“Here, sir, put off the other half of your apprenticeship,” Sindefy said. “Take off your apprentice’s hat and cloak.”

Quicksilver said:

“Well said, sweet Sin! Bring forth my bravery: my finery. Now let my trunks shoot forth their silks concealed. I now am free and now will justify my trunks and punks.”

Trunks can be 1) chests for storing such things as clothing, or 2) trunk-hose.

He would now acknowledge his lover and his fine clothing.

These were things that an apprentice was not supposed to have or be able to afford.

Quicksilver continued:

“Avaunt — go! — dull flat cap, then! Via — go! — the curtain that shadowed Borgia!”

He threw his apprentice’s hat and cloak on the ground.

Cesare Borgia (1475-1507) was known for his ability to disguise himself.

Quicksilver continued:

“There lie, thou husk of my envassaed state.

“I, Samson now, have burst the Philistines’ bands and in thy lap, my lovely Delilah, I’ll lie and snore out my enfranchised state.”

“Bands” are 1) bonds (contracts), or 2) shackles and fetters.

Judges 16 tells the story of Samson and Delilah. She betrayed him by cutting his long hair, which (the hair) was the source of his strength.

Quicksilver dressed himself as a gallant, complete with rapier and dagger.

Gallants followed the then-current style of fighting duels with just a rapier and dagger — no shield.

He then sang:

“When Samson was a tall [brave] young man

“His power and strength increasèd then.”

Quicksilver then said:

“He sold no more, neither cup, nor can, but did them all despise.

“Old Touchstone, now write to thy friends for one to sell thy base gold ends.

“Quicksilver now no more thee attends, Touchstone.”

He then asked Security, “But Dad, have thou seen my running — racing — gelding dressed today?”

Quicksilver was also not supposed to have enough money to own a racing horse.

Security was not Frank Quicksilver’s biological father. “Dad” was simply an informal way to address an older man.

The word “dressed” can mean 1) groomed, or 2) prepared for cooking.

“That I have, Frank,” Security said. “The ostler of the Cock dressed him for a breakfast.”

An ostler, aka hostler, was a person who took care of horses.

The Cock was an inn.

“What, did he eat him?” Quicksilver asked.

“No, but he ate his breakfast for dressing him, and so dressed him for breakfast,” Security said.

The ostler had earned his breakfast by dressing, aka grooming, Quicksilver’s horse. That is how the ostler made his living.

Quicksilver said:

“Oh, witty age, where age is young in wit,

“And all youth’s words have greybeards full of it!”

“But, alas, Frank, how will all this lifestyle be maintained now?” Sindefy asked Quicksilver. “Your position as an apprentice maintained it before.”

Quicksilver replied:

“Why, and I maintained my place. I’ll go to the court — another manner of place for maintenance, I hope, than the silly city.

“I heard my father say, I heard my mother sing, an old song and a true:

“Thou art a she-fool, and know’st

“Not what belongs to our male wisdom.”

“I shall be a merchant, indeed! Trust my estate in a wooden trough as he does? What are these ships but tennis balls for the winds to play with? Tossed from one wave to another, now under line and low down, now over the house and high up; sometimes hit brick-walled against a rock, so that the guts fly out again; sometimes struck under the wide hazard, and farewell Master Merchant.”

In the game of court tennis, which was played indoors, a line on the wall indicated the lower boundary of play. The “house” was a sloping roof that indicated the upper boundary of play. “Bricked-walled” is a corruption of bricole, a stroke in which the ball was hit on a side wall and advanced toward the opponent. The hazard was an opening in the wall. Balls hit into them won points.

Tennis balls were made of hair, and when they wore out, they spilled their guts.

Sindefy said:

“Well, Frank, well, the seas, you say, are uncertain.

“But he who sails in your court-seas shall find them ten times fuller of hazard and danger, wherein to see what is to be seen is torment more than a free spirit can endure.

“But when you come to suffer, how many injuries swallow you? What care and devotion must you use to humor an imperious lord? Proportion your looks to his looks, smile to his smiles? Fit your sails to the wind of his breath?"

"Tush, he who cannot do that is no journeyman — no skilled worker — in his craft," Quicksilver said.

Sindefy replied:

"But he's worse than an apprentice who does it, not only humoring the lord, but every trencher-bearer and waiter, every groom and servant, who by indulgence and intelligence crept into his favor and by pandarism into his bedchamber."

Gallants can advance at court by being on friendly terms with lords and with the servants who encourage the vices of their lords and who spy on and gossip about them and who provide them with whores.

Sindefy continued:

"The servant rules the roost, and when my honorable lord says, 'It shall be thus,' my worshipful rascal, the groom of his close-stool, says, 'It shall not be thus,' claps the door after him, and who dares enter?"

A close-stool is a toilet: an enclosed chamber pot.

Some servants gained and exercised power by controlling access to their lords. If you never see a lord, you can't ask him for favors.

Sindefy continued:

"An apprentice, quoth you? It is but to learn to live, and does that disgrace a man?"

Being an apprentice is nothing to be ashamed of: The apprentice is simply learning to make a living.

Sindefy continued:

“He who rises hardly — by facing and overcoming difficulties — stands firmly; but he who rises with ease, alas, falls as easily.”

“A pox on you,” Quicksilver said, “Who taught you this morality?”

Security said:

“It is owing to this witty age, Master Francis.

“But indeed, Mistress Sindefy, all trades complain of inconvenience, and therefore it is best to have none.

“The merchant, he complains and says, ‘Overseas trading is subject to much uncertainty and loss.’

“Let them keep their goods on dry land, with a vengeance — with a curse — and not expose other men’s substances to the mercy of the winds, under protection of a wooden wall — the ship’s hull — as Master Francis says, and all for greedy desire to enrich themselves with unconscionable gain, two for one, or so.

“In contrast, I, and such other honest men who live by lending money, are content with moderate profit — thirty or forty in the hundred, so we may have it with quietness and out of peril of wind and weather, rather than run those dangerous courses of trading, as they do.”

The maximum legal rate of interest that could be charged was ten percent — not thirty or forty percent.

“Aye, Dad, thou may well be called Security, for thou take the safest course,” Quicksilver said.

Security said:

“Indeed, I take the safest course — and the quieter, and the more contented, and, no doubt, the more godly.

“For merchants in their courses are never pleased, but instead they are always repining and complaining against heaven. One prays for a westerly wind to carry his ship forth; another for an easterly to bring his ship home; and at every shaking of a leaf, he falls into an agony to think what danger his ship is in on such and such a coast, and so forth.

“The farmer, he is always at odds with the weather. Sometimes the clouds have been too barren; sometimes the heavens forget themselves [and rain at the wrong time, when water is not needed], their harvests answer not their hopes; sometimes the season turns out to be too fruitful, corn will bear no price, and so forth.

“The artificer — the trickster and con-man — he’s all for a stirring world; if his trade is too dull and falls short of his expectation, then he falls out of joint.”

Quicksilver wanted his trade to be that of a conman.

Security continued:

“Whereas we who trade nothing but money are free from all this. We are pleased with all weathers: Let it rain or hold up, be calm or windy, let the season be whatsoever, let trade go how it will, we take all in good part, even whatever pleases the heavens to send us, provided that the sun does not stand still and the moon keeps her usual returns from new moon and the sun and moon together make days, months, and years.”

“And you have good security?” Quicksilver asked.

“Aye, by the Virgin Mary, Frank,” Security said. “That’s the special point.”

Quicksilver said:

“And yet, indeed, we must have trades and tradesmen in order to live, for we cannot stand without legs nor fly without wings, and a number of such scurvy, contemptible phrases and worthless sayings.

“No, I say still and always, he who has wit, let him live by his wit; he who has none, let him be a tradesman.”

Security said:

“Witty Master Francis! It would be a pity if any trade should dull that quick brain of yours.

“Do but bring Knight Petronel into my parchment toils — traps of contracts — once, and you shall never need to toil in any trade, on my credit.

“You know his wife’s land?”

“Even to a foot, sir, I have been often there,” Quicksilver said. “A pretty fine seat and country estate, good land, all entire within itself — that is, it has all that is needed.”

“Is it well wooded?” Security asked.

“It has two hundred pounds’ worth of wood ready to fell, and a fine sweet house that stands just in the midst of it, like a prick in the middle of a circle,” Quicksilver said.

“A prick in the midst of a circle” is 1) an arrow or pin in the center of a target, or 2) a penis in a vagina, and, possibly, 3) an erect clitoris (if the vulva is regarded as a circle).

Hmm. Sir Petronel’s wife’s “land” is a pretty fine seat, well-wooded [with pubic hair], with a sweet house in the midst of a circle? Say no more.

Sir Petronel’s wife, of course, is Gertrude.

Quicksilver continued:

“I wish I were its farmer, for a hundred pounds a year!”

He would rent the land for a hundred pounds, and he could immediately sell the wood for two hundred pounds. He would, no doubt, also plow the “land,” and possibly charge others to plow it.

Security said:

“Excellent Master Francis, how I do long to do thee good! How I do hunger and thirst to have the honor to enrich thee!”

Matthew 5:6 states, “Blessed are they which do hunger and thirst after righteousness: for they shall be filled” (King James Version).

Security continued:

“Aye, even to die, so that thou might inherit my living. Even hunger and thirst! For on my religion, Master Francis — and so tell Knight Petronel — I do it to do him a pleasure.”

“By the Virgin Mary, Dad, his horses are now coming up to bear down his lady,” Quicksilver said. “Will thou lend him thy stable to set them in?”

“Indeed, Master Francis, I would be loath to lend my stable out of doors — to a stranger,” Security said. “In a greater matter I will pleasure him, but not in this.”

Frank Quicksilver said to himself:

“A pox on your ‘hunger and thirst’!”

He then said out loud:

“Well, Dad, let him have money.

“All he could in any way get is bestowed on a ship now bound for Virginia, the frame of which voyage is so closely conveyed and secretly carried out that neither his new lady nor any of her friends know it.

“Notwithstanding, as soon as his lady’s hand is gotten to the sale of her inheritance, and you have furnished him with money, he will immediately hoist sail and go away.”

Impoverished gallants sometimes traveled to Virginia to make a new life for themselves.

Security said:

“Now, may a frank — steady — gale of wind go with him, Master Frank! We have too few such knight adventurers. Who would not sell away competent and moderate certainties to purchase, with any danger, excellent uncertainties?”

In other words: Who wouldn’t trade away safe and certain money to gamble and risk it all on a dangerous chance of getting an uncertain but excellent profit?

Security wouldn’t.

He continued:

“Your true knight venturer always does it. Let his wife seal today; he shall have his money today.”

When Sir Petronel’s wife put her seal on the contract for the sale of the land, he would get the money.

Quicksilver began:

“Tomorrow she shall, Dad, before she goes into the country; to work her to which action with the more tricky contrivances, I purpose immediately to advance my sweet Sin here to the place of her gentlewoman-attendant; whom you, for the more credibility, shall present as your friend’s daughter, a gentlewoman of the country, newly come up to London with a will for a while to learn fashions, indeed, and be in attendance to some lady; and she shall buzz pretty and devious chat into her lady’s ear, feeding her humors so serviceably — as you know is the manner of such as she is —”

“Sweet Sin” refers to 1) Sindefy, and 2) the sin of lechery.

Security interrupted, “True, good Master Francis.”

Quicksilver finished:

“— so that she shall keep her port — her mind — open to anything she recommends to her.”

Sindefy could help convince Gertrude to sell her inheritance.

Security said:

“On my religion, I swear that this is a most fashionable project. As good she spoil the lady as the lady spoil her, for it is three to one of one side.”

The word “spoil” can mean 1) plunder, and 2) corrupt her character.

The odds are three to one in favor of Sindefy plundering Gertrude rather than Gertrude corrupting Sindefy’s character.

Security continued:

“Sweet Mistress Sin, how you are bound to Master Francis! I do not doubt to see you shortly wed one of the head men of our city.”

“Head men” are 1) movers and shakers, and 2) cuckolds, who were supposed to have invisible horns growing on their head.

“But sweet Frank, when shall my father Security present me to Gertrude?” Sindefy asked.

Frank Quicksilver answered, “With all festination and speed. I have broken the ice to it and suggested it to Gertrude already, and I will immediately go to the knight's house, whither, my good old Dad, let me ask thee with all formality to man — to escort — her.”

The knight's house was the dwelling where he and Gertrude were staying independently in London.

Security replied:

“Command me, Master Francis; I do hunger and thirst to do thee service.”

He then said to Sindefy:

“Come, sweet Mistress Sin, take leave of my Winifred, and we will instantly meet frank Master Francis at your lady's.”

Winifred was Security's young wife.

“At your lady's” means the place where Gertrude and Sir Petronel were staying. Once Sindefy gets the place as Gertrude's gentlewoman-attendant, Gertrude will be her lady.

Winifred appeared at a window above them.

She called, “Where is my Cu there? Cu?”

“Cu” was Winifred pet name for Se-CU-rity.

“Cu” is the beginning of the word “Cuckold.”

“Aye, Winnie,” Security said.

“Will thou come in, sweet Cu?” Winifred asked.

“Aye, Winnie, right now,” Security said.

Everyone except Quicksilver exited.

Alone, he said to himself:

“‘Aye, Winnie,’ said he?”

“That’s all he can do, poor man; he may well cut off her name at Winnie.”

In other words: Winifred can whinny like a mare, but Security cannot perform the services of a stallion to a mare. He is unable to free her from her desire for an orgasm by giving her one.

In this society, “freed” was sometimes spelled “fred.”

An old, jealous husband can keep a young wife from having freedom.

An old, jealous, impotent husband can also keep a young wife free of sexual satisfaction. Winni-freed has been freed of whinnying “Oh! Oh! Oh! Oh! Oh!” in bed.

If Security was impotent, he would be forced to say “nay” to any requests for sex.

A synonym of “whinny” is “neigh.”

Quicksilver continued:

“Oh, it is an egregious pandar! What won’t a usurious knave be, as long as he may be rich? Oh, it is a notable Jew’s trump!”

A Jew’s trump is a Jew’s harp: a term for a usurer.

According to Quicksilver, Security was or would be willing to use his young wife, Winifred, to get wealth from other people.

“I hope to live to see dog’s meat made from the old usurer’s flesh, dice made from his bones, and indentures made from his skin; and yet his skin is too thick to make parchment, but it would make good boots for a peterman to catch salmon in.”

A peterman is a fisherman. St. Peter was a fisherman. Peter boats were trawlers.

A peterman is also a pandar. The salmon are the peterman's prey. "Boots" can mean "booty" and "plunder." Boots could be the bait for the salmon that the peterman wants to catch.

Quicksilver continued:

"The only smooth skin to make fine vellum — fine, smooth parchment — is a Puritan's skin; they are the smoothest and slickest knaves in a country."

He exited and went to Sir Petronel's lodging.

— 2.3 —

Sir Petronel, who was wearing riding boots and carrying a riding wand, aka riding crop, talked with Quicksilver. They were at Sir Petronel's lodging.

Sir Petronel said:

"I'll be out of this wicked town as fast as my horse can trot.

"Here's now no good action for a man to spend his time in. Taverns grow dead; ordinaries are blown up and ruined financially and closed down; plays are at a standstill; houses of whore-hospitality are at a fall and in a low state; not a hat-feather is waving nor a spur is jingling anywhere.

"I'll go away immediately."

Frank Quicksilver said, "You'd best take some crowns in your purse, knight, or else your eastward castle will smoke but miserably."

Sir Petronel did not have money to buy firewood.

"Oh, Frank!" Sir Petronel said. "My castle? Alas, all the castles I have are built with air, as thou know."

“I know it, knight, and therefore I wonder to where your lady is going,” Quicksilver said.

Sir Petronel replied:

“Indeed, to seek her fortune, I think.

“I said I had a castle and land eastward, and eastward she will go without contradiction; her coach and the coach of the sun must meet full butt.”

There was no castle, and so Gertrude would continue to journey eastward until she meets the Sun head-on.

Phoebus Apollo drove the Sun-chariot, aka Sun-coach.

“And the sun being outshined with Her Ladyship’s glory, she fears he goes westward to hang himself.”

The sun, outshone by Gertrude’s splendor, will, she imagines, go westward to the gallows at Tyburn and hang itself. Yes, Gertrude is that egotistical.

“And I fear, when her enchanted castle becomes invisible, Her Ladyship will return and follow his example,” Quicksilver said.

“Oh, I wish that she would have the grace to hang herself, for I shall never be able to pacify her when she sees herself deceived so,” Sir Petronel said.

Quicksilver said:

“Pacifying her can be made to happen as easily as can be.

“Tell her she mistook your directions, and that shortly you yourself will go down with her to show her that your castle exists. And then, just clothe her crupper in a new gown and you may drive her any way you wish.”

A “crupper” is a horse’s hindquarters, but here it is Gertrude’s butt.

Quicksilver continued:

“For these women, sir, are like Essex calves: You must wriggle them on by the tail continually, or they will never drive orderly.”

Calves could be made to move in the desired direction by twisting their tails.

Metaphorically, a man who wriggles his wife’s tail can make her move in the desired direction. The man must continually satisfy her in bed.

Sir Petronel said, “But alas, sweet Frank, thou know my financial ability and resources will not furnish her blood — her passion and desire — with those costly humors and indulgences.”

In other words, he can’t afford to buy her expensive items such as new gowns.

“Cast that cost on me, sir,” Quicksilver said. “I have spoken to my old pandar, Security, for money or commodity, and commodity, if you are willing, I know he will procure you.”

Quicksilver was trying to swindle Sir Petronel by getting him to buy a commodity. Someone who needed money would get a loan, but if that person were desperate or foolish, he could be induced to accept part or all of the loan in the form of shoddy goods of various kinds, such as dolls and hobbyhorses. These would be sold at a loss.

For example, someone would borrow one hundred pounds and would get what was supposed to be one hundred pounds’ worth of a commodity. The victim would sell the commodity for fifty pounds but would owe the lender one hundred pounds. The swindle was a way to get around laws limiting the amount of interest that could be demanded for a loan. Often, the man being swindled was a young gallant who consorted with prostitutes.

“Commodity!” Sir Petronel asked. “Alas, what commodity?”

“Why, sir, what do you say to figs and raisins?” Quicksilver asked.

“A plague on figs and raisins and all such frail, easily spoiled commodities!” Sir Petronel said. “We shall make nothing from them.”

A “frail” is also a kind of basket in which figs and other fruit can be kept.

“Why, then, sir, what do you say to forty pounds in roasted beef?” Quicksilver said.

“Out upon it, I have less stomach to that than to the figs and raisins,” Sir Petronel said. “I’ll go out of town, although I sojourn with a friend of mine, for I must not stay here; my creditors have set a watch to arrest me, and I have no friend under heaven but my sword to bail me out.”

“Out upon” means 1) “curses upon,” or 2) “damnation to,” according to the Oxford English Dictionary.

He could fight with his sword, or he could hock it to get money for bail.

For a knight to be without a sword was a disgrace.

Frank Quicksilver said, “God save me, knight, put them in sufficient sureties — securities — rather than let your sword bail you. Let them take their choice, either the King’s Bench or the Fleet, or which of the two Counters they like best, for, by the Lord, I like none of them.”

Counters are prisons, as are the King's Bench and the Fleet. One sufficient surety was to allow them to know that the debtor, Sir Petronel, was securely imprisoned.

Another kind of sufficient surety was to give them secure guarantees that they would be paid. Since Sir Petronel had no money, the guarantees would have to be made by someone else.

"Well, Frank, there is no jesting with my earnest necessity," Sir Petronel said. "Thou know if I don't get ready money immediately to further my voyage begun, all's lost, and all is lost that I have already paid out about it."

"Earnest" is money paid in advance to secure a contract.

"Ready money" is cash.

"Why, then, sir, in earnest: If you can get your wise lady to set her hand to the sale of her inheritance, the bloodhound Security will smell out ready money for you instantly," Quicksilver said.

Sir Petronel said:

"There spoke an angel!"

One kind of angel is the coin called an angel.

"To bring her to which conformity, I must feign myself extremely amorous, and, alleging urgent excuses for my stay behind, part with her as passionately as she would from her foisting — farting, stinking — hound."

Quicksilver said:

"You have the sow by the right ear, sir. That's the right way to proceed.

“I warrant there was never a child who longed more to ride a cockhorse or wear his new coat than she longs to ride in her new coach. She would long for everything when she was a maiden, and now she will run mad for them. I lay my life she will have four children every year; and what charge and change — expense and inconstancy — of humor you must endure while she is pregnant with child, and how she will tie you to your tackling until she is with child, a dog would not endure.”

The word “tackle” can mean “genitals.” Gertrude will keep her husband, Sir Petronel, very busy in bed until she becomes pregnant.

“Nay, there is no turnspit dog bound to his wheel more servilely than you shall be to her wheel.”

Wheels are circles, and women have sexual circles.

“For as that dog can never climb the top of his turnspit except when the top comes under him, so shall you never climb the top of her contentment but when she is under you.”

Dogs walked in exercise wheels to turn the spit on which food was roasted. The dog will never reach the top of the wheel, except when the wheel revolves and the top goes under its paws.

Because of his lack of money, Sir Petronel will never be able to satisfy Gertrude’s desires, except when she is under him during sex.

“By God’s light, how thou terrify me!” Sir Petronel said.

Quicksilver said:

“Nay, pay attention, sir.

“What nurses, what midwives, what fools, what physicians, what cunning women [fortune tellers and diviners] must be sought for — fearing sometimes she is bewitched, sometimes in a consumption — to tell her tales, to talk bawdy to her, to make her laugh, to give her glisters [enemas], to let her blood under the tongue and between the toes —”

Bloodletting took place in various parts of the body, including under the tongue and in the foot.

“— how she will revile and kiss you, spit in your face and lick it off again; how she will boast that you are her creature, that she made you out of nothing; how she could have had thousand-mark jointures [thousand-coin marriage settlements]; she could have been made a lady by a Scotch knight and never have married him —”

She could have been a Scotch knight’s common-law wife.

A jointure is joint wealth owned both by a husband and a wife. If the husband dies first, the wife will own the wealth and be provided for.

King James I of England was also King James VI of Scotland. He sold knighthoods to raise money.

Quicksilver continued:

“— she could have had poignados in her bed every morning ___”

An alternate form of “poignado” is “poinado.”

Perhaps “poignado” is a portmanteau word combining “poinado” and “panada” and “poignant.”

Panadas are bread puddings, and poinados are small daggers.

In this context, a small dagger is metaphorically a penis.

In this society, “poignant” refers to sharpness of mental and physical feelings. It also refers to sharp, pungent tastes. Gertrude has a sharp desire for bread puddings and for sex.

A proverb stated, “Puddings and paramours would be hotly handled.”

Quicksilver continued:

“— how she set you up, and how she will pull you down — you’ll never be able to stand upon your legs to endure it.”

“How she set you up” means 1) how she set you up financially, or 2) how she gave you an erection.

“Pull you down” means 1) ruin you financially, or 2) make you no longer have an erection.

The word “stand” is slang for “erection.” Because of sexual exhaustion, Sir Petronel will not be able to maintain an erection.

Sir Petronel said:

“Out of my fortune, what a death is my life bound face-to-face to!

“The best thing about it is that a large, time-fitted, opportunistic conscience is bound to nothing. Marriage is just a form in the school of policy and cunning deception, to which scholars sit fastened only with painted — imaginary — chains.

“Old Security’s young wife is never the further off with me. She is still accessible to me.”

Books were valuable and were sometimes chained to desks or tables, but scholars, who were supposed to be “tied” to their desks, could move around as desired.

Sir Petronel was saying that an unscrupulous man could get out of marriage ties, and he was saying that although old Security's young wife was married, he could still try to seduce her.

Quicksilver said, "Thereby lies a tale, sir. The old usurer will be here immediately with my punk Sindefy, whom you know your lady has promised me to employ for her gentlewoman-attendant, and he — with a purpose to feed on you — invites you most solemnly by me to supper."

Sir Petronel said:

"It falls out excellently fitly.

"I see desire of gain makes jealousy venturous and willing to take risks."

Seeing Gertrude coming toward them, Sir Petronel said, "See, Frank, here comes my lady. Lord, how she views thee! She does not know thee, I think. She doesn't recognize you in this bravery — this splendid clothing you are wearing."

Gertrude asked:

"How are things now?"

She then asked Quicksilver:

"Who are you, I ask?"

He answered, "One Master Francis Quicksilver, if it shall please Your Ladyship."

Of course, she recognized the name.

Gertrude said to herself:

"God's my dignity! As I am a lady, if he did not make me blush so that my eyes stood a-watering! I wish that I were unmarried again."

She was impressed by his fine clothing.

She then asked out loud:

“Where’s the woman I am going to employ as my gentlewoman-attendant, I ask?”

Security and Sindefy entered the scene.

“See, madam, she now comes to attend you,” Quicksilver said.

Security said, “God save my honorable knight and his worshipful lady!”

He removed his hat and bowed.

“You’re very welcome,” Gertrude said. “You must not put on your hat yet.”

Normally, after bowing, a man would be invited to put on his hat again.

“Madam, until I know Your Ladyship’s further pleasure, I will not presume to put on my hat again,” Security said.

“And is this a gentleman’s daughter newly come out of the country?” Gertrude asked about Sindefy.

“She is, madam,” Security said, “and she is one whom her father has a special care to bestow in some honorable lady’s service, to put her out of her honest humors and chaste whims, indeed, for she had a great desire to be a nun, if it shall please you.”

The word “nun” was sometimes used to mean “whore.”

“A nun?” Gertrude asked. “What nun? A nun substantive or a nun adjective?”

She had misunderstood. She was talking about kinds of nouns, not nuns.

William Lily wrote in his An Introduction of the Eight Parts of Speech (London, 1544), “A noun substantive is that standeth by himself and requireth not another word to be joined with him [...]. A noun adjective [i.e. an adjective] is that [...] requireth to be joined with another word.”

“A nun substantive, madam, I hope, if a nun be a noun,” Security said. “But I mean, lady, a vowed maid of that order.”

Of course, “vowed” sounds much like “vowel.”

A “maid” is a maiden.

The word “substantive” means “noun” in the sense of “person, place, or thing.”

A substantive nun is a real (religious) nun.

An adjectival nun is a whore who needs to be joined with another “word”: a man.

Gertrude said, “I’ll teach her to be a maid of the order, I promise you.”

Gertrude being Gertrude, a “maid of the order” is a sexual initiate.

She then asked Sindefy, “And can you do any work that belongs to a lady’s chamber?”

“What I cannot do, madam, I would be glad to learn,” Sindefy replied.

Gertrude said:

“Well said. Hold up, then; hold up your head, I say.”

Sindefy had been keeping her head bowed as she talked to Gertrude.

Gertrude then said to her:

“Come here a little closer.”

“I thank Your Ladyship,” Sindefy said.

Gertrude added:

“And listen —”

She said to Security:

“Good man, you may put on your hat now. I am not looking at you.”

She then said to Sindefy:

“I must have you one of my faction now, not of my knight’s, maid.”

Gertrude wanted to be the boss in her home, not Sir Petronel. She therefore wanted all the servants to be on her side and obey her orders. She wanted them to be in her bow — that is, under her control.

“No, indeed, madam, of yours,” Sindefy said.

Her words were ambiguous. They could mean 1) No, I will not be of your faction: I will be of your husband’s faction, or 2) No, I will not be of your husband’s faction: I will be of your faction.

“And you must draw all my servants in my bow, and keep my counsel, and tell me tales, and put riddles to me, and read on a book sometimes when I am busy [ahem, busy in bed, perhaps not with her husband], and laugh at country gentlewomen, and command anything in the house for my retainers, and care not what you spend, for it is all mine.”

When Gertrude wanted to commit adultery, she would have Sindefy read a book instead of act as her chapereone.

Gertrude was claiming that all the wealth would be hers, although in a patriarchal society, all the wealth would normally be the husband's. Since her husband, Sir Petronel, was in fact impoverished, although Gertrude did not know that yet, all the wealth would in fact be hers.

Gertrude continued:

“And in any case you must be still and always a maiden, whatsoever you do, or whatsoever any man can do to you.”

“I warrant Your Ladyship for that,” Security said.

Yes, Sindefy would call herself a maiden, aka virgin. It did not matter that she wasn't one.

Gertrude said to Sindefy:

“Very well. You shall ride in my coach with me into the country tomorrow morning.”

She then said to her husband:

“Come, knight, please let's make a short supper, and go to bed quickly.”

“Nay, good madam,” Security said. “This night I have a short supper at home that waits on His Worship's acceptance.”

He wanted Sir Petronel to be his supper guest.

“By my faith, but he shall not go, sir,” Gertrude said. “I shall swoon and faint if he eats a meal away from me.”

“Please, let me go to the supper,” her husband, Sir Petronel, said. “Shall Security lose his provision — shall he lose what he has spent on this meal?”

“Aye, by our Lady, sir, rather than I lose my longing,” Gertrude said.

Her longing was to have sex with her husband.

“Come in, I say. As I am a lady, you shall not go!”

Quicksilver whispered to Security, “I told him what a burr he had gotten.”

Gretchen was sticking to Sir Petronel like a burr.

According to the Oxford English Dictionary, a burr can also be 1) “a circle,” or 2) “A broad iron ring on a tilting spear just behind the place for the hand.”

A burr can be a vagina (1 above), and it can be a vagina enveloping a penis (2 above: a ring on a spear).

“If you will not sup away from your knight, madam, let me entreat Your Ladyship to sup at my house with him,” Security said.

“No, by my faith, sir,” Gertrude said, “because then we cannot be in bed soon enough after supper.”

Sir Petronel said:

“What a medicine is this!”

He meant: What a bitter pill is this!

“Well, Master Security, you are newly married as well as I; I hope you are bound as well. We must honor our young wives, you know.”

Quicksilver whispered to Security, “Honor her wish in policy, Dad, until tomorrow she has sealed the contract and signed away her land.”

He meant that Sir Petronel ought to obey the wishes of his wife until she had signed away her property. This was “policy”: something that needed to be done in order to plunder her wealth.

“I hope in the morning your knighthood will yet breakfast with me?” Security asked.

“As early as you will, sir,” Sir Petronel said.

“I thank Your good Worship,” Security said. “I do hunger and thirst to do you good, sir.”

“Come, sweet knight, come,” Gertrude said. “I do hunger and thirst to be in bed with thee.”

They exited.

ACT 3 (Eastward Ho!)

— 3.1 —

Sir Petronel, Quicksilver, Security, Bramble, and Winifred met together at Security's house. They had just eaten breakfast.

Bramble was a lawyer.

“Thanks for our feast-like breakfast, good Master Security,” Sir Petronel said. “I am sorry by reason of my immediate haste to go on so long a voyage to Virginia, I am without means to make any kind amends and requitals to show how affectionately I take your kindness, and to confirm by some worthy ceremony a perpetual league of friendship between us.”

He lacked money to perform some action that would repay Security for the meal.

Security replied:

“Excellent knight, let this be a token between us of inviolable friendship.

“I am newly married to this fair gentlewoman, you know, and, by my hope to make her fruitful and pregnant, although I am something in years, I vow faithfully to you to make you godfather, although in your absence, to the first child I am blessed with. And henceforth call me gossip, I ask you, if you please to accept it.”

A godfather will try to encourage the child to develop in a wholesome way, something that can be difficult when the two are separated by a great distance, especially in the early 1600s.

In this society, a gossip is a friend.

Sir Petronel said:

“In the highest degree of gratitude, my most worthy gossip.

“For confirmation of which friendly title, let me entreat my fair gossip, your wife here, to accept this diamond and keep it as my gift to her first child, wheresoever my fortune in the outcome of my voyage shall bestow me.”

He offered Winifred a diamond ring.

Godparents traditionally gave silver spoons to the godchild. A ring was an unusual present for a godchild, but rings were usual presents given by lovers.

Security said to Winifred:

“What is this now, my coy wedlock — my shy wife. Why are you reluctant to accept so noble a favor and gift?

“Take it, I tell you, with all affection, and, by way of taking your leave, present boldly your lips to our honorable gossip.”

Winifred accepted the ring.

Quicksilver said to himself, “How venturous he is to him, and how jealous to others!”

Security was usually jealous concerning his wife, but because he was greedy to get the ring and to get Sir Petronel’s wife’s land, he allowed his wife to kiss Sir Petronel.

Kissing Winifred, Sir Petronel said:

“Long may this kind touch of our lips print in our hearts all the forms of affection!”

One form of affection is sex.

Sir Petronel then said to Security:

“And now, my good gossip, if the written contract is ready to which my wife should seal her name, let them be brought this morning before she takes her coach into the country, and my kindness shall persuade her to dispatch it.”

“The written contract is ready, sir,” Security said. “My learned counsel here, Master Bramble the lawyer, has perused it, and within this hour I will bring the scrivener — the notary — with it to your worshipful lady.”

“Good Master Bramble, I will here take my leave of you, then,” Sir Petronel said. “God send you fortunate pleas and lawsuits, sir, and contentious clients!”

“And you foreright — favorable — winds, sir, and a fortunate voyage!” Bramble said.

He exited.

A messenger entered the scene and said, “Sir Petronel, here are three or four gentlemen who desire to speak with you.”

“Who are they?” Sir Petronel asked.

“They are your followers — your partners — in this voyage, knight: Captain Seagull and his associates,” Quicksilver said. “I met them this morning and told them you would be here.”

Sir Petronel said to the messenger:

“I ask you to let them enter.”

The messenger exited.

Sir Petronel then said:

“I know they long to be gone, for their stay is dangerous.”

If they delayed setting off on their journey, their ship could be seized to pay off debt.

Captain Seagull, Scapethrift, and Spendall entered the scene.

Captain Seagull was the captain of the ship that was supposed to take Sir Petronel to Virginia, and Scapethrift and Spendall were adventurers with Captain Seagull.

“God save my honorable Colonel!” Captain Seagull said.

By “Colonel,” he meant Sir Petronel.

“Welcome, good Captain Seagull, and worthy gentlemen!” Sir Petronel replied. “If you will meet my friend Frank here, and me, at the Blue Anchor Tavern by Billingsgate this evening, we will there drink to our happy voyage, be merry, and take boat to our ship with all expedition — with all haste.”

“Defer your voyage to Virginia no longer, I ask you, sir,” Captain Seagull said, “but as your voyage is hitherto carried closely and secretly and in another knight’s name, so for your own safety and ours let the secrecy be continued, our meeting and speedy purpose of departing known to as few as is possible, lest your ship and goods be seized for debt.”

“Well advised, Captain,” Quicksilver said. “Our colonel shall have money this morning to dispatch all our departures. Bring those gentlemen at night to the place appointed, and with our skins full of vintage — our bellies full of wine — we’ll take occasion by the vantage and go away.”

They would take opportunity by the forelock — at the opportune, advantageous time — and sail away.

A proverb stated, “Take Time (Occasion, aka Opportunity) by the forelock, for she is bald behind.”

“We will not fail to be there, sir,” Captain Seagull said.

Sir Petronel replied:

“Good morning, good Captain, and my worthy associates.”

He then said to Winifred:

“Health and all sovereignty to my beautiful gossip!”

“Sovereignty” is freedom. An old, jealous husband can keep a young wife from having freedom.

He then said to Security:

“As for you, sir, we shall see you very soon with the written contract.”

“With the written contract and crowns — coins, money — for my honorable gossip,” Security said. “I do hunger and thirst to do you good, sir!”

— 3.2 —

Outside the lodging of Sir Petronel and Gertrude, a coachman appeared, in his frock, aka long coat, in haste and eating part of his breakfast.

The coachman said to himself, “Here’s a stir when citizens ride out of town, indeed, as if all the house were on fire! By God’s light, they will not give a man leave to eat his breakfast before he rises.”

Hamlet, a footman, arrived in haste and said, “What, Coachman! My lady’s coach, for shame! Her Ladyship’s ready to come down.”

In Act 4, scene 5, of Hamlet, Ophelia calls for her coach. In Hamlet, she goes mad, and Gertrude’s desire to be a lady can be regarded as a kind of madness.

The coachman exited.

Potkin, a tankard bearer, entered the scene and said:

“By God’s foot, Hamlet, are you mad? To where do you run now? You should brush up my old mistress!”

Part of Hamlet's job was to brush Mrs. Touchstone's fine clothing.

Hamlet exited.

Sindefy entered the scene and said, "What, Potkin! You must put away your tankard and put on your blue coat and wait upon Mistress Touchstone as she goes into the country."

A blue coat was part of a serving-man's livery: his distinctive clothing.

Mistress Touchstone was Mrs. Touchstone. She was going with her daughter Gertrude into the countryside.

Sindefy exited.

Potkin said to himself, "I will, indeed, right away."

He exited.

Gertrude and her mother were only two people, but they kept many servants hopping.

Mistress Fond and Mistress Gazer entered the scene. They were city wives: female citizens of London. They had urban tastes and manners. They were not lower class, nor were they the highest class. They were a middling class.

"Come, sweet Mistress Gazer, let's watch here and see my Lady Flash take coach."

Lady Flash was Mrs. Petronel Flash: Gertrude.

"On my word, here's a very fine place to stand in," Mistress Gazer said. "Did you see the new ship launched yesterday, Mistress Fond?"

"Oh, God, and we citizens should lose such a sight!" Mistress Fond said.

“I promise, here will be double as many people to see her take coach as there were to see the new ship take water,” Mistress Gazer said.

“Take water” is ambiguous. “Take to water” meant that the ship was launched. “Take on water” meant that the ship was sinking or that the ship was bringing on board supplies of fresh water.

Gertrude thought that her ship of fortune had arrived, but readers know that her husband is impoverished.

“Oh, she’s married to a very fine castle in the country, they say,” Mistress Fond said.

Gertrude thought that she had married money and property and wealth.

“But there are no giants in the castle, are there?” Mistress Gazer asked.

“Oh, no, they say her knight killed them all, and therefore he was knighted,” Mistress Fond said.

Giants are just as real as Sir Petronel’s castle.

“I wish to God Her Ladyship would come away — would make her appearance!” Mistress Gazer said.

Gertrude, Mistress Touchstone, Sindefy, Hamlet, and Potkin entered the scene.

“She comes! She comes! She comes!” Mistress Fond said.

“Pray heaven bless Your Ladyship!” Mistress Gazer and Mistress Fond said.

“Thank you, good people,” Gertrude said.

Queen Elisabeth I often said these words when addressing the public.

“My coach, for the love of heaven, my coach!” Gertrude said. “In good truth, I shall swoon and faint else.”

“Coach! Coach!” Hamlet called. “My lady’s coach!”

He exited.

Gertrude said:

“As I am a lady, I think I am with child already, I long for a coach so.”

A pregnant woman often has cravings for strange combinations of food; Gertrude had a craving to ride in a coach.

Gertrude then asked:

“May one be with child before they are married, mother?”

Her mother, Mrs. Touchstone, answered, “Aye, by our lady, madam, a little thing does that. I have seen a little prick no bigger than a pin’s head swell bigger and bigger until it has come to an ancome, and even so it is in these cases.”

A tiny pinprick in the skin can swell up and become an ulcerous boil, aka an ancome.

A little prick can swell up, enter a vagina, and cause a woman’s belly to swell up.

The word “case” can mean “vagina.”

Hamlet returned and said, “Your coach is coming, madam.”

Gertrude said:

“That’s well done and well said. Now, heaven! I think I am even up to the knees in preferment.”

“Preferment” is promotion to high rank.

She sang:

“But a little higher, but a little higher, but a little higher,

“There, there, there lies Cupid’s fire.”

Yes, Cupid’s fire lies a little higher than a woman’s knees. It’s up there by the pubic bone. It’s the vagina.

The song lines are from Thomas Campion’s bawdy song “Beauty, Since You So Much Desire” from his Fourth Book of Airs (1617), in which he refers to toes and heels and then to Cupid’s fire.

“But must this young man, if it shall please you, madam, run by your coach all the way on foot?” Mrs. Touchstone asked.

Footmen ran beside a coach as it traveled. They were servants to the high-class people riding inside the coach.

Gertrude’s footman was Hamlet.

“Aye, by my faith, I warrant him,” Gertrude said. “He gives no other milk, as I have another servant who does.”

“No other milk” can metaphorically mean “no other duty.”

Milk is a whitish fluid; so is semen.

A servant can be 1) an employee, or 2) a lover.

Mrs. Touchstone said:

“Alas! It is even a pity, I think. For God’s sake, madam, buy him but a hobby-horse; let the poor youth have something between his legs to ease them.”

A hobby-horse can be 1) a child’s toy horse: a stick with a horse’s head on one end, or 2) a whore.

Yes, youths do have a thing between their legs. Yes, that thing can be eased with one kind of hobby-horse.

Mrs. Touchstone continued:

“Alas, we must do as we would be done to.”

The verb “do” can mean “to have sex with.”

The Golden Rule is to treat other people as you would like to be treated.

Matthew 7:12 states, “Therefore all things whatsoever ye would that men should do to you: do ye even so to them: for this is the law and the prophets” (King James Version).

If you would like other people to have sex with you, then you ought to have sex with other people.

“Bah, hold your peace, dame,” Gertrude said. “You talk like an old fool, I tell you.”

Sir Petronel and Quicksilver entered the scene.

“Will thou be gone, sweet honeysuckle, before I can go with thee?” Sir Petronel asked.

“I request of thee, sweet knight, let me,” Gertrude said. “I do so long to dress up thy castle before thou come. But I marvel how my modest sister occupies herself this morning, that she cannot wait on me as I go to my coach as well as her mother.”

“By the Virgin Mary, madam, she’s married by this time to apprentice Golding,” Quicksilver said. “Your father, and someone more, stole to church with them in all haste, so that the cold meat and food left at your wedding might serve to furnish their nuptial table.”

Gertrude said:

“There’s no base fellow, my father, now, but he’s even fit to father such a daughter. He must call me daughter no more now, but ‘madam,’ and ‘please you, madam,’ and ‘please Your Worship, madam,’ indeed.

“Out upon him! Marry his daughter to a base apprentice!”

Golding was no longer an apprentice, but Gretchen did not know that.

Mrs. Touchstone asked:

“What should one do? Is there no law for one who marries a woman’s daughter against her — that is, my — will?”

Mr. Touchstone had gotten their daughter Mildred married to a man whom Mrs. Touchstone did not want her married to.

Mrs. Touchstone then asked:

“How shall we punish him, madam?”

Gertrude said:

“As I am a lady, if it would snow, we’d so pebble them with snowballs as they come from church!”

She wanted to pebble with snowballs her sister, Mildred, too.

“But sirrah, Frank Quicksilver —”

“Aye, madam,” Quicksilver said.

“Do thou remember since thou and I clapped what-d’ye-call’ts in the garret?” Gertrude asked.

They had clapped genitals — bumped uglies — together.

“I don’t know what you mean, madam,” Quicksilver replied.

It was best not to acknowledge that he had had sex with Gertrude.

Gertrude sang:

“His head as white as milk,

“All flaxen was his hair;

*“But now he is dead,
“And laid in his bed,
“And never will come again.
“God be at your labor!”*

The color of flax is pale yellowish-grey.

Milk is a whitish fluid.

The word “head” can mean 1) the froth at the top of a glass of beer, and 2) the cream that rises to the top of unhomogenized milk.

“His head as white as milk” may mean “semen.”

Quicksilver would never come — ejaculate — with her again.

Touchstone, Golding, and Mildred entered the scene. Mildred was carrying rosemary, which represents constancy and loyalty.

“Was there ever such a lady as Gertrude?” Sir Petronel quietly asked himself.

“See, madam, the bride and bridegroom!” Quicksilver said.

Gertrude said:

“God’s my precious!”

This oath may mean 1) By God’s precious blood, or 2) God’s my precious one.

“God give you joy, Mistress What-lack-you!”

“What lack you” is the cry of a business person selling wares. Gertrude’s “Mistress What-lack-you!” meant “Mrs. Tradesman’s Wife.”

“Now out upon thee, baggage, my sister married in a taffeta hat?”

One definition of “baggage” is a worthless woman.

Gertrude preferred hats that were fancier than taffeta hats.

“By the Virgin Mary, hang you!

“Westward with a waning — a vengeance, aka curse — to ye! Nay, I have done with ye, minion, then, truly.”

A minion can be 1) a hussy, or 2) a darling.

Mildred was her father’s favorite daughter.

“Never look to have my countenance — my good will and favor — any more, nor never look to have anything I can do for thee.

“Thou ride in my coach? Or come down to my castle? Fie upon thee! I charge thee in My Ladyship’s name, call me sister no more.”

Touchstone said:

“If it shall please Your Worship, this is not your sister. This is my daughter, and she calls me father, and so does not Your Ladyship, if it shall please Your Worship, madam.”

He disliked his daughter Gertrude’s pride.

Mrs. Touchstone said:

“No, and Gertrude must not call thee father by the practice of heraldry because thou make thy apprentice thy son as well as she your prodigy.”

She then said to Golding:

“Ah, thou misproud — wrongfully proud — apprentice, do thou dare presume to marry a lady’s sister?”

Golding answered:

“It pleased my master, indeed, to embolden me with his favor.

“And although I confess myself far unworthy so worthy a wife (being in part her servant, as I am your apprentice) yet (since I may say it without boasting) I am born a gentleman, and by the trade I have learned from my master (which I trust taints not my blood) able with my own industry and portion to maintain your daughter, my hope is, heaven will so bless our humble beginning that in the end I shall be no disgrace to the grace with which my master has bound me his double apprentice.”

“Double apprentice” means 1) apprentice, and 2) son-in-law.

“‘Master’ me no more, son, if thou think me worthy to be thy father,” Touchstone said. “Don’t call me ‘master.’”

Gertrude said, “‘Son’! Now, good lord, how he shines, if you mark him! He’s a gentleman!”

“Aye, indeed, madam, I am a gentleman born,” Golding said.

“Never stand on your gentry, master bridegroom,” Sir Petronel said. “If your legs are no better than your arms, you’ll be able to stand upon neither shortly.”

He was punning on “coat of arms.”

“If it shall please Your good Worship, sir, there are two sorts of gentlemen,” Touchstone said.

“What do you mean, sir?” Sir Petronel asked.

Touchstone said, “I make bold to take off my hat to Your Worship —”

“Nay, please don’t take off your hat, sir,” Sir Petronel said. “Put it on again and then continue with your description of two sorts of gentlemen.”

Sir Petronel did not want to put on airs over Touchstone, his father-in-law.

Touchstone said:

“If Your Worship will have it so, I say there are two sorts of gentlemen.

“There is a gentleman artificial, and a gentleman natural.

“Now, although Your Worship is a gentleman natural — Work upon that, now!”

The word “natural” can mean 1) by birth, 2) by nature, and/or 3) foolish.

People could artificially raise themselves to a higher social class by 1) acquiring land, and/or 2) acquiring a university degree, and/or 3) acquiring a military commission, and/or 4) practicing law or medicine.

According to the Oxford English Dictionary, a gentleman is 1) “A man of high social status,” and/or 2) “A man having the characteristics traditionally associated with high social standing; a chivalrous, courteous, or honourable man.”

Quicksilver said:

“Well said and well done, old Touchstone. I am proud to hear thee enter a set speech, indeed.

“Continue, I request thee.”

“I beg your pardon, sir,” Touchstone said. “Your Worship’s a gentleman I do not know. If you are one of my acquaintance, you’re very much disguised, sir.”

The clause “Your Worship’s a gentleman I do not know” can mean “I do not know that Your Worship is a gentleman.”

Touchstone was pretending not to recognize Quicksilver.

“Get on with it, old quipper!” Quicksilver said. “Continue with thy speech, I say.”

Touchstone said:

“What, sir, my speeches were always in vain to Your gracious Worship, and therefore until I speak to you with true, not mock, gallantry indeed, I will save my breath to cool my broth from now on.”

His words showed that he had recognized Quicksilver.

Touchstone then said to Golding and Mildred:

“Come, my ‘poor’ son and daughter, let us hide ourselves in our poor humility and live safe. Ambition consumes itself with the very show.”

He then said to everyone:

“Work upon that now!”

Touchstone, Golding, and Mildred exited.

Gertrude said:

“Let him go, let him go, for God’s sake. Let him make his apprentice his son, for God’s sake; give away his daughter, for God's sake; and when they come begging to us, for God's sake, let's laugh at their 'good husbandry,' for God's sake!"

"Good husbandry" is careful thrift, something that Gertrude did not value.

Gertrude continued:

"Farewell, sweet knight; please make haste to come after me."

"What shall I say?" Sir Petronel said. "I would not have thee go."

If she did not go, she would not find out that his castle did not exist.

Quicksilver sang:

"Now, Oh, now, I must depart;

"Parting though it absence move."

He then said:

"This ditty, knight, do I see in thy looks in capital letters — prominently."

He then sang:

"What a grief 'tis to depart,

"And leave the flower that has my heart!

"My sweet lady, and alack for woe,

"Why should we part so?"

He then said:

"Tell truth, knight, and shame all dissembling lovers: Does not your pain lie on that side? Aren't you in pain because you have to leave your wife?"

The pain in the side was his wife. God removed a rib from Adam in order to create Eve.

Genesis 2:22 states, “And the rib, which the LORD God had taken from man, made he a woman, and brought her unto the man” (King James Version).

“If it do, can thou tell me how I may cure it?” Sir Petronel asked.

Quicksilver said:

“Excellently easily: Divide yourself in two halves, just by the girdlestead — the waist; send one half with your lady, and keep the other half for yourself.”

Taking Gertrude’s sexual desires into consideration, Sir Petronel would keep the half that eats. Gretchen would keep the other half: the half that —.

“Or else do as all true lovers do: Part with your heart and leave your body behind.

“I have seen it done a hundred times. It is as easy a matter for a lover to part without a heart from his sweetheart, and he be never the worse, as for a mouse to get away from a trap and leave his tail behind him.

“Look, here comes the writing: the document.”

Security and a scrivener entered the scene.

“Good morning to My worshipful Lady!” Security said. “I present Your Ladyship with this writing, to which if you please to set your hand, with your knight’s, a velvet gown shall attend your journey, on my credit.”

“What writing is it, knight?” Gertrude asked.

Sir Petronel answered, “The sale, sweetheart, of the poor tenement — poor property — I told thee about, only to make a little money to send thee down furniture for my castle, to which my hand shall lead thee.”

He signed the bond first.

“Very well. Now give me your pen, please,” Gertrude said.

She signed the bond.

Her inheritance of land had been sold for ready money.

“It goes down without chewing, indeed,” Quicksilver said to himself.

She had swallowed the bait of the velvet gown.

“Do Your Worships deliver this as your deed?” the scrivener asked.

“We do,” Gertrude and Sir Petronel replied.

“So now, knight, farewell until I see thee,” Gertrude said.

“All farewell to my sweetheart!” Sir Petronel replied.

“God be with ye, son knight,” Mrs. Touchstone said.

“Farewell, my good mother,” Sir Petronel said.

“Farewell, Frank,” Gertrude said. “I would eagerly take thee down if I could.”

Yes, 1) down in the country, or 2) down in bed so she could change an erection to a non-erection.

Quicksilver said:

“I thank Your good Ladyship.”

He then said:

“Farewell, Mistress Sinfy.”

Everyone exited except for Petronel, Quicksilver, and Security.

Of course, Gertrude and her mother, Mrs. Touchstone, were going on a journey to see Sir Petronel's nonexistent castle.

"Oh, tedious voyage, whereof there is no end!" Sir Petronel complained. "What will they think of me?"

This kind of voyage is an undertaking; in this particular case, it is a marriage.

Quicksilver replied:

"Think what they wish."

This is ambiguous. It can mean 1) You should think about what they wish, and/or 2) They will think what they wish.

He continued:

"They longed for a vagary — an excursion — into the country, and now they are fitted: They have gotten what they wanted.

"If a woman will marry so she can ride in a coach, she will not care if she rides to her ruin. It is the great end of many of their marriages. This is not the first time a lady has ridden a false journey in her coach, I hope."

Women would often ride in a coach to an assignation, aka a tryst, aka a session of adulterous sex. Or they would sexually ride while in a coach. Adultery often ruined marriages.

Another kind of "false journey" is a wild-goose chase.

Sir Petronel said:

"Nay, it doesn't matter; I care little what they think. He who weighs men's thoughts has his hands full of nothing.

“A man in the course of this world should be like a surgeon’s instrument: work in the wounds of others and feel nothing himself. The sharper and subtler, the better.”

“As it falls out now, knight, you shall not need to devise excuses or endure her outcries when she returns,” Quicksilver said. “We shall before they return be gone where they cannot reach us.”

Sir Petronel said to Security, “Well, my kind compeer and associate, you have now the assurance we both can make you. Let me now entreat you that the money we agreed on may be brought to the Blue Anchor Tavern nearby Billingsgate by six o’clock, where I and my chief friends, bound for this voyage, will with feasts attend you.”

“The money, my most honorable compeer, shall without fail observe your appointed hour,” Security said.

Sir Petronel said:

“Thanks, my dear gossip.

“I must now impart to your approved — attested and proven — love a loving secret, as one on whom my life does more rely in friendly trust than any man alive.

“Nor shall you be the chosen secretary, aka confidant, of my affections for affection only. For I protest (if God bless my return) to make you partner in my action’s — my deed’s — gain as deeply as if you had ventured with me half my expenses.”

If Security had risked with Sir Petronel half of Sir Petronel’s expenses, he would lose all that money. If he becomes partner in Sir Petronel’s new action or deed, we can expect Security to lose something.

“Know then, honest gossip, I have enjoyed with such divine contentment the bed and sexual favors of a gentlewoman whom you well know, with the result that I shall never enjoy this tedious voyage, nor live the least part of the time it requires, without her presence, so much do I thirst and hunger to taste the dear feast of her company.

“And if the hunger and the thirst you vow as my sworn gossip to my wished good is — as I know it is — unfeigned and firm, do me an easy favor in your power.”

Security replied:

“Be sure, brave gossip, all that I can do, to my best nerve and utmost strength, is wholly at your service.

“Who is the woman, first, who is your friend?”

A “friend” can be a lover.

Sir Petronel answered:

“The woman is your learned counsel’s wife: the wife of the lawyer, Master Bramble, whom I want you to bring out this evening, in honest neighborliness, to take his leave with you of me, your gossip.

“I, in the meantime, will send this my friend — Quicksilver — home to his house, to bring Bramble’s wife disguised before his face into our company.

“For love has made her look for such a wile — a devious stratagem — to free her from his tyrannous jealousy, and I would take this course before another, in stealing her away to make us sport and entertainment and fool his circumspection and deceive his watchfulness the more grossly.

“And I am sure that no man like yourself has credit with him to entice his jealous disposition to so long stay abroad and away from his home as may give time to her enlargement and liberation in such safe disguise.”

Security said:

“This is a pretty, pithy and vigorous, and most pleasant project and scheme!

“Who would not strain a point of neighborliness for such a point-device — such a perfect plot and plot of vice — that, just as the ship of famous Draco — Sir Francis Drake — circumnavigated the world in 1580, will wind about the lawyer, compassing the world himself?”

Sir Francis Drake sailed around the world, and now this plot will wind around and bind the lawyer, just as the lawyer’s legal papers wind around and bind his victims.

The lawyer Bramble compasses the world: He machinates (engages in plots and schemes), and he manipulates those in his world to his benefit.

Besides “machinate” and “manipulate,” the verb “compass” also means 1) to compost, or 2) to manure.

Literally, in a garden, this can be a good thing. But figuratively, Bramble spreads manure around in his world, and it is a bad thing.

Security said:

“He has the world in his arms, and that’s enough for him without his wife.

“A lawyer is ambitious, and his head cannot be praised nor raised too high with any fork of highest knavery.

“I’ll go fetch him straightaway.”

In this society, forks could have two, three, or four prongs. A two-pronged fork can resemble horns — either the horns of the Devil, or the horns of a cuckold.

Security exited.

Sir Petronel said:

“Good, good.

“Now, Frank, go thou home to Security’s house, instead of his lawyer’s, and bring his wife here.

“She, just like the lawyer’s wife, is imprisoned by his stern, usurious jealousy, which could never be overreached thus but with overreaching — that is, be outwitted thus but with trickery.”

Security returned and said:

“And, Master Francis, watch for the instant time to enter with his exit — be on watch to enter the house as soon as Bramble exits.

“It will be rare: two fine horned beasts, a camel and a lawyer!”

According to Security, the lawyer would wear the horns of a cuckold: a man with an unfaithful wife.

According to a fable by Aesop, a camel envied the horns of a bull, and asked Jupiter to give him horns. A capricious god, Jupiter not only did not give the camel horns, but also made the camel’s ears shorter.

The camel wanted horns but did not get them. According to Security, Bramble does not want horns, but he will get them.

Security exited.

“How the old villain takes joy in practicing villainy!” Quicksilver said.

Security returned and said to Quicksilver:

“And listen, gossip, when you have her here, have your boat ready; ship her to your ship with utmost haste, lest Master Bramble delay you.

“To overreach — surpass — that head that outreaches all heads, it is a trick rampant and high-spirited, it is a very quiblin — a true trick!

“I hope this harvest to pitch cart with lawyers — their heads will be so forked.”

Security was saying that instead of using pitchforks to pitch hay into wagons, people could use the forked heads of lawyers to do that.

“This sly touch will get apes — imitators — to invent a number of such tricks.”

He exited.

Quicksilver said:

“Was any rascal ever so honied with poison? He delights in a trick that will end up hurting him.

“He who delights in slavish, base avarice is apt to take joy in every sort of vice.

“Well, I’ll go fetch his wife, while he fetches the lawyer.”

He started to leave, but Sir Petronel said, “But wait, Frank, let’s think about how we may disguise her upon this sudden need to do that.”

Quicksilver said:

“God’s me, there’s the mischief!”

“God’s me” means “God s’ me,” aka “God save me” — a strange oath to make when planning to help someone run away with another man’s wife.

Or perhaps it means “God is me.” Some of these people are trying to act as supreme beings.

“But pay attention, here’s an excellent trick. Before God, it’s a rare and splendid one: I will carry to her a sailor’s gown and cap and cover her, and a player’s beard.”

A “player’s beard” is an actor’s false beard.

It is also an adulterer’s pubic hair: something that Quicksilver wished to cover — with his body.

Think of Chaucer’s “Miller’s Tale” when Absolon encounters a beard after asking for a goodnight kiss.

“And what will you put upon her head?” Sir Petronel asked.

Quicksilver replied, “I told you, a sailor’s cap. By God’s light, God forgive me, but what kind of figent — fidgety and short — memory do you have?”

“Nay, then, what kind of figent wit have thou?” Sir Petronel asked. “A sailor’s cap? How shall she take it off when thou present her to our company?”

“Tush, man, as for that, make her a saucy sailor,” Quicksilver said.

“Tush, tush, it is no fit sauce — no fit disguise — for such sweet mutton,” Sir Petronel said. “I don’t know what to advise.”

A proverb stated, “Sweet meat must have sour sauce.”

“Mutton” is a word for a prostitute.

Security returned, carrying his wife’s good gown, and said, “Knight, knight, here is a rare and splendid trick!”

Sir Petronel said to himself, “By God’s wounds, here he is yet again!”

“What stratagem have you now?” Quicksilver asked.

“The best stratagem that ever was,” Security said. “You talked of disguising?”

“Aye, by the Virgin Mary, gossip, that’s our present care and concern,” Sir Petronel said.

Security said:

“Cast care away, then. Cast aside your worries.

“Here’s the best trick for plain Security — for I am no better — I think that ever lived.

“Here’s my wife’s gown, which you may put upon the lawyer’s wife, and which I brought you, sir, for two great reasons:

“One reason is, that Master Bramble may take hold of some suspicion that it is my wife and gird me — make fun of me — so, perhaps, with his law wit.

“The other reason (which is cunning policy and trickery indeed) is that my wife may now be tied at home, having no more but her old gown to go abroad outside, and she will not show me a quirk while I firk others — she won't be able to trick me while I trick others.

“Isn't this trick splendid?”

“The best that ever was!” Sir Petronel and Quicksilver said.

“Am I not born to furnish and provide for gentlemen?” Security asked.

He was acting as a pandar to Sir Petronel.

“O my dear gossip!” Sir Petronel said.

Security said:

“Well, wait, Master Francis. Watch for when the lawyer's out, and put it in.”

Hmm. “Put it in.” Say no more.

But Security meant for Quicksilver to take the dress in to Bramble's wife.

Security continued:

“And now I will go and fetch Bramble.”

He started to exit but hesitated.

Quicksilver said:

“O my Dad!”

He then whispered to Sir Petronel:

“He goes as if he were the Devil to fetch the lawyer; and devil shall he be, if horns will make him one.”

In medieval stories, the Devil sometimes carried a lawyer to Hell.

Sir Petronel asked Security, “Why, how are things now, gossip? Why do you stay there musing?”

“A toy, a toy runs in my head, indeed,” Security said.

A toy is an odd notion or a trick.

Quicksilver said to himself, “A pox on that head! Are there more toys yet?”

“What is it, I ask thee, gossip?” Sir Petronel asked.

“Why, sir, what if you should slip away now with my wife’s best gown, with me having no security for it?” Security asked.

He had no guarantee — and no security deposit — that the gown would be returned.

“As for that, I hope, Dad, you will take our words,” Quicksilver said.

Security said sarcastically:

“Aye, by the Mass, your word! That’s a proper staff for wise Security to lean upon!”

He then said:

“But it does not matter. For once I’ll entrust my name to your cracked, unsound credits; let it take no shame.

“Fetch the wench, Frank.”

Frank Quicksilver said:

“I’ll wait upon you, sir —”

Security exited.

“— and fetch you over in such a way that you were never so fetched. Yes, I will deceive as you have never been deceived before.”

He then said to Sir Petronel:

“Go to the tavern, knight; your followers don’t dare be drunk, I think, before their captain.”

He exited.

Alone, Sir Petronel said to himself, “I wish I might lead them to no hotter and no more dangerous service, until our Virginian gold were in our purses!”

“Virginia” was the word then used for the North American coast north of Florida. It was not rich in gold, although people believed or hoped it was.

— 3.3 —

Captain Seagull, Spendall, and Scapethrift were in the Blue Anchor Tavern near Billingsgate, a port. A drawer was also present. Drawers are bartenders.

“Come, drawer, pierce and tap your neatest hogsheads — your best and purest barrels — of wine, and let’s have cheer not fit for your Billingsgate tavern but fit for our Virginian colonel,” Captain Seagull said. “He will be here quickly.”

Hmm. “Cheer not fit for your Billingsgate tavern but fit for our Virginian colonel”? That could be much better cheer — drink — than usual. Or much worse.

“Our Virginian colonel” is Sir Petronel.

“You shall have all things fit, sir,” the drawer said. “Would it please you to have any more wine?”

“More wine, slave?” Spendall said. “Whether we drink it or instead spill it, the answer is to draw more wine from the tap.”

“Fill all the drinking pots in your house with all sorts of liquor,” Scapethrift said, “and let them wait on us here like soldiers in their pewter coats of armor. And although we do not employ them now, yet we will maintain them until we do.”

Although they would not drink all the pewter pots of wine now, they would keep the pots full until they did drink them.

“Said like an honorable captain,” the drawer said. “You shall have all you can command, sir.”

“Come, boys, Virginia longs until we share the rest of her maidenhead,” Captain Seagull said.

Virginia was still unspoiled country: It metaphorically still had its maidenhood, aka virginity.

Captain Seagull now talked about Virginia. He made it sound like a utopia, but much of what he said was wishful thinking. He either believed what he said, or he was exaggerating to provide entertainment for his audience.

Spendall asked, “Why, is she inhabited already with any English?”

Captain Seagull answered, “A whole country of English is there, man, bred of those who were left there in 1579. They have married with the Indians and make them bring forth as beautiful faces as any we have in England, and therefore the Indians are so in love with them that all the treasure they have, they lay at their feet.”

In reality, the first settlers arrived in Virginia in 1585, and they returned to England in 1586. The settlers of 1587 disappeared and became known as the “Lost Colony.”

And at first, the Native Americans were friendly, but they turned hostile after bad behavior by the settlers.

“But is there such treasure there, Captain, as I have heard?” Scapethrift asked.

Captain Seagull answered:

“I tell thee, gold is more plentiful there than copper is with us, and for as much red copper as I can bring, I’ll have thrice the weight in gold.

“Why, man, all their pans to catch dripping grease from cooking meat and all their chamber pots are pure gold; and all the chains with which they chain up their streets are massive gold chains; all the prisoners they take are fettered in gold.”

Some streets could be chained off for traffic control.

“And as for rubies and diamonds, they go forth on holidays and gather them by the seashore to hang on their children’s coats and stick in their caps, as commonly as our children wear saffron-gilt — imitation gold — brooches and groats with holes in them.”

These groats are coins that have holes drilled in them so they can be made into necklaces.

“And is it also a pleasant country?” Scapethrift asked.

Captain Seagull answered:

“As ever the sun shined on; temperate and full of all sorts of excellent viands — all kinds of excellent food. Wild boar is as common there as our tamest bacon is here, venison is as common there as our mutton is here.

“And then you shall live freely there, without sergeants [arresting officers], or courtiers, or lawyers, or intelligencers [informers]; only a few industrious Scots, perhaps, who indeed are dispersed over the face of the whole earth. But as for them, there are no greater friends to Englishmen and England — when they are not in England but are in the world — than they are.

“And for my part, I wish a hundred thousand of them were there in Virginia, for we are all one countrymen now and ruled by one king named James, you know, and we should find ten times more comfort of them there than we do here.”

King James I of England was also King James VI of Scotland.

“Then for your means to advancement there, it is simple and not preposterously and perversely mixed: You may be an alderman there and never be a scavenger [a street cleaner]; you may be a nobleman and never be a slave. You may come to preferment enough and never be a pander; you may come to riches and fortune enough and have never the more villainy nor the less wit.”

“God’s me!” Spendall said. “And how far is it thither?”

Captain Seagull said:

“Some six weeks’ sail, no more, with any indifferent — moderately — good wind.

“And if I get to any part of the coast of Africa, I’ll sail thither with any wind. Or when I come to Cape Finisterre, the westernmost point of Spain, there’s a foreright — favorable — wind that will continually waft us until we come to Virginia.

“Look, our colonel’s come.”

Sir Petronel entered the scene. Following him was the drawer.

Sir Petronel said:

“Well met, good Captain Seagull, and my noble gentlemen!

“Now the sweet hour of our freedom from debt and arrest is at hand. Come, drawer. Fill us some carouses — some full cups of wine — and prepare us for the mirth that will be occasioned soon.”

The drawer poured wine and then exited.

“Here will soon be a pretty wench, gentlemen, who will bear us company all our voyage.”

Captain Seagull said, “Whatsoever she is, here’s to her health, noble Colonel, both with cap and knee.”

He removed his cap, knelt, and drank.

When the sailors and others drank toasts and healths, they removed their caps and knelt.

Sir Petronel said:

“Thanks, kind Captain Seagull. She’s one I love dearly, and her identity must not be known until we are free from all who know us. And so, gentlemen, here’s to her health!”

Spendall and Scapethrift said together, “Let it come, worthy Colonel! We do hunger and thirst for it.”

They drank to her health and to her freedom.

“Before heaven, you have hit the phrase of one whom her presence will touch from the foot to the forehead, if ye knew it,” Sir Petronel said.

“Touch” can mean 1) affect, and 2) injure.

Security’s catchphrase was “hunger and thirst for it.”

“Why, then, we will join his forehead with her health in our toast, sir,” Spendall said. “And Captain Scapethrift, here’s to them both.”

The woman’s husband’s forehead would have horns due to his being made a cuckold. The woman, of course, is Winifred, Security’s young wife.

All knelt and drank to the mystery woman.

Security and Bramble entered the scene.

Seeing all kneeling, Security said, “Look, look, Master Bramble! Before heaven, their voyage cannot but prosper; they are on their knees for success to it.”

He thought that they were praying for a successful voyage, not toasting his prospective cuckolding.

“And they pray to God Bacchus,” Bramble said.

Bacchus is the god of wine.

“God save my brave colonel, with all his tall — brave — captains and corporals!” Security said. “See, sir, my worshipful learned counsel, Master Bramble, has come to take his leave of you.”

As he and the sailors rose, Sir Petronel said:

“Worshipful Master Bramble, how far do you draw us into the sweet briar of your kindness?”

“Sweet briars” are wild roses, and they are considered to be a type of bramble: a prickly shrub.

“Come, Captain Seagull, another health to this rare Bramble, who has never a prick about him.”

“Never a prick” can mean 1) never a thorn, aka no prickliness, or 2) never an erection.

“I pledge his most smooth disposition, sir,” Captain Seagull said. “Come, Master Security, bend your supporters — your legs — and pledge this notorious — notable — health here.”

“Bend your legs likewise, Master Bramble, for it is you who shall pledge me,” Security said.

“Not so, Master Security,” Captain Seagull said. “He must not pledge his own health.”

Bramble would have to wait to pledge Security’s health; right now, everyone was pledging Bramble’s health.

Security said, “No, Master Captain?”

Quicksilver and Winifred (Security’s disguised young wife) entered the scene.

“Why, then, here’s one who is fitly come to do him that honor,” Security said.

Quicksilver could pledge Bramble’s health. He could do that fitly because Winifred was not Bramble’s wife.

Quicksilver said to Sir Petronel, “Here’s the gentlewoman — your cousin, sir — whom with much entreaty I have brought to take her leave of you in a tavern. Because she is ashamed to be in a tavern, you must pardon her if she does not take off her mask.”

Masks were worn for protection from the sun as well as for anonymity.

“Pardon me, sweet cousin,” Sir Petronel said. “My kind desire to see you before I went made me so importunate as to entreat your presence here.”

“How are you now, Master Francis?” Security asked. “Have you honored this presence with a fair gentlewoman?”

“Please, sir, take no notice of her, for she will not be known to you,” Francis “Frank” Quicksilver replied.

If Security were impotent, he could not know her Biblically.

“But my learned counsel, Master Bramble here, I hope may know her,” Security said.

“Know her” can mean 1) learn who she is, or 2) have sex with her (that is, Biblically know her).

“No more than you, sir, at this time,” Quicksilver said. “His learning must teach him to pardon her.”

Security said:

“Well, God pardon her for my part, and I do, I’ll be sworn.

“And so, Master Francis, here’s to all who are going eastward tonight towards Cuckold’s Haven; and so to the health of Master Bramble.”

Frank Quicksilver knelt and said:

“I pledge it, sir.

“Has the pledging cup gone round, captains? Has everyone partaken of the health?”

“It has, sweet Frank, and the round closes with thee,” Captain Seagull said.

“Well, sir, here’s to all eastward and toward — promising — cuckolds,” Quicksilver said, “and so to famous Cuckold’s Haven so fatally — ominously — remembered.”

He drank and then rose to his feet.

Cuckold's Haven was a place on the Surrey shore of the Thames River that was marked by a pair of horns displayed on a tall pole. Supposedly, King John I of England had made a miller a cuckold there.

Sir Petronel said to the disguised Winifred, "Nay, please, coz, don't weep."

"Coz" means 1) relative (not necessarily a cousin), or 2) friend.

He then said, "Gossip Security?"

"Aye, my brave gossip?" Security replied.

"May I have a word with you, please, sir?" Sir Petronel asked.

He then said quietly to Security:

"Our friend, Mistress Bramble here, is so dissolved in tears that she drowns the whole mirth of our meeting.

"Sweet gossip, take her aside and comfort her."

Not recognizing his own disguised wife, Security said quietly to her:

"Pity of all true love, Mistress Bramble.

"What! Do you weep at enjoying your love?"

"What's the reason, lady? Is it because your husband is so near, and your heart earns — that is, grieves — to have a little abused and deceived him? Alas, alas, the offence is too common to be respected and taken seriously."

The offense is adultery.

Security continued:

“So great a grace has seldom chanced to so unthankful a woman, to be rid of an old jealous dotard, to enjoy the arms of a loving young knight that, when your prickless Bramble is withered with grief at your loss, will make you flourish afresh in the bed of a lady.”

“Prickless” Bramble has a bawdy meaning, but it can also mean “lacks sharp thorns.”

“Withered” can mean “unerect.”

The drawer entered the scene and said:

“Sir Petronel, here’s one of your watermen — hired boatmen — come to tell you it will be flood tide for the next three hours, and that it will be dangerous going against the tide.”

It was just before high tide, and the current would be strong.

The drawer continued:

“For the sky is overcast, and there was a porpoise even now seen at London Bridge, which is always the messenger of tempests, he says.”

Sir Petronel said:

“A porpoise? What’s that to the purpose? Command him, if he love his life, to wait for us. Can’t we reach the shipping center of Blackwall, where my ship lies, against the tide and in spite of tempests?”

“Captains and gentlemen, we’ll begin a new ceremony at the beginning of our voyage, which I believe will be followed by all future adventurers.”

“What’s that, good Colonel?” Captain Seagull asked.

“This, Captain Seagull,” Sir Petronel said. “We’ll have our provided supper brought aboard Sir Francis Drake’s ship that has compassed the world, where with full cups and banquets — light food and desserts — we will do sacrifice for a prosperous voyage. My mind suggests to me that some good spirits of the waters should haunt her deserted ribs — her unmanned hull — and be auspicious to all who honor her memory, and will with like orgies — that is, ceremonies — begin their voyages.”

Sir Francis Drake’s ship was named Golden Hind. The circumnavigation took place from 1577-1580.

“Rarely conceited — excellently devised!” Captain Seagull said. “One health more to this motion, aka proposal, and let’s go aboard to perform it. He who will not this night be drunk, may he never be sober!”

All encircled the disguised Winifred, danced a drunken round, and drank carouses.

A carouse is a big drink of liquor. It is full-out drinking.

Bramble said:

“Sir Petronel and his honorable captains, in these youthful activities, we old servitors may be spared. We came only to take our leaves, and with one health to you all, I’ll be bold to do so.

“Here, neighbor Security, to the health of Sir Petronel and all his captains!”

He drank.

Security said:

“You must bend the knee then, Master Bramble.”

Bramble and Security knelt.

Security then said:

“So, now I am for you. I have one corner of my brain, I hope, fit to bear one carouse more.

“Here, lady, to you who are encompassed there and are ashamed of our company.”

They drank and rose.

Security said:

“Ha, ha, ha! By my truth, my learned counsel Master Bramble, my mind runs so of Cuckold’s Haven tonight that my head runs over with admiration and wonder.”

Hearing the word “cuckold,” Bramble whispered to Security about the disguised Winifred, “But isn’t that your wife, neighbor?”

Security whispered back, “No, by my truth, Master Bramble. Ha, ha, ha! A pox on all Cuckold’s Havens, I say.”

Bramble whispered back, “On my faith, I swear that her garments are exceedingly like your wife’s.”

Yes, the masked Winifred was wearing her best gown.

Security whispered back:

“Cucullus non facit monachum, my learned counsel.”

Translated, the Latin proverb stated, “A cowl does not make a monk.”

In other words: Appearances can be deceiving.

He continued:

“Not all are cuckolds who seem to be so, and not all who seem not to be cuckolds are so.

“Give me your hand, my learned counsel; you and I will sup somewhere else than at Sir Francis Drake’s ship tonight.”

He then said to Sir Petronel:

“Adieu, my noble gossip.”

“Good fortune, brave captains,” Bramble said. “May God send ye fair skies!”

“Farewell, my hearts, farewell!” everyone said.

“Gossip, laugh no more at Cuckold’s Haven, gossip,” Sir Petronel said.

Security said:

“I have finished. I have finished, sir.

“Will you lead, Master Bramble? Ha, ha, ha!”

Security and Bramble exited.

“Captain Seagull, call for a boat,” Sir Petronel said.

Everyone except the drawer called, “A boat! A boat! A boat!”

Everyone except the drawer exited.

Alone, the drawer said to himself, “You’re in a proper state, indeed, to take a boat, especially at this time of night, and against tide and tempest. They say yet, ‘Drunken men never take harm’; this night will try the truth of that proverb.”

He exited.

— 3.4 —

Alone in his home, Security called:

“What, Winnie! Wife, I say! Out of doors at this time?

“Where should I seek the gadfly?

“Billingsgate! Billingsgate! Billingsgate!”

“She’s gone with the knight: Sir Petronel! She’s gone with the knight! Woe be to thee, Billingsgate! A boat! A boat! A boat! A full hundred marks for a boat!”

He exited to go and try to find his wife.

— 4.1 —

Holding a pair of ox horns, Slitgut stood in front of a pole at Cuckold's Haven.

He said to himself:

“All hail, fair haven of married men only! For there are none but married men who are cuckolds.

“As for my part, I presume not to arrive here except in the behalf of my master, a poor butcher of Eastcheap, who sends me to set up, in honor of Saint Luke, these necessary ensigns — these horns — of his homage.”

The butchers of Eastcheap were in charge of providing new ox's horns as needed for the pole at Cuckold's Haven. The ox was the emblem of Saint Luke.

He continued:

“And I got up this morning, thus early, to get up to the top of this famous tree — this pole — that is all fruit and no leaves, to advance this crest — emblem — of my master's occupation.”

One fruit of adultery is bastards. This kind of fruit is stone-fruit: Stones are testicles.

He then said:

“Up, then!”

He began to climb the pole.

Slitgut then said:

“Heaven and Saint Luke bless me, so that I am not blown into the Thames as I climb, with this furious tempest! By God's light, I think the devil is abroad in the likeness of a storm, to rob me of my horns. Listen at how he roars!

“Lord, what a coil and uproar the Thames keeps! She bears some unjust, dishonest burden, I believe, and so she kicks and curvets and rears up thus to cast it — to vomit it out. Heaven bless all honest passengers, aka travelers, who are upon her back now! For the bit is out of her mouth, I see, and she will run away with them.”

He attached the horns to the top of the pole.

Slitgut continued:

“So, so, I think I have made it look the right way; it runs against London Bridge, as it were, even full butt — it directly faces the London Bridge.”

The horns directly faced London, where many cuckolds lived.

The image was of a rampaging bull running full-tilt at the London Bridge.

“And now, let me discover from this lofty prospect — this vantage place — what pranks the rude, turbulent Thames plays in her desperate lunacy.

“Oh, me, here's a boat that has been cast away nearby. Alas, alas, see one of her passengers laboring for his life to land at this haven here; pray heaven he may recover — reach — it! His nearest land is even just under me.

“Hold out yet a little, whosoever thou are, I pray, and take a good heart to thee. Be courageous! It is a man; take a man's heart to thee.

“Just a little further; get up on thy legs, man, now it is shallow enough. So, so, so! Alas, he’s down again! Hold thy breath, father. It is a man in a nightcap. So!

“Now he’s got up again; now he’s past the worst. Yet thanks be to heaven, he comes towards me to a considerable extent — and strongly.”

Wet, and without his hat, in a nightcap, collar, etc., Security entered the scene. He had fittingly landed at Cuckold’s Haven.

Security said to himself:

“Heaven, I ask thee, how have I offended thee? Where am I cast ashore now, so that I may go a righter way home by land?

“Let me see. Oh, I am scarcely able to look about me. Where is there any sea-mark that I am acquainted with? Where is a landmark I can recognize?”

“Look up, father,” Slitgut said. “Are you acquainted with this landmark?”

“What!” Security said. “Landed at Cuckold’s Haven? Hell and damnation! I will run back and drown myself.”

He fell down.

“Poor man, how weak he is!” Slitgut said. “The water has washed away his strength.”

Security said to himself:

“Landed at Cuckold’s Haven? If it had not been to die twenty times alive, I would never have escaped death.”

He believed that he had escaped death by drowning only so that he could die twenty times from the shame of being a cuckold.

Security continued:

“I will never arise anymore; I will grovel here and eat dirt until I am choked; I will make the gentle earth do that which the cruel water has denied me.”

“Alas, good father, be not so desperate,” Slitgut said. “Rise, man; if you will, I’ll come immediately and lead you home.”

“Home?” Security said. “Shall I make any know my home who has known me thus abroad? How low shall I crouch away, so that no eye may see me? I will creep on the earth while I live and never look heaven in the face more.”

Creeping on the ground, he exited.

Slitgut said:

“What young planet reigns now, I wonder, that old men are so foolish?”

This society believed in astrology: It believed that planets influenced human behavior. In this case, a malign planet was making old men, who should behave wisely, behave foolishly instead.

Slitgut continued:

“What desperate young swaggerer would have been abroad in such a weather as this, upon the water?”

He looked at the Thames again and said:

“Ay me, see another remnant of this unfortunate shipwreck, or some other!”

“Ay me!” is an expression of regret: Alas! Woe is me! Oh! Ah!

Slitgut continued:

“A woman, indeed, a woman! Although she is almost at Saint Katherine’s reformatory for fallen women, I discern her to be a woman, for all her body is above the water, and her clothes swim about her most handsomely. Oh, they bear her up most splendidly!”

Her clothing had trapped air, which kept her afloat like Ophelia’s clothing did for a while in Hamlet.

Slitgut continued:

“Hasn’t a woman reason to love the taking up of her clothes all the better while she lives, because of this?”

Her clothes could be taken up for the purpose of love-making.

Slitgut continued:

“Alas, how busy the rude, unkind Thames is about her!

“A curse on that wave. It will drown her, indeed, it will drown her. Cry God mercy — thank God! — she has escaped it! I thank Heaven she has escaped it.

“Oh, how she swims like a mermaid! May some vigilant body — some watchful person — look out and save her. That’s well done: Just where the priest fell in, there’s someone who is setting down a ladder and is going to take her up.”

This place is where the priest fell in, and the woman will turn out to be a fallen woman.

Slitgut continued:

“God’s blessing on thy heart, boy. Now take her up in thy arms and to bed with her.”

“To bed with her” can mean 1) put her in a bed so she can be warm, or 2) take her to a bed and have sex with her.

Slitgut continued:

“She’s up, she’s up! She’s a beautiful woman, I promise her to be; the billows dare not devour her.”

The drawer from the Blue Anchor Tavern, with Winifred, whom he had rescued, entered the scene. Fittingly, Winifred had been rescued near St. Katherine’s reformatory for fallen women.

“How are you now, lady?” the drawer asked.

“Much better, my good friend, than I wish,” Winifred said. “I fare as one desperate that she may have lost her fame — her reputation — now that my life is preserved.”

The drawer said, “Comfort yourself; that power that preserved you from death can likewise defend you from infamy, howsoever you deserve it. Weren’t you the one who took boat, late this night, with a knight and other gentlemen at Billingsgate?”

The knight, of course, was Sir Petronel.

“Miserable as I am, I was,” Winifred said.

The drawer said:

“I am glad it was my good luck to come down thus far after you, to a house of my friend’s here in Saint Katherine’s, since I am now happily made a means to your rescue from the ruthless and pitiless tempest. This tempest, when you took boat, was so extreme, and the gentleman who brought you forth so desperate and unsober, that I feared long before this that I should hear of your shipwreck, and therefore (with little other reason) made thus far this way.

“And this I must tell you, since perhaps you may make use of it: There was left behind you at our tavern, brought by a porter hired by the young gentleman who brought you, a gentlewoman's gown, hat, stockings, and shoes, which if they are yours, and you please to shift — change — your clothing, taking a hard bed here in this house of my friend, I will immediately go and fetch those articles of clothing for you."

The young gentleman, of course, was Quicksilver, who realized that Winifred would need her other dress and some personal items and so had ordered them to be sent to the tavern. Later, because Quicksilver was drunk and therefore forgetful, he had left the tavern with Winifred before the items could be delivered.

Winifred replied:

"Thanks, my good friend, for your more than good news.

"The gown, with all things bound with it, are mine; which if you please to fetch as you have promised, I will boldly receive the kind favor you have offered until your return — entreating you, by all the good you have done in preserving me hitherto, to let no one know what favor you do me, or where such a one as I am has been bestowed, lest you incur me much more damage in my reputation than you have done me pleasure in preserving my life."

The drawer said, "Come in, lady, and put yourself in order. Be assured that nothing but your own pleasure shall be used in your discovery: I won't reveal anything that you wish me not to reveal."

"Thank you, good friend," Winifred said. "The time may come I shall requite you."

The drawer and Winifred exited.

Slitgut looked at the Thames River and said:

"See, see, see! I hold — I bet — my life, there's some other taking up — another person landing — at Wapping, now!

Someone is being helped to get out of the water! Look — what a crowd of people cluster around the gallows there!”

Pirates, sea-rovers, and criminals were hung at Wapping, located to the east of St. Katherine’s reformatory for fallen women.

Slitgut continued:

“In good truth, it is so. Oh, me! A fine young gentleman! What, and taken up at the gallows? Heaven grant he will not be one day taken down there after hanging. On my life, it is ominous.

“Well, he is delivered for the time. I see the people have all left him; yet I will keep my lookout for a while, to see if any more have been shipwrecked.”

Quicksilver, bareheaded and without cloak or sword, entered the scene. Fittingly, he had come ashore near a gallows.

He said to himself:

“Accursed am I that ever I was saved or born!

“How fatal — how ominous — is my sad arrival here! As if the stars and Providence spoke to me and said, ‘The drift of all unlawful courses, whatever end they dare propose themselves in frame of — in planning — their licentious policies, they are in the firm order of just destiny the ready highways to our ruins.’”

In other words: Providence says that all sinful courses of action will be punished although those who follow such sinful courses of action had something much different and more pleasant intended. Quicksilver’s behavior would lead him to the gallows.

“I don’t know what to do; my wicked hopes are, with this tempest, torn up by the roots.

“Oh, which way shall I bend my desperate steps in which unsufferable shame and misery will not attend them? I will walk this bank and see if I can meet the other relics — the other survivors — of our poor shipwrecked crew or hear of them.

“The knight, alas, was so far gone with wine, and the other three, that I refused their boat and took the hapless woman in another boat. The hapless woman cannot but be sunk, whatever fortune has wrought upon the others’ desperate lives.”

Sir Petronel, Captain Seagull, Spendall, and Scapethrift had gone in one boat, and Quicksilver and Winifred had gone in another.

Quicksilver exited.

Sir Petronel and Captain Seagull entered the scene. They were bareheaded and without cloaks or swords.

“By God’s wounds, Captain, I tell thee we are cast up on the coast of France,” Sir Petronel said. “By God’s foot, I am not drunk still, I hope! Do thou remember where we were last night?”

“No, by my truth, knight, I don’t remember,” Captain Seagull said. “But I think that we have been a horrible while upon the water, and in the water.”

“Ay me, we are undone forever!” Sir Petronel said. “Have thee any money about thee?”

“Not a penny, by heaven,” Captain Seagull said.

“Not a penny between us, and cast ashore in France?” Sir Petronel said.

“In faith, I cannot tell that,” Captain Seagull said. “Neither my brains nor my eyes are my own yet.”

Two gentlemen entered the scene.

Sir Petronel said:

“By God’s foot, won’t thou believe me? I know that we are in France by the elevation of the pole, and by the altitude and latitude of the climate, aka land.”

The elevation of the pole referred to how high the North Star — the Pole Star — was above the horizon, but if one believes that Frenchmen are especially lascivious, it could refer to the elevation of a different kind of “pole.”

Sir Petronel said:

“See, here comes a couple of French gentlemen; I knew we were in France. Do thou think our Englishmen are so Frenchified that a man doesn’t know whether he is in France or in England when he sees them? What shall we do? We must even go to them and entreat some relief of them. Life is sweet, and we have no other means to relieve our lives now but their charities.”

Many men followed French fashions and so were Frenchified: They looked, in some ways, like Frenchmen.

“Please, beg them for help, then,” Captain Seagull said. “You can speak French.”

Sir Petronel, who could speak rough — ungrammatical — French, said:

“Monsieur, plaît-il d’avoir pitié de nôtre grand infortunes? Je suis un poure [pauvre? = poor; poivre? or povre? = pepper] chevalier d’Angleterre qui a souffri l’infortune de naufrage.”

[“Sir, would you like to have pity on our great misfortunes? I am a (poor or pepper) knight of England who suffered the misfortune of shipwreck.”]

The first gentleman, who could speak French, asked:

“Un poure chevalier d’Angleterre?”

Pauvre means “poor.” Poivre and povre mean “pepper.”

[“A (poor or pepper) knight from England?”]

Possibly, the first gentleman was mocking Sir Petronel’s French. But, to be sure, Sir Petronel’s life was peppered — seasoned — with poverty.

Sir Petronel said:

“Oui, monsieur, il est trop vrai; mais vous savez bien, nous sommes tous sujet à fortune.”

[“Yes, sir, it is too true; but you know well, we are all subject to fortune.”]

“A poor knight of England?” the second gentleman said. “A poor knight of Windsor, aren’t you?”

Impoverished military pensioners lived at Windsor.

“Why do you speak this broken French, when you’re a whole Englishman?”

“On what coast do you think you are?”

Sir Petronel replied, “On the coast of France, sir.”

“On the coast of Dogs, sir,” the first gentleman said. “You’re on the Isle of Dogs, I tell you.”

The Isle of Dogs was a peninsula on the north side of the Thames, and many debtors lived there. It was fitting that Sir Petronel had landed there.

The first gentleman continued:

“I see you’ve been washed in the Thames here, and I believe you were drowned in a tavern before, or else you would never have taken boat in such a dawning as this was.

“Farewell, farewell, we will not know you and ask your names for shaming of you.”

Using a Scottish accent, the first gentleman said to the second gentleman, “I ken the man weel; he’s one of those thirty-pound knights.”

The second gentleman replied, “No, no, this is he who stole his knighthood on the grand day for four pounds, giving to a page all the money in his purse, I wot [know] well.”

The grand day was the day King James VI of Scotland became also King James I of England.

The two gentlemen exited.

“By God’s death, Colonel, I knew you were overshot,” Captain Seagull said.

Sir Petronel said:

“Sure I think now, indeed, Captain Seagull, we were something overshot.”

Sir Petronel had vastly over-estimated how far they had traveled, and they had drunk too much alcohol and were vastly intoxicated.

Quicksilver entered the scene.

Sir Petronel said:

“What! My sweet Frank Quicksilver! Do thou survive to make me rejoice? But what, nobody at thy heels, Frank? Ay me, what has become of poor Mistress Security?”

“Indeed, she has gone quite from her name, as she has from her reputation, I think,” Quicksilver said. “I left her to the mercy of the water.”

As far as Quicksilver knew, Mrs. Security was far from being secure, and far from having a good reputation.

“Let her go. Let her go,” Captain Seagull said. “Let us go to our ship at Blackwall and shift us — let’s change out of these wet clothes.”

Sir Petronel said:

“Nay, by my troth, let our clothes rot upon us, and let us rot in them.

“Twenty to one our ship has been attached — has been seized — by this time. If we set her not under sail this last tide, I never looked for any other.

“Woe, woe is me, what shall become of us? The last money we could raise, the greedy Thames River has devoured, and if our ship has been attached, there is no hope that can relieve us.”

“By God’s foot, knight, what an unknighly faintheartedness transports thee and makes thee forget thyself!” Frank Quicksilver said. “Even if our ship would sink, and even if all the world that’s beyond us — Virginia — would be taken away from us, I hope I have some tricks in this brain of mine that shall not let us perish.”

“Well said, Frank, truly,” Captain Seagull said. “Oh, my nimble-spirited Quicksilver, before God I wish that thou had been our colonel!”

The “colonel” — the leader — had been Sir Petronel.

“I like his spirit very much, but I see no means he has to support that spirit,” Sir Petronel said.

“Bah, knight, I have more means than thou are aware of,” Quicksilver said. “I have not lived among goldsmiths and goldmakers all this while but I have learned something worthy of my time with them. And, not to let thee stink where thou stand, knight, I’ll let thee know some of my skill presently.”

One way for Sir Petronel to stink where he stands is to beshit himself. One reason for doing that is out of fear, including out of fear of being in a bad and impoverished situation.

“Do, good Frank,” Captain Seagull said, “I ask thee to.”

“I will blanch and whiten copper so cunningly to make it look so look like silver that it shall pass almost all tests except the test,” Quicksilver said. “It shall endure malleation, it shall have the ponderosity of Luna, and it shall have the tenacity of Luna and be by no means friable.”

In other words, it shall pass almost every test. The test would be to melt it so it could be purified; only then would the deception be revealed. Purification means separating silver from base metals such as copper.

The whitened copper (fake silver), however, can pass other tests. It can be beaten and not break, it will weigh as much as Luna (real silver), it will have the strength of Luna (real silver), and it will not crumble and be reduced to powder.

“By God’s light, where did thou learn these terms, I wonder?” Sir Petronel said.

“Tush, knight, the terms of this art every ignorant quacksalver is perfect in,” Quicksilver said.

Quacksalvers are pretenders to knowledge. For example, some people pretend to have medical knowledge, but don't. These people are known as quacks.

“But I'll tell you how you yourself shall blanch copper thus cunningly.

“Take arsenic, otherwise called realga [arsenic disulphide], which indeed is plain ratsbane [rat poison]; sublime it three or four times [heat to vaporize and then cool to solidify three or four times]; then take the sublimate of this realga and put it into a glass vessel, into chymia [kemia, aka chemical analysis], and let it have a convenient decoction natural [time to mature over heat], four-and-twenty hours, and the compound will become perfectly fixed [solid]. Then take this fixed powder and project it upon [apply it to] well-purged [well-washed] copper, et habebis magisterium.”

“Et habebis magisterium” is Latin for “And you will have the philosopher's stone.”

The philosopher's stone was supposed to be able to turn base metals into precious metals, such as turning copper into silver. Of course, Quicksilver's chemical process would make copper only look like silver — if it worked.

Alchemists sought the knowledge of how to make the philosopher's stone. Such a stone does not exist, and some con men took advantage of other people's credulity. See Ben Jonson's The Alchemist.

“Excellent, Frank, let us hug thee!” Sir Petronel and Captain Seagull said.

Quicksilver said, “Nay, this I will do besides: I'll take you off twelvecence from every angel [a gold coin], with a kind of aqua fortis [nitric acid], and never deface any part of the image.”

This was called “washing” currency: taking away some of the gold without removing the image on the gold coin. Quicksilver was saying that he could extract gold worth one shilling from each ten-shilling coin. Of course, doing this reduces the coin’s weight, and doing that was illegal.

“But then it will lack weight,” Sir Petronel said.

Quicksilver said:

“You shall restore that thus: take your sal achyme [dry salts, aka salt without chyme, aka juice] prepared, and your distilled urine, and let your angels lie in it but four-and-twenty hours, and they shall have their perfect weight again.

“Come on, now, I hope this is enough to put some spirit into your livers and give you courage; I’ll infuse more courage into you another time.

“We have saluted and paid our respects to the proud air long enough with our bare sconces — our bare heads. Now I will take you to a wench’s house of mine at London, there make shift to shift us, and afterward we will take such fortunes as the stars shall assign us.”

The wench was Sindefy; they would change into dry clothes at her house.

“Notable Frank!” Sir Petronel and Captain Seagull said. “We will forever adore thee.”

Everyone except Slitgut exited.

The drawer and Winifred, who was wearing clean, dry clothing, entered the scene.

Winifred said:

“Now, sweet friend, you have brought me near enough your tavern, which I desired so that I might with some color — plausible excuse — be seen near, inquiring for my husband; who, I must tell you, stole thither last night with my wet gown we have left at your friend’s — which, to continue your former honest kindness, let me ask you to please keep secret from the knowledge of anyone.

“And so, with all vow of your requital, let me now entreat you to leave me to my woman’s wit and fortune.”

Winifred would use her woman’s wit to convince her husband that she had been faithful to him and had not been the woman he had seen in the tavern.

“All shall be done that you desire,” the drawer said, “and so, I hope that all the fortune you can wish for will attend you!”

The drawer exited.

Security entered the scene, and he said:

“I will once more go to this unhappy tavern before I change one more rag of mine, so that I may there know what is left behind, and what news there is of their passengers.

“I have bought myself a hat and collar with the little money I had about me and made the street passersby a little break from staring at my nightcap.”

“Oh, my dear husband!” Winifred said. “Where have you been this last night? All night abroad at taverns? Rob me of my garments? And behave as one run away from me? Alas! Is this seemly and fitting for a man of your credit? Of your age and affection to your wife?”

“What should I say?” Security said. “How miraculously does this turn out? Wasn’t I at home and called thee last night?”

“Yes, sir, the harmless, innocent sleep you broke,” Winifred said, “and my answer to you would have witnessed it, if you had had the patience to have stayed and answered me. But your so sudden retreat made me imagine you were gone to Master Bramble’s, and so I rested patient and hopeful of your coming again until this your surprising and unbelievable absence brought me abroad, with no less than wonder, to seek you where the false knight had carried you.”

Of course, the false knight was Sir Petronel.

“Villain and monster that I was, how have I abused thee!” Security said. “I was suddenly gone indeed, for my sudden jealousy transferred me: It carried me away and changed me. I will say no more but this, dear wife: I suspected thee of infidelity.”

“Did you suspect me?” Winifred asked. “Did you think that I was unfaithful?”

“Don’t talk about it, I beg thee,” Security said. “I am ashamed to imagine it. I will go home, I will go home, and every morning on my knees I will ask thee heartily for forgiveness.”

Security and Winifred exited.

Alone, Slitgut said to himself:

“Now I will descend my honorable prospect, the farthest seeing sea-mark of the world.”

On the ground, he continued:

“No marvel then if I could see two miles about me.”

From the top of the pole, he had seen a great distance.

He continued:

“I hope the red — fiery and full-of-lightning — tempest’s anger is now blown over, which surely I think that heaven sent as a punishment for profaning holy Saint Luke’s memory with so ridiculous a custom.

“Thou dishonest satire, farewell to honest married men; farewell to all sorts and degrees of thee!”

The dishonest satire was a parody of infidelity: the set of ox horns at the top of the pole.

Horns are the sign of cuckolds.

Slitgut said his farewells to various kinds of horns:

“Farewell, thou horn of hunger [dinner horn] that calls the Inns of Court to their manger [dinner table].

“Farewell, thou horn of abundance [cornucopia] that adorns — and adds horns to — the headsmen [head men, and horn-headed men, aka cuckolds] of the commonwealth.

“Farewell, thou horn of direction that is the city lantern.”

City lanterns are street lights: lanterns sided with thin, transparent slices of horn.

Slitgut continued with his farewells to various kinds of horns:

“Farewell, thou horn of pleasure, the ensign of the huntsman.”

In addition to a hunting horn, a horn of pleasure can be a penis. Huntsmen can hunt game, or they can hunt women.

Slitgut continued:

“Farewell, thou horn of destiny, the ensign of the married man.”

In this cynical satire, married men are destined to be cuckolded and so receive the horn of destiny.

Slitgut concluded:

“Farewell, thou horn tree that bears nothing but stone fruit!”

“Stone fruit,” of course, is the fruit of stones, aka testicles: bastards.

— 4.2 —

Alone, Touchstone complained to himself:

“Ha, sirrah! Does my knight adventurer think we can — we know — no point of our compass? Don’t we know north-north-east, north-east-and-by-east, east-and-by-north, nor plain eastward? Ha! Have we never heard of Virginia, nor the Cavallaria, nor the Colonia?”

Cavallaria means a land tenant who is required, in times of war, to provide a soldier on horseback.

The Latin colonus means “husbandman,” aka “farming tenant.”

Sir Petronel of course, was a knight, and someone who hoped to make his fortune in Virginia. One way to do that was to establish a plantation.

Touchstone continued:

“Can we discover no discoveries?”

“Well, my errant Sir Flash, and my runagate — my renegade — Quicksilver, you may drink drunk, crack open containers of alcohol and drink the contents, hurl away a brown dozen — a full dozen, of Monmouth sailors’ caps or so in sea-ceremony to your bon voyage —”

The Earl of Essex once threw his cap in the sea out of an excess of happiness when he learned that the city of Cadiz would be attacked: Raleigh had persuaded Lord Howard of Effingham to undertake the attack.

“— but as for reaching any coast save the coast of Kent or Essex with this tide or with this fleet, I’ll be your warrant for a Gravesend toast.”

A Gravesend toast is cold toast, and so it is something not worth much.

Touchstone continued:

“There’s that gone before which will stay your admiral and vice-admiral and rear-admiral, were they all — as they are — but one pinnace and under sail, as well as a remora, don’t doubt it; and from this sconce, without either powder or shot.

“Work upon that now!”

A sconce is 1) a fort, or 2) a head.

The admiral and vice-admiral and rear-admiral are all ships that carry important officers. Sir Petronel’s ship is a pinnace: a small ship. The admiral is the flagship.

A remora was a type of fish that was thought to be able to attach itself to a ship and retard its progress.

Touchstone had given the order for Sir Petronel’s ship to be seized.

Touchstone continued:

“Nay, if you’ll show tricks, we’ll vie with you a little.”

“To show tricks” is 1) to practice deception, or 2) to show your playing cards.

“To vie” is 1) to contend, or 2) to make a bet.

“My daughter, his lady, was sent eastward, by land, to a castle of his in the air — in what region I don’t know — and, as I hear, was glad to take up her lodging in her coach, she and her two waiting-women, her maid and her mother, like three snails in a shell, and the coachman on top on them, I think.”

Hmm. “... the coachman on top on them ...” Say no more.

“Since then, they have all found the way back again by Weeping Cross: They have repented their actions.

“But I’ll not see them. And for two of them, madam and her malkin, they are likely to bite of the bridle for William, as the poor horses have done all this while that hurried them, or else go graze on the common.”

If they bite the bridle, they have no food, and so “to bite of the bridle for William” means “to fare badly.”

“For William” may mean “as far as I’m concerned.”

The malkin — a woman servant or a sexually immoral woman — is Sindyfy.

“So should my Dame Touchstone, too, but she has been my cross and source of torment for these past thirty years, and I’ll now keep her to frighten away spirits, truly.

“I wonder why I hear no news of my son Golding. He was sent for to go to the Guildhall early this morning, and I marvel at the matter. If I had not laid up comfort and hope in him, I should grow desperate of all.

“Look, he is coming, just when I was thinking about him.”

Golding walked over to him.

Touchstone said:

“How are you now, son? What is the news at the Court of Aldermen?”

“Indeed, sir, an incident somewhat strange, else it has little in it worth the reporting,” Golding said.

“What?” Touchstone said. “It is not borrowing of money, then?”

“No, sir,” Golding said. “It has pleased the worshipful commoners — members of the Common Council — of the city to make me one in their number at presentation of the inquest —”

He had been elected to the Court of Common Council: a great honor. People would refer to him as “Thy Worship” or “Your Worship” or “Master Golding.”

“Presentation of the inquest” means “report to a committee of inquiry.”

“Ha!” Touchstone said.

Golding continued, “— and the alderman of the ward wherein I dwell to appoint me his deputy —”

“What!” Touchstone said.

To be an alderman’s deputy was a great honor.

Golding continued, “— in which place, I have had an oath ministered to me since I went.”

Happy at all this good news concerning Golding, Touchstone said:

“Now my dear and happy son! Let me kiss Thy new Worship, and a little boast my own happiness in thee.

“What a fortune was it, or rather my judgment, indeed, for me first to see that in his disposition, which a whole city so conspires and concurs to second and confirm! To be taken into the livery of his company the first day of his freedom!”

Golding had been made a full, respected member of the Guild — the Goldsmiths’ Company — the first day after he had been freed from his apprenticeship. And he had been promoted to some high positions.

Touchstone continued rejoicing:

“Now, not a week married, chosen Commoner and Alderman’s Deputy in a day! Note but the reward of a thrifty course. The wonder of his time!”

A Commoner is a member of the Court of Common Council.

“Well, I will honor Master Alderman for this act as becomes me, and I shall think the better of the Court of Common Council’s wisdom and worship — worthiness — while I live, for thus meeting, or coming just after me, in the opinion of his desert.

“Go forward, my sufficient and able son, and as this is the first, so esteem it the least step to that high and prime honor that expects and awaits thee.”

Possibly, the highest honor that Golding could aspire to would be to become an alderman or even the Mayor of London.

“Sir, as I was not ambitious of this, so I covet no higher place,” Golding replied. “It has dignity enough if it will just save me from contempt. And I had rather my bearing in this or any other office should add worth to it, than the place should give the least opinion — the least estimation — to me.”

Touchstone said:

“Excellently spoken! This modest answer of thine blushes as if it said, ‘I will wear scarlet shortly.’”

Aldermen wore scarlet robes.

“Worshipful son! I cannot contain myself; I must tell thee I hope to see thee one of the monuments of our city.”

The monuments of the city are the great citizens of the city: those who have accomplished much in public work and in charity.

Touchstone continued:

“And I hope to see thee reckoned among her worthies to be remembered the same day with the Lady Ramsey and grave Gresham, when the famous fable of Whittington and his puss shall be forgotten, and thou and thy acts become the posies — the legends — on memorial plaques for hospitals; when thy name shall be written upon conduits, and thy deeds played in thy lifetime by the best companies of actors and be called their get-penny: their reliable source of income.”

Lady Ramsey, the wife of a Mayor of London, was a benefactress of Christ’s Hospital.

Sir Thomas Gresham founded the Royal Exchange, the London mercantile center.

According to legend, Richard “Dick” Whittington became rich when he sold his cat — the best mouser in London — at a high price to the King of Barbary so it could free his mice- and rat-infested palace from rodents. Dick eventually became Mayor of London. He left his fortune to London for the doing of good works, including building water conduits. Some water conduits in London were named for him.

Touchstone continued:

“This I divine. This I prophesy.”

Golding said:

“Sir, don’t engage your expectation farther than my abilities will answer. I, who know my own strengths, fear them; and there is so seldom a loss in promising the least, that commonly it brings with it a welcome deceit.

Usually, people are happy to learn that their low opinion of someone has been wrong.

Golding then said:

“I have other news for you, sir.”

“None more welcome than I have already heard, I am sure,”
Touchstone said.

Golding said:

“They have their degree of welcome, I dare affirm.

“The Colonel and all his company, this morning putting forth drunk from Billingsgate, had like to have been cast away on this side Greenwich; and (as I have intelligence, by a false brother — an informer) have come straggling into town like so many masterless men — vagrants without a source of income — in their doublets and hose, without hat, or cloak, or any other —”

They had lost their swords, too.

It was a disgrace for a knight or a gallant to be without a sword.

“A miracle!” Touchstone said. “The justice of heaven! Where are they? Let’s go quickly and lay for them. Let’s set an ambush for them!”

Golding replied, “I have done that already, sir, both by Constables and other officers, who shall arrest them at their old Blue Anchor Tavern, and with less tumult or suspicion than if yourself were seen in it, under color — the pretext — of a great press that is now taking place, and they shall here be brought before me.”

The press is impressment: involuntary draft and enrollment as a soldier or a sailor. Vagrants were often pressed into military service.

Touchstone said:

“Prudent and politic — shrewd — son! Disgrace them all that ever thou can; their ship I have already seized for debt.

“How to my wish it falls out, that thou have the place of a justicer — a judge — upon them! I am partly glad of the injury done to me, in that thou may punish it. Be severe in thy place, like a new officer of the first quarter — the first three months — of service. Do not be diverted from sharply executing justice.

“Have you heard how our lady has come back with her train of attendants from the invisible castle?”

“No,” Golding said. “Where is she?”

Touchstone said:

“She is inside, but I have not seen her yet, nor her mother, who now begins to wish her daughter undubbed a knight’s lady and unmarried, they say, and that she had walked a foot-pace — slowly and surely, as opposed to a court amble — with her sister.

“Here they come; stand back.”

Mistress Touchstone, Gertrude, Mildred, and Sindefy entered the scene.

Touchstone said to her daughter Gertrude, who had married Sir Petronel:

“God save Your Ladyship! God save Your good Ladyship! Your Ladyship is welcome in your return from your enchanted castle; so are your beauteous retinue.

“I hear that your knight errant has travelled on strange adventures. Surely in my mind, Your Ladyship has ‘fished fair and caught a frog,’ as the saying is.”

In other words: Your Ladyship has made a bad marriage.

“Speak to your father, madam, and kneel down,” Mrs. Touchstone said.

“Kneel?” Gertrude said. “I hope I am not brought so low yet. Although my knight has run away and has sold my land, I am a lady still.”

“Your Ladyship says true, madam,” her father, Touchstone, said, “and it is fitter and a greater decorum that I should curtsy to you, who are a knight’s wife and a lady, than you be brought on your knees to me, who am a poor cullion — a base fellow — and your father.”

Children customarily would kneel before their parents and ask for their parents’ blessing.

“Ah!” Gertrude said. “My father knows his duty.”

She was OK with her father kneeling to her.

“Oh, child!” Mrs. Touchstone said, shocked.

Touchstone said to Gertrude:

“And therefore I do desire Your Ladyship, my good Lady Flash, in all humility, to depart my obscure cottage and return in quest of your bright and most transparent castle, however presently concealed to mortal eyes.”

He then took her by the hand, and still speaking to Gertrude, said:

“And as for one poor woman of your train here, I will take her in order that she shall no longer be a charge to you nor help you to spend and cost your ladyship expenses.

“She shall stay at home with me, and not go abroad, nor put you to the pawning of an odd coach-horse, or three wheels, but take part and share with the Touchstone. If we lack, we will not complain — lament — about it to Your Ladyship.

“And so, good madam, with your demoiselle — your maid — here, please you to let us see your straight — erect, and proud — backs in equipage, aka marching order, and in your fancy dress.”

He wanted to see Gertrude and Sindefy depart.

Touchstone finished:

“For truly, here is no roost for such chickens as you are or birds of your feather, if it shall please Your Ladyship.”

Gertrude said to her father:

“By the Virgin Mary, fist — fart — on your kindness! I thought as much.”

She then said to Sindefy:

“Come away, Sin, we shall as soon get a fart from a dead man as a farthing of courtesy here.”

“Oh, good sister!” Mildred said.

Gertrude said to Mildred:

“Sister, sir-reverence?”

“Sir-reverence” means “saving your reverence.” It is an apology for vulgar language such as “fart.” “Sir-reverence” also meant “excrement.”

Gertrude then said to Sindefy:

“Come away, I say. Hunger drops out at his nose.”

The proverb referred to poverty. Poor people often cannot afford fuel for a fire, and so their noses drip because they catch colds.

Of course, Touchstone had money, and so Gertrude was calling him stingy.

“Oh, madam, fair words never hurt the tongue,” Golding said.

“What do you mean by that?” Gertrude said. “You come out with your gold ends — your bits of wisdom — now!”

Mrs. Touchstone said:

“Stay, lady daughter.

Touchstone interrupted:

“Wife, no man loves his fetters, even when they are made of gold. I do not wish to have my head fastened under my child’s girdle.”

He did not want to be forced to obey her commands.

To have one’s head under another person’s girdle was proverbial for being inferior to that person.

Touchstone continued:

“As she has brewed, so let her drink, in God’s name, and suffer the consequences of her actions. She went witless to her wedding; now she may go wisely a-begging.

“It’s but honeymoon yet with Her Ladyship: she has coach-horses, apparel, jewels, yet left; she needs care for no friends nor take knowledge of father, mother, brother, sister, or anybody.

“When those are pawned, or spent, perhaps we shall return into the list of her acquaintance.”

Gertrude said:

“I scorn your acquaintance, indeed.

“Come, Sin.”

“Oh, madam, why do you provoke your father like this?” Mrs. Touchstone asked.

Gertrude and Sindefy exited.

Touchstone said:

“Nay, nay, even let pride go before. Shame will follow after, I promise you.”

He then said to his wife:

“Come, why do thou weep now? Thou are not the first good cow who has had an ill calf, I trust.”

A proverb stated, “Many a good cow has an ill calf.”

A Constable entered the scene and whispered to Golding.

Touchstone asked:

“What’s the news with that fellow?”

“Sir, the knight and your man Quicksilver are outside,” Golding said. “Will you have them brought in?”

Touchstone said:

“Oh, by all means. Certainly.”

The Constable exited.

Touchstone then said:

“And son, here’s a chair; appear terrible to them on the first interview. Let them behold the melancholy — the seriousness — of a magistrate and taste the fury of a citizen in office.”

“Why, sir, I can do nothing to them unless you charge them with something,” Golding said.

“I will charge them and recharge them, rather than authority should lack foil to set it off,” Touchstone said.

“Foil” is a thin piece of metal set under a jewel to show off its radiance.

Touchstone would highlight the crimes of Sir Petronel and Quicksilver so that Golding could show off his power to punish them.

He motioned for Golding to sit.

“No, good sir, I will not,” Golding said.

He did not want to sit while Touchstone stood.

“Son, it is your place, by all means,” Touchstone said.

“Believe it, I will not sit, sir,” Golding said.

Sir Petronel and Quicksilver entered the scene. They were guarded by a Constable and some officers.

“How misfortune pursues us still in our misery!” Sir Petronel said.

“I wish that it had been my fortune to have been trussed up and hanged at Wapping rather than ever to have come here!” Quicksilver said.

“Or my fortune, to have famished in the Island of Dogs!” Sir Petronel said. “That would be better than being here now.”

“Must Golding sit upon and judge us?” Quicksilver asked.

Recently, they had been apprentices together.

“You might carry an M under your girdle to Master Deputy’s Worship,” the Constable said.

The “M” was for “Master.”

In other words: You should call Golding “Master Golding” and show him respect because he is the Alderman’s Deputy.

“Who are those men, Master Constable?” Golding asked.

“If it shall please Your Worship, they are a couple of masterless men whom I have impressed for the Low Countries, sir,” Golding said.

English soldiers had been fighting Spanish soldiers in Holland. English garrisons were there.

“Why don’t you carry them to Bridewell, according to your order, so that they may be shipped away?” Golding asked.

Bridewell was a workhouse for the poor, and a place where conscripted soldiers stayed.

“If it shall please Your Worship, one of them says he is a knight, and we thought it good to show him to Your Worship for our discharge,” the Constable said.

The Constable did not want to impress a knight into involuntary military service. Impressment was for people of lower status. Possibly, he also wanted a fee for his service.

“Which man is he?” Golding asked.

“This man, sir,” the Constable said, indicating Sir Petronel.

“And who’s the other man?” Golding asked.

“A knight’s fellow, sir, if it shall please you,” the Constable said.

“What!” Golding said. “A knight and his fellow thus accoutered and attired? Where are their hats and feathers, their rapiers and their cloaks?”

“Oh, they mock us,” Quicksilver said to Sir Petronel.

“Nay, truly, sir, they had shed both their feathers and hats, too, before we saw them,” the Constable said. “Here’s all their possessions, if it shall please you, that we found. They say that knights are now to be known without feathers, like cockerels — game cocks — are known by their spurs, sir.”

Knights customarily wore gilt spurs.

“What are their names, do they say?” Golding asked.

Touchstone said to himself, “Very well, this is. Golding should not take knowledge of them in his position as a magistrate, indeed. It is good that he pretends not to know who they are.”

“This is Sir Petronel Flash,” the Constable said.

“What!” Touchstone said, pretending to be shocked at hearing the name.

“And this is Francis Quicksilver,” the Constable said.

Touchstone said to Sir Petronel:

“Is it possible? I thought Your Worship had been gone for Virginia, sir. You are welcome home, sir. Your Worship has made a quick return, it seems, and no doubt a good voyage. Nay, please be covered, sir. Put on your hat.”

He was being sarcastic. Sir Petronel had lost his hat in the Thames River.

Touchstone continued:

“How did your store of sea-biscuits hold out, sir?”

He then looked at Quicksilver and said:

“I thought I had seen this gentleman before.

“Good Master Quicksilver! How a degree to the southward has changed you!”

Virginia is south (and west) of England. (“Virginia” was the word then used for the North American coast north of Florida.) Ships going there from London sailed first southeast to Spain. Also, Quicksilver’s fortunes had fallen.

Golding asked Touchstone:

“Do you know them, father?”

Sir Petronel and Quicksilver attempted to speak, but Golding said to them:

“Forbear for a little while your attempts to speak; you shall be heard soon.”

Touchstone said:

“Yes, Master Deputy. I had a small venture — a small investment — with them in the voyage, a thing called a son-in-law, or so.”

Touchstone then said to the Constable and officers:

“Officers, you may let them stand alone; they will not run away, I’ll give my word for them. They are a couple of very ‘honest’ — cough — gentlemen.

“One of them was my apprentice, Master Quicksilver, here, and when he had two years left to serve as my apprentice, he kept his whore and his hunting nag.

“He would play his hundred pounds at gresco or primero — card games that gamblers play — as familiarly (and all on my purse) as any bright piece of crimson clothing on them all.

“He had his trunks of changeable apparel standing at livery and being kept for him for a fee, with his mare [whore], his chest of perfumed linen, and his bathing-tubs, which when I told him of, why he — he was a gentleman, and I was a poor Cheapside groom, aka servant.”

Nobles and court officials wore crimson clothing.

Bathing-tubs were used for treating venereal disease.

Touchstone continued:

“The remedy was, we must part. Since that time, he has had the gift of gathering up some small parcels — sums of money — of mine, to the value of five hundred pounds, dispersed among my customers, to furnish this his Virginian venture.”

Quicksilver had collected money that was owed to Touchstone, and he had kept it to finance the planned trip to Virginia. This was a capital offense: Quicksilver could hang for it.

Quicksilver had been lending Touchstone’s money to gallants when he was an apprentice, and now he had collected those debts.

“In this Virginia venture, this knight was the chief: Sir Flash.

“He is one who married a daughter of mine, ladyfied and lay her, turned two thousand pounds’ worth of good land of hers into cash within the first week, bought her a new gown and a coach, sent her to seek her fortune by land while he himself prepared for his fortune by sea, took in fresh flesh — a new woman — at Billingsgate for his own diet, to serve him the whole voyage — the wife of a certain usurer called Security, who has been the broker for them in all this business.

“Please, Master Deputy, work upon that now!”

Golding said, “If my worshipful father has ended —”

“I have, if it shall please Master Deputy,” Touchstone said.

Golding began, “Well then, subject to your correction —”

Touchstone whispered to Golding:

“Now, son, come over them with some fine gird — some fine cutting gibe or remark — such as this, ‘Knight, you shall be encountered,’ that is, you shall be taken to the Counter.”

The Counter was a prison; “to be encountered” meant, in the card game primero, “to draw a winning card.”

Touchstone continued whispering:

“Or ‘Quicksilver, I will put you in a crucible,’ or so.”

In some alchemical processes, mercury, aka quicksilver, was placed into crucibles and heated.

Golding said:

“Sir Petronel Flash, I am sorry to see such flashes — such outbursts of bad deeds — as these proceed from a gentleman of your quality and rank. For my own part, I could wish I could say I could not see them; but such is the misery of magistrates and men in place — ministers of state who serve the Crown — that they must not shut our eyes when confronted with offenders and ignore them.”

He said to the Constable and officers:

“Take him aside.”

He then said to Sir Petronel:

“I will hear what you have to say soon, sir.”

“I like this well,” Touchstone said to himself. “Yet there’s some grace — some virtue — left in the knight; he cries.”

Golding said:

“Francis Quicksilver, I wish to God that thou had turned quacksalver rather than run into these dissolute and lewd courses. It is a great pity.

“Thou are a proper, handsome young man, of an honest and clean, fine-featured face, somewhat near a good one — God has done his part in thee; but thou have made too much and been too proud of that face, with the rest of thy body; for maintenance of which in neat, fine, and garish attire, only to be looked upon by some light housewives — hussies, aka harlots — and thou have prodigally consumed much of thy master’s estate, and being by him gently admonished, at several times, have shown thyself to be haughty and rebellious in thine answers, thundering out uncivil comparisons — satiric similes — requiting all his kindness with a coarse and harsh behavior, never returning thanks for any one benefit, but receiving all as if they had been debts to thee and not courtesies.

“I must tell thee, Francis, these are manifest signs of an ill nature, and God does often punish such pride and outracuidance — arrogance and overweening conceit — with scorn and infamy, which is the worst of misfortune.”

Golding asked Touchstone:

“My worshipful father, what do you please to charge them with?”

He then said:

“From the impress I will free them, Master Constable.”

“Then I’ll leave Your Worship, sir,” the Constable said.

“No, you may stay,” Golding said. “There will be other matters against them.”

“Sir, I do charge this gallant, Master Quicksilver, on suspicion of felony,” Touchstone said, “and the knight as being accessory, in the receipt of my goods.”

“Oh, God, sir!” Quicksilver said.

He was afraid of being hanged.

Touchstone said:

“Hold thy peace, impudent varlet, hold thy peace!

“With what forehead or face — what impudence! — do thou offer to chop logic and argue with me, having run such a race of riot — such an extravagant course — as thou have done?

“Doesn’t the sight of this worshipful man’s fortune and temper confound thee, who was thy younger fellow in household, and now has come to have the place of a judge upon thee? Don’t thou observe this?

“Which of all thy gallants and gamesters, thy swearers and thy swaggerers, will come now to moan thy misfortune or pity thy penury? They’ll look out at a window as thou ride in triumph to Tyburn and cry, ‘Yonder goes honest Frank, mad Quicksilver.’” “Ride in triumph” meant to ride in the executioner’s cart to the gallows at Tyburn. Of course, Touchstone was mocking Frank Quicksilver by referring to the triumphal procession of a Roman general after a great victory.

Touchstone continued:

“‘He was a free boon — jolly — companion when he had money,’ says one.”

“Free” can mean liberal and generous and free-spending.

Touchstone continued:

“‘Hang him, fool,’ says another, ‘He could not keep it when he had it.’

“‘A pox on his master the cullion,’ says a third. ‘He has brought him to this.’

“It is true, however, that their pox of pleasure and their piles of perdition would have been better bestowed upon thee, who have ventured for them — for pleasure and perdition — with the best, and by the clew — the thread — of thy knavery brought thyself weeping to the cart of calamity.”

“Pox” is syphilis, and “piles” are hemorrhoids.

“Perdition” means damnation.

In other words: It would have been more appropriate for them to curse you.

“Their pox of pleasure” is a lascivious curse, and “their piles of perdition” is a damnable curse.

Quicksilver pleaded, “Worshipful master —”

Touchstone said:

“Don’t attempt to speak, crocodile who sheds false tears. I will not hear a sound come from thee. Thou have learned to whine at the play yonder.”

In other words: By watching actors in plays, you have learned how to shed fake tears.

Touchstone then said:

“Master Deputy, please commit them both to safe custody until I am able farther to charge them.”

“Oh, me, what an unfortunate thing am I!” Quicksilver said.

Sir Petronel asked Touchstone, “Won’t you take security, sir?”

Small-s “security” is bail.”

Interpreting “security” as “Security,” Touchstone said:

“Yes, by the Virgin Mary, I will, Sir Flash, if I can find him and charge him as deep as the best of you. He has been the plotter of all this; he is your engineer — your plotter and schemer — so I hear.”

He then said to Golding:

“Master Deputy, you’ll dispose of these?”

“In the meantime I’ll go to my Lord Mayor and get his warrant to seize that serpent Security into my hands and seal up both house and goods to the King’s use, or my satisfaction.”

“Officers, take them to the Counter,” Golding said.

Quicksilver and Sir Petronel said, “Oh, God!”

They were in serious trouble.

Touchstone said:

“Nay, go on, go on.

“You see the issue of your sloth. From sloth comes pleasure, from pleasure comes riot, from riot comes whoring, from whoring comes spending, from spending comes poverty, from poverty comes theft, from theft comes hanging; and there is my Quicksilver fixed.”

“Fixed” is an alchemical term meaning “deprived of fluidity and volatility.”

In prison, Quicksilver would lose his freedom. He was in a fix.

They exited.

ACT 5 (Eastward Ho!)

— 5.1 —

Gertrude and Sindefy talked together on a street in London. Their fine clothing had been pawned to get money for food and shelter.

“Ah, Sin!” Gertrude said. “Have thou ever read in the chronicle of any lady and her waiting-woman driven to that extremity that we are in, Sin?”

Chronicles are history books, such as John Stow’s A Summary of the Chronicles of England or his The Annals of England.

“Not I, truly, madam, and if I had, it would be only cold comfort should come out of books, now,” Sindefy answered.

Gertrude said:

“Why, in good faith, Sin, I could dine with a lamentable story now.”

She sang:

“O hone, hone, o no nera, etc.”

The Irish ochoin means “oh, alas!”

“O no nera” may mean “oh, non-era.”

An era can be a beginning of a new period in someone’s life and it can be a period in someone’s life, and a non can be a disapproving person.

Gertrude’s life had changed, and she had begun a period in her life in which many people, and especially her father, disapproved of her.

A “non-era” can be a period in someone’s life in which that person suffers disapproval.

Gertrude then asked:

“Can thou tell never a lamentable story, Sin?”

Sindefy replied:

“None but my own, madam, which is lamentable enough.

“First to be stolen from my friends and relatives, which were worshipful and of good account and esteem, by an apprentice in the habit — clothing — and disguise of a gentleman, and here brought up to London and promised marriage, and now likely to be forsaken, for he is in possibility to be hanged.”

Of course, she was talking about Quicksilver.

Sindefy cried.

Gertrude said:

“Nay, don’t weep, good Sin.

“My Petronel is in as good possibility as he.”

That possibility was of being hung.

Gertrude continued:

“Thy miseries are nothing to mine, Sin. I was more than promised marriage, Sin: I had it, Sin, and I was made a lady, and by a knight, Sin, who is now as good as no knight, Sin.

“And I was born in London, which is more than brought up, Sin; and I am already forsaken, which is past likelihood and more than mere possibility, Sin.

“And instead of land in the country, all my knight’s living — his dwelling — lies in the Counter, Sin. There’s his castle now!”

The word “living” also means “landed property.”

“Which he cannot be forced out of, madam,” Sindefy said.

Gertrude said:

“Yes, if he would live hungry a week or two. ‘Hunger,’ they say, ‘breaks stone walls.’

“But he is even well enough served, Sin, in the Counter, because as soon as ever he had got my hand to the sale of my inheritance, he ran away from me, as if I had been his punk — his prostitute — God bless us.

“Would the Knight of the Sun, or Palmerin of England, have treated their ladies so, Sin, or Sir Lancelot, or Sir Tristram?”

All the names were of knights or princes who were heroes of romances.

“I do not know, madam,” Sindefy answered.

Gertrude said:

“Then thou know nothing, Sin. Thou art a fool, Sin. The knighthood nowadays are nothing like the knighthood of old time. Our knights are nothing like the old knights.

“They rode on horseback; ours go on foot.

“They were attended by their squires; ours are attended by their lackeys.”

Lackeys are footmen.

Gertrude continued:

“They went buckled in their armor; ours are muffled in their cloaks.

“They traveled wildernesses and deserts; ours scarcely dare to walk the streets because of fear of being arrested for debt.

“They were always impelled to engage their honor; ours are always ready to pawn their clothes.

“They would gallop on at sight of a monster; ours run away at the sight of an arresting sergeant.

“They would help poor ladies; ours make poor ladies.”

“Aye, madam, they were knights of the Round Table at Winchester who sought adventures,” Sindefy said, “but these are knights of the square table in ordinaries, and they sit and play the gambling game known as hazard.”

Ordinaries are eating places.

“True, Sin, let him vanish,” Gertrude said. “And tell me, what shall we pawn next?”

“Aye, by the Virgin Mary, madam,” Sindefy said, “that is a timely consideration, for our hostess — profane woman! — has sworn by bread and salt that she will not trust us for another meal.”

Gertrude said:

“Let it stink in her hand, then; I’ll not be beholden — indebted — to her.

“Let me see: My jewels are gone, and my gowns, and my red velvet petticoat that I was married in, and my wedding silk stockings, and all thy best apparel, poor Sin.

“In good faith, rather than thou should pawn a rag more, I’d lay my ladyship in lavender, if I knew where.”

Pawned clothing was stored in lavender; Gertrude would pawn her title of Lady, if she knew where she could do that.

“Alas, madam, your ladyship!” Sindefy said.

Gertrude said:

“Aye, why? You do not scorn my ladyship, although it is — as I am — in a waistcoat?”

She had pawned her gown and was wearing a short garment for the upper body. Such dress was a mark of a woman of ill-repute.

Gertrude continued:

“God’s my life, you are a peat — a pet, a spoiled girl — indeed!

“Do I offer to mortgage my ladyship for you and for your benefit, and do you turn the lip and the ‘Alas’ to my ladyship? Do you disparage my title?”

“Turn the lip” means “show contempt.”

“No, madam, but I question who — I wonder whether anyone — will lend anything upon it,” Sindefy said.

Gertrude said:

“Who will? By the Virgin Mary, enough will, I promise you, if you’ll seek them out.

“I’m sure I remember the time when I would have given a thousand pounds, if I had had it, to have been a lady, and I hope I alone was not bred and born with that appetite. Some other gentle-born people of the city have the same longing, I trust.

“And for my part, I would afford them a pennyworth — some — of it; my ladyship is little the worse for the wearing, and yet I would bate — reduce — a good deal of the sum. I would lend it — let me see — for forty pounds in hand, Sin — that would apparel us — and ten pounds a year. That would keep me and you, Sin, with additional income earned from our needles as seamstresses, and we should never need to be beholden to our scurvy parents.

“Good Lord, that there are no fairies nowadays, Sin!”

“Why, madam?” Sindefy asked.

Fairies did good deeds for good housekeepers.

Gertrude said:

“To do miracles and bring ladies money.

“Surely, if we lay in a habitually clean house, they would haunt it, Sin. I’ll try. I’ll sweep the chamber early this evening, and I’ll set a dish of water on the hearth. A fairy may come and bring a pearl or a diamond; we do not know, Sin.

“Or there may be a pot of gold hid in the backside — the back of the house — if we had tools to dig for it.

“Why may not we two rise early in the morning, Sin, before anybody is up, and find a jewel in the streets worth a hundred pounds? May not some great court lady, as she comes away from revels — dances or masques — at midnight, look out of her coach as it is running, and lose such a jewel, and we find it? Huh?”

“They are pretty waking dreams, these,” Sindefy said.

They were daydreams.

Gertrude said:

“Or may not some old usurer be drunk overnight, with a bag of money, and leave it behind him on a stall, aka a shop counter? For God’s sake, Sin, let’s rise tomorrow by break of day and see.

“I say, indeed, that if I had as much money as an alderman, I would scatter some of it in the streets for poor ladies to find when their knights were laid up and imprisoned.

“And now I remember my song of the Golden Shower. Why may not I have such a fortune? I’ll sing it, and I’ll see what luck I shall have after it.”

She sang:

“Fond [Foolish] fables tell of old,

“How Jove in Danaë’s lap

“Fell in a shower of gold,

“By which she caught a clap.

“Oh, had it been my hap [fortune],

“Howe’er the blow doth threaten,

“So well I like the play

“That I could wish all day

“And night to be so beaten.”

“Caught a clap” meant to suffer a stroke of bad fortune; in this case, it meant to become pregnant.

The “blow” is a sexual thrust.

The “play” is sex.

An oracle had told Danaë’s father, King Acrisius of Argos, that her son would kill him. Therefore, he kept her locked up. Jupiter, the lustful king of the gods, however, came to her in a shower of golden rain. Danaë, made pregnant by Jupiter, gave birth to the Greek hero Perseus. King Acrisius put Danaë and Perseus, her son, into a chest and threw it into the sea. Neptune, god of the sea, provided a calm sea, and the chest washed up on the western coast of Italy, where Danaë founded the city of Ardea. Perseus grew up, learned about the prophecy that he would kill his father, and resolved never to go to Argos. Unfortunately, he competed in athletic games elsewhere, his aged father watched the games, and Perseus accidentally killed him with a discus.

Mrs. Touchstone, Gertrude’s mother, entered the scene.

Seeing her, Gertrude said, "Oh, here's my mother! Good luck, I hope."

She asked, "Have you brought any money, mother? Please, mother, give me your blessing."

Gertrude knelt, and Mrs. Touchstone wept.

Gertrude said, "Nay, sweet mother, do not weep."

"God bless you!" Mrs. Touchstone said, weeping. "I wish that I were in my grave!"

Gertrude said:

"Nay, dear mother, can you steal no more money from my father?"

Gertrude rose and said:

"Dry your eyes and comfort me.

"Alas, it is my knight's fault, and not mine, that I am in a waistcoat and attired thus simply."

Mrs. Touchstone said:

"Simply? It is better than thou deserve. Never whimper for the matter.

"Thou should have looked before thou had leaped. Thou were on fire to be a lady, and now your ladyship and you may both blow at the coal and become impassioned, for anything I know.

"Self do, self have.

"'The hasty person never lacks woe,' they say."

A Scottish proverb stated, "Let them that are cold blow at the coal."

Another Scottish proverb stated, "It's a cold coal to blow at."

Gertrude said:

“Nay, then, mother, you should have looked to it. A body would think you were the older. I did but my kind, I did.”

In other words: Gertrude wished that her mother had warned her about the dangers of the world. Gertrude believed that she herself had simply acted like what she was: a daughter who wished to marry well.

Gertrude continued:

“He was a knight, and I was fit to be a lady. It is not lack of liking but lack of living — lack of income — that severs us.”

Gertrude still loved — or at least still lusted after — Sir Petronel.

Gertrude continued:

“And you talk like yourself and a citiner — a citizen and a citizen’s wife — in this, indeed. You show what husband you come on, I am sure — you know who you are married to and what kind of man he is, truly.”

“Come on” means 1) come from, and 2) have sex with.

Gertrude continued:

“You smell the Touchstone — he who will do more for his daughter who has married a scurvy gold-end man and his apprentice than he will for his other daughter who has wedded a knight and his customer.

“By this light, I think that he is not my legitimate father.”

If she was saying what she really thought, then she also thought that her mother had committed adultery or that her “mother” had just been the midwife at her birth. If the latter, then she — Gertrude — was adopted.

“Oh, good madam, do not take up — don’t reprimand — your mother so,” Sindefy said.

Mrs. Touchstone said:

“Nay, nay, let her even alone.

“Let Her Ladyship grieve me still with her bitter taunts and terms.

“I have not dole — grief — enough to see her in this miserable case, I, without her velvet gowns, without ribbons, without jewels, without French wires, or cheatbread, or quails, or a little dog, or a gentleman usher, or anything indeed, that’s fit for a lady —”

French wires were used as supports for elaborate hairstyles.

Cheatbread is bread, but not bread of the highest quality. Despite being a lady, Gertrude could not afford to buy cheatbread.

Sindefy said to herself, “— except her tongue.”

Mrs. Touchstone continued:

“And I am not able to relieve her, neither, being kept so short of money by my husband. Well, God knows my heart. I did little think that she should ever have had need of her sister Golding.”

Gertrude said:

“Why, mother, I have not yet need of my sister.

“Alas, good mother, be not intoxicate — overly distressed — for me; I am well enough. I would not change husbands with my sister, I.

“The leg of a lark is better than the body of a kite.”

Larks were more highly regarded than kites.

Kites are inferior hawks.

“I know that,” Mrs. Touchstone said. “But —”

“What, sweet mother, what?” Gertrude asked.

“That’s true, mother,” Gertrude said. “Ay me!”

“Nay, sweet ladybird, don’t sigh,” Mrs. Touchstone said. “Child, madam! Why do you weep thus? Be of good cheer. I shall die if you cry and mar your complexion thus.”

The word “complexion” can mean face paint, aka makeup, but Gertrude is too poor to afford it.

“Ladybird” is a term of endearment.

“Alas, mother, what should I do?” Gertrude asked.

“Go to thy sister’s, child,” Mrs. Touchstone advised. “She’ll be proud Thy Ladyship will come under her roof. She’ll persuade thy father to release thy knight and redeem thy gowns and thy coach and thy horses, and set thee up again.”

“But will she get him to set my knight up, too?” Gertrude asked.

In other words (possibly): Will Mildred get Touchstone to give Sir Petronel enough money to buy back the land he sold? In any case, Gertrude wanted enough money to set her husband up in life.

“That she will, or anything else thou shall ask her,” Mrs. Touchstone replied.

“I will begin to love her, if I thought she would do this,” Gertrude said.

Mrs. Touchstone said. “Try her, good chuck, I promise thee that she will.”

“Chuck” is a term of endearment, like “ladybird.”

Gertrude asked Sindefy, “Do thou think she’ll do it?”

“Aye, madam, and be glad you will receive it,” Sindefy said.

Mrs. Touchstone said:

“That’s a good maiden; she tells you the truth.

“Come, I’ll take order — arrange payment — for your debts in the alehouse.”

Gertrude said, “Go, Sin, and pray for thy Frank, as I will for my Pet.”

They exited.

— 5.2 —

Touchstone, Golding, and Wolf stood together in front of Touchstone’s house. Wolf, who was the jailkeeper of the Counter, was carrying letters. The Counter is a prison.

“I will receive no letters, Master Wolf,” Touchstone said. “You shall pardon me.”

“Good father, let me entreat you to read the letters,” Golding said.

Touchstone replied:

“Son Golding, I will not be tempted. I know my own easy nature, and I don’t know what a well-penned subtle letter may work upon it. There may be packing — tricks. Do you see?”

“Packing” is fraudulent dealing.

Touchstone then said to Wolf:

“Return with your packet of letters, sir.”

“Believe it, sir, you need fear no packing here,” Wolf said. “These are but letters of submission, all.”

“Sir, I look for no submission,” Touchstone said. “I will bear myself in this like blind justice. Work upon that now. When the Sessions — the court hearings — come, they shall hear from me.”

“From whom come your letters, Master Wolf?” Golding asked.

“If it shall please you, sir, one comes from Sir Petronel, another from Francis Quicksilver, and a third from old Security, who is almost mad in prison,” Wolf replied. “There are two to Your Worship: one from Master Francis, sir, and another from the knight.”

He handed the letters to Golding.

Touchstone said:

“I wonder, Master Wolf, why you should travail thus and work so hard in a business so contrary to kind or the nature of your place.”

One kind of “kind” is natural disposition.

Wolf the jailkeeper was a kind person, although judging by his name, one would expect his natural disposition to be cruel and wolvisish. One could also expect jailkeepers to be cruel.

“That you, being the keeper of a prison, should labor for the release of your prisoners! Whereas I think it would be far more natural and kindly in you to be ranging about for more prisoners, and not let escape these whom you have already under the tooth — in prison — and in your power. But they say that you wolves, when you have sucked the blood once so that they are dry, you have done and finished with them.”

Wolf said:

“Sir, Your Worship may descant — discourse and improvise — as you please on my name, but I say that I was never so mortified with any men’s discourse or behavior in prison.”

To be “mortified” usually means to be “dead” to the world’s pleasures and to be moved to engage in spiritual devotion. Wolf meant, however, that he was not dead to the needs of his prisoners.

Wolf continued:

“Yet I have had all sorts of men in the kingdom under my keys — under lock and key — and men of almost all religions in the land, including Papist [Catholic], Protestant [Anglican], Puritan, Brownist, Anabaptist, Millenary, Family of Love, Jew, Turk, infidel, atheist, good fellow, etc.”

Brownists were followers of Robert Browne, who believed that congregations ought to elect their pastors.

Anabaptists believed in adult baptism, and they declined to swear oaths to either civil or ecclesiastical authorities.

Millenarists believed that Christ would reign on Earth for one thousand years.

Dutch mystic Hendrick Niclaes founded the Family of Love, which believed in an inward spiritual transformation that would result in a state of perfection.

Good fellows love alcohol and good times. “Good fellow” was also a slang term for a thief.

“And which of all these, thinks Master Wolf, was the best religion?” Golding asked.

“To tell the truth, Master Deputy, they who pay their fees best,” Wolf said. “We never examine their consciences farther.”

Prisoners would pay for food, lodging (the prison was divided into sections, some more expensive to stay in than others), and other services.

Golding said:

“I believe you, Master Wolf.”

He read the letters and then said:

“In good faith, sir, here’s a great deal of humility in these letters.”

Wolf said:

“Humility, sir? Aye, if Your Worship were an eyewitness of it, you would say so. The knight will stay in the Knights’ Ward, do what we can, sir, and Master Quicksilver would stay in the Hole if we would let him.”

The Hole is the common dungeon, and it is the cheapest accommodations in the Counter. The Knights’ Ward is the second most expensive, with the Masters’ Ward being the most expensive.

Wolf continued:

“I never knew or saw prisoners more penitent or more devout. They will sit up all night singing psalms and edifying the whole prison. Only Security sings a note too high, sometimes, because he lies in the Twopenny Ward, far off, and cannot take his tune — he cannot get the correct pitch. The neighbors cannot rest because of him, and they come every morning to ask what godly prisoners we have.”

“Which of them is it who is so devout, the knight or the other?” Touchstone asked.

Wolf said:

“Both, sir, but the young man — Quicksilver — especially. I never heard his like. He has cut his hair, too.”

Short hair was a sign of unworldliness. Courtiers and gallants wore their hair long.

Sindefy had not betrayed him to the Philistines as Delilah had treated Samson, and Quicksilver had cut his own hair. Assuming that his repentance was sincere, cutting his long hair was a sign of his newfound spiritual strength.

Wolf continued:

“He is so well given — disposed — and he has such good gifts! He can tell you almost all the stories of The Book of Martyrs and speak all The Sick Man’s Salve without book — that is, from memory.

These were religious books. The Book of Martyrs was about Protestant martyrs in the time of Queen Mary, a Catholic Queen of England and Ireland whom her Protestant opponents called “Bloody Mary” because of her religious persecution of their faith.

The Sick Man’s Salve by Thomas Becom is about having religious faith during times of illness. It is 545 pages long, and yet Quicksilver seems to have memorized most of the stories in it.

Touchstone said:

“Aye, as if he had had grace.

“He was brought up where it grew, I know. Yes, he grew up in a religious household: mine.

“Go on, Master Wolf.”

“And he has converted one Fangs, a sergeant, a fellow who could neither write nor read,” Wolf said. “Fangs was called the bandog of the Counter, and Quicksilver has brought him already to pare his nails and say his prayers, and it is hoped that he will sell his place shortly and become an intelligencer: an informer.”

A bandog is a dog that is kept chained because it is so fierce.

Sergeants were arresting officers who received fees for making arrests. They could sell their position to another person who would take their place.

Touchstone said:

“No more, I am coming — I am weakening — already. If I should give any farther ear and listen any longer, I would be taken in.”

He was beginning to become sympathetic to Quicksilver and Sir Petronel.

Touchstone said:

“Adieu, good Master Wolf.”

He then said to Golding, his son-in-law:

“Son, I do feel my own weaknesses; do not importune me. Pity is a rheum — an illness — that I am subject to, but I will resist it.”

He then said:

“Master Wolf, fish that is cast in dry pools is cast away. Tell Hypocrisy it will not do; I have touched and tried him too often.”

“Hypocrisy” is Touchstone’s nickname for Quicksilver. Touchstone is determined not to shed sympathetic tears for him because he had tested Quicksilver's character before — often — and Quicksilver had always disappointed him.

“Touched” and “tried” were also goldsmiths' terms. To “touch” meant to test the quality of a gold alloy by rubbing it on a touchstone and examining its color. To “try” precious metal meant to purify it by melting it and removing impurities.

Touchstone continued:

“I am yet proof — tried and tested and armored against appeals for help — and I will remain so. When the Sessions come, they shall hear from me. In the meantime, to all suits, to all entreaties, to all letters, to all tricks, I will be as deaf as an adder and as blind as a beetle; lay my ear to the ground and lock my eyes in my hand, against all temptations.”

He exited.

Golding said:

“You see, Master Wolf, how inexorable he is. There is no hope to recover his good will. Please commend me to my brother knight and to my fellow Francis; present them with this small token of my love.”

His “brother knight” was Sir Petronel, his brother-in-law.

He gave Wolf money and then said:

“Tell them I wish I could do them any worthier office, but in this it is desperate — it is hopeless. Yet I will not fail to try the uttermost of my power for them.

“And, sir, as far as I have any credit with you, please let them lack for nothing — although I am not ambitious — not eager — that they should know so much.”

“Sir, both your actions and words proclaim you to be a true gentleman,” Wolf replied. “They shall know only what is fit, and no more.”

— 5.3 —

Holdfast and Bramble spoke together at the Counter. Holdfast was a prison guard.

“Who do you want to speak with, sir?” Holdfast asked.

“I want to speak with a man named Security who is prisoner here,” Bramble said.

Holdfast said:

“You’re welcome, sir. Stay there; I’ll call him to you.”

He called:

“Master Security!”

Security’s face appeared at a grating. He was being kept in a dark cell.

“Who calls for me?” Security asked.

“Here’s a gentleman who would speak with you,” Holdfast said.

“Who is he?” Security asked. “Is he one who grafts my forehead, now I am in prison, and comes to see how the horns shoot up and prosper?”

He was worried that he would be cuckolded while in prison: A cuckold’s horns could be grafted onto his forehead the way that a branch from one tree can be grafted onto another tree.

“You must pardon him, sir,” Holdfast said to Bramble. “The old man is a little crazed with his imprisonment.”

As a usurer, Security had sent many to the Counter, a prison for debtors; now he was in that prison.

Security said:

“What have you to say to me, sir? Look here.”

Bramble approached the grate.

Security continued:

“My learned counsel, Master Bramble! I beg your mercy, sir. When did you see my wife?”

Bramble replied, “She is now at my house, sir, and she desired — requested — me that I would come to visit you and inquire of you about your case, so that we might work some means to get you out of prison.”

Security said:

“My case, Master Bramble, is stone walls and iron grates.”

His “case” was 1) his condition, 2) his container, and 3) his legal case.

“You see it; this is the weakest part of it. And, as for getting me out of prison, there is no means but to hang myself and so to be carried out, to prevent which they have here bound me in intolerable bands and shackles.”

“Why, but what is it you are in for, sir?” Bramble asked.

Security said:

“For my sins, for my sins, sir, whereof marriage is the greatest.

“Oh, if I had never married, I would have never known this purgatory, to which hell is a kind of cool bath in respect — in comparison.

“My wife’s confederacy, sir, with old Touchstone, that she might keep her jubilee and the feast of her new moon. Do you understand me, sir?”

“Confederacy” means 1) conspiracy, and 2) (sexual) intercourse.

Of course, Touchstone had not had confederacy with Security’s wife. Have Quicksilver and Sir Petronel fooled him into believing this? If they have, they are not repentant. Or is Security imagining things in his misery?

A jubilee is a time of celebration and release, and the feast of the new moon is a pagan fertility festival.

Every fifty years the Old Testament Jews freed their slaves in a jubilee. The name comes from the ram’s horn that was blown to announce the jubilee.

Originally, the new moon was the first crescent moon of the lunar cycle. A crescent moon has horns.

Of course, horns are the sign of the cuckold.

Quicksilver entered the scene and said to Bramble:

“Good sir, go in and talk with him. The light does him harm, and his example will be hurtful to the weak prisoners.”

Security was being kept in a dark cell, and the light did hurt his eyes.

Some prisoners are literally weak, and they will be discouraged if Security talks about injured eyes.

Quicksilver then said:

“Bah, father Security, that you’ll be still so profane! Will nothing humble you?”

All exited, but as they exited, two prisoners entered the scene, accompanied by a friend.

The friend asked about Quicksilver, “Who’s he?”

“Oh, he is a rare — a splendid — young man,” the first prisoner said. “Don’t you know him?”

“No, I don’t,” the friend said. “I never saw him that I can remember.”

“Why, it is he who was the gallant apprentice of London, Master Touchstone’s man — he was his apprentice,” the second prisoner, whose name was Toby, said.

“Who, Quicksilver?” the friend asked.

“Aye, this is he,” the first prisoner said.

“Is this he?” the friend said. “They say he has been a gallant indeed.”

The second prisoner said:

“Oh, he was the royallest — most royal — fellow who ever was bred up in the city!

“He would play his thousand pounds a night at dice, keep knights and lords company, go with them to bawdy-houses; have his six men in a livery, keep a stable of hunting horses, and keep his wench in her velvet gown and her cloth of silver.”

Cloth of silver was interwoven with threads of silver, or it was gilded.

Quicksilver was prodigal, but these exploits seem to have come into existence because of rumor.

The second prisoner continued:

“Here’s one knight with him here in prison.”

“And how miserably he has changed!” the friend said.

“Oh, that’s voluntary in him,” the first prisoner said. “He gave away all his rich clothes as soon as ever he came in here, among the prisoners, and he will eat food out of the basket for humility.”

The basket was an alms basket of food scraps; these scraps were NOT good eating.

“Why will he do so?” the friend asked.

“Alas, he has no hope of life,” the second prisoner said. “He mortifies himself. He does but linger on until the Sessions.”

According to the second prisoner, Quicksilver expected to be hanged. He was preparing for the next life.

The first prisoner said:

“Oh, he has penned the best thing, which he calls his ‘Repentance’ or his ‘Last Farewell,’ that ever you heard. He is a pretty poet, and for prose — you would wonder at and be surprised by how many prisoners he has helped out, with penning petitions for them, and not take a penny.”

The petitions were requests for forgiveness of debt or for other forms of charity.

The first prisoner continued:

“Look, this is the knight, in the rug gown.”

“Rug” is a coarse fabric. Sir Petronel was wearing a rug gown as a sign of repentance. This was similar to the wearing of sackcloth.

The first prisoner then said:

“Let’s stand to the side.”

They stood aside and watched the scene.

Sir Petronel, Bramble, and Quicksilver entered the scene.

Bramble said:

“Sir, as for Security’s case, I have told him.

“Let’s say that he would be condemned to be carted and whipped for a bawd, or so —”

Security had housed Sindefy, Quicksilver’s punk.

Bramble continued:

“— why, I’ll lay an execution on him of two hundred pounds; let him acknowledge a judgment — he shall do it in half an hour — they shall not all fetch him out without paying the execution, on my word.”

This was a legal trick. If Security agreed to pay money — two hundred pounds — to Touchstone, he could not be taken out of prison and carted and whipped until the money was repaid. The authorities would be unwilling to pay that debt, and so Security would not be whipped.

Possibly.

Bramble’s legal maneuvers are so twisty and convoluted that understanding them can be difficult — which is probably the point.

“But can’t we be bailed out, Master Bramble?” Sir Petronel asked.

Bramble answered:

“Hardly. None of the judges is in town, else you should remove yourself, in spite of Touchstone, with a habeas corpus.”

Habeas corpus is the legal right to have a court hearing. People cannot be locked up legally for very long unless they have a court hearing first. The court hearing could be about reducing the amount of bail needed to be released from prison.

Bramble continued:

“But if you have a friend to deliver your tale sensibly — that is, appealingly — to some justice of the town, so that he may have feeling of it, do you see, you may be bailed.”

One way for the authorities to have the feeling that these men should be released from prison would be to put money into the justice’s hand so the justice could feel it.

Another kind of feeling is the feeling of sympathy, but sometimes a bribe is more effective.

Bramble continued:

“For as I understand the case, it is done only in terrorem — done only to terrify others as a deterrent to crime — and you shall have a legal action of false imprisonment against him when you come out, and perhaps a thousand pounds costs.”

Master Wolf entered the scene.

Seeing him, Quicksilver asked, “How are you now, Master Wolf? What is the news? What return — what answer — do they make?”

Wolf answered, “Indeed, all the news is bad. Yonder will be no letters received. Touchstone says the Sessions shall determine it. Master Deputy Golding, however, commends himself to you, and with this token wishes he could do you other good.”

He gave Quicksilver Golding’s money.

Quicksilver said:

“I thank him.

“Good Master Bramble, trouble our quiet no more; do not molest us in prison thus with your winding — tricky, devious, and wily — devices and plots. Please depart.”

Bramble exited.

Quicksilver continued:

“For my part, I commit my cause to Him Who can succor me; let God work His will.

“Master Wolf, please let this money be distributed among the prisoners and desire — request — them to pray for us.”

He returned the money.

“It shall be done, Master Francis,” Wolf said.

Francis Quicksilver exited.

“An excellent temperament and disposition!” the first prisoner said.

“Now God send him good luck!” the second prisoner said.

The two prisoners and their friend exited.

“But what did my father-in-law say, Master Wolf?” Sir Petronel asked.

Holdfast entered the scene.

“There is a man who would speak with you, sir,” Holdfast said to Wolf.

“I’ll tell you soon, Sir Petronel,” Wolf said.

Sir Petronel exited.

Wolf asked Holdfast, “Who is it?”

“A gentleman, sir, who will not be seen,” Holdfast said.

Golding entered the scene.

Wolf asked:

“Where is he?”

Seeing Golding, he said:

“Master Deputy! Your Worship is welcome —”

“Peace!” Golding said. “Quiet!”

He wanted secrecy.

Wolf said to Holdfast, “Away, sirrah!”

Holdfast exited.

Golding said:

“In good faith, Master Wolf, the estate — the situation and condition — of these gentlemen, for whom you were so recently and willingly a suitor, does much affect me.

“And because I am desirous to do them some fair service, and I find that there is no means to make my father relent so likely as to bring him here to be a spectator of their miseries, I have ventured on a trick, which is to make myself your prisoner, entreating you to immediately go and report it to my father, and, feigning an action at the suit of some third person, request of him by this token” — he gave Wolf a ring — “that he will immediately and with all secrecy come here to be my bail.”

As part of the trick, Wolf would say that Golding was in prison because he owed money to someone.

Golding continued:

“This train, aka stratagem, if any, I know will bring him out of his house, and then having him here, I don’t doubt but we shall be all fortunate in the eventual outcome.”

If Touchstone were to actually see the prisoners, he would feel sympathy for them and he would relieve their distress.

“Sir, I will put on my best speed to effect it,” Wolf said.
“Please come in.”

“Yes, and let me rest and remain concealed, please,” Golding said.

He exited.

“See here a benefit truly done, when it is done timely, freely, and to no ambition and ostentation,” Wolf said.

He exited.

— 5.4 —

Touchstone, Mrs. Touchstone, their daughters (Mildred and Gertrude), Sindefy, and Winifred talked together at Touchstone’s house.

“I will sail by you and not hear you, like the wise Ulysses,” Touchstone said.

Touchstone had gotten the myth wrong. Actually, Ulysses wished to sail by the Sirens and hear them and survive. Other sailors on other ships who had heard the Sirens had jumped overboard and been killed. Therefore, Ulysses ordered his men to stop their ears with beeswax and tie him to the mast and sail by the Sirens. Being tied to the mast kept Ulysses from jumping overboard, and he survived hearing the song of the Sirens.

Mildred knelt and said, “Dear father!”

Mrs. Touchstone knelt and said, “Husband!”

Gertrude knelt and said, “Father!”

Winifred and Sindefy knelt and said, “Master Touchstone!”

“Away, Sirens!” Touchstone said. “I will immure myself against your cries and lock myself up to your lamentations.”

“Gentle husband, hear me,” Mrs. Touchstone said.

“Father, it is I, father, my Lady Flash,” Gertrude said. “My sister and I are friends.”

“Good father!” Mildred said.

“Be not hardened, good Master Touchstone,” Winifred said.

“Please, sir, be merciful,” Sindefy said.

Touchstone said:

“I am deaf, I do not hear you; I have stopped my ears with shoemaker’s wax and drunk Lethe and mandragora to forget you.”

The water of the Lethe River causes forgetfulness in souls.

The mandragora plant is mandrake, and it has narcotic qualities. It puts people into a deep sleep.

Touchstone continued:

“All that you speak to me I commit to the air.”

He exited, and the women rose.

Wolf entered the scene.

“How are things now, Master Wolf?” Mildred asked.

“Where’s Master Touchstone?” Wolf said. “I must speak with him immediately. I have lost my breath because of haste.”

“What’s the matter, sir?” Mildred said. “I pray that all is well!”

“Master Deputy Golding has been arrested upon a writ of execution and desires Touchstone immediately to come to him without delay,” Wolf said.

“Ay me!” Mildred said.

She called, “Do you hear me, father?”

From inside, Touchstone said, “Tricks, tricks, confederacy, tricks! I have them in my nose, I scent them.”

According to Touchstone, he scented tricks the way that an animal of prey scented hunters.

“Who’s that?” Wolf asked. “Master Touchstone?”

“Why, it is Master Wolf himself, husband,” Mrs. Touchstone called to her husband.

“Father!” Mildred called.

From an inside room, Touchstone said, “I am deaf still, I say. I will neither yield to the song of the Siren nor the voice of the hyena, the tears of the crocodile nor the howling of the wolf. Avoid my habitation, monsters! Leave!”

People in this society believed that hyenas could imitate the voices of men and lure them to their death.

Wolf called, “Why, you aren’t mad, are you, sir? I ask you to look forth and see the token I have brought you, sir.”

Touchstone entered the scene and said, “Huh! What token is it?”

Wolf showed him Golding’s ring and asked, “Do you know it, sir?”

“My son Golding’s ring!” Touchstone said. “Are you in earnest, Master Wolf?”

“Aye, by my faith, sir,” Wolf said. “He is in prison and requested me to use all speed and secrecy to you.”

Touchstone said:

“Give me my cloak there!”

He then said to the women:

“Please be patient; I am plagued for my austerity.”

He said again:

“My cloak!”

He then asked:

“At whose suit, Master Wolf?”

“I’ll tell you as we go, sir,” Wolf said.

They exited.

— 5.5 —

The two prisoners and their friend talked together in the Counter.

“Why, but is his offence — Quicksilver’s crime — such as that he cannot have hope of life — have hope to continue living?” the friend asked.

“Indeed, it would seem so,” the first prisoner said, “and it is a great pity, for he is exceedingly penitent.”

“They say he is charged only on suspicion of felony yet,” the friend said.

“Aye, but his master is a shrewish — that is, ill-natured — fellow,” the second prisoner said. “He’ll prove great matter against him.”

“More than anything else, I’d like to see his ‘Farewell,’” the friend said.

Touchstone had written a song of repentance. He believed that he would be sentenced to death, and he planned to sing his “Farewell” as he was carted to the place where he expected to be hung.

“Oh, it is rarely — splendidly — written!” the first prisoner said. “Why, Toby may get him to sing it to you. Quicksilver is not standoffish with anybody.”

Toby was the second prisoner’s name.

“Oh, he is definitely not standoffish,” the second prisoner said. “He wishes that all the world should learn about his repentance, and he thinks he acquires merit in it the more shame he suffers.”

In other words: The more shame he feels, the more sincere is his repentance; if he felt no shame, he would not have sincerely repented.

The first prisoner said to the second prisoner, “Please, try and see what thou can do.”

“I promise you that he will not deny it, if he is not hoarse with the often repeating of it,” the second prisoner said.

He exited.

The first prisoner said, “You never saw a more courteous creature than he is, and the knight, too. The poorest prisoner of the house may command them: They may request favors from them. You shall hear a thing admirably penned.”

“Is the knight any scholar, too?” the friend asked. “Is he an author?”

The first prisoner said, “No, but he will speak very well, and discourse admirably of racing horses, and Whitefriars, and against bawds, and of cocks, and he will talk as loud as a hunter, but he is none.”

“He is none” can mean 1) he is not a hunter, and/or 2) he is not a scholar and author.

Whitefriars was a sanctuary for debtors and a haunt of prostitutes.

Wolf and Touchstone entered the scene.

“Please stay here, sir,” Wolf said to Touchstone. “I’ll call His Worship down to you.”

His Worship was Golding.

Wolf exited.

Touchstone stood aside.

Quicksilver and Sir Petronel, who were escorted by the second prisoner, entered the scene.

From another direction, Wolf and Golding entered the scene and stood apart from the others to witness the scene.

The first prisoner said, “See, he has brought him, and the knight, too. Greet him, please.”

He then said to Quicksilver, “Sir, this gentleman, upon our report, is very desirous to hear some piece of your ‘Repentance.’”

“Sir, with all my heart, and as I told Master Toby, I shall be glad to have any man be a witness of it,” Quicksilver said. “And the more openly I profess it, I hope it will appear the heartier and the more unfeigned.”

“Who is this?” Touchstone said to himself. “My former serving-man Francis? And my son-in-law?”

“Sir, it is all the testimony I shall leave behind me to the world and my master whom I have so offended,” Francis Quicksilver said.

“Good sir!” the friend said.

“I wrote it when my spirits were oppressed,” Quicksilver said.

“Aye, I’ll be sworn for you, Francis,” Sir Petronel said. “What you said is true.”

“It is in imitation of Mannington’s, he who was hanged at Cambridge, who cut off the horse’s head at a blow,” Quicksilver said.

George Mannynton [Mannington] wrote “A Woeful Ballad” (1576) an hour before he was executed. It began, “I wail in woe, I plunge in pain.”

“So, sir,” the friend said.

Quicksilver said, “It is to the tune of ‘I wail in woe, I plunge in pain.’”

“An excellent ditty it is, and worthy of a new tune,” Sir Petronel said.

Quicksilver sang:

“In Cheapside famous for gold and plate,

“Quicksilver, I did dwell of late.

“I had a master good and kind,

“That would have wrought [fashioned] me to his mind.

“He bade me still [continually], ‘Work upon that,’

“But alas, I wrought I knew not what.

“He was a touchstone black but true

“And told me still [continually] what would ensue.

“Yet, woe is me, I would not learn;

“I saw, alas, but could not discern.”

The touchstones used to test the purity of gold alloys were often black.

“Excellent!” the friend said. “Excellent well.”

Wolf started to move towards Touchstone, but Golding stopped him and said, “Oh, let Quicksilver alone! Touchstone is taken — is captivated — already.”

Quicksilver continued singing his song:

“I cast my coat and cap away;

“I went in silks and satins gay.

“False metal of good manners I

“I scorned my master, being drunk;

“I kept my gelding and my punk.

“And with a knight, Sir Flash by name,

“Who now is sorry for the same —”

“False metal of good manners” is fake gallantry.

“I thank you, Francis,” Sir Petronel said.

Quicksilver continued singing his song:

“I thought by sea to run away,

“But Thames and tempest did me stay.”

Touchstone said to himself, “This cannot be feigned, surely. Heaven pardon my severity! The ragged colt may prove to be a good horse.”

Golding whispered to Wolf, “How he listens and is transported: He is enraptured by it! He has forgotten me.”

Quicksilver continued singing his song:

“Still ‘Eastward ho!’ was all my word,

“But westward I had no regard.

“Nor never thought what would come after,

“As did, alas, his youngest daughter.”

Mildred was the prudent younger daughter. She could consider the results of her own actions and the results of other people’s actions.

Westward is the direction toward the Tyburn gallows, and eastward may be the direction of good fortune because it is the opposite direction. But eastward is the direction toward Cuckold’s Haven.

Quicksilver and Sir Petronel had wanted to go westward to Virginia, but now it looked as if one or both of them would go westward to Tyburn. Just as on the night of the storm, they had fallen short in their journey.

The word “daughter,” then pronounced “dafter,” rhymed with “after.”

Quicksilver continued:

“At last the black ox trod o’my foot,

“And I saw then what ’longed unto’t [belonged to it].”

A black ox is a symbol of ill fortune.

Quicksilver continued:

“Now cry I, ‘Touchstone, touch me still,

“And make me current by thy skill.””

In other words, the last two lines say:

“Now I cry, ‘Touchstone, continue to test me,

“And make me good metal — and with good mettle — with your skill.”

Starting to come forward, Touchstone said, “And I will do it, Francis.”

Wolf said quietly to Golding, “Stay him, Master Deputy; now is the time; we shall lose the song else.”

He wanted Golding to stop Touchstone from approaching Quicksilver now; he wanted to hear the rest of Quicksilver’s song.

Golding and Wolf approached Touchstone.

The friend said to Quicksilver, “I say that it is the best song that I ever heard.”

“How do you like it, gentlemen?” Quicksilver asked.

“Oh, it is admirable, sir!” the friend and the two prisoners said.

“This stanza now following alludes to the story of Mannington, from whence I took my objective for my invention,” Quicksilver said.

He was emulating Mannington, who had written his own song of repentance.

“Please go on, sir,” the friend said.

Quicksilver continued singing his song:

*“O Mannington, thy stories show
“Thou cutt’st a horsehead off at a blow,
“But I confess, I have not the force
“For to cut off the head of a horse.
“Yet I desire this grace to win:
“That I may cut off the horsehead of Sin
“And leave his body in the dust
“Of sin’s highway and bogs of lust.
“Whereby I may take Virtue’s purse
“And live with her, for better, for worse.”*

Mannington was said to be able to cut off a horse’s head with a single blow.

Quicksilver sang that he would like to cut off the horsehead of Sin so that he could take the purse (bag for money) of Virtue and live with her. Of course, this sounds as if he is robbing Virtue.

“Admirable, sir, and excellently conceited — excellently imagined,” the friend said.

“Alas, sir,” Quicksilver said.

Touchstone said quietly:

“Son Golding and Master Wolf, I thank you. The deceit is welcome —”

The deceit was the pretense that Golding had been arrested and put in the prison.

Touchstone turned to Golding and continued:

“— especially from thee, whose charitable soul in this has shown a high point of wisdom and honesty.

“Listen! I am ravished with his ‘Repentance,’ and I could stand here a whole apprenticeship to hear him.”

The length of a whole apprenticeship was usually seven years.

“Forth, good sir,” the friend said to Quicksilver. “Continue.”

Quicksilver said, “This is the last part, and the ‘Farewell.’”

Quicksilver finished singing his song:

“Farewell, Cheapside, farewell, sweet trade

“Of goldsmiths all that never shall fade.

“Farewell, dear fellow prentices [apprentices] all,

“And be you warnèd by my fall.

“Shun usurers, bawds, and dice and drabs [whores];

“Avoid them as you would French scabs [syphilitic sores and scars].

“Seek not to go beyond your tether,

“But cut your thongs unto your leather.

“So shall you thrive by little and little;

“Scape [Escape] Tyburn, Counters, and the Spittle.”

The expression “to cut thongs of others’ leather” means “to take what is not rightfully yours.”

The full proverb is “It is not honest to make large thongs [out] of others’ leather,” and it means, “Don’t be prodigal at other people’s expense.”

The variation “cut your thongs unto your leather” means “to live within your means.”

Thongs are narrow strips of leather.

The Spittle is the Spital, a hospital for indigent patients. Venereal and other diseases were treated there.

Touchstone came forward and said, “And escape them shall thou, my penitent and dear Francis!”

“Master!” Quicksilver said.

He knelt.

Sir Petronel said, “Father!”

He knelt.

Touchstone said:

“I can no longer forbear to do your humility right. Arise, and let me honor your ‘Repentance’ with the hearty and joyful embraces of a father and friend’s love.

“Quicksilver, thou have eaten into my breast, Quicksilver, with the drops of thy sorrow, and killed the desperate — the despairing — opinion I had of thy reclaim.”

The “drops of thy sorrow” are tears.

The inorganic salts of quicksilver, aka mercury, can be corrosive to the skin. Mercury can also dissolve gold.

By “eaten into my breast,” Touchstone meant “touched my heart.”

Quicksilver’s humility had changed Touchstone’s former opinion that Quicksilver could not be reclaimed.

Rising, Quicksilver said, “Oh, sir, I am not worthy to see your worshipful face.”

Rising, Sir Petronel said, “Forgive me, father.”

Touchstone said:

“Speak no more; all former passages — all former events — are forgotten, and here my word shall release you.

“Francis, thank this worthy brother and kind friend.”

He wanted Francis Quicksilver to thank Golding and Wolf.

Touchstone then said:

“Master Wolf, I am their bail.”

Security shouted in the prison as he ran toward the grate.

Appearing at the grate, he shouted, “Master Touchstone! Master Touchstone!”

“Who’s that?” Touchstone asked.

“Security, sir,” Wolf said.

“Please, sir, if you’ll be won with a song, hear my lamentable tune, too,” Security said.

He sang:

“O Master Touchstone,

“My heart is full of woe;

“Alas, I am a cuckold,

“And why should it be so?

“Because I was a usurer

“And bawd, as all you know,

“For which, again I tell you,

“My heart is full of woe.”

Touchstone said:

“Bring him forth, Master Wolf, and release his restraints.”

Wolf exited.

He then returned with Security.

Touchstone said:

“This day shall be sacred to mercy and the mirth of this encounter in the Counter.”

Seeing some people coming, he said:

“Look, we are encountered with more suitors.”

Suitors are suppliants: They need or want something.

Mrs. Touchstone, Gertrude, Mildred, Sindefy, and Winifred entered the scene.

Touchstone then said:

“Save your breath, save your breath! All things have happened according to your wishes, and we are heartily satisfied in their outcomes.”

Gertrude said to Sir Petronel, “Ah, runaway, runaway, have I caught you? And how has my poor knight done all this while?”

“Dear lady-wife, forgive me!” Sir Petronel said.

Gertrude replied:

“As heartily as I would be forgiven, knight.”

She knelt and said to Touchstone:

“Dear father, give me your blessing and forgive me, too.

“I have been proud and lascivious, father, and a fool, father; and being raised to the state of a wanton coy thing called a lady, father, I have scorned you, father, and my sister, and my sister's velvet cap, too; and I would make a mouth — an expression of contempt — at the city as I rode through it, and I would stop my ears at Bow-bell.”

Bow-bell is the bell at St. Mary-le-bow.

Gertrude continued:

“I have said your beard was a base one, father; and that you looked like Twierpipe, the taborer; and that my mother was only my midwife.”

A tabor is a small drum. Often, a taborer would play the tabor with one hand and a pipe — a wind instrument — with the other.

“Now God forgive you, child madam!” Mrs. Touchstone said.

Touchstone said:

“No more repetitions and recitations of past sins.”

Gertrude rose.

Touchstone then asked:

“What else is needed to make our harmony full?”

“Only this, sir,” Golding said, “that my fellow Francis make amends to Mistress Sindefy with marriage.”

“With all my heart,” Francis Quicksilver said.

“And Security give her a dower, which shall be all the restitution he shall make of that huge mass he has so unlawfully gotten,” Golding said.

“Excellently devised!” Touchstone said. “A good suggestion. What does Master Security say?”

“I say anything, sir,” Security said. “I say what you’ll have me say. I wish I were no cuckold!”

“Cuckold, husband?” Winifred said. “Why, I think this wearing of yellow has infected you.”

“Yellow” is the color of jealousy. Security was wearing yellow.

Touchstone said:

“Why, Master Security, that should be a comfort to you rather than a corrosive to your mental health.

“If you should be a cuckold, it’s an argument you have a beautiful woman for your wife.

“Then you shall be much made of; you shall have a store of friends; you shall never lack money; you shall be eased of much of your wedlock ‘pain’ because others will take it on for you.”

In other words: Others will do for you your husbandly duty to your wife in bed.

Touchstone continued:

“Besides, you are a usurer and likely to go to hell, but the devils will never torment you; they’ll take you for one of their own race because of your cuckold’s horns.

“Again, if you should be a cuckold and don’t know it, you are an innocent, and if you know it and endure it, you are a true martyr.”

Innocents are 1) guiltless people, or 2) fools.

Martyrs undergo great suffering, and sometimes they die.

Security said:

“I am resolved, sir.”

He was resolved to make the best of the situation.

He then said:

“Come hither, Winnie.”

He put his arm around her.

Touchstone said:

“Well, then, all are pleased, or shall be soon.

“Master Wolf, you look hungry, I think. Do you have any apparel to lend Francis to change into?”

Francis Quicksilver said, “No, sir, nor do I desire any, but here I make it my suit that I may go home through the streets in these clothes, as a spectacle for people to stare at, or rather an example, to the children of Cheapside.”

His suit was 1) his petition to Touchstone, and 2) his prison uniform.

He wanted to wear the prison uniform as he walked through the streets to Touchstone’s home.

Touchstone said:

“Thou have thy wish.”

He then said to the audience, including the readers of this book:

“Now, London, look about, and in this moral see thy glass [hourglass, aka time] run out.

“Behold the careful father, thrifty son;

“The solemn deeds, which each of us have done;

“The usurer punished, and from fall so steep

“The prodigal child reclaimed, and the lost sheep.”

He started to exit, but —

EPILOGUE (Eastward Ho!)

— Quicksilver said to Touchstone:

“Stay, sir, I perceive that the multitude are gathered together to view our coming out at the Counter.”

He gestured at the audience members in the theatre and said:

“See whether the streets [the pit] and the fronts of the houses [the galleries] are full of people and the windows are filled with ladies as on the solemn day of the pageant!”

The pageant was an annual entertainment to celebrate the investiture of the Lord Mayor of London.

Quicksilver then said to the audience:

“Oh, may you find in this our pageant here

“The same contentment which you came to seek;

“And as that show but draws you once a year,

“May this attract you, hither, once a week.”

***

Notes:

“That show” was the Lord Mayor’s annual entertainment.

At its first performances, this play was performed only once a week, on Saturdays.

The song is “Sleep wayward thoughts” by John Dowland and is from his The First Booke of Songs or Ayres (1597):

*Sleep wayward thoughts, and rest you with my love,
Let not my Love be with my love diseas'd.
Touch not proud hands, least you her anger move,
But pine you with my longings displeas'd.
Thus while she sleeps I sorrow for her sake,
So sleeps my Love, and yet my love doth wake.*

*But on the fury of my restless fear,
The hidden anguish of my flesh desires,
The glories and the beauties that appear,
Between her brows near Cupid's closed fires
Thus while she sleeps I sorrow for her sake,
So sleeps my Love, and yet my love doth wake.*

*My love doth rage, and yet my Love doth rest,
Fear in my love, and yet my Love secure,
Peace in my Love, and yet my love oppress'd,
Impatient yet of perfect temperature,*

*Sleep dainty Love, while I sigh for thy sake,
So sleeps my Love, and yet my love doth wake.*

*Beauty, since you so much desire

About you somewhere doth it rest,
Yet neuer harbour'd in your brest,
Nor gout-like in your heele or toe ;
What foole would seeke Loues flame so low?

Here are some relevant Oxford English Dictionary definitions for “head”:

“A person’s hair; the whole mass or body of this.”
(head, n.1, 5a)

“The rounded part forming the end of the penis; the glans.” (head, n.1, 18d)

“An accumulation of foam or froth on the top of certain drinks, esp. beer.” (head, n.1, 20a)

“The cream which accumulates on the top of milk.” (head, n.1, 20b, first citation: 1864)

The Oxford English Dictionary also begins a definition of “milk” as “A whitish fluid.”

Since the person’s hair is flaxen (pale yellowish-gray), and the person’s head is “white as milk,” the person’s head is probably semen.

The Irish ochoin means “oh, alas!”

According to the Oxford English Dictionary, the word “franklin” can mean, allusively, “A liberal host.”

If that is the case here, it could refer ironically to her father, Touchstone, who no longer takes care of Gertrude.

According to the Oxford English Dictionary, the word “franklin” can mean “A freeholder; in 14-15th centuries the designation of a class of landowners, of free but not noble birth, and ranking next below the gentry.”

But if “franklin” means “a free landholder,” then it could refer ironically to Sir Petronel, who sold Gertrude’s land and abandoned her. Of course, he is a knight, but he was not born a knight. Sir Petronel, however, is not free: He is in prison.

The phrase “o no nera” could mean “oh, no ne’ra,” aka “oh, no nearer.”

Thomas Robinson has a song titled “O Hone” (1609), the music to which these words were set:

O hone, hone, o no nera, O hone, hone, o no nera.

Source: Ross W. Duffin, Some Other Note: The Lost Songs of English Renaissance Comedy.

“Nera” is a warrior in Irish Mythology.

Nera (modern spelling Neara) is a warrior of Connacht in the Ulster Cycle of Irish mythology who appears in the 10th cen Middle Irish story the Echtra Nerai.

Source: “Nera (mythology).” Wikipedia. Accessed 27 July 2022

https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Nera\_\(mythology\))

If this is the meaning that Ben Jonson meant, then yes, Sir Petronel is no warrior.

“O no nera” may mean “oh, non-era.”

The Oxford English Dictionary defines “era” as “A date, or an event, which forms the commencement of a new period in the history of a nation, an institution, individual, art or science, etc.; a memorable or important date.” The first citation, however, is 1703.

The Oxford English Dictionary defines “non” as “a prohibition.” The sole citation is from 1551.

The Oxford English Dictionary also defines “non” as “a person who dissents or disapproves.” The first citation is 1663.

An era can be a beginning of a new period in someone’s life and it can be a period in someone’s life, and a non can be a disapproving person.

The answer that I think is correct is that “O no nera” means “oh, non-era.”

Gertrude’s life has changed, and she has begun a period in her life in which many people, and especially her father, disapprove of her.

THE SCENE: LONDON

NOTES:

The Latin word morosus has the meaning of “peevisish” or “stubborn.”

According to Wikipedia, “Epicenity is the lack of gender distinction, often reducing the emphasis on the masculine to allow the feminine. It includes androgyny — having both masculine and feminine characteristics.”

A daw is a jackdaw. Jackdaws are a bird that was thought to be loquacious and thievish. The word “daw” also meant “dolt.”

Sir John “Jack” Daw is the “servant” of Epicene. In this context, “servant” means someone who loves her and is devoted to her service. A servant is a male admirer.

An otter is an amphibious animal and is associated with both land and sea: river otters and sea otters.

Centaurs are half-man and half-horse. No female Centaurs exist, even in mythology.

“Collegiates” means “people associated with a College or a Society.”

“Dol” is a nickname for Dorothy.

A pretender is an aspirer. Both MISTRESS TRUSTY and MRS. OTTER aspire to be full-fledged members of the Lady Collegiates.

Ben Jonson wrote Epicene in the year 1609, a year when the plague was virulent in London.

A mistress can be a loved woman, not necessarily a woman one sleeps with.

A servant can be a man who is devoted to and loves and serves a woman.

“Mute” means untalkative.

“Dumb” means untalkative.

“Madam” is a title of higher rank than “Mistress.” “Mistress” means “Mrs.” “Madam” is used for a woman of rank; for example, one who has the title “Lady,” as in Lady Haughty, aka Madam Haughty.

ACT 1 (Epicene)

— 1.1 —

Clerimont was in a room in a house with his boy-servant, who was helping Clerimont dress.

Clerimont asked, “Have you got the song yet perfectly memorized I gave you, boy?”

The boy replied, “Yes, sir.”

“Let me hear it,” Clerimont ordered.

“You shall, sir,” the boy said, “but, truly, let nobody else hear it.”

“Why, I ask?” Clerimont said.

The boy replied, “It will get you the dangerous name of a poet in town, sir.”

Poets and playwrights often engaged in satire, drawing the scorn of those whom they satirized.

The boy continued, “Besides, it will get me a perfect deal of ill will at the mansion you know of, whose lady is the theme of the song, whereas now I am the welcomest thing under a man who comes there.”

The mansion was the headquarters of the Lady Collegiates, and the lady was Madam Haughty.

“Under a man” meant “less than a man,” but the phrase also has a sexual meaning.

“I think so,” Clerimont said, “and above a man, too, if the truth were racked out of you.”

“Above a man” meant taller than a man: The boy would certainly be taller if he were stretched on the torture device known as the rack. Such torture was used to secure confessions from the tortured. Again, the phrase has a sexual meaning.

The boy said, “No, indeed, I’ll confess before being tortured, sir. The gentlewomen play with me and throw me on the bed, and carry me in to my lady, and she kisses me with her makeup-greasy face and puts a peruke — a wig — on my head and asks me if I will wear her gown, and I say, ‘No.’ And then she hits me a blow on the ear and calls me innocent, and lets go of me.”

Clerimont said, “It’s no marvel if the door is kept shut against your master, when the entrance is so easy to you.”

He was punning. A door is an entrance, and he was using the word to refer to a physical door and to the entrance of Madam Haughty’s vagina.

Clerimont continued, “Well, sir, you shall go there no more, lest I be obliged to seek your voice in my lady’s rushes a fortnight hence.”

Rush mats were used as floor coverings. If the boy were to spend time on the floor with Lady Haughty, he would be engaging in an activity whose ability to perform meant that he would lose the ability to sing high notes.

Clerimont ordered, “Sing, sir.”

The boy began to sing, but Truewit, a friend of Clerimont’s, almost immediately entered the room.

Truewit said, “Why, here’s the man who can melt away his time, and never feel it! What, between his mistress away from home and his ingle at home, high fare, soft lodging, fine clothes, and his fiddle, he thinks the hours have no wings and the day has no post-horse.”

The mistress was the woman Clerimont was devoted to, but “mistress” did not necessarily mean that she was devoted to him. The word “ingle” can mean “friend” or “boy kept for homosexual purposes.”

A post-horse is a swift horse used to ride between posts, or stages of a journey. Post-horses were used to carry messages.

Truewit continued, “Well, sir gallant, if you were struck with the plague this minute, or condemned to any capital punishment tomorrow, you would begin then to think and value every moment of your time, esteem it at the true rate, and give all for it.”

“Why, what should a man do?” Clerimont asked.

“Why, nothing,” Truewit said, “or that which, when it is done, is as idle, vain, and useless — such as hearken after the next horse race, or hunting match; lay wagers, praise Puppy, or Peppercorn, Whitefoot, Franklin; swear upon Whitemane’s side in a race; spend aloud, so that my lords may hear you; visit my ladies at night, and be able to give them the character of — that is, gossip about — every bowler or bettor on the green.”

Puppy, Peppercorn, Whitefoot, Franklin, and Whitemane were the names of famous horses.

“Spend aloud” means to talk loudly and/or spend ostentatiously.

The game of bowls was played on a green, and fashionable men sometimes bet on the outcome.

A bettor is a person who makes bets.

To fashionable men, time is something to be wasted in trivial pursuits.

Truewit continued, “These are the things wherein your fashionable men exercise themselves, and I engage in them for company.”

Clerimont replied, “Nay, if I have your authority, I’ll not leave off these activities yet. Come, the others are considerations when we come to have grey heads and weak hams, moist eyes, and shrunk members. We’ll think on them then; then we’ll pray, and fast.”

“Shrunk members” can mean shrunken arms and legs, or shrunken penises.

Truewit said, “Aye, and destine only that time of age to goodness that our lack of ability will not let us employ in evil?”

Some people think the best time to repent sins is after one’s old age has made one incapable of sinning. Saint Augustine once prayed to God, “Give me chastity and continence [self-restraint], but not yet.”

Clerimont replied, “Why, then it is time enough.”

Truewit said, “Yes, as if a man should sleep all the term for trying legal cases and think to complete his business on the last day. Oh, Clerimont, this time, because it is an incorporeal thing and not subject to sense, we mock ourselves the fineliest — most perfect — out of it, with vanity and misery indeed, not seeking an end of wretchedness but only changing the matter constantly.”

Truewit was a thinker who recognized the value of time.

Clerimont said, “Nay, you shall not leave now —”

“See but our common disease!” Truewit said.

The common-to-all disease is discontent, aka unhappiness. For many noblemen, it is caused by lack of patronage at court.

He continued, “With what justice can we complain that great men will not look upon us, nor be at leisure to give our affairs such dispatch as we expect, when we will never do it to ourselves, nor hear nor regard ourselves!”

If noblemen misuse time, can they blame greater men for doing the same thing?

Clerimont replied, “Bah, you have read Plutarch’s Morals now, or some such tedious fellow, and it shows so vilely with you; before God, I say that it will spoil your wit utterly. Talk to me of pins and feathers and ladies and rushes and such things, and leave this stoicity — stoical attitude and puritanical severity — alone until you write sermons.”

The “dull fellow” Truewit had been reading was not Plutarch, but instead was the stoic philosopher Seneca. In particular, he was paraphrasing De Brevitate Vita [Concerning the Shortness of Life], 3.5.

Clerimont preferred talk about trivial things rather than serious things. According to Clerimont, trivial things included “pins and feathers and ladies and rushes and such things.”

A saying of the time was “Not worth a rush.”

Truewit replied, “Well, sir, if my advice will not take effect and succeed, I have learned to lose as little of my kindness as I can. I’ll do good to no man against his will, certainly.”

He then asked, “When were you at the College?”

“What College?” Clerimont asked.

“As if you didn’t already know!” Truewit said.

“No, indeed,” Clerimont said. “I came from court just yesterday.”

“Why, hasn’t the news arrived there yet?” Truewit said. “There is a new foundation, sir, here in the town, of ladies who call themselves the Collegiates. It is an order between courtiers and country madams who live apart from their husbands and give entertainment to all the wits and braveries of the time, as they call them, cry down or up — decry or praise — what they like or dislike in a brain or a fashion with most masculine, or rather hermaphroditical (mannishly feminine), authority, and every day gain to their College some new probationer.”

“Wits and braveries” are gallants: witty gallants and bravely (splendidly) dressed gallants.

“Who is the president?” Clerimont asked.

Truewit answered, “The grave, serious, and youthful matron, the Lady Haughty.”

Clerimont said, “A pox on her autumnal face, her pieced-together beauty! There’s no man who can be admitted to her presence until she is ready nowadays — until she has painted and perfumed and washed and scoured — except this boy here, and him she wipes her makeup-greasy lips upon like a sponge. I have made a song — I ask you to hear it — on the subject.”

The boy sang:

Still [Always] to be neat [finely dressed], still [always] to be dressed,

As [if] you were going to a feast;

Still [Always] to be powdered, still [always] perfumed:

Lady, it is to be presumed,

Though art’s hid [hidden] causes are not found,

All is not sweet, all is not sound.

Give me a look, give me a face

That makes simplicity [absence of ornamentation] a grace;

Robes loosely flowing, hair as free:

Such sweet neglect more taketh [captivates] me

Than all th' adulteries [adulterations] of art.

They strike mine [my] eyes, but not my heart.

Clerimont's song was against fancy dress, perfume, and makeup.

Truewit said, "And I am clearly on the other side: I love a good adornment before any beauty of the world. Oh, a woman is then like a delicate garden; nor is there one kind of it. She may vary every hour, take often counsel of her mirror, and choose the best. If she has good ears, show them; good hair, lay it out; good legs, wear short clothes; a good hand, reveal it often; practice any art to mend breath, cleanse teeth, repair eyebrows, use makeup, and acknowledge it."

Clerimont said, "What! Publicly?"

"That she does it, yes, but not how she does it," Truewit said. "The how of it must be private. Many things that seem foul in the doing are pleasing once they are done. A lady should indeed study her face when we think she sleeps; nor, when the doors are shut, should men be enquiring: All is sacred within then. Is it for us to see their wigs put on, their false teeth, their complexion, their eyebrows, their fingernails? You see that gilders will not work except when enclosed in a room. They must not reveal how little serves, with the help of art, to adorn a great deal. How long did the canvas hang before Aldgate? Were the people allowed to see the city's gilded statues Love and Charity while they were rude stone, before they were painted and polished? No. No more should lovers approach their mistresses except when they are complete and finished."

Aldgate was the most important eastern gate in London's old city wall. Rebuilt in 1609, it was adorned with two statues: Love and Charity. They were kept under wraps until finished and were then revealed to the public.

"Well said, my Truewit," Clerimont said.

Truewit continued, "And a wise lady will keep a guard always upon the place, so that she may do things securely. I once followed a rude fellow into a chamber, where the poor madam, for haste, and troubled, snatched at her wig to cover her baldness and put it on the wrong way."

She put on the wig backwards.

Clerimont said, "Oh, monstrous!"

Truewit continued, "And the unconscionable knave held her in fashionable small talk for an hour, with that reversed face, when I still looked for the time when she should talk from the other side."

"Why, you should have relieved her," Clerimont said.

"No, indeed, I let her alone, as we'll let alone this topic of discussion, if you please, and pass to another," Truewit said.

He then asked, "When did you most recently see Dauphine Eugenie?"

Sir Dauphine Eugenie was a knight and a friend of theirs.

"Not for these last three days," Clerimont answered. "Shall we go to him this morning? He is very melancholic and depressed, I hear."

"Sick of the uncle, is he?" Truewit asked.

He was playing with language. "Sick of the mother" meant hysteria.

Truewit continued, "I met that stiff piece of formality, his uncle, yesterday. He was wearing a huge turban of nightcaps on his head, buckled over his ears."

Sir Dauphine Eugenie's uncle was named Morose.

Old people and sick people wore nightcaps during the day.

"Oh, that's his custom when he walks outside of his house," Clerimont said. "He can endure no noise, man."

"So I have heard," Truewit said. "But is the disease so ridiculous in him as it is made out to be? They say he has been busy entering into many treaties with the fishwives [women who sold fish] and orange-selling women, and he has propounded terms and conditions between them so that they will be silent. But by the Virgin Mary, the chimney-sweepers will not be drawn into making a contract with him to be silent."

Truewit was punning on the word "drawn." Sweeping the chimney cleans out the soot and improves the draw (upward draft) of smoke.

Clerimont said, "No, nor the broom-men [broom sellers]. They stand resolutely against such contracts. He cannot endure a fruit seller; he swoons if he hears one."

The word "stand" can mean erection. The masculine broom-men won't allow themselves to be grouped in a contract together with women.

Sellers at markets advertised their wares by loudly shouting.

Truewit said, "I think a blacksmith would be ominous to him."

Clerimont said, "Or any hammer-man [metal-worker]. A brazier [brass-worker] is not allowed to dwell in his parish, nor anyone who makes armor. He would have hanged a pewterer's apprentice once upon a Shrove Tuesday's riot for being of that trade, when the rest were acquitted."

Blacksmiths make much noise as they hammer hot metal into a desired shape. Other metal-workers such as pewterers also make noise as they work with metal.

Apprentices customarily rioted on Shrove Tuesday (the day before Lent, and a holiday for apprentices) and did such things as wreck brothels.

Truewit said, "A trumpet would frighten him terribly, as would the oboes."

"Out of his senses," Clerimont agreed. "The city-paid street musicians receive a pension from him not to come near the ward he resides in."

He motioned toward the boy and said, "This youth played a trick on him one night. He pretended to be the night watchman and rang the bell to announce each hour, and never left until he had brought him down to the door with a long sword, and there left him waving his sword in the air."

The boy said, "Why, sir, he has chosen a street to live in so narrow at both ends that it will receive no coaches nor carts nor any of these common noises, and therefore we who love him devise, now and then, ways to make him exercise and breathe hard. He would grow sluggish else in his ease. His virtue would rust without action.

"I entreated the keeper of a bear one day to come down with the dogs of some four parishes that way, and, I thank him, he did, and loudly proclaimed and advertised his next bear-baiting under Master Morose's window until he was sent crying away with his head made a most bleeding spectacle to the multitude.

“And another time a fencer, marching to his fencing-match, had his drum most tragically run through for taking that street in his way, at my request.”

Fencers would often march with drummers to a fencing-match as a form of advertisement.

Truewit said to the boy, “You are a good wag: a good mischievous boy.”

He then asked, “What does he do about the church bells?”

Clerimont replied, “Oh, in the queen’s time he was wont to go out of town every Saturday at ten o’clock, or on holiday eves.”

Bells rang on the eves of holy days, including Sundays.

He continued, “But now, because of the plague, the perpetuity of ringing has made him devise a room with double walls and treble ceilings, the windows closed and caulked, and there he lives by candlelight.”

The year was 1609, and the plague caused many, many deaths in London — so many that church bells constantly rang. A passing-bell rings to announce a person’s death, and a knell is a bell ringing during a funeral.

Clerimont continued, “He fired a serving-man last week for having a pair of new shoes that creaked. And his current employee waits on him now in tennis-court woolen socks, or slippers soled with wool, and they talk to each other in a trunk: an ear trumpet.”

He heard a noise, looked at its source, and said, “See who is coming here.”

Sir Dauphine Eugenie entered the room. Clerimont and Truewit had been talking about his uncle, Morose, who hated noise.

Dauphine asked, “How are you now? What ail you, sirs? Dumb? Unable to speak?”

Truewit said, “We are struck into stone, almost, as surely as I am here, with tales of your uncle. There was never such a monster heard of before.”

Dauphine said, “I wish you would once and for all lose this subject, my masters, for my sake. They are such as you are who have brought me into that predicament I am with him.”

“What predicament is that?” Truewit asked.

“By the Virgin Mary, that he will disinherit me, no more than that,” Dauphine said. “He thinks that I and my company of friends are the authors of all the ridiculous acts and monuments — stories — that are told about him.”

Truewit said, “By God’s eyelid, I would be the author of more in order to vex him. His intention to disinherit you makes him deserve it: It gives you law — that is, it authorizes you — to plague him. I’ll tell you what I would do. I would make a false almanac, get it printed, and then have him drawn out on a Coronation Day to the Tower Wharf and kill him with the noise of the cannon celebrating the anniversary of the coronation of King James I.”

The anniversary day was July 25, but a false almanac could list a different date. Morose would be tricked into going to the Tower Wharf on the real anniversary day so that the noise of the celebration would kill him before he could disinherit his nephew: Dauphine.

Truewit continued, "Disinherit you? He cannot, man. Aren't you his next of blood, and his sister's son?"

"Aye," Dauphine said, "but he will thrust me out of the inheritance, he vows, and marry."

If Morose were to marry and have a son, that son would be the next of kin and get the inheritance.

"What!" Truewit said. "That's a greater and more ominous portent for you. Can he endure no noise, and yet he will venture to take a wife?"

"Yes," Clerimont said. "Why, you are a stranger, it seems, to his best trick yet. He has employed a fellow this half year, to enquire around all over England and find him a dumb — silent — woman. It doesn't matter what she is of any form or any quality or any rank, as long as she is able to bear children. Her silence is dowry enough, he says."

"But I trust to God that he has found no woman like that," Truewit said.

"No," Clerimont replied, "but he has heard of one who's lodged in the next street to him, who is exceedingly soft-spoken, thrifty of her speech, who expends only six words a day. And he's pursuing her now, and he shall have her."

"Is it possible?" Truewit said. "Who is his agent in the business?"

"By the Virgin Mary," Clerimont said, "a barber named Cutbeard, who is an honest fellow and one who tells Dauphine here everything."

"Why, you oppress and overwhelm me with wonder!" Truewit said. "A woman and a barber, and yet Morose loves no noise!"

In comedy, women and barbers have a reputation for being talkative.

“Yes, indeed,” Clerimont said. “The fellow trims him silently and has not the knack with his shears or his fingers, and that continence and self-restraint in a barber Morose thinks so eminent a virtue that it has made the barber the chief of Morose’s counsellors — his main confidant.”

A knack is 1) a skill, and 2) a knock, or other loud noise such as snapping one’s fingers.

“Is the barber to be seen, or the wench?” Truewit asked.

In this society, “wench” meant “young woman.” It need not be a negative, insulting word.

“Yes, that they are,” Clerimont answered.

“Please, Dauphine, let’s go there,” Truewit said.

“I have some business now,” Dauphine said. “I cannot, truly.”

“You shall have no business that shall make you neglect this, sir,” Truewit said. “We’ll make her talk, believe it; or, if she will not, we can say at least as much as shall interrupt the treaty and hinder the negotiation — we will break it. You are bound in conscience, when he suspects you without cause, to torment him.”

“Not I, by any means,” Dauphine said. “I’ll give no consent to do it. He shall never have that plea against me that I opposed the least fancy or fantasy of his. Let it lie upon my stars — let it be fated — for me to be guilty, yet I’ll be innocent.”

By “innocent,” he meant not guilty.

“Yes, and be poor and beg,” Truewit said. “Do, innocent, when some servant of his has begotten him an heir, or this barber, if Morose himself cannot. Innocent!”

By “innocent,” he meant fool.

Truewit then said, “Please, Ned, where does she live? Let him be innocent still.”

Clerimont’s nickname was Ned.

He answered, “Why, right opposite the barber’s, in the house where Sir John Daw lives.”

“You do not mean to confound and utterly confuse me!” Truewit said. “Do you?”

“Why?” Clerimont asked.

“Does he who would marry her — Morose — know so much?” Truewit asked.

“I cannot tell,” Clerimont said. “I don’t know.”

“It would be enough of a slur on her reputation, with Jack Daw so near her,” Truewit said.

“Why?” Clerimont asked.

“He is the pre-eminent talking sir in the town!” Truewit said. “Jack Daw! And he is to teach her not to speak — God be with you. I have some business, too.”

“Will you not go there, then?” Clerimont asked.

“Not with the risk of meeting Daw, out of concern for my ears,” Truewit said.

“Why, I thought you two had been upon very good terms,” Clerimont said.

“Yes, of keeping distance between us,” Truewit said.

“They say he is a very good scholar,” Clerimont said.

“Aye, and he says it first,” Truewit said. “A pox on him! A fellow who merely makes a claim to learning, buys titles, and has nothing else of books in him.”

In other words, Jack Daw was the kind of person who buys a book and reads nothing except the title. Also, “buys titles” implies that he bought his knighthood.

“The world reports him to be very learned,” Clerimont said.

“I am sorry the world should so conspire to tell lies about him,” Truewit said.

“In good faith, I have heard very good things come from his mouth,” Clerimont said.

“You may have, indeed,” Truewit said. “There’s none so desperately ignorant as to deny that. I wish that those good things were his own!”

In other words, Jack Daw’s wit was borrowed.

Truewit said, “God be with you, gentlemen.”

“God be with you” is a way of saying “goodbye.”

He exited.

Referring to Truewit’s exit, Clerimont said, “This is very abrupt!”

— 1.3 —

Dauphine said, “Come, you are a strange, open, and unreserved man to tell everything thus.”

He was worried about what Truewit might do or say about what he had heard.

“Why, believe it, Dauphine, Truewit’s a very honest fellow,” Clerimont said.

“I don’t think otherwise,” Dauphine said, “but this frank nature of his is not for secrets.”

“Nay, then, you are mistaken, Dauphine,” Clerimont said. “I know where he has been well trusted and discharged the trust very truly and heartily.”

Dauphine replied, “I don’t dispute it, Ned, but with the fewer a business is handled, it is always the safer. Now we are alone, if you’ll go thither to visit the silent woman, I am for you.”

He meant that he would go with him.

“When were you there?” Clerimont asked.

“Last night,” Dauphine said, “and such a Decameron of entertainment occurred! Boccaccio never thought of the like.”

Boccaccio wrote the Decameron, which consisted of 100 stories, many of them about humorous romantic exploits.

Dauphine continued, “Daw does nothing but court her, and the wrong way. He would lie with her and have sex with her, and yet he praises her modesty. He desires that she would talk and be free in talk (and in bed), and he commends her silence in verses — which he reads and swears are the best that ever man made. Then he rails against his fortunes, stamps his feet, and rebels because he has not been made a counsellor and called to affairs of state.”

No doubt, he has not been called to affairs of sex.

“Please, let’s go,” Clerimont said. “I would like to witness this.”

He then said to his boy-servant, “Some water, boy.”

The water may have been for washing up before leaving his house, or it may have been for drinking.

The boy exited.

Dauphine said, “We are invited to dinner together, Jack Daw and I, by one who came thither to him: Sir La Foole.”

Clerimont said, “Oh, that’s a precious manikin! A little man! A puppet!”

“Do you know him?” Dauphine asked.

“Aye,” Clerimont said, “and he will know you, too, if he saw you even once, even if you should meet him at church in the midst of prayers. He is one of the braveries, although he isn’t one of the wits.”

He dressed well, but he was not witty.

Clerimont continued, “He will salute a judge upon the bench and a bishop in the pulpit, a lawyer when he is pleading at the bar, and a lady when she is dancing in a masque, and he will make her forget her steps.

“He does pay for private performances of plays and for suppers for his guests, and he invites his guests to them aloud, out of his window, as they ride by in coaches. He has a lodging in a fashionable neighborhood — the Strand — for that purpose, and to watch when ladies have gone to the china-shops that sell luxurious oriental goods, or the Exchange, so that he may meet them by chance and give them presents, some two or three hundred pounds’ worth of trinkets, to be laughed at.”

Either the trinkets, or La Foole himself, or both, would be laughed at.

Two or three hundred pounds is a lot of money to spend on trinkets.

Clerimont continued, “He is never without a spare banquet of wine and fruit or sweetmeats in his chamber, for their serving-women to alight at and come up to, for a bait.”

La Foole apparently used the serving-women to help him meet the women they served. In this society, a bait is refreshment, and it is a lure.

“Excellent!” Dauphine said. “He was a fine youth last night, but now he is much finer.”

That is, he is much “finer” as a source of entertainment.

Dauphine asked, “What is his Christian name? I have forgotten it.”

The boy entered the room.

Clerimont answered, “Sir Amorous La Foole.”

The boy said, “The gentleman who owns that name is here below.”

“By God’s heart, he’s come to invite me to dinner, I bet my life,” Clerimont said.

“Likely enough,” Dauphine said. “Please, let’s have him up.”

Clerimont said, “Boy, marshal him in.”

“With a truncheon, sir?” the boy said.

He was punning. Marshalls carried a ceremonial baton. A truncheon can be either a baton or a cudgel.

“Go now, please,” Clerimont said.

The boy exited.

Clerimont said, "I'll make him tell us his pedigree, now, and what food he has to dinner, and who are his guests, and the whole course of his fortunes — all in a breath."

— 1.4 —

La Foole entered the room and said, "God save you, dear Sir Dauphine! Honored Master Clerimont!

"Sir Amorous!" Clerimont said. "You have very much honored — honored — my lodging with your presence."

"In good faith, it is a fine lodging!" La Foole said. "Almost as delicate and delightful a lodging as mine."

"That's not so, sir," Clerimont said.

"Excuse me, sir, if it were in the Strand, it would be, I assure you," La Foole said.

He added, "I have come, Master Clerimont, to entreat you to wait upon two or three ladies to dinner today."

By "wait upon" the ladies, he meant to call upon the ladies, but Clerimont deliberately misunderstood him.

"What, sir!" he said. "Wait upon them? Have you ever seen me carry dishes?"

"No, sir, dispense with me," La Foole said. "I meant, to bear them company."

"Dispense with me" was an affected way of saying, "Excuse me," but Clerimont deliberately misunderstood it to mean "Do without me."

"Oh, that I will, sir," Clerimont said.

He added, "The doubtfulness of your phrase — believe it, sir — would breed you a quarrel once an hour with the terrible boys, if you would but keep them fellowship for a day."

La Foole's phrasing was ambiguous and doubtful — capable of being misunderstood.

The terrible boys were better known as the roaring boys. They were bullies who sought excuses for quarreling. Such excuses could be found in ambiguous language.

"It would be extremely against my will, sir, if I contested and fought with any man," La Foole said.

Such a declaration can be indicative of cowardice.

"I believe it, sir," Clerimont said.

He then asked, "Where will you hold your feast?"

"At Tom Otter's, sir," La Foole said.

"Tom Otter?" Dauphine asked. "Who's he?"

"Captain Otter, sir," La Foole said. "He is a kind of gamester, a gambler, but he has had command, both by sea and by land."

Dauphine said, "Oh, then, he is animal amphibium?"

"Amphibious" refers to living both on land and in the sea.

"Aye, sir," La Foole said. "His wife was the rich china-woman whom the courtiers visited so often, who gave the rare entertainment."

A china-woman is a woman who owns a china-shop — a shop that sells oriental goods. However, words such as "visited" and "entertainment" were used to refer to a brothel and the activity found in it.

"Rare" can mean "splendid" or "infrequent" or both.

La Foole continued, "She commands all at home."

"Then she is Captain Otter?" Clerimont asked.

“You say very well, sir,” La Foole said. “She is my kinswoman, a La Foole by the mother’s side, and she will invite any great ladies for my sake.”

“Not of the La Fooles of Essex?” Dauphine asked.

La Foole replied, “No, sir, the La Fooles of London.”

Clerimont whispered to Dauphine, “Now he’s started.”

La Foole enjoyed talking about his ancestors and himself.

He said, “They all come out of our house, the La Fooles of the north, the La Fooles of the west, the La Fooles of the east and of the south — we are as ancient a family as any is in Europe — but I myself am descended lineally of the French La Fooles — and we do bear for our coat yellow, or or [gold], chequered azure [blue] and gules [red], and some three or four colors more, which is a very noted and celebrated coat and has sometimes and in former times been solemnly worn by the various members of nobility of our house — but let that go.”

La Foole was describing his coat of arms, but readers may be forgiven if they thought he was describing the motley — many-colored — coat worn by a jester, aka fool.

He continued, “Antiquity is not respected now.”

Some aristocratic families had been recently elevated, and many knights had been created in Ireland ten years ago (in 1599) by the second Earl of Essex.

La Foole continued, “I had a brace — a pair — of fat does sent to me, gentlemen, and half a dozen pheasants, a dozen or two godwits [marsh birds, a delicacy], and some other fowl, which I want to be eaten while they are good, and in good company. There will be present at dinner a great lady or two — my Lady Haughty, my Lady Centaur, Mistress Doll Mavis — and they come with the purpose of seeing the silent gentlewoman, Mistress Epicene, whom honest Sir John Daw has promised to bring thither — and then Mistress Trusty, my lady’s serving-woman, will be there, too, and this honorable knight, Sir Dauphine, with yourself, Master Clerimont — and we’ll be very merry, and have fiddlers, and dance — I have been a mad wag in my time, and have spent some crowns since I was a page in court to my Lord Lofty, and after that, I was my lady’s gentleman-usher [a gentleman who serves someone who ranks higher], who got me knighted in Ireland, since it pleased my elder brother to die — I had as fair a gold-embroidered jacket on that day as any that was worn during the Island Voyage or at Caliz.”

The eye of the land is London.

La Foole was knighted in Ireland by the Earl of Essex. Many people of the time thought that the Earl of Essex had lowered the title of knight because he had made so many people knights. Such an honor should be rare.

The Island Voyage — the Earl of Essex’ 1597 expedition to the Azores — was a disaster. Many of the gallants who joined the expedition were criticized for dressing more like people at a masked dance than as soldiers.

Caliz is Cadiz. La Foole was combining the French Cadiz and the English Cales, which is an exonym: a name used by foreigners for a place that the natives themselves do not use it for. For example, USAmericans say Germany, not Deutschland.

La Foole continued, “No one dispraised my jacket, and I came over in it hither, showed myself to my friends in court, and afterward went down to my tenants in the country and surveyed my lands, let new leases, took their money, and spent it in the eye of the land here upon ladies — and now I can take up at my pleasure.”

By “take up,” La Foole meant “take out a loan, borrow money,” but Dauphine and Clerimont deliberately misunderstood him to mean “take (lift) up skirts.”

“Can you take up ladies, sir?” Dauphine asked.

“Oh, let him breathe and catch his breath,” Clerimont said. “He has not yet recovered.”

That is, not yet recovered from his efforts in ladies’ boudoirs.

Dauphine said, “I wish I were your partner in that commodity.”

Many loans involved commodities. To get around usury laws, lenders would require borrowers to take commodities (goods) as part of the loan. The commodities were very overpriced. The lender would buy back the commodities at a low price.

Women can be another kind of commodity.

“No, sir, excuse me,” La Foole said. “I meant money, which can take up anything.”

Money can take up, or buy, anything, including the lifting of skirts.

He continued, “I have another guest or two to invite and say as much to, gentlemen. I’ll take my leave abruptly, in hope you will not fail. I am your servant.”

He meant that he hoped they would not fail to show up for his feast.

La Foole exited.

Dauphine said, “We will not fail you, Sir precious La Foole; but the she whom your ladies come to see will fail, if I take precedence over Sir Daw.”

He did not want Epicene to attend La Foole's dinner.

"Did you ever hear such a wind-fucker as this?" Clerimont said.

A wind-fucker is a kestrel, a small bird whose wings rapidly flap while hovering. The term "wind-fucker" as applied to La Foole implies busy activity that accomplishes nothing.

Dauphine said, "Or such a rook — simpleton — as the other, who will betray his mistress to be seen!"

The other is Jack Daw.

Dauphine continued, "Come, it is time we prevented this planned marriage."

"Let's go," Clerimont said.

ACT 2 (Epicene)

— 2.1 —

Morose, who was carrying an ear-trumpet, and a man-servant were in a room in his house.

Morose said to himself, “Cannot I yet find out a more compendious and expeditious method than by this trunk to save my servants the labor of speech and my ears the discord of sounds?”

Ear trumpets are used by the hard-of-hearing to enable them to hear. Morose was so insistent that his servants be quiet that he used a device that amplified their whispers so that he could hear them.

He continued, “Let me see: All discourses but my own afflict me; they seem harsh, impertinent and irrelevant, and irksome.”

He then said to his man-servant, “Isn’t it possible that you should answer me by signs and I understand you, fellow? Do not speak, even when I question you.”

The man-servant could, for example, make a bow to mean “yes” instead of speaking.

Morose asked, “You have taken the ring — the door-knocker — off the street door as I bade you? Answer me not by speech but by silence, unless it be otherwise.”

The man-servant bowed.

“Very good,” Morose said. “And you have fastened on a thick quilt, or flock-bed [a mattress or quilt stuffed with wool and/or cotton scraps] on the outside of the door, so that, if they knock with their daggers or with brickbats — pieces of bricks — they can make no noise? Answer only with a bow, unless the answer is other than yes.”

The man-servant bowed.

“Very good,” Morose said. “This is not only fit modesty in a servant, but good stately, dignified behavior and discretion in a master.”

He then asked, “And you have been with Cutbeard the barber to have him come to me?”

The man-servant bowed.

“Good,” Morose said. “And he will come immediately? Answer only with a bow, unless the answer is other than yes. If the answer is other than yes, shake your head, or shrug.”

The man-servant bowed.

“Good,” Morose said. “Italians and Spaniards are prudent in using gestures instead of words. And it is a frugal and attractive gravity.

“How long will it be before Cutbeard the barber comes?”

The man-servant started to speak, but Morose said, “Stop! If he will come in an hour, hold up your whole hand; if half an hour, two fingers; if a quarter, one finger.”

The man-servant held up one finger, bent.

“Good,” Morose said. “Half a quarter? It is well. And have you given him a key to come in without knocking?”

The man-servant bowed.

“Good,” Morose said. “And have the lock and the hinges been oiled today to keep them from creaking?”

The man-servant bowed.

“Good,” Morose said. “And the quilting on the stairs is nowhere worn out and bare?”

He had ordered padding to be put on the stairs to stop them from creaking.

The man-servant bowed.

“Very good,” Morose said. “I see that by much teaching and coercion, noise may be eliminated.”

“Stand nearby,” Morose ordered. “The Turk in this divine discipline is admirable, exceeding all the potentates of the earth; always waited on by mutes, and all his commands so executed, yea, even in the war, as I have heard, and in his military marches, most of his charges and directions given by signs and with silence.”

The Sultan of the Ottoman Empire had many mute servants. Some of his bodyguards and troops were also mute.

“An exquisite art!” Morose continued. “And I am heartily ashamed and angry often that the princes of Christendom should suffer a barbarian to transcend them in so high a point of felicity. I will practice it hereafter.”

He was interrupted by the blowing of a horn.

“What is this now?” he said. “Oh! Oh! What villain, what prodigy of mankind is that? Go and find out.”

His man-servant exited.

The horn sounded again.

“Oh!” Morose said. “Cut his throat! Cut his throat! What murderer, hellhound, devil can this be?”

His man-servant returned and said, “It is an express-messenger from the court —”

“Damn, rogue, and must you blow your horn, too?” an angry Morose said.

“Alas,” his man-servant said. “It is a messenger from the court, sir, who says he must speak with you on pain of death —”

In other words, if the messenger failed to deliver the message, he would be killed.

Morose replied, “On pain of your life, be silent!”

— 2.2 —

Truewit, booted and spurred, entered the room. He was carrying a noose and a post-horn in his hands.

He said to Morose, “By your leave, sir — I am a stranger here — is your name Master Morose?”

Receiving no answer, he said to the man-servant, “Is your name Master Morose?”

Again, he received no answer, so he said, “Mute as fishes! Pythagoreans all! This is strange!”

Pythagoreans made vows of silence so they could apply themselves to self-examination.

Truewit said to Morose, “What do you say, sir? Nothing? Has Harpocrates been here, with his club, among you?”

Harpocrates, the god of silence, carried a club.

Truewit continued, “Well, sir, I will believe you to be the man at this time. I will venture to approach you, sir. Your friends at court commend them to you, sir —”

Morose said to himself, “Oh, men! Oh, manners! Was there ever such an impudence?”

He was adapting Cicero’s words from a speech against Cataline: O tempora! O mores! — “Oh, the times! Oh, the manners!” Cataline was a man who was a threat against the Roman Republic.

Truewit continued, “— and they are extremely solicitous for you, sir.”

“Whose knave are you?” Morose said.

This was an insult.

Truewit replied, “I am my own knave, and I am your compeer — your equal — sir.”

This was an insult.

Morose said to his man-servant, “Fetch me my sword —”

Truewit said to the man-servant, “You shall taste the one half of my dagger, if you do, servant —”

He then said to Morose, “— and you shall taste the other half if you stir, sir. Be patient, I order you in the king’s name, and hear me without insurrection.

“They say you are to marry? To marry! Do you hear me, sir?”

“So what, rude fellow!” Morose said.

“By the Virgin Mary, your friends do wonder that you would marry, sir,” Truewit said, “when there are so many ways and so many places to commit suicide.

“The Thames is so near wherein you may drown so handsomely.

“Or you may jump from London Bridge at a low ebb-tide, when with a fine leap, the current will hurry you down the stream.

“Or you can jump from such a delicate steeple in the town as that of St. Mary-le-Bow in Cheapside.

“Or you can jump from a more splendid height, such as St. Paul’s.

“Or, if you want to do it nearer home and a shorter way, you can jump from an excellent garret window into the street.

“Or you can hang yourself from a beam in the said garret, with this noose” — he showed Morose the noose he was carrying — “which they have sent. Your friends desire that you would sooner commit your grave head to this knot than to the wedlock noose.

“Or you can take a little sublimate [mercuric chloride, a rat poison] and go out of the world like a rat.

“Or you can go out of the world like a fly — as one of your friends said — with a straw in your arse like the fly has to keep it from flying away as it fights a spider.

“Your friends want you to go out of the world by any way rather than to follow this goblin matrimony.”

Truewit wanted to convince Morose that suicide was much preferable to marriage.

Truewit continued, “Alas, sir, do you ever think to find a chaste wife in these times? Now? When there are so many masques, plays, Puritan preachings, mad folks, and other strange sights to be seen daily, private and public?”

Entertainments of the time included visiting mental hospitals such as Bedlam to see insane people.

Truewit continued, “If you had lived long ago in King Ethelred’s time, sir, or Edward the Confessor’s, you might perhaps have found in some cold country hamlet, then, a dull, sexually frosty wench who would have been contented with one man; nowadays they will as soon be pleased with one leg or one eye. I’ll tell you, sir, the monstrous hazards you shall run with a wife.”

Morose said, “Good sir, have I ever cheated any friends of yours of their land? Immorally bought their possessions? Foreclosed on their mortgage? Begged a right of succession to an estate or an official position from them? Rendered illegitimate their children so they could not receive an inheritance? What have I done that may deserve this?”

“Nothing, sir, that I know of, except your itch to be married,” Truewit said.

Morose said, “Why, if I had murdered your father, vitiated and corrupted your mother, ravished and raped your sisters —”

Truewit interrupted, “I would kill you, sir. I would kill you if you had.”

“Why, you do more in this, sir,” Morose said. “It would be a vengeance centuple — a hundredfold — for all wicked acts that could be named to do that which you do —”

Truewit interrupted, “Alas, sir, I am only a messenger. I simply tell you what you must hear.

“It seems your friends are worried about your soul’s health, sir, and they would have you know the danger. But you may do what pleases you despite what all your friends say. I am not trying to persuade you not to marry, sir.”

This last sentence was false.

Truewit continued, “If, after you are married, your wife should run away with a vaulter —”

A vaulter can be a gymnast, but brothels were known as vaulting-houses.

Truewit continued, “— or with the Frenchman who walks upon ropes, or with him who dances the jig, or with a fencer for his skill at his weapon, why, it is not your friends’ fault; they have satisfied what their consciences demand by letting you know what may happen.”

A fencer can be skilled with both a weapon and a “weapon.”

“Nay, suffer valiantly, sir, for I must tell you all the perils that you are liable to and that are obnoxious to you.

“If she is pretty, young, and lively, no sweetmeats ever drew more flies; all the yellow jackets and great roses in the town will be there.”

Roses are rosettes worn as decorations on shoes. Yellow jackets and roses were fashionable and were worn by dandies.

Truewit continued, “If she is ugly and crooked-backed, she’ll be with them and buy those jackets and roses, sir.”

In other words, she will pay for sex with well-dressed gallants.

Truewit continued, “If she is rich, and you marry her for her dowry and not for herself, she’ll reign in your house as imperious as a widow.

“If she is noble, all her kindred will be your tyrants.

“If she is fruitful and pregnant, and as proud as May and as changeable as weather in April, she must have her doctors, her midwives, her nurses, her longings every hour, although her longing may be for the dearest morsel of man.

“If she is well educated and learned, there was never such a parrot as she will be; all your patrimony will be too little for the guests who must be invited to hear her speak Latin and Greek, and you must lie with her — woo her — in those languages, too, if you will please her.

“If she is a Puritan, you must feast all the silenced brethren — those who have lost their licenses to preach out of opposition to the official church — once in every three days, salute the Puritan sisters, entertain the whole family or wood [crowd] of them, and hear longwinded religious devotions, singings, and catechisings, which you are not given to and yet must give in order to please the zealous matron your wife, who, for the holy cause, will cheat and trick you over and above.”

The Latin word silva means “woods.” It is a collection of trees. Truewit used “wood” to mean a collection of people. In this society, a piece of wood is a blockhead. (Blockheads were wooden heads for hats or wigs to rest on.) In this society, the word “wood” also meant insane.

Truewit continued, “You begin to sweat, sir?”

“But this is not half, indeed. You may do your pleasure notwithstanding; as I said before, I did not come here to persuade you not to marry.”

Morose’s man-servant started to steal away.

Truewit said to him, “Upon my faith, master serving-man, if you do stir, I will beat you.”

Morose said, “Oh, what is my sin? What is my sin?”

Truewit continued his diatribe against women, “Then, if you love your wife, or rather dote on her, sir, oh, how she’ll torture you! And take pleasure in your torments!”

The word “dote” is related to the word “dotage.”

He continued, “You shall lie with her only when she wishes. She will not hurt her beauty, her face make-up; or it must be for that jewel or that pearl when she does lie with you. Every half-hour’s pleasure must be bought anew, and with the same trouble and expense you wooed her at first.

“Then, you must keep what servants she wants, what company she will; that friend must not visit you without her license; and him she loves most she will seem to hate eagerliest — most fiercely — to avert your jealousy, or feign to be jealous of you first, and for that reason go live with her she-friend (a possible bawd) or cousin (a possible lover) at the College who can instruct her in all the mysteries of writing letters, corrupting servants, and taming household spies.”

The College is that of the Lady Collegiates.

Truewit continued, “She must have that rich gown for such a great day, a new one for the next, a richer for the third.

“She must be served with silver plates and utensils.

“She must have the chamber filled with a succession of servants, footmen, ushers, and other messengers, besides embroiderers, jewelers, tire-women [dress-makers], sempsters [tailors], feathermen [sellers of feathers], perfumers.”

The messengers would be used to carry letters to lovers.

Truewit continued, “All this while she will not feel how the land drops away as it is sold to pay for her extravagance, nor will she feel how the acres melt, nor will she foresee the change when the mercer [seller of expensive fabrics such as silk and velvet] has your woods for her velvets.

“She will never weigh what her pride costs, sir, so long as she may kiss a page or a smooth chin that has the despair of a beard.

“She will be a stateswoman [female politician].

“She will know all the gossip: what was done at the horse races at Salisbury, what happened at the springs in Bath, what happened at court, what happened during the journey of the king.

“Or she will censure and judge poets and authors and styles, and compare them, Samuel Daniel with Edmund Spenser, Jonson with the other youth, and so forth.”

Truewit (that is, Truewit’s creator: Ben Jonson) was joking as well as criticizing women. Many of the points Truewit made against women came from Juvenal’s Satire VI. Juvenal compared Homer and Virgil. Here the comparison is between Ben Jonson and his friend William Shakespeare. That Truewit does not mention Shakespeare’s name is an affectionate joke as shown by neither Jonson nor Shakespeare being youths in 1609.

Truewit continued, “Or she will be thought cunning in controversies or the very knotty problems of divinity; and she will have, often in her mouth, the main issue of the question; and then she will skip to the mathematics and demonstration; and answer in religion to one, in politics to another, in bawdry to a third.”

Morose cried, “Oh! Oh!”

“All this is very true, sir,” Truewit said. “And then her going in disguise to that astrologer and this fortune-teller or wise woman, where the first question is: How soon shall you — Morose — die?”

“The next question is: Whether her present servant loves her?”

“The next question is: Whether she shall have a new servant? And how many?”

The word “servant” can mean lover.

He continued, “She will also ask these questions:

“Which of her family would make the best bawd, male or female?”

“What precedence she shall have by her next match?”

Precedence refers to who precedes others at formal social occasions: the higher the rank, the higher the precedence.

He continued, “And she will set down the answers, and she will believe them more than she believes the holy scriptures. Nay, perhaps she’ll study the art of fortune-telling.”

Morose said, “Gentle sir, have you finished? Have you had your pleasure of me? Have you gotten what you wanted from me? I’ll think about these things you have said.”

“Yes, sir,” Truewit said. “And then she comes steaming home, reeking of vapor and sweat from going afoot.”

To go afoot is to go on foot or to be active. Here the activity could happen in a bed.

Truewit continued, “And she will lie in bed for a month to give birth to a new face, which is all makeup with oil and birdlime used as ingredients, and she rinses in asses’ milk, and she is cleansed with a new cosmetic face-wash.”

Limestone is a sticky substance used to catch birds.

Truewit himself may not have believed all the criticisms he was making of women. Earlier, he had praised women’s use of cosmetics. Here he criticized it before Morose in an attempt to persuade Morose not to marry.

Truewit said, “God be with you, sir.”

This means: Goodbye.

But then he added, “One thing more, which I had almost forgotten. This, too — whom you are to marry may have made a conveyance of her virginity aforehand, as your wise widows do of their estates before they marry, in trust to some friend, sir.”

Wealthy widows had control of their money and possessions, but the money and possessions became her husband’s when the wealthy widow married — unless she had conveyed the money and possessions to a trusted friend — or lover — to keep for her.

According to Truewit, any woman Morose would marry was likely to have given her virginity away.

Truewit continued, “Who can tell? Or if she has not conveyed her virginity to another man yet, she may do so on the wedding day or the night before, and make you a cuckold even before the wedding night.”

A cuckold is a man with an unfaithful wife.

He continued, “The like has been heard of in nature. It is no contrived impossible thing, sir.

“God be with you. I’ll be bold enough to leave this rope with you, sir, for a remembrance.”

He handed Morose the noose.

He said to Morose’s man-servant, “Farewell, Mute.”

He then exited.

Morose said to his man-servant, “Come, help me to my chamber, but first shut the door.”

A horn sounded.

“Oh, shut the door, shut the door!” Morose said. “Has he come again?”

Cutbeard the barber entered the room and said, “It is I, sir, your barber.”

“Oh, Cutbeard! Cutbeard! Cutbeard!” Morose said. “Here has been a cut-throat with me. Help me into my bed, and give me medicine with your counsel.”

They exited.

— 2.3 —

Sir John “Jack” Daw, Clerimont, Dauphine, and Epicene were together in a room in Sir John’s house across from Cutbeard’s barbershop.

Jack Daw said to Clerimont and Dauphine, “Nay, if she will, let her refuse to come to the feast at her own cost. It is nothing to me, gentlemen. But she will not be invited to the like feasts or guests every day.”

Clerimont said, “Oh, by no means, she may not refuse —”

Clerimont and Dauphine then spoke quietly to Epicene to persuade her not to come to the feast.

Picking up where he left off speaking to Jack Daw, Clerimont said quietly to Epicene, “— to stay at home, if you love your reputation. By God’s light, you are invited thither for the purpose of being seen and laughed at by the lady of the College and her parasitical companions. This trumpeting loudmouth” — he pointed to Jack Daw — “has been talking about you.”

Speaking softly like Clerimont so that Jack Daw could not hear him, Dauphine said to Epicene, “You shall not go. Let him be laughed at in your stead for not bringing you, and put him to his extemporal faculty of acting the fool and talking out loud to explain to the company why you are absent.”

Clerimont said softly to Dauphine, “Jack Daw will suspect us; talk out loud.”

He then said out loud, “Please, Mistress Epicene, let’s see your verses — the ones Jack Daw wrote about you; we have Sir John Daw’s permission to see them. Do not conceal your servant’s merit and your own glories.”

By “glories,” he meant splendors and triumphs.

Epicene, who knew that Jack Daw was a fool and would want to read his own verses out loud, replied, “They’ll prove my servant’s glories, if you have his permission so soon.”

By “glories,” she meant pretentious boasts.

Agreeing with her, Dauphine said, “His vainglories, lady!”

Vainglories are empty glories — pretentious boasts about things of little worth.

Eager to show off, Jack Daw said, “Show them, show them, mistress; I dare to acknowledge them to be my own.”

Holding out the verses to Clerimont and Dauphine, Epicene said, “Judge for yourselves what glories!”

Jack Daw grabbed the verses and said, “Nay, I’ll read them myself, too; an author must recite his own works.”

He then said, “It is a madrigal of modesty.”

A madrigal is a love lyric.

He read out loud:

“Modest and fair, for fair and good are near

“Neighbors, howe’er’ —”

“Very good,” Dauphine said.

“Aye, is it not?” Clerimont said.

He meant, Yes, the madrigal is not good.

Jack Daw continued reciting:

“No noble virtue ever was alone,

“But two in one.”

“Excellent!” Dauphine said.

“Recite that again, please, Sir John,” Clerimont requested.

“It has something in it like rare wit and sense,” Dauphine said.

“Rare” can mean splendid, but Dauphine used the word to mean that the wit and sense in the verses were infrequent. A better word would be “nonexistent.”

“Quiet!” Clerimont said.

Jack Daw continued reciting:

“No noble virtue ever was alone,

“But two in one.

“Then, when I praise sweet modesty, I praise

“Bright beauty’s rays;

“And, having praised both beauty and modesty,

“I have praised thee.”

“Admirable!” Dauphine said.

“How it chimes, and tinkles in the close, divinely!” Clerimont said.

Jack Daw is a petit poet. His verses chime like the tinkle of a tiny bell and they tick tick tick like seeds in a dry pod, while Homer’s verses roar in the pines.

“Aye, it is Seneca,” Dauphine said.

Seneca was a Roman tragedian.

“No, I think it is Plutarch,” Clerimont said.

Plutarch wrote a series of biographies comparing famous Greeks to famous Romans.

Both Seneca and Plutarch wrote books that still live long after their authors died.

Jack Daw did not want to be grouped with such great authors: “I scoff at Plutarch and Seneca! I hate it. My verses are my own imaginative inventions, by that light. I wonder those fellows have such credit with gentlemen!”

“They are very grave authors,” Clerimont said.

Seneca and Plutarch wrote about important themes and yes, they are both in the grave.

“Grave asses!” Jack Daw said. “Mere essayists! A few loose maxims and that’s all.”

Jack Daw’s own verses were basically a few common maxims or proverbs. He was saying that one virtue is accompanied by another; for example, beauty is accompanied by modesty.

He continued, “A man would talk so his whole age; I do utter as good things every hour, if they were collected and observed, as either of them.”

“Indeed, Sir John?” Dauphine said.

“He must necessarily, since he is living among the wits and braveries, too,” Clerimont said.

“Aye, and being president of them as he is,” Dauphine said.

Jack Daw continued his criticism of famous thinkers, “There’s Aristotle, a mere commonplace fellow.”

By “commonplace,” Jack Daw meant “trivial,” but the Latin locus communis [common place] means “universal truth.” Aristotle wrote many books about many topics, and especially he wrote philosophy.

Jack Daw continued, “Plato was a discourser.”

By “discourser,” Jake Daw meant “a mere talker,” but Plato truly was a writer of discourses in his Dialogues. In them, Socrates discoursed with other people; his discourses illustrated rational, logical thought.

Jack Daw continued, “Thucydides and Livy were tedious and dry.”

“Thucydides” and “tedious” share some letters. Either through ignorance or through a feeble attempt at humor, Jack Daw pronounced Thucydides as Thucydious.

“Livy” suggests the word “livid,” whose meanings include being furiously angry and being discolored — black and blue — through bruising.

Black is the color of melancholy, which people in this society considered to be a dry humor. This society considered humors to be four bodily fluids whose various combinations made up the human personality. Black bile was the melancholic humor. A melancholic man was gloomy.

Jack Daw continued, “Tacitus was an entire knot, sometimes worth the untying, but very seldom.”

A knotty problem in intellectual thought is one that is hard to untangle.

Thucydides, Livy, and Tacitus are famous ancient historians.

The Latin word tacitus means secret, and hidden. It also means speechless.

“What do you think of the poets, Sir John?” Clerimont asked.

Jack Daw replied, “They are not worthy to be named as authors. Homer, an old tedious prolix ass, talks of curriers of horses, and talks of chines of beef. Virgil talks of dunging of land, and talks of bees. Horace talks of I don’t know what.”

Homer, creator of the Iliad and the Odyssey, did write about horses and chines — backbones — of beef. But he also wrote about the meaning of life, about the heroic ethic, about war and death, and about homecoming.

Virgil in his Georgics did write about beekeeping and other pastoral topics, but his masterpiece is the epic poem Aeneid, which is about Trojans who survived the Trojan War traveling to Italy and becoming important ancestors of the Roman people.

Ben Jonson revered the Roman poet Horace. Fittingly, the foolish Jack Daw knew nothing about Horace.

“I think so,” Clerimont said.

He was not agreeing with Jack Daw’s opinions, but he was agreeing that Jack Daw knew nothing about Horace.

Jack Daw said, “And so Pindarus, Lycophron, Anacreon, Catullus, Seneca the tragedian, Lucan, Propertius, Tibullus, Martial, Juvenal, Ausonius, Statius, Politian, Valerius Flaccus, and the rest —”

These were all Roman and Greek poets, except for the Italian humanist Politian. Possibly, Jack Daw thought that Politian was Roman or Greek.

Clerimont whispered to Dauphine, “What a sackful of their names he has got!”

Dauphine whispered to Clerimont, “And how he pours them out! Politian with Valerius Flaccus!”

Valerius Flaccus wrote the incomplete Argonautica about Jason and the Argonauts.

Clerimont whispered to Dauphine, “Wasn’t the character sketch right about him? Isn’t what we heard about Jack Daw true?”

Dauphine whispered to Clerimont, “As right and correct as could be made, indeed.”

Jack Daw continued, “And Persius, a crabbed coxcomb, not to be endured.”

Persius was a satirist whose style was difficult and appeared to Jack Daw to be crabbed.

“Why, whom do you regard to be authors, Sir John Daw?” Dauphine asked.

Jack Daw replied, “Syntagma juris civilis, Corpus juris civilis, Corpus juris canonici, the King of Spain’s Bible.”

He mentioned books rather than authors.

Syntagma juris civilis and Corpus juris civilis are actually the same book. Corpus is Latin for Body. Σύνταγμα or Syntagma is Greek for Constitution. This book is a collection of Roman law.

Corpus juris canonici is a collection of canon law.

The King of Spain’s Bible is a polygot Bible; King Phillip I of Spain sponsored it.

Many people worked on these books; each book does not have a single author.

Because Jack Daw had named the titles of books and not the names of authors, Dauphine and Clerimont pretended that he thought the titles were authors’ names.

Dauphine whispered to Clerimont, “Is the King of Spain’s Bible an author?”

Clerimont whispered to Dauphine, “Yes, and Syntagma.”

Dauphine asked Jack Daw, “What was that Syntagma, sir?”

Jack Daw answered, “A civil lawyer, a Spaniard.”

Jack Daw really did think the book titles were authors’ names!

Dauphine said, “Surely, Corpus was a Dutchman.”

Clerimont said, “Aye, both the Corpuses, I knew them; they were very corpulent authors.”

The Dutch had a reputation for liking butter. Butter is a food that can make one’s corpus very corpulent, indeed.

Jack Daw continued, “And then there’s Vatablus, Pomponatius, Symancha; the others are not to be received within the thought of a scholar.”

Vatablus, Pomponatius, and Symancha are famous scholars.

Vatablus was a scholar of Hebrew, the Bible, and Aristotle. Pomponatius was a scholar of Aristotle, and Symancha was a scholar of canon and civil law.

Dauphine said to Epicene, “Before God, you have a simple learned servant, lady, in titles.”

The word “simple” can mean “absolute,” which is what Jack Daw thought it meant, or it can mean “foolish.”

In a way, though, Jack Daw was absolutely learned in titles — he knew the titles of books, but not what is inside them.

Clerimont said, “I wonder that he is not called to the helm and made a councilor!”

By councilor, he meant a member of the Privy Council, which advised the King of England.

“He is one extraordinary,” Dauphine said.

“Extraordinary” means outside the regular staff.

Clerimont said, “Nay, but in ordinary!”

“In ordinary” means “full-time.”

As a suffix, “in” can be an intensifier, so if Jack Daw is “inordinary,” he is very ordinary indeed.

Many people with high opinions of their own sagacity are ordinary ignoramuses.

Clerimont added, “To say the truth, the state wants such.”

The word “wants” can mean either “needs” or “lacks.” We can hope that the Privy Council lacks such councilors as Jack Daw.

Dauphine said, “Why, that will follow.”

Clerimont said to Epicene, “I wonder that a mistress can be so silent to the dotes of such a servant.”

“Dotes” are natural endowments, but the word is related to “dotage.”

John Daw said, “It is her virtue, sir. I have written somewhat about her silence, too.”

“In verse, Sir John?” Dauphine asked.

“What else?” Clerimont asked.

Dauphine asked Jack Daw, “Why, how can you justify your being yourself a poet, you who so slight all the old poets?”

Jack Daw replied, “Why, every man who writes in verse is not a poet.”

He meant: Not every man who writes in verse is a poet.

He was correct. Good verse is good poetry and is written by good poets. Bad verse is doggerel and is written by mere rhymers and versifiers and dilettantes. Mere dilettantes lack knowledge and commitment.

Jack Daw continued, “You have of the wits those who write verses and yet are no poets. Poets are those who live by it, the poor fellows who live by it.”

To Jack Daw, the distinction between poets and versifiers was whether they made money from writing. This society respected those who did not have to work for a living.

Dauphine asked, “Why, wouldn’t you live by your verses, Sir John?”

One meaning of “live by” is “be remembered and so be immortal in that sense.” Homer and Virgil are immortal in that sense.

Clerimont said, “No, it would be a pity if he were to. A knight live by his verses? He did not make them to that end, I hope.”

Let us not make immortal bad verses.

Dauphine said, “And yet the noble Sidney lives by his, and the noble family is not ashamed.”

Sir Philip Sidney is one of the immortal poets. Contrary to Jack Daw’s definition, Sidney did not make money from his poetry. His sister published his works after his death (during his lifetime, they circulated in manuscript form), and as a result his name and poetry live on. Among other works, he wrote Astrophil and Stella and An Apology for Poetry. The word “Apology” means “Defense.”

Clerimont said, “Aye, he proclaimed himself publicly; but Sir John Daw has more caution. He’ll not hinder his own rising in the state so much! Do you think he will?”

In this society, snobbery existed against poets.

Jack Daw’s verses were, in fact, not poetry.

Jack Daw recited:

“Silence in women is like speech in man,

“Deny it who can.”

Jack Daw believed that men should speak and that women should not speak.

“Not I ... believe it,” Dauphine said.

He was not one to believe the content of Jack Daw’s verses.

Dauphine then asked, “Your reason, sir?”

John Daw did not give a reason, but he continued reciting:

“Nor is’t a tale

“That female vice should be a virtue male,

“Or masculine vice a female virtue be;

“You shall it see

“I know to speak and she to hold her peace.”

He then asked, “Do you conceive me, gentlemen?”

Some of his words had a sexual meaning.

“Tale” equals “tail.”

“Increase” can mean “production of children.”

“Peace” equals “piece.”

“Conceive” can mean “become pregnant.” (It also can mean “understand.”)

“No, truly,” Dauphine said. “What do you mean by ‘with increase,’ Sir John?”

Jack Daw replied, “Why, ‘with increase’ is when I court her for the common cause of mankind, and she says nothing but consentire videtur, and in time is gravida.”

The common cause of mankind is procreation.

Consentire videtur is Latin for “seems to consent.”

Gravita means “pregnant.”

“Then this is a ballad of procreation?” Dauphine asked.

“A madrigal of procreation,” Clerimont said. “You make a mistake by calling it a ballad.”

Originally, Jack Daw had called it a “madrigal of modesty.”

Epicene said to Jack Daw, “Please give me my verses again, servant.”

Jack Daw, “If you’ll request them aloud, you shall.”

Jack Daw and Epicene walked aside with the poems.

Clerimont heard a noise and looked in its direction and said, “Look, here’s Truewit again.”

— 2.4 —

Truewit entered the room. He was carrying his post-horn.

“Where have you been, in the name of madness, thus equipped with your horn?” Clerimont asked.

“Where the sound of it might have pierced your senses with gladness, had you been in ear-reach of it,” Truewit said. “Dauphine, fall down and worship me. I have forbid the banns, lad. I have formally objected to the marriage. I have been with your virtuous uncle and have broken the match.”

“You have not, I hope!” Dauphine said.

“Yes, indeed,” Truewit said. “If you should hope otherwise, I would repent. This horn got me entrance; kiss it. I had no other way to get in but by feigning to be a post, but when I once got in, I proved not to be a post.”

Truewit was punning on the word “post.” He had pretended to be a post-messenger, but once he gained admittance into Morose’s house, he showed that he (Truewit) was not a fence post: a block of wood, aka blockhead.

He continued, “But on the contrary, I turned him into a post, or a stone, or what is stiffer, by thundering into him the incommodities and disadvantages of a wife and the miseries of marriage. If a Gorgon were ever seen in the shape of a woman, he has seen her in my description.”

A Gorgon is a female monster whose look can turn a man into stone.

Truewit continued, “I have put him off that scent forever. Why don’t you applaud and adore me, sirs? Why do you stand mute? Are you stupid and/or stupefied? You are not worthy of the benefit I have given to you.”

Dauphine said to Clerimont, “Didn’t I tell you? Mischief!”

Clerimont said to Truewit, “I wish that you had placed this benefit somewhere else.”

“Why so?” Truewit asked.

“By God’s light, you have done the most inconsiderate, rash, weak thing that a man ever did to his friend,” Clerimont answered.

“Friend!” Dauphine said. “If the most malicious enemy I have had studied how to inflict an injury upon me, he could not have come up with a greater injury.”

“An injury!” Truewit said. “How? In what, for God’s sake? Gentlemen, come to yourselves again.”

Dauphine said to Clerimont, “But I predicted thus much before to you. I warned you of this.”

Dauphine had worried about Clerimont’s talking so openly about Dauphine’s inheritance troubles to Truewit, who was outspoken and not one for secrets.

“I wish that my lips had been soldered together when I spoke about it!” Clerimont said.

He then said to Truewit, “By God’s light, what moved you to be thus impertinent and meddling?”

“My masters,” Truewit said, “do not put on this strange face of hostility to pay my courtesy. Take off your hostile ‘mask.’ Do you have good deeds done to you, and thank the doers in this way?”

“Before heaven, you have ruined me,” Dauphine said. “That which I have plotted for and have been putting into effect now for these past four months, you have blasted in a minute.

“Now that I am lost and ruined, I may speak.

“This gentlewoman” — he pointed to Epicene — “was lodged here by me on purpose, and to impose upon and trick my uncle, she has professed this obstinate silence for my sake, being entirely my friend, and one who, in return for the fortune she will get if she marries him, would have made me a very ample settlement. But now all my hopes are utterly miscarried by this unlucky occurrence done by you.”

Clerimont said, “Thus it is when a man will be ignorantly officious, do services, and not ask why — or whether — he should do services. I wonder what courteous itch possessed you! You never played a more absurd part in your life, nor ever made a greater trespass to friendship, to humanity.”

“Indeed, you may forgive it best,” Dauphine said. “It was your fault principally.”

“I know it,” Clerimont said. “I wish it were not my fault!”

Clerimont had told Truewit the facts that had made Truewit take the action that neither Dauphine nor Clerimont wanted.

Cutbeard the barber entered the room.

“How are you now, Cutbeard?” Dauphine asked. “What is the news?”

“The best, the happiest that ever was, sir,” Cutbeard said. “There has been a mad gentleman visiting your uncle this morning —”

He pointed to Truewit and said, “I think this is the gentleman,” and then continued, “— who has almost talked him out of his wits with threatening him with the woes of marriage.”

“Go on, please,” Dauphine said.

“And your uncle, sir,” Cutbeard said, “thinks it was done by your arrangement; therefore, he will see the party you know of immediately” — he meant Epicene — “and if he likes her, he says, and if she is so inclining to dumbness as I have told him she is, he swears he will marry her today, instantly, and not defer it a minute longer.”

“Excellent!” Dauphine said. “Beyond our expectation!”

“Beyond your expectation?” Truewit said. “By this light, I knew it would be thus.”

Not likely.

“Nay, sweet Truewit, forgive me,” Dauphine said. “I don’t believe you.”

Truewit said, “No, I was ‘ignorantly officious’ and ‘impertinent.’ This was the ‘absurd,’ ‘weak’ part. So you believe.”

“Will you ascribe to merit, now, what was sheer fortune, mere luck?” Clerimont asked.

Truewit said, “Sheer fortune? Sheer luck? No, it was completely providence and foresight. Fortune and luck had not a finger in it. I saw it must necessarily in nature fall out so; my attendant spirit is never false to me in these things. Show me how it could be otherwise.”

Truewit’s actions had had a good outcome: Morose was going to marry Epicene immediately, it seemed. Now Truewit was taking credit for it.

“Nay, gentlemen, don’t argue,” Dauphine said. “All is well now.”

“Alas, I let him go on with ‘inconsiderate’ and ‘rash’ and what else he pleased to criticize me with,” Truewit said.

Clerimont said, “Bah, you strange justifier of yourself, who claim to be wiser than you were because of a lucky outcome!”

“Lucky outcome!” Truewit said. “By this light, you shall never persuade me to believe anything other than I foresaw it as well as the stars themselves.”

“Nay, gentlemen, all is well now,” Dauphine said. “You two entertain Sir John Daw with conversation while I send Epicene away with my instructions.”

Truewit replied, “I’ll be acquainted with her, first, with your permission.”

The gentlemen approached Jack Daw and Epicene, who had been talking together off to the side.

Presenting Truewit to Epicene, Clerimont said, “This is Master Truewit, lady. He is a friend of ours.”

“I am sorry I have not known you sooner, lady, to celebrate this rare virtue of your silence,” Truewit said.

Epicene curtsied.

Clerimont said to Truewit, “Indeed, if you had come sooner, you would have seen and heard her well celebrated in Sir John Daw’s madrigals.”

Epicene, Dauphine, and Cutbeard exited as Truewit turned to Jack Daw.

“Jack Daw, may God save you!” Truewit said. “When did you last see La Foole?”

“Not since last night, Master Truewit,” Jack Daw said.

“That’s a miracle!” Truewit said. “I thought you two were inseparable.”

“He’s gone to invite his guests,” Jack Daw said.

“Ha, that’s true,” Truewit said. “What a false memory I do have towards that man!”

“I am one of his guests. I met him just now sitting upon what he calls his exquisite, delicate fine black horse, which was ridden into a foam with posting from place to place and person to person to give them the cue —”

“A reminder lest they should forget?” Clerimont asked.

“Yes,” Truewit said. “There never was any poor captain who took more pains at a muster to show men than he, at this meal, to show friends.”

Unscrupulous military officers recruited as many men, including men unsuitable to be soldiers, as they could in order to inflate their own profits. La Foole recruited as many friends and “friends” to attend his feast as he could to maintain his social status.

“It is his quarter-feast, sir,” Jack Daw said.

Once a quarter, La Foole collected the rents due to him because of his land holdings. He celebrated with a feast for himself and his many guests.

“What, do you say so, Sir John?” Clerimont asked.

“Nay, Jack Daw will not be silenced and out of words, among the best friends he has, to the talent of his wit,” Truewit said.

In other words, Jack Daw will not restrain himself from making a joke, even if it is at the expense of his friends. Also, Jack Daw will not be absent from a feast during which he can display his wit and intelligence.

Sadly, Jack Daw had not much wit and intelligence and not many friends who really liked him.

Truewit then asked, “Where’s his mistress, who should hear and applaud him? Has she gone?”

Jack Daw asked, “Has Mistress Epicene gone?”

He meant, Has she gone to the feast already?

Clerimont said, “She has gone before us with Sir Dauphine, I promise you, to the place.”

“Gone before!” Truewit said. “That is a manifest injury, a disgrace and a half, to refuse him at such a festival time as this, with him being a bravery and a wit, too.”

He meant that Epicene had insulted Jack Daw by going to the feast with Dauphine, not him.

“Tut, he’ll swallow it like cream,” Clerimont said. “He’s better read in jure civili [civil law] than to esteem anything a disgrace that is offered him from a mistress.”

He meant that Jack Daw was so well mannered (or perhaps mild mannered) that he would not take offence at any insult a woman offered him.

“Nay, let her even go,” Jack Daw said. “She shall sit alone and be dumb in her chamber a week together, as far as John Daw is concerned, I promise her. Does she refuse me?”

“No, sir, do not take it so to heart,” Clerimont said. “She does not refuse you, but she does a little neglect you.”

He then said, “In good faith, Truewit, you were too blameworthy to put it into his head that she does refuse him.”

“She does refuse him, sir, palpably, however you mince — minimize — it,” Truewit said. “If I were him, I would swear to never speak a word to her today for it.”

“By this light, I will no more speak to her,” Jack Daw said.

“Nor to anybody else, sir,” Truewit said.

“Nay, I will not say that, gentlemen,” Jack Daw said.

He would continue to speak to them.

Clerimont whispered to Truewit, "It would have been an excellent happy condition for the company if you could have drawn him to promise not to speak to us again."

"I'll be very melancholic, indeed," Jack Daw said.

"As a dog, if I were as you, Sir John," Clerimont said.

Dogs were proverbially considered to be melancholic.

"Or a snail, or a hog-louse [wood-louse]," Truewit said. "I would roll myself up like a beetle for self-protection for this day, indeed; they should not unwind me."

"By this toothpick, so I will," Jack Daw said.

In this society, toothpicks were considered fashionable.

"Well done," Clerimont whispered to Truewit. "He begins already to be angry with his teeth."

Jack Daw was jabbing at his teeth with his toothpick.

"Will you go, gentlemen?" Jack Daw asked.

"Nay, you must walk alone, if you are truly melancholic, Sir John," Clerimont said.

"Yes, sir, we'll dog you," Truewit said. "We'll follow you afar off."

Jack Daw exited.

"Was there ever such a two yards of knighthood, measured out by time, to be sold to laughter?" Clerimont said, comparing Jack Daw to a bolt of cloth from which six feet of cloth were measured, cut, and sold.

"A mere talking mole!" Truewit said.

Moles were thought to be blind.

He continued, "Hang him. No mushroom was ever so fresh."

Mushrooms grow overnight, and so upstarts in society were called mushrooms. Jack Daw was an upstart because he had bought his knighthood.

Truewit continued, “Jack Daw is a fellow who is so utterly nothing that he doesn’t know what he would be.”

“Let’s follow him,” Clerimont said. “But first let’s go to Dauphine — he’s hovering about the house — to hear what is the news.”

“I agree,” Truewit said.

They exited.

— 2.5 —

Morose, Epicene, Cutbeard the barber, and the mute servant met together. Epicene was wearing a mask.

“Welcome, Cutbeard,” Morose said. “Draw near with your fair charge, and in her ear softly entreat her to unmask.”

Epicene took off her mask.

“Good,” Morose said.

He asked his mute servant, “Is the door shut?”

The mute servant bowed, meaning yes.

“Enough,” Morose said to the mute servant.

He then said, “Now, Cutbeard, with the same discipline I use with my household servants, I will question you. As I understand, Cutbeard, this gentlewoman is she whom you have provided and brought in hope she will fit me in the place and person of a wife. Answer me not with words, but by making a bow, unless the answer is otherwise than yes.”

Cutbeard bowed.

“Very well done, Cutbeard,” Morose said. “I also understand, Cutbeard, that you have been pre-acquainted with her birth, education, and qualities, or else you would not recommend her to my acceptance in the weighty consequence of marriage.”

Cutbeard began to answer with words, but Morose said, “This I understand, Cutbeard. Answer me not with words, but by making a bow, unless your answer is otherwise than yes.”

Cutbeard bowed.

“Very well done, Cutbeard,” Morose said. “Stand aside now a little, and let me examine her shape and capacity to arouse my affection.”

He walked around Epicene and said, “She is exceedingly fair and of a specially good beauty. She has a sweet, well-tuned composition or harmony of limbs. Her temper of beauty has the true height of my blood — her beauty suits my passions.”

Blood makes a penis attain height.

Morose said to himself about Cutbeard, “The knave has exceedingly well suited me with her external appearance; I will now try her within.”

He meant that he would test her character, but readers may be forgiven for thinking that Morose was going to test Epicene’s lady parts.

Morose said to Epicene, “Come near, fair gentlewoman. Let my behavior not seem rude, although to you, who are uncommonly fine, it may perhaps appear strange.”

It appears strange to most readers, no doubt.

Epicene curtsied.

Morose said, “Nay, lady, you may speak, although Cutbeard and my mute serving-man might not, for of all sounds only the sweet voice of a fair lady has the just attunement to my ears.

“I ask you to speak out loud, lady: Out of the first fire of meeting eyes, they say, love is stricken. Do you feel any such ’motion suddenly shot into you from any part you see in me? Ha, lady?”

He was asking if Epicene felt love-emotion at first sight, but readers may be forgiven if they thought of the motion of the sexual act.

Epicene curtsied.

Morose said to her, “Alas, lady, these answers by silent curtsies from you are too uncourtly, unsophisticated, and simple. I have always displayed my breeding in court, and she who shall be my wife must be accomplished with courtly and audacious — spirited — ornaments.”

He then asked, “Can you speak, lady?”

Speaking softly, Epicene said, “You are the judge of that, truly.”

“What did you say, lady?” Morose said. “Speak up, please.”

A little louder, Epicene said, “You are the judge of that, truly.”

“On my judgment, you have a divine softness in your voice!” Morose said. “But can you naturally, lady, as I enjoin these men — my mute servant and Cutbeard the barber — by instruction and employment, refer yourself to the search of my judgment, and (not taking pleasure in your tongue, which is a woman’s chiefest pleasure) think it agreeable to answer me by silent gestures, so long as my speeches agree with what you understand?”

This was a long-winded way of asking if Epicene would answer him with gestures such as curtsies instead of answering him with words, as long as the answer was yes.

Epicene curtsied.

“Excellent! Divine!” Morose said. “I hope it is possible that she should hold out and continue in this way!

“Peace, Cutbeard, you are made forever, as you have made me, if this felicity persists. But I will test her further.”

Morose then said to Epicene, “Dear lady, I am courtly, I tell you, and I must have my ears banqueted with pleasant and witty conversations, clever gibes, scoffs, and dalliance in her whom I mean to choose for my bedfellow.

“The ladies in court think it a most desperate injury to their quickness of wit and good deportment if they cannot give occasion for a man to court them, and, when an amorous discourse is set in motion, supply as good matter to continue the amorous conversation as himself.

“And do you alone so much differ from all of them that what they with so much pomp and ceremony aim at and toil for to seem learned, to seem judicious, to seem sharp and witty, you can bury in yourself with silence, and rather trust your graces to the fair consciousness and inner conviction of virtue than to the world’s or your own proclamation?”

Morose wanted his bedfellow — wife — to be witty, but to be witty only in his presence and not engage in the flirting that women at court took pleasure in engaging with men they were not married to.

Very softly, Epicene replied, “I should be sorry else.”

This could mean: I would be sorry if I could not do as you wish me to do.

Or it could mean: I would be sorry if I had to refrain from flirting.

“What did you say, lady?” Epicene asked. “Good lady, speak up.”

“I should be sorry else,” Epicene said.

“That sorrow fills me with gladness!” Morose said to himself. “Oh, Morose, you are happy and fortunate above mankind! Pray that you may contain yourself. I will put her to it only once more, and it shall be with the utmost trial and test of their sex.”

“Put her to it” sounds sexual.

He said to Epicene, “But hear me, fair lady: I also love to see her whom I shall choose for my heifer [cow that has not yet calved] to be the first and principal in all fashions, precede all the dames at court by a fortnight, have her council of tailors, liners [drapers], lace-women, and embroiderers, and sit with them sometimes twice a day to learn news of French fashions, and then come forth varied like Nature, or oftener than she, and better by the help of Art [makeup], her emulous servant. This I do like.

“And how will you be able, lady, with this frugality of speech, to give the manifold but necessary instructions for that bodice, these sleeves, those skirts, this cut [in a sleeve to display the colors in the clothing underneath], that stitch, this embroidery, that lace, this wire [to support a headdress], those knots [bows], that ruff, those shoe-roses, this belt, that fan, the other scarf, these gloves? Ha! What do you say, lady?”

Faintly, Epicene said, “I’ll leave it to you, sir.”

“What, lady?” Morose said. “Please, rise a note in your reply.”

“I leave it to wisdom and you, sir,” Epicene said.

Morose was not to be identified with wisdom.

“Admirable creature!” Morose said. “I will trouble you no more; I will not sin against so sweet a simplicity. Let me now be bold to print, on those divine lips, the seal of being mine.”

He kissed her.

He then said, “Cutbeard, I give you the lease of your house free.”

This was Cutbeard’s reward for finding a silent woman for Morose to marry. Cutbeard would not have to pay rent.

Morose continued, “Thank me not with words but with a bow.”

Cutbeard bowed.

Morose then said, “I know what you would say. Epicene is poor, and her friends are deceased. But she has brought a wealthy dowry in her silence, Cutbeard; and in respect of her poverty, Cutbeard, I shall have her more loving and obedient, Cutbeard.

“Go and get me a minister immediately, with a soft, low voice to marry us, and tell him not to be long-winded with irrelevant words, but to be as brief as he can.

“Leave! Quietly, Cutbeard.”

Cutbeard the barber exited.

Morose said to his mute servant, “Sirrah, conduct your mistress into the dining room, your now-mistress.”

One meaning of “mistress” is a female head of household.

The mute servant and Epicene exited.

Morose now began to talk about his nephew: the knight Sir Dauphine Eugenie. Morose wanted to have a son with Epicene so that Sir Dauphine would not inherit his wealth.

“Oh, my felicity!” Morose said. “Oh, my happiness! How I shall be revenged on my insolent kinsman and his plots to frighten me away from marrying! This night I will beget an heir, and thrust him out of my blood like a stranger.

“He would be knighted, indeed, and thought by that means to reign over me: His title must intimidate it.

“No, kinsman, I will now make you bring me the tenth lord’s and the sixteenth lady’s letter of commendation, kinsman, and it shall do you no good, kinsman.”

Morose began to refer to Sir Dauphine as “it” and “kighthood itself” and “it kighthood” and “your kighthood”:

“Your kighthood itself shall come on its knees to me, and it shall be rejected.

“It shall be sued and its goods seized for nonpayment of debts and it shall not be given financial redemption.

“It shall cheat at gambling in the twelvepenny-for-a-meal inn. Yes, it kighthood shall cheat to get money for its diet all the term-time when law courts are in session, and tell entertaining tales to the hostess for its diet in the vacation season.

“Or it kighthood shall do worse and take sanctuary in the seedy area known as Coleharbor [Cold Harbor] and fast due to lack of food.”

Coleharbor was a place where vagabonds took shelter. A cold harbor has shelter but no fire and no food.

Morose continued:

“It shall frighten all its friends with begging letters, and, when one of the four score has brought it knighthood ten shillings, it knighthood shall go to the Three Cranes Tavern or the Bear Tavern at the Bridge-foot and be drunk in fear.

“It shall not have money to discharge one tavern reckoning. It shall not be able to invite the old creditors to postpone asking for repayment and to instead tolerate it knighthood, and it shall not be able to persuade the new creditors-who-should-be to trust it knighthood and give it credit.

“It shall be the tenth name in a list of potential borrowers, and to borrow money it will be forced to take up the commodity of pipkins [earthenware jugs] and stone jugs.”

These commodities would be given to Sir Dauphine instead of money. He would sell them at a low price, and would owe much money to the lender.

Morose continued:

“And the money gotten thereby shall not equip it knighthood even for the attempted seduction of a baker’s widow, a brown baker’s widow.

“It shall give it knighthood’s name for a stallion — a stud — to all frisky citizens’ wives and be refused, when the master of a dancing school or (what do you call him?) the worst reveler in the town is accepted as a lover.”

The worst reveler in town could be the playwright Ben Jonson, who had a reputation.

Morose continued:

“It shall need clothes, and, by reason of that, need wit to play the fool to lawyers.

“It shall not have hope to repair its fortunes by going to Constantinople, Ireland, or Virginia.”

These were places debtors went to in order to escape arrest or to repair their fortunes.

Morose continued:

“The best and last fortune to it knighthood shall be to make Doll Tearsheet or Kate Common — prostitutes — a lady, and so it knighthood may eat.”

The final way for Sir Dauphine Eugenie to eat would be for him to marry a prostitute (who would thereby become Lady Eugenie) and act as her pimp in order to get money to buy food.

Morose exited.

— 2.6 —

Truewit, Dauphine, and Clerimont talked together in the street by Cutbeard’s barbershop. They were looking for Cutbeard.

“Are you sure he has not already gone by?” Truewit asked.

“No, he has not. I stayed in the shop ever since and would have seen him,” Dauphine said.

“But he may take the other end of the lane,” Clerimont said.

“No,” Dauphine said. “I told him I would be here at this end; I arranged to meet him here.”

“What a barbarian he is to stay away and be late, then!” Truewit complained.

“Yonder he comes,” Dauphine said.

As Cutbeard walked over to them, Clerimont said, “And his charge — Epicene — has been left behind him, which is a very good sign, Dauphine.”

“How are things now, Cutbeard?” Dauphine asked. “Are things succeeding, or not?”

Cutbeard answered, “They are successful past imagination, sir, omnia secunda — you could not have prayed to have had it so well — paltat senex, as the proverb says.”

The Latin proverb means, “All is well. The old boy is cutting capers.” It came into existence when a religious rite was interrupted and most religious people there abandoned it, but an old man continued dancing and properly carried out the rite.

Cutbeard continued, “Morose triumphs in his felicity and happiness. He admires Epicene! He has given me the lease of my house, too! And I am now going for a silent minister to marry them, and away I go.”

Not yet. The others wanted to talk.

“By God’s light,” Truewit said, “get one of the silenced ministers. A zealous brother would torment him entirely.”

Truewit was very much in favor of tormenting Morose.

A silent minister would suit Morose just fine, but not a silenced minister. Silenced ministers were Puritan ministers who had lost their license to preach. If one were to officiate at the marriage ceremony, he would be long-winded. Puritan ministers preached long sermons, and one who had not had an opportunity to preach for a long time would be especially full of words.

“Cum privilegio, sir,” Cutbeard said.

The Latin means, “With authority.” The minister would have the right to say the words of the marriage ceremony without Morose interrupting him and encouraging him to finish quickly.

“Oh, by no means, let’s do nothing to hinder the marriage ceremony now,” Dauphine said. “When it is done and finished, I will join with you in finding any device of vexation to torment Morose.”

“And that marriage ceremony shall occur within this half hour, upon my dexterity, gentlemen,” Cutbeard said. “Contrive whatever torment you can, in the meantime, bonis avibus.”

The Latin means, “The omens being favorable.”

Cutbeard the barber exited.

“How the slave does Latin it!” Clerimont said.

Cutbeard had been showing off by putting bits of Latin in his conversation.

Truewit said, “It would be made a jest to posterity, sirs, this day’s mirth, if you will.”

He was thinking of a way to torment Morose.

“Curse his heart who will not join in, I say,” Clerimont said.

“I’m in,” Dauphine said. “I’ll play my part. What do you have in mind?”

“To transfer all La Foole’s company and his feast hither to Morose’s house, today, to celebrate this bride-ale — that is, the wedding-feast,” Truewit said.

A celebration like that would be noisy and thus would torment Morose.

“Aye, by the Virgin Mary, but how will it be done?” Dauphine asked.

“I’ll undertake the directing of all the lady guests thither, and then the food must follow,” Truewit said.

“For God’s sake, let’s make it happen,” Clerimont said. “It will be an excellent comedy of affliction — there will be so many different noises.”

Dauphine asked, “But aren’t they at the Otters’ place already, don’t you think?”

“I’ll guarantee you this for the College-honors — the Lady Collegiates: One of their faces has not the priming color — the undercoat — laid on yet, and the other has not yet smoothed her smock.”

The smock was an undergarment.

In other words, the ladies were not yet dressed and made up.

“Oh, but they’ll rise earlier than usual to prepare to go to a feast,” Clerimont said.

“We best go see and assure ourselves who is right,” Truewit said.

“Who knows the location of the Otters’ house?” Clerimont asked.

“I’ll lead you there,” Truewit said. “Haven’t you been there yet?”

“Not I,” Dauphine said.

“Nor I,” Clerimont said.

“Where have you lived, then?” Truewit asked. “I can’t believe you don’t know Tom Otter!”

“I don’t know him,” Clerimont said. “For God’s sake, what kind of person is he?”

Truewit answered, “He is an excellent animal, equal to your Daw or La Foole, if not transcending them, and he does Latin it as much as your barber. He is his wife’s subject; he calls her princess, and, at such times such as these, he follows her up and down the house like a page, with his hat off, partly to fan himself because of heat, partly to show reverence to her. At this instant, he is marshalling his bull, bear, and horse.”

Dauphine asked, “What are those, in the name of Sphinx?”

The Sphinx is a monster — a lion with the head of a woman and the wings of an eagle — who asked this riddle in Sophocles’ Oedipus Rex: What goes on four legs in the morning, two legs at noon, and three legs in the evening? If Oedipus cannot answer this riddle correctly, the Sphinx will kill him. Oedipus answered the riddle correctly: Man, who goes on hands and knees as a crawling baby, two legs as a healthy adult, and two legs and a cane as an old person.

Truewit answered, “Why, sir, he has been a great man at the bear-baitings and bull-baitings at the Bear Garden in his time, and from that subtle sport has taken the witty denomination of his chief carousing cups.”

Mr. Otter enjoyed watching dogs bait — torment — animals. Because of that, he valued his drinking cups’ lids, which were shaped like animals’ heads.

Truewit continued, “He calls one carousing cup his bull, another his bear, another his horse. And then he has his lesser glasses that he calls his deer and his ape, and several sizes of them, too, and he is never content, nor thinks any entertainment perfect, until these carousing cups are brought out and set on the cupboard.”

Mr. Otter used the carousing cups in drinking competitions.

“For God’s love!” Clerimont said. “We would miss this if we did not go.”

He wanted to see such a man.

“Oh, he has a thousand things as good that will describe his character all day. He will rail about his wife, with certain commonplaces, behind her back; and to her face —”

“Say no more about him,” Dauphine interrupted. “Let’s go see him, I petition you.”

— 3.1 —

Mr. Otter and Mrs. Otter were talking together in their home.

Truewit, Clerimont, and Dauphine entered the room, unobserved by Mr. Otter and Mrs. Otter. They stood silently and listened to the Otters.

Mr. Otter wanted to speak: “Nay, good princess, hear me pauca verba.”

The Latin means “few words,” and it is a drinking cry that means, “More drink and less talk.”

“By that light,” Mrs. Otter said, “I’ll have you chained up with your bull-dogs and bear-dogs if you are not soon civil. I’ll send you to the kennel, indeed. You had best bait me along with your bull, bear, and horse! Just go ahead and try!”

To bait an animal means to torment an animal. In bear-baitings, dogs tormented and sometimes killed a bear. And sometimes the bear killed one or more dogs.

“Never is there a time when the courtiers or Lady Collegiates come to the house but you make it a Shrove Tuesday — a day of rioting! I would have you get your Whitsuntide velvet cap and your staff in your hand to entertain them; yes, indeed, do that.”

Velvet caps were worn during holidays.

Mrs. Otter wanted her husband to be dressed up and be on his best behavior for the Lady Collegiates.

Mr. Otter said, “Not so, princess, neither, but subject to your correction, sweet princess, give me permission — these are things by which I am known to the courtiers. My eccentricity is reported to them, and they receive it so and expect it.

“Tom Otter’s bull, bear, and horse are known all over England, in rerum natura.”

The Latin means, “in the natural order of things.”

Mr. Otter wanted to show off his drinking cups, and Mrs. Otter did not want him to. She wanted him to be a respectable host in front of the Lady Collegiates.

Mr. Otter enjoyed bear-baitings at other places. Here, though, it was if he were a bear and his wife were a dog viciously attacking him.

“Before me, I will na-ture them over to Paris Garden and na-ture you thither, too, if you mention them again. Is a bear a fit beast, or a bull, to mix in society with great ladies? Do you think, in your judgment, that they are fit to mix in any well-ordered society?”

She meant that she would say ‘nay’ to him and turn his drinking cups — and him — over to the Paris Gardens. Then she would not be bothered by them or by him.

“The horse, then, good princess,” Mr. Otter said.

“Well, I am contented for the horse,” Mrs. Otter said. “They love to be well horsed, I know. I love it myself.”

“To be well horsed” contains connotations of being well ridden and well mounted.

Mr. Otter said, “And it is a delicate fine horse, this. Poetarum Pegasus.”

The Latin means, “The poets’ Pegasus.”

Pegasus was a flying horse. Its hoof once struck the earth and opened a spring whose water inspired poets.

Mr. Otter continued, “Correct me if I’m wrong, princess, but Jupiter turned himself into a taurus or bull. Correct me if I’m wrong, good princess.”

Jupiter, king of the gods, turned himself into a white bull. In Crete, the mortal woman Europa climbed on its back, and Jupiter took her from Crete to Europe, which is named after her.

Mrs. Otter said, “By my integrity, I’ll send you over to the Bankside and I’ll commit you to the Master of the Garden, if I hear just a syllable more. Must my house or my roof be polluted with the scent of bears and bulls when it is perfumed for great ladies? Is this according to the agreement we made when I married you? Our agreement is that I would be princess and reign in my own house, and you would be my subject and obey me. What did you financially bring me that should make you thus peremptory and self-willed?”

In this case, “the scent of bears and bulls” was the scent of alcoholic beverages because Mr. Otter used his animal-headed drinking cups for drinking contests.

Mrs. Otter continued, “Do I allow you your half-crown a day to spend where you will among your gamesters so that you can vex and torment me at such times as these? Who gives you your maintenance — your domestic upkeep — I ask you? Who allows you your horse fodder and man’s food? Your three suits of apparel a year? Your four pairs of stockings: one silk, three worsted?”

Servants were given three suits of clothing a year and wore worsted stockings.

She continued, “Who gives you your clean linen, your collars, and your cuffs when I can get you to wear them? It is a marvel you have them on now. Who confers honor upon you with courtiers or great personages to speak to you out of their coaches and come home to your house? Were you ever so much as looked upon by a lord or a lady before I married you, except on the Easter or Whitsun holidays and out at the Banqueting House window, when Ned Whiting or George Stone were at the stake?”

Ned Whiting and George Stone were the names of famous bears used in bear-baiting.

Truewit said quietly to Clerimont and Dauphine, “For God’s sake, let’s go stave her off him.”

Literally, “to stave off” means to beat something — such as dogs in a bear-baiting — away with a stave.

Mrs. Otter continued, “Give me an answer to that. And didn’t I take you up from thence, in an old greasy buff doublet — leather jacket — with tagged laces, and green velvet sleeves worn out at the elbows? You forget this.”

Truewit said quietly to Clerimont and Dauphine, “She’ll worry him if we don’t help him in time.”

To “worry” a bear or bull in baiting is to injure it by biting it.

Truewit, Clerimont, and Dauphine came forward.

Seeing the gentlemen, Mrs. Otter said, “Oh, here are some gallants!”

She said to her husband, “Come on, behave yourself with distinction and with good morality, or, I say, I’ll take away your allowance.”

— 3.2 —

Truewit came forward and said, “With your permission, fair Mistress Otter, I’ll be bold to enter these gentlemen in your acquaintance.”

Mrs. Otter, whose diction was often affected, said, "It shall not be obnoxious or difficil, sir."

In simpler language, she meant it would not be offensive or troublesome.

Truewit said to Mr. Otter about his drinking cups, "How is my noble captain? Is the bull, bear, and horse in rerum natura still?"

He was asking if they were still in existence.

Mr. Otter had a habit of talking about his drinking cups as if they were real animals, and real animals sometimes died during baitings. And cups were sometimes dropped and broken.

Mr. Otter replied, "Sir, sic visum superis.

Sic visum superis is Latin for "As those above decree."

Mrs. Otter said to her husband, "I wish you would but intimate them."

She meant that she wished he would keep the drinking cups out of sight. The Latin intimus means "inmost," and she wanted them inmost a closed cupboard.

Apparently, she also wanted her husband to imitate them in being out of sight because she ordered, "Go your ways inside, and get toasts and butter made for the woodcocks. That's a fit province for you."

A woodcock is a bird, or a fool. Buttered toast was served with woodcock, and it was a milksop. Mr. Otter was a henpecked husband and a milque-toast.

Her husband exited.

The gentlemen talked privately among themselves. They were a distance away from Mrs. Otter, and she could not hear them.

“Alas, what a tyranny is this poor fellow married to!” Clerimont said.

“Oh, but the entertainment will be soon, when we get him drunk and he loosens his tongue,” Truewit said.

“Does he ever dare to speak?” Dauphine asked.

“No Anabaptist — Puritan — ever railed with the like license,” Truewit said.

“License” meant “license to preach” and “lack of restraint.”

He continued, “But pay close attention to her language in the meantime, I ask you.”

Paying close attention to Mrs. Otter’s affected language could be quite entertaining.

Mrs. Otter said to them, “Gentlemen, you are very aptly come. My cousin, Sir Amorous La Foole, will be here shortly.”

“In good time, lady,” Truewit said. “Wasn’t Sir John Daw here, to ask for him and the company?”

“I cannot assure you, Master Truewit,” Mrs. Otter said. “There was a very melancholy knight wearing a ruff, who asked my subject — Mr. Otter — about somebody — a gentleman, I think.”

A ruff is a projecting frilled collar worn around the neck.

“Aye, that was he, lady,” Clerimont said.

“But he departed immediately, I can resolve you,” Mrs. Otter said.

“Resolve” is an affected way of saying “assure.”

“What an excellent choice phrase this lady uses to express herself!” Dauphine said.

Truewit said, “Oh, sir, she is the only authentical — genuine — courtier, who is not naturally bred one, in the city.”

By saying “authentical,” he was mocking her affected way of speaking.

Mrs. Otter said, “You have taken that report upon trust, gentlemen.”

She meant that they believed the report without evidence to back it up. Chances are, she was hoping to hear a compliment reassuring her that the report was true.

Truewit replied, “No, I assure you, the court determines it to be so, lady, in your behalf. The court says it is true.”

“I am the servant of the court and courtiers, sir,” Mrs. Otter said.

“They are rather your idolaters,” Truewit said.

“That is not so, sir,” Mrs. Otter said, modestly.

Cutbeard the barber entered the room, and the gentlemen talked to him quietly so that Mrs. Otter could not overhear them.

“How are you now, Cutbeard?” Dauphine asked. “Any hindrances? Have you run into any problems?”

“Oh, no, sir,” Cutbeard said. “Omnia bene. All is well. It was never better hung on the hinges and running smoothly — all’s sure and going well. I have so pleased him with a curate that he’s gone to it almost with the delight he hopes for soon.”

The delight he hoped for soon was supposed to occur on his wedding night.

“What is he like as a vicar?” Dauphine asked.

Cutbeard replied, “He is like one who has caught a cold, sir, and can scarcely be heard six inches off, as if he spoke out of a bulrush that was not picked, or his throat were full of pith — he is a fine, quick fellow and an excellent barber of prayers.”

Picked bullrushes can be dried and hollowed out. They then make a noise when blown into. This minister’s throat was so constricted that he could hardly make a sound.

A barber of prayers is one who cuts prayers short.

Cutbeard continued, “I came to tell you, sir, that you might omnem movere lapidem (as they say). Be ready with your vexation.”

Omnem movere lapidem is Latin for “Turn over every stone” or “Leave no stone unturned.”

“Many thanks, honest Cutbeard,” Dauphine said. “Be thereabouts with your key to let us in.”

Cutbeard had a key to Morose’s house.

“I will not fail you, sir,” Cutbeard said. “Ad manum. In other words, I will be at hand.”

Cutbeard exited.

Truewit said, “Well, I’ll go watch for the ladies’ coaches and direct them to go to Morose’s house for the feast.”

“Do, and we’ll send Jack Daw to you, if you don’t meet him,” Clerimont said.

Truewit exited.

Mrs. Otter joined the gentlemen's company and asked, "Has Master Truewit gone?"

"Yes, lady," Dauphine said. "There is some unfortunate business fallen out."

Mrs. Otter said, "So I judged by the physiognomy of the fellow who came in; and I had a dream last night, too, of the new pageant and my Lady Mayoress, which is always very ominous to me."

The pageant is the installation festivities of installing a new Mayor of London. The Lady Mayoress is the Mayor's wife.

Mrs. Otter continued, "I told it to my Lady Haughty, a member of the Lady Collegiates, the other day, when Her Honor came hither to see some Chinese fabrics; and she expounded it out of Artemidorus, and I have found it since very true. It has done me many affronts."

Artemidorus was a Greek who wrote about the meaning of dreams.

"What was your dream, lady?" Clerimont asked.

Mrs. Otter said, "Yes, sir, anything I do is but dream city. All my dreams are about the city."

"The city" is London.

She continued, "In a dream, I stained a damask tablecloth that cost me eighteen pounds at one time.

"And in a second dream, I burnt a black satin gown as I stood by the fire at my Lady Centaur's chamber in the College another time.

"In a third dream, at the Lord's masque, a wax candle dripped all over my wired headdress and my ruff, so that I could not go up to the banquet.

“In a fourth dream, I was taking a coach to go to Ware to meet a friend.”

The town of Ware was notorious as a meeting place for assignations. In this society, the word “friend” could mean “lover.”

She continued, “A brewer’s horse kicked up dirt all over my new suit (a crimson satin doublet and black velvet skirts), so that I was obliged to go in and change my clothes, and kept my chamber a leash of days because of the anguish of it.”

A lease is a hunting term meaning “three,” as in a lease of (three) dogs.

In each dream, a social event was ruined for her because of something happening to the clothing she was wearing.

“These were dire mischances, lady,” Dauphine said.

“I would not dwell in the city if it were so ominous to me,” Clerimont said.

“Yes, sir, but I do take the advice of my doctor, which is to dream of it as little as I can,” Mrs. Otter said.

“You do well to do so, Mistress Otter,” Dauphine said.

Jack Daw entered the room, and Clerimont took him aside to speak quietly to him.

“Will it please you to enter into the house farther, gentlemen?” Mrs. Otter asked.

“And into your favor, lady,” Dauphine said.

He was willing to go farther into the house — and farther into her favor.

He continued, “But we stay to speak with a knight, Sir John Daw, who has just come here. We shall follow you, lady.”

“At your own time, sir. When you are ready,” Mrs. Otter said. “It is my cousin Sir Amorous’ feast —”

Sir Amorous is Sir Amorous La Foole.

“I know it, lady,” Dauphine interrupted.

“— and mine together,” Mrs. Otter continued. “But it is for his honor, and therefore I take no credit for it other than of supplying the place for the feast.”

“You are a bounteous kinswoman,” Dauphine said.

“I am your servant, sir,” Mrs. Otter said.

She went further inside her house.

— 3.3 —

Clerimont and Jack Daw came forward and joined Dauphine.

Clerimont and Dauphine wanted to fool Jack Daw into thinking that Epicene loved him. Clerimont, Dauphine, and Truewit wanted to arrange events so that Jack Daw and La Foole would clash with each other.

“Why, don’t you know about it, Sir John Daw?” Clerimont asked.

“No, I am a rook — a fool — if I do,” Jack Daw said.

“I’ll tell you, then,” Clerimont said. “Epicene is married by this time! And whereas it was put in your head — that is, you were made to think — that she had gone with Sir Dauphine, I assure you that Sir Dauphine has been the noblest, honestest friend to you that ever a gentleman of your quality could boast of.”

The last few words can mean that a gentleman of your (low) quality is lucky to have a friend like Dauphine. Unfortunately for Jack Daw, Dauphine is a “friend.”

Clerimont continued, “He has revealed the whole plot and made your mistress so acknowledging and indeed so ashamed of her injury to you that she desires you to forgive her and to grace her wedding with your presence today. She is to be married to a man with a very good fortune, she says — his uncle, old Morose — and she willed me in private to tell you that she shall be able to do you more favors, and with more security now, than before.”

The favors could be sexual favors, and the security could be that if Epicene got pregnant, Morose would be acknowledged as the child’s father.

“Did she say so, indeed?” Jack Daw asked.

“Why, what do you think of me, Sir John!” Clerimont asked. “Ask Sir Dauphine.”

“No, I believe you,” Jack Daw replied.

He then asked Dauphine, “Good Sir Dauphine, did she desire me to forgive her?”

“I assure you, Sir John, she did,” Dauphine answered.

“Nay, then, I do with all my heart,” Jack Daw said, “and I’ll be jovial and cheerful.”

“Yes, because look, sir, this was the injury to you,” Clerimont said. “La Foole intended this feast to honor her bridal day, and made you the property — the tool, the means — to invite the Lady Collegiates and promise to bring her; and then at the time she should have appeared (as his friend) she would have given you the dor — she would have insulted you.

“Whereas now Sir Dauphine has brought her to a feeling of and sensitivity to it, with this kind of satisfaction, that you shall bring all the ladies to the place where she is and be very jovial; and there she will have a dinner, which shall be in your name, and so disappoint La Foole, to make you good again and (as it were) a saver in the main point and of your manhood.”

A saver is a gambler who does not make a profit but also does not suffer a loss.

The main point was for Jack Daw to get revenge on La Foole.

Of course, La Foole had done nothing wrong; all he had done was invite his friends and “friends” to a banquet that he was paying for. Clerimont and Dauphine — and Truewit — were arranging things to make Jack Daw and La Foole angry at each other.

The banquet’s purpose was to honor La Foole and his guests (his guests would honor him as host, and La Foole would honor his guests by inviting them and feeding them), not to honor Epicene’s bridal day. At this time, La Foole did not even know that Epicene was married. Clerimont, Dauphine, and Truewit were arranging things so that the banquet would take place at Morose’s house (and annoy him) and so that Jack Daw and La Foole would be angry at each other.

“As I am a knight, I honor her and forgive her heartily,” Jack Daw said.

“Set about it, then, immediately,” Clerimont said. “Truewit has gone before to meet the coaches and redirect them to Morose’s house and to acquaint you with so much if he should meet you. Join with him, and all is well.”

La Foole entered the room.

Clerimont said quietly to Jack Daw, “See, here comes your antagonist. Take no notice of him, but be very jovial.”

“Have the ladies come, Sir John Daw, and your mistress?”
La Foole asked.

Jack Daw’s mistress was Epicene.

Jack Daw exited.

La Foole then said, “Sir Dauphine! You are exceedingly welcome, and honest Master Clerimont.”

He then asked, “Where’s my cousin?”

His cousin was Mrs. Otter.

La Foole then asked, “Did you see any Lady Collegiates, gentlemen?”

Dauphine replied, “Lady Collegiates! Haven’t you heard, Sir Amorous, how you are abused and deceived?”

“How, sir!” La Foole asked.

“Will you speak so kindly to Sir John Daw, who has done you such an affront?” Clerimont asked.

“An affront in what, gentlemen?” La Foole asked. “Let me be a petitioner to you to know, I beg you.”

“Why, sir, Jack Daw’s mistress — Epicene — was married today to Sir Dauphine’s uncle, your cousin’s neighbor, and he has diverted all the ladies and all your company thither to frustrate your preparations and stick a disgrace upon you. He was here, just now, attempting to entice us away from you, too, but we told him his own character. We have told him the plain truth about himself, I think.”

“Has Sir John Daw wronged me so inhumanely?” Sir Amorous La Foole asked.

“He has done it, Sir Amorous, most maliciously and treacherously,” Dauphine answered, “but if you’ll be ruled by us and take our advice, you shall repay him, truly.”

“Good gentlemen!” La Foole said. “I’ll join in, believe it. How shall I repay him, I ask?”

Dauphine said, “By the Virgin Mary, sir, get your pheasants and your godwits and your best food, and serve it in silver dishes of your cousin’s immediately, and say nothing, but clap a clean towel about you, like a sewer” — the chief attendant of a feast, who supervised the seating of guests and the serving of the dishes — “and, bare-headed” — like a servant — “march before it with a good confidence (it is but over the way, nearby) and we’ll follow you, where you shall set the food on the table, and bid them welcome to it, which shall show it is yours and disgrace Jack Daw’s preparation utterly; and as for your cousin, whereas she should be troubled here at home with the care of making and giving welcome, she shall transfer all that labor thither and be a principal guest herself, sit ranked with the Lady College-honors, and be honored, and have her health drunk as often, with the male guests bare-headed with the doffing of hats to show respect to a lady being toasted, and as loud as the best of them.”

Both La Foole and Jack Daw would attempt to act as the host of the same feast. La Foole, of course, had the best claim to be host, as he was the one who was paying for the feast and had invited the guests. Clerimont, however, had told Jack Daw that the dinner Epicene would provide at Morose’s house would be in Jack Daw’s name.

“I’ll go tell her immediately,” La Foole said. “It shall be done, that’s resolved.”

He would tell his cousin, Mrs. Otter, that the place for the feast had been changed.

La Foole exited.

Clerimont said, "I thought he would not hear our plot out to the end before it would take his fancy."

Dauphine said, "Well, there are guests and food now; what shall we do for music?"

"The smell of the venison going through the street will invite one band of fiddlers or other," Clerimont said.

"I wish it would call the trumpeters thither," Dauphine said.

Trumpets would be louder than fiddles and would annoy Morose more.

"Indeed, there is hope of that; they have information about all feasts," Clerimont said. "There's good social harmony and conversation between them and the London cooks. It is twenty to one, but we have them."

Dauphine said, "It will be a most solemn day for my uncle, and an excellent fit of mirth for us."

"Solemn" means both "ceremonious" and "gloomy." Morose would have gone through the marriage ceremony, and he would be upset by the noise of the wedding banquet.

"Aye," Clerimont said, "if we can hold up the rivalry between La Foole and Jack Daw, and never bring them to declare their grievances and demand explanations."

A few minutes' conversation between La Foole and Jack Daw would clear up their disagreement and reveal the machinations of Truewit, Clerimont, and Dauphine.

"Tut," Dauphine said. "Flatter them both (as Truewit says) and you may take their understandings in a purse-net."

Purse-nets were net-bags used to catch rabbits.

Dauphine continued, “They’ll believe themselves to be just such men as we make them, neither more nor less. They have nothing, not even the use of their senses, but by tradition.”

In other words, they cannot think for themselves, but know only what has been handed down to them and what they have been told.

La Foole returned, outfitted like a sewer with a towel over his arm.

“Look!” Clerimont said quietly to Dauphine. “Sir Amorous has his towel on already.”

He then asked La Foole, “Have you persuaded your cousin?”

“Yes,” La Foole answered. “It is very feasible; she’ll do anything, she says, rather than allow the La Fooles to be disgraced.”

Dauphine said, “She — Mrs. Otter — is a noble kinswoman. It will be such a crushing device — like a pestle — Sir Amorous! It will pound all your enemy’s plots to powder and blow him up with his own explosives and his own line of gunpowder.”

“We’ll give fire, I promise you,” La Foole said.

Clerimont advised, “But you must manage it privately, without any noise, and take no notice by any means —”

Mr. Otter entered the room and said, “Gentlemen, my princess says you shall have all her silver dishes, festinate” — quickly — “and she’s gone to alter her attire a little and go with you —”

“And you yourself, too, Captain Otter,” Clerimont said.

“By all means, sir,” Dauphine said.

“Yes, sir, I do intend it,” Mr. Otter said. “But I would entreat my cousin Sir Amorous, and you, gentlemen, to be petitioners to my princess to allow me to carry my bull and my bear, as well as my horse, to the feast.”

“That you shall do, Captain Otter,” Clerimont said.

“My cousin will never consent, gentlemen,” La Foole said.

“She must consent, Sir Amorous, to reason,” Dauphine said.

“Why, she says they are not decorum — they are unseemly — among ladies,” La Foole said.

Mr. Otter said, “But they are decora — beautiful — and that’s better, sir.”

“Aye, she must hear our argument,” Clerimont said. “Didn’t Pasiphaë, who was a queen, love a bull? And wasn’t Callisto, the mother of Arcas, turned into a bear and made a star, Mistress Ursula, in the heavens?”

Pasiphaë’s husband, King Minos of Crete, refused to sacrifice a bull to the gods, so they made Pasiphaë fall in love with a bull. Their offspring was the Minotaur, which had the head of a bull and the body of a man.

Jupiter had a son named Arcas with the mortal woman Callisto. Juno, Jupiter’s jealous wife, changed Callisto into a bear. After Callisto died, Jupiter made her a constellation: the Big Bear, or Ursa Major. Ursula is a diminutive of “Ursa.”

Mr. Otter said, “Oh, God, that I could have said as much! I will have these stories painted in the Bear Garden, ex Ovidii Metamorphosi.”

Ex Ovidii Metamorphosi means “out of Ovid’s Metamorphoses.”

The Roman poet Ovid's Metamorphoses contains many stories of mythic transformations, including that of Callisto (II.401-507).

The story of Pasiphaë, who was not transformed, appears in Ovid's Ars Amatoris (I.295-326).

“Where is your princess, Captain?” Dauphine asked. “Please be our leader.”

“That I shall, sir,” Mr. Otter said.

“Make haste, good Sir Amorous,” Clerimont said to La Foole.

They exited.

— 3.4 —

In Morose's house, the wedding had just been performed. Present were Morose, Epicene, the parson, and Cutbeard the barber.

Morose gave the parson a gratuity and said, “Sir, there's an angel for yourself, and a pair of angels for your cold.”

An angel is a gold coin.

Morose added, “Don't wonder at my management of my bounty. It is fit we should thank Fortune, and thank double — twice as much — to Nature, for any benefit she confers upon us. Besides, your cold is your imperfection, but my solace.”

The parson's cold made him unable to speak loudly.

The parson hoarsely and quietly said, “I thank Your Worship. Because of your gratuity, my cold is now my solace, too.”

“What did he say, Cutbeard?” Morose asked.

Cutbeard answered, “He says, praesto, sir — at your service, sir. Whensoever Your Worship needs him, he can be ready with the like. He got this cold from sitting up late and singing rounds — songs — with cloth-workers who customarily sing part-songs as they work.”

“Say no more,” Morose said. “I thank him.”

“May God keep Your Worship, and give you much joy with your fair spouse,” the parson said.

He coughed.

“Oh, oh!” Morose said. “Wait, Cutbeard! Let him give me five shillings of my money back. As it is bounty to reward benefits, so is it equity to give fines for injuries. I will have it.”

Because of the parson’s coughing, Morose wanted part of the gratuity back.

Cutbeard and the Parson talked quietly.

Morose asked, “What does he say?”

“He cannot get change for an angel, sir,” Cutbeard said.

“It must be changed,” Morose said.

Cutbeard whispered to the parson, “Cough again.”

Morose asked, “What does he say?”

“He will cough out the rest, sir,” Cutbeard said.

The parson coughed.

“Away, away with him,” Morose said, upset by the noise. “Stop his mouth! Away; I forgive it. Let him keep the five shillings.”

Cutbeard and the parson exited.

Epicene said, not in a whisper, “Bah, Master Morose, that you will treat a man of the church with this violence!”

“What?” Morose said, astonished that Epicene was not whispering.

Epicene said, “It does not become your gravity or dignity or breeding (as you claim to have in court) to have offered this outrage on a waterman, or any more boisterous creature, much less on a man of his civil coat and sober profession.”

Watermen were notorious for loudly shouting their availability for work.

The parson’s civil coat was the black coat worn by ministers.

“You can speak, then!” Morose said.

“Yes, sir,” Epicene said.

“Speak out, I mean,” Morose said.

Speaking out meant speaking in a regular or loud voice and expressing her opinions.

“Aye, sir,” Epicene said. “Why, did you think you had married a statue, or a puppet only? One of the French puppets — marionettes — with the eyes turned with a wire? Or some innocent half-wit out of the Bedlam hospital or some innocent child from Christ’s Hospital, who would stand with her hands thus” — she demurely crossed her hands in front of her and let them hang down — “and a plaice-mouth, and look upon you?”

A plaice is a fish with a small, puckered mouth.

“Oh, immodesty!” Morose said. “A manifest woman!”

“A manifest woman” means “You are manifestly a woman!” Morose, however, was using the word structure of “A manifest villain!”

Morose called, “What, Cutbeard!”

“Nay, never quarrel with Cutbeard, sir,” Epicene said. “It is too late now. I confess that my speaking somewhat lessens the modesty I had when I styled myself as simply a maiden; but I hope I shall make my speaking a stock — an asset — always suitable to the status and dignity of your wife.”

“She can talk!” Morose said.

“Yes, indeed, sir,” Epicene said.

Morose called for help: “What, sirrah!”

He then called, more softly, “None of my knaves — servants — are there?”

His mute servant entered the room.

Morose asked him, “Where is this impostor Cutbeard?”

The mute servant shrugged or made motions that Cutbeard had gone out.

Epicene said to him, “Speak to him, fellow, speak to him. I’ll have none of this compulsory, unnatural dumbness in my house, in a household where I govern.”

The mute servant exited.

“She is my regent — my ruler — already!” Morose complained. “I have married a Penthesilea, a Semiramis. I have sold my liberty to a distaff!”

Penthesilea was a Queen of the Amazons; she died fighting for Troy in the Trojan War. Achilles killed her.

Semiramis was an Assyrian warrior-queen. After her husband died, she governed while dressed in men’s clothing and pretending to be her son.

A distaff is used in making thread. This was regarded as women's work, and so Morose's "distaff" is a woman. A distaff also makes noise during use.

In this society, a sword is the insignia for a man, and a distaff is the insignia for a woman.

— 3.5 —

Truewit entered the room and asked, "Where's Master Morose?"

Recognizing Truewit as the obnoxious man who had advised him against marriage, Morose said, "Has he come again? May the Lord have mercy upon me!"

"I wish you all joy, Mistress Epicene, with your grave and honorable marriage match," Truewit said.

Epicene said, "I return you the thanks, Master Truewit, so friendly a wish deserves."

"She has acquaintances, too!" Morose said.

Acquaintances and friends meant possible visitors, and visitors meant noise.

"May God save you, sir, and give you all contentment in your fair choice here," Truewit said. "Before, I was the bird of night to you, the owl, but now I am the messenger of peace, a dove, and I bring you the glad wishes of many friends, to the celebration of this good hour."

An owl is a bearer of bad omens. Previously, Truewit had warned Morose of the dangers of marriage.

"What hour, sir?" Morose asked.

"Your marriage hour, sir," Truewit answered. "I commend your resolution that — notwithstanding all the dangers I laid before you and warned you about, in the voice of a night-crow — would yet go on and be yourself. It shows you are a man constant to your own ends, and upright to your purposes — you who would not be put off with left-handed cries.”

The Latin word for “left” is “sinister.” A left-handed man could hold up his right hand in a show of peace and stab you with his left hand. In the ancient world, Greek and Roman soothsayers regarded a bird cry on the left as an ominous sign.

Morose had ignored Truewit’s warnings and had gotten married anyway, showing that he was his own man.

“How did you arrive at the knowledge of so much?” Morose asked. “How do you know my business?”

Truewit answered, “Why, did you ever hope, sir, committing the secrecy of your marriage to a barber, that less than the whole town should know it?”

Barbers are notorious talkers. When King Midas of Phrygia judged a music contest between the gods Pan and Apollo, he gave first place to Pan. Angry, Apollo turned Midas’s ears into the ears of an ass. Midas kept his ears covered, and no one knew his secret except his barber. Unable to tell any human about Midas’ secret, the barber whispered the secret into a hole in the ground. Rushes grew there, and when the wind blew through the rushes, the rushes made sounds that revealed Midas’ secret. Soon, everyone knew the secret.

Truewit continued, “You might as well have told it to the conduit or the bake-house, or the infantry who follow the court, and with more security.”

People got water from a public conduit, aka water-pipe. It was a meeting place for people to talk together. So was a bakehouse. The “infantry” consisted of the blackguards or most menial servants who followed all the other people as the king traveled. They were bearers of gossip about those whom they served.

Truewit continued, “Could your gravity forget so old and noted a scrap of quotation as lippis et tonsoribus notum?”

The scrap of quotation came from Horace’s Satires I.vii.3 and meant “known to the bleary-eyed and the barbers.” Barbers are talkers and full of gossip, but bleary-eyed people are not, so if the bleary-eyed people know a piece of gossip, everyone knows it. Bleary-eyed people tend to stay quietly at home. (In Horace, the bleary-eyed people frequent apothecary shops and hear gossip there.)

Truewit continued, “Well, sir, forgive the fault yourself now, and be communicable and affable with your friends.”

The fault was Morose’s confiding his business to a barber.

Truewit continued, “Here will be three or four fashionable Lady Collegiates to visit you presently, and their train of minions and followers.”

Wishing to keep such unwelcome guests out of his house, Morose shouted, “Bar my doors! Bar my doors! Where are all my eaters, my mouths now?”

Servants had a reputation for always being hungry.

Some servants entered the room.

Morose shouted, “Bar up my doors, you varlets!”

Epicene said, “Anyone who bars the doors is a varlet. Let them stand open. I dare any of you to move his eyes toward the doors. Shall I have a barricado — a barricade — made against my friends, to be barred of any pleasure they can bring in to me with honorable visitation?”

The servants exited. They did not bar the doors.

“Oh, Amazonian impudence and shamelessness!” Morose said.

“Nay, indeed, in this, sir, she speaks only reason, and I think she is more continent and self-restrained than you,” Truewit said.

He knew that Morose did not want to hear the noise of his soon-to-arrive visitors, but he pretended that Morose wanted to go to bed with Epicene immediately and so was ordering his doors to be barred.

Truewit continued, “Would you go to bed so quickly, sir, before noon? A man of your head and hair — your judgment and character — should owe more to that reverend ceremony, and not mount the marriage bed like a lecherous town bull or a lecherous mountain goat, but wait for the due season and ascend it then with religion and piety and with awe of and reverence for marriage.”

Villagers collectively owned a bull that bred all their cows.

Truewit continued, “Those delights are to be steeped in the humor and silence of the night, and give the day to other open pleasures and jollities of feast, of music, of revels, and of discourse. We’ll have all, sir, that may make your wedding day dignified and happy.”

“Oh, my torment! My torment!” Morose said.

Truewit responded, “Nay, if you endure the first half hour of marriage, sir, so irritatively, and with this irksomeness, what comfort or hope can this fair gentlewoman — Epicene — imagine to be hers hereafter, in the consideration of so many years as are to come —”

Morose interrupted, “— of my affliction. Good sir, depart, and let her do it — afflict me — alone.”

“I have finished speaking, sir,” Truewit said.

“That cursed barber!” Morose said.

“Yes, in faith, he is a cursed wretch, indeed, sir,” Truewit said.

“I have married his cittern that’s common to all men,” Morose said.

A cittern is a musical instrument often found in barbershops of the time. Customers could play the cittern to amuse themselves.

Morose was calling his new wife a common-to-all slut.

He continued, “Some plague above the plague —”

Truewit interrupted, “— all Egypt’s ten plagues —”

In Exodus 7-12 God sent ten plagues against Pharaoh for not allowing the Jews to leave Egypt: (water turning to) blood, frogs, lice, flies, pestilence of livestock, boils, hail and fire, locusts, darkness for three days, and the death of firstborn children.

Morose interrupted, “— revenge me on him!”

“It is very well, sir,” Truewit said. “If you laid on a curse or two more, I’ll assure you he’ll bear them. For example, that he may get the pox while seeking to cure it, sir?”

Barbers treated the pox: syphilis.

Truewit continued, “Or, that while he is curling another man’s hair, his own hair may drop off?”

Hair loss was a symptom of syphilis.

Truewit continued, “Or, for burning some male bawd’s love-lock, he may have his brain beat out with the curling iron?”

“No, let the wretch live wretched,” Morose said. “May he get the itch — scabies — and let his barbershop become so filled with lice that no man will dare to come to him, nor he dare to come to no man!”

“Aye,” Truewit said, “and if he would swallow all his balls of soap for pills, let not them purge him.”

“Let his warming pan be forever cold!” Morose said.

“May a perpetual frost be underneath it, sir,” Truewit said.

In the Great Frost of 1608, the Thames River was frozen for six weeks.

“Let him never hope to see fire again!” Morose said.

“Except in hell, sir,” Truewit said.

“Let his barber chairs be always empty, his scissors rust, and his combs mold in their cases!” Morose said.

“Very dreadful, that!” Truewit said. “And may he lose the skill, sir, of carving lanterns in paper.”

Barbers made lanterns out of oiled paper to sell.

“Let there be no bawd carted that year to employ a basin of his, but let him be glad to eat his barber’s sponge for bread!” Morose said.

When bawds or prostitutes were publicly carted through the streets, barbers hired out basins for onlookers to beat as they followed the cart and jeered at the bawd or prostitute.

“And let him drink lotium — stale urine — to go with it, and much good may it do him,” Truewit said.

Lotium was used by barbers as a hair dressing.

“Or, for lack of bread —” Morose began.

Truewit interrupted, “— let him eat ear-wax, sir. I’ll help you to curse. Or, let him pull his own teeth and add them to the lute-string.”

Barbers cleaned out ear-wax, and they pulled teeth. Pulled teeth were hung on a string and displayed in the shop.

Morose said, “No, let him beat the old ones to powder and make bread of them.”

Truewit said, “Yes, let him make meal out of millstones.”

Millstones are grinders. So are molars.

“May all the boils and burns that he has cured on others break out upon him!” Morose said.

“And may he now forget the cure of them in himself, sir, or, if he does remember the cure, let him have scraped all his linen into lint for the cure, and not have a rag left to him to use to set up business with,” Truewit said.

Lint was used to dress wounds.

“Let him never set up hair again, but have the gout in his hands forever!” Morose said.

He had finished cursing Cutbeard the barber, so he said, “Now, no more, sir.”

Truewit was not ready to finish cursing Cutbeard.

He said, “Oh, that last insult was too highly set! You went too far. You might go less with him, indeed, and be revenged enough; as, for example, that he be never able to new-paint his pole —”

The pole could be his red and white barber pole, but a second meaning is that the barber never again get his pole — his penis — wet.

“Good sir, no more,” Morose said. “I forgot myself.”

Truewit continued cursing the barber: “Or, that he lack the credit to get goods from a comb-maker —”

“No more, sir,” Morose said.

Truewit continued cursing the barber: “Or, that, having broken his mirror in a former despair, he fall now into a much greater despair of ever getting another —”

“I beseech you, no more,” Morose said.

Truewit continued cursing the barber: “Or, that he never be trusted with the trimming of any but chimney sweepers —”

Chimney-sweepers (and colliers, aka coal sellers) were the least desirable customers because they were the dirtiest.

Morose began, “Sir —”

Truewit continued cursing the barber: “Or, that he may cut a collier’s throat with his razor, without evil intent, and yet hang for it!”

Morose said, “I will forgive him rather than hear any more. I ask you to stop, sir.”

In this matter, Morose was kinder than Truewit.

— 3.6 —

Jack Daw entered the room, leading Madam Haughty, Madam Centaur, and Mistress Dol Mavis, all of whom were Lady Collegiates). He also led Mistress Trusty, the Lady Haughty’s serving-woman. “Madam” is a title of higher rank than “Mistress.”

“This way, madam,” Jack Daw said to Madam Haughty.

Following the order of precedence, the madams would enter the room before the mistresses.

“Oh, the sea breaks in upon me!” Morose said. “Another flood!”

The first flood occurred in Genesis and featured Noah and the ark.

Morose continued, “An inundation! I shall be overwhelmed with noise. It beats already at my shores. I feel an earthquake in myself for it.”

Jack Daw kissed Epicene and said, “May God give you joy, mistress.”

“Has she servants, too?” Morose asked.

Yes, Epicene had male devotees.

Jack Daw said to Epicene, “I have brought some ladies here to see and know you.”

Epicene kissed the ladies one by one as he presented them to her in order of precedence:

“This is Lady Haughty.

“This is my Lady Centaur.

“This is Mistress Doll Mavis.

“This is Mistress Trusty, my Lady Haughty’s serving-woman.”

Jack Daw next asked, “Where’s your husband? Let’s see him. Can he endure no noise? Let me come to him.”

“What nomenclator is this?” Morose said.

Nomenclator means the announcing of names; Morose pronounced the last two syllables as “clatter.”

Truewit said, “This is Sir John Daw, sir, your wife’s servant.”

This kind of servant is a male admirer.

“A Daw, and her servant!” Morose said. “Oh, it is decreed, it is decreed of me — judgment has been passed on me — if she has such servants.”

A jackdaw is a foolish bird, and so the word “daw” was used for “fool.”

Morose attempted to leave, but Truewit stopped him and said, “Nay, sir, you must kiss the ladies; you must not go away now. They come toward you to seek you out.”

Madam Haughty said, “Indeed, Master Morose, would you steal a marriage and be married secretly thus, in the midst of so many friends, and not tell us? Well, I’ll kiss you, notwithstanding the justice of my quarrel.”

She then said to Epicene, “You shall give me leave, mistress, to use a becoming familiarity with your husband.”

She kissed Morose.

Normally, a male guest would ask the husband for permission to kiss the bride. Here, Madam Haughty was inverting the traditional roles of male and female in this society.

Epicene said, “Your Ladyship does me an honor in it, to let me know he is so worthy of your favor, as you have done both him and me grace to visit a pair of people so unprepared to entertain you.”

“Compliment! Compliment!” Morose said.

Epicene was using courtly language and compliments.

She continued, “But I must lay the burden of that upon my servant here.”

Jack Daw would help entertain the guests.

“Burden” has a sexual meaning in Epicene’s sentence. “Burden” can mean the weight of the top partner in sex. The sentence’s sexual meaning can be interpreted as Epicene was going to sexually get on top of her servant: Jack Daw.

“It shall not be necessary, Mistress Morose,” Madam Haughty said. “We will all bear, rather than one shall be oppressed.”

“I know it,” Morose said, “and you will teach her the faculty if she needs to learn it.”

Morose was taking her words in a sexual sense. One meaning of “to bear” is to bear a man’s weight in the missionary position. One meaning of “oppressed” is to be ravished. He was saying that Madam Haughty would teach Epicene how to bear a man’s weight in bed, unless Epicene had already learned it.

“We will all bear” can also mean “We will all bare our bodies.”

Morose stood to the side, and the ladies talked together out of his hearing.

“Is this the silent woman?” Madam Haughty asked.

Madam Centaur replied, “Nay, she has found her tongue since she was married, Master Truewit says.”

Truewit joined the ladies.

“Oh, Master Truewit!” Lady Haughty said. “May God save you. What kind of creature is your bride here? She speaks, I think.”

Truewit replied, “Yes, madam, believe it. She is a gentlewoman of very perfect behavior and of a good family.”

“And Jack Daw told us she could not speak,” Madam Haughty said.

“So it was pretended in a plot, Madam, in order to put her upon this old fellow, by Sir Dauphine, his nephew, and one or two more of us,” Truewit said, “but she is a woman of an excellent self-confidence and an extraordinarily felicitous wit and tongue. You shall see her make rare sport at the expense of Jack Daw before night.”

“And he brought us here to laugh at her!” Madam Haughty said.

“It often falls out, madam, that he who thinks himself the master wit is the master fool,” Truewit said.

Certainly Truewit, Clerimont, and Dauphine behaved sometimes unethically, if not foolishly. Is it foolish to behave unethically?

He continued, “I assure Your Ladyship, you cannot laugh at her.”

But they could laugh with her.

Lady Haughty said, “No, we won’t laugh at her. We’ll have her to the College. If she has wit, she shall be one of us.”

She then said to Madam Centaur, “Won’t she, Centaur? We’ll make her a Collegiate.”

“Yes, indeed, madam, and Mavis and she will set up a partnership,” Madam Centaur said.

“Believe it, madam,” Truewit said.

He added, “And Mistress Mavis, Epicene will sustain her part. She will be a good partner.”

Madam Mavis replied, “I’ll tell you that after I have talked with her and tested her.”

“Treat her very civilly, Mavis,” Madam Haughty said.

“So I will, madam,” Madam Mavis said.

She then walked aside with Epicene.

Morose said to himself, still not hearing their conversation, “This is a blessed minute. I wish that they would whisper like this forever!”

Truewit said to Madam Haughty, “In the meantime, madam, I wish that Your Ladyship would help to vex Morose a little. You know his disease.”

Morose’s disease was an excessive sensitivity to noise.

Truewit continued, “Talk to him about the wedding ceremonies, or call for your gloves, or —”

“Leave it to me,” Madam Haughty said. “Centaur, help me.”

Madam Haughty called to Morose, “Master bridegroom, where are you?”

“Oh, their silence was too miraculously good to last!” Morose said to himself.

Madam Haughty said, “We see no signs of a wedding here, no mark of a bride-ale. Where are our scarves and our gloves?”

Scarves and gloves were traditional gifts given to wedding guests.

She continued, “Please, give them to us. Let’s know your bride’s color and your color, at least.”

The bride and groom chose separate colors, which their respective friends wore at the wedding and bride-ale.

“Alas, madam, he has provided none,” Madam Centaur said.

“Had I known Your Ladyship’s cosmetician, I would have,” Morose said.

That kind of color was makeup.

Madam Haughty said, “He has scored a point against you, Centaur, indeed. But do you hear, Master Morose, a jest will not absolve you in this manner. You have sucked the milk of the court and from thence have been brought up to the true solid foods and wine of it — you have been a courtier from the baby’s bonnet to the nightcap, as we may say. It’s shocking for you to offend in such a high point of ceremony as this, and let your nuptials lack all the marks of ceremoniousness! How much plate have you lost today (if you had but regarded your profit), what gifts, what friends, through your complete rusticity and boorishness!”

Plate is gold and silver utensils for the table: They are traditional wedding gifts.

Morose began, “Madam —”

Madam Haughty interrupted, “Pardon me, sir. I must insinuate your errors to you.”

“To insinuate” is “to suggest or hint,” but Madam Haughty did not suggest or hint but instead spoke straightforwardly.

“No gloves? No garters? No scarves? No epithalamium? No masque?” she said.

The bride’s garters were given away to the guests. Gloves and scarves were also given to the wedding guests.

A masque was an entertaining performance with dancing and acting by masked participants.

An epithalamium is a wedding song.

Jack Daw said, “Yes, madam, I’ll make — write — an epithalamium. I promised my mistress; I have begun it already. Will Your Ladyship hear it?”

“Aye, good Jack Daw,” Madam Haughty answered.

Unwilling to hear the epithalamium, Morose said to Madam Haughty, “Will it please Your Ladyship to command a chamber and be private with your friend? You shall have your choice of rooms to retire to with the hope of obtaining what you want: My whole house is yours. I know it” — that is, having an assignation — “has been Your Ladyship’s purpose in going into the city at other times; however, now you have been unhappily diverted upon me, but I shall be loath to break any honorable custom of Your Ladyship’s. And therefore, good madam —”

Epicene said, “Come, you are a rude bridegroom to entertain ladies of honor in this fashion.”

Madam Centaur agreed: “He is a rude groom, indeed.”

A groom can be a bridegroom or a servant.

Truewit also agreed: “By that light, you deserve to have a cuckold’s horns grafted onto your forehead and have your horns reach from one side of the island to the other.”

He then pretended to be joking: “Do not mistake me, sir. I speak this only to give the ladies some heart again, not for any malice to you.”

Morose gestured toward Truewit and said, “Ladies, is this your bravo — your hired bully?”

Truewit said, “So God help me, if you utter such another word, I’ll take your Mistress Bride further inside the house and drink your health in a way unpleasant to you. Do you see? Bah. Know your friends and such as love you.”

Truewit may have been threatening to cuckold Morose.

— 3.7 —

Clerimont entered the room, leading in a number of musicians.

“Excuse me, ladies,” Clerimont said. “Do you want any music? I have brought you a variety of noises.”

A noise is a band of musicians.

He then said to the musicians, “Play, sirs, all of you.”

Because the musicians were from different bands that played different kinds of music, the result was indeed a noise.

“Oh, a plot, a plot, a plot, a plot upon me!” Morose said. “This day I shall be their anvil to work on; they will grate — grind — me asunder. It is worse than the noise of a saw!”

Clerimont, pretending that Morose did not know that the noise was produced by the bows, aka bow-saws, used to play fiddles, said, “No, they are hair, resin, and guts. I can give you the formula for making them.”

Gut was used for strings, and horsehair was used for the bow-saw. Resin was rubbed on the bow-saw.

Truewit said to the musicians, “Peace, boys.”

The musicians stopped playing.

Clerimont said to the musicians, “Play, I say.”

The musicians began playing.

“Peace, rascals!” Truewit said.

The musicians stopped playing.

Truewit said to Morose, “You see who’s your friend now, sir? Take courage; put on a martyr’s resolution. Mock down all their attacks by means of patience. It is only for a day, and I would suffer heroically if I were in your place. Should an ass exceed me in fortitude? No. You betray your infirmity — your inordinate sensitivity to sound — with your hanging dull ears, and make them exult disdainfully. Bear up bravely and constantly and steadfastly.”

Morose may have been wearing a couple of nightcaps, as old men sometimes did in this society. The ends of the nightcaps could be hanging down like droopy ears.

La Foole walked into the room, followed by servants carrying food to the banqueting room. Dauphine and Mrs. Otter also arrived.

Truewit said to Morose, “Look here, sir, at what honor is unexpectedly done to you by your nephew, Dauphine. A wedding dinner has come, and a knight sewer — La Foole — before it, for the greater honor, and fine Mistress Otter, your neighbor, in the rump or tail of it.”

“Has that Gorgon, that Medusa, come?” Morose said. “Hide me! Hide me!”

Medusa is the most famous of the mythological Gorgons, the sight of whom could turn men into stone.

“I promise you, sir, that she will not transform you into stone,” Truewit said. “Look upon her with a good courage. Please receive her and conduct your guests in. No? You won’t?”

He then said to Epicene, “Mistress Bride, will you invite in the ladies? Your bridegroom is so bashful and shamefaced here —”

Epicene said to Madam Haughty, “Will it please Your Ladyship, madam?”

“With the benefit of your company, Mistress,” Madam Haughty replied.

Epicene said to Jack Daw, “Servant, please perform your duties.”

“I am glad to be commanded, Mistress,” Jack Daw replied.

Madam Centaur asked, “How do you like Epicene’s wit, Mavis?”

Mistress Mavis replied, “Very prettily, absolutely well.”

They were going to the banqueting hall, and Mistress Mavis was ahead of Mrs. Otter.

Mrs. Otter objected, “It is my place.”

The higher-ranking person would go first, and Mrs. Otter believed that she should precede Mistress Mavis.

Disagreeing about the order of precedence, Mistress Mavis said, “You shall pardon me, Mistress Otter.”

“Why, I am a Collegiate,” Mrs. Otter said.

“But not in ordinary,” Madam Mavis replied.

“In ordinary” means “full-time.”

“But I am,” Mrs. Otter said.

“We’ll dispute that within the banqueting hall,” Mistress Mavis said.

Jack Daw escorted the ladies into the banqueting hall.

“I wish that this had lasted a little longer!” Clerimont said.

“And that they had sent for the heralds!” Truewit said.

Heralds of the College of Heralds decided who had precedence over another person. Heralds-at-arms blew trumpets.

Mr. Otter entered the room, carrying his drinking cups.

Truewit asked, “Captain Otter, what is the news?”

“I have brought my bull, bear, and horse in private, and yonder are the trumpeters outside, and the drummer, gentlemen,” Mr. Otter said.

The drum and trumpets sounded.

“Oh! Oh! Oh!” Morose cried.

Mr. Otter continued, “And we will have a rouse — a deep drink — in each of them soon, for bold Britons, indeed.”

The drum and trumpets sounded again.

“Oh! Oh! Oh! “ Morose cried.

He exited.

The others cried, “Follow! Follow! Follow!”

This was a hunting cry.

ACT 4 (Epicene)

— 4.1 —

Truewit and Clerimont talked together, privately.

“Was there ever any poor bridegroom so tormented as Morose?” Truewit said. “Or any man so tormented, indeed?”

“I have not read of the like in the chronicles of the land,” Clerimont replied.

“Surely, he cannot but go to a place of rest after all this purgatory,” Truewit said.

In Purgatory, repentant sinners suffer to purge their sins, after which they go to Paradise. Truewit was joking that Morose was suffering so much on this day that after death he could skip Purgatory and go straight to Paradise.

“He may presume it, I think,” Clerimont said.

“The spitting, the coughing, the laughter, the sneezing, the farting, the dancing, the noise of the music, and Epicene’s masculine and loud commanding and directing the whole family of household servants make him think that by marrying Epicene he has married an avenging deity — a Fury,” Truewit said.

“And she carries it off splendidly,” Clerimont said.

“Aye, she takes any occasion to speak,” Truewit said. “That’s the best part of it.”

“And how soberly Dauphine labors to satisfy Morose that it was none of his plot, that he had nothing to do with it!” Clerimont said.

“And Dauphine has almost brought Morose to the faith in the article,” Clerimont said. “He has almost convinced him that it is true.”

Church of England ministers subscribed to 39 Articles of Faith.

“Here he comes,” Clerimont said.

Dauphine entered the room.

Clerimont then asked, “Where is Morose now? What’s become of him, Dauphine?”

Dauphine answered, “Oh, hold me up a little, or I shall die laughing. He has got on his whole nest of nightcaps and locked himself up in the top of the house, as high as ever he can climb to escape from the noise.”

The nightcaps fitted inside each other from smallest to largest, forming a “nest.”

Proverbs 21:9 states, “It is better to dwell in a corner of the house top, than with a contentious woman in a wide house” (1599 Geneva Bible).

Dauphine continued, “I peeped in at a cranny and saw him sitting over a crossbeam roof, like him of the saddler’s horse in Fleet Street, upright; and he will sleep there.”

Outside the saddler’s shop in Fleet Street was a sign or a model displaying a horse and rider.

“But where are your Collegiates?” Clerimont asked.

“Withdrawn with the bride in private,” Dauphine said.

“Oh, they are instructing her in the College grammar — its rules and practices,” Truewit said. “If Epicene has favor with them, she knows all their secrets instantly.”

Clerimont said, “I think the Lady Haughty looks well today, despite all my dispraise of her in the morning. I think I shall come around to your opinion and agree with you again, Truewit. I think I will believe that makeup and good clothing improve a woman's appearance."

"Believe it," Truewit said. "I told you right. Women ought to repair the losses that time and years have made in their features with personal decorations. And an intelligent woman, if she knows in herself the least defect, will be most careful to hide it, and it becomes her.

"If she is short, let her sit much, lest when she stands she should be thought to sit.

"If she has an ill foot, let her wear her gown the longer and her shoe the thinner.

"If she has a fat hand and scaly fingernails, let her less often carve the meat at the table and gesture only while wearing gloves.

"If she has a sour breath, let her never discourse fasting, and always talk while at a distance."

Truewit believed that talking on an empty stomach made bad breath more noticeable. Possibly, the smell of food on one's breath was more pleasing. Or possibly, the act of eating and chewing brushed one's teeth.

Truewit continued, "If she has black and rugged and uneven teeth, let her laugh less, especially if she laughs with her mouth wide and open."

Clerimont said, "Oh, some women, when they laugh, you would think they brayed like a donkey, it is so rude, and —"

Truewit interrupted, "— aye, and there are others who will stalk in their gait like an ostrich, and take huge strides. I cannot endure such a sight. I love the gracefulness of dance measures in the feet and I love musical rhythm in the voice; they are gentlenesses and elegances that often attract no less than the face.”

“How did you come to study these creatures so exactly?” Dauphine asked. “I wish you would make me proficient in that knowledge.”

Truewit replied, “Yes, but then you must cease to live in your chamber for an entire month reading the chivalric romances Amadis de Gaul or Don Quixote, as you are accustomed to do, and come abroad where the material for study is plentiful. You must go to court, to tiltings and jousts, to public shows and feasts, to plays, and to church sometimes; thither they come to show off their new attire, too, and thither they come to see and to be seen. In these places a man shall find whom to love, whom to play with, whom to touch once, whom to hold forever. The variety arrests his judgment.

“A wench to please a man does not come dropping down from the ceiling, as he lies on his back making a droning sound as he sucks a tobacco pipe. He must go to the places where she is.”

Musicians suck in air to play droning bagpipes.

Dauphine said, “Yes, and be never the nearer — no further ahead.”

“Bah, heretic!” Truewit said. “That lack of confidence makes you deserving of failure.”

“He says the truth to you, Dauphine,” Clerimont said.

“Why?” Dauphine asked.

“A man should not doubt that he will overcome any woman,” Truewit said. “If he thinks he can vanquish them, then he shall; for, although they refuse him, their desire is to be tempted. Penelope herself cannot hold out long.”

Despite what Truewit said, Penelope was a chaste woman who did hold out long. Her husband, Odysseus, went to fight in the Trojan War and did not return home until after twenty years had passed. Penelope remained faithful to Odysseus despite pressure to marry one of the young men who had taken over Odysseus' palace. In her famous weaving trick, she said that she would marry one of the suitors after she had finishing weaving a shroud for Odysseus' father. Each day, she wove the shroud, and each night she unwove the work she had done.

Truewit continued, "Ostend, as you know, was taken at last."

In 1604 the Spanish captured the city of Ostend in Belgium after a three-year siege.

Truewit continued, "You must persevere and hold to your purpose. They would solicit us, but that they are afraid. Howsoever, they wish in their hearts that we would solicit them."

In other words, women wait for men to make the first move.

Truewit continued, "Praise them, flatter them; you shall never lack eloquence or trust. Even the chastest women delight to feel themselves that way rubbed."

Flattery's "rubbing" can result in sexual titillation.

Truewit continued, "With praises you must mix kisses, too. If they take kisses, they'll take more. If they kiss, they'll do more than kiss. Though they resist, they want to be overcome."

"Oh, but a man must beware of force," Clerimont said.

He was against rape.

Truewit said, "It is to them an acceptable violence, and often has the place of the greatest courtesy. She who might have been forced, if you let her go free without touching her, although she then seems to thank you, will forever after hate you, and although she is glad in the face, she is assuredly sad at the heart.”

Truewit was in favor of date rape.

“But all women are not to be taken all ways,” Clerimont said.

He knew that women are different; they are not all the same.

“That is true, no more than all birds or all fishes,” Truewit said. “If you appear learned to an ignorant wench, or jocund to a sad wench, or witty to a foolish wench, why, she immediately begins to mistrust herself. You must approach them in their own height, their own line — you have to meet them at their own level and have the right bait to snare them — for the contrary makes many who fear to commit themselves to noble and worthy fellows run into the embraces of a rascal.

“If she loves wit, give her verses, though you borrow them from a friend or buy them to have good verses.”

Some of Truewit’s wit was borrowed. Much of what he had to say about women here comes from Ovid’s Ars Amatoria. Ars Amatoria is The Art of Love. Some readers consider it a seduction manual.

Truewit continued:

“If she loves valor, talk about your sword and be frequent in the mention of quarrels, though you are cautious in fighting.

“If she loves activity and exercise, be seen on your Barbary horse often, or leaping over stools to demonstrate the physical fitness of your back.”

A strong back was a mark of a strong lover.

Truewit continued:

“If she loves good clothes or hairdressing, have your learned council about you every morning: your French tailor, barber, linener, etc. Let your powder, your mirror, and your comb be your dearest acquaintance. Take more care for the ornament of your head than the safety of your head, and wish that the commonwealth be troubled rather than that a hair about you be troubled. That will take — capture — her.

“Then, if she is covetous and craving, promise her anything and perform it sparingly; so shall you always keep her in appetite. Seem as if you would give, but be like a barren field that yields little, or be like unlucky dice are to foolish and hoping gamesters. Let your gifts be slight and dainty rather than precious. Let your cunning and ingenuity be greater than your expense. Give cherries when they are in season, or apricots, and say they were sent to you from the country, though you bought them in a market in nearby Cheapside.

“Admire her clothing and hats; like her in all fashions; compare her in every outfit to some deity; invent excellent dreams to flatter her, and riddles.

“Or, if she is of high rank, perform always the supporting parts to her: like what she likes, praise whom she praises, and do not fail to make the household servants your supporters, yea, all the dependents in the household, and salute them by their names — it is only a light cost if you can purchase them so easily. Make her physician your pensioner — bribe him to get him on your side — and bribe her chief serving-woman, too.

“Nor will it be outside of your interests to make love to the serving-woman, too, so long as she follows, not ushers in, her lady’s pleasure. Always make love to the lady first. All blabbing is taken away when the serving-woman comes to be a part of the crime.”

Dauphine asked, "On what courtly lap have you recently slept, to come forth as so sudden and absolute a courtling?"

A courtling is a little courtier.

Dauphine may not have liked what he was hearing.

Truewit replied, "In good faith, I should rather question you who are so hearkening after these mysteries. I begin to suspect your diligence, Dauphine.

"Speak, are you in love in earnest?"

"Yes, by my faith I am," Dauphine said. "It would be wrong to lie to you."

"With which of them, I ask you?" Truewit said.

"With all the Collegiates," Dauphine answered.

"Come on!" Clerimont said. "We'll keep you at home, believe it, in the stable, if you should be such a stallion — such a stud."

"No," Truewit said. "I like him well. Men should love wisely, and men should love all women.

"Men should love a certain one for her face, and let her please the eye; love another for her skin, and let her please the touch; love a third for her voice, and let her please the ear; and where the objects mix, let the senses also mix, too."

He then said, "You would think it strange if I would make them all in love with you before night!"

Dauphine said, "I would say that you had the best philter — love potion — in the world, and could do more than Madam Medea or Doctor Forman."

Medea was a witch who helped Jason (of Argonauts fame) win the Golden Fleece. She then married Jason. He later fell out of love with her, and she killed their children.

Doctor Simon Forman was a quack who dealt in love potions.

Truewit said, “If I don’t make all the Collegiates love you, let me play the mountebank — itinerant quack and charlatan — for my meat while I live, and let me play the bawd for my drink.”

“So be it, I say,” Dauphine said.

— 4.2 —

Mr. Otter, who was still holding his drinking cups, Jack Daw, and La Foole entered the room. So did some musicians.

“Oh, Lord, gentlemen, how my knights and I have missed you here!” Mr. Otter said.

The knights were Sir Jack Daw and Sir La Foole.

“Why, Captain, what service?” Clerimont asked. “What service?”

This meant: How can I serve you?

“By seeing me bring up my bull, bear, and horse to fight,” Mr. Otter said.

Clerimont could serve him by being the audience for a drinking competition.

Jack Daw said, “Yes, indeed, the captain says we shall be his dogs to bait them.”

The three men — Mr. Otter, Jack Daw, and La Foole — would attack the bear-cup, bull-cup, and horse-cup by drinking from them.

“That is a good employment of them,” Dauphine said.

“Come on, let’s see a course, then,” Truewit said.

“A course” is 1) a drinking round, and 2) a bout between the dogs and a tormented animal.

“I am afraid my cousin will be offended by the drinking if she comes here,” La Foole said.

His cousin was Mrs. Otter.

“Be afraid of nothing,” Mr. Otter said to him.

He then said, “Gentlemen, I have placed the drum and the trumpets, and one to give them the sign when you are ready.”

The musicians prepared to play. Mr. Otter produced his cups and distributed them.

“Here’s my bull for myself, and my bear for Sir John Daw, and my horse for Sir Amorous La Foole,” he said. “Now, set your foot to mine and yours to his, and —”

Mr. Otter was telling the others — Jack Daw and La Foole — to set their feet in the proper position along with him — toe to toe to toe — for a drinking competition.

“I pray to God that my cousin doesn’t come here!” La Foole said.

“Saint George and Saint Andrew!” Mr. Otter said. “Fear no cousins.”

He was playing with words: “Fear no colors” means “Fear no foe.”

Saint George and Saint Andrew are the patron saints of England and of Scotland, respectively. Reigning over the countries was one man: King James I of England, who was also King James VI of Scotland.

Mr. Otter then said to the musicians, “Come, sound, sound. Et rauco strepuerunt cornua cantu.”

The Latin is a quotation from Virgil (Aeneid 8.2) and means “And the trumpets sounded with harsh note.”

The drum and trumpets sounded, and the three competitors drank. Mr. Otter drank from the bull drinking cup, Jack Daw from the bear drinking cup, and La Foole from the horse drinking cup.

“Well done, Captain Otter, indeed!” Truewit said. “Well fought at the bull!”

Clerimont said to Jack Daw, “Well held at the bear!”

“’loo, ’loo, Captain,” Truewit said.

“Halloo” was a cry urging the dogs to attack.

“Oh, the horse has kicked off his dog already,” Dauphine said.

The “fight” consisted of drinking. La Foole had stopped “fighting” quicker than the others. The horse-cup had kicked him off.

“I cannot drink it, as I am a knight,” La Foole said.

“Godso, off with his spurs, somebody,” Truewit said.

He was joking that La Foole ought to lose his knighthood for so poor an effort in this battle of drinkers.

“Godso” is a curse word based on the Italian cazzo (penis) and mimicking other oaths that used the word “God’s.”

“It goes against my conscience,” La Foole said. “My cousin Mrs. Otter will be angry with all the drinking.”

Jack Daw finished his cup and said, “I have done mine.”

“You fought high and fair, Sir John,” Truewit said.

“At the head,” Clerimont said.

“Like an excellent bear-dog,” Dauphine said.

An excellent bear-dog would attack the bear’s head.

Clerimont said quietly to Jack Daw, “You take no notice of the business, I hope.”

The business was the rivalry of Jack Daw and La Foole.

Jack Daw replied quietly, “Not a word, sir. You see we are jovial.”

“Sir Amorous, you must not equivocate,” Mr. Otter said. “You must not be ambiguous. It must be pulled down, for all ‘my cousin.’”

“It must be pulled down” meant, “All the drink must be drunk.” Also, a baited animal could be pulled down to the ground by dogs.

Clerimont said quietly to La Foole, “By God’s foot, if you don’t drink your drink, they’ll think you are discontented with something. You’ll betray all if you take the least notice.”

La Foole quietly replied, “Not I. I’ll both drink and talk, then.”

He drank.

“You must pull the horse onto his knees, Sir Amorous, by drinking deep,” Mr. Otter said. “Fear no cousins. Jacta est alea.”

The Latin means, “The die is cast.” Julius Caesar said this while crossing the Rubicon River against the orders of the Roman Senate. It metaphorically means, “We can’t go back now. We can only go forward.”

Truewit said quietly to Clerimont and Dauphine about Mr. Otter, “Oh, now he’s in his vein, and bold. The least hint given him of his wife now will make him rail against her recklessly.”

Clerimont whispered to Truewit, “Speak to him of her.”

Truewit whispered to Dauphine, “You speak to Mr. Otter, and I’ll fetch Mrs. Otter in to hear what he says about her.”

Truewit exited to get Mrs. Otter.

“Captain he-Otter, your she-Otter is coming, your wife,” Dauphine said, giving him fair warning.

“Wife! Bah! Titivilitium,” Mr. Otter said.

Titivilitium means, “A thing that is vile and of no value.” The word is used in Plautus’ comic play Casina, line 347.

Mr. Otter continued, “There’s no such thing in nature. I confess, gentlemen, I have a cook, a laundress, a house-drudge, all of whom serve my necessary turns and go under that title; but he’s an ass who will be so uxorious as to tie his affections to one circle.”

Mr. Otter’s image is of an ass driving a rotary mill by walking in a circle, but “circle” also means vagina.

“Uxorious” means being excessively fond of one’s wife.

Mr. Otter continued, “Come, the name — ‘wife’ — dulls the appetite. Here, replenish again. Let’s have another bout.”

The drinking cups were filled again.

Mr. Otter continued, “Wives are nasty, sluttish animals —”

“Oh, Captain!” Dauphine said.

Mr. Otter finished, “— as ever the earth bare, tribus verbis — in three words.”

He then asked, “Where’s Master Truewit?”

“He’s slipped aside, sir,” Jack Daw said.

“But you must drink and be jovial,” Clerimont said.

“Yes, give the drinking cup to me,” Jack Daw said.

“And me, too,” La Foole said.

“Let’s be jovial,” Jack Daw said.

“As jovial as you will,” La Foole said.

“Agreed,” Mr. Otter said.

Mr. Otter poured more drink, and then he gave Jack Daw and La Foole different drinking cups than he had before.

He said to La Foole, “Now you shall have the bear, cousin, and Sir John Daw shall have the horse, and I’ll have the bull still.”

He then said, “Sound, Tritons of the Thames! Nunc est bibendum, nunc pede libero —”

Tritons are mythological minor sea-gods who blew a shell-trumpet.

The Latin means, “Now is the time for drinking, now with free foot” (Horace, Odes, I.37.1). “Free foot” refers to dancing. This particular ode was about Cleopatra, who had a reputation as a man-destroyer.

The three men drank.

As the trumpets sounded, Morose spoke from the top of a staircase, “Villains, murderers, sons of the earth, and traitors, what are you doing there?”

“Sons of the earth” are bastards.

“Oh, now that the trumpets have awakened him, we shall have his company,” Clerimont said.

As was his custom when drunk, Mr. Otter complained about his wife: “A wife is a scurvy clogdogdo, an unlucky thing, a very foresaid bear whelp, without any good fashion or breeding: mala bestia — an evil beast.”

Chances are, a “clogdogdo” is Bear Garden slang meaning a bear cub. Newborn bears were thought to be without a defined shape; the mother-bear licked her whelp into shape.

“Clog-dog-do” could perhaps mean “shoe-dog-action,” referring to a dog that ought to either heel or be kicked.

Bear cubs need to be licked into shape, and dogs need to be trained. Mr. Otter apparently believed that wives need to be treated like bear cubs and dogs.

Truewit brought Mrs. Otter into the room. Mr. Otter did not notice her presence.

“Why did you marry one, then, Captain?” Dauphine asked.

“A pox!” Mr. Otter said. “I married six thousand pounds, I did. I was in love with that. I have not kissed my Fury these forty weeks.”

He had married for money, not love. Now his marriage had suffered bed-death.

“The more to blame you, Captain,” Clerimont said.

Truewit whispered to Mrs. Otter, who was about to interrupt her husband, “Nay, Mistress Otter, listen to him a little while first.”

Mr. Otter said, “She has a breath worse than my grandmother’s, profecto — truly.”

Mrs. Otter whispered to Truewit, “Oh, treacherous liar! Kiss me, sweet Master Truewit, and prove him a slandering knave.”

Mr. Truewit whispered back, “I’ll rather believe you, lady.”

He did not want to kiss her.

Mr. Otter continued, “And she has a peruke — a wig — that’s like a pound of hemp made up in shoe-laces.”

“Oh, viper, mandrake!” Mrs. Otter said to herself.

People in this society believed that vipers were born by eating their way out of their mother’s body. Vipers were symbols of treachery.

The root of the poisonous mandrake plant was thought to resemble the form of a human being.

Mr. Otter continued, “She has a very vile face, and yet she spends forty pounds a year in mercury and hog’s bones.”

These were ingredients used in making cosmetics.

Mr. Otter continued, “All her teeth were made in the Blackfriars, both her eyebrows were made in the Strand, and her hair was made in Silver Street. Every part of the town owns a piece of her.”

“Blackfriars” implied that her teeth were black, “the Strand” implied that her eyebrows consisted of strands, aka bristles, and “Silver Street” implied that her hair was grey.

“I cannot hold back!” Mrs. Otter said, but not loudly enough for her husband to hear her.

Mr. Otter continued, “She takes herself asunder always, when she goes to bed, into some twenty boxes, and about next day noon is put together again, like a great German clock; and so comes forth and rings a tedious alarum to the whole house, and then is quiet again for an hour, but for her quarters.”

Some women when they go to bed take off their wig, their false eyelashes, their teeth, and so on. An old joke is that at bedtime a husband looks around and can’t find his wife because there’s nothing left.

Jacobean playwrights regarded German clocks as needing a lot of upkeep to keep them in working condition. They were constantly breaking down.

The word “quarters” referred to Mrs. Otter’s quarter-hours and her living quarters and her farting hind-quarters.

Mr. Otter then asked the drinkers, “Have you done me right, gentlemen? Have you matched me drink for drink?”

Furious, Mrs. Otter beat him, saying, “No, sir, I’ll do you right with my quarters, with my quarters!”

Quarters are also blows in fencing.

“Oh, stop, good princess!” Mr. Otter said.

Truewit said to the musicians, “Sound! Sound!”

The drummer drummed and the trumpeters blew their trumpets.

“A battle! A battle!” Clerimont said.

Mrs. Otter said to her husband, “You notorious, stinkardly bear-ward! Does my breath smell?”

A bear-ward takes care of a bear.

“Under correction, dear princess,” Mr. Otter said.

He then said, “Look after my bear and my horse, gentlemen.”

“Do I lack teeth and eyebrows, you bull-dog?” Mrs. Otter asked.

Truewit said to the musicians, “Play! Play still!”

They played their instruments again.

Mr. Otter said, “No, I avow, under correction —”

Mrs. Otter interrupted, “Aye, now that you are under correction you avow no; but you did not avow no before correction, sir. You Judas, to offer to betray your princess! I’ll make you an example —”

Carrying a two-handed long sword, Morose descended the staircase and said, “I will have no such examples in my house, Lady Otter.”

“Ah —” Mrs. Otter began.

Morose interrupted, “Mistress Mary Ambree, your examples are dangerous.”

A ballad was sung about Mary Ambree’s dressing herself as a soldier so she could take part in the siege of Ghent in 1584 to avenge her lover after he died in the siege.

Mrs. Otter, Jack Daw, and La Foole exited rapidly. Jack Daw and La Foole dropped their drinking cups as they exited.

Morose continued, “Rogues, hellhounds, Stentors!”

Stentor was a mythological soldier whose voice was as loud as those of fifty men put together. In Book 5, lines 785-6 of Homer’s Iliad, Hera took his form and used his voice to encourage the Greek warriors to fight well in a battle of the Trojan War.

Morose continued, “Out of my doors, you sons of noise and tumult, begot on an ill May Day, or when the galley-foist is afloat to Westminster!”

In 1517, an especially violent riot occurred on May Day.

A galley-foist is a ceremonial armed escort to the state barge that each year took the new Lord Mayor of London to Westminster to be sworn into office. Drummers and trumpeters were part of the escort.

Morose continued, “A trumpeter could not be conceived but then!”

A trumpeter is a son of noise and so must be begotten during noisy events such as May Days and installations of mayors.

Morose drove out the musicians.

“What ails you, sir?” Dauphine asked.

Morose said, “They have rent my roof, walls, and all my windows asunder with their brazen throats.”

Joshua 6:1-27 tells how Joshua and his warriors conquered Jericho. Among other things, Joshua ordered seven priests to blow seven trumpets. The noise brought down the walls of Jericho.

Morose exited.

“You had best follow him, Dauphine,” Truewit said.

“So I will,” Dauphine replied.

He exited.

“Where’s Jack Daw and La Foole?” Clerimont asked.

Mr. Otter said, “They have both run away, sir.”

He then said, “Good gentlemen, help me to pacify my princess, and speak to the great ladies for me. Now I must go lie with the bears this fortnight, and keep out of her way until I make my peace with her, because of this offence she has taken.”

He looked around and asked, “Do you see my bullhead, gentlemen?”

The bullhead was the cover of one of the drinking cups.

He searched for his bullhead.

“Isn’t it on the cup, Captain?” Clerimont said.

Truewit said quietly to Clerimont, “No, but he may make a new one, by copying the one that is on his shoulders.”

He was joking that a copy of Mr. Otter’s head would make a good cover for the drinking cup. Presumably, Mr. Otter’s head would have the horns of a cuckold just as the bullhead-cover would have the horns of a bull. Chances are, he had a couple of bumps resembling growing horns on his head from his wife’s beating him.

Finding the bullhead, Mr. Otter said, “Oh, here it is.”

He then said, “If you come over the Thames River, gentlemen, and ask for Tom Otter, we’ll go down to Ratcliffe and have a round of drinking, indeed, despite all these disasters.”

Radcliffe was outside the jurisdiction of London, and so rogues who wanted to be outside the jurisdiction of London went there.

Mr. Otter continued, “There’s bona spes — good hope — left.”

Cicero's In Catalinum (Against Catiline) II.25 states that "well-founded hope [fights] against universal despair."

"Away, Captain!" Truewit said. "Get away while you are well."

Mr. Otter exited.

"I am glad we are rid of him," Clerimont said.

"You would never have been, unless we had put his wife upon him," Truewit said. "His character is as tedious at last as it was ridiculous at first."

— 4.3 —

Madam Haughty, Mrs. Otter, Mistress Mavis, Jack Daw, La Foole, Madam Centaur, and Epicene entered the room.

Truewit and Clerimont stood to the side, watching and listening.

Madam Haughty said, "We wondered why you shrieked so, Mistress Otter."

"Oh, God," Mrs. Otter said. "Madam, he came down with a huge long naked weapon in both his hands, and looked so dreadfully! Surely, he's beside himself."

Morose had been holding a long two-handed sword, although readers may be forgiven if they thought after reading Mrs. Otter's description that he had been holding a "weapon" of a different sort.

"Why, what were you doing there, Mistress Otter?" Madam Mavis asked.

"Alas, Mistress Mavis, I was chastising my subject — my husband — and thought nothing of him," Mrs. Otter said.

Jack Daw said to Epicene, “Indeed, mistress, you must do so, too. Learn to chastise. Mistress Otter corrects her husband with the result that he dares not speak but under correction.”

“And with his hat off to her,” La Foole said. “It would do you good to see.”

Lady Haughty said, “Seriously, it is good and mature counsel.”

She then said to Epicene, “Practice it, Morose. I’ll call you ‘Morose’ always now, just as I call my friends ‘Centaur’ and ‘Mavis.’ We four will be all one.”

“Morose” and “Centaur” and “Mavis” were how males were called in this society. The feminine form of address was “Mistress Morose” and “Madam Centaur” and “Mistress Mavis.”

Mistress Centaur said to Epicene, “And you’ll come to the College and live with us?”

The Lady Collegiates lived apart from their husbands.

Madam Haughty said to Epicene, “Make him give milk and honey.”

Milk and honey are found in the Promised Land. Metaphorically, they mean “what you want.”

Apparently, Madam Haughty was saying that Epicene must make Morose give her milk and honey if he wants to enter the “Promised Land.” Nudge, nudge. Wink, wink.

Mistress Mavis said, “Look how you manage him at first, for you shall have him like that ever after.”

“Manage” means “train.” The word “manage” was used when talking about the handling of horses. Mistress Mavis’ advice was for Epicene to begin training her husband early.

Madam Centaur advised, “Let him allow you your coach and four horses, your serving-woman, your chambermaid, your page, your gentleman-usher, your French cook, and four grooms.”

Madam Haughty advised, “And go with us to Bedlam, to the china houses, and to the Exchange.”

“It will open the gate to your fame,” Madam Centaur said.

Her language was ambiguous. The “gate” can be the vaginal opening, and “fame” can mean “reputation.”

Madam Haughty said, “Here is Centaur, who has immortalized herself with the taming of her wild male.”

“Aye, she has done the miracle of the kingdom,” Mistress Mavis said.

Epicene asked, “But ladies, do you count it lawful to have such plurality of servants — male admirers — and do them all graces?”

“Grace” means “favor.” The “graces” in this context can be sexual favors.

“Why not?” Madam Haughty asked. “Why should women deny their favors to men? Are women the poorer, or the worse, for it?”

Jack Daw asked, “Is the Thames less for the dyer’s water, mistress?”

“Or a torch, for lighting many torches?” La Foole asked.

“Water” can mean “semen,” “torch” can mean “penis,” and “burn” can mean “infected with venereal disease.”

A torch that lights many torches and makes them burn is a homosexual penis that infects with venereal disease many other homosexuals’ penises. To “light” can mean to infect with burning sores and/or to give urination a burning sensation.

“Well said, La Foole,” Truewit said.

He then said to himself, “What a new one — a new expression — he has got!”

La Foole did not realize the homosexual meaning of what he had said, but Truewit did.

Both La Foole and Jack Daw were making variations on a cliché. La Foole was making a variation on this cliché: “One candle can light many more.” Jack Daw was making a variation on this cliché: “To cast water into the Thames.”

“They are empty losses women fear in this kind,” Madam Centaur said.

In other words: When giving love, women lose nothing, and so they ought not to fear giving love.

“Besides, ladies should be mindful of the approach of age, and let no time lack its due use,” Madam Haughty said. “The best of our days pass first.”

“We are rivers that cannot be called back, Madam,” Mistress Mavis said. “She who now excludes her lovers may live to lie a forsaken beldame — an old hag — in a frozen bed.”

“That is true, Mavis,” Madam Centaur said. “And who will escort us to a coach, then, or write, or tell us the gossip then? Who will make anagrams of our names, and invite us to the Cockpit and kiss our hands all during the time a play is performed, and draw their weapons for our honors?”

Some of her words such as “Cockpit” and “weapons” can have sexual meanings.

These anagrams were acrostic poems in which each line begins with a letter of the name of a loved one.

“Not one,” Madam Haughty said.

Jack Daw said, “Nay, my mistress is not altogether unintelligent of these things. Here are present those who have tasted of her favors.”

He was hinting that Epicene had slept with some of the men now present.

Clerimont whispered to Truewit, “What a neighing hobby-horse — chattering buffoon — Jack Daw is!”

Epicene said to Jack Daw, “But not with the intention to boast them again, servant.”

Women tend not to want clandestine affairs to be made known.

Epicene then said to Madam Haughty, “And have you those excellent receipts — prescriptions — madam, to keep yourselves away from the bearing of children?”

“Oh, yes, Morose,” Madam Haughty said. “How else should we maintain our youth and beauty? Many births make a woman old, as many crops make the earth barren.”

— 4.4 —

Truewit joined Morose and Dauphine, who were talking privately together.

“Oh, my cursed angel, who directed me to this fate!” Morose said.

“Why, sir?” Dauphine asked.

“So that I should be seduced by so foolish a devil as a barber will make!” Morose said.

“I wish that I had been worthy, sir, to have taken part in your counsel,” Dauphine said. “You should never have trusted it to such a minister.”

“I wish that I could redeem it with the loss of an eye, nephew, a hand, or any other member!” Morose said.

He was addressing his nephew, but chances are he wished he could redeem his marriage with the loss of his nephew, a member of his family.

Dauphine pretended that when Morose mentioned the loss of any other member, that included the loss of his male member.

“By the Virgin Mary,” Dauphine said, “God forbid, sir, that you should geld yourself to anger your wife.”

Actually, Dauphine did not need to pretend.

“As long as it would rid me of her!” Morose said. “And that I did supererogatory — beyond the call of duty — penance in a belfry at Westminster Hall, in the Cockpit, at the fall of a stag, at the Tower Wharf.”

He asked himself, “What other noisy place is there?”

He then continued with his list: “London Bridge, Paris Garden, Billingsgate, when the noises are at their height and loudest.”

All of the activities and places he named were noisy. Bells ring in a belfry. Cockfights were held in the Cockpit. Dogs bark while hunting a deer. At the Tower Wharf, ordnance was fired on special occasions. London Bridge was noisy and crowded, and the water rushing through the bridge’s arches created a roar. Bear-baitings were held at the Bear Garden. Fishwives raucously shouted in the fish market at Billingsgate.

The Oxford English Dictionary defines the theological meaning of “supererogation” as “In the Roman Catholic Church: the performance of good works beyond what God commands or requires, held to contribute to a store of merit which the Church may dispense to others to make up for their deficiencies; an instance of this.”

Morose continued, “Nay, I would sit out a play that consisted of nothing but fights at sea, drums, trumpets, and shields!”

“I hope there shall be no such need, sir,” Dauphine said. “Have patience, good uncle. This is only a day, and it is well-worn, too, now. Much of the day is already over.”

“Oh, all my days will be like this day forever, nephew, I foresee it, forever,” Morose said. “Strife and tumult are the dowry that comes with a wife.”

“I told you so, sir, and you would not believe me,” Truewit said.

“Alas, do not rub those wounds, Master Truewit, and make them bleed again,” Morose said. “The fault was my negligence. Add not affliction to affliction. I have perceived the effect — the fulfillment — of it too late in Madam Otter.”

Mrs. Otter was much like Epicene. The Otters and the Moroses had bad marriages.

Epicene approached the group and asked her husband, Morose, “How are you, sir?”

“Did you ever hear a more unnecessary question?” Morose said. “As if she did not see!”

He then answered Epicene, “Why, I do as you see, empress, empress.”

Morose's marriage was unhappy like Mr. Otter's, and so he imitated Mr. Otter's use of an honorary title. Mr. Otter used "princess," and Morose now used "empress."

Epicene said, "You are not well, sir. You look very ill. Something has upset you."

Morose said, "Oh, horrible, monstrous impertinencies and irrelevances! Wouldn't just one of these sentences have served?"

Epicene's three previous sentences all stated the same thing. Two of them were redundant and therefore unnecessary sound.

Morose said to Truewit, "What do you think, sir? Wouldn't just one of these sentences have served?"

Truewit replied, "Yes, sir, but these are only signs of female kindness, sir — they are certain tokens that she has a voice, sir."

One meaning of the word "voice" is conscience.

"Oh, is it so?" Morose said. "Come, if it is no otherwise —"

He then asked Epicene, "What do you say?"

"How do you feel, sir?" Epicene asked.

"Again that!" Morose complained.

"Nay, look, sir," Truewit said. "You would be friends with your wife upon unconscionable, unjust, and unreasonable terms — you would be friends with her only if she is silent —"

Epicene said to Morose, "They say you are mad, sir."

"Not for the love of you, I assure you," Morose said. "Do you see?"

He made a motion as if he were going to hit her.

“Oh, lord, gentlemen!” Epicene said. “Lay hold on him, for God’s sake!”

Truewit and Clerimont restrained Morose.

“What shall I do?” Epicene said. “Who’s his physician? Can you tell me who he is? Tell me which physician knows the state of his body best, so that I might send for him!”

She said to Morose, “Good sir, speak. I’ll send for one of my doctors, otherwise.”

“Why, to poison me, so that I might die intestate — without a will — and leave you possessed of all I have?” Morose asked.

Since Morose did not love Epicene, when he made his will, he would deprive her of some things that she would otherwise have gotten.

“Lord, how idly he talks, and how his eyes sparkle!” Epicene said. “He looks green about the temples! Do you see what blue spots he has?”

“Aye, it’s melancholy,” Clerimont said.

“Melancholy” tends to mean depression, but much earlier the Roman statesman Cicero wrote that some ancients used the word “melancholia” to mean frenzy (Tusculan Disputations 3.5.11).

“Gentlemen, for heaven’s sake, advise me,” Epicene said.

She called, “Ladies!”

She then said to Jack Daw, “Servant, you have read Pliny and Paracelsus.”

Pliny was the Roman author of Historia Naturalis (The Natural History). Part of it discusses medicine, including plants from which to derive useful drugs.

Paracelsus was a Swiss authority in chemistry and medicine.

Epicene continued, “No word now to comfort a poor gentlewoman? Woe to me! What luck had I, to marry a distracted man?”

“Distracted” can mean insane or frenzied.

Jack Daw began, “I’ll tell you, mistress —”

Truewit said quietly to Clerimont and Dauphine, “How splendidly Epicene acts her role!”

Struggling to break free, Morose said, “What do you mean by this, gentlemen?”

Epicene said to Jack Daw, “What will you tell me, servant?”

Jack Daw replied, “The disease in Greek is called μανία [mania], in Latin insania, furor, velexstasis melancholica, that is, egressio, when a man ex melancholico evadit fanaticus.”

Jack Daw had listed a number of synonyms for madness and ended with some words meaning “when a man goes from melancholy to madness.”

Morose said, “Shall I have a lecture read upon me alive?”

He was complaining that he was being treated as if he were a cadaver used in a medical lecture although he was still alive.

Jack Daw continued, “But he may be but phreneticus yet, mistress, and phrenetis is only delirium or so —”

Phreneticus means suffering from phrenetis.

Phrenetis means inflammation of the brain.

Delirium means temporary mental disturbance.

He was only offering names for Morose's disease; he was not advising about treatments.

Epicene said, "Aye, that is for the disease, servant. But what does this have to do with the cure? We are sure enough of the disease — we know the disease Morose has."

Struggling, Morose shouted, "Let me go!"

"Why, we'll entreat her to hold her peace, sir," Truewit said.

"Oh, no," Morose said. "Don't labor to stop her. She is like a water-pipe that will gush out with more force when she opens again."

Madam Haughty said to Epicene, addressing her the way males were addressed, "I'll tell you, Morose, you must talk divinity to him uninterruptedly, or you must talk moral philosophy to him."

La Foole said, "Aye, and there's an excellent book of moral philosophy, madam, of Reynard the Fox and all the beasts, called Doni's Philosophy."

The Moral Philosophy of Doni was a collection of animal fables, but none were about Reynard the Fox.

"There is, indeed, Sir Amorous La Foole," Madam Centaur said.

"Oh, misery!" Morose moaned.

"I have read it, my Lady Centaur, from cover to cover to my cousin here," La Foole said.

"Aye, and it is a very good book as any is of the moderns," Mrs. Otter said.

“Tut, he must have Seneca read to him, and Plutarch, and the ancients,” Jack Daw said. “The moderns are not for this disease.”

Seneca was a playwright and moral philosopher, and Plutarch was a biographer who compared and contrasted ancient Greeks and ancient Romans.

“Why, you discommended them, too, today, Sir John,” Clerimont said. “You spoke against them.”

“Aye, in some cases,” Jack Daw said, “but in these they are best, and Aristotle’s Ethics.”

“Do you say so, Sir John?” Mistress Mavis said. “I think you are deceived; you took it upon trust without reading it.”

“Where’s Trusty, my serving-woman?” Madam Haughty said. “I’ll end this dispute. Please, Otter, call her.”

By “Otter,” Madam Haughty meant Mrs. Otter. Madam Haughty used the masculine form when she addressed women.

Madam Haughty continued, “Trusty’s father and mother were both mad when they put her in my employment.”

“I think so,” Morose said.

He meant that he thought they had to be mad to put Mistress Trusty in Madam Haughty’s employment.

Mrs. Otter exited to get Mistress Trusty.

Morose said to Truewit and Clerimont, who were restraining him, “Nay, gentlemen, I am tame. This is but an exercise, I know, a marriage ceremony, which I must endure.”

Besides meaning a performance of a ceremony, the word “exercise” can mean “test” or “trial” (saints and martyrs have been exercised in this way) or the training exercise of an animal.

Madam Haughty said, “And one of them — I know not which — was cured with The Sick Man’s Salve, and the other with Greene’s Groatsworth of Wit.”

The Sick Man’s Salve by Thomas Becon was a religious tract that urged ill people to be patient and humble.

Greene’s Groatsworth of Wit by Robert Greene gave admonitory advice to his readers to reject the low life in London.

Madam Haughty believed that Mistress Trusty’s parents had been cured by hearing these books read out loud: one book for each parent.

“A very cheap cure, Madam,” Truewit said.

A goat was four-pence, which was the cost of the pamphlet Greene’s Groatsworth of Wit.

“Aye, the cure’s very feasible and practical,” Madam Haughty said.

Mrs. Otter returned with Mistress Trusty.

“My lady called for you, Mistress Trusty,” Mrs. Otter said. “You must resolve a controversy.”

“Oh, Trusty, which was it you said, your father or your mother, who was cured with The Sick Man’s Salve?” Madam Haughty asked.

“My mother, madam, was cured with the Salve,” Mistress Trusty answered.

“Then it was The Sick Woman’s Salve,” Truewit said.

“And my father was cured with the Groatsworth of Wit,” Mistress Trusty added. “But there were other means of treatment used. We had a preacher who would preach folks asleep always; and so they were prescribed to go to church by an old woman who was their physician, thrice a week —”

“To sleep?” Epicene asked.

“Yes, indeed,” Mistress Trusty said, “and every night they read themselves asleep on those books.”

Sleep can be a healer.

“In good faith, these cures make sense,” Epicene said. “I wish I knew where to procure those books.”

“Oh!” Morose said.

“I can help you with one of them, Mistress Morose,” La Foole said. “I can furnish the Groatsworth of Wit.”

“But I shall disfurnish you, Sir Amorous,” Epicene said. “Can you spare it?”

She worried about depriving him of his groat’s worth of wit; that is, she worried about depriving him of the little wit he had.

“Oh, yes, for a week or so,” La Foole said. “I myself will read it to him.”

“No, I must do that, sir,” Epicene said. “That must be my job.”

“Oh! Oh!” Morose moaned.

“Surely, he would do well enough if he could sleep,” Epicene said.

“No, I should do well enough if you could sleep,” Morose said.

Asleep, she might be quiet.

He then asked, “Have I no friend who will make her drunk, or give her a little laudanum or opium.”

Laudanum is an alcoholic drink containing morphine.

“Why, sir, she talks ten times worse in her sleep,” Truewit said.

Hmm. How would he know that?

“What!” Morose said.

“Don’t you know, sir?” Clerimont said. “She never ceases all night.”

Hmm. How would he know that?

“And she snores like a porpoise,” Truewit said.

“Oh, redeem me, fate! Redeem me, fate!” Morose prayed.

He then asked Dauphine, “For how many reasons may a man be divorced, nephew?”

“I truly don’t know, sir,” Dauphine answered.

“Some divine must resolve you in that, sir, or some canon lawyer,” Truewit said.

A divine is a priest or a minister. A canon lawyer specializes in ecclesiastical law.

“I will not rest,” Morose said. “I will not think of any other hope or comfort, until I know.”

Morose and Dauphine exited.

“Alas, poor man!” Clerimont said.

“You’ll make him mad indeed, ladies, if you pursue this,” Truewit said.

“No, we’ll let him rest and catch his breath now a quarter of an hour or so,” Madam Haughty said.

“By my faith, a large truce,” Clerimont said.

“Is that his keeper who has gone with him?” Madam Haughty asked.

Lunatics need keepers to take care of them and make sure they don’t hurt themselves.

“It is his nephew, Madam,” Jack Daw said.

“Sir Dauphine Eugenie,” La Foole said.

Mistress Centaur said, “He looks a very pitiful knight —”

In this society, “pitiful” can mean “full of pity for others.” That is what Mistress Centaur meant, but in his next comment Jack Daw did not. He meant “deserving pity.”

“As pitiful as can be,” Jack Daw said. “This marriage has put him out of all. It has ruined his hope of inheritance.”

La Foole said, “He has not a penny in his purse, madam —”

“He is ready to cry all this day,” Jack Daw said.

Jack Daw meant that Dauphine was ready to cry because Morose had married Epicene, and so Dauphine would inherit little or nothing when Morose died, especially if Epicene gave birth to a boy.

“Dauphine is a very shark,” La Foole said. “He set me in the nick the other night at primero.”

La Foole was saying that Dauphine had bet against him — the meaning of “set me” — at the crucial moment. La

Foole did not say who won, but if it is true that Dauphine has an empty purse, then La Foole won.

La Foole is a fool, and Dauphine is not a fool (although he does have ethical lapses), but when it comes to games of chance, fortune can sometimes favor fools.

The word “shark” can mean “cheater,” but it can also mean “an impecunious fellow.”

Truewit and Clerimont were Dauphine’s friends.

Truewit whispered to Clerimont, “How these swabbers talk!”

Swabbers are low fellows.

“Aye, Otter’s wine has swelled their humors above a spring tide,” Clerimont whispered back.

Wine often makes people say things they would not ordinarily say.

Lady Haughty said to Mrs. Epicene Morose, “Good Morose, let’s go in again. I like your couches exceeding well; we’ll go recline and talk there.”

“I wait on you, madam,” Epicene said.

Jack Daw, La Foole, and the ladies exited, but Truewit detained Epicene as she was leaving.

“By God’s light,” Truewit said. “I will have them as silent as signs, and as silent as the posts on which the signs are hung, too, before I have done. Do you hear, lady bride? I ask you now, as you are a noble wench, to continue this discourse about Dauphine within, but praise him exceedingly. Magnify him with all the height of affection you can — I have some purpose for your doing it — and just beat off these two rooks, Jack Daw and his fellow fool, La Foole, with any discontentment and annoyance away from here, and I'll honor you forever."

Rooks are fools.

"I was about to do it, here," Epicene said. "It made me angry to the soul to hear them begin to talk so malapertly and impudently about Dauphine."

"To be malapert" is "to be boldly disrespectful to or about a person of higher social standing."

"Please, perform it," Truewit said, "and you will win me and make me an idolater who worships you everlastingly."

"Will you go in and hear me do it?" Epicene asked.

"No, I'll stay here," Truewit said. "Drive them out of your company. It is all I ask, which cannot be any way better done than by extolling Dauphine, whom they have so slighted."

"I promise you that I will do it," Epicene said. "You shall expect one of them very soon."

She exited.

Clerimont said, "What a pair of kestrels are these, to hawk after ladies thus!"

To be called a kestrel was an insult. The word can mean "busy fool."

"Aye," Truewit said, "and to strike at and attack such an eagle as Dauphine."

"He will be mad when we tell him," Clerimont said. "Here he comes."

— 4.5 —

Dauphine entered the room.

“Oh, sir, you are welcome,” Clerimont said.

“Where’s your uncle?” Truewit asked.

“He’s run outdoors in his nightcaps to talk with a casuist about his divorce,” Dauphine said. “The plan is working admirably.”

A casuist is a theologian who resolves difficult questions of conduct, duty, and conscience.

“It works admirably” meant that his plan to inherit his uncle Morose’s wealth was going well.

“You would have said so if you had been here,” Truewit said. “The ladies have laughed at you most derisively and comically since you went out of the room, Dauphine.”

“And they asked if you were your uncle’s keeper,” Clerimont said.

Truewit added, “And the pair of baboons — Jack Daw and La Foole — answered, ‘Yes,’ and said you were a pitiful poor fellow and lived by running errands, and had nothing but the three suits of apparel given to servants and some few benevolences — charitable donations — that lords gave you to play the fool for them and swagger.”

“Let me not live!” Dauphine said.

He came up with a better plan: “I’ll beat ’em. I’ll bind them both to grand Madam’s — Lady Haughty’s — bedposts and have them tormented by monkeys.”

“You shall not need to do that; they shall be beaten for and to you, Dauphine,” Truewit said. “I have an execution — a metaphorical legal writ enforcing a judgment — to serve upon them, I promise you, and it shall serve. Trust my plot.”

“Aye, you have many plots,” Dauphine said. “You had one to make all the wenches fall in love with me.”

Truewit replied, “Why, if I do not do that yet before night, as near as it is, and if they do not everyone invite you and be ready to scratch and fight for you, then take the mortgage of my wit.”

“Before God, I’ll be his witness!” Clerimont said. “You shall have what you promised, Dauphine.”

He then looked back and forth at both men and said, “You shall be his fool forever if you don’t.”

In other words:

1) Dauphine shall be Truewit’s fool — the butt of his jokes — forever if he doesn’t take the wager.

2) Truewit shall be Dauphine’s fool — the butt of his jokes — forever if Truewit loses the wager and doesn’t do what he says he will do.

“Agreed,” Truewit said. “Perhaps it will be the better estate.”

Perhaps having Truewit as Dauphine’s fool would be better than having the ladies as Dauphine’s lovers.

Or perhaps having the ladies in love with Dauphine and offering him valuable gifts of jewels and other things will give Dauphine a better estate than relying on his uncle Morose’s generosity.

Truewit then said, “Do you observe this gallery? Or rather lobby, indeed? Here are a couple of studies, one at each end. Here I will act such a tragicomedy between the Guelphs and the Ghibellines: Daw and La Foole.”

The Guelphs and the Ghibellines were rival factions in medieval Italy. Dante, author of The Divine Comedy, was a Guelph.

“Whoever comes out first — Jack Daw or La Foole — I will seize upon. You two shall be the chorus behind the arras, and whip out between the acts and speak.”

A chorus in Greek tragedy would observe the action and then comment on it.

An arras is a wall hanging: a thick tapestry. Often an alcove was behind an arras; it made a good hiding place.

Truewit continued, “If I do not make them keep the peace for this remnant of the day, if not of the year, I will have failed once in my life.”

La Foole and Jack Daw had been at peace before Truewit and his friends had started interfering with their lives. Even now, there was no major disagreement between them.

He listened and then said, “I hear Daw coming. Hide and do not laugh, for God’s sake.”

Clerimont and Dauphine hid behind the arras.

Jack Daw entered the room and asked Truewit, “Which is the way into the garden, do you think?”

Probably he needed to urinate.

“Oh, Jack Daw!” Truewit said. “I am glad I have met with you. In good faith, I must have this matter go no further between you. I must have this dispute between you two made up.”

“What matter, sir?” Jack Daw asked. “Between whom?”

“Come, you disguise it,” Truewit said. “You pretend not to know about the dispute between Sir Amorous and you. If you love me, Jack, you shall make use of your philosophy now for this once and deliver to me your sword. This is not the wedding the Centaurs were at, though there is a she-one here.”

Centaurs are mythological beings with the body of a horse and the torso, arms, and head of a man. Many of the Centaurs were violent. In Thessaly, the Centaurs were invited to a wedding, but they grew drunk and tried to rape the women guests. The Centaur named Eurytion tried to rape the bride. A battle broke out between the humans and the Centaurs. No female Centaurs exist, even in mythology.

By “she-one,” Truewit mean Madam Centaur.

Truewit continued, “The bride Epicene has entreated me to make sure I will see no blood shed at her bridal. You saw her whisper to me just now.”

Jack Daw handed his sword to Truewit and said, “As I hope to finish Tacitus, I intend no murder.”

The Roman historian Tacitus wrote much and Jack Daw would need much time to read all of Tacitus’ many works.

“Aren’t you waiting for Sir Amorous?” Truewit asked.

“Not I, by my knighthood,” Jack Daw answered.

“And by your learning and scholarship, too?” Truewit asked.

“And by my learning and scholarship, too,” Jack Daw answered.

Truewit returned Jack Daw’s sword to him and said, “Bah. In that case, I return to you your sword and beg your pardon; but do not sheathe your sword, for you will be assaulted. Stay on your guard. I understood that you had apprehended La Foole’s challenge and walked here to defy him, and that you had regarded your life as being of contemptible value in comparison to the value of your honor.”

“No, no, no such thing, I assure you,” Jack Daw said.

He had just said that he did not regard his life as being of contemptible value in comparison to the value of his honor.

Jack Daw continued, “La Foole and I parted now as good friends as we could be.”

“Don’t trust that visor,” Truewit said. “I saw La Foole after dinner with another face.”

A visor is the part of a helmet that protects the eyes. It hides part of the face and so can be compared to a mask.

Truewit continued, “I have known many men in my time vexed with losses, with deaths, and with abuses, but so offended a wight as Sir Amorous I have never seen or read of.”

“Wight” is a medieval word meaning “man.” Truewit was like a playwright directing Jack Daw and La Foole in a parody of a medieval romance about chivalry and honor.

Truewit continued, “For taking away his guests and bringing them here, sir, today, that’s the cause of his argument with you, and he declares it behind your back, with such threats and insults! He said to Dauphine that you were the arrantest ass —”

“Aye, he may say whatever he pleases,” Jack Daw said.

Truewit continued, “And he swears that you are so proclaimed a coward that he knows you will never do him any manly or single right — that is, you will not meet him in man-to-man combat — and therefore he will take his course.”

“I’ll give him any satisfaction, sir — except fighting,” Jack Daw said.

“Aye, sir,” Truewit said, “but who knows what satisfaction he’ll take? Blood he thirsts for, and blood he will have; and whereabouts on you he will have it, who knows but himself?”

“Please, Master Truewit, be a mediator in the dispute,” Jack Daw pleaded.

Truewit opened a door to one of the studies and said, “Well, sir, conceal yourself then in this study until I return. Nay, you must be content to be locked in this study because for my own reputation I would not have you seen to receive a public disgrace, while I have the matter in managing.”

He then exclaimed, “Godso, here he comes!”

Truewit shut Jack Daw in the study, closing and locking the door and talking to him through it, “Keep your breath quiet, so that he doesn’t hear you sigh.”

Speaking loudly, as though conversing with La Foole, who was not present, Truewit said, “In good faith, Sir Amorous, Daw is not this way. Please be merciful; do not murder him; he is a Christian as good as you. You are armed as if you sought a revenge on all his family!”

He said loudly, as though conversing with Dauphine, who was still hidden behind the arras, “Good Dauphine, get him away from this place. I never knew a man’s anger so high but he would speak to his friends, he would hear reason.”

Speaking through the door, Truewit said, “Jack Daw!”

No answer.

Truewit then said, louder, “Jack Daw! Asleep?”

From behind the door, Jack Daw asked, “Has he gone, Master Truewit?”

“Aye,” Truewit said. “Did you hear him?”

“Oh, God!” Jack Daw said. “Yes.”

Truewit said to himself, “What a quick ear fear has!”

Jack Daw's fear had caused him to think he had heard La Foole's voice, although La Foole was not present.

Truewit unlocked the door, and Jack Daw came out and said, "But is he so armed as you say?"

"Armed?" Truewit said. "Did you ever see a fellow set out to take possession of property from another man?"

Even when the property had been awarded by a court of law, such an action often required force or the threat of force.

"Aye, sir," Jack Daw said.

"That may give you some light to conceive of him," Truewit said, "but it is nothing to the principal."

The principal is La Foole. "Principal" is a legal term for someone who has directly committed a crime. According to Truewit, La Foole was ready to commit murder.

Truewit said, "Some treacherous associate in the house has furnished him with weapons strangely. Or if it were out of the house, it was Tom Otter."

"Indeed, Tom Otter is a captain and his wife is La Foole's kinswoman," Jack Daw said.

"He has got somebody's old two-handed longsword, to mow you off at the knees," Truewit said. "And that sword has spawned such a dagger! But then he is so hung with pikes, halberds, petronels, calivers, and muskets that he looks like a justice of peace's hall that is hung with ancient and modern weapons."

A halberd is a weapon that is a combination spear and battle-axe. A petronel is a large pistol. Calivers are light muskets.

Truewit continued, "A man with an income of two thousand pounds a year is not assessed at so many weapons as he has on."

High-ranking citizens were required to possess a certain number of weapons in case the king needed them.

Truewit continued, "There was never a fencer challenged at so many several foils."

In other words, La Foole was carrying several different kinds of swords.

Truewit continued, "You would think he meant to murder all the many inhabitants of Saint Sepulchre's parish. If he could but victual himself for half a year in his breeches, he is sufficiently armed to overrun a country."

Breeches were voluminous pants. Truewit was saying that if only La Foole could stuff his pants with six months' worth of food, he would have sufficient food (he already had sufficient weapons) to conquer a country.

"Good lord, what does he mean, sir?" Jack Daw said. "Please, Master Truewit, be a mediator."

"Well, I'll see if he will be appeased with a leg or an arm," Truewit said. "If not, you must die this once."

"I would be loath to lose my right arm," Jack Daw said. "I use it for writing madrigals."

"Why, if he will be satisfied with a thumb or a little finger, all's one to me," Truewit said. "You must think I'll do my best."

"Good sir, do," Jack Daw said.

Truewit locked Jack Daw up again in the study, and then Clerimont and Dauphine came forth from behind the arras.

"What have you done?" Clerimont asked.

"He will let me do nothing, man," Truewit said. "He does all before me. He offers his left arm."

Truewit did not need to frighten Jack Daw. Jack Daw was frightening himself.

“Left arm?” Clerimont said. “His left wing, because he’s a Jack Daw.”

A jackdaw is a foolish, easily caught bird.

“Take it, by all means,” Dauphine said.

He meant for Truewit to take Jack Daw’s left arm.

We can hope that he was joking.

“What!” Truewit said. “Maim a man forever for a jest? What kind of conscience do you have?”

“It is no loss to him,” Dauphine said. “He has no use for his arms but to eat spoon meat — baby food or food for invalids. Besides, as good maim his body as his reputation.”

Truewit replied, “He is a scholar and a wit, and yet he does not think so — he does not think ‘as good maim his body as his reputation.’ But he loses no reputation with us, for we all have decided that he is an ass before now.”

He then said to Clerimont and Dauphine, “Take your places behind the arras again.”

“Please,” Clerimont said, “let me be in at the fooling of the other — La Foole — a little.”

“Look, you’ll spoil all,” Truewit said. “These are always your tricks.”

“No, I won’t spoil things,” Clerimont said, “but instead I could hit on some things that you will miss, and you will say that they are good ones.”

“I warrant you that what I say is true,” Truewit said. “Please, stop pleading; I’ll leave it off if you don’t. I’ll stop the whole jest.”

“Come away with me, Clerimont,” Dauphine said.

Clerimont and Dauphine concealed themselves behind the arras again.

La Foole entered the room.

“Sir Amorous!” Truewit said.

“Master Truewit!” La Foole said.

“Where are you going?” Truewit asked.

“Down into the court to make water,” La Foole answered.

He needed to urinate.

“By no means, sir,” Truewit said. “You shall rather put your breeches to the test and see how much water they hold.”

Breeches were voluminous and padded. The padding could soak up and hold water — or urine.

“Why, sir?” La Foole asked.

Truewit opened the door to the second study and said, “Enter here, if you love your life.”

“Why?” La Foole asked. “Why?”

“Do question why until your throat is cut,” Truewit said. “Dally until the enraged soul finds you.”

“Who’s the enraged soul?” La Foole asked.

“It is Jack Daw,” Truewit answered. “Will you go into the study and hide?”

“Aye, aye, I’ll go in,” La Foole said. “What’s the matter?”

Truewit said, “Nay, if he had been cool enough to tell us that, there had been some hope to reconcile you, but he seems so implacably enraged.”

“By God’s light, let him rage,” La Foole said. “I’ll hide myself.”

“Do, good sir,” Truewit said. “But what have you done to him within that should provoke him thus? You have made some jest at his expense before the ladies —”

“Not I, never in my life have I made a jest at the expense of any man,” La Foole said. “The bride was praising Sir Dauphine, and he went away in snuff — in a huff, indignantly — and I followed him. Maybe he is intoxicated and taking offence at me because earlier I would not drink all the full horse-cup.”

“By my faith, that may be the truth,” Truewit said. “You remember well. But he walks the round up and down, through every room of the house.”

“Walk the round” is a military metaphor meaning to go round a camp and ensure that all the sentries are vigilant against enemies.

Truewit continued, “Jack Daw does this with a towel in his hand, crying, ‘Where’s La Foole? Who saw La Foole?’ And when Dauphine and I asked the reason he was doing this, we could force no answer from him but ‘Oh, revenge, how sweet you are! I will strangle him in this towel’ — which leads us to conjecture that the main cause of his fury is because you brought your food here today, with a towel about you, to his discredit.”

“Likely enough,” La Foole said. “Why, if he is angry because of that, I’ll stay here until his anger has blown over.”

Truewit replied, “That is a good, becoming resolution, sir, if you can adopt it immediately.”

“Yes, I can adopt it,” La Foole said. “Or, I’ll go away into the country immediately.”

“How will you get out of the house, sir?” Truewit said. “He knows you are in the house, and he’ll watch out for you this seven night — this week — but he’ll have you. He’ll outwait a sergeant for you.”

Sergeants had the power to arrest people, and they had the reputation of lying in wait a long time in order to arrest people.

“Why, then, I’ll stay here,” La Foole said.

“You must think how to feed yourself for the time, then,” Truewit said.

“Why, sweet Master Truewit, will you entreat my cousin Otter to send me a cold venison pasty, a bottle or two of wine, and a chamber pot?” La Foole asked.

His cousin Otter was Mrs. Otter. He was using the masculine form of address to refer to her.

A pasty is a meat-pie.

“A stool of Sir A-jax’s invention would be better than a chamber pot, sir,” Truewit said.

In 1596, Sir John Harington invented a flushable toilet. He wrote about it in his treatise The Metamorphosis of Ajax. The title contained a pun: A jakes is a privy.

“Aye, that will be better, indeed, and a pallet — a straw mattress — to lie on,” La Foole said.

“Oh, I would not advise you to sleep by any means,” Truewit said.

“Wouldn’t you, sir?” La Foole asked. “Why, then, I will not.”

Truewit said, “Yet there’s another fear —”

“Is there, sir?” La Foole asked. “What is it?”

Truewit tested the door’s strength and then said, “No, he cannot break this door with his foot, surely.”

“I’ll set my back against it, sir,” La Foole said. “I have a good back.”

Truewit said, “But then if he should batter —”

“Batter!” La Foole said. “If he dares to batter the door, I’ll have an action of battery against him.”

Battery is a crime committed against a human, not a door.

“Anticipate the worst,” Truewit said. “He has sent for gunpowder already, and what he will do with it, no man knows — perhaps he will blow up the corner of the house where he suspects you are.”

He pretended to hear Jack Daw coming, and he said, “Here he comes! In quickly!”

La Foole ran into the study.

Pretending that Jack Daw was present, Truewit said loudly enough for La Foole to hear, “I protest, Sir John Daw, he is not here. What will you do? Before God, you shall hang no petard — no bomb — here. I’ll die rather. Will you not take my word? I never knew one but would be satisfied.”

He then said through the door to La Foole, “Sir Amorous, there’s no resisting. He has made a petard out of an old brass pot, to force open your door. Think of some satisfaction or terms to offer him.”

From the other side of the door, La Foole said, “Sir, I’ll give him any satisfaction. I dare give any terms.”

“You’ll leave it to me, then?” Truewit said.

“Aye, sir,” La Foole said. “I’ll agree to any conditions.”

Truewit then quietly told Clerimont and Dauphine to come out from behind the arras.

After they had done so, Truewit said, “Now, what do you think, sirs? Wouldn’t it be a difficult thing to determine which of these two is the most scared?”

“Yes,” Clerimont said, “but this one — La Foole — fears the bravest. The other is a whiniling — whining and whimpering — dastard, Jack Daw! But La Foole is a brave, heroic coward! And he is afraid of a threatening look and a manly accent. I like him rarely.”

Truewit said, “Hasn’t it been a pity that the real characters of these two have been concealed?”

“Shall I make a suggestion?” Clerimont asked.

“Be brief,” Truewit said, “for I must strike while it is hot.”

“Strike while the iron is hot” is a proverb that derives from blacksmithing. When the iron is glowing and hot, the blacksmith strikes it with a hammer and hammers it into the desired shape. The proverb means to act when you have a good opportunity to act to achieve something desirable.

“Shall I go fetch the ladies to witness the catastrophe?” Clerimont asked.

A catastrophe is the denouement — the climax — of a play.

“Umm,” Truewit said, thinking.

He made a decision: “Aye, by my truth.”

“By no mortal means,” Dauphine said. “Let them continue in the state of ignorance and continue to err. Let the ladies continue to think that Jack Daw and La Foole are wits and fine fellows just as they have been thinking. It would be a sin to disabuse them.”

In this matter, Dauphine was perhaps the kindest of the three friends.

“Well, I will have them fetched, now I think about it, for a private purpose of mine,” Truewit replied.

He then said, “Do, Clerimont, fetch them and tell them all that’s passed so far, and bring them into the balcony of this room.”

“This is your extreme vanity, now,” Dauphine said. “You think you would be undone and ruined if every jest you make were not made widely known.”

Truewit replied, “You soon shall see how unjust you are.”

He then said, “Clerimont, tell the ladies that it was Dauphine’s plot.”

Clerimont exited to get the ladies.

Truewit said to Dauphine, “Don’t trust me if the whole drift — the jest — is not for thy good.”

He added, “There’s a carpet — a thick woolen tablecloth — in the next room. Put it on, with this scarf over your face and a cushion on your head, and be ready when I call Amorous. Go!”

In this society, carpets were not placed on floors.

Dauphine exited.

Truewit unlocked a study door and called, “John Daw!”

“What good news do you have, sir?” Jack Daw asked.

“Indeed, I have followed and argued with La Foole hard for you,” Truewit said. “I told him you were a knight and a scholar, and that you knew fortitude consists magis patiendo quamfaciendo, magis ferendo quam feriendo.”

The Latin means, “More in suffering than in doing, more in submitting than in striking [a blow].”

“It does so indeed, sir,” Jack Daw said.

“And I told him that you would suffer,” Truewit said. “So at first he demanded, by my truth, in my opinion, too much.”

“What was it, sir?” Jack Daw said.

“Your upper lip and six front teeth,” Truewit said.

“That was unreasonable,” Jack Daw said.

“I told him plainly that you could not spare them all,” Truewit said. “So, after long argument — pro et con, as you know — I brought him down to your two butter-teeth — that is, your two most prominent front teeth — and them he would have.”

“Oh, did you so?” Jack Daw said. “Why, he shall have them.”

Madam Haughty, Madam Centaur, Mistress Mavis, Mrs. Otter, Epicene, Mistress Trusty, and Clerimont entered the balcony and silently observed Truewit and Jack Daw.

“But he shall not have your front teeth, sir, by your leave,” Truewit said. “The conclusion is this, sir — because you shall be very good friends hereafter, and this will never be remembered or upbraided — raised to reproach you. In addition, so he may not boast he has done any such thing to you in his own person, he is to come here in disguise, give you five kicks in private, sir, take your sword from you, and lock you up in that study, for as long as he pleases. That will be but a little while; we'll get the sword released soon."

"Five kicks?" Jack Daw said. "He shall have six, sir, to be friends."

"Believe me," Truewit said, "you shall not overreach yourself and make an error if you send him that word by me."

"Deliver it, sir," Jack Daw said. "He shall have the sixth kick with all my heart in order for us to be friends."

"Friends?" Truewit said. "Nay, if he should not be friends with you, and heartily too, upon these terms, he shall have me as his enemy as long as I live. Come, sir, bear it bravely."

"Oh, God, sir," Jack Daw said, "six kicks is nothing."

Truewit replied, "True. What's six kicks to a man who reads Seneca?"

"I have had a hundred kicks, sir," Jack Daw said.

Truewit called to the arras behind which Dauphine was concealed, "Sir Amorous!"

He then said to Jack Daw, "No speaking to one another, or revisiting old arguments."

Dauphine, well disguised by the carpet and shawl he was wearing, came forth and kicked Jack Daw.

Counting the kicks, Jack Daw said, "One, two, three, four, five."

He then said, "I insist, Sir Amorous, that you shall have six."

Truewit said, "Nay, I told you that you should not talk."

He then said to Dauphine, whom Jack Daw thought was La Foole, "Come, give him six, if he must have them."

Dauphine kicked Jack Daw a sixth time.

Truewit then said to Jack Daw, “Your sword.”

Jack Daw surrendered his sword to Truewit, who said, “Now, return to your safe custody. You shall soon meet in front of the ladies, and be the dearest friends one to another.”

Jack Daw went into the study where he had been hidden.

Truewit said to Dauphine, “Give me the scarf now; you shall be at the other bare-faced. Stand to one side.”

Dauphine gave Truewit the scarf and stood behind the arras.

Truewit called, “Sir Amorous!”

He unlocked the door to the study where Sir Amorous La Foole was hiding.

La Foole came out of the study.

Seeing Jack Daw’s sword that Truewit was holding, La Foole asked, “What’s here? A sword?”

“I cannot help it, unless I should take the quarrel upon myself,” Truewit said. “Here, Jack Daw has sent you his sword —”

“I’ll not take it,” La Foole interrupted.

Truewit continued, “And he orders you to fasten it against a wall, and break your head in some few different places against the hilt.”

“I will not,” La Foole said. “Tell him that plainly. I cannot endure to shed my own blood.”

“Will you not do what Jack Daw orders you to do?” Truewit asked.

“No,” La Foole said. “I’ll beat my head against a fair flat wall, if that will satisfy him; if not, he shall beat my head himself, for me: Amorous.”

“Why, this is a strange shying away, when a man stands surety for you!” Truewit said. “I, however, offered him another condition. Will you stand to that?”

“Aye,” La Foole said. “What is it?”

“That you will be beaten in private,” Truewit said.

“Yes. I am content to do that, to be blunt, and if he uses the blunt part of the sword,” La Foole said.

La Foole was OK with being hit with the pommel of a sword, or perhaps with the flat of a sword.

Truewit said, “Then you must submit yourself to be hoodwinked in this scarf.”

He was punning. “Hoodwinked” means 1) blindfolded, and 2) fooled.

He continued, “And you must be led to him, where he will take your sword from you and make you bear a blow over the mouth, gules, and he will make you bear tweaks by the nose, sans nombre.”

Gules is a heraldic term meaning “blood-red” (the color of a bloody mouth) and sans nombre is a term meaning “without number.”

“I am content to do that,” La Foole said. “But why must I be blinded?”

“That’s for your own good, sir,” Truewit said, “because if he should grow insolent and arrogant upon this and publish it hereafter to your disgrace (which I hope he will not do) you will be able to swear safely and declare that he never beat you, to your knowledge.”

“Oh, I understand,” La Foole said.

Truewit said, “I do not doubt but you’ll be perfectly good friends after this, and not dare to utter an ill thought one against another in the future.”

“Not I, as God help me, against him,” La Foole said.

“Nor he against you, sir,” Truewit said. “If he should —”

Truewit blindfolded La Foole’s eyes with the scarf and led him forward, saying, “Come, sir.”

Pretending to address Jack Daw, Truewit then called, “All hid, Sir John!”

The call “All hid” is used in the children’s game “Hide and Seek.”

Dauphine came out from behind the arras and took La Foole’s sword away from him and then tweaked his nose.

La Foole moaned, “Oh, Sir John, Sir John. Oh, o—o—o—o—o—oh —”

Truewit said, “Good Sir John, stop tweaking his nose; you’ll blow his nose off.”

Dauphine exited with the two swords.

Truewit said to La Foole, “It is Sir John’s pleasure that you should retire into the study. Why, now you are friends. All bitterness between you, I hope, is buried. You shall come out of the study by and by, and you two shall act like Damon and Pythias and embrace with all the rankness of friendship that can be.”

Damon and Pythias were two close friends. Dionysius I of Syracuse, a tyrant, sentenced Damon to death. Damon requested that he be allowed to return to his home to say goodbye to his family and settle his affairs; Pythias volunteered to stay in Syracuse as a hostage until Damon returned. He would die in Damon's place if Damon did not return. Dionysius I of Syracuse was surprised when Damon did, in fact, return to face death. Impressed by the true friendship of Damon and Pythias, he allowed both of them to live.

In this culture, "rankness" can mean 1) abundance, or 2) foulness.

La Foole went into the study where he had been hidden.

The ladies and Clerimont, all of whom had witnessed everything, retired from the balcony.

Truewit said, "I trust we shall have them tamer in their language hereafter."

Dauphine entered the room, closely followed by the ladies and Clerimont, and Truewit said, "Dauphine, I worship you. — God's will, the ladies have surprised us."

Truewit knew the ladies had witnessed the scene, but he pretended to be surprised by the ladies' presence in order to benefit Dauphine.

— 4.6 —

Madam Haughty, Madam Centaur, Mistress Mavis, Mrs. Otter, Epicene, and Mistress Trusty, along with Clerimont, had witnessed everything. All knew that Jack Daw and La Foole, despite being knights, were cowards. Rather than earning their knighthoods on the battlefield, they had bought them.

The ladies talked among themselves, apart from the gentlemen.

Madam Haughty said, “Madam Centaur, how our judgments were imposed on by these adulterate — counterfeit — knights!”

“Nay, madam,” Madam Centaur said, “Mavis was more deceived than we; it was her commendation that made them known in the College.”

“I commended only their wits, madam, and their splendid clothing,” Mistress Mavis said. “I never looked toward their valor, manliness, and courage.”

“Sir Dauphine is valiant and a wit, too, it seems,” Madam Haughty said.

“And Dauphine is a fine dresser, too,” Mistress Mavis said.

“Was this his project?” Madam Haughty asked.

The project was revealing the cowardly nature of Jack Daw and La Foole.

“So Master Clerimont intimates, Madam,” Mrs. Otter said.

Mrs. Haughty said to Mrs. Epicene Morose, “Good Morose, when you come to the College, will you bring Dauphine with you? He seems a very perfect gentleman.”

“He is indeed so, Madam, believe it,” Epicene replied.

“But when will you come, Morose?” Madam Centaur asked Epicene.

“Three or four days from now, Madam, when I have gotten myself a coach and horses,” Epicene said.

“No, tomorrow, good Morose,” Mrs. Haughty said. “Centaur shall send you her coach.”

“Yes, indeed, do, and bring Sir Dauphine with you,” Mistress Mavis said.

“She has promised to do that, Mavis,” Madam Haughty said.

“He is a very worthy gentleman in his exterior appearance, madam,” Mistress Mavis said.

“Aye, he shows he is judicial in his clothes,” Madam Haughty said.

She meant “judicious,” not “judicial,” which means “like a judge.” “Judicious” means “showing good judgment.”

Madam Centaur said, “And yet he is not so exaggeratedly neat as some, madam, who have their faces set in a brake!”

A brake can be a thicket. She was referring to hair and beards. Some men take great care of their facial hair.

(Another kind of brake is a device to keep a horse’s hoof still as it is being shod. In that case, the faces would have a set expression. A woman can wear so much makeup that her face will crack if she smiles. Also, a woman can wear such an elaborate headdress that she must be careful when she moves her head.)

The ladies were beginning to talk about very elegant — and probably effeminate — men. (Dauphine was not one of them.)

“Aye, and have every hair in place!” Madam Haughty said.

Mistress Mavis said, “And who wear purer linen than ourselves, and practice more neatness than the French hermaphrodite!”

King Henri III of France was a famous transvestite. The English liked French fashions, but they did not like what they considered French effeminacy. Also, at the time a hermaphrodite could be seen in London.

“Aye, ladies,” Epicene said, “what lies they tell one of us, they have told a thousand, and they are the only thieves of our chaste reputation, who think to take — seduce — us with that perfume, or with that lace, and laugh at us unconscionably when they have done.”

Epicene was well aware that men gossip.

Her words “have told a thousand” were ambiguous and could mean 1) have told a thousand lies, 2) have told a thousand women, and 3) have told a thousand lies to a thousand women.

“But Sir Dauphine’s carelessness — his nonchalance — becomes him,” Madam Haughty said.

“I could love a man for such a nose!” Madam Centaur said.

One meaning of the noun “nose” is a projecting part. A lady such as Madam Centaur may be thinking of Dauphine’s penis.

“Or such a leg!” Mistress Mavis said.

A leg is a lower limb. A lady such as Mistress Mavis could be thinking of Dauphine’s penis.

“He has an exceeding good eye, madam,” Madam Centaur said.

“And a very good love-lock of hair,” Mistress Mavis said.

“Good Morose, bring him to my chamber first,” Madam Centaur said to Epicene.

“Will it please Your Honors to meet at my house, Madam?” Mrs. Otter asked.

Truewit whispered to Dauphine, “See how they eye thee, man! They are taken with you, I promise you.”

Mrs. Haughty approached Truewit and Dauphine and said, “You have unbraced — exposed and disarmed — our brace — pair — of knights here, Master Truewit.”

“Not I, Madam,” Truewit replied, “it was the plot of Sir Dauphine, who, if he has disfurnished Your Ladyship of any guard or service by it, is able to make the place good again in himself.”

The service could be love-service.

Mrs. Haughty said, “There’s no doubt of that, sir.”

She kissed Dauphine.

Madam Centaur said to Mistress Mavis, “Godso, Mavis, Haughty is kissing.”

Mistress Mavis replied, “Let us go, too, and take part.”

They approached the gentlemen.

Madam Haughty said, “But I am glad of the fortune — besides the exposure of two such empty caskets — to gain the knowledge of so rich a mine of virtue as Sir Dauphine.”

“We would all be glad to style him of our friendship — make him one of our friends — and see him at the College,” Madam Centaur said.

“He cannot mix with a sweeter society, I’ll prophesy, and I hope he himself will think so,” Mistress Mavis said.

“I should be rude to imagine otherwise, lady,” Dauphine said.

Truewit whispered to Dauphine, “Didn’t I tell you, Dauphine? Why, all their actions are governed by crude opinion, without reason or cause. They don’t know why they do anything but as they are informed, believe, judge, praise, condemn, love, hate, and — in emulation one of another — do all these things alike. Only they have a natural inclination that sways them generally to the worst when they are left to themselves. But pursue it, now you have them.”

Mrs. Haughty asked Epicene, “Shall we go in again, Morose?”

“Yes, madam,” Epicene replied.

“We’ll entreat Sir Dauphine and ask for his company,” Madam Centaur said.

Truewit said, “Wait, good madam, and witness the interview of the two friends: Pylades and Orestes. I’ll fetch them out to you straightaway.”

Pylades and Orestes were two good friends. When Agamemnon returned home to Greece after fighting the Trojan War for 10 years, his wife, Clytemnestra, killed him. She had taken a lover during the years that he was away from home. Her son, Orestes, killed her because she killed his father, and Orestes was sentenced to die. His friend Pylades was willing to die in Orestes’ place, although Orestes did not want him to, so both told the executioners, “I am Orestes!”

“Will you, Master Truewit?” Lady Haughty asked.

Dauphine said, “Aye, but, noble ladies, do not confess in your countenance or outward bearing to them any knowledge of their follies, so that we may see how they will bear up again, with what assurance, confidence, and erection.”

“Erection” means uprightness, and it is a sexual pun.

“We won’t, Sir Dauphine,” Madam Haughty said.

“Upon our honors, Sir Dauphine,” Madam Centaur and Mistress Mavis said.

Pretending to speak confidentially, Truewit said to La Foole, who was still in a study, “Sir Amorous! Sir Amorous! The ladies are here.”

From behind the door, La Foole said, “Are they?”

“Yes, but do slip out by and by when their backs are turned and meet Sir John Daw here, as if by chance, when I call you.”

Truewit went to the door of the other study and said, “Jack Daw!”

“What do you have to say, sir?” Jack Daw said from behind the door.

Truewit replied, “Whip out behind me suddenly, and have no anger in your looks toward your adversary.”

He said loudly, “Now, now!”

La Foole and Jack Daw slipped out from behind their separate doors.

“Noble Sir John Daw!” La Foole said. “Where have you been?”

“Seeking you, Sir Amorous,” Jack Daw said.

“Me?” La Foole bowed and said, “I honor you.”

Jack Daw returned the bow and said, “I anticipate you, sir.”

Clerimont said to Dauphine and Truewit, “They have forgotten their rapiers!”

“Oh, they meet in peace, man,” Truewit said.

Dauphine asked Jack Daw, “Where’s your sword, Sir John?”

Clerimont asked La Foole, “And where is yours, Sir Amorous?”

“Mine?” Jack Daw said. “My serving-boy took it away to mend the handle just now.”

“And my gold handle was broken, too, and my boy took it away,” La Foole said.

Dauphine said, “Indeed, sir?”

He said to Truewit and Clerimont, “How their excuses meet and fit together!”

Clerimont said to Dauphine and Truewit, “What a consent there is in the handles!”

In this culture, “handle” can mean excuse.

Truewit said to Clerimont and Dauphine, “Nay, there is so in the points, too, I promise you.”

“Points” means 1) sword-points, and 2) points made in their excuses.

Seeing Morose, Epicene’s husband, Mrs. Otter said, “Oh, me! Madam, he comes again, the madman. Run!”

The ladies, Jack Daw, and La Foole hastily exited.

— 4.7 —

Morose entered the room. He was carrying two swords: those of Jack Daw and La Foole.

He asked, “What are these naked — unsheathed — weapons doing here, gentlemen?”

Truewit answered, “Oh, sir, there was likely to have been murder committed here since you went. A couple of knights quarreled about the bride’s favors; we were obliged to take away their weapons, or else your house would have been begged by this time —”

A criminal's or accomplice's property would be forfeited to the Crown, and it would be begged — petitioned for — in a case of legal confiscation.

“For what?” Morose asked.

“For manslaughter, sir, as being an accessory,” Clerimont said.

“And for her favors?” Morose said.

“Aye, sir, for her heretofore — past favors — not present,” Truewit said.

He then said, “Clerimont, carry their swords to them now. They have done all the hurt they will do.”

Clerimont exited with the two swords.

“Have you spoken with a lawyer, sir?” Dauphine asked Morose.

“Oh, no!” Morose answered. “There is such a noise in the law court that they have frightened me home with more violence than I went. There was such speaking and counter-speaking, with their several voices of citations [summonings to court], appellations [appeals to a higher court], allegations [making charges in court], certificates [giving of testimony], attachments [writs to seize property], interrogatories [questions asked of witnesses or defendants], references [submissions of disputes to the Court of Chancery], convictions, and afflictions indeed among the barristers and attorneys, that the noise here is silence compared to it! Here is a kind of calm midnight.”

Seeing an opportunity, Truewit said, “Why, sir, if you would have the court judgment be resolved, indeed, I can bring you hither a very sufficient, qualified, and capable lawyer and a learned divine who shall inquire into every least uncertainty and scruple of the matter for you.”

“Can you, Master Truewit?” Morose asked.

“Yes, and they are very sober grave persons, who will dispatch the business in a chamber with a whisper or two,” Truewit answered.

“Good sir, shall I hope this benefit from you and trust myself into your hands?” Morose asked.

“Alas, sir!” Truewit said. “Since you went, your nephew and I have been ashamed and often furious when we think how you are abused. Go in, good sir, and lock yourself up until we call you. We’ll tell you more soon, sir.”

“Do your pleasure with me, gentlemen,” Morose said. “I believe in you, and that deserves no delusion. My trust in you ought not to be shown to be deluded. You ought not to trick me.”

This was a reasonable request.

Truewit said, “You shall find none, sir —”

Morose exited.

Truewit continued, “— except heaps and heaps of plenty of vexation.”

“What will you do now, wit?” Dauphine asked Truewit.

“Bring here to me Otter and the barber if you can, by any means, immediately,” Truewit said.

“Why?” Dauphine asked. “For what purpose?”

Truewit answered, “Oh, I’ll make the deepest divine and gravest lawyer out of the two of them, for him —”

“You cannot do that, man,” Dauphine said. “These are waking dreams.”

“Don’t doubt that I can do it,” Truewit said. “Just clap a civil gown with a fur border on one, and clap a canonical cloak with sleeves on the other, and give them a few terms in their mouths. If they don’t come forth as able a doctor and complete a parson for this purpose as may be wished, then don’t trust my judgment. And I hope, without wronging the dignity of either profession, since they are but impersonations, and for mirth’s sake, to torment him. The barber smatters Latin, I remember.”

“Yes, and Otter, too,” Dauphine said.

“Well, then, if I don’t make them — Cutbeard the barber and Mr. Otter — wrangle out and dispute contentiously this case to Morose’s no-comfort, let me be thought a Jack Daw or La Foole or anything worse. Go to your ladies, but first send for Jack Daw and La Foole.”

“I will,” Dauphine said.

They exited.

ACT 5 (Epicene)

— 5.1 —

La Foole, Clerimont, and Jack Daw entered the room.

“Where did you find our swords, Master Clerimont?” La Foole asked.

“Why, Dauphine took them from the madman,” Clerimont answered.

“And he took them from our serving-boys, I assure you,” La Foole said.

“Very likely, sir,” Clerimont said.

“Thank you, good Master Clerimont,” La Foole said. “Sir John Daw and I are both beholden to you.”

“I wish I knew how to make you so, gentlemen,” Clerimont said.

“Sir Amorous and I are your servants, sir,” Jack Daw said. “We are in your debt.”

Mistress Mavis entered the room and said, “Gentlemen, have any of you a pen and ink? I would like to write out a riddle in Italian for Sir Dauphine to interpret and explain.”

“Not I, truly, lady,” Clerimont said. “I am no professional scribe.”

“I can furnish you, I think, lady,” Jack Daw said.

Jack Daw and Mistress Mavis walked to the side, and Daw produced a pen and ink.

Clerimont said, “He has it in the haft of a knife, I believe.”

A haft is a handle. The handles of swords, knives, and walking sticks sometimes had a hollow space for carrying such items.

“No, he has his box of instruments,” La Foole said.

“Like a surgeon!” Clerimont said.

La Foole said, “For the mathematics: He has his square, his compasses, his brass pens, and his black lead in order to draw maps of every place and person where he comes.”

“What!” Clerimont said. “Maps of persons?”

“Yes, sir,” La Foole said. “He has made maps of Nomentack, the Native American from Virginia, when he was here, and of the Prince of Moldavia, and of his mistress, Mistress Epicene.”

By “his mistress,” La Foole meant “Jack Daw’s mistress (loved one),” but his ambiguous use of “his” made it sound as if Epicene were the mistress of the Prince of Moldavia.

“What!” Clerimont said. “He has not found out her latitude, I hope.”

He was punning. In this society, latitude meant 1) location, and 2) laxity (e.g., of conduct).

“You are a pleasant and witty gentleman, sir,” La Foole said.

Mistress Mavis exited, and Jack Daw rejoined Clerimont and La Foole.

“Indeed,” Clerimont said, “now that we are in private, let’s wanton it and be naughty a little and talk waggishly.

“Sir John, I was telling Sir Amorous here that you two govern the ladies; wherever you go, you carry the feminine gender before you.”

His last words were ambiguous and could mean 1) you seduce the ladies, or 2) you act effeminately.

“They shall rather carry us before them if they will, sir,” Jack Daw said.

In other words, the ladies will bear the weight of the men in the missionary position.

“Nay, I believe that they do, with all,” Clerimont said, “but that you are the prime men in their affections, and direct all their actions —”

“Not I,” Jack Daw said. “Sir Amorous is.”

“I declare that Sir John is,” La Foole said.

“As I hope to rise in the state,” Jack Daw said, “Sir Amorous, you have the person.”

“Sir John, you have the person, and the discourse, too,” La Foole said.

By “person,” they meant attractiveness. “Discourse” meant art of conversation.

“Not I, sir,” Jack Daw said. “I have no discourse — and then you have activity, beside.”

“Activity” means 1) gymnastic skill, or 2) sexual activity.

La Foole replied, “I protest, Sir John, you come as high from Tripoli as I do every whit, and you lift as many joint-stools and leap over them, if you would practice it —”

He was talking about vaulting, tumbling, lifting, and jumping. Chances are, both Jack Daw and La Foole did a fair amount of unintentional tripping.

Clerimont said, “Well, agree on it together, knights, for between you, you divide the kingdom or commonwealth of ladies’ affections.”

Clerimont’s meaning was that the ladies of Jack Daw and La Foole were a commonwealth — as a common wealth, they were everyone’s ladies, aka prostitutes. Of course, Jack Daw and La Foole thought that Clerimont meant that they shared all the ladies’ affections between them.

Clerimont continued, “I see it and can perceive a little how they observe you and fear you, indeed. You could tell strange stories, my masters, if you would, I know.”

“In faith, we have seen somewhat, sir,” Jack Daw said. “We have seen some things.”

La Foole said, “That we have: velvet petticoats and embroidered smocks and such.”

Such clothing was worn by high-class ladies — and by prostitutes.

Jack Daw said, “Aye, and —”

He hesitated.

Clerimont said, “Nay, out with it, Sir John. Do not envy your friend the pleasure of hearing, when you have had the delight of tasting.”

Jack Daw, who may not have had any stories to tell in the locker room, said, “Why — ah — you speak, Sir Amorous.”

La Foole, in the same position as Jack Daw, said, “No, you speak, Sir John Daw.”

“Truly, you shall do the speaking,” Jack Daw said.

“Truly, you shall do the speaking,” La Foole said.

Jack Daw said, “Why, we have been —”

La Foole interrupted, “— in the Great Bed at Ware together in our time. Speak, Sir John.”

The Great Bed of Ware could sleep twelve people.

Perhaps the two knights did have stories to tell in a locker room frequented by gay men.

“Nay, you speak, Sir Amorous,” Jack Daw said.

“And these ladies here were with you, knights?” Clerimont asked.

“No, excuse us, sir,” La Foole said.

“We must not wound reputation,” Jack Daw said.

“No matter,” La Foole said. “They were these ladies or other ladies. Our bath cost us fifteen pounds when we came home.”

Some kinds of bath treated venereal disease.

“Listen to me, Sir John,” Clerimont said, “you shall tell me but one thing truly, as you love me.”

“If I can, I will, sir,” Jack Daw said.

“You lay in the same house with the bride Epicene here?” Clerimont said.

“Lay” means reside, but the word also has a sexual meaning.

“Yes, and conversed with her hourly, sir,” Jack Daw said.

Conversation is a kind of intercourse. In this society, the word “conversation” could mean sexual intercourse or intimacy.

“And what disposition has she?” Clerimont asked. “Is she coming and open? Is she free?”

“Coming” meant compliant and eager.

“Oh, exceedingly open, sir,” Jack Daw said. “I was her servant, and Sir Amorous was to be.”

“Come, you have both had favors from her?” Clerimont said. “I know and have heard so much.”

“Oh, no, sir,” Jack Daw said.

“You shall excuse us, sir,” La Foole said. “We must not wound reputation.”

Clerimont said, “Tut, she is married now, and you cannot hurt her with any report, and therefore speak plainly. How many times, truly? Which of you led first?”

“Sir John had her maidenhead, indeed,” La Foole said.

“Oh, it pleases him to say so, sir, but Sir Amorous knows what’s what as well,” Jack Daw said.

“Do you, indeed, Amorous?” Clerimont asked.

“In a manner, sir,” La Foole said.

“Why, I commend you, lad,” Clerimont said. “Little knows Don Bridegroom of this. Nor shall he, as far as I’m concerned.”

“Don” is the Spanish title meaning “Master.”

“Hang him, mad ox,” Jack Daw said.

“Ox” means “fool.” An ox also has horns, the emblem of a cuckold.

“Speak softly,” Clerimont said. “Here comes his nephew with the Lady Haughty. He’ll take the ladies away from you, sirs, if you don’t look out for him in time.”

“Why, if he does, we’ll fetch the ladies home again, I promise you,” La Foole said.

They exited.

— 5.2 —

Lady Haughty and Dauphine entered the room.

Lady Haughty said, “I assure you, Sir Dauphine, it is the price and worth and estimation of your manly virtue only that has caused me to embark on this adventure, and I had to find a way to tell you so; nor can I repent of the act, since it is always evidence of some virtue in ourselves that we love and desire it so in others.”

“Your Ladyship sets too high a value on my weakness,” Dauphine said.

Lady Haughty replied, “Sir, I can distinguish gems from pebbles —”

Dauphine thought, Are you so skillful in stones?

He was punning to himself. The word “stones” can mean 1) jewels, or 2) testicles.

Lady Haughty continued, “— and howsoever I may suffer in such a judgment as yours, by admitting equality of rank or society with Centaur or Mavis —”

Dauphine interrupted, “You do not, Madam. I perceive that they are your mere foils.”

He was punning. The word “foil” can mean 1) setting to show off a jewel, or 2) contrast. In this case, the friends were supposed to contrast with Madam Haughty, to her advantage.

“Then you are a friend to truth, sir,” Lady Haughty said. “It makes me love you the more. It is not the outward but the inward man whom I seek. They are not capable of apprehending an eminent, distinguished perfection; instead, they love flatly and dully.”

Madam Centaur called from outside the room, “Where are you, my Lady Haughty?”

Madam Haughty called back, “I come immediately, Centaur.”

She then said to Dauphine, “My chamber, sir, my page shall show you; and Trusty, my woman, shall be ever awake for you.”

Madam Haughty meant that Mistress Trusty would always be awake to let Dauphine into Madam Haughty’s chamber, but readers can be forgiven if they thought that Mistress Trusty would be always sexually available for Dauphine.

Lady Haughty continued, “You need not fear to communicate anything with her, for she is a Fidelia and lives up to her name.”

The name “Fidelia” is based on the Latin word for “faithful and trustworthy.”

Lady Haughty continued, “I ask you to wear this jewel for my sake, Sir Dauphine.”

She gave him a jewel.

Madam Centaur entered the room.

Lady Haughty asked, “Where’s Mavis, Centaur?”

“She is inside, madam, writing,” Madam Centaur answered. “I’ll follow you soon. I’ll just speak a word with Sir Dauphine.”

Lady Haughty exited.

Dauphine asked, “With me, madam?”

Madam Centaur replied, “Good Sir Dauphine, do not trust Haughty, nor put any faith in her, whatever you do besides. Sir Dauphine, I give you this warning: She is a perfect courtier and loves nobody but those whom she can manipulate and use, and for her uses she loves all.

“Besides, her physicians give her out to be none of the clearest.”

The word “clearest” meant 1) most innocent, and 2) most clear of disease. Urine is supposed to be clear; cloudy urine may mean the presence of disease.

Madam Centaur continued, “Whether she pays them or no, heaven knows.”

Madam Haughty’s physicians talked about her, perhaps because she did not pay them.

Madam Centaur continued, “And she’s above fifty, too, and plasters herself with makeup the way plasterers plaster a wall! See her before noon — before she puts on makeup.”

Carrying a piece of paper, Mistress Mavis entered the room.

Madam Centaur said quietly, “Here comes Mavis, who has a worse face than Madam Haughty! You would not like her face, even by candlelight.”

Candlelight is said to flatter all ladies.

Madam Centaur continued, “If you’ll come to my chamber one of these mornings early, or late in an evening, I’ll tell you more.”

She then asked, “Where’s Haughty, Mavis?”

“Inside, Centaur,” Mistress Mavis answered.

“What have you there?” Madam Centaur asked, referring to the piece of paper.

“An Italian riddle for Sir Dauphine,” Mistress Mavis said.

She thought, You shall not see it, indeed, Centaur.

She then said out loud, “Good Sir Dauphine, solve it for me. I’ll call for it soon.”

Mistress Mavis and Madam Centaur exited together as Clerimont entered the room.

“How are you now, Dauphine?” Clerimont asked. “How do you ’quit yourself of these females?”

Clerimont meant, How do you acquit yourself with these females? Dauphine, however, took the meaning as, How do you rid yourself of these females?

“By God’s light, they haunt me like fairies and give me jewels here,” Dauphine replied. “I cannot be rid of them.”

“Oh, you must not tell, though,” Clerimont said.

Telling other people about a fairy’s gift brought bad luck.

“By the Mass, I forgot that,” Dauphine said. “I was never so assaulted. One loves me for virtue, and she bribes me with this jewel.”

He showed Clerimont the jewel that Madam Haughty had given to him.

He continued, “Another loves me and gives me warnings, and by that means she would possess me. A third brings me a riddle here; and all are jealous and each rails at the others.”

“A riddle?” Clerimont said. “Please let me see it.”

He read the Mistress Mavis’ paper out loud:

Sir Dauphine,

I chose this way of intimation for privacy. The ladies here, I know, have both hope and purpose to make a Collegiate and servant of you. If I might be so honored as to appear at any end of so noble a work, I would start a rumor about my undergoing medical treatment tomorrow and continue it four or five days or longer, for your visitation.

Mavis.

One end of so noble a work was the end of Dauphine's penis.

Visitation was a good deed: It meant to visit the ill. Visitation for the purpose of having an adulterous assignation when one is married — as Madam Centaur was — is not a good deed.

“By my faith, she is a ‘subtle’ one!” Clerimont said. “She calls this a riddle? What would their plain dealing and plain speaking be like, I wonder?”

“We lack Truewit to tell us that,” Dauphine said.

Truewit was known for plain dealing and plain speaking.

“We lack him for something else, too,” Clerimont said. “His knights reformados are wound up as high and insolent as ever they were.”

Reformados are soldiers who have been disbanded but still keep their rank. Clerimont was also punning on “reformed.”

“You jest,” Dauphine said.

He thought that surely they would have learned better behavior after their recent humiliation.

“No drunkards, either with wine or vanity, ever confessed such stories of themselves,” Clerimont said. “I wouldn't give a fly's leg to be put in a balance scale to measure all the women's reputations here, if Jack Daw and La Foole could be thought to speak the truth — they tell false tales about all the women, and if believed, they would ruin every woman's reputation. And as for the bride, they have made their affidavit against her directly —”

“What, have they said that they have lain with her?” Dauphine asked.

“Yes, and they tell times and circumstances, with the cause why and the place where,” Clerimont said. “I had almost brought them to affirm that they had done it today.”

“Not both of them?” Dauphine said.

“Yes, indeed,” Clerimont said. “With one or two more cries of ‘Really!’ or ‘Indeed!’ I would have effected it. They would have signed the affidavit.”

“Why, they will be our entertainment, I see, still, whether we want that kind of entertainment or not,” Dauphine said.

— 5.3 —

Truewit entered the room and said, “Oh, are you here? Come, Dauphine. Go, call your uncle immediately. I have put my divine and my canonist into costumes, dyed their beards, and done all else that is needed; the knaves do not know themselves, they are so exalted and raised in rank and altered. Promotion changes any man.

“Dauphine, you shall guard one door and I will guard another, and then Clerimont will be in the middle, so that Morose may have no means of escape from their caviling, bickering, and hairsplitting when the disguised Cutbeard and the disguised Mr. Otter once grow hot.

“And then the women (as I have given the bride her instructions) are to break in upon him in the l'envoi — the conclusion.

“Oh, it will be full and twanging and exceptionally fine and wonderfully exciting!

“Leave, Dauphine. Fetch Morose.”

Dauphine exited to get his uncle.

Mr. Otter, disguised as a divine, aka minister, entered the room.

Cutbeard the barber, disguised as a canon lawyer, also entered the room.

Truewit said to them, “Come, Master Doctor and Master Parson, look to your parts now and discharge them splendidly. You are well disguised and costumed; perform your parts as well.

“If you happen to forget your lines, do not confess it with standing still or humming or gaping one at another, but go on and talk loudly and eagerly, use vehement gestures, and just remember your technical Latin terms and you are safe.

“Let the matter — the content of your discussion — go where it will; many lawyers improvise.

“But at first be very solemn and grave like your garments, although you let yourselves go afterward and skip out like a pair of jugglers on a table.”

Truewit heard a noise and said, “Here he comes! Set your faces, and look superciliously while I present you.”

Dauphine and Morose entered the room.

Morose asked, “Are these the two learned men?”

“Yes, sir,” Truewit replied. “Will it please you to greet them?”

“Greet them?” Morose said, “I had rather do anything than wear out time so unfruitfully, sir. I wonder how these common forms of greeting, such as ‘May God save you’ and ‘You are welcome,’ have come to be a habit in our lives? Or ‘I am glad to see you!’ — when I cannot see what the profit can be of these words, since it is no whit better with him whose affairs are sad and grievous that he hears this salutation.”

“That is true, sir,” Truewit said. “We’ll get down to business, then.”

The business was divorce or annulment: Morose no longer wanted to be married to Epicene. The fake experts — Mr. Otter and Cutbeard the barber — would discuss the twelve impediments to marriage. These impediments appear in Saint Thomas Aquinas’ Summa Theologica, Supplementum ad Tertiam Partem:

*Error, conditio, votum, cognatio, crimen, cultus disparitas, vis, ordo, ligamen, honestas,
si sis affinis, si forte coire nequibis,
haec socianda vetant connubia, facta retractant.*

These are the impediments that the fake experts will mention:

- 1) impedimentum erroris: impediment arising from error
  - error personae: mistaken identity
  - error fortunae: error as to fortune and property and financial circumstances
  - error qualitatis: mistake as to disposition and character
- 2) conditio: condition, aka social status — for example, whether one is a free person or a slave
- 3) votum: if either has taken a vow of chastity

- 4) cognatio: if the persons are closely related
  - cognatio spiritualis: if the groom was the bride's godfather
- 5) crimen adulterii: the sin of adultery
- 6) cultus disparitas: difference of religion
- 7) vis: upon compulsion or force
- 8) ordo: if the bride had taken holy orders
- 9) ligamen: if one was bound previously to someone else
- 10) publica honestas: public reputation
- 11) affinitas ex fornication: relationship arising from fornication
- 12) si forte coire nequibus: if by chance you are unable to consummate the marriage

Truewit then said, "Gentlemen, Master Doctor and Master Parson, I have acquainted you sufficiently with the business for which you have come hither. And so I know you need not now inform yourselves about the state of the question. This is the gentleman who expects your resolution, and therefore, when you please, begin."

Mr. Otter, disguised as a minister, said, "May it please you to begin, Master Doctor."

Cutbeard the barber, disguised as a canon lawyer, said, "May it please you to begin, good Master Parson."

The divine-disguised Mr. Otter said, "I would hear the canon lawyer speak first."

The canon lawyer-disguised Cutbeard the barber said, "I must give place to practical divinity, sir."

Practical divinity is in contrast to theoretical or speculative divinity.

Morose said, “Nay, good gentlemen, do not throw me into circumstantialities. Let your comforts — those that exist — arrive quickly to me. Be swift in affording me my peace, if I shall hope for any. I don’t love your disputations or your court tumults.

“And so that this won’t be strange to you, I will tell you why I feel this way. My father, in my education, was accustomed to advise me that I should always collect and contain my mind, not allowing it to flow loosely. He advised me to look at what things were necessary to the conduct of my life and what things were not necessary, embracing the one and eschewing the other. In short, he advised me that I should endear myself to rest and avoid turmoil, and this now has grown to be second nature to me.

“This has the result that I come not to your public pleadings or your places of noise — it is not that I do not care about or overlook those things that make for the dignity of the commonwealth, but only that I avoid public pleadings for the mere avoiding of clamors and impertinencies and irrelevances of orators who don’t know how to be silent.

“And it is for the reason of noise that I am now a suitor to you. You do not know in what a misery I have been exercised and tested this day, what a torrent of evil! My very house turns round with the tumult! I dwell in a windmill! The perpetual motion is here, and not at Eltham.”

Cornelius Drebbel demonstrated what was supposed to be a perpetual-motion device at Eltham Palace. This device drew large crowds.

Truewit said to the disguised Cutbeard, “Well, good Master Doctor, will you break the ice? Master Parson will wade in after you.”

“Sir, although I am unworthy and the weaker person, I will presume to go first,” the disguised Cutbeard said.

The disguised Mr. Otter said, “It is no presumption, Domine Doctor.”

Domine means “master.”

“Yet again!” Morose said.

Domine Doctor was a phrase that said much the same thing twice. Both words were titles of respect used to address learned persons.

The disguised Cutbeard said, “Your question is, for how many causes a man may have divortium legitimum, a lawful divorce. First, you must understand the nature of the word ‘divorce,’ which is a divertendo — which is derived from the Latin word for ‘separating.’”

“Make no excursions to discuss words, good Doctor,” Morose said. “Get to the question and answer it briefly and quickly.”

The disguised Cutbeard said, “I answer, then: The canon law affords divorce in only a few cases, and the principal is in the common case, the adulterous case. But there are duodecim impedimenta, twelve impediments (as we call them), all of which do not dirimere contractum, but irritum reddere matrimonium — as we say in the canon law, they do not take away the bond but cause a nullity therein.”

The twelve impediments resulted in a nullification of marriage: No valid marriage ever existed.

“I understood you before,” Morose said. “Good sir, avoid your irrelevance of translation.”

Morose understood Latin and so he did not need the “experts” to translate for him, but the “experts” continued to translate much of the Latin they used — at least for now.

“He cannot expound this too much, sir, by your favor,” the disguised Mr. Otter said.

“Yet more!” Morose said.

More unnecessary words. All Morose wanted was an answer to his question: Could he nullify his marriage to Epicene or divorce her?

Truewit said, “Oh, you must give the learned men permission to speak, sir.”

He then said, “To your impediments, Master Doctor.”

“The first is impedimentum erroris,” the disguised Cutbeard said.

“Of which there are several species or kinds,” the disguised Mr. Otter said.

“Ay, such as error personae,” the disguised Cutbeard said.

“For example: If you contract yourself to one person, thinking her to be someone else,” the disguised Mr. Otter said.

This kind of contract can be a betrothal.

“Then, error fortunae,” the disguised Cutbeard said.

“For example: If she is a beggar, and you thought her to be rich,” the disguised Mr. Otter said.

“Then, error qualitatis,” the disguised Cutbeard said.

“For example: If she proves to be stubborn or headstrong, although you thought that she was obedient,” the disguised Mr. Otter said.

This sounded promising to Morose, who said, “What? Is that, sir, a lawful impediment?”

They both started to talk, and Morose said, “One at a time, please, gentlemen.”

The disguised Mr. Otter said, “Aye, ante copulam, but not post copulam, sir. That is, before the marriage is consummated, but not after the consummation.”

The disguised Cutbeard said, “Master Parson says right. Nec post nuptiarum benedictionem — not after the ecclesiastical blessing of marriage. It does indeed but irrita reddere sponsal — that is, annul the contract of marriage. But after marriage the obstacle is of no obstancy — of no judicial oppositional force.”

The marriage and the consummation of the marriage are two separate events, and so Mr. Otter and Cutbeard the barber were not saying exactly the same thing.

Truewit said, “Alas, sir, what a hope are we fallen from by this timing!”

Morose and Epicene had not consummated the marriage, but they had married.

The disguised Cutbeard said, “The next is conditio: if you thought her freeborn and she proves to be a bondwoman or slave, there is impediment of estate and condition.”

The disguised Mr. Otter said, “Aye, but Master Doctor, those servitudes are sublatae — abolished — now among us Christians.”

By Christians, the disguised Mr. Otter meant Protestant Christians.

The disguised Cutbeard said, “By your favor, Master Parson ___”

The disguised Mr. Otter said, “You shall give me leave, Master Doctor.”

“Nay, gentlemen,” Morose said. “You need not quarrel in discussing that impediment; it does not concern my case. Pass on to the third impediment.”

The disguised Cutbeard said, “Well, then, the third is votum — vow: if either party has made a vow of chastity. But that practice, as Master Parson said of the other impediment, is taken away from among us, thanks be to Protestant church government.”

Catholic nuns and priests who have made a vow of celibacy cannot get married. Neither Morose nor Epicene was Catholic.

The disguised Cutbeard continued, “The fourth impediment is cognatio: if the persons be of kin, within the degrees of kinship that are incestuous.”

The disguised Mr. Otter asked Morose, “Aye, do you know what the degrees are, sir?”

“No, nor do I care, sir,” Morose said. “They offer me no comfort in the question, I am sure.”

He and Epicene were not biologically closely related.

The disguised Cutbeard said, “But there is a branch of this impediment that may apply, which is cognatio spiritualis. If you were her godfather, sir, then the marriage is incestuous.”

“That comment is absurd and superstitious, Master Doctor,” the disguised Mr. Otter said. “I cannot endure it.”

By “superstitious,” he meant “Catholic.”

The disguised Mr. Otter continued, “Are we not all brothers and sisters, and as much akin in that as godfathers and goddaughters?”

“Oh, me!” Morose said. “To end the controversy, let me say that I never was a godfather — I never was a godfather in my life, sir. Pass on to the next obstacle.”

The disguised Cutbeard said, “The fifth is crimen adulterii: the known case.”

The word “case” can mean vagina. “Known case” can mean sexually experienced vagina.

The disguised Cutbeard continued, “The sixth, cultus disparitas: difference of religion. Have you ever examined her about her religion?”

This society opposed Roman Catholicism.

“No,” Morose replied. “I would rather she were of none than be put to the trouble of it.”

“You may have it done for you, sir,” the disguised Mr. Otter said.

“By no means, good sir,” Morose said. “On to the rest. Shall you ever come to an end, do you think?”

“Yes, he has done half, sir,” Truewit said.

They had discussed six of the twelve impediments to marriage.

Truewit said to Mr. Otter and Cutbeard, “On to the rest.”

He then said to Morose, “Be patient and expect the end, sir.”

The disguised Cutbeard said, “The seventh is vis: if it were upon compulsion or force.”

“Oh, no, the marriage was too voluntary, on my part — too voluntary,” Morose said.

The disguised Cutbeard said, “The eighth is ordo: if ever she has taken holy orders.”

“That’s superstitious, too,” the disguised Mr. Otter said.

Again, by “superstitious,” he meant Catholic.

“It does not matter, Master Parson,” Morose said.

Epicene had never been a nun.

Morose continued, “I wish she would go into a nunnery yet!”

The disguised Cutbeard said, “The ninth is ligamen: if you were married, sir, to any other before.”

“I thrust myself too soon into these fetters,” Morose answered.

The disguised Cutbeard said, “The tenth is publica honestas: which is inchoata quaedam affinitas.”

Publica honestas means public decency. Inchoata quaedam affinitas means “(previous) unconsummated marriage.”

The disguised Mr. Otter said, “Aye, or affinitas orta ex sponsalibus, and is but leve impedimentum — a slight impediment.”

Affinitas orta ex sponsalibus means “relationship arising from a betrothal.”

“I feel no air of comfort blowing to me in all this,” Morose said.

The disguised Cutbeard said, “The eleventh is affinitas ex fornicatione.”

Affinitas ex fornicatione means “relationship arising from fornication.” A person who had committed fornication could not marry a close relative of the person with whom he had committed fornication.

The disguised Mr. Otter said, “Which is no less vera affinitas — a true relationship — than the other, Master Doctor.”

The disguised Cutbeard said, “True, quae oritur ex legitimo matrimonio.”

Quae oritur ex legitimo matrimonio means “(no less a true relationship than that) which comes from legal marriage.”

The disguised Mr. Otter said, “You say right, venerable Doctor. And nascitur ex eo, quod per conjugium duae personae efficiuntur una caro —”

Nascitur ex eo, quod per conjugium duae personae efficiuntur una caro means “it follows from this, that through physical union two people are made one flesh.”

“Heyday, now they begin,” Morose said.

Now they were beginning to get far off the track Morose wanted them to follow.

The disguised Cutbeard said, “I conceive you, Master Parson. Ita per fornicationem aequae est verus pater, qui sic generat —”

Ita per fornicationem aequae est verus pater, qui sic generat means “thus he is equally a true father who begets through fornication.”

The disguised Mr. Otter said, “Et vere filius qui sic generatur —”

Et vere filius qui sic generatur means “and he is truly a son who is thus begotten.”

“What’s all this to me?” Morose asked.

Clerimont whispered to Truewit and Dauphine, “Now it grows warm.” The twelfth obstacle was of special interest to the three friends. If none of the first eleven obstacles applied to Morose’s marriage, perhaps the twelfth would.

The disguised Cutbeard said, “The twelfth and last impediment is si forte coire nequibis.”

Si forte coire nequibis means “If by chance you are unable to have sex.”

The disguised Mr. Otter said, “Aye, that is impedimentum gravissimum. It does utterly annul and annihilate, that. If you have manifestam frigiditatem, you are well, sir.”

Impedimentum gravissimum means “very serious impediment.”

Manifestam frigiditatem means “evident frigidity.”

The word “frigid” means “unable to be sexually aroused.” These days, we use the word to mainly refer to women, but this society used the word to also refer to impotent men.

“Why, there is comfort come at length, sir,” Truewit said. “Confess that you are a man who is unable to have sex, and she will sue to be divorced first.”

The disguised Mr. Otter said, “Aye, or if there be morbis perpetuus et insanabilis, such as paralysis, elephantiasis, or so —”

Morbis perpetuus et insanabilis means “a perpetual, continuous, and incurable disease.”

“Oh, but frigidity is the fairer way, gentlemen,” Dauphine said.

The disguised Mr. Otter said, “You say the truth, sir.”

He then said, “And as it is in the canon, Master Doctor —”

“I conceive you, sir,” the disguised Cutbeard said.

Clerimont said to himself, “Before he finishes speaking.”

The disguised Mr. Otter continued, “— that a boy or child under years — underage — is not fit for marriage because he cannot reddere debitum. So your omnipotentes —”

Reddere debitum means “pay the debt,” or “fulfil the obligation.” In marriage, both partners are expected to engage in sex.

Omnipotentes means “omnipotent men.”

The disguised Mr. Otter had made a mistake in his Latin, which Truewit now pointed out.

He whispered to the disguised Mr. Otter, “Your ‘impotentes,’ you whoreson lobster.”

Impotentes means “impotent men.”

A lob is a dull-witted person.

The disguised Mr. Otter said, “Your impotentes, I should say, are minime apti ad contrahenda matrimonium.”

Minime apti ad contrahenda matrimonia means “least suited to making marriages.”

Mr. Otter had again made a mistake in his Latin, which Truewit again pointed out.

He whispered to the disguised Mr. Otter, “‘Matrimonium?’ We shall have most unmatrimonial Latin with you. Say ‘matrimonia,’ and be hanged.”

Mr. Otter’s Latin was unmatrimonial because words that should have had the same grammatical construction did not and so the words were not joined — married — together. Contrahenda is plural, and matrimonium is singular. Contrahenda and matrimonia are both plural, and so they belong together.

Dauphine whispered to Truewit, “You put them out, man.”

Dauphine was worried that Truewit's criticism would make Mr. Otter and Cutbeard forget their lines.

The disguised Mr. Cutbeard said, "But then there will arise a doubt, Master Parson, in our case, post matrimonium, that frigiditate praeditus. Do you conceive — understand — me, sir?"

Post matrimonium means "after marriage."

Frigiditate praeditus means "endowed with frigidity" or "a man who is frigid."

"Very well, sir," the disguised Mr. Otter answered.

"Who cannot uti uxore pro uxore may habere eam pro sorore," the disguised Mr. Cutbeard said.

He meant: A man who cannot keep a wife as a wife may keep her as a sister.

"Absurd, absurd, absurd, and absolutely heretical," the disguised Mr. Otter said.

"You shall pardon me, Master Parson," the disguised Mr. Cutbeard said. "I can prove it."

"You can prove a will, Master Doctor," the disguised Mr. Otter said. "You can prove nothing else."

To "prove a will" means to "show in court that a will is valid."

Mr. Otter was disguised as a minister, and he was making the point that Cutbeard, who was disguised as a lawyer, was out of his element here. This particular question required a religious ruling, not a legal ruling.

The disguised Mr. Otter continued, "Doesn't the verse of your own canon say, Haec socianda vetant conubia, facta retractant —"

The Latin means “These things forbid uniting in marriage, and after marriages have been made these things annul them.”

“I grant you that, but how do they retractare, Master Parson?” the disguised Cutbeard asked. “How do they annul them?”

“Oh, this is what I feared,” Morose said to himself.

“In aeternum, sir,” the disguised Mr. Otter said. “Forever.”

“That’s false in divinity, by your favor,” the disguised Cutbeard said.

“It is false in humanity — secular learning — to say so,” the disguised Mr. Otter said. “Is he not prorsus inutilis ad thorum? Can he praestare fidem datam? I would like to know.”

Prorsus inutilis ad thorum means “utterly useless in bed.”

Praestare fidem datam means “fulfil the promise given.”

The Latin word praestare means “perform.” It can be broken into two words: prae and stare. This means “before” and “to stand.” To the Elizabethans and Jacobean, “to stand” meant “to have an erection.”

“Yes, but what if he does convalescere?” the disguised Cutbeard asked. “What if he recovers his potency?”

“He cannot convalescere,” the disguised Mr. Otter said. “It is impossible.”

Morose tried to leave, but Truewit stopped him.

Truewit said to him, “Nay, good sir, listen to the learned men, or else they’ll think you neglect them.”

The disguised Cutbeard asked, “What if he does simulare himself frigidum, odio uxoris, or so?”

He meant: What if he pretends to be frigid, out of hatred for his wife?

The disguised Mr. Otter replied, “I say he is adulter manifestus — a manifest adulterer — then.”

Dauphine said to Truewit and Clerimont, “They dispute it very learnedly, indeed.”

The disguised Mr. Otter continued, “And prostitutor uxoris — the prostituer of his wife — and this is positive.”

Morose said to Truewit, “Good sir, let me escape.”

“You will not do me that wrong, sir?” Truewit replied.

The disguised Mr. Otter continued, “And therefore if he is manifeste frigidus — manifestly frigid — sir —”

The disguised Cutbeard interrupted, “Aye, if he is manifeste frigidus, I grant you —”

“Why, that was my conclusion,” the disguised Mr. Otter said.

“And mine, too,” the disguised Cutbeard said.

Truewit said to Morose, “Nay, hear the conclusion, sir.”

The disguised Mr. Otter said, “Then, frigiditatis causa —”

The disguised Cutbeard interrupted, “Yes, causa frigiditatis —”

“Oh, my ears!” Morose interrupted, moaning.

The disguised Mr. Otter said to Morose, “She may have libellum divortii — a petition for divorce — against you.”

“Aye, divortii libellum she will surely have —” the disguised Cutbeard said.

“Good echoes, forbear,” Morose said.

They did not need to say everything twice. Doing that hurt his ears twice as much.

“— if you confess that you are impotent,” the disguised Mr. Otter said, finishing for the disguised Cutbeard.

“Which I would do, sir —” the disguised Cutbeard said.

“I will do anything —” Morose said.

The disguised Mr. Otter said, “And clear myself in foro conscientiae — in the forum of conscience —”

In foro conscientiae is a Latin term for “in the forum of conscience.” Some situations are a matter of conscience; they are not a matter of law.

The disguised Cutbeard interrupted, “Because you lack indeed —”

“Yet more!” Morose said.

The disguised Mr. Otter finished for the disguised Cutbeard, “— exercendi potestate — the power of consummation.”

— 5.4 —

Epicene, Madam Haughty, Madam Centaur, Mistress Mavis, Mrs. Otter, Jack Daw, and La Foole entered the room.

“I will not endure it any longer,” Epicene said. “Ladies, I ask that you help me. This is such a wrong as never was offered to a poor bride before. On her marriage day, to have her husband conspire against her, and a couple of mercenary companions — contemptable fellows! — to be brought in for form’s sake to persuade a separation!”

She then said, “If you had blood or virtue — the proper lineage and manly excellence — in you, gentlemen, you would not allow such earwigs around a husband, or allow such scorpions to creep between man and wife.”

An earwig is an ear whisperer, an insinuating parasite.

“Oh, the variety and changes of my torment!” Morose said.

“Let them be cudgeled out of doors by our servants,” Madam Haughty said.

“I’ll lend you my footman,” Madam Centaur said to Epicene.

“We’ll have our men toss them in a blanket in the hall,” Mistress Mavis said.

“Just as there was tossed a man at our house, madam, for peeping in at the door,” Mrs. Otter said.

“That would give satisfaction, indeed,” Jack Daw said.

“Wait, ladies and gentlemen, you’ll hear us out before you proceed, won’t you?” Truewit asked.

“I’d have the bridegroom blanketed, too,” Mistress Mavis said.

“Begin with the bridegroom first,” Madam Centaur said.

“Yes, by my truth,” Madam Haughty said.

“Oh, mankind generation!” Morose said.

He was referring to the ladies, who had traits that are associated with men. This society looked down on masculine women. In this context, “mankind” meant “masculine.”

“Ladies, for my sake, don’t do that,” Dauphine said.

“Yes, for Sir Dauphine’s sake,” Madam Haughty said.

“He shall command us,” Madam Centaur said.

“He is as fine a gentleman of his inches, madam, as any is about the town,” La Foole said.

When La Foole referred to Dauphine’s “inches,” readers may be forgiven for thinking of the length of Dauphine’s penis rather than Dauphine’s tallness.

La Foole added about Dauphine, “And he wears as good colors when he wishes.”

La Foole had in mind heraldic colors, and so he was saying that Dauphine, a knight, wore his heraldic colors when he wished to.

Truewit said to Morose, “Be brief, sir, and confess your infirmity; she’ll be on fire to be quit of you; if she just hears that impotency named once, you shall not be able to entreat her to stay. She’ll flee from you like she would flee from one who had the marks of the plague upon him.”

Morose began, “Ladies, I must crave all your pardons —”

“Silence, ladies,” Truewit said.

Morose continued, “— for a wrong I have done to your whole sex in marrying this fair and virtuous gentlewoman —”

“Hear him out, good ladies,” Clerimont said.

Morose continued, “Being guilty of an infirmity that, before I conferred with these learned men, I thought I might have concealed —”

Truewit interrupted, “But now being better informed in his conscience by them, he is to declare it and give satisfaction by asking your public forgiveness.”

“I am no man, ladies,” Morose said.

“What!” said Madam Haughty, Madam Centaur, Mistress Mavis, Mrs. Otter, Jack Daw, and La Foole.

Morose continued, “I am utterly unable in nature, by reason of frigidity, to perform the duties or any the least office of a husband.”

Mistress Mavis said, “Now, curses upon him, prodigious — monstrous — creature!”

“Bridegroom uncarnate!” Madam Centaur said.

“Uncarnate” means “not carnate” or “not incarnate” — not of flesh and blood. Madam Centaur was saying that Morose lacked some flesh and blood that men normally had.

“And would you offer it to a young gentlewoman?” Madam Haughty said.

“Offer it” could mean “propose marriage” or “offer your impotence” or “present this insult.”

Mrs. Otter added, “A lady of her longings?”

In addition to sexual longings, Mrs. Otter meant ’longings, aka belongings or possessions. She also meant social longings, or social ambition.

Epicene said, “Tut, a device, a device, this is; it smells rankly, ladies. It is a completely fictional comment of his own.”

“Why, if you suspect that, ladies, you may have him examined,” Truewit said.

Jack Daw added, “As the custom is, by a jury of physicians.”

“Yes, indeed, it will be excellent,” La Foole said.

“Oh, me, must I undergo that?” Morose said.

“No, let women examine him, madam,” Mrs. Otter said. “We can do it ourselves.”

“Curses upon me — that is worse!” Morose said.

“No, ladies, you shall not need to,” Epicene said. “I’ll take him with all his faults.”

“This is worst of all!” Morose said.

“Why, then there is no divorce, Doctor, if she doesn’t consent to it?” Clerimont said.

The disguised Cutbeard said, “No, if the man be frigidus and impotent, it is de parte uxoris — on the behalf of the wife — that we grant libellum divortii — a petition of divorce — in the law.”

“Aye, it is the same in theology,” the disguised Mr. Otter said.

“Worse, worse than worst!” Morose moaned.

“Nay, sir, don’t be utterly disheartened,” Truewit said. “We have yet a small relic of hope left, as near as our comfort is blown out.”

He said, “Clerimont, produce your brace — pair — of knights.”

He said to the disguised Mr. Otter, “What was that, Master Parson, you told me in errore qualitatis — mistake as to disposition — just now?”

He then said quietly, “Dauphine, whisper to the bride that she must act as if she were guilty and ashamed.”

The disguised Mr. Otter said, “By the Virgin Mary, sir, in errore qualitatis (which Master Doctor did forbear to urge) if she be found corrupta, that is, vitiated, deflowered, or broken up, that was pro virgine desponsa, espoused for a maiden —”

The error in quality would possibly apply if Morose thought that Epicene was a virgin when he married her although she was actually not a virgin.

Hopeful, Morose asked, “What then, sir?”

The disguised Mr. Otter said, “It does dirimere contractum and irritum reddere, too.”

Dirimere contractum means “cancel the contract,” and irritum reddere means “render it null and void.”

Truewit said to Morose, “If this is true, we are happy again, sir, once more. Here is an honorable pair of knights who shall affirm so much.”

Clerimont led forward Jack Daw and La Foole, both of whom had earlier claimed to have slept with Epicene.

“Pardon us, good Master Clerimont,” Jack Daw said.

“You shall excuse us, Master Clerimont,” La Foole said.

“Nay, you must make it good now, knights,” Clerimont replied, with his hand on the hilt of his sword. “There is no remedy; I’ll eat no words for you, nor no men. You know you spoke it to me?”

In other words, they had to speak up in public about their relationship with Epicene. Clerimont insisted.

“Is this gentlemanlike, sir?” Jack Daw said.

Truewit said quietly, “Jack Daw, Clerimont is worse than Sir Amorous. He is fiercer by a great deal.”

He then said quietly to La Foole, “Sir Amorous, beware! There are ten Jack Daws in this Clerimont.”

He meant that as a fighter Clerimont was as good as ten Jack Daws.

La Foole said out loud, "I'll confess it, sir."

"Will you, Sir Amorous?" Jack Daw asked. "Will you wound reputation?"

"I am resolved to do so," La Foole said.

"So should you be, too, Jack Daw," Truewit said.

He then whispered to him, "What should keep you off? She is only a woman, and in disgrace. Morose will be glad to hear what you have to say about her corruption."

Jack Daw whispered back, "Will he? I thought he would have been angry."

"You will dispatch the business, knights," Clerimont said. "It must be done, truly."

"Why, if it must, it shall, sir, they say," Truewit said. "They'll never go back."

He then said to Jack Daw and La Foole, "Do not tempt his patience."

Jack Daw said to Morose, "It is true, indeed, sir."

La Foole said to Morose, "Yes, I assure you that it is true, sir."

"What is true, gentlemen?" Morose said. "About what do you assure me?"

Jack Daw said, "That we have known your bride, sir —"

La Foole interrupted, "In good fashion. She was our mistress, or so —"

“Nay, you must be plain, knights, as you were to me,” Clerimont said.

A mistress is a loved one, but not necessarily one with whom the lover has slept.

The disguised Mr. Otter said, “Aye, the question is, if you have carnaliter or no. Have you known her carnally?”

“Carnaliter?” La Foole said. “What else, sir?”

The disguised Mr. Otter said, “It is enough: a plain nullity — a plain annulment.”

“I am ruined!” Epicene said. “I am ruined!”

“Oh, let me worship and adore you, gentlemen!” Morose said.

“I am ruined!” Epicene said again.

Morose said to her, “Yes, you have fallen into my hands, for which I thank these knights.”

He then said, “Master Parson, let me thank you otherwise.”

He gave the disguised Mr. Otter money.

“And have they confessed?” Madam Centaur asked.

“Now, curses upon them, the informers!” Mistress Mavis said.

Referring to Jack Daw and La Foole, Truewit said, “You see what creatures you may bestow your favors on, madams.”

Madam Haughty said to Epicene, “I would object to them as beaten knights, wench, and not good witnesses in law.”

In this society, the word “wench” could be used affectionately.

Jack Daw and La Foole were cowardly knights and so they were not good witnesses in a court of law. As knights, they were supposed to be brave; by being cowardly, they were not keeping their knightly vows.

“Poor gentlewoman, how she takes it!” Mrs. Otter said.

Madam Haughty said to Epicene, “Be comforted, Morose. I love you the better for it.”

“So do I, I assure you,” Madam Centaur said.

The disguised Cutbeard asked, “But gentlemen, you have not known her since matrimonium?”

“Not today, Master Doctor,” Jack Daw answered.

“No, sir, not today,” La Foole answered.

The disguised Cutbeard said, “Why, then, I say, for any sexual act before, the matrimonium — the marriage — is good and perfect, unless the worshipful bridegroom did before witnesses precisely demand if she were virgo ante nuptias — a virgin before marriage.”

“No, that he did not, I assure you, Master Doctor,” Epicene said.

“If he cannot prove that, it is ratum conjugium — a valid marriage — notwithstanding the previous events,” the disguised Cutbeard said. “And they do in no way impedire — impede — the marriage. And this is my sentence; this I pronounce.”

The disguised Mr. Otter said to Morose, “I am of Master Doctor’s resolution, too, sir, if you did not make that demand ante nuptias — before marriage.”

“Oh, my heart!” Morose moaned. “Will you break? Will you break? This is the worst of all worst worsts that hell could have devised! Marry a whore! And so much noise!”

“Come,” Dauphine said. “I see now plain confederacy and conspiracy in this doctor and this parson to hoodwink a gentleman. You seek his affliction. Please leave, companions.”

The disguised Mr. Otter and the disguised Cutbeard did not leave.

Dauphine then said to Clerimont and Truewit, “And, gentlemen, I begin to suspect that you are on their side.”

He then said to his uncle, Morose, “Sir, will it please you to hear what I have to say?”

“Oh, do not talk to me!” Morose said. “Don’t take from me the pleasure of dying in silence, nephew.”

“Sir, I must speak to you,” Dauphine said. “I have long been your poor despised kinsman, and many a hard thought has strengthened you against me; but now it shall appear whether I love you or your peace of mind, and whether I prefer them to all the world beside. I will not be long or complaining of grievous injuries to you, sir. If I free you of this unhappy match absolutely and instantly after all this trouble, and free you who are almost in your despair now —”

“It cannot be,” Morose interrupted. “It is impossible for you to do that.”

Dauphine continued, “— sir, if I arrange things so that you will never be troubled with a murmur of it more, what shall I hope for or deserve from you?”

“Oh, whatever you want, nephew!” Morose said. “You shall deserve me and have me.”

“Shall I have your favor entirely for myself, and shall I have your love hereafter?” Dauphine asked.

“You shall have that and anything else besides,” Morose said. “Make your own conditions. My whole estate is yours. Manage it; I will become your ward.”

“Nay, sir, I will not be so unreasonable,” Dauphine said.

“Will Sir Dauphine be my enemy, too?” Epicene asked.

Dauphine said to Morose, “You know I have been long a petitioner to you, uncle, that out of your estate, which is fifteen hundred pounds a year, you would allow me just five hundred during your life and assure that I will inherit the rest after your life ends, concerning which I have often by myself and my friends tendered you a document to sign, which you would never consent or incline to sign. If you please but to effect it now —”

Dauphine wanted a third of Morose’s income simply because he was related to Morose. Such people come out of the woodwork when someone wins a sweepstakes or a lottery.

“You shall have it, nephew,” Morose said. “I will do it, and more.”

Dauphine said, “If I don’t quit you immediately and forever of this encumbrance, you shall have power instantly, I declare before all these people, to revoke your act, and I will become the slave of whomever you will give me to forever.”

“Where is the writing?” Morose said. “I will sign it — that, or I will sign a blank paper, and you can write your own conditions on it.”

“Oh, me!” Epicene said. “I am a most unfortunate, wretched gentlewoman!”

Dauphine would get all; Epicene would get nothing.

“Will Sir Dauphine do this?” Madam Haughty asked.

Crying, Epicene said, “Good sir, have some compassion on me.”

“Oh, my nephew knows you, most likely,” Morose said to her. “Away, crocodile that weeps false tears!”

“Knows you” can mean “knows you sexually” or “sees through you.”

“He does it not, surely, without good ground,” Madam Centaur said.

She wanted to believe the best about Dauphine, whom she had propositioned.

Giving Morose the documents, Dauphine said, “Here, sir.”

“Come, nephew, give me the pen,” Morose said. “I will subscribe my signature to anything, and I will put my seal to whatever you want for my deliverance. You are my restorer.”

Morose signed and returned the documents, saying, “Here, I deliver it to you as my deed. If there is a word in it lacking or written with false orthography [spelling], I declare in advance that I will not take advantage.”

“Then here is your release, sir,” Dauphine said.

He pulled off Epicene’s peruke — her wig — revealing that Epicene was a boy.

“You have married a boy, a gentleman’s son whom I have brought up this half year at my great expense,” Dauphine said, “and brought up for this settlement that I have now made with you.”

He then asked the disguised Cutbeard, “What do you say, Master Doctor? This is justum impedimentum— a just impediment, I hope. It is error personae — mistaken identity?”

The disguised Mr. Otter said, “Yes, sir, in primo gradu — in the first degree.”

The disguised Cutbeard agreed: “In primo gradu.”

Dauphine pulled off Mr. Otter’s and Cutbeard’s false beards and disguises.

He then said to them, “I thank you, good Doctor Cutbeard and Parson Otter.”

He then said to Morose, “You are beholden to them, sir, who have taken these pains for you; and you are beholden to my friend, Master Truewit, who prepared them for the business by providing their disguises. Now you may go in and rest and be as private as you will, sir. I’ll not trouble you until you trouble me with your funeral, which I don’t care how soon it comes.”

In this matter, Dauphine was an asshole.

Morose exited.

Dauphine then said, “Cutbeard, I’ll make your lease good.”

Earlier, Morose had promised Cutbeard that the lease of his house would be free.

Dauphine then parodied his uncle: “Don’t thank me except by bowing, Cutbeard.”

Cutbeard bowed.

Dauphine said, “And Tom Otter, your princess shall be reconciled to you.”

He then looked at Clerimont and Truewit, neither of whom had known that Epicene was a boy, and said, “How are you now, gentlemen? Do you look at me?”

“A boy?” Clerimont asked.

“Yes,” Dauphine said. “Mistress Epicene.”

Truewit said, “Well, Dauphine, you have cheated your friends of the better half of the garland — the glory — by concealing this part of the plot! But I hope it may do you much good — you deserve it, lad.”

He then said, “And, Clerimont, for your unexpectedly bringing in these two to confession, wear my part of the garland freely.”

Next he said, “Nay, Sir Daw and Sir La Foole, you see the gentlewoman who has done you sexual favors! We are all thankful to you, and so should the womenkind here, especially for lying about her, although not lying with her! You meant to do so, I am sure. Were it not that we have fastened your lie upon you today in your own imagined persons, and so recently, this Amazon — Mrs. Otter — the champion of the sex, should beat you now soundly for the common slanders that ladies receive from such cuckoos as you are.”

Cuckoos lay their eggs in the nests of other birds, something these two knights talked about metaphorically doing.

Truewit continued, “You are they who, when no merit or fortune can make you hope to enjoy their bodies, will yet lie with their reputations and make their fame suffer. Leave, you common moths of these and all ladies’ honors!”

Moths make holes; Jack Daw and La Foole had attempted to make metaphorical holes in the reputations of ladies.

Truewit continued, “Go, travel and work to make legs and faces — bows and smirks — and come home with some new matter to be laughed at. You deserve to live in an air as corrupted as that wherewith you feed rumor.”

Jack Daw and La Foole exited.

Truewit then said, “Madams, you are mute upon this new metamorphosis! But here stands she — Epicene — who has vindicated your fames.”

Referring to Jack Daw and La Foole, Truewit said, “Take heed of such insectae — insects — hereafter.”

Truewit deliberately used the incorrect feminine form of the Latin word for insects rather than the correct neuter form to insult the knights by referring to them as effeminate.

Truewit continued, “And let it not trouble you that you have revealed any mysteries — secrets — to this young gentleman. He is almost an adult, and he will make a good visitant — visiting lover — within the next twelve months. In the meantime we’ll all undertake for his secrecy, we who can speak so well of his silence.”

Truewit now spoke to the readers of this book: “Audience, if you like this comedy, rise cheerfully, and, now that Morose has gone in, clap your hands. It may be that the noise of clapping will cure him, or at least please him.”

PROLOGUES

Prologue #1

Truth says, of old the art of making plays
Was to content the people; and their praise
Was to the poet money, wine, and bays [fame / bay laurel wreaths].
But in this age, a sect of writers are,
That, only, for particular likings [narrow tastes] care,
And will taste [try] nothing that is popular.
With such we mingle neither brains nor breasts [share neither thoughts nor feelings];
Our wishes, like to those [who] make public feasts,
Are not to please the cook's taste, but the guests'.
Yet, if those cunning palates [carping critics] hither come,
They shall find guests' entreaty [entertainment], and good room;
And though all relish not, sure there will be some,
That, when they leave their seats, shall make them [the carping critics] say,
Who [He who, i.e., Jonson] wrote that piece, could so have wrote [written] a play,
But that he knew this was the better way.
For, to present all custard [romantic content], or all tart
[satiric content],
And have no other meats [dishes, content in a play], to bear a part.

Or to want [lack] bread, and salt [stinging satire], were but course [pun on coarse] art.

The poet prays you then, with better thought

To sit; and, when his cates [delicacies] are all in brought,

Though there be none far-fet [far-fetched], there will dear-bought

Be fit for ladies: some for lords, knights, esquires;

Some for your waiting-wench, and city-wires [fashionable women who use wires in their ruffs and headdresses];

Some for your men, and daughters of Whitefriars.

Nor is it, only, while you keep your seat

Here, that his feast will last; but you shall eat

A week at ord'naries [inns], on his broken meat [fragments of food/leftovers]:

If his muse be true,

Who commends her[self] to you.

Prologue #2

This is another Prologue occasioned by some person's impertinent exception:

The ends of all who for the scene do write

Are, or should be, to profit and delight;

And still [always] 't hath [it has] been the [subject of] praise of all best times,

So [As long as] persons were not touched [accused], to tax the crimes [to criticize folly].

Then, in this play which we present tonight,

And make the object of your ear and sight,

On forfeit of yourselves, think nothing true [real]

Lest so you make the maker [poet] to judge you;

[If you criticize the satire, it must be because the satire satirizes YOU.]

For he knows poet never credit gained

By writing truths, but things like truths well feigned.

If any yet will, with particular sleight

Of application, wrest [twist] what he doth write,

And that he meant or [either] him or her will say,

They make a libel which he made a play.

A note in the Oxford World Classics edition of Ben Jonson, The Alchemist and Other Plays [Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2008] says this:

Calix: a botched conflation of Cadiz and its English exonym, Cales, referring to the English capture of Cadiz in 1596.

Dictionary.com defines “exonym” in this way:

a name used by foreigners for a place, as Florence for Firenze

a name used by foreigners to refer to a people or social group that the group itself does not use, as Germans for Deutsche.

The description of Jack Daw as a petit poet comes, of course, from Edgar Lee Masters’ Spoon River Anthology:

Petit, the Poet

Seeds in a dry pod, tick, tick, tick,

Tick, tick, tick, like mites in a quarrel—

Faint iambics that the full breeze wakens—

But the pine tree makes a symphony thereof.

Triolets, villanelles, rondels, rondeaus,

Ballades by the score with the same old thought:

The snows and the roses of yesterday are vanished;

And what is love but a rose that fades?

Life all around me here in the village:

Tragedy, comedy, valor and truth,

*Courage, constancy, heroism, failure—
All in the loom, and oh what patterns!
Woodlands, meadows, streams and rivers—
Blind to all of it all my life long.
Triolets, villanelles, rondels, rondeaus,
Seeds in a dry pod, tick, tick, tick,
Tick, tick, tick, what little iambs,
While Homer and Whitman roared in the pines?*

Does Mr. Otter own any animals?

He is not likely to have a real bear, a real horse, or a real bull.

He is fond of bear-baitings and bull-baitings, and he is fond of his drinking cups capped with the artificial animal heads.

Sometimes, Mrs. Otter may seem to be speaking about real animals, but she is speaking about his drinking cups. She does not want him to display them in front of the Lady Collegiates.

For example:

Is a bear a fit beast, or a bull, to mix in society with great ladies? (3.1.13-24)

Truewit tells his companions about the drinking cups in the previous scene (2.6). Mr. Otter has no bear, horse, or bull, but he does have the eccentricity of referring to his drinking cups as if they were real animals. Because of that, his wife does the same thing when she talks to him.

A very shark. He set me i'the nick t'other night at primero.

(4.4.132)

Source of above:

The Cambridge Edition of the Works of Ben Jonson

7 Volume Set. Volume 3.

Ben Jonson (Author), David Bevington (Editor),
Martin Butler (Editor), Ian Donaldson (Editor).

Cambridge University Press, 2012.

According to the Oxford English Dictionary, a shark is “A worthless and impecunious person who gains a precarious living by sponging on others, by executing disreputable commissions, cheating at play, and petty swindling; a parasite; a sharper.”

According to the Oxford English Dictionary, “to set in the nick” means “(perhaps) to cheat (a person) out of his or her money.”

According to the Oxford English Dictionary, “nick” means:

9. (a) In the game of hazard: a throw which is either the same as the main (mainn.2 1b), or has a fixed correspondence to it (see quot. 1797); a winning throw. Now chiefly historical. (b) In the game of craps: a natural.”

This is the note in The Routledge Anthology of Renaissance Drama (2002) on page 309:

set ... nick: unclear; Holdsworth suggests it means 'cleared me out', with La Foole muddling terms from Primero (a card game) with hazard (a dice game); with 'set' meaning bet against, and 'nick' being the winning score in hazard

Of course, if Dauphine had cheated La Foole out of his money, then Dauphine’s purse would not be empty.

In my opinion, the passage is ambiguous:

1) If Dauphine bet against him (“set me”) when La Foole had the winning score (La Foole was “in the nick”), then

Dauphine could very well have an empty purse. La Foole is a fool, and Dauphine is not a fool, but when it comes to games of chance, fortune can sometimes favor fools. In that case, the word “shark” could mean “an impecunious fellow.”

2) But Dauphine could have been the one “in the nick” — he could have had the winning score. In that case, Dauphine would have money in his purse. Also in that case, La Foole is lying about Dauphine’s purse being empty. Also in that case, the word “shark” could mean “a cheat.” La Foole could be lying about that, too.

La Foole may be muddled because he is (possibly) using terms from two different games: one a game of dice (hazard) and the other a game of cards (primero). His language may be muddled and ambiguous because his brain is muddled.

The Oxford English Dictionary also defines “nick” in this way:

III. A precise moment, location, etc., and related senses.

11. Chiefly in in (also at, upon) the (very) nick. The precise or exact point of time when something takes place or requires to be done; a critical or opportune juncture, a crucial moment; (in later use) esp. the latest possible moment.

In that case, “He set me i’the nick t’other night at primero” means “he bet against me at the crucial moment.” This is ambiguous because it does not say who won the bet.

— Entire Play —

These characters are not likable.

La Foole and Jack Daw are fools. So are Mr. and Mrs. Otter.

The Lady Collegiates are despicable.

Truewit has a great name [True-wit-and-intelligence], but he advocates date rape, and some of his opinions about women are despicable.

Dauphine basically is telling his uncle this:

You are my uncle. I am your nephew. You have money. I want money. Your income is 1,500 pounds per year. I want one-third of your income. Although you are capable of having a wife and fathering an heir, I want you to sign a document that will make me the heir of all your wealth.

Dauphine also is willing for Jack Daw to lose his left arm.

Clerimont, perhaps the most likeable character, says he is in love with all the Lady Collegiates. The actor playing Clerimont, however, may make it clear that he does not love all the Lady Collegiates; after all, Clerimont criticizes Lady Haughty in the first scene of the play. Clerimont also remains silent when Clerimont talks about maiming Jack Daw, but Truewit quickly makes it known that Jack Daw will not be physically maimed, perhaps so quickly that Clerimont did not have a chance to say anything.

Truewit, Dauphine, and Clerimont regard themselves as superior to the fools in the play and so they are willing to manipulate the fools into acting much more foolishly than they would on their own.

Truewit, Dauphine, and Clerimont may not be fools, but they are assholes.

Modern audiences are likely to wonder whether Morose's sensitivity to noise is the result of a medicine condition.

William Shakespeare's comedies tend to end in love and reconciliation. Ben Jonson's comedies tend to end in hate and discontent.

Ben Jonson could have titled this play Fools and Assholes.

CHAPTER 9: Ben Jonson's *Every Man in His Humor

CAST OF CHARACTERS (Every Man in His Humor)

KNOWELL an old gentleman

EDWARD KNOWELL his son

BRAINWORM the father's (Old Knowell's) serving-man

MASTER STEPHEN a country gull, Old Knowell's nephew and Edward's cousin. A gull is a simpleton.

GEORGE DOWNRIGHT a plain squire. A squire is a gentleman. Half-brother to Wellbred. Squire Downright is the older half-brother.

WELLBRED Squire Downright's half-brother and Dame Kitely's brother

JUSTICE CLEMENT an old merry magistrate

ROGER FORMAL his clerk, a young man

THOMAS KITELY a merchant

DAME KITELY Kitely's wife and Wellbred's sister and Squire Downright's sister. She must be half-sister to either Wellbred or Squire Downright, but the play doesn't identify which one.

MISTRESS BRIDGET Kitely's sister

MASTER MATTHEW the town gull

THOMAS CASH Kitely's serving-man

OLIVER COB a water-bearer. Water-bearers carried water from conduits to individual houses.

TIB his wife.

CAPTAIN BOBADILL a St. Paul's man. St. Paul's was a place to loiter and to meet people.

SERVANTS and ATTENDANTS

THE SCENE: LONDON

NOTES:

This society believed that the mixture of four humors in the body determined one's temperament. One humor could be predominant. The four humors are blood, yellow bile, black bile, and phlegm. If blood is predominant, then the person is sanguine (active, optimistic). If yellow bile is predominant, then the person is choleric (bad-tempered). If black bile is predominant, then the person is melancholic (sad). If phlegm is predominant, then the person is phlegmatic (calm, apathetic, indolent).

A humor can be a personal characteristic. For example, Edward, Old Knowell's son, has the humor of being devoted to the acquisition of impractical knowledge such as poetry.

A humor can also be a fancy or a whim.

The word "humor" was an in-vogue word in Ben Jonson's day. He may have used it in his title for that reason.

According to Wikipedia, "Humorism began to fall out of favor in the 1850s with the advent of germ theory, which was able to show that many diseases previously thought to be humoral were in fact caused by pathogens."

Humorism has no part in modern medicine.

<https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Humorism#>

In this society, a person of higher rank would use "thou," "thee," "thine," and "thy" when referring to a person of lower rank. (These terms were also used affectionately and between equals.) A person of lower rank would use “you” and “your” when referring to a person of higher rank.

“Sirrah” was a title used to address someone of a social rank inferior to the speaker. Friends, however, could use it to refer to each other.

The year the play Every Man in His Humor was first performed was 1598, and that is likely the year that the play is set.

The reference to Tilley in 4.8 is to this book:

ACT 1 (Every Man in His Humor)

— 1.1 —

Old Knowell and Brainworm talked together outside his house in Hoxton. Knowell was an old gentleman, and Brainworm was his serving-man.

“A goodly — fair — day is coming, and a fresh morning!” Old Knowell said. “Brainworm, call up your young master. Bid him rise, sir. Tell him I have some business to employ him.”

The young master was Edward, Old Knowell’s son.

“I will, sir, at once,” Brainworm said.

“But listen, sirrah,” Old Knowell said. “If he is studying, don’t disturb him.”

“Very well, sir,” Brainworm said.

He exited to carry out his errand.

Alone, Old Knowell said to himself:

“How happy now I should esteem myself if I could by any means wean the boy from one vain course of study he is devoted to! He is a scholar, if a man may trust the liberal, generous voice of reputation in her report. He is of good reputation in both our universities, Oxford and Cambridge, both of which have favored him with degrees. But their indulgence must not produce in me a foolish, doting opinion that he cannot err.

“I myself was once a student and, indeed, I was fed with the self-same humor he is now, dreaming on nothing but idle poetry, that fruitless and unprofitable art, good to none, but least of all to its professors and practitioners, which then I thought the mistress and reigning authority of all knowledge.

“But since then, time and the truth have awakened my judgment, and reason has taught me better to distinguish the vain from the useful learnings.”

Like many people, Old Knowell wanted knowledge to be practical. He did not believe in ars gratia artis: art for the sake of art. His son, Edward, however, reveled in art.

Master Stephen, who was Old Knowell’s nephew and Edward’s first cousin, entered the scene. This society, however, used the word “cousin” to mean a close relative. For example, Old Knowell now used the word to refer to Master Stephen, who was his nephew.

“Cousin Stephen!” Old Knowell said. “What is the news with you that brings you here so early?”

“Nothing but only to come to see how you are, uncle,” Master Stephen said.

“That’s kindly done,” Old Knowell said. “You are welcome, coz.”

The word “coz” meant “cousin” and “relative” and sometimes “close friend.”

“Aye, I know that, sir,” Master Stephen said. “I would not have come otherwise. How is my cousin Edward, uncle?”

“Oh, he is well, coz,” Old Knowell said. “Go in and see him. I suspect he is barely stirring yet.”

“Uncle, before I go in, can you tell me whether he has any book of the sciences of hawking and hunting?” Master Stephen said. “I would like to borrow it.”

“Why, I hope you will not be a-hawking now, will you?” Old Knowell said.

The hunting season was almost over.

“No, wusse — of course — but I’ll practice in preparation for next year, uncle,” Master Stephen said. “I have bought myself a hawk and a hood and bells and all. I lack nothing but a book to teach me how to train and care for it.”

Hawks were blindfolded with a hood that was taken off so they could hunt. Bells attached to their legs made sounds to help hunters keep track of the hawk’s location.

“Oh, that is most ridiculous!” Old Knowell said.

“Nay, look now, you are angry, uncle,” Master Stephen said. “Why, you know, if a man does not have knowledge of the hawking and hunting terminology nowadays, I’ll not give a rush for him.”

A rush is a reed; it is of little worth.

Master Stephen continued, “The hawking and hunting terminology is more studied than the Greek or the Latin. He is qualified for no gallant’s company without that knowledge; and, by gad’s lid, I scorn, aye, so I do, to be a consort for every humdrum, commonplace fellow.”

“Gad’s lid” means “By God’s eyelid.” It is an oath.

Soon Master Stephen would say, “Slid,” which means “By God’s eyelid.” It is another oath.

This society was against blasphemy and therefore invented these oaths.

Master Stephen continued:

“Hang them, the scoundrels! There’s nothing worthwhile in them in the world.

“Why do you talk about it? Because I dwell at Hoxton, shall I keep company with none but the archers of Finsbury, or the citizens who come hunting ducks with water-spaniels to Islington Ponds?

“A fine jest, in faith! ’Slid, a gentleman must show himself like a gentleman. Uncle, I hope that you are not angry. I know what I have to do, I trust. I am no novice.”

He wanted to be a fashionable young fellow.

Old Knowell replied:

“You are a prodigal, absurd coxcomb — a fool. Bah! Nay, never look at me with that expression; it’s I who am speaking.

“Take it as you will, sir. I’ll not flatter you. Haven’t you yet found means enough to waste that which your friends have left you, but you must go and cast away your money on a kite and don’t know how to keep it when you have purchased it?”

A kite is a bird of prey that was regarded as having less worth than a hawk. A proverb stated, “It is impossible to make a good hawk of a kite.”

Old Knowell continued:

“Oh, it’s ‘comely’! This will make you a gentleman!

“Well, cousin, well, I see you are completely past hope of all reclaim.

“Aye, so, now you are told of it, you look another way.”

“What would you have me do?” Master Stephen asked.

Old Knowell replied:

“What would I have you do? I’ll tell you, kinsman:

“Learn to be wise and practice how to thrive, I would have you do that, and not to spend your money on every bauble — trifle — that you fancy, or every foolish brain-notion that humors you.

“I would not have you invade each place, nor thrust yourself on all societies, until men’s affections or your own desert and merit would worthily invite you to your social rank.

“He who is so heedless in his behavior often sells his reputation at a cheap market.

“Nor would I have you melt away yourself in flashy, showy finery, lest, while you affect to make a blaze of gentlemanly behavior to the world, a little puff of scorn would extinguish it and leave you like an ill-smelling wick, whose property — its essential quality — is only to offend.”

Master Stephen was melting away his wealth by spending it on flashy, showy clothing like a candle melting away by spending its wick and wax on a blaze of light.

Knowell continued:

“I’d have you sober and contain yourself, so that your sail isn’t bigger than your boat.

“I would have you instead moderate your expenses now at first, so that you may keep the same proportion always.

“Nor would I have you stand so much on and assert your gentility, which is an airy and mere borrowed thing from dead men’s dust and bones, and none of yours unless you make or hold it.”

Old Knowell did not want his nephew, Master Stephen, to spend all his money now on acting like a wealthy gentleman. Rather, it would be best to moderate his expenses now so that he would have money to live on throughout his life.

Hearing a noise, Old Knowell asked, “Who is coming here?”

— 1.2 —

A servant entered the scene and said, “God save you, gentlemen.”

Master Stephen said:

“Nay, we do not stand much on our gentility, friend.”

“Yet you are welcome, and I assure you that my uncle here is a man with an income of a thousand pounds a year, his income from Middlesex land. He has but one son in all the world; I am his next heir after his son, according to the common law, Master Stephen, as simple as I stand here, if my cousin should die, as there’s hope he will.”

By “simple,” Master Stephen meant “a direct inheritor,” but readers may be forgiven if they think that Master Stephen is simple-minded.

Most people would not talk about the hope of a cousin dying, and certainly not in the presence of the cousin’s father.

Master Stephen continued, “I have a pretty considerable living of my own, too, besides, close by here.”

A living is property from which the owner receives income.

The servant replied, “In good time, sir.”

“In good time” means “certainly,” but the phrase can be used ironically, as if saying, “Yeah, whatever.”

Master Stephen thought that the servant was saying the phrase ironically and therefore mocking him.

““In good time, sir?”” Master Stephen said. “Why, and in very good time, sir. You do not flout and mock me, friend, do you?”

“Not I, sir,” the servant said.

“Not you, sir?” Master Stephen said. “You had best not be, sir. If you should, here are those who can perceive it, and that quickly, too. Bah. And they can give it again soundly, too, if need be.”

“Why, sir, let this satisfy you,” the servant said. “In good faith, I had no such intent to mock you.”

“Sir, if I thought you had, I would talk with you, and that immediately,” Master Stephen said.

The “talking” would consist of insults.

“Good Master Stephen, so you may, sir, at your pleasure,” the servant said.

“And so I would, sir, my ‘good,’ saucy fellow, if you were outside of my uncle’s grounds, I can tell you — though I do not stand upon my gentility, neither, in it,” Master Stephen said.

If Master Stephen were to challenge the servant to a fight while the servant was a visitor on Old Knowell’s property, that would be an insult to Old Knowell.

“Cousin, cousin, will this never be left off?” Old Knowell said. “Will it never end?”

Master Stephen said, “Whoreson, base fellow! A menial serving-man! By this cudgel, if it were not for shame, I would —”

It would be a disgrace for a young gentleman such as Master Stephen to fight a servant. Higher-born people did not fight lower-born people — they were too proud to do so.

Old Knowell said:

“What would you do, you peremptory gull — you utter fool? If you cannot be quiet, get away from here! You see that the honest man conducts himself modestly towards you, giving no reply to your unseasonable, immature quarrelling and rude name-calling. And still you are in a huff, with a kind of bearing as void of intelligence as of humanity.

“Go, get yourself inside! Before heaven, I am ashamed that thou have a kinsman’s claim on me — I am ashamed that thou have a share of my family’s identity.”

His nephew was disgracing the family.

Master Stephen exited.

The servant said, “I ask you, sir, is this Master Knowell’s house?”

“Yes, by the Virgin Mary, it is, sir,” Old Knowell replied.

“I should inquire for a gentleman here, one Master Edward Knowell,” the servant said. “Do you know any such person, sir, I ask you?”

“I should forget myself else, sir,” Knowell replied.

“Are you the gentleman?” the servant asked, removing his hat. “I ask your pardon, sir. I was required by a gentleman in the City, as I rode out at this end of the town, to deliver to you this letter, sir.”

He gave Old Knowell a letter.

“To me, sir?” Old Knowell said. “What do you mean? Please, remember your courtesy.”

The servant’s courtesy was delivering the letter. By “Please, remember your courtesy,” Old Knowell was saying “Please, remember who asked you to deliver the letter.”

Old Knowell read out loud:

“To his most selected friend, Master Edward Knowell.”

He then asked, “What might the gentleman’s name be, sir, who sent it?”

Looking up and seeing that the servant had taken off his hat, he said, “Nay, please, be covered — put your hat on.”

In this society, people customarily wore hats indoors.

“One Master Wellbred, sir,” the servant said, putting on his hat.

“Master Wellbred!” Old Knowell said. “He is a young gentleman, isn’t he?”

The servant replied, “The same, sir. Master Kately married his sister — Kately is a rich merchant in the Old Jewry.”

The Old Jewry was a street in the City — central London — where many well-off Jews had lived before the 1290 expulsion of Jews from England.

“You say very true,” Old Knowell said.

He then called for his own servant, “Brainworm!”

Brainworm entered the scene and said, “Sir?”

“Make this honest friend a drink here,” Old Knowell said.

Giving a visitor a drink before he left was good etiquette.

He said to the servant who had brought him the letter, “Please, go inside.”

The servant and Brainworm went inside Old Knowell’s house.

Alone, Old Knowell said to himself:

“This letter is directed to my son. Yet I am Edward Knowell, too, and may with the safe conscience of good manners use the fellow’s error to my satisfaction.

“Well, I will break open the seal of the letter and read it — old men are curious — if only for the sake of the style and the phrase, to see if both live up to the praises of my son, who has almost become the idolater of this young Wellbred.”

He opened the letter and said, “What have we here? What’s this?”

The letter was written with much slang of the time. It also referred to Edward Knowell by the nickname “Ned.”

Old Knowell read the letter out loud:

“Why, Ned, I ask thee, have thou forsworn all thy friends in the Old Jewry, or do thou think us all still Jews who inhabit there?”

This society was anti-Semitic.

Old Knowell continued reading the letter out loud:

“If thou do, come over and just see our frippery; exchange an old shirt for a whole smock with us.”

A frippery is a secondhand clothes shop.

Literally, the letter invited Edward Knowell to change his clothes.

Figuratively, the “old shirt” was Old Knowell, and the “whole smock” was a healthy woman with no venereal disease.

Old Knowell continued reading the letter out loud:

“Do not conceive that antipathy between us and Hoxton as was between Jews and hogs’ flesh.”

An earlier version of the name “Hoxton” was “Hogs-den.”

Old Knowell continued reading the letter out loud:

“Leave thy vigilant father alone, to number and count over his green apricots of the north-west wall evening and morning. If I had been his son, I would have saved him the labor long since, if taking in all the young wenches who pass by at the back door, and coddling every kernel of the fruit for them, would have served.”

The writer of the letter, Wellbred, would have used the apricots to entice young wenches passing by to let him know or “know” (Biblically) them better. The word “coddling” meant stewing, but he was punning on “cuddling” and on “codling,” which means a scrotum. “Cod” means “bag” or scrotum.

Old Knowell continued reading the letter out loud:

“But prithe come over to me quickly, this morning; I have such a present for thee (our Turkey Company never sent the like to the Grand Signor)!”

The Turkey Company traded with the Turkish Empire and sent lavish gifts to the Sultan.

Old Knowell continued reading the letter out loud, which described the present, which was a couple of fools:

“One is a rhymers, sir, of your own batch of loaves, your own yeast, but who does think himself poet-major of the town, willing to be shown and worthy to be seen. The other — I will not venture his description with you until you come because I would have you make your way hither with an appetite.”

Events would show that he was talking about Master Matthew (a wanna-be poet) and Captain Bobadill (a boastful soldier who spent much time loitering at St. Paul’s).

Old Knowell continued reading the letter out loud:

“If the worst of them be not worth your journey, draw your bill of charges as unconscionable as any Guildhall verdict will give it to you, and you shall be allowed your viaticum.”

A viaticum is money for traveling expenses. Guildhall legal verdicts were often unjust, and so the viaticum would be a greater sum than was reasonable.

Old Knowell read the close of the letter out loud:

“From the Windmill.”

The Windmill is a tavern in Old Jewry.

Old Knowell then said to himself:

“From the bordello, the Spital, or Pict-hatch, this letter might have come as well as from a tavern!”

A bordello is a brothel.

“Spital” meant a hospital that treated venereal disease.

Pict-hatch was a place of low repute with many prostitutes in London.

The letter’s content was about leaving the old man Knowell and instead chasing skirts and laughing at fools.

“Is this Wellbred the man my son has so sung his praises as having the happiest and most felicitous intelligence and the choicest brain the times have sent forth to us?

“I don’t know what he may be in the arts, nor what in schools and studies, but surely for his manners I judge him to be a profane and dissolute wretch, worse by possession of such great good gifts, yet being the master of so loose a spirit.

“Why, what unhallowed ruffian would have written in such a scurrilous manner to a friend?

“Why should he think I count my apricots, or play the Hesperian dragon with my fruit, to watch over it so that it is not stolen?”

Golden apples grew in the garden of the Hesperides, mythological immortal nymphs who lived in the west and took care of the garden. A dragon guarded the apples.

“Well, my son, I would have thought you would have had better judgment in making your selection of your companions than to have taken on trust such petulant, jeering gamesters who can spare no argument or subject from their jest. Such gamesters mock everyone and everything. But I perceive affection makes a fool of any man too much the father.”

Fathers love their sons and for that reason often think too highly of the sons — they often think that their sons are better than their sons really are.

Old Knowell called, “Brainworm!”

Brainworm entered the scene and said, “Sir?”

“Has the fellow who brought this letter gone?” Old Knowell asked.

“Yes, sir, a pretty while ago,” Brainworm replied.

“And where’s your young master?”

“In his bedchamber, sir.”

“Did he speak with the fellow?”

“No, sir, he didn’t see him.”

Old Knowell gave Brainworm the letter and said, “Take this letter and deliver it to my son, but don’t tell him that I have opened it, on your life.”

“Oh, Lord, sir, if I were to tell him, that would be a jest indeed!” Brainworm said.

Indeed, it could lead to comedy.

He exited, carrying the letter.

Alone again, Old Knowell said to himself:

“I am resolved I will not stop my son’s journey into the City, nor practice any violent way to hinder the unbridled course of youth in him, because, when restrained, the course of youth grows more impatient, and in its nature, similar to the eager greyhound of good breed and high spirits, which, even just a little while kept from its game, turns its head and leaps up at its holder’s throat.”

Keeping youths from doing what youths do makes them rebel, sometimes violently.

Old Knowell continued:

“There is a way of winning more by love, and urging of the modesty, than fear. Force works on servile natures, not the free. Those who are compelled to goodness may be good, but they are good only because they are compelled, whereas others, drawn by softness and example, form a habit of acting correctly.

“Then, if they stray, simply warn them, and the same thing they should have done for virtue, they’ll do for shame.”

— 1.3 —

Edward Knowell, holding the letter, which he had not yet read, talked with Brainworm.

“Did he open it, do thou say?” Edward Knowell asked.

“Yes, I give you my word, sir, and he read the contents,” Brainworm answered.

“That scarcely contents me — it hardly makes me happy,” Edward Knowell said. “What expression, I ask thee, did he make while reading it? Was he angry or pleased?”

“Nay, sir,” Brainworm said. “I didn’t see him read it, nor open it, I assure Your Worship.”

“No?” Edward Knowell said. “How do thou know then that he did either?”

Brainworm answered, “By the Virgin Mary, sir, because he charged me on my life to tell nobody that he opened it. If he had not told me that, I would not have known that to tell you.”

“That’s true,” Edward Knowell said. “Well, I thank thee, Brainworm.”

Edward Knowell began to read the letter.

Master Stephen entered the room, unnoticed by Edward Knowell.

Master Stephen said, “Oh, Brainworm, didn’t thou see a fellow here in a what-sha’-call-him jacket? He brought my uncle a letter just now.”

“Yes, I did, Master Stephen,” Brainworm said. “What about him?”

“Oh, I have such a mind — a desire — to beat him! Where is he? Can thou tell me?”

Brainworm said to himself, “In faith, he is not of that mind — opinion.”

Master Stephen wanted to beat the servant, but Brainworm knew, of course, that the servant would not want to be beaten. Or, perhaps, he knew that Master Stephen liked to talk about fighting but not actually fight.

Brainworm said out loud, “He has gone, Master Stephen.”

“Gone?” Master Stephen said. “Which way? When did he go? How long ago?”

“He has ridden away from here,” Brainworm said. “He got on a horse at the street door.”

“And I stayed in the fields!” Master Stephen said. “Whoreson scanderbag — swaggering — rogue! Oh, I wish that I just had a horse to fetch him back again!”

“Scanderbag” was a reference to Albanian nobleman George Castriot’s Turkish name: Iscander Beg, aka Alexander the Governor, a complimentary reference to Alexander the Great. Master Stephen regarded him as swaggering, but the Albanians regarded him as a heroic patriot who successfully led a rebellion against the Turks.

“Why, you may have my mistress’ gelding to serve your longing, sir,” Brainworm said.

“But I have no boots,” Master Stephen said. “That’s the spite of it.”

Riding boots are long to protect the legs from chafing. Lack of riding boots was also an excuse for Master Stephen to avoid riding after the servant and fighting him.

Brainworm began, “Why, a fine wisp of hay rolled hard, Master Stephen —”

Bundled hay could be tied to the inside of a leg to protect it while riding without riding boots. Farmers sometimes did this.

“No, in faith, it’s no boot — no avail — to follow him now. Let him just go, and let him hang,” Master Stephen said. “I ask thee, help to truss me a little. He does so vex me —”

Master Stephen had loosened the laces connecting his tights to his jacket. Now he needed to be trussed — laced — up again.

“You’ll be worse vexed when you are trussed, Master Stephen,” Brainworm said.

A fowl’s legs and wings are trussed — tied — so it can be cooked without drying out those parts of the meat.

Brainworm continued, “You had best stay unlaced, and walk around until you have cooled off. Your choler may founder you else.”

“Choler” is “anger.”

The word “choler” sounded much like “collar,” aka yoke. An improperly yoked animal could founder, aka stumble.

“By my faith, and so I will, now thou tell me that,” Master Stephen said.

Thinking about boots made him think of legs, and so he asked, “How do thou like my leg, Brainworm?”

Were his legs attractive?

“A very good leg, Master Stephen,” Brainworm said, “but the woolen stocking does not commend it so well.”

“Foh!” Master Stephen said, out of patience. “The stockings are good enough, now summer is coming on, for the dust. I’ll have a pair of silk stockings in preparation for winter, for when I go to dwell in the town. I think my leg would show well in a silk hose.”

“Believe me, Master Stephen, they would, rarely well,” Brainworm said.

“Rarely” can mean 1) splendidly, or 2) seldomly.

“Seriously, I think it would,” Master Stephen said. “I have a reasonably good leg.”

“You have an excellent good leg, Master Stephen, but I cannot stay to praise it longer now, and I am very sorry for it,” Brainworm said.

He could be very sorry for the lack of time to praise the leg, or he could be very sorry for the leg, despite having politely praised it.

“Another time will serve, Brainworm,” Master Stephen said. “Gramercy for this.”

Grand merci is French for “many thanks.”

Brainworm exited.

Having read the letter, Edward Knowell laughed.

Master Stephen said to himself, “By God’s eyelid, I hope he isn’t laughing at me. If he is —”

Still unaware of Master Stephen’s presence, Edward Knowell said to himself, “Here was a letter indeed, to be intercepted by a man’s father, and do him good with him! He cannot but think most ‘virtuously’ both of me and the sender, surely, who makes the painstaking costermonger — fruit seller — of him in our ‘Familiar Epistles.’”

Some collections of published letters by such ancient writers as Cicero and Pliny the Younger were titled Epistolae ad Familiares, or Letters to Friends, aka Familiar Epistles.

Edward Knowell knew that after reading the letter, his father must have a poor opinion of the letter-writer.

Edward Knowell continued talking to himself:

“Well, if my father read this with patience, I’ll be gelt, and troll ballads for the music seller Master John Trundle, yonder, the rest of my mortality.”

Italian boys were sometimes gelt — castrated — before puberty to preserve their high singing voices.

The rest of Edward Knowell’s mortality was the rest of his life.

Edward Knowell continued talking to himself:

“It is true and likely my father may have as much patience as another man, for he takes much medicine, and often taking medicine makes a man very patient — and a patient.

“But I wish that your packet, Master Wellbred, had arrived at him in such a minute of his patience; then we would have known the end of it, which now is doubtful, and threatens —”

He noticed the presence of Master Stephen and said to himself:

“My ‘wise’ cousin! So then, I’ll furnish our feast with one gull more toward the mess — a group of four. He writes to me of a brace, aka pair, of fools, and here’s another fool in my room — that’s three fools. Oh, for a fourth!

“Lady Fortune, if ever thou shall use thine eyes, I entreat thee —”

Lady Fortune is often depicted as being blindfolded. Edward Knowell wanted her help in finding a fourth fool. If Edward Knowell were to find a fourth fool, that would be worth her seeing.

Master Stephen said to himself, “Oh, now I see who he laughed at: He laughed at somebody in that letter. By this good light, if he had laughed at me —”

Edward Knowell said out loud, “How are you now, cousin Stephen, melancholy?”

“Yes, a little,” Master Stephen said. “I thought you had laughed at me, cousin.”

“Why, what if I had, coz?” Edward Knowell said. “What would you have done?”

“I swear by this light, I would have told my uncle,” Master Stephen said.

“If you would have told your uncle, then I say that I did laugh at you, coz,” Edward Knowell said.

“Did you, indeed?” Master Stephen asked.

“Yes, indeed,” Edward Knowell said.

“Why, then —” Master Stephen began.

“What, then?” Edward Knowell asked.

“I am satisfied,” Master Stephen said. “It is sufficient.”

“Why, be so, gentle coz,” Edward Knowell said. “And, I ask you, let me entreat a courtesy of you. I am sent for this morning by a friend in the Old Jewry to come to him; to get there is just crossing over the fields to Moorgate.”

Moorgate was a gate in the City wall. Hoxton was close to Moorgate, just across some fields.

Edward Knowell asked, “Will you keep me company? I protest, it is not to draw you into bond, or any plot against the state, coz.”

“I protest” meant “I assure you.”

Being drawn into bond meant assuming someone’s debt. In this instance, it could mean paying Edward Knowell’s and his friend's bar tab, something that Edward was saying would not happen.

Master Stephen answered, "Sir, that doesn't matter, as it were; you shall command me to go twice as far as Moorgate to do you good in such a matter. Do you think I would leave you? I protest —"

Moorgate was perhaps a mile away. Master Stephen was saying that he would walk to Moorgate and back even if it were two miles away.

"No, no, you shall not protest, coz," Edward Knowell said.

"By my fackins, but I will, by your leave," Master Stephen said. "I'll protest more to my friend than I'll speak of at this time."

"Fackins" was a rustic word for "faith." Master Stephen was a rural fellow who had come to London.

"You speak very well, coz," Edward Knowell said.

"Nay, not so, neither, you shall pardon me," Master Stephen said, "but I speak to serve my turn."

By "my turn," he meant "my purpose," but Edward Knowell now punned on the word "turn."

A trip to and from a water conduit was a turn. Water-bearers filled their tankards with water and carried them to houses. They were paid by the turn. Gentlemen such as Edward Knowell and Master Stephen did not work as water-bearers.

"Your turn, coz?" Edward Knowell said. "Do you know what you say? A gentleman of your social rank, talents, bearing, and consequence, to talk of your 'turn' in this company, and to me alone, like a tankard-bearer at a conduit?"

"This company" refers to you, the readers of this book.

Edward Knowell continued:

“Fie! You are a wight — a person — who hitherto his every step has left the stamp of a great foot behind him, as every word has left the savor of a strong spirit behind him!”

“A strong spirit” could mean 1) “much courage,” or 2) “strong breath or mouth odor,” such as alcoholic bad breath.

“And he, this man, by whom I mean you, Master Stephen, is so graced, gilded, or, to use a more fitting metaphor, so tin-foiled by nature, as not ten housewives’ pewter made ready for a good time — a celebration — shows more bright to the world than he! And is he — as I said last, so I say again, and still shall say it — is this man to conceal such real ornaments as these, and shadow their glory and obscure their brilliance as a milliner’s wife does her wrought stomacher with a smoky lawn or a black cyprus?”

“Foil” is a piece of metal placed under a diamond to increase its brilliance. Some people deserve to have precious-metal foil to set off their brilliance; for Master Stephen, tin foil would do.

A milliner sold fancy fabrics such as lawn and cypress as well as such items as wrought stomachers — embroidered coverings for the chest.

Edward Knowell was saying that Master Stephen ought not to hide his talents the way that a milliner’s wife could hide her embroidered stomacher with fabric such as smoky lawn or black cyprus.

“Oh, coz, it cannot be justified; don’t try to do it! Drake’s old ship at Deptford may sooner circle the world again. “

Sir Francis Drake's ship The Golden Hind was anchored at Deptford. In 1580, it had returned to England after circumnavigating the world.

“Come, don't wrong the quality of your desert and merit with looking downward, coz, but hold up your head, so; and let the Idea — the perfect pattern — of what you are be portrayed in your face, so that men may read in your physiognomy, aka face: ‘Here within this place is to be seen the true, rare, and accomplished monster, or miracle, of nature’ — which is all one. What do you think of this, coz?”

Actually, to be the true, rare, and accomplished monster of nature is not a good thing.

“Why, I do think of it, and I will be more proud and melancholy and gentleman-like than I have been, I'll guarantee you,” Master Stephen said.

“Why, that's resolute, Master Stephen,” Edward Knowell replied.

Having “praised” Master Stephen and puffed up his pride, Edward Knowell said to himself, “Now, if I can but hold him up to his height of pride, as it is happily begun, it will do well for an example of suburb humor.”

Pride goes before a fall. People with undeserved pride fall easily.

Edward Knowell continued talking to himself:

“We may perhaps have a match with the city and play Master Stephen against a city gull for forty pounds.”

Edward Knowell wanted to compare a country fool with a city fool (who would turn out to be Master Matthew). He could even make a wager and bet forty pounds that Master

Stephen, the country fool, would prove to be a bigger fool than the city fool.

Edward Knowell said out loud, “Come, coz.”

“I’ll follow you,” Master Stephen said.

“Follow me?” Edward Knowell said. “You must go before me.”

The person with the higher social standing had precedence — that is, he would go first.

Edward Knowell and Master Stephen were both young gentlemen, but Edward Knowell was continuing to puff up Master Stephen’s pride.

“If I must, I will,” Master Stephen said.

He then said, “I ask you to show me the way, good cousin.”

The person who knew the way to Moorgate should be the one to go first and lead the way. Young Stephen should have insisted that Edward Knowell go first.

— 1.4 —

Standing in front of a building and holding a book, Master Matthew said to himself, “I think this is the house.”

He knocked and called, “What ho!”

Cob, the water-carrier whose house it was, opened the door and said, “Who’s there? Oh, Master Matthew! I give Your Worship good morning.”

“What, Cob?” Master Matthew said, surprised to see him. “How are thou, good Cob? Do thou live here, Cob?”

“Aye, sir, I and my lineage have kept a poor house here in our days.”

“To keep a good house” means “to have lots of food and drink.” It also means to rent rooms.

“Thy lineage, Monsieur Cob?” Master Matthew said. “What lineage, what lineage?”

“Why, sir, an ancient lineage and a princely one,” Cob said. “My ancestry came from a king’s belly, no worse man; and yet no man neither — by Your Worship’s leave, I did lie in that — but Herring, the king of fish (I proceed from his belly), one of the monarchs of the world, I assure you. I fetch my pedigree from the first red herring that was broiled in Adam and Eve’s kitchen, by the harrots’ books.”

Red herring is smoked herring.

By “harrots’ books,” Cob meant “heralds’ books.”

Cob continued, “The herring’s cob was my great-great-mighty-great grandfather.”

A “cob” is a head.

Cob was saying that according to the heraldry books, the head of Cob’s family was the head of the first herring Adam and Eve broiled and ate. In fact, it was his “great-great-mighty-great grandfather.”

“Why mighty?” Master Matthew asked. “Why mighty, I ask thee?”

“Oh, it was a mighty while ago, sir, and a mighty great cob,” Cob said.

“How do thou know that?” Matthew asked.

“How do I know that?” Cob said. “Why, I smell his ghost every once in a while.”

“Smell a ghost?” Matthew said. “Oh, unsavory jest! And the ghost of a herring cob!”

“Aye, sir,” Cob said. “With favor of Your Worship’s nose, Master Matthew, why not the ghost of a herring cob as well as the ghost of rasher bacon?”

Rasher bacon is bacon that is thinly sliced for broiling.

“Roger Bacon, would thou say?” Mathew said, thinking of the ghost of Roger Bacon.

“I say rasher bacon,” Cob said. “They were both broiled on the coals; and a man may smell broiled meat, I hope?”

Cob probably meant “they” to mean red herring and rasher bacon, but readers may be forgiven for thinking that “they” meant Roger Bacon and rasher bacon.

Roger Bacon was suspected of practicing black magic, and he was imprisoned because of it. He was not burned at a stake, although that was a punishment for practicing the black arts.

Cob said, “You are a scholar; upsolve me that, now.”

One upsolution would presumably be this:

P1: Rasher Bacon was broiled, and Roger Bacon was burned at the stake.

P2: A man can smell broiled meat.

C: A man can smell rasher bacon and Roger Bacon.

According to Cob, people can smell the ghosts of rasher bacon and of Roger Bacon.

Cob’s “upsolve” was a word of his own invention, one that Master Matthew took exception to.

“Oh, raw ignorance!” Matthew said.

“Raw ignorance” is “unschooled ignorance,” and it is ignorance that has not been broiled.

Matthew then asked, “Cob, can thou tell me about a gentleman, one Captain Bobadill, where his lodging is?”

“Oh, my guest, sir, you mean?” Cob asked.

“Thy guest?” Matthew said. “Alas!”

He laughed. He did not expect a gentleman to take residence in the home of a water-carrier.

“Why do you laugh, sir?” Cob asked. “Don’t you mean Captain Bobadill?”

“Cob, please, advise thyself well; do not wrong the gentleman and thyself, too. I dare be sworn he scorns thy house. He! He lodge in such a base, obscure place as thy house? Tut, I know his disposition so well: He would not lie in thy bed if thou should give it to him.”

“I will not give it to him, though, sir,” Cob said. “By the Mass, I thought something was in it; we could not get him to bed all night. Well, sir, although he does not lie on my bed, he lies on my bench. If it will please you to go up, sir, you shall find him with two cushions under his head and his cloak wrapped about him as though he had neither won nor lost.”

A person who fights hard but neither wins nor loses a fight is likely to be thoroughly tired at the end of the fight.

Cob continued, “And yet I guarantee he never cast better in his life than he has done last night.”

One can cast dice or cast — vomit — excessive alcohol.

“Why, was he drunk?” Matthew asked.

“Drunk, sir?” Cob said. “You do not hear me say so. Perhaps he swallowed a tavern token or some such device, sir.”

Tavern keepers gave tokens rather than coins as change.

Possibly, Captain Bobadill had been drinking so eagerly that he had swallowed a token along with the alcohol.

Cob continued, "I have nothing to do with alcohol; I deal with water and not with wine."

He called to his wife inside his house, "Give me my tankard there, ho!"

He used the tankard to carry water.

In this context, "ho" is an exclamation. He was not calling his wife a 'ho' or whore.

He was going to go to work.

Cob then said to Master Matthew, "God be with you, sir. It's six o'clock in the morning; I should have carried two turns by this time."

He again called to his wife, "What! Ho! My stopple, come!"

A stopple is a stopper for the tankard in which he carried water.

Master Matthew said to himself about Captain Bobadill, "Lie in a water-bearer's house, a gentleman of his havings? Well, I'll tell him my mind."

Captain Bobadill's "havings" are 1) his deportment, and/or 2) his possessions.

Tib, Cob's wife, appeared at the door with a tankard and stopple for Cob.

"What, Tib, show this gentleman up to the Captain," Cob said, taking the tankard and stopple from her.

Master Matthew exited with Tib.

Alone now, Cob said to himself:

“Oh, if my house were the Brazen Head now! In faith, it would even speak, ‘More fools yet!’”

Roger Bacon was supposed to have created a speaking head out of brass or bronze. The Brazen Head makes an appearance in Robert Greene’s play Friar Bacon and Friar Bungay.

Cob continued:

“You should have some people now who would take this Master Matthew to be a gentleman at the least. His father’s an honest man, a worshipful fishmonger, and so forth. He was a member of the Worshipful Company of Fishmongers.”

Mongers are sellers.

Cob continued:

“And now Master Matthew creeps and wriggles into acquaintance with all the fine gallants about the town, such as my guest is — oh, my guest is a fine man! — and they flout him invincibly — without mercy.”

“To flout someone” means “to jeer at him.”

Cob continued:

“Master Matthew goes every day to a merchant’s house where I serve water, one Master Kitely’s, in the Old Jewry; and here’s the jest, he is in love with my master’s sister, Mistress Bridget, and calls her ‘mistress.’”

In this society, a mistress is a woman to whom a man is devoted. The man who loves her is known as her servant.

Cob continued:

“And there he will sit a whole afternoon sometimes, reading of these same abominable, vile — a pox on them, I cannot abide them! — rascally verses, poyetry, poyetry, and speaking of interludes; it will make a man burst to hear him.”

He had an odd way of pronouncing “poetry.”

Interludes are performances.

Interludes are also comic plays. Master Matthew’s reading out loud of his love poems caused people to burst into laughter.

Cob continued:

“And the wenches, they do so jeer and tee-hee at him! Well, if they should do so much to me, I’d forswear them all, by the foot of Pharaoh.

“There’s an oath! How many water bearers shall you hear swear such an oath?”

It was an educated oath. Many water-carriers would not be so learned in their swearing. So said Cob.

Learned swearing can be regarded as legible swearing, as much learning requires reading.

“Oh, I have a guest, he teaches me, he does swear the legiblest of any man christened: ‘by Saint George,’ ‘by the foot of Pharaoh,’ ‘by the body of me,’ ‘as I am a gentleman and a soldier’ — such dainty oaths!

“In addition, he does take this same filthy, roguish — rascally — tobacco, the finest and cleanliest tobacco. It would do a man good to see the fumes of smoke come forth at his tunnels.”

His tunnels are his nostrils.

Cob continued:

“Well, he owes me forty shillings my wife lent him out of her purse by sixpence a time, besides his lodging. I wish I had it.”

“Sixpence at a time”? Eighty loans of sixpence each make a total of forty shillings.

Cob continued:

“I shall have it, he says, the next action.”

The action could be a military action, aka campaign, or a legal action, aka lawsuit — actually, the lawsuit could be instituted by Cob against his guest.

Or it could be Captain Bobadill getting out of bed and working rather than being a parasite.

Cob continued:

“Helter skelter, hang sorrow, care’ll kill a cat, uptails all, and a louse for the hangman!”

“Up tails all” means “topsy turvy,” often in a risqué way.

A hangman was entitled to the clothing of those whom he executed. Much of that clothing would be infested with lice.

Some of these then-common sayings made as much sense as thinking that Captain Bobadill would ever repay his debt.

— 1.5 —

Captain Bobadill was in his room, lying on a bench.

He called, “Hostess! Hostess!”

Tib entered his room and asked, “What do you say, sir?”

“A cup of thy small beer, sweet hostess,” Captain Bobadill answered.

Small beer is weak beer. People of the time drank much small beer, which was regarded as healthful. In fact, the alcohol killed bad germs, the existence of which had not yet been discovered.

In this case, Captain Bobadill was ordering some hair of the dog that bit him. A little alcohol might take the edge off his hangover.

“Sir, there’s a gentleman below who wants to speak with you,” Tib said.

“A gentleman!” Captain Bobadill said. “Ods so, I am not in.”

“Ods so” was a euphemism for “Godso,” which is an oath or an exclamation.

He was not eager to talk to gentlemen. He had too many debts, and he was probably ashamed of where he was living.

“My husband told him you were in, sir,” Tib said.

“What the plague!” Captain Bobadill said. “What did he mean by doing that?”

Master Matthew called from outside the room, “Captain Bobadill!”

Captain Bobadill called back, “Who’s there?”

He then said to Tib, “Take away the basin, good hostess.”

The basin’s purpose was to be vomited in.

He then called, “Come up, sir!”

Tib went to the door and called down to Master Matthew, “He wants you to come up, sir.”

Master Matthew entered the room, carrying his book. Tib exited.

Captain Bobadill said, "You come into a clean house here."

"God save you, sir," Master Matthew said. "God save you, Captain."

"Gentle Master Matthew, is it you, sir?" Captain Bobadill said. "Please, sit down."

"Thank you, good Captain," Master Mathew said.

He looked around but saw no stool, and then he said, "You may see I am somewhat audacious in seeking you out."

"Not so, sir," Captain Bobadill said. "I was invited to supper last night by a company of gallants, where you were wished for and drunk to, I assure you."

"Do me the favor of telling me by whom, good Captain," Master Matthew requested.

"By the Virgin Mary, by young Wellbred and others," Captain Bobadill said.

Noticing that there was no seat, he then called to Tib, "Why, hostess, bring a stool here for this gentleman."

Matthew said, "No haste, sir. All is very well."

"Body of me!" Captain Bobadill said. "It was so late when we parted last night that I can scarcely open my eyes yet; I was but newly risen when you came in. How passes the day abroad, sir? You can tell."

"In faith, it is about a half hour to seven," Master Matthew said. "Now trust me, you have an exceedingly fine lodging here, very neat and private."

Tib brought in a bench.

"Aye, sir, sit down, I bid you," Captain Bobadill said.

Tib exited.

Captain Bobadill continued, “Master Matthew, in any case possess no gentlemen of our acquaintance with notice of my lodging. Do not give them that information.”

“Who, I, sir?” Master Matthew said. “No.”

“Not that I need to care who knows it, for the cabin is convenient, but because I would not be too popular and generally visited, as some are.”

A cabin is a temporary lodging for a soldier; literally, it is a tent.

Captain Bobadill did not want to be too popular and generally visited, no doubt because he wished to avoid creditors.

“True, Captain, I conceive — understand — you,” Master Matthew said.

“For do you see, sir, by the heart of valor in me, except it be to some peculiar — special — and choice spirits to whom I am extraordinarily engaged, such as yourself or so, I could not extend my hospitality thus far,” Captain Bobadill said.

“Oh, Lord, sir! I am convinced of that,” Master Matthew said.

“I confess I love a cleanly and quiet privacy above all the tumult and roar of fortune,” Captain Bobadill said.

Seeing the book Master Matthew was holding, he asked, “What new book have you there? What! ‘Go by, Hieronimo!’”

“Go by, Hieronimo!” was a famous line from Thomas Kyd’s play The Spanish Tragedy. The play was popular, but old-fashioned. Playwrights such as Ben Jonson mocked it in their own plays.

“Aye, did you ever see it acted?” Master Matthew asked.
“Isn’t it well penned?”

“Well penned?” Captain Bobadill said. “I would like to see all the poets of these times pen another such play as that was!”

One of the poets of “these times” was Ben Jonson.

Captain Bobadill continued:

“They’ll prate and swagger and keep a stir of art and devices, but when I, as I am a gentleman, read them, I find that they are the most shallow, pitiful, barren fellows who live upon the face of the earth once more as before.”

Master Matthew said:

“Indeed, here are a number of fine speeches in this book:

“O eyes, no eyes, but fountains fraught with tears!”

“There’s a poetic conceit! There’s a poetic metaphor!

“Fountains fraught with tears!”

“O life, no life, but lively form of death!” Another!

“O world, no world, but mass of public wrongs!” A third!

“Confused and filled with murder and misdeeds.” A fourth!

“O the muses!

“Isn’t it excellent? Isn’t it simply the best that you ever heard, Captain? Huh? How do you like it?”

“It is good,” Captain Bobadill said.

Matthew recited a poem while Captain Bobadill got dressed:

“To thee, the purest object to my sense,

“The most refined essence heaven covers,

“Send I these lines, wherein I do commence

“The happy state of turtle-billing lovers.

“If they prove rough, unpolished, harsh, and rude,

“Haste made the waste — thus mildly I conclude.”

“Turtle-billing lovers” are lovers who kiss like turtle-doves.

Master Matthew stopped reciting.

Captain Bobadill said, “Nay, proceed, proceed. Where’s this poem from?”

Master Matthew said:

“This, sir? It’s a trifle of my own in my nonage, aka minority and immaturity, the infancy of my muses.

“But when will you come and see my study? In good faith, I can show you some very good things I have done recently.”

He then said as Captain Bobadill put on his boots:

“That boot becomes your leg surpassingly well, Captain, I think.”

“So, so,” Captain Bobadill replied. “It’s the fashion gentlemen now use.”

Master Matthew said:

“In truth, Captain, now you speak of the fashion, Master Wellbred’s elder brother and I have fallen out and have quarreled exceedingly.

“This other day I happened to enter into some discourse about a hanger, which, I assure you, both for fashion and workmanship was most preemptory-beautiful and gentleman-like; yet he condemned and called it the most pied and ridiculous hanger that he ever saw.”

A hanger is a loop from which a sword hangs from a sword-belt. Hangers were often decorated.

“Peremptory-beautiful” was a pretentious phrase that meant “utterly beautiful.”

“Pied” meant “parti-colored.” Fools wore motley — parti-colored clothing.

Captain Bobadill said, “Squire Downright is the half-brother to Wellbred, isn’t he?”

“Aye, sir, he is,” Master Matthew said.

“Hang him, the rook,” Captain Bobadill said.

A rook is a simpleton.

“He!” Captain Bobadill said. “Why, he has no more judgment than a malt-horse.”

A malt-horse is a cart-horse that pulled wagons loaded with alcoholic beverages. Proverbially, it was regarded as stupid. (Alcoholics may have regarded it as stupid because it pulled wagons loaded with alcohol but drank none of it.)

“By Saint George, I marvel that you’d lose a thought upon such an animal; he is held to be the most peremptory, absurd clown of Christendom this day. I protest to you, as I am a gentleman and a soldier, I never exchanged words with his like. Judging from his discourse, he should eat nothing but hay. He was born for the manger, pannier, or pack-saddle. He has not so much as a good phrase in his belly, but all old iron and rusty proverbs — a good commodity for some blacksmith to make hobnails of.”

Hobnails were used in the making of heavy boots, and so they were associated with rusticity.

Master Matthew said, “Aye, and he thinks to carry it away and sweep all away before him with his manhood and manly valor always wherever he comes. He brags he will give me the bastinado, as I hear.”

A bastinado is a beating with a cudgel.

“What!” Captain Bobadill said. “He the bastinado? How came he by that word, do you think?”

“Nay, indeed, he said he would ‘cudgel’ me,” Master Matthew said. “I termed it bastinado for my greater credit.”

“That may be, for I was sure bastinado was not in his vocabulary,” Captain Bobadill said. “But when? When did he say this?”

“In faith, yesterday, they say,” Master Matthew said. “A young gallant, a friend of mine, told me so.”

Captain Bobadill said, “By the foot of Pharaoh, if it were my case now and I were in your position, I would send him a chartel immediately.”

A chartel is a challenge to a duel. Two men would fight with swords, often to the death.

Captain Bobadill continued:

“The bastinado? A most proper and sufficient dépendence, warranted by the great Carranza.”

A dépendence is the pretext for a duel.

Jerónimo Sánchez de Carranza wrote a famous treatise on dueling.

Captain Bobadill continued:

“Come hither. You shall chartel him. I’ll show you a trick or two you shall use to kill him with at your pleasure: the first stoccata, if you will, by this air.”

A stoccata is a thrust with a dueling sword.

Master Matthew said, “Indeed, you have absolute knowledge in the mystery, I have heard, sir.”

A mystery is an art. It is a mystery to those who have not learned it. Captain Bobadill had studied the art of dueling. Possibly.

“Heard it from whom?” Captain Bobadill asked. “From whom have you heard it, I ask you?”

“In truth, I have heard it spoken from various people that you have very rare and un-in-one-breath-utterable skill, sir,” Master Matthew said.

“By heaven, no, not I, no skill in the earth,” Captain Bobadill said. “I have some small rudiments in the science of dueling, such as to know my time, distance, or so. I have made myself expert in it more for noblemen’s and gentlemen’s use than for my own practice, I assure you.”

“No skill” but “expert”? Hmm.

Dueling had a bad reputation because it often resulted in the death of a promising young man.

Captain Bobadill said, “Hostess, accommodate us with another bed-staff here quickly.”

A bed-staff was a staff used in making up the bed.

Tib, who had been eavesdropping outside the door, entered the room and Captain Bobadill said, “Lend us another bed-staff!”

Tib exited.

Captain Bobadill said, “The woman does not understand the words of action.”

The words of action included the names of various kinds of swords and dueling terms, such as poniards (daggers). It also included the word “accommodate,” which meant “equip” and which was a fancy term for the times. Ben Jonson considered it a “perfumed” term.

Captain Bobadill, however, may simply have meant that Tib was slow in executing orders. After all, she had been slow in getting a stool for Master Matthew.

Captain Bobadill flourished a bed-staff as if it were a sword and said, “Look you, sir, exalt not your point above this state — position — at any hand (whatever you do), and let your poniard maintain your defense thus.”

Duelists fought with a sword and a dagger; they used the sword to attack and the dagger to deflect thrusts. A poniard is a slim dagger.

Tib returned with another bed-staff.

Captain Bobadill said, “Give it to the gentleman, and leave us.”

She handed the bed-staff to Master Matthew and then exited.

Captain Bobadill said, “So, sir, come on.”

They engaged in fencing practice.

Captain Bobadill said, “Oh, twine your body more about, so that you may fall to a more sweet, comely, gentleman-like guard.”

They made another pass.

Captain Bobadill said, “So, indifferent. Hollow your body more, sir, thus.”

He demonstrated and then said, “Now stand fast on your left leg. Note your distance; keep your due proportion of time.”

Matthew tried it.

Captain Bobadill said, “Oh, you disorder your point most irregularly!”

Master Matthew was holding his “sword” incorrectly.

He tried again and asked, “How is the bearing of it now, sir?”

Captain Bobadill answered, “Oh, out of measure ill! Extremely bad! A well-experienced hand would pass upon you at pleasure.”

By “pass upon you,” he meant “make a successful pass at you,” but Master Matthew wondered whether “pass upon you” meant “pass judgment upon you.”

“What do you mean, sir, by ‘pass upon me’?” Master Matthew asked.

Captain Bobadill answered, “Why, thus, sir, make a thrust at me. Come in upon the answer, control your point, and make a full career at the body. The best-practiced gallants of the time name it the passada: a most desperate thrust, believe it.”

He was using dueling terms. “Answer” means “answering thrust,” and “career” means “lunge.”

“Well, come, sir,” Master Matthew said.

They fenced again.

Captain Bobadill said, “Why, you do not manage your weapon with any facility or grace to invite me. I have no spirit to play with you; your dearth of judgment renders you tedious.”

Fencing using a bed-staff rather than a sword will do that. For some people, however, using a sword rather than a bed-staff won't much help.

"But one venue, sir," Master Matthew said.

A venue is a bout of fencing. It was an out-of-fashion French term.

Captain Bobadill said:

"Venue?' Fie! Most gross denomination as ever I heard. Oh, the stoccata, while you live, sir. Note that.

"Come, put on your cloak, and we'll go to some private place where you are acquainted, some tavern or so, and have a bite.

"I'll send for one of these fencers, and he shall breathe — exercise — you by my direction, and then I will teach you your trick. You shall kill him — Squire Downright — with it at the first pass, if you please.

"Why, I will teach you, by the true judgment of the eye, hand, and foot, to control any enemy's sword-point in the world.

"Should your adversary confront you with a pistol, it would be nothing, by this hand; you should, by the same rule, control his bullet in a line, unless it were buck-shot and spread."

Captain Bobadill claimed he would teach Master Matthew to deflect a bullet with his sword.

He then asked, "How much money do you have about you, Master Matthew?"

"In faith, I have not more than two shillings or so," Master Matthew said.

“It is somewhat with the least — it’s not much money,” Captain Bobadill said. “But come. We will have a bunch of radish and salt to add relish to our wine, and a pipe of tobacco to close the orifice of the stomach, and then we’ll call upon young Wellbred. Perhaps we shall meet the Corydon his half-brother there and put him to the question — we will call him to account.”

Corydon was a shepherd in Virgil’s Eclogues, and so the word meant a rustic fellow here: a yokel.

— 2.1 —

Thomas Kitely, Thomas Cash, and Squire Downright stood together in front of Kitely's place of business in Old Jewry. Kitely was a merchant, and Cash was his serving-man. Kitely was married to Squire Downright's sister, and so they were brothers-in-law.

"Thomas, come here," Kitely said. "There lies a note inside upon my desk. Here, take my key."

He held out the key to Thomas Cash, who took it.

Squire Downright looked at him, questioning this display of trust in a servant: Kitely had much money in the building.

Kitely said, "It doesn't matter, either."

He then asked Thomas Cash, "Where is the boy?"

"Inside, sir, in the warehouse," Cash said.

"Let him count immediately that Spanish gold and weigh it with the pieces of eight," Kitely said.

Pieces of eight are a kind of money.

Kitely added, "Make sure to see to the delivery of those silver fabrics to Master Lucre."

These fabrics had threads of silver woven into them.

Kitely continued, "Tell him, if he will, he shall have the grogran fabrics at the rate I told him, and I will meet him on the Royal Exchange soon."

Grogran fabric was made of mohair, wool, and silk.

"Very well, sir," Cash said as he exited.

“Do you see that fellow, brother-in-law Downright?” Kately asked.

That fellow was Thomas Cash.

“Aye, what about him?” Squire Downright said.

“He is a jewel, brother-in-law,” Kately said. “I took him as a child up at my door and I christened him — I gave him my own name: Thomas. Since then I brought him up and had him educated at Christ’s Hospital, the orphanage, from where when he proved to be a promising imp, I called him home and taught him so much that I have made him my treasurer, and I have given him, who had none, a surname: Cash. And I find him in his place so full of faith and loyalty that I dare to entrust my life into his hands.”

“So would I not put that kind of trust in any bastards, brother-in-law,” Squire Downright said, “as it is likely he is, even if I knew that I myself was his father. But you said you had something to tell me, gentle brother-in-law. What is it? What is it?”

“In faith, I am very loath to utter it,” Kately said, “as fearing it may hurt your patience, except that I know your judgment is of strength against the nearness of affection —”

“The nearness of affection” means “the bias of personal feelings.”

Kately was going to criticize someone close to Squire Downright.

“What is the need for this round-about approach to what you have to say?” Squire Downright complained. “Please, be direct. Say plainly what you have to say.”

Kately, who was married to Squire Downright’s sister, said, “I will not say how much I ascribe and consider due unto your friendship, nor in what regard I hold your love; but let my past behavior and treatment of your sister simply confirm how well I've been affected and disposed to your —”

“You are too tedious,” Squire Downright interrupted. “Come to the matter. Get to the point.”

Kitely was married to the sister of Squire Downright and Wellbred, who were half-brothers and who were his brothers-in-law.

Kitely said:

“Then, without further ceremony, thus:

“My brother-in-law Wellbred, sir, I know not how, recently has much declined in what he was and has greatly altered in his disposition.

“When he came first to lodge here in my house, never trust me if I were not proud of him.

“It seemed to me that he bore himself in such a fashion, so full of manliness and sweetness in his bearing, and — what was chief — it seemed not borrowed, assumed, or acted in him, but all that he did became him as his own, and seemed as perfect, proper, and possessed as breath is by life or color is by the blood.

“But now his course of life is so irregular, so licentious, pretentious, and deprived of grace, and he himself in addition so far fallen off from that first place, as scarcely any sign remains to tell men's judgments where he lately stood.

“He's grown a stranger to all due respect, forgetful of his friends, and now he is not content just to cheapen himself and make himself over-familiar in all societies, and so he makes my house here as common as a marketplace, a theater, a public receptacle for giddy humor and diseased riot.

“And here in my house, as in a tavern or a brothel, he and his wild associates spend their hours in repetition of lascivious jests, swear, leap, drink, dance, and revel night by night, control my servants, and indeed what don’t they do?”

Leaping consisted of acrobatic leaps, but it also referred to the sexual act.

Realizing that Kately wanted him to speak to Wellbred, Squire Downright said:

“Sdeynes, I don’t know what I should say to him in the whole world!”

“Sdeynes” means “By God’s dignesse,” aka “By God’s dignity.”

Squire Downright continued:

“He values me at a cracked three-farthings, for anything I see.”

A three-farthings coin was thin and easily cracked.

Squire Downright continued:

“What is bred in the bone will never get out of the flesh.

“I have told him enough, one would think, if that would serve. But counsel to him is as good as a shoulder of mutton to a sick horse.”

A shoulder of mutton is of no use to a sick horse.

Squire Downright continued:

“Well, he knows what to trust to, I swear before St. George. Let him spend, and spend, and domineer and lord it until his heart aches. If he thinks to be relieved by me when he is put into one of your city prisons for debtors — the Counters — he has the wrong sow by the ear, in faith, and he claps his dish at the wrong man's door.”

Beggars had begging bowls with lids that they clapped against the bowl to make noise and attract attention. Squire Downright was saying that Wellbred would be begging the wrong man for favors if he came to him for money.

Squire Downright continued:

“I'll lay my hand on my halfpenny before I part with it to fetch him out, I'll assure him.”

Squire Downright meant that he would keep a tight hold on his money. He certainly would give none of it to his half-brother — Wellbred — to fetch him out of trouble.

Kitely said, “Nay, good brother-in-law, let it not trouble you thus.”

Squire Downright said:

“By God's death, he maddens me! I could eat my very spur-leathers out of anger.”

Spurs-leathers are leather straps for tying spurs to one's feet.

Squire Downright continued:

“But why are you so tame? Why don't you speak to him and tell him how he disquiets your house?”

Kitely said:

“Oh, many reasons dissuade me from doing that, brother-in-law.

“But if you yourself would consent to undertake it, though just with plain and temperate manner of speech, it would both come much better to his sense and savor less of resentment or of passion.

“You are his elder brother, and that title both gives and warrants you authority, which, backed up by your presence and personal qualities, must breed a kind of duty in him and regard, whereas if I should hint at the least complaint, it would but add contempt to his neglect, heap worse on ill, make up an edifice of hatred, that in the rearing would come tottering down and in the ruin bury all our love.

“Nay, more than this, brother-in-law:

“If I should speak, he would be ready from his heat of cholic humor and overflowing of the vapor in him to whisper into the ears of his close friends the false breath of telling what disgraces and low disparagements I had put upon him, while they, sir, to back him up in creating the false fable, would make their loose comments upon every word, gesture, or look I use. And they would mock me all over, from my flat cap to my shining, blackened shoes.”

Shopkeepers and traders dressed in flat caps and shining, blackened shoes.

Kitely continued:

“And out of all their impetuous riotous fantasies his close friends would beget some slander that shall stick to me.

“And what would that be, do you think?”

“By the Virgin Mary, it would be this:

“They would give out, because my wife is pretty, I myself just lately married, and my sister here sojourning a virgin in my house, that I am jealous!”

Kitely’s sister was Mistress Bridget.

Kitely continued:

“Nay, as sure as death, that is what they would say; and they would say that I had found fault with and quarreled with my brother-in-law Wellbred on purpose, in order to find an apt pretext to banish them — his close friends — from my house.”

“By the Mass, perhaps so,” Squire Downright said. “They’re likely enough to do it.”

Kitely said:

“Brother-in-law, they would, believe it.

“So would I, like one of these penurious quack doctors who sell cure-all medicines, just set the advertisements up to my own disgrace and try experiments upon myself, lend scorn and envy the opportunity to stab my reputation and good name —”

He was interrupted by the entry of guests.

We can wonder whether the characterization of Wellborn by Kitely and Squire Downright is correct.

— 2.2 —

Master Matthew and Captain Bobadill entered the scene.

Master Matthew said to Captain Bobadill about Squire Downright, “I will speak to him —”

Squire Downright was the person with whom Master Matthew had fallen out.

Captain Bobadill interrupted, “— speak to him? Away, by the foot of Pharaoh! You shall not, you shall not do him that grace.”

He then said to Kitely, “The time of day to you, gentleman of the house. Is Master Wellbred up and stirring?”

“What about it then?” Squire Downright said. “What else should he be doing?”

Captain Bobadill said to Kately, “Gentleman of the house, it is to you whom I address myself. Is he within, sir?”

“He came not to his lodging last night, sir, I assure you,” Kately said.

Angry at being ignored, Squire Downright said to Captain Bobadill, “Why, do you hear me? You!”

Captain Bobadill said, “The gentleman-citizen has satisfied me with his answer. I’ll talk to no scavenger.”

He started to leave.

A scavenger is a street-cleaner. In this society, horses were a major means of transportation and so scavengers cleaned up horse dung.

Squire Downright said, “What, ‘scavenger’? Stay, sir, stay!”

Captain Bobadill and Master Matthew exited.

Restraining Squire Downright, Kately said, “Nay, brother-in-law Downright.”

“By God’s heart!” Squire Downright said. “Stand away from me, if you love me.”

“You shall not follow him now, please, brother-in-law,” Kately said. “In good faith, you shall not. I will overrule you.”

“Ha!” Squire Downright said.

He called after Captain Bobadill, “‘Scavenger’? Well, go to . . . I say little, but by this good day — God forgive me that I should swear — if I put up with it so and sheathe my sword, then say I am the rankest cow that ever pissed! By God’s dignity, if I swallow this, I’ll never draw my sword in the sight of Fleet Street, that place of brawls, again while I live. I’ll sit in a barn with Madge Owlet and catch mice first.

‘Scavenger’? By God’s heart, I’ll go near to fill that huge tumbrel slop of yours with something, if I have good luck; your Gargantua breech cannot carry it away so.”

Slops are baggy trousers, and a tumbrel is a cart for hauling away dung. Gargantua was a giant whom Rabelais wrote about in comic novels.

Squire Downright wanted to frighten Captain Bobadill so much that he filled his trousers with a stinky substance so voluminous that even the giant Gargantua’s trousers could not hold it all.

“Oh, do not fret yourself like this!” Kately said. “Never think about it.”

“These are my half-brother’s consorts, these are!” Squire Downright said. “These are Wellbred’s cam’rades, his walking mates! He’s a gallant, a cavaliero, too, and dressed in a style just right for the hangman!”

A cam-rade is a crooked ray. Wellbred was like the sun, and his comrades were like crooked rays emanating from him.

Hangmen were permitted to keep the clothing of the people they hanged, but perhaps Squire Downright meant that Captain Bobadill and Master Matthew wore clothing that exposed the throat, making it easy for a noose to do its work.

Squire Downright said, “Let me not live if I could not find it in my heart to swinge — thrash — the whole gang of them, one after another, and begin with him — Wellbred — first. I am aggrieved it should be said that he is my half-brother and takes these courses of action. Well, as he brews so he shall drink — he’ll get his just deserts, by Saint George, again. Yet he shall hear about it, and that roundly, too, if I live, in faith.”

Kitely said, “But brother-in-law, let your rebuke then run in an easy current, not over-high carried with rashness or devouring choler and anger, but rather use the soft, persuading way, whose powers will work more gently, and compose the imperfect thoughts you labor to reclaim, thereby more winning than enforcing the consent.”

Squire Downright said, “Aye, aye, let me alone for that, I assure you. I’ll take care of it.”

A bell rang, and Kitely said, “What is that now? Oh, the bell rings to call us to breakfast. Brother-in-law, please go in and keep my wife company until I come. I’ll just give orders for some dispatch of business to my servants.”

Squire Downright exited.

— 2.3 —

Cob entered the scene. He was carrying his tankard, and he was late in delivering the water.

“What! Cob?” Kitely said. “Our maids will have you by the back, in faith, for coming so late this morning.”

“Have you by the back” can mean “by the scruff of the neck,” but a strong back is a sign of sexual prowess.

“Perhaps so, sir,” Cob said. “Take heed somebody have not them by the belly for walking so late in the evening.”

A current proverb stated, “The back of a herring, the belly of a wench are best.”

Both are bodily pleasures.

Cob exited.

Alone, Kitely said to himself:

“Well, yet my troubled spirit’s somewhat eased, though not so reposed in that security as I could wish. But I must be content.

“Howsoever I set a face on it and try to look good and comfortable to the world, I would prefer that I had lost this finger by chance, than Wellbred had ever lodged within my house!

“Why, it cannot be, where there is such visitation of wanton gallants and young revelers, that any woman should long be virtuous and chaste.

“Is it likely that factious, rebellious Beauty will preserve the public weal — the commonwealth and common good — of Chastity unshaken when such strong motives muster and make head” — a double entendre — “against Beauty’s and Chastity’s single peace?”

“Make head” means 1) make way, 2) make war, 3) raise an army, and/or 4) raise an erection.

“Single” means 1) lone, 2) weak, and/or 3) unmarried.

“Peace” means 1) opposite of war, 2) tranquility of mind, and/or 3) piece (of ass).

Kitely continued:

“No, no. Beware when two mutual appetites meet to negotiate, and spirits of one kind and quality come once to parley in the pride of blood.”

A proverb of the time stated, “A castle that parleys and a woman who hears will both yield.”

“Pride of blood” means 1) high point of emotion, and/or 2) high point of sexual passion.

Kitely continued:

“It is no slow conspiracy that follows.”

In other words, a sexual conspiracy quickly follows.

Kitely continued:

“Well, to be plain, if I but thought the time had corresponded to their affections and inclinations, and opportunity had matched their sexual desires, all the world would not persuade me but I were a cuckold.

“By the Virgin Mary, I hope they have not got that start. For good fortune has balked and blocked them yet, and shall do still, while I have eyes and ears to attend the accusations of my heart.”

“Attend” means 1) pay attention to, 2) minister to, and/or 3) be present at the scene of.

“Impositions” means 1) commands, 2) accusations, and/or 3) falsehoods.

Kitely continued:

“My presence shall be as an iron bar between the conspiring impulses of desire. Yes, every look or glance my eye ejects shall check their opportunity, as one checks his slave when he forgets his prescribed duties.”

This society believed that the eye ejected beams that allowed it to see. Kitely would keep an eye on things to stop any adultery from occurring.

Dame Kitely (Kitely’s wife) and Bridget (Kitely’s sister) entered the scene.

Dame Kitely said, “Sister Bridget, please, fetch down the rose-water above in the closet.”

Rose-water was often served with fruit and sugar.

Bridget exited to carry out the errand.

Dame Kitely said to her husband, Kitely, "Sweetheart, will you come in to breakfast?"

Kitely said to himself, "I wonder if she overheard me just now!"

"Please, good muss, we are waiting for you," his wife said.

"Muss" was a term of endearment: baby talk for "mouse."

Kitely said to himself, "By heaven, I would not have her overhear what I said for a thousand angels."

Angels are gold coins.

Dame Kitely said, "What ails you, sweetheart? Aren't you well? Speak, good muss."

"In truth, my head aches extremely all of a sudden," Kitely replied.

He was jealous and suspected his wife of cheating on him with one or more of Wellbred's friends.

In this society, men with unfaithful wives were said to have invisible horns growing on their heads. If horns were growing on Kitely's head, that would cause him pain.

Dame Kitely felt his head and said, "Oh, the Lord!"

Did she feel horns?

"What now?" Kitely said. "What?"

"Alas, how your forehead burns!" Dame Kitely said.

He had a fever.

She continued, "Muss, keep yourself warm. In good truth, it is this new disease; there's a number of people who are troubled with it."

The “new disease” was characterized by fever and headache.

She continued, “For love’s sake, sweetheart, come in out of the air.”

Being outside in the air was believed to be harmful for invalids.

Kitely said to himself, “How simple and how subtle are her answers! A new disease, and many troubled with it! Why, truly, she heard me, I bet all the world to nothing.”

“All the world to nothing” means “It’s a sure bet.”

Dame Kitely said, “Please, good sweetheart, come in. The outside air will do you harm, in truth.”

Kitely said to himself, “‘The air’! She has me in the wind. She knows what’s up.”

If a hunter is in the wind, the animal being hunted can smell him.

The “air” could also be gossip in the air that would harm him.

He said out loud, “Sweetheart, I’ll come to you soon. My illness will go away, I hope.”

“Pray to heaven it does,” Dame Kitely said.

She and Bridget exited.

Alone, Kitely said to himself:

“A new disease? I don’t know whether it is new or old, but it may well be called poor mortals’ plague, for like a pestilence it infects the houses of the brain.”

His disease was jealousy. It is an old disease.

In this society, people thought of the brain as having three “houses,” or parts: front, middle, and back. Fancy and imagination were located in the front of the brain. Reason was located in the middle of the brain. Memory was located in the back of the brain.

Kitely continued:

“First it begins solely to work upon the fantasy, filling her seat with such pestiferous, plague-causing air that it soon corrupts the judgment; and from thence sends the same kind of contagion to the memory, still each to other giving the infection, which, as a subtle vapor, spreads itself confusedly through every part capable of sensation until not a thought or motion in the mind is free from the black poison of suspicion.

“Ah, but what misery is it to know this, or, knowing it, to want the mind’s erection — its strength and firmness — in such extremes!

“Well, I will once more strive, in spite of this black cloud, myself to be ...

“And shake the fever off that thus shakes me.”

He exited.

Kitely suspected his wife of being unfaithful to him by having an affair with Wellbred’s friend or friends. He was suffering from melancholic jealousy.

— 2.4 —

Alone, Brainworm, disguised as a wounded veteran, stood on the Moorfields between Hoxton and London, and said to himself:

“By God’s eyelid, I cannot choose but laugh to see myself transformed thus, from a poor creature to a creator; for now must I create an intolerable set of lies, or my present profession loses the grace — excellence and credit — of being a soldier. And yet the lie to a man of my coat is as ominous a fruit as the fico.

Calling a soldier a liar was fighting words: The soldier would fight, or he would lose his honor.

Giving a soldier a fico, aka fig (an obscene gesture) was a fighting gesture: The soldier would fight or lose his honor.

The fruit — outcome — of these words and this action was ominous.

Brainworm then addressed you, the reader of this book:

“Oh, sir, it holds for good polity — stratagem — ever, to have that outwardly in vilest estimation that inwardly is most dear to us. So much for my borrowed disguise.”

Brainworm valued valiant military service, but he was going to play the role of a fake out-of-work soldier: a con man who pretended to be an out-of-work soldier who had been much wounded in battle.

He continued:

“Well, the truth is my old master intends to follow my young master, dryfoot, over Moorfields to London this morning.”

“Dryfoot” was a hunting term that meant to track prey without any pawprints to guide the hunter. The hunter would use only the scent of the prey to track it.

Because Moorfields was often wet, it was difficult to cross with dry feet.

Brainworm continued:

“Now I, knowing of this hunting match, or rather this conspiracy of one, and to insinuate myself with my young master — for so must we who are blue-waiters and men of hope and service do, or perhaps we may wear motley at the year’s end, and you know who wears motley —”

Servants, who waited on their masters, wore blue livery, but unemployed servants wore motley (a coarse fabric) and Fools wore motley (parti-colored clothing). Unless a servant insinuated himself with the young master before the old master died, the servant would be a fool.

Brainworm continued:

“— I have got myself ahead of my young master in this disguise, determining here to lie in ambuscade — ambush — and intercept him in the midway of his journey.

“If I can but get his cloak, his purse, his hat — nay, anything — to cut him off, that is, to stay his journey, ‘Veni, vidi, vici,’ I may say with Captain Caesar; I am made forever, in faith.”

After a military victory, Julius Caesar said, “Veni, vidi, vici”: “I came, I saw, I conquered.”

Brainworm continued:

“Well, now I must practice in order to get the true manner of one of these lance-knights.”

Lance-knights were mercenaries who fought with lances.

Brainworm adopted a military posture, and he said:

“My arm, aka weapon, here, and my — young master!”

He had seen Edward Knowell coming toward him across Moorfields.

Brainworm continued:

“My young master and his cousin, Master Stephen, as I am true counterfeit man of war and no soldier!”

He stood aside, hidden by some bushes.

Edward Knowell and Master Stephen stopped to talk by the bushes where Brainworm was hiding.

Edward Knowell said to Master Stephen, “So, sir, and what then, coz?”

“By God’s foot, I have lost my purse, I think,” Master Stephen said.

In this society, men kept their money in bags that they called purses.

“Lost your purse?” Edward Knowell said. “Where? When did you have it?”

“I cannot tell,” Master Stephen said. “Wait!”

Brainstorm said to himself, “By God’s eyelid, I am afraid they will recognize me, despite my disguise. I wish I could get by them without being seen!”

“Do you have it?” Edward Knowell said.

Master Stephen replied, “No, I think I was bewitched, I —”

“Don’t weep about the loss,” Edward Knowell said. “Hang it, let it go.”

Finding his purse, Master Stephen said, “Oh, it’s here. No, if it had been lost, I would not have cared, except for a jet ring Mistress Mary sent me.”

Jet rings are made of an inexpensive material.

“A jet ring?” Edward Knowell said. “Oh, what is the posy, the posy?”

A posy is a motto engraved inside a ring.

Master Stephen said, “It was fine, in faith:

“Though fancy sleep,

“My love is deep.

“Its meaning is that although I did not fancy her, yet she loved me dearly.”

“It is most excellent!” Edward Knowell said.

Master Stephen said:

“And then I sent her another, and my posy was this:

“The deeper, the sweeter,

“I’ll be judged, by Saint Peter.”

Readers may be forgiven for giggling while reading “The deeper, the sweeter,” which can refer to love, to drinking, and to sex.

“What?” Edward Knowell said. ““By Saint Peter”? I do not conceive that.”

By “conceive,” he meant “understand.”

“By the Virgin Mary,” Master Stephen said, ““Saint Peter’ to make up the meter.”

When it comes to peters, a “meter” is unrealistic. Inches are realistic and can conceive.

Edward Knowell replied, “Well, there the saint was your good patron; he helped you at your need. Thank him, thank him.”

Brainworm had started to sneak away, but he came back, saying to himself, “I cannot take my leave of them like this. I will take a risk, come what will.”

Still disguised as a wounded soldier, Brainworm said out loud:

“Gentlemen, would it please you to exchange a few crowns — a few coins — for a very excellent good blade here?”

“I am a poor gentleman, a soldier, one who in the better state of my fortunes scorned so mean a recourse, but now it is the humor — the whim — of necessity to have it so.

“You seem to be gentlemen well-disposed toward martial men, else I should rather die with silence than live with shame. However, do me the courtesy to remember that it is my need that speaks, not myself. This condition agrees not with my spirit.”

“Where have thou served?” Edward Knowell asked.

Under King Henry VIII and Queen Elizabeth I, England had fought wars with Scotland, France, and Spain. But wars with the countries that the disguised Brainworm will now mention? Not so much.

The disguised Brainworm said:

“May it please you, sir, I have served in all the late wars of Bohemia, Hungaria, Dalmatia, Poland — where have I not served, sir?”

“I have been a poor servitor — serving soldier — by sea and land any time these past fourteen years, and I have followed the fortunes of the best commanders in Christendom.

“I was twice shot at the taking of Aleppo, once at the relief of Vienna. I have been at Marseilles, Naples, and the Adriatic Gulf, a gentleman slave in the galleys thrice, where I was most dangerously shot in the head, through both the thighs; and yet, being thus maimed, I am void of maintenance, nothing left me but my scars, the noted marks of my resolution and courage.”

Sometimes, a wound to the thigh is a way to say a wound to the genitals. If he was wounded through both thighs, he may have been wounded through both testicles. Therefore, in addition to being void of financial maintenance, he was unable to maintain the family line.

Elizabeth I, whose reign began in 1558, was currently Queen of England, and the actions the disguised Brainworm mentioned had not taken place anytime during the past fourteen years. The year the play Every Man in His Humor was first performed was 1598, and that is the date of this conversation. Many of the campaigns the disguised Brainworm mentioned had occurred in the 1530s, and the siege of Marseilles had occurred in 1524.

The disguised Brainworm was pretending to have served “the best commanders in Christendom,” but the Ottoman Turks took Aleppo in 1516 in a battle of Muslim Turks versus Muslim Egyptians.

Many rufflers, aka con men who posed as ex-soldiers, could be found in London and its surrounding areas such as Moorfields.

The disguised Brainworm was acting as both a ruffler and a courtesy-man, a con man who very politely asked for money while praising the marks (people targeted to be conned), for example, as “gentlemen well-disposed toward martial men.”

Master Stephen examined the disguised Brainworm’s sword and asked, “For how much will you sell this rapier, friend?”

The disguised Brainworm replied, “Generous sir, I refer it to your own judgment. You are a gentleman; give me whatever you please.”

“True, I am a gentleman,” Master Stephen said. “I know that, friend. But so what, though? I ask you to tell me for how much would you sell this sword?”

“I assure you, the blade may become the side or thigh of the best prince in Europe,” the disguised Brainworm said.

“Aye, with a velvet scabbard, I think,” Edward Knowell said.

A velvet scabbard would be impractical; it would be decorative. A sword in a velvet scabbard would be unlikely to be used in war.

Master Stephen said, “If it should be mine, it shall have a velvet scabbard, coz, that’s flat — that’s for certain. I’d not wear it as it is if you would give me an angel.”

An angel is a coin.

“At Your Worship’s pleasure, sir,” the disguised Brainworm said. “Nay, it is a most pure Toledo.”

“I had rather it were a Spaniard,” Master Stephen said.

Actually, Toledo swords had a very good reputation and were made in Toledo, Spain.

Master Stephen then said, “But tell me, what shall I give you for it? If it had a silver hilt —”

“Come, come, you shall not buy it,” Edward Knowell said to Master Stephen.

Edward Knowell then gave a coin to the disguised Brainworm and said, “Hold on, there’s a shilling, fellow. Take thy rapier.”

“Why, but I will buy it now because you say so ... because you say such things,” Master Stephen said to Edward Knowell.

He then said to the disguised Brainworm, “And there’s another shilling, fellow. I scorn to be outbid. What, shall I walk with a cudgel, like Higginbottom, when I may have a rapier for money?”

The Old English “hig” was a word for hay. “Higginbottom” is “hay in bottom,” and so “Higginbottom” refers to a man who needs padding for his bottom and so has hay in the bottom part of his pants. The man may have been beaten on his bottom and therefore carries the cudgel for protection.

“You may buy one in the City,” Edward Knowell said.

“Tut, I’ll buy this in the field, so I will,” Master Stephen said. “I have a mind to it because it is a field rapier.”

It was a field rapier because it was being sold on Moorfields, but the disguised Brainworm would, of course, claim that it was a battlefield rapier.

Master Stephen then asked the disguised Brainworm, “Tell me your lowest price.”

“You shall not buy it, I say,” Edward Knowell said.

“By this money, but I will, though I give more for it than it is worth,” Master Stephen said.

“Come away,” Edward Knowell said. “You are a fool.”

“Friend, I am a fool, that’s granted,” Master Stephen said, “but I’ll have it for that word’s sake.”

He then said to the disguised Brainworm, “Follow me for your money.”

“I am at your service, sir,” the disguised Brainworm said.

They exited.

Alone, Old Knowell, Edward’s father, said to himself:

“I cannot lose the thought yet of this letter that was sent to my son, nor cease to wonder at the change of manners and the breeding of our youth within the kingdom since I myself was one.

“When I was young, even a man who lived in a brothel would not have dared to conceive an insult and utter it against a grey head.

“Old age was authority against a buffoon, and an old man had then a certain reverence paid to his years who had none due to his life — so much the sanctity of some prevailed for others.”

Not every old man had lived his life in such a way that demanded respect, but they received respect anyway because other old men had lived their lives in such a way as to demand respect.

“But now we all are fallen. Youths have fallen away from their reverence, and the aged have fallen away from that which bred reverence: good example.

“Nay, I wish that we — even those of us who are parents — were not the first who did destroy the hopes in our own children, and I wish that children would not have learned our vices in their cradles and sucked in our ill customs with their milk.

“Even before all their teeth are born, or they can speak, we make their palates sophisticated.

“The first words we form their tongues with are licentious jests.

“Can it say ‘whore’? Can it say ‘bastard’?

“Oh, then, kiss it: It is a witty child.

“Can it swear? Then it is the father’s darling! Give it two sugarplums.

“Nay, rather than it shall learn no bawdy song, the mother herself will teach it.”

Old Knowell said sarcastically:

“But this is in the infancy, the days of the long petticoat worn by young children. When it puts on the breeches, it will put off all this.”

He then said:

“Aye, it is likely, when its corruption has gone into the bone already.”

Old Knowell continued:

“No, no, this dye does deeper than the coat, or shirt, or skin. It stains all the way to the liver, the seat of violent — and sexual — passion and all the way to the heart, the seat of knowledge and understanding, in some.

“And, rather than it — the child — should not grow up and be corrupt, note what we fathers do. Look how we live, what mistresses we keep, at what expense in our sons’ eyes, where they may handle our gifts to our mistresses, hear our lascivious courtships, see our dalliance, taste of the same sexually stimulating, aphrodisiacal foods with us, to the ruin of our states!

By “states,” he meant 1) bodily health, and 2) estates.

Old Knowell continued:

“Nay, when our own portion of wealth has fled, to prey on our children’s remainder — property held in trust for heirs — we call them into fellowship of vice, bait them with the young chambermaid, to seal, and teach them all bad ways, to buy their affliction and their affection.”

To “seal” means to sign a contract; in this case, the person would sign a contract giving away his property in return for having sex with a young chambermaid.

“This is one path; but there are millions more in which we spoil our own with leading them.

“Well, I thank heaven I never yet was a man who travelled with his son, before he was sixteen, to show him the Venetian courtesans, nor read the grammar of cheating he had made to his sharp boy at twelve, repeating continually this rule: ‘Get money, continually get money, boy, no matter by what means; money will do more, boy, than my lord’s letter — a letter of recommendation from an aristocrat.’

“Neither have I dressed snails or mushrooms in exotic ways before him, perfumed my sauces, and taught him to make them, proceeding continually with my grey gluttony at all the eating-houses, and only feared that his palate would degenerate, not his manners.

“These are the trade of fathers now. However, my son, I hope, has met within my threshold none of these household precedents, which are strong and swift to carry away youth to their — the household precedents’ — precipice. Indeed, the precipice threatens youth.

“But, let the house at home be never so clean-swept, or kept sweet from filth — nay, dust and cobwebs — if he will live away from home with his companions in dung and dung-heaps, then it is worth a fear.

“Nor is the danger of associating familiarly with them — his companions — less than all that I have mentioned by way of example.”

Brainworm, still disguised as a soldier, appeared on the scene.

Seeing Old Knowell, the disguised Brainworm said to himself, “My master! Nay, indeed, have at you. I am fleshed now, I have fared so well.”

By “fleshed,” he meant that he had done well so far: His efforts had been rewarded. Hunting hounds and hawks were given a piece of the flesh of the game that they had helped hunters to kill.

Brainworm had already “attacked” Edward Knowell and Master Stephen and had done well. Now he was going to “attack” Old Knowell. “Have at you” was a cry that meant “I am going to attack you now.”

The disguised Brainworm said to Old Knowell, “Worshipful sir, I beg you, heed and have regard for the estate and condition of a poor soldier. I am ashamed of this base course of life, God’s my comfort, but extremity provokes me to it. What is the remedy?”

Old Knowell replied, “I have nothing for you now.”

“By the faith I bear to truth, gentleman, begging is no ordinary customary behavior in me, but only to preserve my manhood,” the disguised Brainworm said. “I avow to you that a man I have been, and a man I may be, by your sweet bounty.”

“Please, good friend, be satisfied,” Old Knowell said.

“Be satisfied” meant, basically, “leave me alone.”

“Good sir, by that hand, you may do the part of a kind gentleman in lending a poor soldier the price of two mugs of beer, a matter of small value. The King of Heaven shall pay you, and I shall be thankful. Sweet Worship —”

Old Knowell said, “Nay, if you be so importunate —”

Blocking his way, the disguised Brainworm said, “Oh, tender sir, need will have its course. I was not made to this vile use. Well, the sword-edge of the enemy could not have cast me down so much. It’s hard when a man has served in his prince’s cause and be thus —”

He wept, and then continued, “Honorable Worship, let me derive — obtain — a small piece of silver from you; it shall not be given in the course of time — someday, I will return it. By this good ground, I was obliged to pawn my rapier last night for a poor supper; I had sucked the hilts long before pawning my rapier. I am a pagan else, sweet Honor.”

Sucking the hilts was a way of dealing with hunger, such as sucking a pacifier or chewing gum or smoking.

Old Knowell said:

“Believe me, I am taken with some wonder to think that a fellow of thy outward presence would, in the frame and fashion of his mind, be so degenerate and sordid-base.

“Are thou a man? And thou aren’t ashamed to beg? To practice such a servile kind of life?

“Why, no matter how poor your education, having thy limbs, a thousand more attractive courses of action offer themselves to thy election.

“Either the wars might still supply thy wants, or the service of some virtuous gentleman, or honest labor. Nay, what can I name but would become thee better than to beg? But men of thy condition feed on sloth, as does the beetle on the dung she breeds in, not caring how the mettle of your minds is eaten with the rust of idleness.

“Now, before me, whoever he be who would relieve a person of thy quality, while thou persists in this loose, desperate course, I would esteem the sin not thine, but his.”

Giving alms to a beggar with a healthy body would be a sin, according to Old Knowell.

The disguised Brainworm said, “In faith, sir, I would gladly find some other course, if so —”

“Aye, you’d gladly find it, but you will not seek it,” Old Knowell interrupted.

“Alas, sir, where should a man seek?” the disguised Brainworm said. “In the wars there’s no ascent by desert — merit — in these days, but — and for employment as a servant, I wish it were as soon obtained as wished for, the air’s my comfort; I know what I would say —”

“What’s thy name?” Old Knowell interrupted.

“If it pleases you, Fitzsword, sir,” the disguised Brainworm said.

“Fitzsword” means “Son of the Sword.”

“Fitzsword?” Old Knowell said. “Say that a man should give thee employment now. Would thou be honest, humble, just, and true?”

The disguised Brainworm began, “Sir, by the place and honor of a soldier —”

“Nay, nay, I don’t like those affected oaths,” Old Knowell interrupted. “Speak plainly, man: What do thou think about my words?”

“Nothing, sir, but I wish that my fortunes would be as happy as my service should be honest,” the disguised Brainworm said.

“Well, follow me and be my servant,” Old Knowell said. “I’ll test thee and see if thy deeds will bear a proportion to thy words.”

“Yes, sir, immediately,” the disguised Brainworm said. “I’ll just garter my hose for a moment.”

Old Knowell exited as the disguised Brainworm bent over to adjust the garters of his hose.

Alone, the disguised Brainworm said to himself:

“Oh, I wish that my belly were hooped like a barrel to keep it from bursting now! For I am ready to burst with laughing. Never was a bottle or a bagpipe fuller.

“By God’s eyelid, was there ever seen a fox in years — such a cunning old man — who betrayed himself like this?”

Old Knowell had been fooled very much.

The disguised Brainworm said:

“Now I shall be possessed of all his plans, and, by that conduit, aka channel, my young master will also be possessed with knowledge of all his plans because I will tell him.

“Well, he is resolved to test my honesty; in faith, I say that I am resolved to test his patience.

“Oh, I shall deceive him intolerably! This small piece of service will bring him wholly out of love with soldiers forever.

“He will never come within the sign of soldiers — the sight of a soldier’s cassock, aka cloak, or a portable musket-stand — again. He will hate the musters at Mile End for it to his dying day.”

Militias composed of apprentices practiced maneuvers at Mile End.

The disguised Brainworm continued:

“It doesn’t matter. Let the world think me a bad counterfeit if I cannot trick him and give him the slip at an instant.”

Another meaning of the word “slip” is a counterfeit coin.

The disguised Brainworm continued:

“Why, this is better than to have stopped or delayed his journey. Well, I’ll follow him. Oh, how I long to be employed!”

He exited and followed Old Knowell.

— 3.1 —

Master Matthew and Captain Bobadill met Wellbred in the street outside the Windmill Tavern.

Master Matthew said to Wellbred, “Yes, indeed, sir, we were at your lodging to seek you, too.”

“Oh, I did not go there last night,” Wellbred said.

“Your half-brother told us as much,” Captain Bobadill said.

“Who? My half-brother Downright?” Wellbred asked.

“Yes, he,” Captain Bobadill said. “Master Wellbred, I don’t know in what kind of esteem you hold me, but let me say to you this: As sure as honor, I esteem it so much out of the sunshine of reputation to throw the least beam of regard upon such a —”

“Out of the sunshine of reputation” means 1) shade of reputation, and 2) dishonorable.

Knowing that Captain Bobadill was going to talk ill about Squire Downright, Wellbred said, “Sir, I must hear no ill words about my half-brother.”

Captain Bobadill replied, “I protest to you, as I have a thing — a soul — to be saved about me, I never saw any gentleman-like quality —”

“Good Captain, about-face to some other topic of discourse,” Wellbred said.

Captain Bobadill replied, “With your leave, sir, if there were no more men living upon the face of the earth, I should not like him, by Saint George.”

“In truth, neither would I,” Master Matthew said. “He is of a rustical cut — I don’t know how. He does not carry himself like a gentleman of fashion.”

Wellbred replied, “Oh, Master Matthew, that’s a grace peculiar but to a few: quos aequus amavit Jupiter.”

The Latin, which comes from Virgil’s Aeneid VI.129, means this: “Those whom kind Jupiter has loved.”

“I understand you, sir,” Master Matthew said.

“No question you do or you do not, sir,” Wellbred said.

Yes, there was no question whether Master Matthew understood him or — as was more likely — did not understand him.

Edward Knowell and Master Stephen entered the scene.

Seeing Edward, Wellbred said, “Ned Knowell! By my soul, welcome! How do thou, sweet spirit, my genius?”

A genius is a familiar spirit.

Wellbred continued, “By God’s eyelid, I shall love Apollo and the mad Thespian girls the better while I live, for this.”

Apollo is the god of music.

The mad Thespian girls are the Muses, who provide inspiration (and so are mad) to creative people and who frequented the Thespian springs at the foot of Mount Helicon.

Wellbred continued, “My dear Fury, now I see there’s some love in thee.”

Calling Edward Knowell a Fury was a joke, as the Furies were avenging spirits who came from the Land of the Dead, but in Aeschylus’ tragedy Eumenides, the Furies acquired the name of the Eumenides, aka the Kindly Ones. In the play, crimes began to be tried in courts of law instead of crimes being avenged by the Furies.

The love in Edward Knowell was shown by Edward's coming to the Windmill Tavern as invited.

Wellbred and Edward Knowell then talked privately between themselves; the others could not hear them.

Wellbred said to Edward Knowell:

“Sirrah, these are the two” — he pointed to Captain Bobadill and Master Matthew — “I wrote to thee about.

“Nay, what a drowsy humor is this now? Why don't thou speak?”

“Oh, you are a fine gallant!” Edward Knowell said. “You sent me a ‘splendid’ letter.”

“Why, wasn't it splendid?” Wellbred asked.

“Yes, I'll be sworn I was never guilty of reading the like,” Edward Knowell said. “Match it in all Pliny the Younger's or Symmachus' epistles, and I'll have my judgment burned in the ear for a rogue.”

Epistles are letters.

Pliny the Younger's letters and Symmachus' letters were published. Both were Roman scholars.

In Elizabethan times, before 1593, a rogue's ear could be branded with a red-hot poker as punishment.

Edward Knowell continued, “Make much of thy vein, aka literary style, for it is inimitable. But I marvel what camel it was who had the task of carrying and delivering it?”

In this society, camels were thought to be dull creatures. They were pack animals: beasts of burden.

Edward Knowell continued, "For doubtless he was no ordinary beast who brought it."

"Why do you say these things?" Wellbred asked.

"Why?" sayest thou?" Edward Knowell said. "Why, do thou think that any reasonable creature, especially in the morning — the sober time of the day, too — could have mistaken my father for me?"

Realizing that Edward's father had gotten the letter, Wellbred said, "By God's eyelid, you are joking, I hope."

Edward Knowell replied, "Indeed, the best use we can turn it to is to make a jest of it now. But I'll assure you, my father had the full view of your flourishing and florid style an hour or so before I saw your letter."

"What a dull slave was this messenger!" Wellbred said. "But sirrah, what did your father say about it, truly?"

"I don't know what he said," Edward Knowell replied, "but I have a shrewd guess what he thought."

"What?" Wellbred asked. "What?"

Edward Knowell replied, "By the Virgin Mary, he must have thought that thou are some strange, dissolute young fellow, and I a grain or two better for keeping thee company."

"A grain or two better" means "hardly better."

"Tut, that thought is like the moon in her last quarter; it will change shortly," Wellbred said. "But, sirrah, I ask thee to become acquainted with my two hangers-on here. Thou will take exceeding pleasure in them if thou hear them once go: my wind-instruments. I'll wind them up."

His wind-instruments were blowhards.

He would wind them up in such a way that they would speak and reveal themselves to be fools.

Wellbred continued, “But” — he pointed toward Master Stephen — “what strange piece of silence is this? The sign of the Dumb Man?”

Tavern signs often consisted of a picture representing the name of the tavern.

Master Stephen had not yet spoken; he was dumb in more ways than one.

He also was adopting the signs of a melancholic man: He was standing with crossed arms.

Edward Knowell answered, “Oh, sir, he is a kinsman of mine, one who may make your music the fuller, if he pleases. He has his humor, sir.”

A humor is a distinctive personal characteristic.

“Oh, what is it?” Wellbred asked. “What is it?”

“Nay, I’ll neither do your judgment nor his folly that wrong of anticipating your impressions of him,” Edward Knowell said. “I’ll leave him to the mercy of your search. If you can discover him, so be it, well and good.”

“Discover him” meant to have Master Stephen act in such a way that revealed what kind of a fool he was.

Wellbred and Edward Knowell joined the others.

Wellbred said, “Well, Captain Bobadill, Master Matthew, I ask you to know this gentleman here: Edward Knowell. He is a friend of mine and one who will deserve your affection.”

He then said to Master Stephen, “I don’t know your name, sir, but I shall be glad of any occasion to render me more familiar to you.”

“My name is Master Stephen, sir. I am this gentleman’s own cousin, sir; his father is my uncle, sir. I am somewhat melancholy, but you shall command me, sir, in whatsoever is incident to a gentleman,” Master Stephen replied.

Captain Bobadill said to Edward Knowell, “Sir, I must tell you this: I am no general man.”

He was no general man because he was a captain and not a general. In addition, in this society a general man is a man who is widely accomplished and knows much.

A general man can also be a man who is friendly to everyone: This is the sense in which Captain Bobadill was using it.

Captain Bobadill continued: “But for Master Wellbred’s sake — you may embrace and accept it at what height of favor you please — I do communicate with you and conceive you to be a gentleman of some parts. I love few words.”

“And I fewer, sir,” Edward Knowell replied. “I have scarcely enough to thank you.”

Edward Knowell’s words could be construed as saying that Captain Bobadill deserved many more words of thanks or as saying that Captain Bobadill scarcely deserved the few words of thanks that he was receiving.

Master Matthew said to Master Stephen, “But are you indeed, sir, so given to it?”

“Aye, truly, sir, I am mightily given to melancholy,” Master Stephen replied.

“Oh, melancholy is your only fine humor, sir,” Master Matthew said. “Your true melancholy breeds your perfect fine wit, sir. I am melancholy myself at different times, sir, and then I do no more but take pen and paper immediately, and overflow you half a score or a dozen of sonnets at a sitting.”

Edward Knowell whispered to Wellbred, “Surely, he utters them, then, by the gross.”

“Utters” in the commercial sense meant “puts into circulation” and “puts out for sale.”

“Gross” is a unit of measure: twelve dozen. “Gross” also means ignorant, stupid, and rude.

Master Stephen said to Master Matthew, “Truly, sir, and I love such things out of measure.”

“Out of measure” means 1) boundlessly, and 2) metrically inaccurate.

Edward Knowell whispered to Wellbred, “Truly, better than in measure, I’ll undertake.”

In other words, Master Stephen loved bad, out-of-measure poetry more than he loved good, metrically accurate poetry.

Master Matthew said to Master Stephen, “Why, I invite you, sir, to make use of my study. It’s at your service.”

Master Stephen replied, “I thank you, sir; I shall be bold to do so, I promise you. Have you a stool there, to be melancholy upon?”

“That I have, sir,” Master Matthew said, “and I have some papers there of my own doing at idle hours, about which you’ll say there’s some sparks of wit in the poems when you see them.”

Given the quality of Master Matthew's "poetry," the stool could very well be a kind of toilet: a close-stool.

Wellbred whispered to Edward Knowell, "I wish the sparks would kindle for once and become a fire among them so that I might see self-love burned for her heresy!"

Master Matthew's love of his poems was large enough to be idolatrous.

Master Stephen said to Edward Knowell, "Cousin, is it well? Am I melancholy enough?"

"Oh, aye, excellent," Edward Knowell answered.

"Captain Bobadill, why do you muse so?" Wellbred asked.

Edward Knowell whispered to Wellbred, "He is melancholy, too."

Captain Bobadill replied to Wellbred, "Truly, sir, I was thinking of a most honorable piece of service that was performed on Saint Mark's Day, which is tomorrow, some ten years ago now."

Saint Mark's Day is April 25.

"In what place, Captain?" Edward Knowell asked.

Captain Bobadill answered:

"Why, at the beleaguering of Strigonium in Hungary, where, in less than two hours, seven hundred resolute gentlemen as any were in Europe lost their lives upon the breach the assault made in the fortifications.

"I'll tell you, gentlemen, it was the first but the best leaguer, aka siege, that I ever beheld with these eyes, except the taking in, aka capture, of — what do you call it? — last year by the Genoese; but that of all others was the most fatal and dangerous exploit that ever I was ranged in since I first bore arms before the face of the enemy, as I am a gentleman and a soldier.”

Master Stephen said, “By God, I had as gladly as an angel I could swear as well as that gentleman!”

In other words: By God, I wish as much for an angel (a gold coin) as I wish to swear like that gentleman!

In yet other words: By God, I, just as much as an angel in heaven does, wish to swear like that gentleman!

Edward Knowell said to Captain Bobadill, “Then you were a servitor — a soldier — at both, it seems: at Strigonium and What-do-you-call-it?”

“Oh, Lord, sir!” Captain Bobadill said. “By Saint George, I was the first man who entered the breach, and, had I not effected it with resolution, I would have been slain if I had had a million of lives.”

Edward Knowell said to himself, “It was a pity that you had not ten lives: a cat’s nine lives and your own, indeed.”

He said out loud, “But was it possible?”

Master Matthew said to Master Stephen, “Please, pay close attention to this discourse, sir.”

“So I do,” Master Stephen said.

“I assure you, upon my reputation, it is true, and you yourself shall confess it,” Captain Bobadill said to Edward Knowell.

“You must bring me to the rack first,” Edward Knowell said.

The rack was an instrument of torture in which arms and legs were dislocated. Edward Knowell would have to be tortured before he confessed the truth of — that is, acknowledged to be true — Captain Bobadill’s claims.

The word “rack,” however, also meant destruction, as in “rack and ruin.” Captain Bobadill interpreted Edward Knowell’s words as saying that he needed to hear more of Captain Bobadill’s description of the destruction that Captain Bobadill had witnessed.

Captain Bobadill said:

“Observe me judicially, aka judiciously, sweet sir. They had planted three demi-culverins, aka cannons, just in the mouth of the breach. Now, sir, as we were to charge, their master gunner — a man of no mean skill and marksmanship, you must think — confronted me with his linstock ready to give fire.”

A linstock is used to hold the lighted match that fires the cannon.

Captain Bobadill continued:

“I, spying his intention, discharged my petronel, aka pistol, in his bosom, and with these single — these sole and petty — arms” — he drew his weapon — “my poor rapier, I ran violently upon the Moors who guarded the ordnance and put them pell-mell to the sword.”

“To the sword?” Wellbred said. “To the rapier, Captain.”

Edward Knowell said to Wellbred, “Oh, it was a good figure of speech observed, sir.”

Edward Knowell was sarcastic. Captain Bobadill had said that he had put the enemy pell-mell to the sword. The word “pell-mell” means “confusedly” and as used by Captain Bobadill could refer to Captain Bobadill, not to the enemy. The word “pell-mell” also often refers to fleeing in a confused fashion.

He then said to Captain Bobadill, “But did you do all this, Captain, without hurting your blade?”

Captain Bobadill had been flourishing his sword, which was undamaged — evidence that it was unused.

Captain Bobadill said, “Without any impeach, aka damage, on the earth. You shall perceive, sir. Look at my sword. It is the most fortunate — blessed with luck — weapon that ever rode on a poor gentleman’s thigh. Shall I tell you, sir? You talk of Morglay, Excalibur, Durindana, or so; tut, I lend no credit to that which is fabled of them. I know the virtue of my own sword, and therefore I dare the boldlier maintain it.”

The sword named Morglay belonged to Sir Bevis of Hampton, the sword named Excalibur belonged to King Arthur, and the sword named Durindana belonged to Roland.

Master Stephen said, “I wonder whether it is a Toledo sword or not?”

“A most perfect Toledo, I assure you, sir,” Captain Bobadill said.

“I have a countryman of his here,” Master Stephen said, referring to the sword that he had bought from the disguised Brainworm.

“Please, let me see it, sir,” Master Matthew said.

He examined Master Stephen’s sword and said, “Yes, indeed, it is!”

Captain Bobadill examined the sword and said, “This a Toledo? Pish and pshaw!”

“Why do you ‘pish,’ Captain?” Master Stephen asked.

Captain Bobadill said, “This is a Fleming sword, by heaven. I’ll buy them for a guilder apiece, even if I want to have a thousand of them.”

Inexpensive swords were made in Flanders, a region in Belgium. A guilder is a Dutch coin.

Edward Knowell said to Master Stephen, “What do you say, cousin? I told you thus much.”

“Where did you buy it, Master Stephen?” Wellbred asked.

“I bought it from a scurvy rogue soldier,” Master Stephen said. “May a hundred lice go with him! He swore it was a Toledo sword.”

“It is a poor provant, aka government-issue, rapier, no better,” Captain Bobadill said.

“By the Mass, I think it is, indeed, now I look on it better,” Master Matthew said.

“The longer you look on it, the worse,” Edward Knowell said.

He then said to Master Stephen, “Put it up. Put it up.”

This meant: Sheathe your sword. Accept that you have been conned and move on.

Master Stephen said, “Well, I will put it up, but by — I have forgotten the Captain’s oath; I wanted to have sworn by it — if I ever meet him —”

He meant: “If I ever meet the man who sold me this sword —”

“Oh, it is past help now, sir,” Wellbred said. “You must have patience.”

“Whoreson, coney-catching rascal!” Master Stephen said. “I could eat the very hilts for anger!”

A coney-catcher is a swindler, a con man. Coneys are rabbits that can be lured from their rabbit-holes and caught.

“A sign of good digestion!” Edward Knowell said. “You have an ostrich stomach, cousin.”

Ostriches were reputed to be able to eat anything, including metals such as iron. Master Stephen was swallowing — bearing — the insult of being sold a poor sword, and an ostrich was capable of swallowing a sword.

“A stomach?” Master Stephen said. “I wish that I had him here! You should see if I had a stomach.”

He was saying that he had a stomach — a longing — for a fight.

“It’s better as it is,” Wellbred said to Master Stephen.

He then said, “Come, gentlemen, shall we go?”

— 3.2 —

Brainworm, still disguised as a soldier, entered the scene.

Edward Knowell said to Master Stephen, “A miracle, cousin. Look here! Look here!”

Master Stephen said to Brainworm, “Oh, by God’s lid, by your leave, do you know me, sir?”

“By your leave” meant “if you don’t mind.” It was a phrase of etiquette that could lead to avoiding a duel.

“Aye, sir. I know you by sight,” the disguised Brainworm replied.

“You sold me a rapier, didn’t you?” Master Stephen asked.

“Yes, by the Virgin Mary, I did, sir,” the disguised Brainworm replied.

“You said it was a Toledo sword, didn’t you?” Master Stephen asked.

“True, I did so,” the disguised Brainworm replied.

“But it is not a Toledo sword?” Master Stephen asked.

“No, sir, I confess it, it is not,” the disguised Brainworm replied.

“Do you confess it?” Master Stephen said to the disguised Brainworm.

He then said, “Gentlemen, bear witness he has confessed it.”

He then said to the disguised Brainworm, “By God’s will, if you had not confessed it —”

Edward Knowell interrupted, “— oh, cousin, stop, stop.”

Master Stephen replied, “I have finished, cousin.”

“Why, you have acted like a gentleman,” Wellbred said to Master Stephen. “He has confessed it; what more do you want?”

Master Stephen said, “Yet, by his leave, he is a rascal — under his favor, do you see?”

“Under his favor” means “if he is agreeable to it.” It was a phrase of etiquette that could lead to avoiding a duel.

Edward Knowell said quietly to Wellbred, “Aye, ‘by his leave, he is,’ and ‘under favor’ — a pretty piece of civility! Sirrah, how do thou like him?”

Wellbred replied quietly, “Oh, he’s a most precious fool! Make much of him and build up his pride. I can compare him to nothing more aptly than a drum, for everyone may play upon him.”

“No, no,” Edward Knowell whispered. “A child’s whistle is by far the fitter to use as a comparison.”

A child’s whistle makes a shrill noise. So does Master Stephen.

The disguised Brainworm said to Edward Knowell, “Sir, shall I entreat a word with you?”

“With me, sir?” Edward Knowell replied. “You haven’t another Toledo sword to sell, have you?”

“You are full of conceits — jests — sir,” the disguised Brainworm said.

He and Edward Knowell talked quietly and privately together.

He said to Edward, “Your name is Master Knowell, as I take it?”

“You are in the right,” Edward Knowell said. “You don’t mean to proceed in the catechism, do you?”

The Child’s Catechism in the Book of Common Prayer had questions such as “What is your name?” and “Who gave you this name?”

“No, sir, I am none of that coat,” the disguised Brainworm said.

By “coat,” he meant a parson’s coat; in other words, he was saying that he was not a parson.

“But you are of as bare a coat, though,” Edward Knowell said.

By “bare,” he meant “threadbare.” Parsons were proverbially impoverished.

Edward Knowell then said, “Well, speak, sir.”

The disguised Brainworm said, “Indeed, sir, I am but servant to the drum extraordinary — I am a soldier on a special mission — and indeed — this smoky varnish of makeup being washed off and three or four patches removed — I appear Your Worship's in reversion, after the decease of your good father — Brainworm!"

He would be Edward Knowell's servant after the death of Edward's father; "reversion" referred to a legal right of succession.

He gave Edward Knowell a glimpse of his identity.

"Brainworm!" Edward Knowell said. "By God's light, what breath of a conjurer has blown thee here in this disguise?"

"The breath of your letter, sir, this morning — the same that blew you to the Windmill and that blew your father after you," the disguised Brainworm said.

"My father?" Edward Knowell asked, surprised.

"Don't be startled," the disguised Brainworm said. "It is true. He has followed you over the fields, by the footprints, as you would follow a hare in the snow."

Edward Knowell motioned for Wellbred to join them, and then he said, "Sirrah Wellbred, what shall we do, sirrah? My father has come over after me."

"Thy father?" Wellbred said. "Where is he?"

The disguised Brainworm answered, "At Justice Clement's house over here, in Coleman Street, where he just waits for my return, and then —"

"Who's this?" Wellbred asked. "Brainworm?"

"The same, sir," the disguised Brainworm said.

"Why, how in the name of wit did thou come to be transmuted like this?" Wellbred asked.

"In faith, it's a stratagem, a stratagem," the disguised Brainworm said. "For the love of reason, gentlemen, and for avoiding the danger, don't stand here! Withdraw somewhere private, and I'll tell you everything."

"But are thou sure he will wait for thy return?" Edward Knowell asked.

"Do I live, sir?" the disguised Brainworm asked. "What kind of question is that?"

"We'll prolong his waiting, then, a little," Wellbred said. "Brainworm, thou shall go with us."

Wellbred called to the others, "Come on, gentlemen."

He then said to Edward Knowell, "Nay, I ask thee, sweet Ned, don't droop; by God's heart, if our wits are so wretchedly dull that one old, plodding brain can outstrip us all, I would wish that we were impressed — conscripted — into service to make porters of, and serve out the remnant of our days in Thames Street or at Custom House quay, in a civil war against the carmen."

Porters transported goods by foot, and carmen transported goods by cart, and so they were engaged in a civil war for business carrying goods from the river.

The disguised Brainworm said, "Amen, amen, amen, I say!"

They exited.

— 3.3 —

Kitely and Cash talked together at Kitely's business in Old Jewry about one of Kitely's business associates.

"What does he say, Thomas?" Kitely asked. "Did you speak with him?"

"He will expect you, sir, within this half hour," Thomas Cash answered.

“Has he the money ready, can you tell?” Kitely asked.

“Yes, sir,” Cash said. “The money was brought in last night.”

“Oh, that’s well,” Kitely said. “Fetch me my cloak, my cloak.”

Cash exited.

Alone, Kitely said to himself:

“Wait, let me see. An hour to go and come, aye, that will be the least amount of time, and then it will be an hour before I can settle my affairs with him, or very near to it. Well, I will say two hours.

“Two hours? Ha! Things never dreamt of yet may be contrived, aye, and effected, too, in my two hours’ absence.

“Well, I will not go. Two hours. No, sneering Opportunity, I will not give your subtle trickery that scope. Who will not judge him worthy to be robbed who sets his doors wide open to a thief and shows the felon where his treasure lies?

“Again, what earthly spirit but will attempt to taste the fruit of beauty’s golden tree when leaden sleep seels and seals up the dragon’s eyes?”

A dragon guarded the golden apples in the garden of the immortal nymphs known as the Hesperides. Hercules took some of the golden apples.

The word “seel” comes from falconry. A young hawk’s eyes were stitched shut during its training.

Kitely was jealous of his wife, and he did not want to leave her for two hours lest he be cuckolded.

Kitely continued:

“I will not go. Business, go by for once.

“No, Beauty, no. You are of too good caract — carat and character — to be left so, without a guard, or open. Your luster, too, will inflame at any distance, and it will draw courtship to you as a jet does straws, it will put the power of motion in a stone, and it will strike fire from ice. Nay, it will make a porter leap you with his burden!”

Jet is a semi-precious variety of lignite (a kind of coal) that is black and hard, takes a polish, and is used in jewelry. When rubbed, it generates an electrical charge that will draw a straw to it.

Leaping consisted of acrobatic leaps, but it also referred to the sexual act. This particular burden, in Kitley’s jealous mind, could be a load of semen. The word “burden” also refers to pregnancy.

Kitley continued:

“You, Beauty, must then be kept shut tight, secret, and well-watched, for, if given the opportunity, no quicksand devours or swallows swifter. He who lends his wife, if she is beautiful, either time or place, compels her to be false.

“I will not go. The dangers are too many.

“And then fashionable dressing is a most main — important and potent — attraction! Our great heads within the city never were in safety ever since our wives began to wear these little round velvet caps.”

Ever since the wives started wearing fashionable caps, the husbands’ heads were in danger of growing horns because the wives of the men might cuckold them. So said Kitley.

Kitley continued:

“I’ll change them. I’ll change them right away in my household. My wife shall no more wear three-piled acorns, to make my horns ache.”

“Three-piled” meant thick velvet of the best quality. The three-piled caps resembled the cap of an acorn.

Young bucks grew antler-like “velvet” skin covering their horns while growing their antlers.

Kitely was worried that the a-corn caps might give him ache-horns.

Kitely continued:

“Nor will I go. I am resolved for that. I have firmly decided that.”

Cash returned, carrying Kitely’s cloak.

Kitely said to Cash, “Carry in my cloak again. Yet stay! Yet do carry it in again, too! I will defer going on any and all occasions, whatever I do.”

“Sir, Snare, your scrivener, will be there with the bonds,” Cash said.

A scrivener draws up documents, including legal documents.

“That’s true,” Kitely said. “Fool on me! I had entirely forgotten it; I must go. What time is it?”

“Time for the Exchange to open, sir,” Cash said.

The Exchange opened at 10 a.m.

Kitely said to himself:

“By God’s heart, then Wellbred will soon be here, too, with one or other of his loose consorts. I am a knave if I know what to say, what course of action to take, or which way to make a decision.

“My brain, I think, is like an hourglass, wherein my imaginations run like sands, filling up time, but then are turned and turned, so that I don’t know what to stop at and who to have trust in, and know even less what choices to put in action.

“It shall be so. I dare to have faith in his secrecy; he doesn’t know how to deceive me.”

He called, “Thomas!”

“Sir,” Thomas Cash said.

Kitely said to himself:

“Yet, now I have thought about it, too, I will not have faith in Thomas’ secrecy.”

He then asked Thomas Cash, “Thomas, is Cob within?”

“I think he is, sir,” Cash said.

Kitely said to himself:

“But Cob will prate and blab, too; there’s no talking to him if I want privacy.

“No, there is no man on the earth compared to Thomas, if I dare to trust him: There is all the fear.

“But if Thomas were to have a chink, aka crack, and be leaky and blab my secrets, I would be a goner, having lost my reputation forever and being a subject of gossip for the Exchange.

“The manner Thomas consistently maintained until this present time promises no such change. What should I fear, then?

“Well, come what will, I’ll tempt my fortune for once.”

He said to Thomas Cash, “Thomas — you may deceive me, but I hope that your love to me is more —”

Cash interrupted, “— sir, if a servant’s duty with faith may be called love, you are more than in hope of having it; you are already possessed of it.”

Kitely said:

“I thank you heartily, Thomas. Give me your hand. I thank you with all my heart, good Thomas.

“I have, Thomas, a secret to impart to you — but when once you have it, I must seal up your lips.

“So far I tell you, Thomas.”

“Sir, as for that —” Thomas Cash began.

Kitely interrupted, “— nay, hear me out. Think that I esteem you, Thomas, when I will let you in thus to my private life. It is a thing that sits nearer to my crest than thou are aware of, Thomas. If thou should reveal it, but —”

A crest appears in a coat of arms, and Kitely meant the word to refer to his family. A crest also appears at the top of a head (for example, a rooster’s crest), and Kitely was worried about a cuckold’s horns appearing on his head.

Thomas Cash interrupted, “— what! I reveal it?”

“Nay,” Kitely said. “I do not think thou would, but if thou should, it would be a great weakness.”

“It would be a great treachery!” Thomas Cash said. “Give it no other name.”

“Thou will not reveal it, then?” Kitely asked.

“Sir, if I do, let mankind disclaim — disown — me forever,” Thomas Cash said.

Cash had said most of the right words, but he had not said, “I swear.”

Kitely said to himself:

“He will not swear. He has some reservation, some concealed purpose and close meaning, surely. Else, being urged so much, how should he choose but lend an oath to all this protestation?”

“He’s no precisian — no Puritan — I am certain of that, nor is he rigid Roman Catholic. He’ll play at fayles and tick-tack; I have heard him swear.”

“Fayles and tick-tack” are forms of backgammon.

Puritans and Catholics did not play games of chance, and they did not swear.

Kitely said to himself:

“What should I think of it? Urge him again, and by some other way? I will do so.”

Kitely said to Thomas Cash, “Well, Thomas, thou have sworn not to disclose my secret. Yes, you did swear?”

“Not yet, sir, but I will, if it pleases you,” Thomas Cash said.

“No, Thomas, I dare to take thy word without an oath,” Kitely said. “But if thou will swear, do as thou think good. I am resolved to take your word without your swearing an oath; you may swear at thy pleasure.”

“By my soul’s safety, then, sir, I solemnly declare and swear that my tongue shall never take knowledge of a word delivered to me in nature of your trust,” Thomas Cash said.

Kitely said:

“It’s too much; these ceremonies are not necessary. I know thy faith to be as firm as rock.

“Thomas, come hither, nearer; we cannot be too private in this business. So it is —”

Kitely said to himself, “Now he has sworn, I dare the safelier venture —”

He said out loud to Cash, “I have recently by diverse observations —”

Kitely said to himself, “But I don’t know whether his oath can bind him, yea or nay, being not taken lawfully, before a magistrate. Ha!”

He then asked you, the reader of this book, “What do you say?”

Kitely said to himself, “I will ask counsel and advice before I proceed.”

He said out loud to Thomas Cash, “Thomas, it will be now too long to stay. I’ll spy some fitter time soon, or tomorrow.”

“Sir, at your pleasure,” Thomas Cash said.

“I will think,” Kitely said, “and, Thomas, I ask you, search the books in preparation for my return, for the receipts between me and Traps.”

“I will, sir,” Cash said.

“And listen: If your mistress’ brother Wellbred happens to bring here any gentlemen before I come back, let someone immediately bring me word,” Kitely said.

“Very well, sir,” Cash replied.

“Bring me word to the Exchange, do you hear?” Kitely said. “Or here in Coleman Street, to Justice Clement’s. Don’t forget it, and don’t be out of the way. Don’t leave them alone.”

“I will not, sir,” Cash said.

“I ask you to attend carefully to it,” Kately said. “Whether he should come or not, if any other, stranger or otherwise, don’t fail to send me word.”

“I shall not, sir,” Cash said.

“Make it your special business, now, to remember it,” Kately said.

“Sir, I promise you I will,” Cash said.

“But Thomas, this is not the secret, Thomas, I told you of,” Kately said.

“No, sir, I do believe it,” Cash said.

The words “I do believe it” are ambiguous and can mean: “I do believe it is the secret, or 2) I do believe it is not the secret.

“Believe me, it is not,” Kately said.

“Sir, I do believe you,” Cash said.

What did he believe: Kately’s words, or his actions and mannerisms, which showed that he was agitated and hinted that this was the secret he had told Thomas Cash about?

Kately said:

“By heaven, it is not; that’s enough.

“But Thomas, I don’t want you to utter it, do you see, to any creature living; yet I don’t care if you do.

“Well, I must go away from here.

“Thomas, understand thus much: It was a trial of you when I intimated so deep a secret to you. I don’t mean this, but that which I have yet to tell you; this is nothing, this.

“But, Thomas, keep this from my wife, I charge you, locked up in silence, midnight, buried here.”

He tapped his chest.

He said to himself, “There is no greater hell than to be a slave to fear.”

He exited.

Cash said:

“‘Locked up in silence, midnight, buried here’?”

“Whence should this flood of passion, I wonder, spring from? Huh?”

“Best dream no longer of this running humor, for fear I sink! The violence of the stream already has transported me so far that I can feel no ground at all. But be silent —”

He had heard something and was now listening intently.

He then said, “Oh, it is our water-bearer. Something has vexed him now.”

— 3.4 —

Cob entered the scene. He did not notice Cash at first.

Thinking himself to be alone, he said, “Fasting days? What tell you me of fasting days? By God’s eyelid, I wish they were all on a light fire — all ablaze — as far as I’m concerned! They say the whole world shall be consumed with fire one day, but I wish I had these Ember weeks and villainous Fridays burnt in the meantime, and then —”

One week, called an Ember Week, occurred each season. During Wednesday, Friday, and Saturday of each Ember Week, as well as on all Fridays and Saturdays, eves of holy days, and during Lent, no meat could be sold or consumed.

One reason for this was to increase jobs for fishermen and fishmongers.

The current day was the Eve of Saint Mark's Day, and so it was the eve of a holy day.

"Fasting days" did not mean abstinence from all food, but meat was forbidden.

Cash said, "Why, how are you now, Cob? What moves thee to this choler, huh?"

The word "choler" means anger.

"Collar, Master Thomas?" Cob said. "I scorn your collar. I, sir, I am none of your cart-horse. I am not a cart-horse, although I carry and draw water."

The word "draw" means 1) get from the tap, or 2) pull.

Cob continued, "If you offer to ride me with your collar, or halter either, I may perhaps show you a jade's trick, sir."

The word "ride" can mean "irritate."

Jades are bad horses, and jades sometimes have tricks that can irritate their owners.

Cash replied, "Oh, you'll slip your head out of the collar?"

He was making a joke about the collar being a hangman's noose.

Cash continued, "Why, goodman Cob, you mistake me."

"Nay, I have my rheum," Cob said, "and I can be angry as well as another, sir."

"Thy rheum, Cob? Thy humor? Thy humor? Thou are mistaken," Cash said.

The word “rheum” was an old-fashioned word for “humor.” It also meant “mucous discharge” or “watery discharge.”

Cob replied, “‘Humor’? Mack, I think it be so, indeed. What is that ‘humor’? Some rare thing, I warrant.”

“Mack” meant “by the Mass.”

“By the Virgin Mary, I’ll tell thee, Cob,” Cash said. “It is a gentleman-like monster bred in the special gallantry of our time by affectation, and it is fed by folly.”

“What!” Cob said. “Must it be fed?”

“Oh, aye, humor is nothing if it is not fed,” Cash said. “Didn’t thou ever hear that? It’s a common phrase, ‘Feed my humor.’”

“Feed my humor” meant “indulge my disposition” or “indulge my mood” or “indulge my whim.”

“I’ll have nothing to do with it,” Cob said. “Humor, avaunt! Be off! I don’t know you; be gone. Let who will, make hungry meals for your monstership; it shall not be I.”

In other words, let someone else go hungry in order to feed your humor.

Cob continued, “Feed you, quoth — said — he? By God’s eyelid, I have much ado to feed myself, especially on these lean rascally days, too.”

“Lean rascals” are lean inferior deer, and so they are not plentiful eating.

Cob continued, “If it had been any other day but a fasting day — a plague on them all, for me! I swear by this light, one might have done the commonwealth good service and have drowned them all in the flood two or three hundred thousand years ago. Oh, I do stomach — resent — them hugely! I have a maw, now, if it were for Sir Bevis his horse, against them.”

He could eat Sir Bevis’ horse to prepare himself for fasting days.

“I ask thee, good Cob, what makes thee so out of love with fasting days?” Cash said.

Cob replied, “By the Virgin Mary, that which will make any man out of love with them, I think: their bad conditions, if you need to know that. First, fasting days are of a Flemish breed, I am sure of that, for they raven up and devour more butter than all the days of the week beside. Next, fasting days stink of fish and leek porridge miserably. Thirdly, fasting days will keep a man devoutly hungry all day, and at night send him supperless to bed.”

According to Cash, the Flemish are Phlegm-ish. If phlegm is predominant in a person’s makeup, then the person is phlegmatic (calm, apathetic, indolent). Eating fish supposedly made a person phlegmatic.

The Flemish also had a reputation for liking butter.

Many fast days made a man devoutly — fervently and piously — hungry. Many fast days, such as those of Lent and the eves of holy days, had a religious origin.

Cash said, “Indeed, these are faults, Cob.”

“Nay, if this were all, it would be something,” Cob said. “But they are the only known enemies to my generation, aka breed. A fasting day no sooner comes but my lineage goes to rack.”

Remember that Cob traces his ancestry from Herring.

“Rack” can mean 1) ruin, 2) broiling rack or grill, and 3) torture rack.

“Poor cobs, they smoke for it,” Cob said.

True. Cobs are heads, and the heads of herring are often smoked.

The words “smoke for it” also meant “suffer for it.”

Cob continued, “They are made martyrs of the gridiron.”

Saint Lawrence was a Roman martyr who was cooked alive on a griddle. The legend is that he told his tormenters, “This side is cooked. Turn me over and eat.”

Cob continued, “They melt in passion, and your maidens also know this, and yet would have me turn Hannibal and eat my own fish and blood!”

Hannibal was a Carthaginian who crossed the Alps with war elephants and rampaged up and down Italy for years, terrifying the Romans, enemies of Carthage.

Cob was mixing up the words “cannibal” and “Hannibal.”

He pulled out a red herring and addressed it: “My princely coz, fear nothing. I have not the heart to devour you, even if I might be made as rich as King Cophetua.”

King Cophetua married a beggar maiden. He was rich, and he did not marry for money.

Cob continued, “Oh, that I had room for my tears!”

“Room” is a pun on “rheum,” aka a watery discharge.

Cob continued, “I could weep salt water enough now to preserve the lives of ten thousand of my kin; but I may curse none but these filthy almanacs, for, if it weren’t for them, these days of persecution would never be known.”

Almanacs listed fasting days.

Cob continued, “I’ll be hanged if some fishmonger’s son does not make much of them, and puts in more fasting days than he should do because he would utter — put up for sale — his father’s dried stockfish and stinking conger eels.”

A politician named William Cecil, the son of a fishmonger, was responsible for making some Wednesdays fish-days. Such days were called Cecil’s Fasts. They were unpopular.

Cash said, “By God’s light, peace! Thou shall be beaten like a stockfish else.”

Dried cod, aka stockfish, was beaten before being boiled.

Seeing an approaching group, Cash said, “Here is Master Matthew. Now I must look out for a messenger to my master.”

He was going to send a message to Kitely that men had arrived at his house.

Master Matthew was the son of a fishmonger.

Cob and Cash exited.

— 3.5 —

Wellbred, Edward Knowell, Brainworm, Captain Bobadill, Master Matthew, and Master Stephen were outside Kitely’s house. Wellbred, Edward Knowell, and Brainworm talked privately among themselves. The rest had pipes and tobacco but were not yet smoking.

Wellbred said, “Beshrew me — curse me — but it was an absolute good jest, and exceedingly well carried.”

“Aye, and our ignorance maintained it as well, didn’t it?” Edward Knowell said.

“Yes, indeed,” Wellbred said, “but was it possible thou didn’t know him? I forgive Master Stephen, for he is stupidity itself.”

Edward Knowell replied, “Before God, I swear that I did not recognize Brainworm, even if I might have joined the seven wise masters and become the eighth for recognizing him.”

The Seven Wise Masters of Rome were seven philosophers who were tutors to the son of Emperor Diocletian.

Edward Knowell continued:

“He had so contorted himself into the attire and guise of one of your poor infantry, your decayed, ruinous, worm-eaten gentlemen of the round — a military patrol going on its rounds — such as have vowed to sit on the outskirts of the city (let your provost and his half-dozen of halberdiers do what they can) and have translated begging out of the old hackney — plodding — pace to a fine, easy amble, and made it run as smooth off the tongue as a shove-groat shilling.”

Impoverished soldiers (and conmen) were living in the outskirts of the city, and they were accomplished beggars.

A provost was in charge of maintaining public order.

Halberdiers were civic guards who carried halberds — weapons that were half-spear and half-battleax.

A shove-groat shilling was a smooth coin of little value used in a game of shuffleboard called shove-groat.

Edward Knowell continued:

“He had molded himself so perfectly into the likeness of one of these reformados, observing every trick of their action — as varying the accent, swearing with an emphasis, indeed all with so special and exquisite a grace — that, had thou seen him, thou would have sworn he might have been sergeant-major, if not lieutenant-colonel, to the regiment.”

The reformados were members of a disbanded military company and so they were no longer employed as soldiers. The term originally referred to members of a military company that was disbanded so its soldiers could be reformed into other companies.

Wellbred, who had seen and quickly recognized Brainworm, said, “Why, Brainworm, who would have thought thou had been such an artificer?”

“An artificer? An architect!” Edward Knowell said.

An artificer is a trickster, one who has designs on another person and wants to trick that person.

Artificers can also mean craftsmen and artisans. An architect, however, is a designer — an artist — on a grand scale. When it came to disguises, Brainworm was an artist.

Edward Knowell continued, “Except a man had studied begging all his lifetime and had been a weaver of language — a spinner of tales — from his infancy for the clothing — the disguise — of begging, I never saw his rival.”

“Where did thou get this military coat, I wonder?” Wellbred said.

Brainworm answered, “I got it from a Houndsditch man, sir, one of the devil’s near kinsmen: a broker.”

Houndsditch was a street where many pawnbrokers worked.

Wellbred said, “That cannot be, if the proverb holds true, for ‘A crafty knave needs no broker.’”

Pawnbrokers were known for being dishonest and crafty.

“True, sir,” Brainworm said, “but I did need a broker, ergo ___”

Ergo is Latin for “therefore.”

The syllogism is this:

P1: A crafty knave needs no broker.

P2: I needed a broker.

C: Therefore, I am not a crafty knave.

“P” means “Premise,” and “C” means “Conclusion.”

“Well parried,” Wellbred said. “Not a crafty knave, you’ll say.”

“Tut, Brainworm has more of these shifts,” Edward Knowell said.

Shifts can mean 1) dodges and tricks, and 2) items of clothing (e.g., shirts).

Punning on “shift” as “item of clothing,” Brainworm said, “And yet, where I have one, the broker has ten, sir.”

“One” means one shift (item of clothing), or it means one shift (trick).

Thomas Cash entered the scene and called, “Francis! Martin!”

He then said to himself, “Not a one to be found now. What a spite is this? Isn’t this maddening?”

He wanted Francis and/or Martin to carry a message to Kately, who was at Justice Clement’s house.

“How are you now, Thomas?” Wellbred asked. “Is my brother-in-law Kately inside?”

“No, sir, my master went out just now, but Master Downright is inside,” Thomas Cash said.

He called, “Cob! What, Cob!”

He then asked, “Is he gone, too?”

“Whither went your master, Thomas,” Wellbred asked. “Can thou tell me?”

“I don’t know for sure,” Thomas Cash said. “To Justice Clement’s, I think, sir.”

He called again, “Cob!”

He exited.

“Justice Clement — who’s he?” Edward Knowell asked.

“Why, don’t thou know him?” Wellbred said. “He is a city magistrate, a justice here, an excellent good lawyer and a great scholar, but the only — peerless — mad, merry old fellow in Europe. I showed him to you the other day.”

“Oh, is that he?” Edward Knowell said. “I remember him now. Good faith, and he has a very strange presence, I think. It shows as if he stood out of the rank from other men. I have heard many of his jests in the university. They say he will commit a man for taking the wall of his horse.”

A man who believed that he had social precedence over other men also believed that he and his horse should ride in the part of the street that was closest to the wall because it was cleaner and safer.

Edward Knowell had said, “They say he will commit a man for taking the wall of his horse.”

His horse? Whose horse? Justice Clement’s horse?

If another man would ride closer to the wall than Justice Clement's horse, then he, as a justice of the peace, and therefore of high social status, could punish that man.

But maybe it was another man's horse, and one man was unrightfully trying to take precedence over another man. In that case, Justice Clement could punish the man who was acting unrightfully.

Wellbred said, "Aye, or wearing his cloak on one shoulder, or serving of God — anything, indeed, if it should come in the way of his humor."

If a man wearing his — Justice Clement's cloak — on one shoulder without a good reason for having Justice Clement's cloak, then Justice Clement could punish that man.

A man who served God would be unlikely to be punished, but a hypocrite who claimed to serve God might be punished.

But perhaps Justice Clement's humor was sometimes to threaten to punish people but not punish them.

Cash went in and out of the scene, calling for potential messengers.

He re-entered the scene and called, "Gasper! Martin! Cob! By God's heart, where should they be, I wonder?"

"Master Kately's serving-man, please, vouchsafe — grant — us the lighting of this match," Captain Bobadill requested.

He handed a match to Cash.

In this society, a spark from a tinderbox was used to light a match.

"Fire on your match!" Cash said.

No doubt he wanted to say, “Fie on — to hell with — your match!”

He complained, “No time but now to ‘vouchsafe’?”

He was busy.

He called, “Francis! Cob!”

He then exited.

Captain Bobadill said, “I swear by the body of me, here’s the remainder of seven pounds of tobacco I got a week ago yesterday. It is your right, your true Trinidad.”

Seven pounds! If pipe-smokers can be chain smokers, Captain Bobadill must be a chain smoker.

High-quality tobacco came from Trinidad.

He then asked, “Have you ever taken — used — any tobacco, Master Stephen?”

“No, truly, sir, but I’ll learn to take it now, since you commend it so,” Master Stephen replied.

In Ben Jonson’s day, tobacco was controversial. Many people praised it and believed that it cured many diseases. Others disparaged it as causing many diseases. Captain Bobadill praised tobacco, but Cob disparaged it.

Captain Bobadill said:

“Sir, believe me, upon my relation, for what I tell you the world shall not refute. I have been in the Indies, where this herb grows, where neither myself nor a dozen gentlemen more of my knowledge have received the taste of any other nutriment in the world for the space of one-and-twenty weeks except for the fume of this simple — this medicinal herb — only.”

There were stories of Native Americans using tobacco to stop hunger pangs for four or five days.

“Therefore, it cannot be but it is most divine.

“Further, taken in the nature, in the true natural form so, it makes an antidote that, if you had taken the most deadly poisonous plant in all Italy, where the strongest poisons come from, the tobacco would expel it and purge you of it with as much ease as I speak.

“And for your green — fresh — wound, your balsamum and your Saint John’s wort are all mere cheats and trash compared to tobacco, especially your Trinidado. Your Nicotian is good, too.”

The word “Nicotian” comes from Jacques Nicot, who is credited for introducing tobacco into France. It is actually a term for tobacco in general, not a term for a particular kind of tobacco.

Captain Bobadill continued:

“I could say what I know of the virtue of it for the expulsion of rheums and colds, raw humors, crudities, obstructions and constipation, with a thousand of this kind, but I profess myself no quacksalver.”

“Quacksalvers” are medical quacks.

Captain Bobadill continued:

“Only thus much, by Hercules: I do hold it and will affirm it before any prince in Europe to be the most sovereign — efficacious — and precious weed that ever the earth tendered to the use of man.”

Edward Knowell whispered to Wellbred, “This speech would have done decently and fittingly in a tobacco-trader’s mouth!”

Captain Bobadill sounded as if he were making a commercial.

Cash and Cob entered the scene.

Cash said to Cob, “At Justice Clement’s, in the middle of Coleman Street, he — Kitely — is.”

Coleman Street was close to Old Jewry.

Cash had Cob by the ear to make sure he was listening, and Cob said, “Oh, oh!”

Captain Bobadill asked Cash, “Where’s the match I gave thee, Master Kitely’s serving-man?”

Cash said, “I wish that his match, and he, and his pipe, and all were at the city of Sancto Domingo on the island of Hispaniola! I had forgotten about it.”

He exited.

Cob said:

“By God’s me, I wonder what pleasure or felicity they have in taking this roguish and rascally tobacco.”

“By God’s me”? If we are God’s, then perhaps this oath means “By the body of me.” Or maybe Cob meant to say “God’s ’nee,” aka “God’s knee.”

Cob continued:

“It’s good for nothing but to choke a man and fill him full of smoke and embers. There were four died out of one house last week with the taking of it, and two more the bell went for yesternight.”

Bells were usually rung to announce a death, but for these two people, bells were rung in anticipation of their deaths.

Cob continued:

“One of them, they say, will never escape his death; he voided a bushel of soot yesterday, upward and downward — he vomited and defecated a bushel of tobacco ash.

“By the stocks, if there were no wiser men than I, I’d have it present — instant — whipping, man or woman, who should but deal with a tobacco pipe. Why, it will stifle them all in the end, as many as use it; it’s little better than ratsbane or rosaker.”

The stocks were two pieces of wood with half-circles carved out of one edge; when the two pieces of wood were put together, the half-circles would form circles. A person would be restrained by having his or her feet, and/or hands, and/or head put in the circles.

Ratsbane is rat poison, and rosaker is red arsenic, which was also used to kill rats.

Captain Bobadill beat Cob with a cudgel as Cash re-entered the scene while carrying a lighted match.

Everyone said, “Oh, good Captain, stop! Stop!”

“You base cullion, you!” Captain Bobadill said to Cob.

A cullion is literally a testicle.

The others restrained Captain Bobadill.

Cash handed the lighted match to Captain Bobadill and said, “Sir, here’s your match.”

He then said to Cob, “Come, thou must necessarily be talking, too. Thou are well enough served — you got what you deserved.”

Cob said, “Nay, he will not meddle with his match — fight with his equal — I assure you. Well, it shall be a dear beating, if I live.”

He meant that he would get revenge on Captain Bobadill.

Still angry, Captain Bobadill said to Cob, “Do you prate? Do you murmur?”

Edward Knowell said to Captain Bobadill, “Nay, good Captain, will you regard the humor of a fool?”

He then said to Cob, “Go away, knave!”

Wellbred said to Thomas Cash, “Thomas, get him away.”

Cash and Cob exited.

“A whoreson, filthy slave, a dung-worm, an excrement!” Captain Bobadill said about Cob. “I swear by the body of Caesar, that except that I scorn to let forth so mean a spirit, I would have stabbed him to the earth.”

“Let forth so mean a spirit” means “let free from the body so mean a soul.”

“By the Virgin Mary, the law forbids murder, sir,” Wellbred said.

“By Pharaoh’s foot, I swear I would have done it,” Captain Bobadill said.

Master Stephen said to himself, “Oh, he swears admirably! ‘By Pharaoh’s foot,’ ‘by the body of Caesar’ — I shall never do it, to be sure. ‘Upon my honor,’ and ‘by Saint George’ — no, I have not the right grace.”

The right grace is the right tone of voice. Master Stephen knew the right words, but he did not know the right way to say them. Yes, he knew the words, but he did not know the tune.

The men lighted their pipes and smoked.

Master Matthew said, "Master Stephen, will you have any tobacco? By this air, this is the most divine tobacco that I ever drunk!"

"None, I thank you, sir," Master Stephen said.

Master Stephen then said to himself, "Oh, this gentleman — Master Matthew — does it rarely, too, but nothing like the other."

Master Matthew swore — "by this air" — but not as well as Captain Bobadill.

Master Stephen faced a post and began to practice swearing: "By this air! 'As I am a gentleman!' 'By —'"

Captain Bobadill and Master Matthew exited.

Brainworm said to Edward Knowell, "Master, glance, glance! Look at Master Stephen!"

He then said, "Master Wellbred!"

Master Stephen said to the post, "As I have something to be saved, I protest —"

He had a soul to be saved.

The phrase "I protest" is used in a solemn declaration.

Wellbred said to himself, "You are a fool; it needs no affidavit."

Edward Knowell said to Master Stephen, "Cousin, will you have any tobacco?"

Taking some tobacco, Master Stephen said, "Aye, sir! Upon my reputation —"

"How are you now, cousin?" Edward Knowell asked.

Master Stephen said, “I protest, as I am a gentleman, but no soldier, indeed —”

“No, Master Stephen?” Wellbred said. “As I remember, your name is entered in the Artillery Garden?”

The Artillery Garden is the Artillery Yard, where citizens who were members of the Honorable Artillery Company practiced military drills.

“Aye, sir, that’s true,” Master Stephen said.

He then asked Edward Knowell, “Cousin, may I swear ‘as I am a soldier’ by that?”

“Oh, yes, that you may,” Edward Knowell said. “It’s all you have for your money.”

Citizens paid to become members of the Honorable Artillery Company, and they paid quarterly fees. By becoming members, they became citizen-soldiers.

“Then, as I am a gentleman and a soldier, I swear that it is divine tobacco!” Master Stephen said.

“But wait,” Wellbred said. “Where’s Master Matthew? Gone?”

“No, sir, they went in here,” Brainworm answered.

Captain Bobadill and Master Matthew had gone inside Kitley’s house.

“Oh, let’s follow them,” Wellbred said. “Master Matthew has gone to salute — greet formally — his mistress in verse.”

His mistress — that is, the woman he loved and served — was Bridget, Kitley’s sister.

Wellbred asked Edward Knowell, “We shall have the happiness to hear some of his poetry now. He never comes unsupplied.”

He then said, “Brainworm!”

Master Stephen said, “Brainworm? Where? Is this Brainworm?”

Brainworm was still disguised as a military man, and Master Stephen had not recognized him.

“Aye, cousin,” Edward Knowell said. “Say no words about it, upon your gentility.”

“I won’t, I swear by the body of me, by this air, Saint George, and the foot of Pharaoh!” Master Stephen said.

Wellbred said quietly to Edward Knowell, “Splendid! Your cousin’s discourse is simply drawn out with oaths.”

The oaths added unnecessary words to his conversation.

Edward Knowell said quietly to Wellbred, “His discourse is larded with them. It’s a kind of French dressing, if you love it.”

French cooks would add fat to lean fowl before cooking it to make it juicy.

French people were renowned for oaths and cookery. French swearing could give someone a good dressing-down.

— 3.6 —

Kitely and Cob talked together.

“Ha!” Kitely said. “How many are there, do thou say?”

Cob began, “By the Virgin Mary, sir, your brother, Master Wellbred —”

Kitely interrupted, "Tut, beside him. What strangers are there, man?"

"Strangers?" Cob said. "Let me see: one, two — by the Mass, I don't well know, there are so many."

"What!" Kitely said. "So many?"

"Aye," Cob said, "there's some five or six of them at the most."

Kitely said to himself, "A swarm! A swarm! Spite of the devil, how they sting my head with forkèd stings, thus wide and large!"

The stings would cause his head to swell up in two spots and make horns.

He then asked, "But Cob, how long have thou been in coming hither, Cob?"

"A little while, sir," Cob answered.

"Did thou come running?" Kitely asked.

"No, sir," Cob answered.

"Nay, then, I am familiar with thy haste," Kitely said.

He then said to himself:

"Bane to my fortunes! What meant I to marry? Why did I marry? I who before was established in such content, my mind at rest, too, in so soft a peace, being free master of my own free thoughts, and now become a slave?"

"What, never sigh; be of good cheer, man, for thou are a cuckold. It is done, it is done. Nay, when such flowing store, plenty itself, falls in my wife's lap, the cornucopiae will be mine, I know."

When Zeus seduced Danae, he transformed himself into a stream of gold that poured into her lap.

Kitely's cornucopiae was a plentitude of horns.

Kitely then said, "But Cob, what manner of reception had the strangers? I am sure my sister and my wife would bid them welcome. Ha!"

"Likely enough, sir," Cob said, "yet I heard not a word of it."

Kitely said to himself, "No, their lips were sealed with kisses, and the voice, drowned in a flood of joy at their arrival, had lost her motion, state, and faculty."

He then asked, "Cob, which of them was it who first kissed my wife? My sister, I should say. My wife! Alas, I don't fear her. Ha? Who was it, do thou say?"

"By my truth, sir," Cob said, "will you have the truth of it?"

"Oh, aye, good Cob, I ask thee heartily for the truth," Kitely said.

"Then, I am a vagabond, and fitter for Bridewell than Your Worship's company, if I saw anybody to be kissed, unless they would have kissed the post in the middle of the warehouse," Cob said.

Bridewell was a workhouse for impoverished people.

To "kiss the (door)post" meant to "be shut out after arriving too late."

Cob continued, "For there I left them all at their tobacco — with a pox! A plague on them!"

"What!" Kitely said. "Hadn't they gone in, then, before thou came to me?"

“Oh, no, sir,” Cob said.

“Spite of the devil!” Kately said. “Why do I stay here, then?”

He wanted to get home before he was cuckolded.

“Cob, follow me,” Kately ordered.

Alone, Cob said to himself:

“Nay, soft and fair! I have eggs on the spit.”

“Having eggs on the spit” meant “having important business at hand.” Roasting eggs on a spit required careful attention.

Cob continued:

“I cannot go yet, sir. Now I am for some five-and-fifty reasons hammering, hammering revenge. Oh, for three or four gallons of vinegar to sharpen my wits! Revenge, vinegar revenge, vinegar-and-mustard revenge!”

Cob was angry at Captain Bobadill, who had beaten him although he was staying at his house. Cob was Captain Bobadill’s host, and guests ought not to beat their hosts. It’s a violation of hospitality. Cob was also jealous; he was afraid that Captain Bobadill was sleeping with his — Cob’s — wife. This is another violation of hospitality.

The kind of revenge Cob wanted was vinegar-and-mustard revenge. The two, when combined, made a sharp salad dressing, and Cob wanted revenge with a sting to it.

Cob continued:

“Nay, if he had not lain in my house, it would never have grieved me. But being my guest — one whom, I’ll be sworn, my wife has lent him her smock off her back while his one shirt has been in the wash, pawned her neckerchers for clean bands for him, sold almost all my platters to buy him tobacco — and he to turn into a monster of ingratitude and strike his lawful host!”

“Neckerchers” are neckerchiefs; “bands” are ornamental collars or ruffs.

Cob continued:

“Well, I hope to raise up a host — an army — of fury for it.”

Looking up, he said, “Here comes Justice Clement.”

— 3.7 —

Justice Clement, Old Knowell, and Roger Formal (Justice Clement’s clerk) entered the scene.

“What, has Master Kately gone?” Justice Clement asked.

He then called, “Roger!”

Roger Formal, his clerk, said, “Aye, sir.”

“By the heart of me, what made him leave us so abruptly?” Justice Clement asked.

Seeing Cob, he asked him, “How are you now, sirrah? What are you doing here? What do you want?”

Cob answered, “If it pleases Your Worship, I am a poor neighbor of Your Worship’s —”

Justice Clement interrupted, “A poor neighbor of mine? Why, speak, poor neighbor.”

“I dwell, sir, at the sign of the water-tankard, nearby the Green Lattice,” Cob said. “I have paid scot and lot there any time this eighteen years.”

“To the Green Lattice?” Justice Clement asked.

Many alehouses had painted lattices.

“No, sir, to the parish,” Cob said. “By the Virgin Mary, I have seldom escaped scot-free at the Lattice.”

“Scot and lot” were parish taxes.

“Oh, well,” Justice Clement said. “What business has my poor neighbor with me?”

Cob replied, “If Your Worship likes, I have come to crave the peace of Your Worship.”

Cob wanted Justice Clement to issue a warrant of peace-keeping to keep Captain Bobadill from inflicting violence upon him.

Justice Clement, however, thought — or pretended to think — that Cob was saying that Cob wanted a warrant of peace-keeping to keep Justice Clement from inflicting violence upon him.

Justice Clement said, “Of me, knave? Peace of me, knave? Did I ever hurt thee? Or threaten thee? Or wrong thee? Huh?”

“No, sir,” Cob said, “but I want Your Worship’s warrant for one who has wronged me, sir. His arms are at too much liberty. I would like to have them bound to a treaty of peace, if my credit could compass it and bring it about with Your Worship.”

“Thou go far enough about for it, I am sure,” Justice Clement said.

“To encompass” means “to encircle.” Justice Clement was punning: Cob was taking the long route in telling Justice Clement information; he was not getting straight to the point but was instead circling around it.

Old Knowell said to Cob, “Why, do thou go in danger of thy life for him, friend?”

“No, sir,” Cob said, “but I go in danger of my death every hour by his means; if I die within a twelvemonth and a day, I may swear by the law of the land that he killed me.”

Prosecution for murder could be instituted within a year and a day.

“What! What, knave?” Justice Clement said. “Swear he killed thee?”

Once a person is dead, it is unlikely that he will swear anything.

Justice Clement continued, “And by the law? What pretense, what color — what justification — have thou for that?”

Cob said, “By the Virgin Mary, if it pleases Your Worship, both black and blue — color enough, I assure you. I have it here to show Your Worship.”

He showed the bruises from the beating that Captain Bobadill had given him.

“Who is he who gave you these bruises, sirrah?” Justice Clement asked.

“A gentleman and a soldier he says he is, of the city here,” Cob said.

“A soldier of the city?” Justice Clement said. “What do you call him?”

“Captain Bobadill,” Cob answered.

“Bobadill?” Justice Clement said. “And why did he bob and beat you, sirrah? How did the quarrel between you begin?”

To “bob” means to “hit with a fist.”

He continued, “Speak truly, knave, I advise you.”

“By the Virgin Mary, indeed, if it pleases Your Worship, only because I spoke against their vagrant — low and vile — tobacco as I came by them when they were taking it. That is the cause of the beating — it was for nothing else.”

“Ha? You speak against tobacco?” Justice Clement said.

He then ordered, “Formal, his name.”

Roger Formal asked Cob, “What’s your name, sirrah?”

“Oliver, sir,” Cob answered. “Oliver Cob, sir.”

Justice Clement said, “Tell Oliver Cob he shall go to the jail, Formal.”

Roger Formal said, “Oliver Cob, my master, Justice Clement, says you shall go to the jail.”

“Oh, I beseech Your Worship, for God’s sake, dear Master Justice!” Cob said.

He was asking for mercy.

“Nay, by God’s precious body,” Justice Clement said. “If such drunkards and tankards as you are come to dispute about tobacco once, I have done.”

He ordered, “Away with him! Take him away!”

“Oh, good Master Justice!” Cob said.

He said to Old Knowell, “Sweet old gentleman!”

Old Knowell replied, “Sweet Oliver, I wish that I could do thee any good.”

A popular ballad of the time began, “Oh, sweet Oliver.”

He then said, “Justice Clement, let me entreat you, sir.”

“What?” Justice Clement said. “A threadbare rascal, a beggar, a slave who never drunk out of better than piss-pot metal in his life?”

Piss-pot metal was pewter, the metal that tavern mugs — and chamber pots — were made of.

Justice Clement continued:

“And he to deprave and abuse the virtue of an herb so generally received in the courts of princes, the chambers of nobles, the bowers of sweet ladies, the tents of soldiers?”

“Roger, away with him, by God’s precious.”

He then said to Cob, “I say, go to.”

“Go to” was an expression of annoyance. Sometimes, it meant “Go to hell.”

Cob said, “Dear Master Justice, let me be beaten again — I have deserved it — but don’t send me to the prison, I beg you!”

“Alas, poor Oliver!” Old Knowell said.

Justice Clement said, “Roger, make a warrant of peacekeeping for him.”

He was going to give Cob what Cob wanted.

Justice Clement then said about Cob, “He shall not go to prison; I was only frightening the knave.”

Roger Formal said, “Do not stink, sweet Oliver. You shall not go to prison; my master will give you the warrant of peacekeeping you wanted.”

“Do not stink” may mean “Don’t crap your pants.”

Cob, who had been very scared, said, “Oh, may the Lord maintain His Worship, His worthy Worship!”

“Leave, and take care of him,” Justice Clement ordered Roger Formal, his clerk.

Roger Formal and Cob exited.

Justice Clement then said to Old Knowell, “How are you now, Master Knowell! In the dumps? In the dumps? Are you melancholic? Come, this is not fitting.”

“Sir, I wish I could not feel my cares,” Old Knowell said.

He was worried about his son and the company his son was keeping.

“Your cares are nothing,” Justice Clement said. “They are like my cap, soon put on and as soon put off.”

While performing their official duties, justices wore a special cap.

“Your son is old enough to govern himself; let him run his course. It’s the only way to make him a staid, settled, dignified man, one who will stay at home.

“If he were a spendthrift, a ruffian, a drunkard, or a licentious liver, then you had reason, you had reason to take care and to be worried, but with him being none of these, mirth’s my witness, if I had twice as many cares as you have, I’d drown them all in a cup of sack.”

Sack is a kind of white wine.

“Come, come, let’s try it.

“I marvel that your parcel — piece — of a soldier has not returned all this while.”

The parcel of soldier was the disguised Brainworm.

They exited to drink a cup of wine.

ACT 4 (Every Man in His Humor)

— 4.1 —

Squire Downright and Dame Kately talked together. They were brother and sister. Her brother and his half-brother was Wellbred, who often brought visitors to the Kately house, in which he lived.

“Well, sister, I tell you true, and you’ll find it so in the end,” Squire Downright said.

He had been complaining about the visitors whom Wellbred often brought to the Kately house.

“Alas, brother, what would you have me do?” Dame Kately said. “I cannot help it; you see, my brother brings them in here; they are his friends.”

“His friends? His fiends!” Squire Downright said. “By God’s blood, they do nothing but haunt him up and down like a sort of unlucky sprites — malignant elves or fairies — and tempt him to all manner of villainy that can be thought of. Well, by this light, a little thing — something trivial — would make me play the devil with some of them. If it weren’t more for your husband’s sake than anything else, I’d make the house too hot for the best of them. They should say and swear hell were broken loose before they went away from here. But, by God’s will, it is nobody’s fault but yours. For, if you had done as you might have done, they should have been parboiled — thoroughly boiled — and baked, too, every mother’s son, before they should have come in, ever a one of them!”

“God’s my life, did you ever hear the like?” Dame Kately said. “What a strange man is this! Could I keep out all of them, do you think? I should put myself against half-a-dozen men, should I? Good faith, you’d madden the most patient body in the world to hear you talk so, without any sense or reason.”

Hmm. “Put myself against half-a-dozen men.” Ha.

— 4.2 —

Mistress Bridget, Master Matthew (who was holding some papers), and Captain Bobadill entered the scene, followed at a distance by Wellbred, Master Stephen, Edward Knowell, and Brainworm.

Master Matthew was Mistress Bridget’s servant: He was her professed admirer, who served her. She was his mistress: the woman he loved. “Mistress” in this sense does not imply that they were sleeping together.

Bridget said to Master Matthew, “Servant, truly, you are too prodigal of your wit’s treasure, thus to pour it forth upon so mean a subject as my worth.”

“You say well, mistress; and I mean as well,” Master Matthew said.

He was agreeing with her!

“Bah, here is stuff — here is nonsense!” Squire Downright said.

Edward Knowell said quietly to Wellbred, “Oh, now stand close — quiet and nearby and unnoticed. Pray heaven she can get him to read his poetry. He should do it of his own natural impudency.”

Bridget pointed to the papers Master Matthew was carrying and asked, “Servant, what are these papers, I ask you?”

“By the Virgin Mary, an elegy, an elegy, an odd toy,” Master Matthew said.

The word “elegy” meant a short lyrical poem, not necessarily mournful. “An odd toy” is a whimsical trifle.

Squire Downright said, “It is a toy to mock an ape with — that is, a trick to make a fool out of a fool. Oh, I could sew up his mouth now!”

“Sister-in-law, I request of you, let’s hear it,” Dame Kately said.

“Are you rhyme-given, too?” Squire Downright said.

Master Matthew said to Bridget, “Mistress, I’ll read it, if you please.”

“I pray you do, servant,” Bridget replied.

Squire Downright said sarcastically, “Oh, here’s no foppery! By God’s death, I swear I can endure the stocks better.”

Squire Downright exited.

Edward Knowell said quietly to Wellbred, “What ails thy brother? Can’t he hold his water at the reading of a ballad?”

A then-current story was about a man who so hated the bagpipes that he peed himself whenever he heard them.

Wellbred quietly replied, “Oh, no, a rhyme to him is worse than cheese or a bagpipe.”

Cheese and other curdled foods nauseate some people. Some cheeses are cheesy.

Wellbred quietly continued, “But pay attention. You lose the protestation — you are missing Master Matthew’s comments.”

Master Matthew said, “In faith, I did it in a humor — an inspiration. I don’t know how good it is, but if it would please you, come near, sir. This gentleman” — he pointed to Master Stephen — “has judgment; he knows how to censure a —”

He then said to Master Stephen, “Please, sir, you can judge.”

“Not I, sir — upon my reputation, and by the foot of Pharaoh,” Master Stephen said, practicing his swearing.

Wellbred said quietly to Edward Knowell, “Oh, chide your cousin for swearing.”

Edward Knowell said quietly to Wellbred, “Not I, as long as he does not forswear himself.”

To “forswear himself” means to “swear falsely.” If Master Stephen swears “upon my reputation, and by the foot of Pharaoh” and has neither a reputation nor the foot of Pharaoh, he has not forsworn himself.

Captain Bobadill said, “Master Matthew, you abuse the expectation of your dear mistress and her fair sister. Bah, while you live, avoid this prolixity.”

“I shall, sir,” Master Matthew replied.

He then addressed his audience, “Well, incipere dulce — ‘to begin is sweet.’”

Edward Knowell said quietly to Wellbred, “What? Insipere dulce? ‘A sweet thing to be a fool,’ indeed.”

Wellbred said quietly to Edward Knowell, “What! Do you take incipere in that sense?”

Edward Knowell whispered, “You do not? You? This was your villainy, to gull him with a mot.”

A mot is a saying. A bon mot is a witty saying.

Edward Knowell was accusing Wellbred of teaching Master Matthew the mot “incipere dulce” so that Wellbred could pun on it with “insipere dulce” and call Master Matthew a fool in a bon mot. Edward Knowell, however, had beaten him to the jest and made it first.

Wellbred whispered to Edward Knowell, “Oh, the benchers’ phrase: pauca verba, pauca verba.” “Pauca verba” is Latin for “few words.” Some proverbs beginning with that phrase included “Few words are best” and “Few words suffice for the wise.” When it came to Master Matthew’s own poetry, the fewer words the better. When it came to drinkers, it was best to talk less and drink more.

Benchers sit on a bench. The bench could be a tavern bench or a judge’s bench; in this case, it is the bench a judge of poetry sat on.

Master Matthew read out loud:

“Rare creature, let me speak without offence.

“Would God my rude words had the influence

“To rule thy thoughts, as thy fair looks do mine;

“Then shouldst thou be his prisoner, who is thine.”

Edward Knowell whispered to Wellbred, “This is Christopher Marlowe’s Hero and Leander!”

Master Matthew was a plagiarist, but at least right now he was plagiarizing very good poetry. He was merely changing a few words and claiming it as his own poetry.

Marlowe had written this:

“Fair creature, let me speak without offence,

“I would my rude words had the influence,

“To lead thy thoughts, as thy fair looks do mine,

“Then shouldst thou be his prisoner who is thine.”

(The spelling and punctuation of Marlowe’s poem here and later has been partially modernized.)

Wellbred whispered back, “Oh, aye, peace. Be quiet. We shall have more of this.”

Master Matthew read out loud:

“Be not unkind and fair. Misshapen stuff

“Is of behaviour boisterous and rough —”

Marlowe had written this:

“Be not unkind and fair; misshapen stuff

“Are of behaviour boisterous and rough.”

Wellbred said to Master Stephen, “How do you like that, sir?”

Master Stephen answered by shaking his head.

People nod their heads yes, and people shake their heads no. Master Stephen did not like the lines of poetry.

Edward Knowell whispered to Wellbred, “By God’s light, he shakes his head like a bottle, to feel if there is any brain in it!”

Master Matthew said:

“But observe the catastrophe — the denouement — now:

“And I in duty will exceed all other

“As you in beauty do excel Love’s mother.”

Marlowe had written this:

“And I in duty will excel all other,

“As thou in beauty dost exceed Love’s mother.”

Love’s mother is Venus; Love is Cupid.

Master Matthew then presented the verses to Bridget.

Edward Knowell whispered to Wellbred, “Well, I’ll have him given the freedom of the wit-brokers, for he utters nothing but stolen remnants.”

Edward Knowell would have Master Matthew enrolled among the dealers in second-hand remnants — in this case, the dealers in second-hand wit since Master Matthew had gotten his wit from Christopher Marlowe.

Wellbred whispered to Edward Knowell, “Oh, forgive him for it.”

Edward Knowell whispered back, “A filching rogue, hang him! And from the dead? It’s worse than sacrilege.”

Christopher Marlowe’s Hero and Leander had been published posthumously in 1598.

Wellbred said to Bridget, “Sister-in-law, what have you here? Verses? Please, let’s see them.”

Bridget gave the verses to Wellbred, who examined them and said, “Who made these verses? They are excellent good.”

“Oh, Master Wellbred, it is your disposition to say so, sir,” Master Matthew said. “They were good in the morning; I made them extempore — extemporaneously — this morning.”

“What! Extempore!” Wellbred said.

“Aye, I wish that I might be hanged else,” Master Matthew said. “Ask Captain Bobadill. He saw me write them at the — a pox on it! — the Star, yonder.”

The Star was a tavern. It had taken Master Matthew a moment to remember the name.

Brainworm said quietly to Wellborn and Edward Knowell, “Can he find in his heart to curse the stars so?”

Edward Knowell whispered, “Indeed, his stars are even with him: They have cursed him enough already.”

According to astrology, the stars have an influence on our life. At his birth, Master Matthew’s stars had cursed him with foolishness.

“Cousin, how do you like this gentleman’s verses?” Master Stephen asked Edward Knowell.

“Oh, admirable!” Edward Knowell said. “The best that ever I heard, coz.”

Master Stephen said, “By the body of Caesar, they are admirable! The best that ever I heard, I swear as I am a soldier.”

If Edward Knowell liked the poetry, then so did Master Stephen. Many people make up their minds about the quality of a work of art after learning the opinion of good critics.

Justice Downright entered the scene.

He said to himself, not caring if anyone heard him, “I am vexed. I can hold never a bone of me still! By God’s heart, I think they mean to build and breed — reside permanently — here!”

Wellbred said to Bridget, “Sister, you have a simple servant here, who crowns your beauty with such encomions and encomiums and devices.”

Encomion is the Greek form of encomium. Each is a fancy expression of praise.

Devices can be tricks, or they can be poetic devices such as metaphors.

Wellbred continued, “You may see what it is to be the mistress of a wit who can make your perfections so transparent that every bleary eye may look through them and see him drowned over his head and his ears in the deep well of desire.”

Narcissus fell in love with his own reflection. Unable to move away from his reflection, he stared at it until he died. In some versions of the myth, he fell into the pool and drowned.

Wellbred then said, “Sister Kitely, I marvel that you haven’t gotten you a servant who can rhyme and do tricks, too.”

Master Matthew’s “trick” was plagiarism.

“Tricks” also has a sexual meaning that the others were well aware of.

Justice Downright said to himself, “Oh, monster! Impudence itself! Tricks?”

“Tricks, brother?” Dame Kitely asked. “What tricks?”

“Nay, speak,” Bridget said. “I ask you, what tricks?”

“Aye, never spare anybody here, but say, what tricks?” Dame Kitely said.

Both women were worried about their reputations.

“Passion of my heart!” Bridget said. “Do tricks?”

“Tricks” can be sexual acts performed for pay. “Merry tricks” is a pun on meretrix, which is Latin for “prostitute.”

Wellbred said, “By God’s light, here’s a trick, vied and revied.”

This kind of “trick” was one performed in a card game. The phrase “vied and revied” means “bid and rebid.”

Wellbred continued, “Why, you monkeys, you, what a caterwauling do you keep up! Hasn’t he given you rhymes and verses and tricks?”

Squire Downright said to himself, “Oh, the fiend!”

Wellbred said to Bridget, “Nay, you lamp of virginity — you paragon of virtue — who so take it in snuff — take offense at it, come and cherish this tame poetical fury — inspiration — in your servant; you’ll be begged else shortly for a concealment.”

King Henry VIII had dissolved the monasteries and taken their land, but some land that should have gone to the crown was concealed — the land that was taken from the monasteries and should have gone to the crown was instead held by private owners. Queen Elizabeth I gave commissions to people to find and report concealed land; these people received part or sometimes all of the land. Some greedy people tried to claim that land legally owned by others was actually concealed land. These greedy people begged the land — they claimed they were entitled to part or all of the land as a reward.

Like those greedy people, Master Matthew was claiming a part of Marlowe’s poetry as his own. Master Matthew had “found” the “concealed” Hero and Leander — foolishly, he thought that no one would recognize Marlowe’s poem and so discover his plagiarism. Bridget, who was Master Matthew’s mistress, had given him a “commission” for poetry and now she needed to reward him lest he lay a claim to — beg — the entire poem.

Also, unless Bridget cherished Master Matthew’s “tame poetical fury,” she could be accused of concealing his poetic “genius.”

Wellbred continued, “Go on, reward his muse. You cannot give him less than a shilling in conscience because the book he had it out of cost him a teston at least.”

A teston is sixpence; a shilling is tweldepence. Master Matthew would receive sixpence for the cost of Marlowe’s book (expenses) and sixpence for the labor of copying Marlowe’s verses.

Wellbred then said to the others, “How are you now, gallants? Master Matthew? Captain? What! All sons of silence? No spirit?”

Squire Downright said, out loud, to Wellborn, “Come, you might practice your ruffian tricks somewhere else and not here, indeed. This is no tavern, nor drinking school, to vent your exploits in.”

“What is this now!” Wellborn said. “Whose cow has calved?”

Sometimes, people could argue over whose cow had calved when a cow gave birth in a common pasture with no witnesses. Sometimes, cows gave birth at roughly the same time, and if a cow gave birth to twins, people could argue over the ownership of the second twin. Sometimes, a calf was stillborn, and if another cow gave live birth at roughly the same time, people could argue over the ownership of the living calf.

By saying “Whose cow has calved?” Wellbred was acknowledging that Squire Downright was in a mood for a fight.

The proverb can also mean, “What’s the matter?”

“By the Virgin Mary,” Squire Downright said, “That was my cow that calved. Nay, boy, don’t look at me like that about this matter. I'll tell you about it; aye, sir, you and your companions, mend yourselves when I have finished talking."

"My companions?" Wellbred said to his half-brother: Squire Downright.

The word "companions" could be used as a derogatory term. Squire Downright was using it in that way to insult Wellbred's friends and guests.

For Wellbred to allow his guests to be insulted would be a major breach of hospitality.

"Yes, sir, your companions, so I say," Squire Downright said. "I am not afraid of you, nor am I afraid of them, either, your hang-bys — your hangers-on — here. You must have your poets and your potlings and drinking buddies, your soldados [Spanish for "soldiers"] and foolados [mock-Spanish for "fools"], to follow you up and down the city, and here they insist on coming to domineer and swagger."

He then said to Master Matthew, "Sirrah, you ballad-singer, and Slops, your fellow there, get out!"

Slops were baggy trousers; Captain Bobadill was wearing slops.

Squire Downright continued, "Get yourself home or, by this steel" — he put his hand on his sword — "I'll cut off your ears, and that immediately."

Wellbred said to Master Matthew and Captain Bobadill, as they shied away, "By God's light, stay. Let's see what he dares to do."

He then said to Squire Downright, "Cut off his ears? Cut a whetstone. You are an ass, do you see? Touch any man here and, by this hand, I'll run my rapier to the hilts in you."

Wellbred was no fan of Master Matthew and Captain Bobadill, but Squire Downright was going beyond the bounds of proper behavior.

Livy in his History of Rome (Book 1.36) recounted a story of a Roman augur named Attus [sometimes called Accius] Naevius who cut a whetstone with a razor. Such a task would be impossible, and Wellbred was mocking Squire Downright here.

Squire Downright said, “Yea, I would like to see that, boy.”

They both drew their swords. So did a few others.

Dame Kately shouted, “Oh, Jesu! Murder! Thomas! Gaspar!”

“Help, help, Thomas!” Bridget shouted.

Thomas Cash and the other serving-men came running and parted the opposing swordsmen.

“Gentlemen!” Edward Knowell said. “Don’t fight, I ask you.”

Captain Bobadill said to Squire Downright, “Well, sirrah, you Holofernes. By my hand, I will pink your flesh full of holes with my rapier for this; I will, by this good heaven!”

Holofernes was the general of Nebuchadnezzar; Judith killed him. “Full of holes” is a play on his name.

They attempted to fight again, but they were parted.

Captain Bobadill said, “Nay, let him come, let him come, gentlemen; by the body of Saint George, I’ll not kill him.”

“Stop, stop, good gentlemen!” Cash said.

Squire Downright said to Captain Bobadill, “You whoreson bragging coistrel! You scoundrel!”

Kitely entered the scene and asked, “Why, what is this now? What’s the matter? What’s the trouble here? Whence springs the quarrel?”

He called for Thomas Cash, “Thomas! Where is he?”

He said, “Put up your weapons and put off this rage!”

He then said to himself, “My wife and my sister — they are the cause of this.”

He called again for Thomas Cash, “What! Thomas! Where is this knave?”

Thomas Cash said, “Here I am, sir.”

Wellbred said to Edward Knowell and the rest, “Come, let’s go. This is one of my half-brother’s ancient — long-established — humors, this.”

“I am glad nobody was hurt by his ancient humor,” Master Stephen said.

Because he was frightened, he forgot to swear.

Wellbred, Edward Knowell, Brainworm, Master Stephen, Captain Bobadill, Master Matthew, and the servants exited.

Staying behind were Kitely, Squire Downright, Dame Kitely, Bridget, and Thomas Cash.

Kitely said, “Why, what is this now, brother-in-law? Who forced this brawl? Whose rude behavior started it?”

Squire Downright replied, “A sort of lewd rakehells, who care neither for God nor the devil. And they insist on coming here to read ballads, and roguery, and trash. I’ll mar and mangle the group of them before I sleep, perhaps, especially Bob there, he who's all manner of shapes, and Songs and Sonnets, his fellow."

Captain Bobadill's shape changed according to the kind of trousers he was wearing. Currently, he was wearing wide baggy trousers.

Songs and Sonnets was a popular title for books of — you guessed it — songs and sonnets.

Bridget said to Squire Downright, "Brother-in-law, indeed, you are too violent, too sudden in your humor; and you know that my brother-in-law Wellbred's temper will not bear any reproof, especially in such presence where every slight disgrace he should receive might wound him in opinion and respect."

"Respect?" Squire Downright said. "Why do you talk about respect among such as have neither spark of manhood nor good manners? By God's dignity, I am ashamed to hear you. Respect?"

He exited.

Bridget said, "Yes, there was one, a civil gentleman, and he very worthily demeaned — conducted — himself."

"Oh, that was some love of yours, sister," Kately said.

"A love of mine?" Bridget said. "I wish it would be no worse, brother. You'd pay my dowry sooner than you think."

Her dowry was in the keeping of her brother until she married.

"Indeed, he seemed to be a gentleman of an exceedingly fair disposition, and of very excellent good parts," Dame Kately said.

Bridget and Dame Kately exited.

Alone except for Thomas Cash, Kately said to himself, “Her love, by heaven! My wife’s minion! Her sweetheart! ‘Fair disposition’? ‘Excellent good parts’? By God’s death, these phrases are intolerable. ‘Good parts’? How should she know his parts? His parts! Well, well, well, well, well, well! It is too plain, too clear. “ “Parts” can mean 1) qualities, or 2) sexual parts.

He then said more loudly, “Thomas, come here. What! Have they gone?”

“Aye, sir, they went inside,” Thomas Cash said. “My mistress and your sister —”

This kind of mistress was a lady boss.

“Are any of the gallants inside?” Kately asked.

“No, sir, they are all gone,” Cash replied.

“Are thou sure of it?” Kately asked.

“I can assure you that it is so, sir,” Cash said.

“What gentleman was that they praised so, Thomas?” Kately asked.

“One whom they call Master Knowell, a handsome young gentleman, sir,” Thomas Cash replied.

Kately said to himself, “Aye, I thought so; my mind gave me as much. I’ll die if they haven’t hidden him in the house somewhere; I’ll go and search.”

He then said more loudly, “Go with me, Thomas. Be true to me, and thou shall find me a master worthy of the name.”

They exited.

Cob knocked on the door of his house. His wife, Tib, was inside. He was jealous of his wife. He worried that she was cheating on him with Captain Bobadill.

As he knocked, Cob called, “What, Tib! Tib, I say!”

From inside the house, Tib said, “What is it now? What cuckold is it who knocks so hard?”

Tib opened the door suddenly, and in so doing, hit Cob’s head with the door.

She said, “Oh, husband, is it you? What’s the news?”

“Nay, you have stunned me, indeed!” Cob said. “You have given me a knock on the forehead that will stick by me. Cuckold? By God’s eyelid, cuckold?”

“Bah, you fool!” Tib said. “Did I know it was you who knocked? Come, come, you may call me as bad a name when you like.”

“May I?” Cob said. “Tib, you are a whore.”

“You lie in your throat, husband,” Tib replied.

“What! The lie? And in my throat, too?” Cob said. “Do you long to be stabbed, huh?”

Telling a soldier that he lied in his throat was grounds for a duel to the death.

“Why, you are no soldier, I hope,” Tib said.

“Oh, must you be stabbed by a soldier?” Cob said.

He was referring to a sexual “stabbing.”

Cob continued, “By the Mass, that’s true. When was Bobadill here, your captain? That rogue, that foist, that fencing Burgullian! I’ll tickle — beat — him, indeed.”

A “foist” is a pickpocket, and “Burgullian” is Cob’s word for a Burgundian.

In England in 1598, a Burgundian named John Barrose was hanged for killing a man. Previously, he had challenged all the fencers in England to fence against him.

“Why, what’s the matter, I wonder?” Tib said.

Cob said:

“Oh, he has lambasted me rarely, sumptuously! But I have it here in black and white, for his black and blue, that shall pay him back.”

The “black and white” was the warrant that Cob had asked for, and the “black and blue” were the bruises that Captain Bobadill had given him.

Cob continued:

“Oh, the Justice! The honestest old brave Trojan in London!”

Being called a Trojan was a compliment.

Cob continued:

“I honor the very flea of his dog. A plague on him, though; he put me once in a villainous, filthy fear. By the Virgin Mary, it vanished away like the smoke of tobacco, but I was smoked — given a hot time — soundly first, I thank the devil and his ‘good’ angel, my guest.

“Well, wife, or Tib, whichever you prefer, get you in and lock the door, I order you.”

In this society, “Tib” was a slang name for a strumpet.

Cob continued:

“Let no body into you, wife, nobody in to you. Nobody in to and no body into you. Those are my words. Not Captain Bob himself, nor the fiend in his likeness. You are a woman; you have flesh and blood enough in you to be tempted; therefore, keep the door shut upon all comers.”

The word “comers” had a sexual meaning.

“I warrant you, there shall no body enter here without my consent,” Tib said.

“Nor with your consent, sweet Tib,” Cob said, “and so I leave you.”

“It’s more than you know, whether you leave me so,” Tib said.

“What?” Cob asked.

“Why, whether I am sweet,” Tib said.

Tib was teasing her husband: Was he leaving her in a state of sweetness? Maybe not.

“Sweet” can metaphorically mean “chaste.”

“Tut, sweet or sour, thou are a flower,” Cob said. “Keep closed thy door; I ask no more.”

This particular “door” could be between her legs.

Edward Knowell, Wellbred, and Brainworm, who was still disguised as a soldier, talked together on a street. Master Stephen was present, but he was not close enough to hear the others’ conversation.

Edward Knowell said, “Well, Brainworm, perform this business successfully and thou will make a purchase of my love forever. You shall gain my love forever.”

Wellbred said to the disguised Brainworm, “Indeed, now let thy spirits use their best faculties. But, at any hand, remember the message to my half-brother, for there’s no other means to start him.”

To start an animal is to drive it out of its lair by startling it.

They were planning to trick Wellbred’s half-brother: Squire Downright.

“I warrant you, sir,” the disguised Brainworm said. “Fear nothing. I have a nimble soul that has awakened all the forces of my fantasy — imagination — by this time and put them in true motion. What you have instructed me to do, I’ll discharge it amply, sir. Don’t doubt it.”

“Go forth and prosper, Brainworm,” Wellbred said.

The disguised Brainworm exited.

Wellbred then said to Edward, “Indeed, Ned, how do thou approve of my abilities in this device?”

“In truth, well, in any case,” Edward Knowell said, “but our plot will come to an excellent end if it succeeds.”

Wellbred said:

“Succeeds, man? Why, it cannot choose but succeed, as long as the details of our plot don’t miscarry.

“But tell me ingenuously and frankly: Do thou feel affection for my sister-in-law Bridget, as thou claim?”

“Friend, am I worth believing?” Edward Knowell asked.

“Come, do not protest,” Wellbred said. “In faith, she is a maiden of good qualities and much modesty; and, unless I conceived very worthily of her, thou should not have her.”

“Nay, that, I am afraid, will be a question yet, whether I shall have her or not,” Edward Knowell said.

“By God’s eyelid, I swear thou shall have her; I swear by this light, thou shall,” Wellbred said.

“Nay, do not swear,” Edward Knowell said.

“By this hand, thou shall have her,” Wellbred said. “I’ll go fetch her right away. Just appoint a place where you two shall meet, and, as I am an honest man, I’ll bring her there.”

In fact, Edward Knowell wanted to marry Bridget.

“Wait, wait,” Edward Knowell said. “Be temperate.”

“Why, by — what shall I swear by?” Wellbred said. “Thou shall have her, as I am —”

“Please, be at peace,” Edward Knowell said. “Be silent. I am satisfied, and I do believe thou will omit no offered occasion — opportunity — to make my desires complete.”

“Thou shall see and know that I will not,” Wellborn said.

They exited.

— 4.6 —

Roger Formal and Old Knowell talked together on a street near Justice Clement’s house. Roger Formal was Justice Clement’s clerk.

“Was your man a soldier, sir?” Roger Formal asked.

The man was an employee, a serving-man: the disguised Brainworm, whom Old Knowell had recently hired.

“Aye, a knave,” Old Knowell said. “I overtook him begging on the way, this morning, as I came over Moorfields.”

He was upset because his new employee had been absent for so long.

Brainstorm, who was still disguised as a soldier, entered the scene.

Seeing the disguised Brainworm, Old Knowell said, “Oh, here he is!”

He then said to the disguised Brainworm, “You’ve made fair speed, believe me. Where, in the name of sloth, could you be thus —”

The disguised Brainworm interrupted, “— by the Virgin Mary, peace be my comfort, I was where I thought I should have had little comfort of — little support from — Your Worship’s service.”

In other words, he had been where he thought he would be treated badly because of his being employed by Old Knowell.

“How so?” Old Knowell asked.

“Oh, sir!” the disguised Brainworm said. “Your coming to the city, your reception of me, and your sending me to watch — indeed, all the circumstances, either of your charge or my employment, are as open, evident, and plain to your son as to yourself.”

In other words, Edward Knowell knew his father’s every move.

“How could that be?” Old Knowell asked. “Unless that villain Brainworm has told him about the letter and revealed all that I strictly charged him to conceal? It is so.”

“I am partly of the faith that it is so indeed,” the disguised Brainworm said.

“But how could he know thee to be my serving-man?” Old Knowell asked.

“Nay, sir, I cannot tell, unless it be by the black art,” Brainworm said. “Isn’t your son a scholar, sir?”

Some scholars, including Doctor Faustus, studied the black arts.

“Yes, but I hope his soul is not allied unto such hellish practice,” Old Knowell said. “If it were, I would have just cause to weep my part in him and curse the time of his creation.”

He then asked, “But where did thou find them, Fitzsword?”

Fitzsword was the disguised Brainworm’s alias.

The disguised Brainworm said:

“You should rather ask where they found me, sir, for I’ll be sworn that I was going along in the street, thinking nothing, when all of a sudden a voice calls, ‘Master Knowell’s man!’ Another cries, ‘Soldier!’ And thus half a dozen of them, until they had called me within a house, where I no sooner came but they were seen to be manly men, and out flew all their rapiers at my bosom, with some three- or four-score oaths to accompany them, and all to tell me I was but a dead man if I did not confess where you were, and how I was employed, and about what. Which, when they could not get that information out of me — as, I affirm, they must have dissected and made a skeleton out of me first, and so I told them — they locked me up into a room in the top of a high house, whence by great miracle, having a light heart, I slid down by the use of a ball of packthread — strong cord for typing up packs — into the street and so escaped.

“But, sir, thus much I can assure you, for I heard it while I was locked up: there were a great many rich merchants and fine citizens’ wives with them at a feast, and your son, Master Edward, withdrew with one of them, and has appointed to meet her soon at the house of a man named Cob. He is a water-bearer who dwells by the old City wall.

“Now there Your Worship shall be sure to take him, for there he preys, and he will not fail to be there.”

“Nor will I fail to break his match, I don’t doubt,” Old Knowell said.

“Match” can mean 1) appointment, or 2) romantic match.

Old Knowell then ordered, “Go thou along with Justice Clement’s man, Roger Formal, and wait there — at Justice Clement’s house — for me. At Cob’s house, say thou?”

“Aye, sir, there you shall have him,” the disguised Brainworm said.

Old Knowell exited.

The disguised Brainworm said to himself, “Yes? Invisible? Much wench or much son!”

He was being sarcastic. Old Knowell would find neither Bridget nor Edward, his son, there.

The disguised Brainworm continued, “By God’s light, when he has stayed there three or four hours, travailing with the expectation of wonders, and at length be delivered of air — oh, the entertainment that I should then take to look on him if I dared!”

“To be delivered of air” means “to give birth to nothing.”

The disguised Brainworm continued, “But now I mean to appear no more before him in this disguise; I have another trick to act yet. Oh, that I would be so happy as to light on a nupson — a fool — now in this Justice’s novice!”

He was hoping that Roger Formal, the young man who was Justice Clement’s clerk, was a fool.

The disguised Brainworm said to Roger Formal, “Sir, I make you stay somewhat long.”

“Not a whit, sir,” Roger Formal said. “I ask you, what do you mean, sir?”

“I was putting up some papers,” the disguised Brainworm said.

According to the Oxford English Dictionary, one definition of “paper” is this: “A notice fastened on the back of a criminal undergoing punishment, specifying his or her offence.” The notice makes known the offender’s offense.

Brainworm, disguised as a soldier, had not been literally putting up papers, but he had been punishing Master Stephen for his foolishness, and he had been making Master Stephen’s foolishness known by conning him into buying a sword of low quality for the price of a sword of high quality.

Brainworm had also been fooling or would be fooling other people with his disguise, including Old Knowell and Roger Formal himself. His fooling of these people would also become known, just as if people were reading papers pinned to their back.

His fooling of Old Knowell had made Roger Formal stay somewhat long.

“You have been lately in the wars, sir, it seems,” Roger Formal said.

The disguised Brainworm said, “By the Virgin Mary, I have, sir, to my loss and expense of everything, almost.”

“Truly, sir, I would be glad to bestow a pottle of wine on you, if it would please you to accept it,” Roger Formal said.

A pottle is a two-quart tankard.

“Oh, sir,” the disguised Brainworm said.

“I would like to hear the manner of your services and your devices — your stratagems — in the wars,” Roger Formal said. “They say they are very strange, and not like those a man reads in the Roman histories or sees at Mile End.”

Militias composed of apprentices practiced maneuvers at Mile End.

“No, I assure you, sir, my services were not like those,” the disguised Brainworm said. “Why, at any time when it would please you, I shall be ready to discourse to you all I know.”

He said to himself, “And somewhat more than I know, too.”

He would make up military adventures.

“No better time than now, sir,” Roger Formal said. “We’ll go to the Windmill. There we shall have a cup of neat — undiluted — grist, we call it. Please, sir, let me request that you go with me to the Windmill.”

“Grist” is malt that has been ground — perhaps by a windmill — for brewing strong beer. Roger Formal and his friends used the word “grist” to refer to strong beer.

“I’ll follow you, sir,” the disguised Brainworm said.

He then said to himself, “And make grist out of you, if I have good luck.”

“Make grist” in this context means “take advantage of you.”

They exited.

Master Matthew, Edward Knowell, Captain Bobadill, and Master Stephen talked together.

Master Matthew said to Edward Knowell about Squire Downright, “Sir, did your eyes ever taste the like clown — country bumpkin — of him where we were today? I mean Master Wellbred’s half-brother? I think the whole earth cannot show his parallel, I swear by this daylight.”

“We were just now speaking about him,” Edward Knowell said. “Captain Bobadill tells me that Squire Downright has fallen foul of you, too.”

“Oh, aye, sir, he threatened me with the bastinado,” Master Matthew said.

The bastinado was a cudgel. Squire Downright had threatened to beat Master Matthew with a cudgel.

“Aye, but I think I taught you prevention — defense — this morning for that,” Captain Bobadill said. “You shall kill him, beyond question, if you be so generously — nobly — minded.”

“Indeed, it is a most excellent trick!” Master Matthew said.

He practiced fencing.

“Oh, you do not give spirit enough to your fencing move,” Captain Bobadill said. “You are too tardy, too heavy. Oh, it must be done like lightning. Hay!”

Hai is an Italian fencing term meaning “A hit!”

Captain Bobadill demonstrated at a post.

“Splendid, Captain!” Master Matthew said.

“Tut, it is nothing, if it be not done in a — punto!” Captain Bobadill said, demonstrating.

Punto is an Italian word meaning 1) a point of time, aka moment, or 2) a thrust with the point of a sword.

“Captain, did you ever test yourself against any of our masters and teachers of defense here?” Edward Knowell asked.

“Oh, good sir!” Master Matthew said. “Yes! I should think so!”

Captain Bobadill said:

“I will tell you, sir.

“Upon my first coming to the city, after my long travail — travel and trouble — for knowledge in that mystery, aka art, of fencing, only there came three or four of them to me at a gentleman’s house, where it was my chance to be resident at that time, to entreat my presence at their schools, and in addition so much importuned me that — I protest to you, as I am a gentleman — I was ashamed of their rude demeanor out of all measure.

“Well, I told them that I would not come to a public school, and they should pardon me, as it was opposite in diameter — diametrically opposed — to my humor; but if instead they would give their attendance at — come to — my lodging, I promised to do them what right or favor I could, as I was a gentleman, and so forth.”

“So, sir, then you tried their skill?” Edward Knowell asked.

Captain Bobadill answered:

“Alas, soon tried! You shall hear, sir.

“Within two or three days afterward, they came; and, by honesty, fair sir, believe me, I graced them exceedingly, showed them some two or three tricks of defense that have purchased for them since a very creditable reputation! They cannot deny this. And yet now they hate me; and why? Because I am excellent, and for no other vile reason on the earth.”

“This is the strangest and most barbarous thing I ever heard!” Edward Knowell said.

Captain Bobadill continued:

“Nay, for a greater instance of their preposterous — perverse and ungrateful — natures, just note this, sir.

“They have assaulted me, some three, four, five, six of them together, as I have walked alone in diverse outskirts in the town, such as Turnbull, Whitechapel, and Shoreditch, which were then my quarters.”

Turnbull, Whitechapel, and Shoreditch were areas known for their prostitutes and criminals.

“And they have assaulted me since upon the Royal Exchange, at my lodging, and at my ordinary, aka my usual eating-house, where I have driven them before me the whole length of a street in the open view of all our gallants, pitying to hurt them, believe me.

“Yet all this lenity will not overcome their spleen, aka envy; they will be doing with the pismire — will be as busy as ants — raising a hill a man may spurn abroad — kick aside — with his foot at pleasure.

“By myself, I could have slain them all, but I don’t delight in murder. I am loath to bear any other weapon than this bastinado — this cudgel — against them, yet I hold it good policy not to go disarmed, for, although I am skillful, I may be oppressed with multitudes.”

Edward Knowell said, “Aye, believe me, you may indeed be so, sir, and in my conceit — opinion — our whole nation should sustain the loss by it, if it were so.”

Of course, he did not believe this. He was saying these things to Captain Bobadill in the hope that Captain Bobadill would reveal his — Captain Bobadill’s — foolishness.

“Alas, no,” Captain Bobadill said. “What’s a peculiar — individual — man to a nation? Not seen.”

He was unacknowledged: Important people did not know who he was.

“Oh, but your skill, sir!” Edward Knowell said.

Captain Bobadill said, “Indeed, that might be some loss, but who respects or pays attention to it? I will tell you, sir, privately and figuratively sealed: I am a gentleman and live here obscure and to myself. But if I were known to Her Majesty and the lords, observe me, I would undertake, upon this poor head and life, for the public benefit of the state, not only to spare the entire lives of her subjects in general, but to save the one half — nay, three quarters — of her yearly expense in holding war and against whatsoever enemy. And how would I do it, do you think?”

“Nay, I don’t know how, nor can I conceive it,” Edward Knowell said.

Captain Bobadill said:

“Why, I would do it thus, sir.

“I would select nineteen more men throughout the land to join with myself; they should be gentlemen of good spirit, and of a strong and able constitution.

“I would choose them by an instinct, a characteristic that I have.”

Captain Bobadill then used a number of specialized Italian fencing words:

“And I would teach these nineteen men the special rules — as your punto, your reverso, your stoccata, your imbroccata, your passada, your montanto — until they could all play very near or altogether as well as myself.”

He continued:

“This done, say the enemy were forty thousand strong. We twenty would come into the field the tenth of March or thereabouts, and we would challenge twenty of the enemy. They could not in their honor refuse us.

“Well, we would kill them; challenge twenty more, kill them; twenty more, kill them; twenty more, kill them, too. And thus would we kill every man his twenty a day, that’s twenty score; twenty score, that’s two hundred; two hundred a day, five days a thousand. Forty thousand — forty times five, five times forty — two hundred days kills them all up, by computation.”

Hmm — “twenty score, that’s two hundred.” No, twenty score is four hundred.

Using the correct arithmetic, in one hundred days, Captain Bobadill and his nineteen chosen men would kill an army of forty thousand strong. So Captain Bobadill said.

“And this will I venture my poor gentleman-like carcass to perform — provided there be no treason practiced upon us — by fair and discreet manhood; that is, civilly and in a gentlemanly fashion, by the sword.”

He was using “carcass” to refer to his body, and if he really had the chance to challenge twenty enemy soldiers a day, and did so, his body would soon be a carcass indeed.

“Why, are you so sure of your hand, Captain, at all times?” Edward Knowell asked.

Isn't it possible that in fighting so many men, even one at a time, he might make a mistake and be killed?

“Tut, never miss thrust upon, or mistrust, my reputation with you,” Captain Bobadill said.

“I would not stand in Downright's shoes, then, if you meet him, for the wealth of any one street in London,” Edward Knowell said.

He was still encouraging Captain Bobadill to say things that would reveal that he was a fool. So far, he had been very successful in doing that.

“Why, sir, you mistake me,” Captain Bobadill said. “If he were here now, by this welkin, aka sky, I would not draw my weapon upon him. Let this gentleman — Master Matthew — do as he wishes, but I will bastinado him, by the bright sun, wherever I meet him.”

He would not fight Squire Downright with his sword; instead, he would beat him with a cudgel.

Master Matthew said, “Indeed, and I'll have a fling at him, at my distance.”

A safe distance, no doubt.

Squire Downright appeared some distance away.

“Godso, look where he is!” Edward Knowell said. “Yonder he goes.”

In this society, “Godso” was an exclamation of surprise.

Squire Downright, who was looking for Captain Bobadill and Master Matthew, said to himself, “What peevish luck I have. I cannot find these bragging rascals!”

He exited.

“It’s not he, is it?” Captain Bobadill said.

“Yes, indeed, it is he,” Edward Knowell said.

“I’ll be hanged, then, if that were he,” Master Matthew said.

“Sir, keep your hanging good for some greater matter, for I assure you that was he,” Edward Knowell said.

“Upon my reputation, it was he,” Master Stephen said.

“Had I thought it had been he, he must not have gone away like that, not without a fight,” Captain Bobadill said. “But I can hardly be induced to believe it was he, yet.”

“I think so, sir,” Edward Knowell said.

If Captain Bobadill were to be induced to believe that it was Squire Downright, then according to his words, he would go after him and fight him. But Edward Knowell knew that Captain Bobadill was a coward who would not fight Squire Downright, and so he would not be induced to believe that it was Squire Downright.

Squire Downright reentered the scene.

Edward Knowell said, “But look, he has come again!”

Seeing them, Squire Downright took off his cloak and let it drop to the ground, and then he said to Captain Bobadill, “Oh, Pharaoh’s foot, have I found you? Come, draw; to your tools — your dagger and rapier. Draw, gypsy, or I’ll thrash you.”

People in this society fought duels using dagger and rapier — no shields. The dagger was used to help defend against the opponent’s rapier.

As used in this society, the word “gypsies” means 1) shiftless rascals, and 2) Egyptians. Squire Downright was calling Captain Bobadill an Egyptian because he often swore “by Pharaoh’s foot.”

“Gentleman of valor, I do believe what thou are saying,” Captain Bobadill said. “Hear me —”

Not in a listening mood, Downright said, “Draw your weapon, then.”

Traying to talk his way out of a fight, Captain Bobadill said, “Tall — valiant — man, I never thought about it until now: By the body of me, I had a warrant of the peace served on me just now as I came along, by a water-bearer. This gentleman saw it — Master Matthew.”

Cob had been given a warrant of peace upon him.

Squire Downright said, “By God’s death, you will not draw, then?”

He beat Captain Bobadill and disarmed him.

Master Matthew ran away.

“Stop! Stop!” Captain Bobadill said. “Under thy favor, stop beating me!”

“Prate again if you like this, you whoreson foist, you!” Squire Downright said. “You’ll control the point, you? You’ll control my sword with your own? Your consort — Master Matthew — is gone? Had he stayed, he would have shared this beating with you, sir.”

Squire Downright exited, accidentally leaving his cloak behind him.

“Well, gentlemen, bear witness I was bound to keep the peace, by this good day,” Captain Bobadill said.

He wanted to excuse his not fighting, but he did not want his excuse to be cowardice.

“No, indeed, it’s an ill day, Captain,” Edward Knowell said. “Never reckon it to be other than an ill day. But let’s say you were bound to keep the peace; even if that were so, the law allows you to defend yourself. That’ll prove but a poor excuse for not fighting.”

“I cannot explain what happened, sir,” Captain Bobadill said. “I desire a good and fair interpretation of what happened. I have never sustained the like disgrace, by heaven. Surely I was struck by a planet from heaven, for I had no power to touch my weapon.”

In other words, he was saying that he had been paralyzed by malign astrological influences. Others may instead say that he had been paralyzed by fear.

“Aye, likely enough,” Edward Knowell said. “I have heard of many who have been beaten under a planet.”

Catholic priests wore a chasuble, a sleeveless outer vestment that was called a planet. In anti-Catholic England, Catholic priests were sometimes beaten.

Edward Knowell continued, “Go, get yourself to a doctor. By God’s eyelid, if these are your tricks, your passadas and your montantos, I’ll have none of them.”

Captain Bobadill exited.

“Oh, manners!” Edward Knowell said. “That this age should bring forth such creatures! That Nature should be at leisure to make them!”

In other words, what a pitiable time we live in if such people as Captain Bobadill and Master Matthew exist in it.

He then said to Master Stephen, “Come, coz.”

Picking up Squire Downright's cloak, Master Stephen said, "By the Mass, I'll have this cloak."

"By God's will, it is Downright's," Edward Knowell said.

"Nay, it's mine now," Master Stephen said. "Another man might have picked it up as well as I. I'll wear it, so I will."

He put it on.

"What if he should see it?" Edward Knowell said. "He'll demand that it be returned to him, you can assure yourself."

"Aye, but he shall not have it," Master Stephen said. "I'll say I bought it."

"Take heed you don't buy it at too dear a cost, coz," Edward Knowell said.

They exited.

— 4.8 —

Kitely, Wellbred, Dame Kitely, and Bridget talked together.

Kitely said to Wellborn about Squire Downright, "Now trust me, brother-in-law, you were much to blame to incense his anger and disturb the peace of my poor house, where there are sentinels who every minute watch to give alarms of civil war, without the adjection — the addition — of your assistance or taking the occasion to act."

"No harm done, brother-in-law, I assure you, since there is no harm done," Wellbred said. "Anger costs a man nothing; and a brave man is never his own man — truly himself — until he becomes angry. To keep his valor in obscurity is to keep himself, as it were, in a cloak-bag, aka suitcase. What's a musician unless he plays music? What's a brave man unless he fights? For, indeed, all this my wise half-brother stands upon absolutely, and that made me fall in with him so resolutely."

Squire Downright wanted to fight, and Wellbred joined in with him in wanting to fight.

“Aye, but what harm might have come of it, brother!” Dame Kately said.

“Might, sister?” Wellbred said. “So might the good warm clothes your husband wears be poisoned, for anything he knows, or the wholesome wine he drunk just now at the table —”

Wellbred was saying that there wasn’t much chance that serious harm could come from him and Squire Downright quarreling.

Kately said, “Now, God forbid! Oh, me, now I remember: My wife drunk to me last and changed the cup, and she told me to wear this cursèd suit today. Let’s see if heaven will permit murder to be undiscovered!”

Hercules died from wearing poisoned clothing that his wife gave him. In Hercules’ case, his death was unintended by his wife. According to the myth, a Centaur named Nessus offered to give Deianira, Hercules’ wife, a ride across a fast, deep river. He did take her across the river, but when Hercules was still in the river, Nessus tried to run away with Deianira. Hercules killed Nessus with some arrows that had been dipped in the poisonous blood of the Hydra. Dying, Nessus told Deianira that if Hercules became attracted to another woman, then she should give him Nessus’ shirt, which was charmed and would make Hercules love her again. Hercules did fall in love with another woman, and Deianira did give him Nessus’ shirt. But the shirt was stained with the poisoned blood of the Hydra from Hercules’ arrows and with Nessus’ own Hydra-poisoned blood, and as Nessus knew would happen, the poison burned Hercules and caused him so much pain that he immolated himself. The fire burned away his mortal part, leaving his immortal part, and he became a god.

Kitely then said, “I feel ill. Give me some mithridate.”

Mithridate was a poison antidote. Mithridates was a King of Pontus who made himself immune to poison by taking a small amount of poison at first and then slowly taking larger amounts of poison each succeeding day.

Kitely continued, “Some mithridate and olive oil, good sister, fetch me.”

In this society, people sometimes used olive oil as an emetic to make them vomit.

Kitely continued, “Oh, I am sick at heart!”

He had heart palpitations — or thought he did. He was also sick from jealousy, which gave him a burning sensation.

Kitely continued, “I burn, I burn. If you will save my life, go fetch it for me.”

“Oh, what a strange humor!” Wellbred said. “My very breath has poisoned him.”

Just hearing Wellbred’s words had made Kitely ill.

Bridget said to Kitely, “Good brother, be patient and calm. What do you mean? The strength of these extreme conceits — powerful delusions — will kill you.”

Dame Kitely said, “Curse your heart-blood, brother Wellbred, now, for putting such a foolish idea into his head!”

“Is a fit simile a foolish idea?” Wellbred replied, referring to the argument he had just made. “Will he be poisoned with a simile?”

He then said, “Brother-in-law Kately, what a strange and idle imagination is this! For shame, be wiser. On my soul, there’s no such matter. You aren’t poisoned.”

“Am I not sick?” Kately asked. “How am I then not poisoned? Am I not poisoned? How am I then so sick?”

“If you are sick,” Dame Kately said, “your own thoughts make you sick.”

“His jealousy is the poison he has taken,” Wellbred said.

Brainworm entered the scene. He was no longer disguised as a soldier; instead, he was disguised as Roger Formal, Justice Clement’s clerk.

Brainworm said, “Master Kately, my master, Justice Clement, salutes you and desires to speak with you with all possible speed.”

“No time but now?” Kately said. “When, I think, I am sick? Very sick! Well, I will wait upon His Worship.”

He then called, “Thomas! Cob!”

He said to himself, “I must seek them out and set them to be sentinels — watchful guards — until I return.”

He again called, “Thomas! Cob! Thomas!”

He exited to look for Thomas Cash and Cob.

Wellbred and the disguised Brainworm talked together apart from the others.

Wellbred quietly said, “This is perfectly splendid, Brainworm. But how did thou get this apparel of the Justice’s clerk?”

Brainworm quietly replied, “By the Virgin Mary, sir, my proper fine penman — the clerk Roger Formal — would necessarily bestow the grist on me at the Windmill Tavern, to hear some martial discourse, where I so marshalled and manipulated him that I made him drunk, with admiration.”

The disguised Brainworm had made Roger Formal admirably drunk with alcohol and drunk with admiration for Brainworm’s supposed martial exploits.

The disguised Brainworm continued, “And because too much heat — caused by the beer — was the cause of his distemper, I stripped him stark naked, as he lay at full length asleep, and borrowed his suit of clothing to deliver this counterfeit message in, leaving a rusty suit of armor and an old brown bill — a kind of halberd — to watch over him until my return — which shall be when I have pawned his apparel and spent the better part of the money, perhaps.”

A brown bill is a kind of long-handled weapon.

Wellbred said quietly, “Well, thou are a successful merry knave, Brainworm. His absence will be a good subject for more mirth. I say to thee, return to thy young master — Edward Knowell — and tell him to meet me and my sister-in-sister, Bridget, at the Tower of London immediately.”

Marriages could be performed at the Tower immediately because the premises were extra-parochial. Such a place was called a liberty.

Wellbred added quietly, “For here, tell Edward, the house is so stored up with jealousy that there is no room for love to stand upright in.”

Hmm. “... love to stand upright in.” Those words have a double meaning.

Wellbred continued quietly, “We must get our fortunes committed to some larger prison, say; and I know no better air, nor where the liberty of the house may do us more present service, than the Tower.”

One kind of commitment is to another person in a marriage; another kind of commitment is to a prison.

“Liberty of the house” is a certain amount of permitted freedom while in custody.

Wellbred said, “Go now!”

The disguised Brainworm exited.

Kitely and Thomas Cash entered the scene, but they were oblivious to the presence of Dame Kitely and Wellbred, who were far enough away not to hear their conversation.

Kitely said:

“Come here, Thomas.

“Now my secret’s ripe, and thou shall learn it. Listen carefully to what I say to thee with both of thine ears. I must go forth, Thomas.

“Be careful of thy promise.”

Thomas Cash had promised not to reveal Kitely’s secret.

Kitely continued:

“Keep a good watch. Note every gallant, and observe him well, any man who enters in my absence to thy mistress.

“If she would show him rooms, the jest is stale.”

The hostess of an inn — or whorehouse — can show rooms.

“Show him rooms” can have the implication of “lies backwards and lets out her forerooms” (Tilley F594).

A stale is a prostitute. A stale jest is an old trick.

Kitely continued:

“Follow them, Thomas, or else hang on him, and don’t let him go behind you. Closely observe their looks. Note if she attempts even just to see his hat-band or any other amorous toy about him, but praises his leg or foot, or if she says the day is hot, and asks him to feel her hand, how hot it is — oh, that’s a monstrous thing!”

The amorous toy could be a decorative piece of clothing — or a penis.

This society regarded a hot, moist palm as a sign of a lecherous nature.

Kitely continued:

“Closely observe all this for me, good Thomas; closely observe their sighs, and if they even just whisper, then break them off — interrupt them. I’ll back thee up in it.”

They might object to Thomas Cash’s interference, but Kitely would back him up.

Kitely then asked:

“Will thou do this?”

“Will thou be true, my Thomas?”

“As true as truth’s self, sir,” Thomas Cash replied.

“Why, I believe thee,” Kitely said.

He then asked, “Where is Cob, now?”

He called, “Cob!”

Kitely exited.

Dame Kitely said, “He’s always calling for Cob. I wonder what he employs Cob to do.”

Wellbred said, “Indeed, sister, to ask how he employs Cob is a necessary question for you who are his — Kately’s — wife, and a thing not very easy for you to be satisfied in. But this I’ll assure you, sister: Cob’s wife is an excellent bawd — pander — and often your husband haunts her house — by the Virgin Mary, for what purpose I cannot altogether accuse him. Imagine what you think convenient. But I have known fair hides to have foul hearts before now, sister.”

“You never said truer than that, brother,” Dame Kately said. “So much I can tell you in return for your information.”

She then ordered Thomas Cash, “Thomas, fetch your cloak and go with me; I’ll go after my husband immediately. I wish to Lady Fortune I could catch him in the act there, indeed! I’d return him his own, I assure him. Yes, I’d pay him back.”

Thomas Cash and Dame Kately exited.

Wellbred said:

“So, let them go; this may make entertainment soon.

“Now, my fair sister-in-law: I wish that you only knew how happy a thing it were to be fair and beautiful!”

He was not saying that she was not fair and beautiful, only that she was not enjoying the effects of being fair and beautiful.

“That touches not me, brother-in-law,” Bridget said. “That does not concern me.”

Wellbred said:

“That’s true; that’s even the fault of it. For, indeed, beauty stands a woman in no stead unless it procures her touching.”

This kind of touching is sexual in nature.

Wellbred continued:

“But sister-in-law, whether it touches you or not, it touches your beauties, and I am sure they will abide the touch.”

A touchstone was used to determine the genuineness and quality of gold alloys.

Wellbred continued:

“If they do not, a plague on all ceruse, say I!”

Ceruse was a cosmetic that was used for touching up a woman’s beauty.

Wellbred continued:

“And it touches me, too, in part, though not in the —”

He omitted the word “whole,” perhaps because he realized that it might be mistaken as the word “hole.”

Wellbred continued:

“Well, there’s a dear and respected friend of mine, sister-in-law, who stands very strongly and worthily affected toward you, and has vowed to inflame whole bonfires of zeal at his heart in honor of your perfections.”

“Bonfires” can be a pun on “bone-fires,” aka venereal disease.

Wellbred continued:

“I have already made my promise to bring you where you shall hear him confirm much more. Ned Knowell is the man, sister-in-law. There’s nothing to take exception to against the man. You are ripe for a husband, and a minute’s loss to such an occasion is a great trespass in a wise beauty.

“What do you say, sister-in-law? On my soul, I swear he loves you. Will you give him the meeting?”

Bridget replied, "In faith, I would have very little confidence in my own constancy and chastity, brother-in-law, if I did not dare to meet a man. But this proposition of yours savors of an old knight-adventurer's servant a little too much, I think."

"What's that, sister-in-law?" Wellbred asked.

Bridget replied, "By the Virgin Mary, of the squire."

A squire of ladies can be a pander. An apple-squire is also a pander.

"It doesn't matter even if it did," Wellbred said. "I would be such a one for my friend."

The friend could be either Edward Knowell, or Bridget, or both. Wellbred was willing to be a "pander" to bring them together.

He was not really a pander, of course; he wanted them to be married.

Wellbred looked up and said, "But see who has returned to hinder us!"

Kitely entered the scene.

"What villainy is this?" he said. "Called out on a false message? This was some plot! I was not sent for by Justice Clement."

He then said, "Bridget, where's your sister-in-law — my wife?"

"I think she has gone out, sir," Bridget said.

"What!" Kately said. "Has my wife gone out? To where, for God's sake?"

"She's gone outside with Thomas," Bridget said.

“Outside with Thomas?” Kitely said. “Oh, that villain dors — dupes — me! He has revealed all to my wife. Beast that I was, to trust him! To where, I ask you, did she go?”

“I don’t know, sir,” Bridget answered.

“I’ll tell you, brother-in-law, where I suspect she’s gone,” Wellbred said.

“Where, good brother-in-law?” Kitely asked.

“To Cob’s house, I believe,” Wellbred said, “but keep my secret.”

“I will, I will,” Kitely said. “To Cob’s house? Does she haunt Cob’s? She’s gone on purpose now to cuckold me with that lewd rascal, who, to win her favor, has told her all.”

He thought that his wife would have sex with Thomas Cash.

Kitely exited.

Wellbred said to Bridget, “Come, he’s once more gone. Sister-in-law, let’s lose no time; the affair is worth it.”

They exited.

— 4.9 —

Master Matthew and Sir Bobadill talked together in a street.

“I wonder, Captain, what they will say about my going away?” Master Matthew said.

His going away was running away.

“Why, what should they say, but as of a discreet gentleman, quick, wary, respectful of nature’s fair lineaments, and that’s all?” Captain Bobadill answered.

“Respectful of nature’s fair lineaments” refers to running away to keep one’s body from being beaten; in other words, Master Matthew had hauled ass to save his ass.

“Why, so, but what can they say about your beating?” Master Matthew said.

“A rude part, aka rude piece of combat, a touch with soft wood, a kind of gross battery used, laid on strongly, borne most patiently, and that’s all,” Captain Bobadill said.

A rude part is also 1) an unmannerly act, or 2) an unmannerly role, as in a play.

A wooden cudgel is hardly soft wood.

“Aye, but would any man have offered it in Venice, as you say?” Master Matthew said.

Would anyone have offered — attempted — to fight Captain Bobadill in Venice?

Captain Bobadill said:

“Tut, I assure you, no. You shall have there your nobilis [gentlemen], your gentilezza [nobility], come in bravely upon your reverse, stand you close, stand you firm, stand you fair, save your retricato with his left leg, come to the assalto [attack] with the right, thrust with brave steel, defy your base wood.”

Captain Bobadill’s Italian was imperfect. By retricato he probably meant rintricato, which means “entangled.”

The base wood is a wooden cudgel.

Captain Bobadill continued:

“But wherefore do I awaken this remembrance? I was fascinated — bewitched. By Jupiter, fascinated! I was bewitched! But I will be unbewitched, and I will be revenged by law.”

“Do you hear me?” Master Matthew said. “Isn’t it best to get a warrant, and have him arrested and brought before Justice Clement?”

“It would not be amiss,” Captain Bobadill said. “I wish we had a warrant!”

Brainworm, still disguised as Roger Formal, Justice Clement’s clerk, entered the scene.

“Why, here comes his clerk,” Master Matthew said. “Let’s speak to him.”

“Agreed,” Captain Bobadill said. “You do the speaking.”

“Save you, sir,” Master Matthew said to the disguised Brainworm.

“With all my heart, sir,” the disguised Brainworm said.

Master Matthew meant, “God save you,” but Brainworm was willing to use his wit and intelligence and all his heart to save himself from any bad consequences of his actions.

Master Matthew then said, “Sir, there is a man named Downright who has abused this gentleman and myself, and we intend to make our amends by law. Now, if you would do us the favor to procure a warrant to bring him before your master, Justice Clement, you shall be well considered, I assure you, sir.”

The disguised Brainworm replied, “Sir, you know my service is my living. Such favors as these gotten from my master is his only preferment, and therefore you must consider me as I may make benefit of my job.”

The disguised Brainworm was saying that he made his living from serving Justice Clement, who did him the favor of allowing him to write warrants and make money from them.

“How is that, sir?” Master Matthew asked.

“Indeed, sir, the thing is extraordinary, and the gentleman may be of great account,” the disguised Brainworm said. “Yet, be who and what he will, if you will lay me down a brace of angels in my hand, you shall have it; otherwise, not.”

A brace of angels is two gold coins. The disguised Brainworm was selling the warrant at a high price.

Master Matthew and Captain Bobadill talked privately.

“What shall we do, Captain?” Master Matthew said. “He asks for a brace of angels. You have no money?”

“Not a cross, by Lady Fortune,” Captain Bobadill said.

A cross was imprinted on pennies and half-pennies.

“Nor I, as I am a gentleman, but two pence, left of my two shillings in the morning for wine and radish,” Master Matthew said. “Let’s find him something he can pawn.”

“Pawn?” Captain Bobadill said. “We have nothing to the value of his demand.”

“Oh, yes, I’ll pawn this jewel in my ear, and you may pawn your silk stockings, and pull up your boots,” Master Matthew said. “Your silk stockings will never be missed. It must be done now.”

Master Matthew was wearing one jeweled earring, as was fashionable at the time.

“Well, if there be no remedy, I’ll step aside and pull them off,” Captain Bobadill said.

He took off his stockings as Master Matthew removed his earring.

Master Matthew said to the disguised Brainworm, “Do you hear me, sir? We have no store of money at this time, but you shall have good things to pawn — look, sir, you shall have this jewel and that gentleman’s silk stockings — because we would have this business dispatched before we go to our chambers.”

“I am content, sir,” the disguised Brainworm said. “I will get you the warrant right away. What’s his name, do you say? Downright?”

“Aye, aye, George Downright,” Master Matthew said.

“What manner of man is he?” the disguised Brainworm asked.

“He is a tall, big man, sir,” Master Matthew said. “He goes in a cloak most commonly of silk russet laid about with russet lace.”

“That is very good, sir,” the disguised Brainworm said.

“Here, sir, here’s my jewel,” Master Matthew said.

“And here are my silk stockings,” Captain Bobadill said.

They gave the disguised Brainworm these items to pawn.

“Well, gentlemen, I’ll procure for you this warrant right away,” the disguised Brainworm said. “But who will you have to serve it?”

“That’s true, Captain,” Master Matthew said. “That must be considered.”

“By the body of me, I don’t know who will serve the warrant,” Captain Bobadill said. “It is a dangerous service!”

“Why, you would best get one of the varlets of the city, a sergeant,” the disguised Brainworm said. “I’ll appoint one for you, if you please.”

Varlets were city sergeants who served warrants and made arrests. They were arresting sergeants.

“Will you, sir?” Master Matthew said. “Why, we can wish nothing better.”

“We’ll leave it to you, sir,” Captain Bobadill said.

Captain Bobadill and Master Matthew exited.

“This is splendid!” the disguised Brainworm said. “Now I will go pawn this cloak of Justice Clement’s clerk at the broker’s for a varlet’s suit, and be the varlet myself, and get either more pawns or more money from Downright for the arrest.”

Another meaning of the word “varlet” is “scoundrel.”

— 4.10 —

Old Knowell stood in front of Cob’s house and said, “Oh, here it is. I am glad I have found it now.”

He knocked and said, “Ho! Who is within here?”

Tib opened the door a crack and said, “I am within, sir. What’s your pleasure? What do you want?”

“To know who is inside besides yourself,” Old Knowell replied.

He was looking for his son Edward and whatever woman his son was supposed to be with.

“Why, sir, you are no constable, I hope,” Tib said.

“Oh, do you fear the constable?” Old Knowell said. “Then I don’t doubt that you have some guests inside who deserve that fear. I’ll fetch the constable straightaway.”

“On God’s name, sir!” Tib said.

“Bah,” Old Knowell said. “Come, tell me, isn’t young Knowell here?”

“Young Knowell?” Tib said. “I know no such person, sir, I swear on my honesty.”

“Your honesty?” Old Knowell said. “Dame, it flies too lightly from you. There is nothing for me to do but fetch the constable.”

“The constable?” Tib said. “The man is mad, I think.”

She slammed the door shut, and Old Knowell started to leave.

Thomas Cash and Dame Kately entered the scene. Old Knowell saw them and stood to the side to observe them. They did not notice him.

Dame Kately was here because she thought that her husband was having an affair here.

Thomas Cash said loudly, “Ho! Who keeps house here?”

Old Knowell said to himself, “Oh, this is the female copesmate of my son. Now I shall meet my son immediately.”

A copesmate is a companion, but “to cope” means “to encounter,” and the encounter could be sexual in nature.

“Knock, Thomas, hard,” Dame Kately ordered.

Knocking, Thomas Cash said loudly, “Ho, good wife!”

From inside her house, Tib said, “Why, what’s the matter with you?”

“Why, woman, does it grieve you to open your door?” Dame Kately said. “Perhaps you get something to keep it shut.”

In other words: Perhaps you get paid to keep the door shut while people inside are having immoral sex.

Tib opened the door and said, “What do you mean by these questions, I ask you?”

“So strange you make it?” Dame Kately said. “You pretend not to understand me? Isn’t my husband here?”

“Her husband?” Old Knowell said to himself.

She did not add “and true” to the word “tried.” “Tried” can mean 1) excellent, and 2) tested.

“I hope he need not to be tried here,” Tib said.

“To be tried” in this context meant 1) to be put on trial, 2) to have something (e.g., semen) extracted, and/or 3) to be sexually solicited.

“No, dame, he does it not for need, but for pleasure,” Dame Kately said.

“Neither for need nor for pleasure is he here,” Tib said.

Old Knowell said to himself, “This is only a trick to balk me with.”

Seeing a figure approaching, he said to himself, “Wait, who is this? Isn’t it my son, disguised?”

Kately, wearing his cloak, entered the scene. His wife, Dame Kately, saw him coming, and she ran to him.

“Oh, sir, have I forestalled your honest market — your honest business?” Dame Kately said. “Have I found your close — secret — walks? You stand amazed now, do you? Indeed, I am glad I have smoked you out yet at last. Who is your jewel, may I ask? In, come, let’s see her.”

She said to Tib, “Fetch forth your huswife — hussy — dame!”

She then said to her husband, Kately, “If she is more beautiful, in any honest judgment, than myself, I’ll be content with it. But she is a change, she feeds you fat, she soothes your appetite — and you are well? Your wife, an honest woman, is figuratively meat twice sod — twice boiled, and rendered stale by familiarity — to you, sir? Oh, you treacher — you deceiver!”

Old Knowell said to himself, “She cannot counterfeit thus palpably. She cannot be faking her emotions and actions. This is real.”

Kately replied to his wife, “Out on thy more than strumpet’s impudence! Do thou steal away thus to thy haunts? And have I taken thy bawd” — he pointed to Thomas Cash — “and thee and thy companion” — he pointed to Old Knowell — “this hoary-headed lecher, this old goat, close — secretly and close together — at your villainy? And would thou excuse it with this stale harlot’s trick of accusing me of doing what thou thyself are doing?”

In this society, goats were thought to be lecherous.

Kately said to Old Knowell, “Oh, old incontinent, don’t thou feel ashamed, when all thy powers’ in chastity is spent, to have a mind so hot, and to entice and feed the enticements of a lustful woman?”

Kately was saying that Old Knowell was impotent because of old age, but his mind still sinned in his thoughts.

“Bah!” Dame Kitely said. “I defy thee, I do, dissembling wretch!”

“Defy me, strumpet?” Kitely said.

Standing by Thomas Cash, he said, “Ask thy pander here. Can he deny it?”

He pointed to Old Knowell and added, “Or can that wicked elder deny it?”

Kitely now thought that his wife, Dame Kitely, was having an affair with Old Knowell, whose name he did not know.

Dame Kitely still thought that her husband, Kitely, was having an affair with a woman inside Tib’s house.

Old Knowell said out loud, “Why, listen, sir —”

“Tut, tut, tut, never speak,” Kitely said. “Thy guilty conscience will reveal thee.”

“What lunacy is this that haunts this man?” Old Knowell said.

Kitely said to Tib, “Well, goodwife B, A, D” — this meant “bad,” and it sounded somewhat like a goat and (once the vowel sound was changed) “bawd” — “Cob’s wife ...”

And then he said to his wife, “... and you, who make your husband such a hoddy-doddy ...” — a hoddy-doddy is literally a small shell-snail; snails have horns, like cuckolds.

And then he said to Thomas Cash and Old Knowell, “... and you, young apple-squire [pander], and old cuckold-maker ...”

And then he said to all of them, “I’ll have every one of you before a justice of the peace. All of you shall answer it. I order all of you, go to the justice.”

Old Knowell replied, “By the Virgin Mary, I go willingly, although I taste — perceive — that this is a trick put on me to punish my impertinent search, and justly. And I half-forgive my son for playing this trick.”

Kitely said to his wife, “Come, will you go?”

“Go?” Dame Kitely said. “To thy shame, believe it.”

Cob entered the scene, and seeing the commotion, he asked, “Why, what’s the matter here? What’s here to do?”

“Oh, Cob, are thou come?” Kitely said. “I have been abused, and in thy house. Never was a man so wronged!”

“By God’s eyelid, in my house, my master Kitely?” Cob said. “Who wrongs you in my house?”

Referring to his wife and Old Knowell, Kitely said, “By the Virgin Mary, young-lust-in-old and old-in-young, here.”

He then said, “Thy wife’s their bawd; here have I taken them.”

“What?” Cob said. “Bawd? Has my house come to that? Am I preferred — promoted — to be a keeper of a brothel thither?”

He attacked his wife and beat her, saying, “Did I order you to keep your doors shut, Isabel?”

He had, indeed.

When he said “Isabel,” he may have meant “Jezebel,” aka an immoral, sexually promiscuous woman.

Cob continued, “And do you let them lie open for all comers?”

These comers could be cum-ers.

Old Knowell said, “Friend, know some cause before thou beat thy wife. This is madness in thee.”

“Why, isn’t there cause?” Cob asked.

“Yes, I’ll show cause before the Justice, Cob,” Kitley said.
“Come, let her go with me.”

“She shall go,” Cob said.

“I will go,” Tib said. “I’ll see if you may be allowed to make a bundle of hemp out of your right and lawful wife thus, at every cuckoldly knave’s pleasure.”

Hemp stalks were beaten to separate the fibers, which were used to make rope.

Tib then said to Kitley, “Why don’t you go now?”

Kitley said, “You are a bitter quean — a bitter harlot. Come, we’ll have you tamed.”

They exited.

— 4.11 —

Disguised as a city sergeant, Brainworm was holding a staff of office. This staff of office was a mace that was decorated with the image of an artichoke. Mace is also a spice, as are salt and pepper, which can be used to spice an artichoke. Satirists can use words as if they were weapons, dealing blows the way a mace does. Satirists also rub salt into a wound.

Brainworm said to himself:

“Well, of all my disguises yet, now I am most like myself, being in this sergeant’s gown.”

Brainworm’s being “most like myself” was his being disguised as a varlet.

The disguised Brainworm continued:

“A man of my present profession never counterfeits until he lays hold upon a debtor and says he arrests him, for then he brings him to all manner of unrest. A kind of little kings we are, bearing the diminutive of a mace made like a young artichoke that always carries pepper and salt in itself. Well, I don’t know what danger I undergo by this exploit. Pray heaven I come well off.”

Master Matthew and Captain Bobadill entered the scene.

“Look, I think yonder is the varlet, judging by his gown,” Master Matthew said.

“Let’s go in quest of him,” Captain Bobadill said.

Master Matthew said to the disguised Brainstorm, “God save you, friend. Aren’t you here at the appointment of Justice Clement’s clerk?”

“Yes, if it please you, sir,” the disguised Brainworm replied. “He told me two gentlemen had willed him to procure a warrant from his master, which I have about me, to be served on a man named Downright.”

“It is honestly done of you both,” Master Matthew said.

Looking up, he said, “And see where the party comes whom you must arrest. Serve it upon him quickly, before he is aware of what you are doing.”

Master Matthew had seen a man whom he thought was Squire Downright, but the man was actually Master Stephen, who was wearing Squire Downright’s cloak.

“Bear back, Master Matthew!” Captain Bobadill said. “Retreat!”

He was afraid of Squire Downright.

The disguised Brainworm said to Master Stephen, “Master Downright, I arrest you in the Queen’s name, and I must carry you before a justice of the law by virtue of this warrant.”

“Me, friend?” Master Stephen said. “I am no Downright, I. I am Master Stephen. You don’t do well to arrest me, I tell you truly. I am in nobody’s bonds nor books — I want you to know that.”

He thought he was being arrested for debt, and he was saying that he had no actionable debt registered in either bonds or books.

Master Stephen continued, “A plague on you heartily for making me thus afraid before my time!”

“Why, how are you deceived, gentlemen?” the disguised Brainworm asked.

“He wears such a cloak, and that deceived us,” Captain Bobadill said.

The real Squire Downright entered the scene.

Seeing him, Captain Bobadill said, “But see, here he comes, indeed! This is he, officer.”

Seeing that Master Stephen was wearing his cloak, Squire Downright said to him, “Why, what is this now, Signor Gull, have you turned filcher — thief — recently? Come, give my cloak to me.”

“Your cloak, sir?” Master Stephen said. “I bought it even now, in open market.”

“Master Downright, I have a warrant I must serve upon you, procured by these two gentlemen,” the disguised Brainworm said.

“These gentlemen?” Squire Downright said. “These rascals!”

“Keep the peace, I order you, in Her Majesty’s name,” the disguised Brainworm said.

“I obey thee,” Squire Downright said. “What must I do, officer?”

“Go before Master Justice Clement, to answer for what they can object against you, sir,” the disguised Brainworm said. “I will treat you kindly, sir.”

Master Matthew said to Captain Bobadill, “Come, let’s go ahead of the others and make our case to the Justice, Captain.”

Captain Bobadill said about the disguised Brainworm, “The varlet’s a tall — brave —man, before heaven!”

The disguised Brainworm had said that he must serve a warrant on Squire Downright.

Actually, he had not written out or served a warrant, but had merely told Squire Downright that he must serve a warrant on him.

Captain Bobadill and Master Matthew exited.

Squire Downright said to Master Stephen, “Gull, you’ll give me my cloak?”

“Sir, I bought it, and I’ll keep it,” Master Stephen replied.

“You will?” Squire Downright said.

“Aye, that I will,” Master Stephen replied.

Squire Downright gave the disguised Brainworm some money and said, “Officer, there’s thy fee. Arrest him.”

“Master Stephen, I must arrest you,” the disguised Brainworm said.

“Arrest me?” Master Stephen said. “I scorn it.”

He then said to Squire Downright, “There, take your cloak; I’ll not have it.”

“Nay, that shall not serve your turn now, sir,” Squire Downright said.

He wanted Master Stephen to be arrested.

He then said to the disguised Brainworm, “Officer, I’ll go with thee to the Justice’s. Bring him — Master Stephen — along.”

“Why, isn’t your cloak here?” Master Stephen said. “What else do you want?”

“I’ll have you answer— give satisfaction — for it, sir,” Squire Downright said.

Master Stephen could have avoided this trouble by quickly giving Squire Downright the cloak — which Squire Downright owned.

“Sir, I’ll take your word, and this gentleman’s, too, for his appearance in court,” the disguised Brainworm said.

Brainworm was not really an arresting sergeant. He was not authorized to arrest anyone or to write warrants. If he were to actually deliver these men to Justice Clement, his disguise would be revealed.

“I’ll have no words taken,” Squire Downright said. “Bring him along.”

“Sir, I may choose to do that,” the disguised Brainworm said. “I may take bail.”

If he took bail, he could enrich himself.

“It is true, you may take bail and choose, at another time,” Squire Downright said, “but you shall not now, varlet. Bring him along, or I’ll beat you.”

“Sir, I pity the gentleman’s case,” the disguised Brainworm said. “Here’s your money back.”

“By God’s dignity, don’t tell me about my money,” Squire Downright said. “Bring him away, I say.”

“I assure you, he will go with you of himself — on his own accord — sir,” the disguised Brainworm said.

He did not want to go with them to see Justice Clement.

“Yet more ado?” Squire Downright said. “Yet more arguing?”

The disguised Brainworm said to himself, “I have made a fair mash — a fine mess — of it.”

A mash is a mixture of malt and water and is used for brewing beer.

“Must I go?” Master Stephen asked.

“I know no remedy to avoid it, Master Stephen,” the disguised Brainworm said.

Squire Downright said to Master Stephen, “Come along before me here. I do not love your hanging look behind.”

He was saying that he didn’t want Master Stephen with his hangdog — dejected — look behind him. He wanted to keep an eye on him lest he escape.

“Why, sir, I hope you cannot hang me for it,” Master Stephen replied.

He then asked the disguised Brainworm, “Can he, fellow?”

“I think not, sir,” the disguised Brainworm said. “It is but a whipping matter, surely.”

“Why, then, let him do his worst,” Master Stephen said. “I am resolute.”

They exited to go and see Justice Clement.

ACT 5 (Every Man in His Humor)

— 5.1 —

Justice Clement, Old Knowell, Kitley, Dame Kitley, Tib, Thomas Cash, Cob, and some of Justice Clement's servants were together in a room in Justice Clement's house.

Justice Clement said, "Nay, but stay, stay. Give me leave."

He then said to a servant, "My chair, sirrah."

The servant brought him his chair, and he sat down.

Justice Clement then said to Old Knowell, "Master Knowell, you say that you went there to meet your son, Edward?"

"Aye, sir," Old Knowell said.

"But who directed you to go there?" Justice Clement asked.

"That did my own serving-man, sir," Old Knowell said.

He was referring to Brainworm, who at the time was disguised as a soldier. Old Knowell still did not know that the soldier was Brainworm.

"Where is he?" Justice Clement asked.

"I don't know, now," Old Knowell said. "I left him with your clerk and ordered him to stay here for me."

"My clerk?" Justice Clement said. "About what time was this?"

"By the Virgin Mary, between one and two, as I take it," Old Knowell said.

"And at what time did my clerk come with the false message to you, Master Kitley?" Justice Clement asked.

The person who had delivered the false message to Kitely was Brainworm, who at the time was disguised as Justice Clement's clerk.

"After two, sir," Kitely said.

"Very good," Justice Clement said.

He then asked, "But Mistress Kitely, how was it that you were at Cob's?"

"If it pleases you, sir, I'll tell you," Dame Kitely said. "My brother Wellbred told me that Cob's house was a suspected place."

A suspected place is a house of ill repute — a whorehouse.

"So it appears, I think," Justice Clement said. "But go on."

"And that my husband used thither daily," Dame Kitely said.

"Used" meant "was accustomed to go" or "used women sexually."

"That doesn't matter, as long as he used himself well, mistress," Justice Clement said.

"Used" meant "treated."

"True, sir, but you know what grows by such haunts often," Dame Kitely said.

Penises grow in such haunts. In the case of such activities resulting in cuckolds, horns grow.

"I see — rank fruits of a jealous brain, Mistress Kitely," Justice Clement said. "But did you find your husband there in that case, as you suspected?"

"I found her there, sir," Kitely said.

“Did you so?” Justice Clement said. “That alters the case. Who gave you knowledge of your wife’s being there?”

“By the Virgin Mary, my brother-in-law Wellbred did,” Kately said.

“What?” Justice Clement said. “Wellbred first told her, and then afterward he told you? Where is Wellbred?”

“Gone with my sister, Bridget, sir, I don’t know to where,” Kately said.

“Why, this is a mere trick, a device,” Justice Clement said. “You are gulled in this most grossly, all of you.”

He then asked Tib, “Alas, poor wench, were thou beaten for this?”

“Yes, most pitifully, if it pleases you,” Tib said.

“And worthily, I hope, if it shall turn out to be so,” Cob said.

“Aye, that’s likely, and a piece of a sentence — a bit of wisdom,” Justice Clement said.

One of Justice Clement’s servants entered the room.

Justice Clement asked, “What is it now, sir? What’s the matter?”

“Sir, there’s a gentleman in the court outside who desires to speak with Your Worship,” the servant replied.

“A gentleman?” Justice Clement said. “Who is he?”

“A soldier, sir, he says,” the servant replied.

“A soldier?” Justice Clement said. “Take down my armor and my sword quickly! A soldier speak with me? Why, when will you get me my armor and sword, knaves?”

The servant brought Justice Clement his armor and sword and helped him arm himself.

Justice Clement said, “Come on, come on, hold my cap there, so; give me my gorget. Give me my sword.”

A gorget is a piece of armor worn to protect the throat.

He then said to Old Knowell, Kately, and Dame Kately, “Stand nearby. I will end your matters soon.”

He then said to the servant, “Let the soldier enter.”

The servant went to the door.

Captain Bobadill and Master Matthew entered the room.

Justice Clement said to Captain Bobadill, “Now, sir, what have you to say to me?”

— 5.2 —

Captain Bobadill began, “By Your Worship’s favor —”

Justice Clement said to Master Matthew, “Keep out, sir, I don’t know your claim to my attention.”

If he was going to be forced to fight, he wanted to fight only one person, not two.

He then said to Captain Bobadill, “You send me word, sir, that you are a soldier; why, sir, you shall be answered here. Here are men who have been among soldiers. Sir, what is your pleasure?”

“Indeed, sir, this is it: This gentleman and I myself have been most uncivilly wronged and beaten by one Downright, a coarse fellow about the town here,” Captain Bobadill said. “And for my own part, I protest, being a man in no sort given to this filthy humor of quarrelling, he has assaulted me in the way of my peace, despoiled me of my honor, disarmed me of my weapons, and rudely laid me flat in the open streets, when I not so much as once offered to resist him.”

Justice Clement was disgusted. Captain Bobadill was supposed to be a soldier, and yet he had not defended himself.

“Oh, by God’s precious!” Justice Clement said. “Is this the soldier?”

He then said to a servant, “Here, take my armor off quickly; it will make him swoon, I fear. He is not fit to look on it — he who will put up with and endure a blow.”

Master Matthew said, “If it pleases Your Worship, he was bound to the peace.”

“Why, if he were, sir, his hands were not bound, were they?” Justice Clement said.

A man can legally and morally defend himself.

A servant entered the room and said, “There’s one of the varlets of the city, sir, who has brought two gentlemen here, one of them upon Your Worship’s warrant.”

“My warrant?” Justice Clement said, surprised.

He had signed no warrants.

“Yes, sir,” the servant said. “The officer says that the warrant was procured by these two.”

The “officer” was the disguised Brainworm, and the false warrant had been paid for by Captain Bobadill and Master Matthew.

“Tell him to come in,” Justice Clement said.

He then pointed to Captain Bobadill and said, “Let’s put aside this picture.”

Captain Bobadill was not a true soldier; he was at best a picture of a soldier.

Captain Bobadill was led aside, and a servant went to the door and let into the room Squire Downright, Master Stephen, and Brainworm, who was still disguised as an arresting sergeant.

Justice Clement said, "What, Master Downright! Are you brought here at Master Freshwater's suit?"

Captain Bobadill was a freshwater soldier; a freshwater sailor is one who has not been to sea.

— 5.3 —

Squire Downright answered, "Indeed, I am, sir. And here's another brought at my suit."

Justice Clement asked Master Stephen, "Who are you, sir?"

"A gentleman, sir," Master Stephen replied.

Seeing Old Knowell, he said, "Oh, uncle!"

"Uncle?" Justice Clement said. "Who? Master Knowell?"

"Aye, sir," Old Knowell said. "This is a 'wise' kinsman of mine."

"God's my witness, uncle, I am wronged here monstrously!" Master Stephen said. "He charges me with the stealing of his cloak, and I wish I might never stir if I did not find it in the street by chance."

"Oh, did you find it, now?" Squire Downright said. "You said you bought it, previously."

"And you said I stole it," Master Stephen said. "Now that my uncle is here, I'll do well enough with you."

"Well, let this rest a while," Justice Clement said.

He then said to Captain Bobadill, “You who have cause to complain there, stand forth. Did you have my warrant for this gentleman’s apprehension?”

Captain Bobadill replied, “Aye, if it pleases Your Worship.”

“Nay, do not speak in passion — so strongly,” Justice Clement said.

He was mocking Captain Bobadill, who spoke deferentially.

He then asked, “Where did you get it?”

“From your clerk, sir,” Captain Bobadill answered.

“That’s well,” Justice Clement said sarcastically. “As if my clerk can make warrants and my hand not sign them!”

He had not made or signed the warrant.

He then asked, “Where is the warrant? Officer, do you have it?”

The disguised Brainworm said, “No, sir. Your Worship’s man, Master Formal, bid me do it for these gentlemen, and he would be my discharge and take the responsibility.”

“Why, Master Downright, are you such a novice to be served and never see the warrant?” Justice Clement asked.

“Sir, he did not serve it on me,” Squire Downright said.

“No?” Justice Clement said. “What happened, then?”

Squire Downright said, “By the Virgin Mary, sir, he came to me and said he must serve it, and he would treat me kindly, and so —”

“Oh, God’s pity, was it so, sir?” Justice Clement said, “He must serve it?”

He then said to a servant, "Give me my long-sword there, and help me off the chair, so."

He then said to the disguised Brainworm, "Come on, sir varlet."

Brainworm knelt.

Justice Clement waved his long-sword over him as he said, "I must cut off your legs, sirrah. Stand up; I'll treat you kindly. I must cut off your legs, I say."

"Oh, good sir, I beg you," the disguised Brainworm said. "Don't do that, good Master Justice!"

"I must do it," Justice Clement said. "There is no remedy. I must cut off your legs, sirrah; I must cut off your ears, you rascal, I must do it. I must cut off your nose; I must cut off your head."

"Oh, Your good Worship!" the disguised Brainworm said.

"Well, rise," Justice Clement said.

The disguised Brainworm stood up.

Justice Clement said to him, "How do thou do now? Do thou feel thyself well? Have thou no harm?"

"No, I thank Your good Worship, sir," the disguised Brainworm said.

"Why, so it is!" Justice Clement said. "I said I must cut off thy legs, and I must cut off thy arms, and I must cut off thy head, but I did not do it. So you said you must serve this gentleman with my warrant, but you did not serve him. You knave, you slave, you rogue, do you say you must?"

He then said to a servant, "Sirrah, go away with him and take him to the jail!"

He then said to the disguised Brainworm, "I'll teach you a trick for your 'must,' sir."

"Good sir, I beg you to be good to me," the disguised Brainworm said.

Justice Clement said to the servant, "Tell him he shall go to the jail. Take him away, I say!"

"Nay, sir, if you will commit me, it shall be for committing more than this," the disguised Brainworm said. "I will not lose, by my travail, any grain of my fame, certainly."

Brainworm had performed mighty deeds in his various disguises this day, and he wanted credit for doing them. Therefore, he threw off his current disguise.

"Who is this?" Justice Clement asked.

"My serving-man Brainworm!" Old Knowell said.

"Oh, yes, uncle," Master Stephen said. "Brainworm has been with my cousin Edward and me all this day."

"I told you all there was some plot," Justice Clement said.

Brainstorm, no longer disguised, said, "Excellent Justice, since I have laid myself thus open to you, now stand strong for me, both with your sword and your balance."

Lady Justice carries both a sword and a set of scales. These represent punishment and fairness.

"By the body of me, I swear this is a merry knave!" Justice Clement said. "Give me a bowl of sack."

A bowl is a shallow cup.

A servant brought him wine.

Justice Clement said, "If he belongs to you, Master Knowell, I can vouch for your patience."

Brainworm said, “My master’s patience is what I have most need of.”

He then said to his master, Old Knowell, “Sir, if you’ll only pardon me, I’ll glory in all the rest of my exploits.”

He was proud of most of the actions he had performed this day.

Old Knowell replied, “Sir, you know I don’t love to have my favors come hard from me. You have your pardon — although I suspect you shrewdly of being in secret agreement with my son against me.”

“Yes, indeed, I have been, sir, although you retained me doubly this morning for yourself: first, as Brainworm, afterward, as Fitzsword,” Brainworm said. “I was your reformed — discharged — soldier, sir. It was I who sent you to Cob’s, upon the errand without an end — a pointless errand.”

“Is it possible?” Old Knowell said. “Is it possible that thou could disguise thy language so as I should not know thee?”

“Oh, sir, this has been the day of my metamorphosis!” Brainworm said. “It is not that disguise alone that I have run through today. I brought this gentleman, Master Kately, a message, too, in the form of Master Justice’s clerk here, to draw him out of the way, as well as Your Worship, while Master Wellbred might make a conveyance of Mistress Bridget to my young master.”

A conveyance is a legal transfer of property. Bridget — now Edward Knowell’s wife — was now figuratively his property.

“What!” Kately said. “My sister has been stolen away?”

“My son is not married, I hope!” Old Knowell said.

“Indeed, sir, they are both as surely — securely — joined in wedlock as love, a priest, and three thousand pounds (which is her dowry) can make them,” Brainworm said, “and by this time they are ready to order their wedding supper at the Windmill Tavern, unless some friend or family member here forestall them and invite them home.”

Edward Knowell and Bridget were married.

“By the Virgin Mary, that will I do,” Justice Clement said. “I thank thee for putting me in mind of it.”

He ordered a servant, “Sirrah, go and fetch them here, upon my warrant.”

The servant exited.

Justice Clement then said, “Neither’s friends and family have cause to be sorry, if I know the young couple rightly.”

This was a good marriage match for both bride and groom.

Justice Clement said to Brainworm, “Here, I drink to thee for thy good news. But, I ask thee, what have thou done with my clerk, Formal?”

Brainworm replied, “Indeed, sir, after some ceremony passed, as making him drunk, first with story, and then with wine, but all in kindness, and stripping off his outer clothing and leaving him in his shirt, I left him in that cool fashion, departed, sold Your Worship’s warrant to these two” — he pointed to Captain Bobadill and Master Matthew — “pawned his livery for that varlet’s gown to serve it in, and thus have brought myself, by my activity, to Your Worship’s consideration.”

A servant’s livery is distinctive clothing that shows whose servant he is.

Justice Clement said, “And I will consider thee, in another cup of sack. Here’s to thee, which, having drunk off, this is my sentence.”

Justice Clement’s sentencing of Brainworm consisted of Brainworm’s having a drink with him.

He drank and then added, “Pledge me — drink with me: Thou have done or assisted to nothing, in my judgment, but what deserves to be pardoned for the wit of the offence. If thy master, or any man here, is angry with thee, I shall suspect his ingenuity and intelligence as long as I know him to be angry.”

A noise sounded.

Justice Clement said, “What now? What noise is that?”

A servant entered and said, “Sir, Roger has come home.”

Roger Formal was the justice’s clerk.

Justice Clement ordered, “Bring him in, bring him in.”

Roger Formal entered the room. He was still drunk, and he was wearing an old suit of armor.

Justice Clement asked him, “What, drunk in arms, against me? What is your reason for this?”

— 5.4 —

“I beg Your Worship to pardon me,” Roger Formal said. “I happened into ill company by chance who cast me into a sleep and stripped me of all my clothes —”

The ill company was Brainworm, who was then disguised as a soldier.

“Well, tell him that I am Justice Clement, and I pardon him,” Justice Clement said. “But what does this have to do with your armor? What may that signify?”

“If it pleases you, sir, it was hung up in the room where I was stripped, and I borrowed it from one of the liquor-drawers, aka bartenders, to come home in, because I was loath to do penance through the street in my shirt.”

People were sometimes shamed for moral offences by being forced to walk through the streets while wearing a white sheet.

“Well, stand by awhile,” Justice Clement said, seeing some people coming.

Edward Knowell, Wellbred, and Bridget entered the room.

“Who are these people?” Justice Clement asked.

Recognizing them, he said, “Oh, the young company.”

He greeted them: “Welcome, welcome! God give you joy.”

This was a traditional greeting to a newly wedded couple.

He then said:

“Mistress Bridget, don’t blush. You are not so fresh a bride but the news of it has come here before you.

“Master Bridegroom, I have made your peace with and reconciled you to your father and your brother-in-law; give me your hand. I will also make your peace with and reconcile you to all the rest, before you forsake my roof.”

— 5.5 —

“We are the more indebted to your humanity, sir,” the newly married Edward Knowell said.

Justice Clement pointed to Captain Bobadill and Master Matthew and said, “Only these two have so little of man in them that they are no part of my care.”

Wellbred said, “Yes, sir, let me plead to you for this gentleman.”

He pointed to Master Matthew and then said, “He belongs to my sister-in-law, the bride.”

He had been Bridget’s servant and had served her.

Justice Clement asked, “In what place, sir?”

By “place,” he meant “position or capacity,” but Wellbred punned on another meaning: “location.”

“In the place of her delight, sir, below the stairs and in public,” he said. “He was her poet, sir.”

“Below the stairs” meant in the servants’ hall. Wellborn was bawdily punning on the “place of her delight” and “below the stairs.”

Justice Clement said:

“A poet? I will challenge him myself right now, at extempore:

“Mount up thy Phlegon muse, and testify

“How Saturn, sitting in an ebon [black] cloud,

“Disrobed his podex, white as ivory,

“And through the welkin thundered all aloud.”

Justice Clement was parodying poetry. In Greek mythology, Phlegon is one of the horses that pull the chariot of the sun-god Helios. A “podex” is a butt, and his poem was about the god Saturn dropping his pants, farting, and filling the welkin — the sky — with thunderous sound.

As one of the horses that pull the chariot of the sun-god Helios across the sky, Phlegon is connected with time. The word “extempore” means “without time for preparation.” The Latin ex tempore means “out of time.”

“He is not for extempore, sir,” Wellborn said. “He is all for the pocket muse; may it please you to command a sight of his pocketed poems.”

Master Matthew could not compose poems extempore and release the words into the air; his way of composing poems was to copy them out of a book with a few words changed and keep them in his pocket.

Of course, small books can also fit in pockets.

“Yes, yes, search him for a taste of his vein,” Justice Clement said.

“To taste his vein” meant “to take his pulse” — Justice Clement meant for the servants to grab him by the wrist. He also meant for them to search the man for samples of his poetic style.

Wellborn said to Master Matthew, who was resisting, “You must not deny the Queen’s justice, sir, under penalty of a writ of rebellion.”

A man who failed to show up in court after a summons was served was treated as a rebel against the law.

Some people searched Matthew’s pockets and found his poems.

Justice Clement said:

“What, all this verse? By the body of me, he carries a whole ream, a realm and commonwealth of paper, in his hose! Let’s see some of his subjects.”

He read out loud:

“Unto the boundless ocean of thy face

“Runs this poor river, charged with streams of eyes.”

He then said, “What! This is stolen!”

Yes, this was another of Master Matthew’s plagiarized poems.

Samuel Daniel had written:

“Unto the boundless ocean of thy beauty

“Runs this poor river, charged with streams of zeal.”

Edward Knowell said, “A parody! A parody! With a kind of miraculous gift to make it absurder than it was.”

“Is all the rest the same as this batch?” Justice Clement said. “Is all the rest of this plagiarized? Bring me a torch; lay the poems all together and set them on fire. Cleanse the air. Here was enough to have infected the whole city, if it had not been taken in time!”

They burned the poems.

A defense against the plague was to burn stinky rubbish. After it was burned, it would no longer stink and so the air would be cleansed.

Justice Clement continued, “See, see, how our poet’s glory shines! Brighter and brighter! Still it increases! Oh, now it’s at the highest; and now it declines as fast. You may see: Sic transit gloria mundi.”

The Latin means, “Thus passes the glory of the world.”

“There’s an emblem for you, son, and your studies!” Old Knowell said to Edward.

Justice Clement said:

“May no speech or act of mine be drawn forward against such as profess it — poetry — worthily. They are not born every year, as is an alderman.”

It has been said that a poet is born once in an age; however, William Shakespeare, Ben Jonson, John Ford, John Donne, and John Milton (and others) were all alive at the same time. Some ages are more productive of poets than others.

Justice Clement continued:

“There goes more to the making of a good poet than a sheriff, Master Kitley. You look upon me! Though I live in the city here among you, I will do more reverence to him, when I meet him, than I will to the mayor, out of his year.”

The Mayor of London served for one year.

“But these paper-peddlers! These ink-dabblers! They cannot expect reprehension or reproach. They have it with the fact.”

Bad poets are punished simply by the fact that their poetry is bad. They need not expect reprehension or reproach because bad poets and bad poetry tend to be ignored. Master Matthew has no reputation as a poet today. Plagiarism is not poetry.

“Sir, you have saved me the labor of a defense,” Edward Knowell said.

He would have made a defense of good poets and good poetry.

Justice Clement said:

“It shall be conversation for supper between your father and me, if he dare undertake me.

“But to dispatch away these.”

He said to Captain Bobadill and Master Matthew, “You sign of the soldier, and you picture of the poet — but both so false I will not have you hanged out at my door until midnight.”

Captain Bobadill and Master Matthew were mere signs or pictures to hang out in front of a tavern — they were not the real things. Hanging them out at Justice Clement’s house after midnight would be acceptable because it would be too dark for them to be seen.

“While we are at supper, you two shall penitently fast it out in my court outside; and, if you will, you may pray there that we may be so merry within as to forgive or forget you when we come out.”

Justice Clement then pointed to Roger Formal and said, “Here’s a third, because we value your safety, who shall watch you; he is provided for the purpose.”

Roger Formal was wearing old armor, and so he was provided with what was needed to guard Captain Bobadill and Master Matthew.

Justice Clement said to Roger Formal, “Look to your charge, sir. Do your job.”

Master Stephen asked, “And what shall I do?”

Justice Clement said, “Oh, I would have lost a sheep if he had not bleated!”

He had forgotten about Master Stephen.

He then said to Master Stephen, “Why, sir, you shall give Master Downright his cloak; and I will entreat him to take it. A trencher — a wooden plate — and a napkin you shall have in the buttery, and you shall keep Cob and his wife here” — he pointed to them — “company.”

The buttery is a large pantry, full of provisions, where servants ate and drank.

Justice Clement continued:

“I will first entreat Cob and his wife to be reconciled, and I will entreat you to endeavor with your ‘intelligence’ to keep them so.”

“I’ll do my best,” Master Stephen said, unaware of the justice’s sarcasm.

Cob said to his wife, “Why, now I see thou are honest and chaste, Tib, I receive thee as my dear and mortal wife again.”

He said “mortal,” but he meant “moral.”

Tib replied, “And I receive you as my loving and obedient husband.”

In the marriage service of this society, it was the wife who was supposed to be obedient.

Justice Clement said:

“Good complement and compliment! It will be their bridal night, too. They are married anew.

“Come, I conjure the rest to put off all discontent.

“You, Master Downright, put off your anger.

“You, Master Knowell, put off your cares and worries.

“Master Kately and his wife, both put off your jealousy. For, I must tell you both, while that — jealousy — is fed, horns in the mind are worse than on the head.”

“Sir, thus they go away from me,” Master Kately replied.

He then said to his wife, “Kiss me, sweetheart.”

He kissed his wife and then recited out loud:

“See, what a drove of horns fly in the air,

“Winged with my cleansèd and my credulous breath!

“Watch ’em, suspicious eyes, watch where they fall:

“See, see, on heads that think they’ve none at all!

“Oh, what a plenteous world of this will come!

“When air rains horns, all may be sure of some.”

He then said, “I have learned so much verse out of a jealous man’s part in a play.”

The play was Every Man in His Humor, and he was the jealous man.

Justice Clement said:

“It is well! It is well! This night we’ll dedicate to friendship, love, and laughter.

“Master Bridegroom, take your bride and lead; everyone shall take a fellow.

“Here is my mistress: Brainworm! To whom all my addresses of courtship shall have their reference.

“Brainworm’s adventures this day, when our grandchildren shall hear to be made a fable, I don’t doubt that it shall find both spectators and applause.”

Now is a good time for the readers of this book to applaud.

Thank you.

According to Oxford English Dictionary:

A “rade” is a ray.

A “ray” is:

A single line or narrow beam of light; each of the lines in which light (and accompanying radiant heat) may seem to emanate from the sun or other source.

The adjective “cam” means:

Crooked, twisted, bent from the straight.

Away from the straight line, awry, askew.

This information comes from the Wikipedia article on “Fisher King”:

(A “thigh” wound has been interpreted by many scholars in Arthurian literature as a wound to the genitals.)

[...]

The location of the wound is of great importance to the legend. In most medieval stories, the mention of a wound in the groin or more commonly the “thigh” (such as the wounding of the ineffective suitor in Lanval from the Lais of Marie de France) is a euphemism for the physical loss of or grave injury to one’s penis. In medieval times, acknowledging the actual type of wound was considered to rob a man of his dignity, thus the use of the substitute terms “groin” or “thigh”, although any informed medieval listener or reader would have known exactly the real nature of the wound. Such a wound was considered worse than actual death because it signaled the end of a man's ability to function in his primary purpose: to propagate his line. In the instance of the Fisher King, the wound negates his ability to honor his sacred charge.

This information comes from an article titled “The Motif of the ‘Mutilated Hero’ in Herodotus”:

Classical scholars are generally aware of the trope that in literature from around the world thigh wounds are often euphemistic for castration, or at least for impotence.

According to the Oxford England Dictionary, “hay” comes from the Old English “hīg.”

This paragraph by David Bruce is pure speculation:

“Higginbottom” is “hay in bottom,” aka a man who needs padding for his bottom. The man may have been beaten on his bottom and therefore carries the cudgel.

In 1.3, Brainworm talks about bundled hay being used in place of riding boots to prevent chafing. Captain Bobadill wears voluminous pants that could hold bundled hay in the bottom that could protect him whenever he is beaten. He doesn’t do that in the play, of course, but maybe he should.

“Higginbottom” is perhaps the name of a man who carried a cudgel but is no longer remembered. Since that man, if he existed, is no longer remembered, we do what we can with what we’ve got.

The reference is a story about the Roman augur Attus Navius in Livy, The History of Rome, Book 1, 36:

36. He was also making preparations for surrounding the City with a stone wall when his designs were interrupted by a war with the Sabines. So sudden was the outbreak that the enemy were crossing the Anio before a Roman army could meet and stop them. There was great alarm in Rome. The first battle was indecisive, and there was great slaughter on both sides. The enemies' return to their camp allowed time for the Romans to make preparations for a fresh campaign. Tarquin thought his army was weakest in cavalry and decided to double the centuries, which Romulus had formed, of the Ramnes, Titienses, and Luceres, and to distinguish them by his own name. Now as Romulus had acted under the sanction of the auspices, Attus Navius, a celebrated augur at that time, insisted that no change could be made, nothing new introduced, unless the birds gave a favourable omen. The king's anger was roused, and in mockery of the augur's skill he is reported to have said, 'Come, you diviner, find out by your augury whether what I am now contemplating can be done.' Attus, after consulting the omens, declared that it could. 'Well,' the king replied, 'I had it in my mind that you should cut a whetstone with a razor. Take these, and perform the feat which your birds portend can be done.’ It is said that without the slightest hesitation he cut it through. There used to be a statue of Attus, representing him with his head covered, in the Comitium, on the steps to the left of the senate-house, where the incident occurred. The whet-stone also, it is recorded, was placed there to be a memorial of the marvel for future generations. At all events, auguries and the college of augurs were held in such honour that nothing was undertaken in peace or war without their sanction; the assembly of the curies, the assembly of the centuries, matters of the highest importance, were suspended or broken up if the omen of the birds was unfavourable. Even on that occasion Tarquin was deterred from making changes in the names or numbers of the centuries of knights; he merely doubled the number of men in each, so that the three centuries contained eighteen hundred men. Those who were added to the centuries bore the same designation, only they were called the ‘Second’ knights, and the centuries being thus doubled are now called the ‘Six Centuries.’

This paragraph by David Bruce is pure speculation:

Sometimes, people could argue over whose cow had calved when a cow gave birth in a common pasture with no witnesses. Sometimes, cows gave birth at roughly the same time, and if a cow gave birth to twins, people could argue over the ownership of the second twin. Sometimes, a calf was stillborn, and if another cow gave live birth at roughly the same time, people could argue over the ownership of the living calf.

According to the Oxford English Dictionary, one definition of “paper” is this:

A notice fastened on the back of a criminal undergoing punishment, specifying his or her offence.

This is what I wrote in this book:

The notice makes known the offender’s offense.

Brainworm, disguised as a soldier, had not been literally putting up papers, but he had been punishing Master Stephen for his foolishness, and he had been making Master Stephen’s foolishness known by conning him into buying a sword of low quality for the price of a sword of high quality.

Brainworm had also been fooling or would be fooling other people with his disguise, including Old Knowell and Roger Formal himself. His fooling of these people would also become known, just as if people were reading papers pinned to their back.

His fooling of Old Knowell had made Roger Formal stay somewhat long.

Note: I suspect that “I was putting up some papers” may have additional meaning, but this is the best that I can do as of now.

NOTES:

Ben Jonson’s society existed before the age of modern medicine.

Doctors in Ben Jonson’s society believed that the human body had four humors, or vital fluids, that determined one’s temperament. Each humor made a contribution to the personality, and one humor could be predominant. For a human being to be sane and healthy, the four humors had to be present in the right amounts. If a man had too much of a certain humor, it would harm his personality and health.

Blood was the sanguine humor. A sanguine man was optimistic.

Phlegm was the phlegmatic humor. A phlegmatic man was calm.

Yellow bile was the choleric humor. A choleric man was angry.

Black bile was the melancholic humor. A melancholic man was gloomy.

A humor can be a personal characteristic.

A humor can also be a fancy or a whim.

A humor can also be a mood.

Asper's humor (personal characteristic) was to be severely critical and satiric.

Sordido's humor (personal characteristic) was to be severely greedy.

Sogliardo's humor (personal characteristic) was to want to be a gentleman and to have Cavalier Shift as his role model.

Cavalier Shift's humor (personal characteristic) was to want to be thought a brave man.

Fungoso's humor (personal characteristic) was to be excessively socially ambitious and dressed in the very latest fashion.

Saviolina's humor (personal characteristic) was to have an overly high opinion of herself.

Deliro's humor (personal characteristic) was to excessively dote on his wife, Fallace.

Fallace's humor (personal characteristic) was to excessively dote on Fastidious Brisk.

Fastidious Brisk's humor (personal characteristic) was to want to be thought a highly desired and desirable courtier.

Puntarvolo's humor (personal characteristic) was to travel and gamble on his travel.

Macilente's humor (personal characteristic) was to be maliciously envious.

In Ben Jonson's society, a person of higher rank would use "thou," "thee," "thine," and "thy" when referring to a person of lower rank. (These terms were also used affectionately and between equals.) A person of lower rank would use "you" and "your" when referring to a person of higher rank.

“Sirrah” was a title used to address someone of a social rank inferior to the speaker. Friends, however, could use it to refer to each other.

The word “wench” at this time was not necessarily negative. It was often used affectionately.

In Ben Jonson’s society, a “clown” is a rustic, a countryman or countrywoman.

Queen Elizabeth I ruled England at the time of the play, whose first performance was in 1599.

NOTES ON CHARACTERS (Every Man Out of His Humor)

ASPER [Sour]

A faultfinder. He is of an ingenious, intellectually gifted, free, and unrestrained spirit, eager, tart, and constant in reproof, without fear rebuking the world's abuses; one whom no servile hope of gain or frosty apprehension of danger can make to be a parasite and sycophant, either to time, place, or opinion.

MACILENTE [Lean, Thin]

A lean malcontent. A man well-endowed with natural abilities, a capable and sufficient scholar, and travelled, who, lacking that place in the world's account which he thinks his merit is entitled to, falls into such an envious apoplexy, with which his judgment is so confounded and disgusted that he grows violently impatient of any contrasting happiness in another.

PUNTARVOLO [Wishes to Gamble]

A vainglorious knight, over-Englishing — over-elaborating and over-exaggerating — his travels and wholly consecrated to affecting eccentricity; the very Jacob's staff of compliment; a sir who has lived to see the revolution of time in most of his apparel — he is old, and most of his clothing is no longer fashionable. Of dignified appearance good enough, but so palpably affected to his own praise that, for lack of flatterers, he commends himself to the floutage and mockery of his own family. He deals upon returns and strange performances, resolving, in spite of public derision, to stick to his own particular fashion, phrase, and gesture.

A Jacob's staff was an instrument for measuring altitude. Puntarvolo enjoys using high-altitude (high-flown) language.

He praises himself so much and so extravagantly that others mock him.

“Returns and strange performances” are things to gamble on. A traveler could bet that he could return from a hazardous journey within a certain time; others could bet that he would not be able to do it. An example of a strange performance is actor Will Kemp’s betting that he could dance the morris dance from London to Norwich.

CARLO BUFFONE [Charles the Jester]

A public, scurrilous, and profane jester, who, more swift than Circe, with absurd similes will transform any person into deformity. A good feast-hound or banquet-beagle who will scent out a supper some three miles away, and who will swear to his patrons (“God damn me if I did not!”) that he came in oars when he was only wafted over in a sculler. A contemptible person who has an extraordinary gift in pleasing his palate, and will swill up more sack (white wine) at a sitting than would make all the guard a posset (medicinal drink). His religion is railing, and his discourse ribaldry. They stand highest in his respect whom he studies most to reproach.

Circe is the goddess who turned Odysseus’ men into swine in Homer’s Odyssey.

Carlo Buffone is a man who gets himself invited to dinners hosted by rich people. He will swear that he crossed the Thames River in an expensive boat with lots of oars, but he actually used less-expensive means of transportation: a rowboat with a pair of oars or a small boat with one oar. He entertains his hosts with malicious gossip and indelicate tales.

A posset is a drink containing milk curdled by wine or ale.

FASTIDIOUS BRISK [Well-Dressed]

A neat, foppish, spruce, full-of-affectations courtier; one who wears clothes well and in fashion, practices by his mirror how to salute and greet people of high social class, speaks good fragments of others' wit (notwithstanding his fashionable use of the bass viol and tobacco to punctuate his conversation), swears tersely and with variety, cares not what lady's favor [letter, gift, or sexual conquest] he belies or what great man's familiarity he belies. A good property to perfume the boot of a coach. He will borrow another man's horse to appraise it and then ride the horse as if it were his own; or, if he lacks money, on foot can post — ride quickly — himself into credit with his merchant only with the jingle of his spur and the jerk of his wand (whip).

Fastidious Brisk uses perfume. Attendants sat in the boot of the coach, and Brisk's perfume improved the smell of the air there. The Oxford English Dictionary defines "boot" in this way: "An uncovered space on or by the steps on each side, where attendants sat, facing sideways."

Although Fastidious Brisk has no horse, he wears spurs and carries a whip so that other people, including merchants, think that he is wealthy enough to own a horse. This is a scheme to persuade merchants to give him credit.

DELIRO [Fool]

A good doting — foolish — citizen, who, it is thought, is wealthy enough that he might be a member of the common council. A fellow sincerely besotted with his own wife, and so rapt with a belief in her perfections that he simply holds himself unworthy of her; and in that hoodwinked — as if blindfolded — humor, lives more like a suitor than a husband, standing in as true dread of her displeasure as when he first wooed her. He sacrifices twopence in juniper to her every morning before she rises, and he wakes her with villainous out-of-tune music, which she, out of her contempt (though not out of her judgment) is sure to dislike.

Deliro treats his wife as if she were a goddess. He burns sweet-smelling juniper as a sacrifice to her, just as devotees burn incense to honor their god.

FALLACE [Illusion]

Deliro's wife and idol, a proud, mincing, petted darling, and as perverse as he is officious. She dotes as perfectly upon the courtier Fastidious Brisk as her husband dotes on her, and lacks only the effrontery to be adulterous.

SAVIOLINA [Moderately Witty]

A court lady whose weightiest praise is a light, shallow wit, admired by herself and one more, her admirer Brisk.

SORDIDO [Sordid and Corrupt]

A wretched hobnailed rustic miser and chatterer, whose recreation is reading of almanacs, and whose felicity is foul weather; one who never prayed but for a lean dearth of wheat due to crop failure, and always wept in a fat harvest.

Almanacs forecast weather and crop yields. Sordido hoards grain and hopes for a lean harvest so he can sell grain at a high price.

FUNGOSO [A Mushroom, aka an Upstart]

The son of Sordido, and a student; one who has reveled — including in the festivities of the Inns of Court after Christmas — in his time and follows the fashion afar off, like a spy. He makes it the whole bent of his endeavors to wring sufficient means from his wretched father to put him in the courtier's fashion; at which he earnestly aims, but so unluckily, that he still alights short a suit.

Fungoso metaphorically bends his bow, takes aim at a target, and shoots, but his arrow alights — lands — short of his mark. Fungoso wants to dress like a courtier, but he fails.

SOGLIARDO [Fool]

An essential (in the highest sense) clown and rustic, brother to Sordido, yet so enamored of the title and status of a gentleman that he will have it although he has to pay for it. He comes up every London law-term to learn to take tobacco and see new motions. He is in his kingdom when he can get himself into company where he may be well laughed at.

Motions are 1) puppet-shows, and 2) events that take place in courts of law.

SHIFT [Conman and Trickster]

A threadbare shark, rogue, and petty swindler; one who never was a soldier, yet is a con man who makes money by begging while pretending he was a soldier. His profession is skeldering (fraudulent begging) and odling (cheating), his bank is St. Paul's Cathedral, and his warehouse is Pickthatch, a place of brothels. Borrows single testons (sixpences) upon oaths until doomsday. Falls under executions of three shillings and enters into five-groat bonds. He waylays the reports of notable military exploits and cons them without book (that is, he hears the reports and memorizes them), damning himself by lying that he came freshly from the military exploit, when all the while he was taking the diet (that is, undertaking a cure for venereal disease) in a bawdy house or lay pawned in his chamber for rent and victuals. He is of that admirable and happy memory that he will salute — greet — one for an old acquaintance whom he never saw in his life before. He lays claim to cheats, quarrels, and robberies that he never did, only to get himself a reputation. His chief activities are taking the whiff of tobacco, squiring a prostitute and pimping her or using her services, and covertly looking for imparters — people who will part with their money by lending it to him, or people who can give him information he can use, perhaps to help him pretend to be a soldier.

Pickt-hatch was a bad part of town where Shift stored — warehoused — stolen goods.

An execution is a writ of execution. Shift cannot repay three shillings, and so a writ of execution is taken out to seize his property to repay the three shillings.

Sometimes, Shift would have to stay in his room because he had pawned everything of value he owned, perhaps including his clothing.

Shift pretends to recognize people he has never seen before as a way to worm himself into their acquaintanceship and con them.

CLOVE and ORANGE [Effeminate Fools]

An inseparable pair of coxcombs, aka fools, city-born; the Gemini or twins of foppery who, like a pair of wooden rapiers, are fit for nothing but to be practiced upon (cheated or fooled). Being well flattered, they'll lend money, and repent when they have done. Their glory is to feast actors and give suppers; and in company of better rank, to avoid the suspicion of intellectual insufficiency, will enforce their ignorance most desperately, to set upon the understanding of anything. Orange is the more preposterous of the two, whose small portion of juice being squeezed out, Clove serves to stick him with commendations.

Clove and Orange are both fools, but they pretend — or even believe — that they are more intelligent than they are. They force their ignorance on other, smarter people.

When Orange speaks, Clove lavishes him with praise.

CORDATUS [Wise and Prudent]

The author's friend, a man intimately and closely acquainted with the scope and drift — the aim and design — of the author's plot; of a discreet, prudent, and understanding judgment, and has the place of a moderator, arbitrator, and judge.

MITIS [Gentle]

Is a person of no action, and therefore we have reason to afford him no character.

BENA NOTA:

It was not near his thoughts who has published this either to traduce and defame the author or to make vulgar and cheap any of the individual and distinguished merits of the actors, but rather, whereas many censures fluttered about it, to give all leave and leisure to judge with distinction.

INDUCTION (Every Man Out of His Humor)

The induction is an introduction.

The trumpet sounded for the second time. The first sounding of the trumpet was to tell audience members to take their places, and the third and final sounding would announce the beginning of the Prologue. The middle sounding was a warning that audience members really needed to take their places.

Asper and two of his friends — Cordatus and Mitis — strode onto the stage of a playhouse. Asper would be an actor in the play his friends were going to see. His two friends were running after him. Asper was angry, and they wanted to calm him. Audience members — including you, dear reader — were in attendance.

Asper was also the author of the play about to be presented on that stage.

In Ben Jonson's day, the word "asper" meant harsh, severe, and stern. As a satirist, Asper was about to severely criticize society.

Cordatus began, "Nay, my dear Asper —"

Mitis began, "Stay your mind, and calm yourself —"

Asper said:

"Go away!

"Who is so capable of enduring this impious world that he can check his spirit or rein his tongue? Who can control himself in this impious and wicked world and refrain from criticizing it?

"Or who has such a dead unfeeling sense that heaven's horrid thunders cannot awaken it?

“To see the earth, cracked with the weight of sin, hell gaping under us, and over our heads black ravenous ruin with her sail-stretched wings ready like a bird of prey to sink us down and cover us.

“Who can behold such prodigies — monstrous, unnatural events — as these and have his lips sealed up?

“Not I. My soul was never ground into such oily colors to flatter vice and daub iniquity — I can’t paint a pretty picture of this impious world.

“Instead, with an armed and resolved hand, I’ll strip the ragged, torn, faulty follies of the time as naked as people are at their birth —”

Asper was a satirist who wished to point out the faults of this world. He wanted to metaphorically strip and whip wicked offenders.

“Don’t be too bold,” Cordatus interrupted.

Asper said, “You trouble me with your interruption!”

He then continued his diatribe from where he had left off:

“— and with a whip of steel print wounding lashes in their iron ribs.

“I fear no angry mood, stamped in a private brow when I am pleased to unmask a public vice.

“I fear no strumpet’s poisons nor ruffian’s stab, should I detect their hateful lusts.

“I fear no pawnbroker’s, bawd’s, usurer’s, or lawyer’s extortionate grip, if I were disposed to say that they’re all corrupt.

“I fear no courtier’s frown, should I ‘applaud’ the easy flexure of his supple hams as he frequently bows.

“Tut, these are so innate and inborn, vulgar, and common that drunken Custom — habituated vice — would not shame to laugh in scorn at any satirist who would just dare to tax them.

“And yet, not one of these but knows Custom’s works, knows what damnation is, the devil, and hell. Yet hourly they persist, grow grossly luxuriant and foul-smelling in sin, blasting their souls away in perjurious, lying puffs of air, to cherish their extortion, pride, or lusts.”

“Stop, good Asper,” Mitis said. “Don’t be like your name.”

Asper’s name means “harsh.” He is a harsh critic.

Asper continued:

“Oh, but to such corrupt people, whose faces are all filled with religious zeal, and who, with the words of Hercules, attack such crimes as these, who will not smell of sin, but seem as if they were made of sanctity, religion in their garments, and their hair cut shorter than their eyebrows —”

Asper was criticizing hypocrisy. The Puritans were thought to be hypocrites.

Puritans talked much about religious zeal, and their hairstyle was short.

Hercules suffered fits of madness during which he ranted.

Asper continued:

“— when the conscience is vaster than the ocean, and devours and swallows up more wretches than the Counters —”

The Counters are prisons.

Asper was criticizing conscientious Puritans who condemned more people than could be held in London’s two prisons for debtors. The Puritans' ability to morally condemn other people became as wide and deep as the ocean.

Mitis said, "Gentle Asper, contain your spirit in much stricter boundaries, and don't be thus carried away with the violence of your strongly held thoughts and beliefs."

Cordatus said, "Unless your breath has the godlike power to melt and destroy the world and mold and make it anew again, it is in vain to expend it in these moods."

Looking around, Asper said, "I did not see this thronged round until now."

The round was the area around the stage. Asper and his two friends were standing on stage.

Asper addressed the audience, including you, dear readers:

"Gracious and kind spectators, you are welcome.

"May Apollo and the Muses feast your eyes with graceful objects, and may our Minerva — Queen Elizabeth I — answer your hopes to their largest strain — to their utmost."

Apollo was the god of music and poetry. The nine Muses were goddesses of the arts. Minerva was the Roman equivalent of the Greek Athena, goddess of wisdom.

Asper continued:

"Yet here — don't mistake me, judicious friends — I do not say this to beg your patience, or servilely to fawn on your applause like some dry, unfruitful brain, despairing in his merit."

Asper then invited critics to criticize his ideas:

"Let me be criticized by the austerest brow.

“Where I lack art and skill in my conception and expression, or where I lack judgment in my handling of my conception and expression, please tax and criticize me freely.

“Let envious, carping critics with their most sweeping eyes look through and through me; I pursue no favor.

“Only grant me your attentions, and I will give you music worth your ears.

“Oh, how I hate the monstrosity of time, where every servile imitating spirit, plagued with an itching, contagious leprosy of wit, in a mere lame fury strives to fling his ulcerous body in the Thespian spring of poetic inspiration, and straightaway leaps forth a poet, but as lame as Vulcan or the founder of Cripple Gate.”

Vulcan is the Roman equivalent of the Greek Hephaestus. He was the lame blacksmith god.

Cripple Gate, one of the seven gates of Old London, was popularly supposed to have been built by a lame man who had become wealthy.

Not every playwright is competent or original.

Mitis said, “In faith, this humor will seem offensive to some. You will be thought to be too peremptory and dogmatic.”

The word “humor” was popular at the time and had many meanings. Mitis was using it to mean “mood.”

Picking up on the word “humor,” Asper said, “‘This humor’? It’s good you used that phrase just now, and can you explain why you used the phrase ‘this humor,’ Mitis?”

Mitis began to turn away, wishing to avoid a discussion of the meaning or meanings of the word “humor.”

Asper told him, “Nay, do not turn away, but answer me.”

“Answer?” Mitis said. “Answer what?”

Asper said:

“I will not stir your patience, pardon me.

“I urged my question about humor for some reasons, and the rather to give these ignorant ‘well-spoken’ days some taste of their abuse of this word ‘humor.’”

“‘Well-spoken’” with the ironic quotes means “eloquent but ignorant.”

“Humor” was an in-vogue word, used by many people with various meanings.

Asper considered some of those meanings to be incorrect.

“Oh, do not let your purpose lapse, good Asper,” Cordatus said. “It cannot but arrive at a most acceptable conclusion, chiefly to such people as have the happiness daily to see how the poor innocent word is racked, distorted, and tortured.”

Cordatus agreed with Asper that the word “humor” was frequently misused.

“Aye, please, proceed,” Mitis said.

Asper, who had been thinking and not paying attention, said, “Ha? What? What is it?”

“Tell us about the abuse of the word ‘humor,’” Cordatus said.

Ben Jonson’s society existed before the age of modern medicine.

Doctors in Ben Jonson’s society believed that the human body had four humors, or vital fluids, that determined one’s temperament. Each humor made a contribution to the personality, and one humor could be predominant. For a human being to be sane and healthy, the four humors had to be present in the right amounts. If a man had too much of a certain humor, it would harm his personality and health.

The four humors are blood, yellow bile, black bile, and phlegm. If blood is predominant, then the person is sanguine (active, optimistic). If yellow bile is predominant, then the person is choleric (bad-tempered). If black bile is predominant, then the person is melancholic (sad). If phlegm is predominant, then the person is phlegmatic (calm, apathetic, indolent).

The above is the definition of “humor” that Asper believed was correct.

Asper said:

“Oh, I beg your pardon. I was lost in my thoughts.

Asper now defined humor:

“Why, humor (as it is, ens, aka entity) we thus define to be a quality of air or water, and in itself it holds these two properties, moisture and flexure, aka fluidity or ability to flow.

“As for demonstration: Pour water on this floor, and it will wet and run. Likewise, the air, forced through a horn or trumpet, flows instantly away and leaves behind a kind of dew or condensation.

“And hence we do conclude that whatsoever has flexure (fluidity) and humidity, as wanting power to contain itself, is humor. So in every human body the cholera, melancholy, phlegm, and blood, by reason that they flow continually in some one part and are not continent, but are incontinent and always flowing, receive the name of humors.

“Now, thus far it may by metaphor — figuratively — apply itself unto the general disposition, as when some individual, singular, peculiar quality does so possess a man that it draws all his affections, desires, and feelings, his spirits, and his powers in their confluxions — their actions of flowing together — all to run one way.

“This may be truly said to be a humor.”

Other people believed that a humor could be a personal characteristic, a fancy or a whim, or a mood.

A personal characteristic could be an eccentricity, such as affectation in clothing.

Asper, however, did not regard affectation in clothing to be a true humor:

“But that a rook — a lout — in wearing a pied feather — the cable hatband or the three-piled ruff, a yard of shoe-tie or the Switzer’s knot on his French garters, should affect a humor, oh, it is more than most ridiculous.”

A pied feather is a parti-colored plume — a feather dyed more than one color.

A cable hatband is a twisted cord worn around a hat.

A three-piled ruff is a three-layered collar.

Shoe-ties are decorations made of ribbon and worn on a shoe.

The Switzer’s knot is a garter worn below the knee by Swiss soldiers.

French garters are made of silk or taffeta.

People were claiming that their affectation in clothing was a humor.

“He speaks pure truth,” Cordatus said. “Now, if an idiot should have but an apish — foolishly affected or imitative — or fantastic strain, it is his humor.”

In other words, if anyone exhibited any kind of eccentricity, perhaps (or probably) intentionally, that person called it his or her humor.

Speaking as a satirist and as the supposed author of the satiric play about to be performed, Asper said, “Well, I will scourge and whip those apes, and to these courteous eyes” — he meant the audience — “I will set opposite to their gaze a mirror as large as is the stage whereon we act, where they shall see the time’s deformity anatomized — dissected — in every nerve and sinew, with constant courage and contempt of fear.”

“Asper, I urge it as your friend, take heed and be careful,” Mitis said. “The days are dangerous, full of objection and faultfinding and complaint, and men are grown impatient of reproof.”

Asper laughed and then replied:

“You might as well have told me that yonder is heaven.”

He pointed to the underside of the cover over the stage; the underside was painted like the sky.

Asper continued:

“You might as well have told me that this stage is the earth, these pillars are men, and these things all move like the things they represent.

“Don’t I know the times’ condition?”

“Yes, Mitis, I know the times’ condition, and their souls, and who they are who either will or can make an objection against me. They are none but a group of fools, so sick in taste that they scorn all medicine of the mind, and, like camels made sore because of chafing, kick at every touch — they fight the people who are trying to help them.

“Good men and virtuous spirits who loath their vices will cherish my free labors, love my lines, and with the fervor of their shining grace make my brain fruitful to bring forth more objects worthy their serious and attentive eyes.

“But why do I so urge this, as if my argument were faint and weak?

“No, if any person here should happen to see himself in the portrayal of any actor on stage, let him not dare to accuse me of doing wrong, for if he is ashamed to have his follies known, first he should be ashamed to enact them.”

More usually, people don't see themselves when actors portray the audience's vices — but they do see their neighbors. Later, Jonathan Swift would write, “Satire is a sort of glass [mirror] wherein beholders do generally discover everybody's face but their own; which is the chief reason for that kind reception it meets with in the world, and that so very few are offended with it.”

Asper continued:

“My strict hand was made to seize on vice, and, with a firm grip, to crush out the humor of such spongy souls as lap up every idle vanity.”

Cordatus said about Asper, “Why, this is genuine furor poeticus! The poets' inspired frenzy!”

He then said to the audience, “Kind gentlemen [and gentlewomen], we hope your patience will yet conceive the best interpretation of his actions or entertain this supposition: that a madman speaks.”

Asper called to the actors, who were offstage, “Are you ready there?”

He then said, “Mitis, sit down, and my Cordatus, sit down, too.”

He called to the trumpeters, “Sound, ho, and begin!”

When the trumpets would next sound, that would be the signal for the prologue to begin. Actually, the trumpets would sound not immediately, but a little later.

Asper said to his two friends, “I will leave you two as judges to sit here, observe what I present, and liberally speak your opinions upon every scene as it shall pass the view of these spectators.”

He called to the trumpeters, “Nay, now, you’re tedious, sirs. For shame, begin!”

Asper then said, “And Mitis, note for me if in all this collection of faces of the audience you can espy a gallant of this type, who, to be thought one of the judicious, sits with his arms thus wreathed” — Asper folded his arms tightly in the position a judgmental critic would fold them — “his hat pulled here” — Asper demonstrated the way a judgmental critic would wear his hat — “cries a derisive ‘mew’ and nods, then shakes his empty head, and will show more various motions — expressions — in his face than the new London, Rome, or Nineveh.”

“Motions” were puppet-plays as well as expressions. London was probably about the giants Gog and Magog, Nineveh was probably about Jacob and the whale, and Rome was probably about Julius Caesar.

Asper continued his description of a judgmental critic: “And now and then he breaks a dry biscuit jest — a stale joke, which, so that it may more easily be chewed, he steeps and soaks in his own laughter.”

People would float a piece of dry toast in a mug of ale and then consume both the toast and the ale.

“Why, will that make it be sooner swallowed?” Cordatus asked.

Asper replied, “Oh, assure yourself it will, or if it did not, yet as Horace sings, Jejunus raro stomachus vulgaria temnit — that is, ‘Mean cates are always welcome to hungry guests.’”

“Mean cates” are common food, not delicacies.

“That is true, but why should we observe them, Asper?” Cordatus asked.

Why keep an eye on the judgmental critics?

Asper answered:

“Oh, I would know them, for in such assemblies they’re more infectious than the pestilence. And therefore I would give them pills to purge — emetics or laxatives — and make them fit for fair societies. How monstrous and detested is it to see a fellow who has neither art nor brain sit like an Aristarchus, or a stark ass” — Aristarchus of Samothrace was an ancient Greek literary critic — “taking exception to men’s lines with a tobacco face in snuff, always spitting, using his twisted, contorted looks, in nature of a vice, to wrest and turn the good aspect of those who shall sit near him from what they do behold! Oh, it is most vile.”

Critics can be good or bad. A good satirist can justly criticize a bad society. A bad critic can unjustly criticize a good play.

Mitis began, “Nay, Asper —”

Asper said:

“Peace, Mitis, be quiet. I know what you are thinking: You’ll say that your — that is, my — audience will take exception at this.

“Pish, you are too timorous and full of fear. Then it is he, a patient, shall reject all medicine because the physician tells him you are sick.”

In other words, you say that the audience will take exception at my words and so I ought not to say them, although my words are meant to heal despite inflicting pain. It is as if a physician were to tell you that you are sick, and because you are timorous and full of fear, and you don’t want others to feel that way, the others have no chance of getting the same medicine although they suffer from the same illness that you do.

Asper continued:

“Or, if I say that he is vicious, you will not hear of virtue.”

In other words, if I say that someone is sinful, you will shield that person from hearing me although I then talk about virtue.

Asper continued:

“Come, you’re foolish.

“Shall I be so extravagant to think that happy judgments and composed, self-possessed spirits will challenge me for taxing such as these?

“I am ashamed —”

Cordatus interrupted, “— nay, but good sir, pardon us. We must not endure this peremptory sailing on and criticizing us but instead use our best endeavors how to please the audience. We can’t ignore the interests of the audience.”

Asper replied:

“Why, therein I commend your careful thoughts, and I will join with you in working to please the audience.

“But whom shall we please?

“Attentive auditors, such as will join their profit with their pleasure, and come to feed their understanding parts and satisfy their intellect? For these, I’ll prodigally expend my energy and speak my spirit away into air with my satiric speeches. For these, I’ll melt my brain into invention, coin new ideas, and hang my richest words as polished jewels in the audience’s bounteous ears.

“But wait, I am losing myself and wronging the actors’ patience. If I stay on stage and dwell here, the actors will not begin, I see.”

He said to Cordatus and Mitis, “Friends, sit here still, and entertain this troop of audience members with some familiar talk and chit-chat. I’ll hasten the trumpeters and make them sound.”

When the trumpet sounded, the Prologue would walk onto the stage. During the prologue, Asper would dress for his part in the play.

Asper then said to the audience:

“Now, gentlemen, I go to turn myself into an actor and a humorist.”

A humorist 1) is subject to humors, and/or 2) is comical.

Asper continued:

“Here, before I resume my present person, we hope to make the circles of your eyes flow with distilled laughter — tears of laughter. If we fail, we must impute it to this sole, single chance: ‘Art has an enemy called ignorance.’”

He exited to get dressed for his role in his play.

“How do you like his spirit, Mitis?” Cordatus asked.

“I would like it much better if he were less confident,” Mitis said.

“Why, do you suspect his merit?” Cordatus asked.

“No, but I fear this spirit of his will procure him much malice against him,” Mitis said.

“Oh, that sets the stronger seal on his merit,” Cordatus said. “If he had no enemies, I should esteem his fortunes most wretched at this instant.”

A savage satirist such as Asper should have enemies. A savage satirist without enemies is a bad savage satirist. Asper does have enemies and so he may be a good savage satirist.

“You have seen his play, Cordatus,” Mitis said. “Please tell me, how is it?”

“Indeed, sir, I must refrain from judging it,” Cordatus said. “Only this I can say of it, it is strange, and of a particular kind by itself, somewhat like Vetus Comoedia. A work that has bounteously pleased me; how it will answer the general expectation and be received by the audience, I don’t know.”

Vetus Comoedia is Old Comedy, such as the comic plays of the ancient Greek playwright Aristophanes. It is also early English comic plays.

“Does he observe all the laws of comedy in it?” Mitis asked.

“What laws do you mean?” Cordatus asked.

Mitis replied, “Why, the equal division of it into acts and scenes, according to the Terentian manner; the correct number of actors; the furnishing of the scene with grex or chorus; and that the whole plot fall within the compass of a single day.”

Terence was a Roman playwright who divided his plays into five acts.

Ben Jonson's grex or chorus consisted of Cordatus and Mitis, who would comment on and criticize his play.

"Oh, no, these are too nice — foolish or over-strict — observations," Cordatus said.

"They are such as must be received, if you don't mind my saying so, or it cannot be authentic," Mitis said. "They must be accepted as authoritative."

"To tell the truth, I can discern no such necessity," Cordatus said.

"No?" Mitis said.

Cordatus now began to talk about theatrical history as the people of Ben Jonson's day understood it. Some of what they believed was correct, and some was incorrect:

"No, I assure you, signor.

"If those laws you speak of had been delivered to us ab initio — from the beginning — and in their present excellence and perfection, there would be some reason for obeying their rules. But it is manifest that that which we call comoedia was at first nothing but a simple and continuous satire, aka satyr's dance and songs, sung by one only person, until Susario invented a second, after him Epicharmus a third; Phormus and Chionides devised to have four actors, with a prologue and chorus, to which Cratinus, long after, added a fifth and sixth, Eupolis more, Aristophanes more than they.

"Every man in the dignity of his spirit and judgment supplied something.

"And, although it is true that in Aristophanes this kind of poem" — "poem" was Ben Jonson's preferred word for “play” — “appeared completely and fully perfected, yet how is the face of it changed since, in Menander, Philemon, Cecilius, Plautus, and the rest, who have utterly excluded the chorus, altered the social levels and conditions of the characters, their names, and natures, and augmented it with all liberty according to the elegance and disposition of those times wherein they wrote.

“I don’t see then why we shouldn’t enjoy the same licentia, or free power, to illustrate and heighten our invention as they did, and not be tied to those strict and regular forms that the foolishness and fussiness of a few playwrights — who value nothing but form — would thrust upon us.”

Some people follow the literary rules too strictly.

Mitis replied, “Well, we will not dispute about this now. But where does Ben Jonson set his scene in this upcoming play?”

“By the Virgin Mary, he sets it on the Insula Fortunata, sir,” Cordatus answered.

The Fortunate Island is 1) Britain, and 2) the birthplace of Folly, according to Renaissance humanist Erasmus’ The Praise of Folly.

In mythology, the Fortunate Islands are the Isles of Bliss, where good souls go to in the afterlife.

“Oh, the Fortunate Island?” Mitis said, “By the Mass, he has bound himself to a strict law there. He has severely limited what he can do.”

Some people of Ben Jonson’s day believed in the three theatrical laws of time, place, and action.

The unity of time was the rule that the events of the play had to take place within one day.

The unity of place was the rule that the events of the play had to take place in one main place.

The unity of action was the rule that the events of the play had to concern one action. That is, the play would have one plot.

These laws came from an interpretation of Aristotle's Poetics, but Ben Jonson and other playwrights often violated these rules; for example, plays would often contain one major plot and one or more minor plots. Ben Jonson often did this, but he also followed the three unities in his play Volpone.

"Why so?" Cordatus asked.

"He cannot lightly and easily alter the scene without crossing the seas," Mitis said.

The unity of place, if observed, would prohibit the characters from leaving the island.

"He doesn't need to cross the seas, having a whole island to run through, I think," Cordatus said.

"No?" Mitis said. "How comes it, then, that in a certain play we see so many seas, countries, and kingdoms passed over with such admirable dexterity?"

The Elizabethan stage was very fluid. The locale could be England in one scene and France in the next scene. This happens in William Shakespeare's Henry V.

"Oh, that just shows how well the authors can travail and travel in their vocation, and outrun the apprehension of their audience," Cordatus said. "But leaving this topic of discussion, I wish the actors would begin at once. This protraction is enough to sour the best-settled patience in the theatre."

The trumpets sounded for the third time to announce the entrance of the Prologue.

“They have answered your wish, sir,” Mitis said. “The trumpets sound.”

The Prologue — the actor who spoke the prologue — strode on stage.

“Oh, here comes the Prologue,” Cordatus said.

He then said to the Prologue, “Now, sir, if you had stayed away a little longer, I would have spoken your prologue for you, indeed.”

“By the Virgin Mary, with all my heart, sir, you shall do it yet, and I thank you,” the Prologue said.

He started to leave.

“Nay, nay! Stay, stay! Do you hear me?” Cordatus said.

The Prologue replied, “You could not have prepared and aimed to have done me a greater benefit at this time, for I say to you, I am not word-perfect, and had I spoken the prologue, I must of necessity have been reduced to silence.”

“What! Do you speak this seriously?” Cordatus asked.

“Seriously?” the Prologue said. “Aye, as God’s my help, I do speak this seriously, and I esteem myself indebted to your kindness for it.”

“For what?” Cordatus asked.

“Why, for undertaking the prologue for me,” the Prologue said.

“What! Did I agree to undertake it for you?” Cordatus asked.

“Did you?” the Prologue said. “I appeal to all these gentlemen in the audience whether you did or not. Come, it pleases you to cast a strange and surprised look on it now, but it will not serve as an excuse.”

“Before God, but it must serve, and therefore speak your prologue,” Cordatus said.

“If I do, let me die poisoned with some venomous hiss and never live to look as high as the two-penny room again,” the Prologue said.

The Prologue had metaphorically compared the hissing of a hostile audience to the hissing of a venomous snake.

Places in the theater cost various prices according to how good the places were. The two-penny rooms were frequented by prostitutes and pickpockets.

The Prologue exited.

“He has put you to it, sir,” Mitis said.

“By God’s death, what a humorous — perverse — fellow this is!” Cordatus said.

He then said to the audience, “Gentlemen [and gentlewomen], in good faith, I can speak no prologue, howsoever the Prologue’s weak wit has had the fortune to make this strong, severe, brazen use and treatment of me here before you. But I protest —”

Carlo Buffone entered the scene along with his serving-boy.

Carlo interrupted Cordatus, “— come, come, stop these fustian — bombastic and longwinded — protestations. Leave. Come, I cannot abide these grey-headed, hoary, outdated ceremonies.”

He then ordered his serving-boy, “Boy, fetch me a glass of wine, quickly, so that I may bid these gentlemen welcome and give them a health — a toast — here.”

The serving-boy exited.

Carlo Buffone then said, “I marvel whose wit it was to put a prologue in yonder sackbut’s mouth. They might well think he’d be out of tune, and yet you’d play upon him, too.”

A sackbut is a musical instrument that is a forerunner of the trombone, and a butt of sack is a cask of white wine. Carlo Buffone was calling the Prologue a sackbut. Possibly, he was implying that Cordatus had a squeaky voice and was drunk. Carlo was known for saying caustic things that were not necessarily true. He was willing to say mean things if it would get people to laugh.

“To play on a person” is 1) to trick that person, 2) to mock that person, 3) to jest with that person, and/or 4) to manipulate that person (as one would manipulate a musical instrument).

“Hang him, dull block!” Cordatus said, knowing that he had been insulted.

A “block” is 1) a block of wood on which wigs or hats were placed, 2) metaphorically, a blockhead or stupid person, 3) an obstruction, or 4) a wooden support in carpentry.

Using the definition of “block” as a wooden support, Carlo Buffone said, “Oh, speak good words, speak charitable words. A well-timbered fellow, he would have made a good column if he had been thought on when the house — the Globe Theatre — was being built.”

“Well-timbered” can mean 1) well-built, or 2) wooden-headed, aka blockheaded.

The Globe Theatre was where Ben Jonson’s play was being performed.

Carlo’s serving-boy returned with a glass and some wine.

Carol Buffone said:

“Oh, have thou come? Well assayed, and well done. Give me wine, boy. Fill my glass. Good. Here’s a cup of wine that sparkles like a diamond.”

He then said to the audience:

“Gentlewomen — I am sworn to put them in first — and gentlemen, here is a round in place of a bad prologue.”

Carlo Buffone was claiming that etiquette required him to mention the gentlewomen first, before mentioning the gentlemen.

He continued:

“I drink this good draught to your health here: Canary, the very elixir and spirit of wine.”

Canary wine was wine from the Canary Islands. The Latin name of the islands is Canariae Insulae and means the Islands of the Dogs. Large dogs were reputed to roam on the islands.

Carlo Buffone drank and then said:

“This is the wine that our poet — Ben Jonson — calls Castalian liquor, the liquor of the Muses, whose sacred spring was named Castalia, when he comes abroad, now and then, once in a fortnight, and hosts a good meal among players, where he has caninum appetitum: a dog-like, greedy appetite. By the Virgin Mary, at home he keeps a good philosophical — abstemious — diet of beans and buttermilk. An honest pure rogue, he will drink off three, four, five of these draughts, one after another, and look villainously when he has done, like a one-headed Cerberus.

“Ben Jonson does not hear me, I hope.”

The draughts were of wine, but Carlo made it sound as they might be of buttermilk. If indeed they were of buttermilk, that could explain why Ben Jonson looked so villainously. Of course, being drunk or hungover can also make one look villainously.

Cerberus was a three-headed dog that was a guard dog in the Land of the Dead. One way to get past him was to get him drunk with bread soaked in wine so that he would sleep.

Carlo Buffone continued:

“And then, when his belly is well ballasted — loaded — and his brain clothed with Canary wine and rigged a little, he sails away in spite of it, as though he would work wonders when he comes home.”

Once loaded with the inspiration of Canary wine, Ben Jonson felt as if he could write a play that would be wonderfully applauded.

“He has made a play here, and he calls it Every Man Out of His Humor. By God’s blood, if he gets me out of the humor he has put me in, I’ll never trust any of his tribe again, while I live.”

The humor — mood — Carlo Buffone was in was caustic and critical. Can Ben Jonson get him out of that humor? Not likely. Chances are, even if Ben Jonson doesn’t get him of that mood, Carlo Buffone will never trust any of his tribe.

“Gentles, all I can say on his behalf is, you are welcome. I could wish my bottle here were passed around among you, but there’s an old rule: ‘No pledging your own health.’”

“By the Virgin Mary, if any here are thirsty for it, their best course of action that I know is to sit still, seal up their lips, and drink so much of the play in at their ear.”

Carlo Buffone and his serving-boy exited.

“Who may this fellow be, Cordatus?” Mitis asked.

Cordatus answered:

“Indeed, if the time will allow his description, I’ll give it to you.”

In fact, Carlo Buffone is a character in Ben Jonson’s play.

Cordatus continued:

“He is one whom the author — Ben Jonson — calls Carlo Buffone, an impudent common jester, a violent railer, and an immense glutton. He is one whose company is desired by all men, but beloved by none. He will sooner lose his soul than a jest, and he will profane even the most holy things to excite laughter. No honorable or reverend personage whatsoever can come within the reach of his eye but is turned into all manner of variations by his specious similes and comparisons.”

“You paint forth a monster,” Mitis said. “You make him out to be a monster.”

Cordatus continued his description:

“He will prefer all other countries before his native country, and he thinks he can never sufficiently, or with admiration enough, deliver his affected ideas about foreign atheistic policies.

“But wait, observe these actors in the play. Carlo Buffone will appear as himself in the play soon.”

Macilente, unaccompanied, walked onto the stage.

Asper, the supposed author of the play, was appearing in the role of Macilente.

“Oh, this is your envious man, Macilente, I think,” Mitis said.

“The same, sir,” Cordatus replied.

The play began.

ACT 1 (Every Man Out of His Humor)

— 1.1 —

The scene was the estate of Sogliardo, a wealthy country bumpkin who wished to be a gentleman. The estate was near London.

Macilente, an envious scholar, said to himself:

“Viri est, fortunae caecitatem facile ferre.”

The Latin means: “The lot of Mankind is to endure the blindness of fortune without complaining.”

Macilente continued:

“It is true, but stoic.”

The Stoic philosophers believed in patiently enduring their lot in life.

Macilente continued:

“Where in the vast world does that man breathe who can so entirely command his passions and his feelings?”

“Well, I see that I strive in vain to cure my wounded soul. For every cordial that my thoughts apply turns into a corrosive and eats it farther.

“There is no taste and no relish in this philosophy. It is like a dose of medicine that a man should drink, but his stomach turns with the sight of it.

“I am no such peeled and pilled Cynic that I would believe that beggary is the only happiness, or that with a number of these patient fools, I would sing ‘my mind to me a kingdom is’ when the lank hungry belly barks for food.”

“My mind to me a kingdom is” is the first line of a hymn by Sir Edward Dyer.

The word “peeled” means threadbare and beggarly, and the word “pilled” means covered with fur.

Hungry stomachs growl; very hungry stomachs bark.

Many Cynics were beggars and the Cynic Diogenes was sometimes called the Dog. The word “Cynic” means “Dog-like.”

The Cynics believed in rejecting wealth, fame, and power and instead living a simple life. They often publicly and caustically rejected wealth, fame, and power and the people who pursued them.

Diogenes once carried a lit lamp during the daytime and claimed to be looking for a man — any man — but all he could find were scoundrels. (Retellings of this story sometimes say that he was looking for an honest man.)

Alexander the Great heard about Diogenes, met him, and asked if he could do anything for him. In doing so, Alexander stood between the famous Cynic and the sun and cast a shadow on him. Diogenes replied, “Yes, you can stand out of my sunlight.”

Alexander told him, “If I were not Alexander, I would want to be Diogenes.” Diogenes replied, “If I were not Diogenes, I would want to be Diogenes.”

When Alexander wondered why Diogenes was looking at a pile of bones, Diogenes replied, “I am looking for the bones of your father, but I cannot distinguish them from the bones of his slaves.”

Macilente began to speak about his envy of the success of other people:

“I look into the world, and there I meet with objects that strike my bloodshot eyes into my brain; where, when I view myself — having before observed, this man is great, mighty, and feared, and that man is loved and highly favored, a third man is thought wise and learned, a fourth man is rich and therefore honored, a fifth man is splendidly handsome, and a sixth man is admired for his nuptial fortunes won by marrying a rich woman — when I see these and view myself, I say that I wish my optic instruments — my eyes — were cracked, and that the engine of my grief could cast my eyeballs, like two globes of wildfire, forth to melt this unjustly proportioned frame of nature.”

“Engine” here refers to a war machine such as a catapult.

Wildfire was a highly inflammable substance used in war.

Macilente continued:

“Oh, they are thoughts that have transfixed — pierced and wounded — my heart, and often, in the strength and full force of apprehension, made my cold passion stand upon my face, like drops of sweat on a stiff cake of ice.”

Cordatus commented:

“This alludes well to that of the poet,

“Invidus suspirat, gemit, incutitque dentes,

“Sudat frigidus, intuens quod odit.”

Jonson scholar G.A. Wilkes translated the Latin:

“The envious man sighs, groans, gnashes his teeth,

“Breaks into a cold sweat, contemplating what he hates.”

Mitis said, “Oh, peace. Be quiet: You interrupt the scene.”

— 1.2 —

Sogliardo and Carlo Buffone entered the scene. Sogliardo was a country bumpkin who had land and money and wished to be a gentleman.

Macilente said, “Wait! Who are these men? I’ll lie down a while until they pass by.”

He lay down.

Cordatus said to Mitis, “Signor, note this gallant, I say to you.”

The “gallant” was Sogliardo.

“Who is he?” Mitis asked.

“A tame rook,” Cordatus said. “You’ll see through him very soon. Listen.”

A rook is a fool.

Sogliardo said, “Nay, look, Carlo, this is my humor now. I have land and money, my relatives left me well off, and I will be a gentleman whatsoever it costs me.”

“That is a most gentlemanlike resolution,” Carlo Buffone said.

Sogliardo said:

“Tut, if I take a humor of a thing once, I am like your tailor’s needle: I go through and I see it through.

“But, as for my name, signor, what do you think? Won’t it serve for a gentleman’s name, when the ‘signor’ is put to it? Huh?”

“Let me hear it,” Carlo Buffone said. “What is it?”

Sogliardo answered, “‘Signor Insulso Sogliardo.’ I think it sounds well.”

Insulso is Latin for “without salt.” Sogliardo is without salt: He is bland and without wit and intelligence.

“Oh, excellent,” Carlo Buffone said. “Tut, if you were all dressed to suit your name, you might very well stand for a gentleman. I know many Sogliardos who are gentlemen.”

Sogliardos are people without wit and intelligence, like Sogliardo.

“Why, and for my wealth I might be a justice of peace,” Sogliardo said.

Carlo Buffone said to himself, “Aye, and a constable for your wit.”

Calling Sogliardo “a constable for your wit” was a way of saying that Sogliardo was witless. Constables were often thought to be unintelligent.

Sogliardo motioned around him and said, “All this is my lordship you see here, and those farms you came by.”

Sogliardo was a lord of the lordship who owned much property. He was not a member of the peerage.

“These are good steps to gentility, too, by the Virgin Mary,” Carlo Buffone said. “But Sogliardo, if you affect — aspire — to be a gentleman indeed, you must observe all the splendid qualities, humors, and accomplishments of a gentleman.”

“I know it, signor,” Sogliardo said, “and if you please to instruct me, I am not too good and high-ranking to learn something from you, I’ll assure you.”

Carlo Buffone said out loud, “Enough, sir —”

He said to himself, “I’ll make admirable use in the projection of my medicine upon this lump of copper here.”

He then said out loud, “— I’ll think about how I can help you, sir.”

He wanted to turn this metaphorical lump of copper (and literal fool) into money and gold for himself, like an alchemist would use the philosopher's stone to turn base metals such as copper into gold.

In the process called projection, some of the philosopher's stone was used to turn base metal into precious metal. This was supposed to be the final step of making the philosopher's stone.

The philosopher's stone was called "medicine" here because it was also believed to cure all illnesses.

Of course, the philosopher's stone does not exist.

"Signor, I will both pay you and beg you, and thank you and think about you," Sogliardo replied.

Cordatus said, "Isn't this purely and entirely good?"

Envious at hearing about Sogliardo's wealth, Macilente said to himself, "By God's blood, why should such a prick-eared hind as this be rich?"

A hind is 1) a rustic, 2) a servant, or 3) a female deer.

Dogs with erect ears are said to be prick-eared. Possibly, Sogliardo had big ears and a short haircut.

Macilente continued, "Bah! A fool? Such a transparent gull that may be seen through? Why should he have land, houses, and lordships? Oh, I could eat my entrails and sink my soul into the earth with sorrow!"

Carlo Buffone said:

"First, to be an accomplished gentleman, that is, a gentleman of the time, you must give up housekeeping in the country and live all the time in the city among gallants, where, at your first appearance, it would be good if you turned four or five hundred acres of your best land into two or three trunks of apparel — you may do it without going to a conjurer, magician, or witch.”

A gentleman needed expensive clothing, and he could get money to buy it by mortgaging his land.

“And be sure that you mix yourself always with such as flourish in the spring of the fashion and are least among the common people; study their deportment and behavior in everything; learn to play at the card game called primero and the dice game called passage; and, always when you lose, have two or three peculiar, eccentric oaths to swear by that no other man swears; but above all, protest in your play, and affirm ‘Upon your honor, as you are a true gentleman’ at every cast of the dice. You may do it with a safe conscience, I assure you.”

“Oh, this is admirably splendid!” Sogliardo said. “He cannot choose but be a gentleman who has these excellent gifts. More, more, I ask you to tell me.”

Carlo Buffone said:

“You must endeavor to feed neatly at your eating-house, sit and look melancholy, and pick your teeth when you cannot speak.”

Toothpicks were fashionable.

He continued:

“And when you go to plays, be humorous — unreceptive to the play — look with a good starched-with-haughtiness face, and ruffle your brow like a new boot, laugh at nothing but your own jests, or else as the noblemen laugh; that’s a special grace and eloquence you must observe.”

Wide-topped boots were fashionable. The tops were folded, aka ruffled, below the knee.

“I assure you that I do those things, sir,” Sogliardo said.

Carlo Buffone said, “Aye, and sit on the stage and flout and scoff — provided you are wearing a good suit of clothing.”

Some members of the audience could sit on the stage. In fact, Cordatus and Mitis were sitting on the stage.

“Oh, I’ll have a suit only for that, sir,” Sogliardo said.

“You must talk much about your kindred and allies,” Carlo Buffone said.

“Tell lies?” Sogliardo said. “No, signor, I shall not need to do so, I have kindred in the city to talk about. I have a niece who is a merchant’s wife, and a nephew, my brother Sordido’s son, who is a law student of the Inns of Court.”

Carlo Buffone said:

“Oh, but you must pretend alliance with courtiers and great persons, and always when you are to dine or sup in any strange and unfamiliar presence, hire a fellow with a great chain that is the steward’s badge of office — though it be copper, it doesn’t matter — to bring you letters, feigned to make it appear to be from such a nobleman or such a knight or such a lady, ‘To their worshipful, right rare, and noble qualified friend or kinsman, Signor Insulso Sogliardo’ — give yourself plenty enough titles of address.

“And there, while you direct your attention to circumstances of news, or inquiry of their health, or so, one of your friends, whom you must bring with you always, breaks the seal open, as if it were in jest, and reads it publicly at the table; at which you must seem to take his action as unpardonable an offence as if he had torn your mistress’ colors, or insulted or lustfully panted at her picture; and pursue it with that hot grace as if you would enforce a challenge upon it immediately.”

Colors are scarves and ribbons that are gifts from women.

Sogliardo said:

“Wait, I do not like that humor of challenge. It may be accepted.”

He did not want to get into a fight.

He continued:

“But I’ll tell you what’s my humor now. I will do this: I will take the opportunity of sending one of my suits to the tailor’s to have the pocket repaired, or so, and such a letter as you talk of, with its seal and all broken open, shall be left in the pocket.

“Oh, the tailor will soon let everyone know who and what I am upon the reading of it, more effectively than twenty of your gallants.”

The stereotype of tailors was that they were effeminate and they were gossips.

“But then you must put on an extreme face of discontentment at your serving-man’s negligence,” Carlo Buffone said.

Sogliardo would pretend that his serving-man had left the open letter in the pocket.

“Oh, so I will, and I will beat him, too,” Sogliardo said. “I’ll have a man-servant for the purpose.”

Macilente said to himself, “You may indeed have a man-servant for the purpose. After all, you have land and crowns. Oh, partial — unfairly biased — Fate!”

Crowns are gold coins.

“By the Mass, well remembered,” Carlo Buffone said.

Wealthy men could beat their servants.

He continued, “You must keep your men gallant at the first. Give them fine pied — parti-colored — liveries embroidered with good gold lace. There’s no loss in it; they may rip it off and pawn it, when they lack victuals.”

“By our Lady, the Virgin Mary, that is expensive, signor,” Sogliardo objected. “It will bring a man into debt.”

“Debt?” Carlo Buffone said. “Why, that’s the more for your credit, sir; it’s an excellent policy for gentlemen to owe much in these days, if you note how gentlemen act in these days.”

Sogliardo would get credit — a reputation — for being a gentleman, but “more for [his] credit” also meant he would be in danger of overextending his credit, aka debt.

“How will debt be more for my credit as a gentleman, good signor?” Sogliardo said. “I would like to be a politician and play the game of being a gentleman well.”

Carlo Buffone said:

“Oh, look, wherever you are indebted any great sum, your creditor attends you with no less regard than if he were bound to you for some huge benefit, and he will tremble with fear lest he give you the least cause of offence, lest he lose his money.

“I assure you, in these times no man has his servant more obsequious and pliant than gentlemen have their creditors, to whom, if at any time, you pay but a half or a fourth part of what you owe them, it comes more acceptedly and welcome than if you gave them a New-Year’s gift.”

“I understand you, sir,” Sogliardo said. “I will raise the money by borrowing it, and bring myself in credit and run up debts, to be sure.”

Carlo Buffone said:

“By the Virgin Mary, take heed of this: Always be careful that you don’t do business with bankrupts, or poor needy Ludgathians.”

Ludgathians were bankrupts who were in the debtors’ prison at Ludgate.

“They are impudent creatures, turbulent spirits; they don’t care what violent tragedies they stir, nor how they play fast and loose with a poor gentleman’s fortunes, to get their own.

“By the Virgin Mary, these rich fellows who have the world, or the better part of it, sleeping in their countinghouses, they are ten times more peaceable, they. Either fear, hope, or modesty restrains them from offering any outrages.”

These rich fellows were the ones with lots of money in their treasuries. Because of their excessive wealth, they were peaceful. Possibly, this made them easier to take advantage of. They would not object to small (small for them, that is) losses.

“But this is nothing to your followers. You shall not run a penny more in debt for them, if you wish, yourself.”

“No?” Sogliardo said. “How should I keep them, then?”

Don’t servants need to eat and to be paid?

Carlo Buffone replied:

“Keep them? By God’s blood, let them keep themselves; they aren’t sheep, are they?”

“You shall come in houses where plate, apparel, jewels, and diverse other pretty commodities lie negligently scattered, and I would have those mercuries follow me in the houses, I think. They should remember they don’t have their fingers for nothing.”

Mercuries are thieves; Mercury was the Roman god of thieves.

Carlo Buffone would have Sogliardo’s servants pilfer items from the houses of rich people.

“That’s not so good, I think,” Sogliardo said.

“Why, after you have kept them a fortnight or so and showed them enough to the world, you may turn them away and keep no more than a boy; it’s enough,” Carlo Buffone said.

Serving-boys were paid less than serving-men.

“Nay, my humor is not for boys,” Sogliardo said. “I’ll keep men, if I keep any, and I’ll give coats, that’s my humor. But I lack a cullison.”

Servants wore blue coats. Their clothing was known as liveries, and the servants of great gentlemen had distinctive liveries that showed whom they served.

A cullison was a badge that indicated one’s family and was displayed on servants’ livery. The badge often was a coat of arms. Gentlemen had cullisons.

“Why, now that you ride to the city, you may buy one,” Carlo Buffone said. “I’ll bring you where you shall have your choice for money.”

Wealthy ambitious men could bribe heralds to grant them a coat of arms.

“Can you, sir?” Sogliardo asked.

“Oh, aye, you shall have one take the measure of you and make you a coat of arms to fit you of what fashion you will,” Carlo Buffone said.

His words were suitable to describe both a herald who made coats of arms and a tailor who made coats.

“By word of mouth, I thank you, signor,” Sogliardo said.

“By word of mouth?” He was taking Carlo Buffone’s advice and making up his own oaths: “I swear by my word of mouth.”

Sogliardo continued, “I’ll be for once a little prodigal in a humor, in faith, and have a most prodigious coat.”

Macilente said loud enough to be heard:

“Torment and death! Break head and brain at once to be delivered of your fighting issue!”

Zeus gave birth to his warrior-daughter Athena from his forehead. Parthenogenesis is a form of asexual reproduction, and the temple called the Parthenon in Athens was dedicated to her.

Sogliardo was an ordinary fool, but Lady Fortune had given him wealth and so he was going to be born again as a wealthy, foolish gentleman. Sogliardo was someone whom Macilente wanted to fight.

Macilente continued:

“Who can endure to see blind Fortune dote thus?”

“To be enamored on this dusty turf — this clod! A whoreson puckfist! Oh, God! God! God! God!”

“I could run wild with grief now to behold the rankness and gross fertility of her bounties that does breed such bulrushes, these mushroom gentlemen, these social upstarts, who shoot up in a night to a position of dignity.”

Macilente felt envious of Sogliardo’s wealth, and he felt contempt at how Sogliardo was planning to spend it.

A puckfist is a puffball fungus: It is empty, like Sogliardo’s head.

Bulrushes only appear to be strong; they are actually fragile.

Mushroom gentlemen are gentlemen who seemingly spring up overnight. They are new men, and they do not come from families who have long been known as belonging to a high social class.

Hearing Macilente complain, Carlo Buffone said to Sogliardo, “Let him alone. Ignore him. He is some stray, some stray.”

“Nay, I will ask him some questions before I go, to be sure,” Sogliardo said.

Carlo Buffone replied, “The lord of the soil has all wefts and strays here, hasn’t he?”

Wefts are waifs, abandoned property such as that dropped by a thief while being pursued. Strays are stray animals. If waifs and strays were not claimed within a reasonable amount of time, they became the property of the lord of the lordship.

Carlo Buffone was referring to Macilente as if he were a stray dog.

“Yes, sir,” Sogliardo answered.

“Truly, then I pity the poor fellow,” Carlo Buffone said.

He was referring to Macilente.

Carlo Buffone said to himself, “He’s fallen into a fool’s hands.”

Sogliardo said to Macilente, “Sirrah, who gave you a commission or warrant to lie — reside — in my lordship?”

“Your lordship?” Macilente said.

“What? ‘My lordship’? Do you know me, sir?” Sogliardo asked.

“I do know you, sir,” Macilente said.

Carlo Buffone said to himself, “By God’s heart, he answers him like an echo.”

“Why, who am I, sir?” Sogliardo asked.

“You are one of those whom fortune favors,” Macilente answered.

Carlo Buffone said to himself, “The periphrasis of a fool. I’ll observe this better.”

A Latin proverb stated, “Fortuna favit fatuis.” This means: “Fortune favors fools.”

Macilente had used a periphrasis — roundabout way — to say that Sogliardo was a fool.

“Whom fortune favors?” Sogliardo asked. “What do you mean by that, friend?”

“I mean simply ... that you are one who doesn’t live by your wits,” Macilente said.

This means “you are rich enough that you don’t have to live by your wits,” and it implies “you aren’t intelligent enough to live by your own wits.”

“By my wits?” Sogliardo said. “No, sir, I scorn to live by my wits, I. I have better means, I tell thee, than to take such base courses of action as to live by my wits. By God's blood, do thou think I live by my wits?"

Sogliardo was happy that he had so much money that he didn't need to live by his wits. He was also stupid enough that he didn't understand Macilente's implied insult.

Macilente said to Carlo Buffone, "I think, jester, you should not relish this well."

Jesters live by their wits; Sogliardo took pride in not living by his wits.

Carlo Buffone said to himself, "Ha! Does he know me? Does he recognize me?"

Macilente said to Carlo Buffone, "Though yours be the worst use a man can put his wit to, of thousands of ways to use your wit, to prostitute it at every tavern and eating-house, yet I think that you should have turned your broadside at this, and you should have been ready with a defense of wit able to sink this hulk of ignorance into the bottom and depth of his contempt."

As a jester, Carlo Buffone should have given Sogliardo a broadside of his wit and metaphorically blown him out of the water and literally blown him out of his self-satisfied complacency.

A broadside occurs when all the cannon on one side of a warship fire at the same time.

A hulk is 1) a large ship, or 2) a large person.

Carlo Buffone said to himself, "By God's blood, this man is Macilente!"

He then said out loud to him, "Signor, you are well encountered. How is it with you? How are you?"

He then whispered to Macilente, “Oh, we must not regard what he — Sogliardo — says, man. He is a trout, a shallow fool. He has no more brain than a butterfly. He is a mere stuffed suit. He looks like a musty bottle, newly placed in a wicker basket; his head’s the cork, light, light.”

Trout were supposed to be easily caught by tickling them.

Sogliardo was like a musty — a stale — bottle in a new wicker basket. His intelligence was musty, but his clothing was new.

Carlo Buffone then said out loud, “I am glad to see you so well returned, signor.”

“You are?” Macilente said. “Gramercy, good Janus. Great thanks.”

Janus was a Roman god with two faces. One face looked toward the future; the other face looked toward the past. The image became used for a hypocrite. Carlo Buffone was praising Sogliardo to his face, but he was insulting him behind his back.

Sogliardo whispered to Carlo Buffone, “Is he one of your acquaintance? I love him the better for that.”

Carlo Buffone whispered to Sogliardo, “By God’s precious body, come away and don’t waste time on him, man, what do you mean? If you knew him as I do, you’d shun him as you’d shun the plague.”

Sogliardo whispered back, “Why, sir?”

Carlo Buffone whispered back, “Oh, he’s a black — an evil — fellow. Take heed on him. Be careful when you are around him.”

Sogliardo whispered back, “Is he a scholar or a soldier?”

Carlo Buffone whispered back, “Both, both. A lean mongrel; he looks as if he were chap-fallen — slack-jawed — because of exhaustion from barking at other men’s good fortunes. Be wary how you offend him; he carries oil and fire in his pen that will scald where it drops; his spirit’s like gunpowder, quick, violent; he’ll blow a man up with a jest. I fear him worse than a rotten wall does the cannon, when the wall is still shaking an hour after the sound of the cannon’s blast. Leave, don’t come near him.”

Sogliardo whispered back, “For God’s sake, let’s be gone. If he is a scholar, you know I cannot abide him. I had as gladly see a cockatrice, especially as cockatrices go now.”

Cockatrices are basilisks, mythological monsters that can kill with their look.

Cockatrices are also prostitutes. There is a pun on “cock,” and the “trice” is analogous to the end of meretrix, a word that is Latin for “prostitute” and which people of Ben Jonson’s time joked meant “merry tricks.” Therefore, cockatrices are cock-tricks.

Carlo Buffone now whispered to Macilente, “What, you’ll stay, signor? This gentleman Sogliardo and I are to visit the knight Puntarvolo, and then go from thence to the city. We — you and I — shall meet there.”

Carlo Buffone and Sogliardo exited.

Throughout this meeting, Macilente had been lying down.

Now he stood up and said to himself:

“Aye, when I cannot shun you, we will meet.

“It is strange. Of all the creatures I have seen, I don’t envy this Buffone, Carlo Buffone, for indeed neither his fortunes nor his parts — qualities — deserve it.

“But I hate him as I hate the devil, or that brass-visaged and impudent monster called Barbarism.

“Oh, it is an open-throated, black-mouthed, slanderous cur, which bites at all, but eats on those who feed him.

“A rogue who to your face will, serpent-like, creep on the ground as if he would eat the dust, and to your back will turn the tail and sting you more deadly than a scorpion.”

Seeing someone coming, he said, “Wait, who’s this? Now, for my soul, another darling of the old Lady Chance’s. I’ll observe him.”

Old Lady Chance is Lady Fortune.

He watched quietly, unobserved as the newcomer arrived and he listened as the newcomer spoke to himself.

— 1.3 —

Sordido entered the scene. He was reading a prognostication: a set of weather predictions and other information useful to farmers. Prognostications were bound with almanacs.

Sordido was Sogliardo’s brother, and like Sogliardo, he was rich. Sordido was, in particular, a rich farmer.

What Sordido was reading made him happy: “Oh, splendid, good, good, good, good, good! I thank my Christ. I thank my Christ for it.”

Macilente said to himself, “Didn’t I say the truth? Doesn’t his passion — his strong emotion — speak out of my divination?”

Macilente had guessed that this newcomer was “another darling of the Old Lady Chance’s.” The newcomer’s strong feelings of happiness seemed to show that this was true.

Macilente continued, “Oh, my senses, why don’t you lose your powers and become deadened, dull, and blunted with this spectacle? I know him: He is Sordido, the farmer, a boor, and brother to that swine who was here.”

“That swine” was Sogliardo.

“Excellent, excellent, excellent!” Sordido said. “It is as I would wish, as I would wish.”

Macilente said to himself, “See how the strumpet Fortune tickles and excites him, and makes him swoon with laughter, ‘Oh, oh, oh!’”

Many people considered Lady Fortune to be a strumpet because she was so fickle when deciding on whom to bestow or not to bestow her favors. Often, she left one man and then favored another man.

“Ha, ha, ha!” Sordido said. “I will not sow my grounds this year. Let me see, what harvest shall we have? June? July?”

He consulted his book of prognostications.

Macilente said to himself, “What is it? A prognostication that enraptures him so?”

Sordido read the prognostications out loud and commented on them:

“‘The twentieth, twenty-first, twenty-second days, rain and wind.’ Oh, good, good.

“‘The twenty-third and twenty-fourth, rain and some wind.’ Good.

“‘The twenty-fifth, rain’ — good still.

“‘Twenty-sixth, twenty-seventh, twenty-eighth, wind and some rain.’ I wish it had been rain and some wind. Well, it is good, when it can be no better.

“Twenty-ninth inclining to rain.’ Inclining to rain? That’s not so good, now.

“Thirtieth and thirty-first, wind and no rain.’ No rain? By God’s eyelid, wait, this is worse and worse.

“What does he say about St. Swithin’s? Turn back. Look, ‘St. Swithin’s’ — no rain?”

A proverb stated, “If it rain on St. Swithin’s Day [July 15], it will continue for forty days.”

Excessive rainy weather ruined crops and made the price of grain higher.

Macilente said to himself:

“Oh, here’s a precious, filthy, damned rogue, who fattens himself with the expectation of rotten weather and unseasonable hours, and he is rich for it, an elder brother.”

Because of primogeniture, the eldest son usually inherited the bulk of his parents’ estate.

Macilente continued speaking to himself:

“His barns are full, his ricks and mows are well trod, and his garners — grain storehouses — crack with store.”

Well-trod ricks and mows are well-tamped stacks of grain so that no space is wasted that could store more grain.

Macilente continued speaking to himself:

“Oh, it is well! Ha, ha, ha!

“May a plague consume thee and thy family!”

Sordido hoarded grain so that he could wait for a bad harvest and sell it at a very high price.

Still thinking he was alone, Sordido continued:

“Oh, here! ‘St. Swithin’s, the fifteenth day, variable weather, for the most part, rain’ — good — ‘for the most part, rain.’

“Why, it should rain forty days after now, more or less. It was a rule held before I was able to hold a plow, and yet here are two days, no rain. Ha! It makes me muse.”

On the thirtieth and the thirty-first, the prognostication forecast no rain.

Sordido continued:

“We’ll see how the next month begins, and see if that is better. ‘August: August first, second, third, and fourth days, rainy and blustering.’ This is well, now.

“‘Fifth, sixth, seventh, eighth, and ninth, rain, with some thunder.’ Aye, by the Virgin Mary, this is excellent; the other was incorrectly printed, surely.”

“The other” was the other two days: the thirtieth and the thirty-first.

Sordido continued:

“‘The tenth and eleventh, great store of rain’ — oh, good, good, good, good, good!

“‘The twelfth, thirteenth, and fourteenth days, rain’ — good still.

“‘Fifteenth and sixteenth, rain’ — good still.

“‘Seventeenth and eighteenth, rain’ — good still.

“‘Nineteenth and twentieth’ — good still, good still, good still, good still, good still!

“‘One-and-twentieth, some rain.’ Some rain? Well, we must be patient and attend the heavens’ pleasure. I wish it would be more, though.

“‘The one-and-twentieth, two-and-twentieth, three-and-twentieth, great tempest of rain, thunder, and lightning.’ Oh, good again, past expectation good!

“I thank my blessed angel. Never, never did I spend a penny better than I spent this penny to purchase this dear book.”

Almanacs containing prognostications cost one penny.

Still thinking he was alone, Sordido continued:

“It is not dear — expensive — for price, and yet by me it is as dearly prized and as valuable as life, since in it is contained the very life-essence, blood, strength, and sinews of my happiness.

“Blest be the hour wherein I bought this book.

“May the endeavors of the man who composed the book be happy and fortunate, and may the man who sold me the book be fortunate.

“Sleep with this blessing, and be as true to me as I rejoice and am confident in thee.”

A servant arrived and gave a letter to Sordido.

As Sordido read the letter, Macilente said to himself:

“Ha, ha, ha! Isn’t this good? Isn’t it pleasing, this?”

He was sarcastic.

Macilente continued:

“Ha, ha! God’s — ha! Is it possible that such a spacious — large-scale and owning-much-land — villain should live and not be plagued? Or does he lie hidden within the wrinkled bosom of the world where Heaven cannot see him?”

“By God’s blood, I think that it is rare and admirable that he should breathe and walk, feed with good digestion, sleep, enjoy his health, and, like a boisterous whale swallowing the poor, always swim in wealth and pleasure.

“Isn’t it strange?

“Unless his house and skin were thunder-proof, I wonder at it.”

“Thunder-proof” means impervious to thunderbolts thrown by Zeus, the King of the gods — or thrown by God.

Macilente continued:

“I think now, the fever, gout, leprosy, or some such loathed disease might alight upon him, or that fire from heaven might fall upon his barns, or mice and rats eat up his grain, or else that it might rot within the hoary ricks, even as it stands.

“I think this might be a good and suitable punishment, and after all that, the devil might come and fetch him. Aye, it is true. I truly believe he deserves this punishment.

“In the meantime he surfeits — celebrates to excess — in prosperity, and thou, Macilente, in envy of him, gnaw thyself.

“Peace, fool, by which I mean myself, get away from here, and tell thy vexed spirit, ‘Wealth in this age will scarcely look on merit.’”

He exited.

Sordido asked the servant, “Who brought this paper and gave it to you to give to me, sirrah?”

The servant replied, “By the Virgin Mary, sir, one of the justice’s men brought it; he says it is a precept — a court order — and all their hands are on it. All the authorities have signed their names to it.”

Sordido responded:

“Aye, and the prints of them stick in my flesh like a brand deeper than in their letters.”

They had used wax to seal the letter and stamp the seal deeply.

Sordido continued:

“They have sent me pills wrapped in paper here, pills that, should I take them, would poison all the sweetness of my book and turn my honey into hemlock juice.”

Pills were usually wrapped in paper.

The authorities were ordering Sordido to sell his grain at a fair price in the marketplace because people were hungry. Soon, some authorities would arrive and check his storehouses to verify that he had sold his grain.

Sordido said:

“But I am wiser than to observe and obey their precepts or follow their prescriptions. Here’s a device to order me to bring my grain to the markets.

“Aye, that’s likely!

“When I have neither barn nor garner nor earth to hide my grain in, I’ll bring it, but until then, each corn I send shall be as big as Paul’s.”

He intended to hide his grain. Only the grain he could not hide would be sold, but the only grain he could not hide would have each kernel as large as St. Paul’s Cathedral.

Sordido continued:

“Oh, but some say that the poor are likely to starve.

“Why, let them starve; what’s that to me? Are bees bound to keep life in drones and idle moths by laboring to produce honey while they are idle? No.

“Why, such as these who term themselves the poor, only because they would be pitied, are indeed just a band of lazy beggars, licentious rogues and sturdy vagabonds, bred by the sloth of a fat plenteous year like snakes in heat of summer out of dung, and this is all that these cheap times are good for; whereas a wholesome and penurious dearth of grain purges the soil of such vile excrements, and kills the vipers.”

Ben Jonson’s society believed that snakes could be born from spontaneous generation.

“Penurious” means 1) extremely poor, and 2) mean.

His servant said, “Oh, but master, be careful that they — the poor people — don’t hear you.”

“Why should I?” Sordido asked.

“The poor people will loudly exclaim against and denounce you,” the servant said.

Sordido said:

“Aye, their exclamations against me move me as much as thy breath moves a mountain.

“Poor worms, they hiss at me, while I at home can be contented to applaud myself, to sit and clap my hands and laugh and leap, knocking my head against my roof with joy to see how plump my moneybags are and my barns.

“Sirrah, go, hurry to your home, and bid your fellows to get all their flails ready in preparation for when I come.”

“I will, sir,” the servant said as he exited.

Alone, Sordido said to himself:

“I’ll instantly set all my servants to thrashing a whole rick of corn, which I will hide under the ground, and with the straw thereof I’ll stuff the outsides of my other mows.”

Ricks are stacks of cut corn or hay, and mows are corn or hay stored in a barn.

Sordido wanted to disguise his mows of grain as mows of straw.

Sordido continued:

“That done, I’ll have them empty all my garners and in the friendly earth bury my store, so that, when the searchers for my grain — by then hidden — come to prevent me from cornering the market, they may suppose all’s consumed and that my fortunes were lied about or misreported.

“And to lend more opinion to my appearance of need and to stop that many-mouthed vulgar dog — poor people yelping for food — that otherwise would always be baying at my door, each market day I will be seen to buy part of the purest wheat, as if to feed my household, and when the wheat comes here, it shall increase my heaps.

“It will yield me treble gain at this dear time, promised in this dear book. I have cast and calculated and forecast all.”

He was gambling — like a cast of the dice — all the grain he had that the upcoming harvest would be poor.

Sordido continued:

“Until then, I will not sell an ear. I’ll hang first.

“Oh, I shall make my prizes — rewards — and my prices as I wish!

“My house and I can eat peas and barley.

“What though a world of wretches starve the while?

“He who will thrive must think no courses of action vile.”

He exited.

Cordatus said to Mitis, “Now, signor, how do you approve of this? Have the humorists expressed themselves truly or not?”

The humorists were 1) the characters with humors, and 2) the characters who caused the audience to smile and laugh.

Mitis replied:

“Yes, I do approve of this, if it will be well prosecuted and followed up. It is hitherto happy enough.

“But I think that Macilente went away from here too soon. He might have been made to stay and speak something in reproof of Sordido’s wretchedness — greediness — now at the last.”

“Oh, no, that would have been extremely improper,” Cordatus said. “Besides, he had continued the scene too long with him as it was, being in no more action.”

Mitis said, “You may put forward the length as a necessary reason, but for propriety and stage decorum the scene would very well have borne Macilente’s staying and speaking, in my judgment.”

“Oh, the worst of both: excessive length and lack of propriety,” Cordatus said. “Why, you mistake his — Macilente’s — humor utterly, then.”

“How do I mistake it?” Mitis asked. “Isn’t his humor envy?”

Cordatus said:

“Yes, but you must understand, signor, Macilente envies Sordido not as he is a villain, a wolf in the commonwealth, but as he is rich and fortunate; for the true condition of envy is dolor alienae felicitates.”

The Latin meant: “resentment at another person’s good fortune.”

Cordatus continued:

“To have our eyes continually fixed upon another man’s prosperity — that is, his chief happiness — and to grieve at that. That is what Macilente does.

“Whereas if we make his monstrous and abhorred actions our object, the grief we take then comes nearer the nature of hate than envy, as being bred out of a kind of contempt and loathing in ourselves.”

Macilente was envious of Sordido’s wealth. Macilente’s humor was envy.

If Macilente’s main opinion of Sordido was that he was a monster for hoarding grain in hopes of making much money later while people were starving now, then Macilente’s humor would be hate: He would hate Sordido.

Mitis said, “So you’ll infer it would have been hate, not envy in him, to reprehend the humor — greediness — of Sordido?”

Cordatus said:

“Right, for what a man truly envies in another, he could always love and cherish in himself; but no man truly reprehends in another what he loves in himself, therefore reprehension — finding fault — is out of his hate.”

Macilente envied Sordido’s wealth, but Macilente would love to have that wealth for himself.

Cordatus continued:

“And this distinction he himself has made in a speech there, if you noticed it, where he says, ‘I don’t envy this Buffoon, but I hate him.’”

Mitis said, “Wait, sir: ‘I don’t envy this Buffoon, but I hate him.’ Why might he not as well have hated Sordido as him?”

Cordatus answered:

“No, sir, there was subject — a material motive — for his envy in Sordido: his wealth.

“But there was no subject — no material motive — for envy in the other: Carlo Buffone.

“He — Carlo Buffone — stood possessed of not one eminent gift or superior talent, but he did possess a most odious and fiend-like disposition that would turn charity itself into hate, rather than envy as in the present case.”

ACT 2 (Every Man Out of His Humor)

— 2.1 —

Carlo Buffone, Sogliardo, Fastidious Brisk, and Cinedo were near the house of the knight Puntarvolo. Fastidious Brisk was a courtier, and Cinedo was his page. In Latin, cinaedus means “homosexual.”

“You have satisfied me, sir,” Mitis said.

Seeing the new actors arriving, he added, “Oh, here come the fool and the jester again, I think.”

“It would be a pity if they should be parted, sir,” Cordatus said.

The jester was Carlo Buffone, and the fool was Sogliardo.

“What bright-shining gallant is that with them?” Mitis asked. “The knight they went to pay a visit to?”

Carlo Buffone and Sogliardo had mentioned paying a visit to the knight named Puntarvolo.

“No, sir, this man is one Monsieur Fastidious Brisk, otherwise called the fresh Frenchified courtier,” Cordatus answered.

Ben Jonson’s society regarded anyone who was “Frenchified” as effeminate and affected.

“Is he a humorist, too?” Mitis asked.

“He is as humorous as quicksilver,” Cordatus answered. “Just watch him.”

Quicksilver, also known as mercury, is liquid at room temperature and coheres in a ball. People who are mercurial are volatile, unstable, and capricious. Think of Mercutio in William Shakespeare’s Romeo and Juliet.

“The scene is the country still, remember,” Cordatus said.

Sordido and Puntarvolo lived close to each other and close to the city.

The city was London.

Fastidious Brisk said, “Cinedo, watch when the knight comes, and give us word.”

“I will, sir,” Cinedo said as he exited.

“How do thou like my boy, Carlo?” Fastidious Brisk asked.

“Oh, well, well,” Carlo Buffone said. “He looks like a colonel of the pygmies’ cavalry, or one of these clockwork figures in a great antique and antic — old-fashioned and grotesque — clock. He would show well upon a haberdasher’s stall at a corner shop, splendidly.”

Haberdashers sold hats. Carlo Buffone was joking that Cinedo looked like a dummy in a haberdasher’s shop.

“By God’s heart, what a damned witty rogue is this!” Fastidious Brisk said. “How he confounds with his similes!”

“It’s better to confound with similes than smiles,” Carlo Buffone said.

“To confound” means 1) to surprise, 2) to confuse, or 3) to destroy or ruin. This third meaning is now obsolete.

Courtiers do much flattering and smiling. Sometimes, flattery and smiles can lead to ruin and destruction.

“And to where were you riding now, signor?” Carlo Buffone asked.

“Who, I?” Fastidious Brisk asked. “What a silly jest is that! To where should I ride but to the court?”

He was a courtier, and so he spent much time at the court.

Carlo Buffone sprung his sex joke: “Oh, pardon me, sir, you could ride to twenty places more: your hot-house, or your —”

A hot-house is a place where a person can get a hot bath and a massage. Also, a hot-house can be a whorehouse. “Riding” can be a sexual riding.

Carlo Buffone did not finish his sentence, pretending that he was not willing to mention anything salacious.

“By the virtue of my soul, this knight dwells in Elysium here,” Fastidious Brisk said, changing the subject.

Elysium is where good souls go to in the afterlife.

Carlo Buffone said to himself:

“He’s gone now.”

The attention of Fastidious Brisk had wandered to a different topic of discussion, probably on purpose. In other words, Carlo Buffone’s conversation was not to his liking.

Carlo Buffone added, still talking to himself:

“I thought he would fly out presently. These be our nimble-spirited catsos who have their evasions — tricks and shifts — at pleasure, and who will run over a bog like your wild Irish; no sooner started, but they’ll leap from one thing to another like a squirrel — hey! — dance and do tricks in their discourse, from fire to water, from water to air, from air to earth, as if their tongues did but even lick the four elements over, and away.”

The word “catso” comes from the Italian cazzo, which means “penis.” “Catso” is used to mean “rogue.”

Irish soldiers were known for attacking enemy English soldiers and then escaping by running through swampland.

The four elements that Ben Jonson's society thought everything was made of in various combinations were air, water, earth, and fire.

Fastidious Brisk said, "Sirrah Carlo, thou never saw my grey hobby yet, did thou?"

His use of "sirrah" showed that he believed that he was Carlo Buffone's social superior.

Hobby horses are small horses, much in fashion in Ben Jonson's time.

"No, have you such a one?" Carlo Buffone asked.

"The best in Europe, my good villain, thou shall say when thou see him," Fastidious Brisk said.

"Good villain" means "fine fellow," but in a condescending way.

"But when shall I see him?" Carlo Buffone asked.

Not answering the question, Fastidious Brisk said, "There was a nobleman in the court offered me one hundred pounds for him, I swear by this light of the day — the sun. A fine little fiery slave, he runs like a — oh, excellent, excellent! — with the very sound of the spur."

"What? The sound of the spur?" Carlo Buffone asked.

"Oh, it's your only humor now extant, sir," Fastidious Brisk said. "A good jingle, a good jingle."

Fastidious Brisk moved his feet and jingled his spurs.

Carlo Buffone said to Sogliardo, "By God's blood, you shall see him turn morris-dancer. He has got him bells, a good suit, and a hobby-horse."

The "bells" were his jingling spurs.

In some dances, the dancers wore a hobby-horse — a figure of a horse that was attached to their waist. It made a comic image since the dancer appeared to be on horseback. The hobby-horse's rear legs were the person's legs. "Hobby-horse" was also slang for "prostitute."

Morris-dance costumes included small bells attached to the clothing.

Morris-dances and hobby-horse capers were rural entertainments. A courtier such as Fastidious Brisk would look down on them as being unsophisticated entertainments.

Sogliardo said to Carlo Buffone, "Signor, now you talk of a hobby-horse, I know where one is, one who will not be given for a brace of angels."

A brace of angels is a pair of gold coins.

"What is that you are saying, sir?" Fastidious Brisk asked.

Sogliardo said, "By the Virgin Mary, sir, I am telling this gentleman about a hobby-horse. It was my father's, indeed, and though I say it —"

Carlo Buffone said to himself, "Who should not say it."

He then said, out loud, "Go on, go on."

Sogliardo continued, "— my father did dance in it with as good humor and as good regard and public approval as any man of his social rank whatsoever, being no gentleman. I have danced in it myself, too."

"Not since the humor of gentility was upon you, did you?" Carlo Buffone asked.

Gentlemen were unlikely to dance in a hobby-horse costume.

“Yes, once,” Sogliardo said. “By the Virgin Mary, that was but to show what a gentleman might don in a humor.”

“Oh, very good,” Carlo Buffone said.

Mitis said to Cordatus, “Why, this fellow’s discourse would be nothing if not for the word ‘humor.’”

The word “humor” was an in-vogue word, and some speakers vastly overused it.

“Oh, bear with him,” Cordatus said. “If he should lack matter, substance — and lack words, too — it would be pitiful.”

Sogliardo said, “Nay, look, sir, there’s not a gentleman in the country who has the like humors for the hobby-horse as I have. I have the method for the threading of the needle, the —”

“Threading the needle” was a dance move in the morris-dance. Possibly, two dancers made one big arch with their arms and the other dancers danced through the arch.

“What? The method?” Carlo Buffone said.

Sogliardo responded, “Aye, the legerity” — he meant “dexterity” — “for that, and the wehee” — neigh — “and the daggers in the nose, and the travels of the egg from finger to finger — all the humors necessary for a good performance.”

These are all dance moves and tricks of dexterity suitable for good dancers and performers.

Sogliardo continued, “The hobby-horse hangs at home in my parlor. I’ll keep it for a monument, as long as I live, to be sure.”

A monument is a memorial. Sogliardo would keep the hobby-horse as a memorial for long-times-past morris-dances.

“Do so, and when you die, it will be an excellent trophy to hang over your tomb,” Carlo Buffone said.

Roman trophies were such things as the weapons of a fallen enemy.

“By the Mass, and I’ll have a tomb, now I think on it,” Sogliardo said. “It is but so much expense.”

“Best build it in your lifetime, then; your heirs may happen to forget it if you don’t,” Carlo Buffone said.

“I mean to,” Sogliardo said. “I’ll not trust it to them.”

“No, for heirs and executors are grown damnably careless, especially since the ghosts of will-and-testament makers left off walking,” Carlo Buffone said.

Out of fear of where they would end up in the afterlife, wealthy people often made wills that would leave their descendants destitute, if followed. Their descendants found ways to get around such wills and inherit the deceased person’s wealth. The ghosts of the deceased wealthy people have stopped walking, perhaps because the wealthy people ought to take care of their descendants, and since the descendants are, in fact, taken care of, the ghosts can rest peacefully.

Also possibly, the ghosts had been in Purgatory, the place where souls — ghosts — purged their sins, according to Catholic doctrine. Since the idea of Purgatory was no longer current in Protestant England, Englishmen and Englishwomen no longer believed that ghosts walked in Purgatory.

Carlo Buffone said quietly to Fastidious Brisk, “How do you like him, signor?”

Fastidious Brisk said quietly back, “Before heavens, his humor arrides me exceedingly.”

Trying to avoid vulgar words — the words of commoners — Fastidious Brisk was Englishizing a Latin prefix and a Latin word: ad (to) and ridere (laugh). He meant arrides to mean “amuses.”

Carlo Buffone whispered to Fastidious Brisk, “‘Arrides’ you?”

In other words, his humor is to ride you?

Fastidious Brisk whispered back:

“Aye, pleases me.

Then, realizing that he had set himself up to be mocked, he said:

“A pox on it!

“I am so haunted at the court and at my lodging with your refined choice spirits that it makes me completely of another garb, another strain, I don’t know how.”

“Garb” is fashionable expression, and “strain” is an uncommon turn of phrase.

Poet John Milton used the words “garb” and “strain” to describe extravagant language.

Fastidious Brisk added quietly, “I cannot frame myself to your harsh vulgar phrase. It is against my genius.”

“Genius” can mean 1) natural inclination, 2) spirit, or 3) guardian angel.

Upset at being ignored, Sogliardo said, “Signor Carlo.”

He and Carlo Buffone talked together quietly.

Cordatus said to Mitis, “This is just like that sentence of Horace: Dum vitant stulti vitia in contraria currunt.”

The Latin means: “When fools avoid vices, they run into their opposites.”

Cordatus continued, “So this gallant, laboring to avoid vulgarity in his speech, falls into a habit of affectation ten thousand times more hateful than vulgar speech.”

In this case, the fool is Fastidious Brisk. The vice is vulgar speech, and in avoiding it, he uses the speech of courtiers to excess. Cordatus regarded such speech as ten thousand times more hateful than vulgar speech.

“Vulgar” contains the meaning of “common.” Vulgar speech is the speech of commoners: common people.

Carlo Buffone said quietly to Sogliardo about Fastidious Brisk:

“Who, he?”

“He is a gull, a fool. There is no salt — no wit and intelligence — in him in the earth, in the world, man. He looks like a fresh salmon kept in a tub, he’ll be spent — exhausted by spawning — shortly. His brain’s lighter than the feather in his cap already, and his tongue more subject to lie than the feather is to wag and flutter. He sleeps with a musk-cat every night, and walks all day hanged in pomander chains for penance.”

A musk-cat can be a container of musk or a prostitute or an animal such a civet or a musk deer that secretes musk.

Pomander chains are necklaces with hanging containers of perfume, but the bodies of some executed criminals were hung in chains and exposed to the view of the public.

Carlo Buffone continued speaking quietly to Sogliardo about Fastidious Brisk:

“He has his skin tanned in civet — preserved in perfume — to make his complexion youthful and the sweetness of his youth lasting in the sense of his sweet lady. A good empty puff, he loves and respects you well, signor.”

Puffs are libertines, often homosexual, or they are vainglorious boasters.

Sogliardo replied quietly, “There shall be no love lost, sir, I’ll assure you.”

Upset at being ignored by Carlo Buffone, Fastidious Brisk said, “Nay, Carlo, I am not fortunate enough to enjoy your love and friendship, I see. I am not favored by your attention. Please allow me to enjoy thy company a little, sweet mischief-maker. By this air, I shall envy this gentleman’s — Sogliardo’s — place in thy affections, if you are thus private, indeed.”

Cinedo, Fastidious Brisk’s boy-servant, entered the scene.

Fastidious Brisk asked, “How is it now? Has the knight arrived?”

“No, sir,” Cinedo said. “But it is guessed he will arrive soon, by his forerunners.”

Forerunners are servants sent ahead to announce a person’s imminent arrival, but in this case four-runners are also four-legged dogs that run ahead of a hunter.

“His hounds!” Fastidious Brisk said. “By Minerva, an excellent figure of speech, a good boy.”

Minerva is the Roman goddess of wisdom. Her Greek name is Athena.

Carlo Buffone said, “You should give him a French crown for it; the boy would find two better figures in that, and a good figure of your bounty beside.”

A French crown is 1) a coin with the head of King Henri IV of France on one side, and 2) baldness as a symptom of the French disease: syphilis.

“Figures” are 1) figures of speech, and 2) images of kings on coins.

“Tut, the boy wants no crowns,” Fastidious Brisk replied.

That is, he wants no tips.

“He wants no crown,” Carlo Buffone said.

That is, he wants no baldness caused by syphilis.

Carlo Buffone added, “Speak in the singular number, and we’ll believe you.”

“Figure,” the singular of “figures,” is a sum of money.

“Nay, thou are so capriciously conceited now,” Fastidious Brisk replied.

“Conceited” means 1) full of conceits, aka ideas and figures of speech, 2) fanciful, and 3) full of an overvaluation of yourself.

Fastidious Brisk then began saying to Carlo Buffone:

“Sirrah —”

Realizing that Carlo Buffone had made a joke at his expense about a French crown, he said to himself:

“Damnation!”

He then continued speaking out loud:

“I have heard this knight, Puntarvolo, reported to be a gentleman of exceedingly good humor. Thou know him; please tell me, what is his disposition? I never was so favored by my stars as to see him yet.”

He asked Cinedo:

“Boy, are you looking after the hobby horse?”

“Aye, sir, the groom has set him up and put him in a stall,” Cinedo replied.

Fastidious Brisk said, “It is well.”

Sogliardo talked quietly with Cinedo.

Fastidious Brisk said to Carlo Buffone, “I rode out of my way on purpose to visit him, and take knowledge of his — nay, good wickedness! — his humor, his humor.”

He was worried that Carlo would deliberately mistake his words as meaning that he had come here to take knowledge — have carnal knowledge — of the knight’s wife.

Carlo Buffone told Fastidious Brisk about the knight Puntarvolo: “Why, he loves dogs, and hawks, and his wife well. He has a good riding face, and he can sit on a great warhorse. He will taint — break — a staff well when tilting. When he is mounted, he looks like the sign of the George, that’s all I know, save that, instead of a dragon, he will brandish his sword against a tree, and break his heavy sword as confidently upon the knotty bark as the other did upon the scales of the beast.”

Having a good riding face can mean 1) Puntarvolo always looks in control of his horse, and/or 2) his wife likes to sit on his face.

The sign of the George is the sign of the St. George Inn. St. George is the patron saint of England, and one of his notable exploits was killing a dragon.

Fastidious Brisk said, “Oh, but this is nothing to what’s said about him. They say that he has dialogues and discourses between his horse, himself, and his dog, and that he will court his own lady as if she were a stranger he had never encountered before.”

Carlo Buffone replied, “Aye, that he will, and woo her anew every morning.”

He pointed to Sogliardo, who was talking quietly to Cinedo, and said, “This gentleman has been a spectator of it.”

He then said to Sogliardo, “Signor Insulso!”

In the middle of a conversation, Sogliardo said to Cinedo, “I am resolute to keep a page —”

He then said to Carlo Buffone, “What do you have to say, sir?”

“Have you seen Signor Puntarvolo woo his lady?” Carlo Buffone asked.

“Oh, aye, sir,” Sogliardo answered.

“And what is the manner of it? Please tell us, good signor,” Fastidious Brisk requested.

Sogliardo answered, “Indeed, sir, he woos her in a very high style. He has his humors for it, sir; as first, suppose he were now to come from riding or hunting or so, he has his trumpet to sound, and then the waiting-gentlewoman looks out, and then he speaks, and then she speaks. It is very pretty, indeed, gentlemen.”

“Do you remember any particulars, signor?” Fastidious Brisk asked.

“Oh, yes, sir,” Sogliardo said. “First, the gentlewoman looks out at the window.”

“After the trumpet has summoned a parle? Not before?” Carlo Buffone asked.

A parle is a talk by opposing parties before battle begins.

Sogliardo said, “No, sir, not before, and then he says —”

He had a fit of laughing.

“What does he say?” Carlo Buffone said. “Don’t be so amused.”

Sogliardo said, “He says —”

He continued to laugh.

“Nay, speak, speak,” Fastidious Brisk said.

“Ha, ha, ha — he says, ‘God save you’ — ha, ha!” Sogliardo said.

“Was this the ridiculous motive to all this passion?” Carlo Buffone asked.

In other words: Is this what you are laughing at?

“Nay, that, I am laughing at what comes after, is — ha, ha, ha, ha!” Sogliardo said.

Carlo Buffone said, “Doubtless he apprehends more than he utters, this fellow, or else —”

Hounds sounded.

“Listen! Listen!” Sogliardo said. “They are returning from hunting. Stand by, close under this terrace, and you shall see it done better than I can show it in words.”

“So it had need,” Carlo Buffone said. “It will scarcely poise — repay — the observation else.”

Watching the knight woo his wife must necessarily convey more information — and entertainment — than Sogliardo had been able to convey.

“Indeed, I remember it all, but the manner of it is quite out of my head,” Sogliardo said.

He remembered how entertaining the sight was, but he could not convey the details that made the sight entertaining.

“Oh, withdraw, withdraw!” Fastidious Brisk said. “It cannot be other than a most pleasing sight to watch.”

They moved away to watch Puntarvolo unobserved.

— 2.2 —

Puntarvolo and a huntsman with a horn entered the scene. They were accompanied by a greyhound. Puntarvolo was a knight who enjoyed hunting.

“Forester, give wind to thy horn,” Puntarvolo said.

The huntsman blew his horn.

“Enough!” Puntarvolo said. “By this time, the sound has touched the ears of the people enclosed in the castle.”

Puntarvolo did not have a castle as his dwelling. He was playing a role, as would soon become clear.

He then said to the huntsman, “Depart, leave the dog, and take with thee what thou have deserved, the horn, and thanks.”

Normally, the blower of the horn would deserve and get a monetary tip, but this blower had blown badly his horn. Or the blower had blown well the horn and the horn was his tip.

The huntsman exited.

“Aye, by the Virgin Mary, there’s some taste in this,” Carlo Buffone said. “This is worth savoring.”

“Isn’t it good?” Fastidious Brisk said.

The knight’s wife’s waiting-gentlewoman appeared at the window. The waiting-gentlewoman was a companion, not a common servant.

“Wait!” Puntarvolo said. “My eye has, on the instant, through the generous gift of the window, received the form of a nymph. I will step forward three paces, of the which I will barely retire one; and, after some little flexure — bending — of the knee, with an erected grace, I will greet her.”

“Erected grace” is a complimentary greeting after standing up from kneeling.

Readers may be forgiven for thinking of a different kind of erection.

Taking steps, he counted, “One, two, and three.”

He stepped back one step, knelt, and said, “Sweet lady, God save you.”

“No, indeed, I am only the waiting-gentlewoman,” she replied.

“He knew that before,” Carlo Buffone said.

“Pardon me,” Puntarvolo said. “Humanum est errare.”

The Latin means: “To err is human.”

Puntarvolo had erred in mistaking the serving-gentlewoman for the lady of the house.

Puntarvolo had taken three steps forward and one step back. His mistaking the serving-gentlewoman for the lady of the castle was his one step back.

A proverb stated: “To err (that is, to sin) is human, to repent (one’s sin) is divine, to persevere (in sinning) is diabolical.”

“He learned that from a Puritan,” Carlo Buffone said.

Puritans were thought to be hypocritical. A jest in Ben Jonson’s day was this: “A Puritan is such a one as loves God with all his soul but hates his neighbor with all his heart.”

Puntarvolo said:

“To achieve the richest perfection of compliment (which is the sundial — the measuring device — of the thought, and guided by the sun of your beauties) are required these three elements: the gnomon, the puntlios, and the superficies.

“The superficies is that which we call ‘place’; the puntlios, ‘circumstance’; and the gnomon, ‘ceremony.’

“In each of which, for a stranger to err, it is easy and easily done, and such am I.”

The gnomon is the rod of the sundial.

The punctilio are the gradations marked on the sundial’s circumference.

The superficies is the level surface of the sundial.

Carlo Buffone said, “True, not knowing her horizon, he must needs err, which I fear he knows too well.”

A horizon is a place in which Puntarvolo can err, aka wander. The woman’s horizon is her intelligence and knowledge. Her horizon is also the horizontal position in which Puntarvolo can have sex with her. Some religious people consider all sex, even sex between a husband and wife, to be sexual sin, aka sexual erring. This belief is considered a heresy by many religious leaders.

“What do you call the lord of the castle, sweet face?” Puntarvolo asked.

“The lord of the castle is a knight, sir: Signor Puntarvolo,” the waiting-gentlewoman said.

“Puntarvolo? Oh,” Puntarvolo said, still playing the role of a stranger.

“Now must he ruminare,” Carlo Buffone said.

“Does the wench know him all this while, then?” Fastidious Brisk asked.

“Oh, as well as you know me, man,” Carlo Buffone said. “Why, therein lies the syrup — the sweetness — of the jest. It’s a fully planned project, a designment of his own, a thing studied and rehearsed as ordinarily at his coming from hawking or hunting, like a jig after a play.”

“Aye, even like a jig, sir,” Sogliardo said.

Yes, the waiting-gentlewoman was part of the role-playing. Puntarvolo had written the lines she was saying.

“It is a most sumptuous and stately edifice,” Puntarvolo said. “How old is the knight, fair damsel?”

“Indeed, much about your years, sir,” the waiting-gentlewoman said. “He is approximately your age.”

“What temperament, or what stature, bears he?” Puntarvolo asked.

“He is approximately your height, and very near upon your temperament,” the waiting-gentlewoman answered.

Puntarvolo said, “My temperament is melancholy —”

“So is the dog’s, exactly,” Carlo Buffone said.

Dogs were proverbially melancholy.

Puntarvolo continued;

“— and melancholy does betoken constancy, chiefly in love.

“What are his endowments? Is he courteous? Is he courtly and chivalrous?”

“Oh, he is the most courteous knight upon God’s earth, sir,” the waiting-gentlewoman answered.

“Is he magnanimous?” Puntarvolo asked.

A magnanimous man is generous in his thoughts and actions.

“He is as magnanimous as the skin between your brows, sir,” the waiting-gentlewoman answered.

Having skin between the eyebrows — no unibrow — indicated magnanimity and honesty.

“Is he bountiful and charitable?” Puntarvolo asked.

Charity was a noble virtue.

“By God’s blood, Puntarvolo takes an inventory of his own good parts!” Carlo Buffone said.

Puntarvolo had written the waiting-gentlewoman’s lines, and those lines praised him.

“Bountiful? Aye, sir, I wish you should know it; the poor are served at his gate early and late, sir,” the waiting-gentlewoman answered.

“Is he learned?” Puntarvolo asked.

“Oh, aye, sir, he can speak the French and Italian,” the waiting-gentlewoman answered.

“Then, he is travelled?” Puntarvolo asked.

“Aye, indeed, he has been beyond-sea once or twice,” the waiting-gentlewoman answered.

“As far as Paris, to fetch over a fashion and come back again,” Carlo Buffone said.

A much more impressive journey would have been to the Holy Land.

“Is he religious?” Puntarvolo asked.

“Religious? I don’t know what you call religious, but he goes to church, I am sure,” the waiting-gentlewoman answered.

“By God’s eyelid, I think these answers should offend him,” Fastidious Brisk said.

Puntarvolo had traveled abroad only once or twice, and Fastidious Brisk thought that his religiousness was perhaps shown only by his going to church, although the waiting-gentlewoman had said that “the poor are served at his gate early and late.”

“Tut, no,” Carlo Buffone said. “He knows they are excellent, and to the capacity of her who speaks them.”

The serving-gentlewoman was playing a part, and these answers are either what she was ad-libbing or what Puntarvolo had written for her to say. In any case, Puntarvolo was happy with the answers.

“I wish that I could see his face,” Puntarvolo said.

“The waiting-gentlewoman should let down a mirror from the window at that word, and request him to look in it,” Carlo Buffone said.

“Doubtless, the gentleman is most exact and absolutely qualified,” Puntarvolo said. “Does the castle contain him? Is he inside the castle?”

“No, sir, he is away from home, but his lady is within,” the waiting-gentlewoman answered.

“His lady?” Puntarvolo said. “Is she beautiful? Splendidous? Brilliant and magnificent? And is she amiable?”

“Amiable” is derived from the Latin word for “love.” As used by Puntarvolo, “amiable” means “able to be loved.”

“Oh, Jesus, sir!” the waiting-gentlewoman said.

She may not have wanted to play a role in this game. Or her answer may have meant that she was unable to express his lady’s beauty.

“Please, dear nymph, entreat her beauties to shine on this side of the building,” Puntarvolo said.

The waiting-gentlewoman exited from the window.

Carlo Buffone said, “He wants his lady — his wife — to shine on this side of the building so that he may erect a new sundial of compliment, with his gnomons and his puntilios.”

Carlo was thinking of a different kind of erection than a literal sundial.

Fastidious Brisk said, “Nay, thou are such another man now; a man had necessarily walk uprightly before thee.”

“Uprightly” can mean 1) righteously, or 2) with an erection.

Carlo Buffone said, “By God’s heart, can any man walk more upright than he does? Look, look. It is as if he went about in a frame, or had a suit of wainscot on, and the dog watching him lest he should leap out of it.”

Puntarvolo had excellent posture. He was as stiffly upright as if he were being stretched on a rack or was wearing wood paneling as a suit of clothing.

“Oh, villain!” Fastidious Brisk said.

“Well, if ever I meet him in the city, I’ll have him jointed — pulled joint from joint so he can be roasted,” Carlo Buffone said. “Or else I’ll pawn him in Eastcheap among the butchers.”

Seeing some people coming, Fastidious Brisk said, “Peace! Quiet! Who are these people, Carlo?”

Sordido and his son, Fungoso, entered the scene.

Carlo Buffone, Fastidious Brisk, and Sogliardo continued to watch, unnoticed.

Sordido said to Fungoso, his son, “Yonder’s your godfather; do your duty to him, son.”

Fungoso’s godfather was Puntarvolo.

Fungoso took off his hat.

Sogliardo pointed to Sordido and said to Fastidious Brisk, “You ask who is this man, sir? He is a poor elder brother of mine, sir, a yeoman who may spend some seven or eight hundred pounds a year. That’s his son, my nephew, there.”

A yeoman was not a gentleman, but he could own much land and be wealthy.

Puntarvolo said, “You are not ill-come, neighbor Sordido, although I have not yet said well-come. What, my godson is grown a great proficient — an advanced scholar — by this time!”

“I hope he will grow to be great one day, sir,” Sordido said.

Wealthy yeomen could become gentlemen by such means as getting degrees in law.

“What does he study? The law?” Fastidious Brisk asked.

“Aye, sir, he is a gentleman, although his father is only a yeoman,” Sogliardo answered.

Some people, such as King James I at a later time, wanted only gentlemen to be admitted into law schools, but many yeomen got educations in law.

“What do you call your nephew, signor?” Carlo Buffone asked.

“By the Virgin Mary, his name is Fungoso,” Sogliardo answered.

The Italian fungo means “fungus.” A mushroom is a type of fungus.

Mushroom gentlemen are gentlemen who seemingly spring up overnight from humble origins.

“Fungoso?” Carlo Buffone said. “Oh, he looked somewhat like a sponge in that pinked doublet, I thought. Well, make much of him; I see he was never born to ride upon a mule.”

A doublet is a jacket. When a doublet is pinked, it has small holes through which a lining or a shirt with a contrasting color can be seen.

Judges and sergeants-at-law rode mules. Fungoso was so fantastically dressed that he wouldn't fit in a conservative occupation such as law.

The waiting-gentlewoman appeared again at the window and said, “My lady will come immediately, sir.”

“Oh, now, now,” Sogliardo said to his hidden companions.

Puntarvolo said to Sordido and Fungoso, “Stand by, retire yourselves a space.”

He then said to Fungoso, “Nay, please, don’t forget the use of your hat. The air is piercing.”

Because it was cold, Puntarvolo was giving Fungoso permission to put on his hat, which he had taken off to show respect to the knight, his godfather. This demonstrated magnanimity on Puntarvolo’s part.

Sordido and Fungoso withdrew to the side, and the lady — Puntarvolo’s wife — came to the window.

“What?” Fastidious Brisk said. “Won’t their presence prevail against the current of his humor?”

In other words, won’t Puntarvolo be too embarrassed to continue his role-play in the presence of Sordido and Fungoso?

“Oh, no, it’s a complete flood — a torrent — that washes away all before it,” Carlo Buffone said.

Puntarvolo said:

“What more than heavenly pulchritude is this?

“What storehouse or treasury of bliss?

“Dazzle, you organs to my optic sense,

“To view a creature of such eminence.

“Oh, I am planet-struck and in yonder sphere

“A brighter star than Venus does appear!”

“Planet-struck” meant “struck with awe due to the astrological influence of a planet.” In this case, the planet was his wife.

In Ben Jonson's society, the word "planet" could refer to the sun and to stars. Planets were believed to be embedded in spheres around the Earth.

"What! In verse?" Fastidious Brisk said.

"A poetic ecstasy, an ecstasy, man!" Carlo Buffone said.

"Is it your desire to speak with me, sir knight?" Puntarvolo's lady asked.

"He will tell you that soon," Carlo Buffone said. "Neither his brain nor his body are yet molded for an answer."

No real conversation would take place right now. Puntarvolo's brain was filled with ornate language, and his body was stiff with courtly dignity. Part of his body may soon be stiff with blood.

Puntarvolo said, "Most debonair, gracious, and luculent — brilliant — lady, I decline me as low as the basis of your altitude."

He bowed to her.

"Basis" and "altitude" were terms used in geometry.

Cordatus said, "He makes congees — ceremonious bows — to his wife in geometrical proportions."

By "geometrical proportions," he meant "angular movements."

"Is it possible there should be any such humorist?" Mitis asked.

"Very easily possible, sir," Cordatus answered. "You see there is. Just look in front of you."

Puntarvolo said:

“I have scarcely collected my spirits, which were just now scattered — dazzled and confused — in the admiration of your form; to which, if the bounties of your mind be in any way responsive, I don’t doubt that my desires shall find a smooth and secure passage.”

“Desires”? “Smooth and secure passage”? Hmm. Later, he (and his wife) will talk about “entrance” to the “castle.” These words sound sexual. Role-play can be very sexual, indeed.

Puntarvolo continued:

“I am a poor knight-errant, lady, who, hunting in the adjacent forest, was by adventure in the pursuit of a hart — a female deer — brought to this place; which hart, dear madam, escaped by enchantment.”

The hart could be the waiting-gentlewoman, whom Puntarvolo had complimented with the excuse that he thought she was the lady of the castle.

Puntarvolo continued:

“The evening approaching, I myself and my servant wearied, my suit is to enter your fair castle and refresh myself.”

Puntarvolo’s lady responded:

“Sir knight, although it is not usual with me, chiefly in the absence of a husband, to admit any entrance to strangers, yet in the true regard of those innate virtues and fair parts that so strive to express themselves in you, I am resolved to entertain you to the best of my unworthy power, which I acknowledge to be nothing when compared to the value that so worthy a person as you may deserve.

“May it please you to wait while I descend.”

“Most admired lady, you astonish me,” Puntarvolo said.

She and her waiting-gentlewoman exited from the window, and Puntarvolo joined Sordido and his son: Fungoso.

“What!” Carlo Buffone said. “She astonishes you by speaking a speech of your own penning?”

“Nay, look!” Fastidious Brisk said. “Please, peace. Please, be silent.”

“A pox on it,” Carlo Buffone said. “I am impatient of such foppery.”

“Oh, let’s hear the rest,” Fastidious Brisk said.

Carlo Buffone said:

“What! Hear a tedious ACT of courtship, after Sir Lancelot and Queen Guinevere?”

Sir Lancelot and Queen Guinevere committed adultery, and so Queen Guinevere cuckolded her husband: King Arthur. Similarly, in this role play, Puntarvolo’s wife was on the verge of committing adultery with a “stranger,” and so she was “cuckolding” her husband: Puntarvolo.

“Leave! I marvel in what dull cold nook he found this lady out, that, being a woman, she was blessed with no more abundance of wit but to serve his humor thus. By God’s blood, I think he feeds her with porridge, aye; otherwise, she could never have such a thick brain.”

“Why, is porridge so hurtful, signor?” Sogliardo asked.

Carlo Buffone jested — or perhaps he believed — that thick porridge produces thick wits:

“Oh, there is nothing under heaven more prejudicial to those ascending subtle powers. There is nothing under heaven that does sooner abate that which we call acumen ingenii [acuteness of mental powers], than gross fare [food].

“Why, I’ll give you an example: Your city wives, just observe them.

“You haven’t more perfect true fools in the world bred than they are generally; and yet you see, by the fineness and delicacy of their diet — diving into the fat capons, drinking rich wines, feeding on larks, sparrows, potato-pies, and such good unctuous, fatty meats — how their wits are refined and rarefied; and sometimes a very quintessence of conceit flows from them, able to drown a weak intellect.”

Larks, sparrows, and potato-pies were considered aphrodisiacs.

City wives were fools, but because of their rich diet — no porridge for them! — they were able to outwit those country folk who ate porridge.

“Silence! Here comes the lady,” Fastidious Brisk said.

Puntarvolo’s lady and her waiting-gentlewoman entered the scene.

Seeing Carlo Buffone, Fastidious Brisk, and Sogliardo, Puntarvolo’s lady said, “God save me, here’s company! Go back inside!”

She and her waiting-gentlewoman exited.

“By God’s light, our presence has cut off the action of the jest,” Fastidious Brisk said.

“All the better,” Carlo Buffone said. “I am glad about it, for the outcome was very perspicuous: It was easy to foresee. Come, let’s reveal our presence and greet the knight.”

Carlo Buffone, Fastidious Brisk, and Sogliardo stepped forward and went over to Puntarvolo.

Puntarvolo said:

“Wait, who are these men who address themselves towards us?”

“What! Carlo! Now by the sincerity of my soul, welcome!”

He then said to Fastidious Brisk and Sogliardo:

“Welcome, gentlemen.”

He then asked Carlo Buffone:

“And how do thou, thou grand scourge, or second untruss of the time?”

Satirists are known for scourging — whipping — those who need it. To “untruss” is to undress; for example, to make bare someone’s back in preparation for a whipping. As a noun, an untruss is literally someone who prepares someone’s back for a whipping. Figuratively, an untruss is a satirist.

The first British untruss may have been John Marston, author of The Scourge of Villainy.

Carlo Buffone said:

“Indeed, I am spending my metal and mettle in this reeling, tottering world, here and there, as the sway of my feelings carries me.”

“Metal” is metal coins, and “mettle” is natural vigor. To “spend one’s mettle” is to ejaculate.

“And perhaps I stumble upon a yeoman fewterer, as I do now.”

A “yeoman fewterer” is a dog-keeper. Puntarvolo was still holding his dog’s leash.

Puntarvolo was a knight, but by holding his dog's leash instead of having a servant do that, he was acting like a yeoman fewterer.

“Or perhaps I stumble on one of fortune's mules laden with treasure, and an empty cloak-bag following him, opening his mouth wide when a bag will untie.”

Sogliardo and Sordido were fortune's mules laden with treasure, and Fastidious Brisk and Fungoso were the empty cloak-bags following them, and they, like Carlo Buffone, were hoping to acquire some of these fortune's mules' wealth.

In particular, Fungoso would soon be asking his father, Sordido, for money with which to buy expensive clothing. Fastidious Brisk was a courtier who also wished to borrow money so that he could buy expensive clothing, although he borrowed money from someone other than Sogliardo and Sordido.

Actually, Carlo Buffone was following Sogliardo in order to make fun of him.

Puntarvolo said, “Silence, you bandog, peace!”

A “bandog” is 1) a mean dog that is kept tied up, 2) a fierce dog used in bear-baiting, or 3) figuratively, a savage satirist.

Pointing to Fastidious Brisk, Puntarvolo said, “What brisk nymphodoro is that in the white virgin boot there?”

Fastidious Brisk was fashionably dressed.

A nymphodoro is an effeminate courtier.

Carlo Buffone said, “By the Virgin Mary, sir, he is one whom I must entreat you to take a very particular knowledge of, and with more than ordinary respect: This is Monsieur Fastidious.”

Puntarvolo said to Fastidious Brisk, “Sir, I could wish that for the time of your vouchsafed abiding — your deigning to visit me — here, and for your more ample entertainment, that this my house stood on the Muses’ hill — Mount Parnassus — and that these my orchards were those of the Hesperides.”

The garden of the Hesperides contained trees that grew golden apples.

“I possess as much in your wish, sir, as if I were made lord of the Indies, and I pray that you believe it,” Fastidious Brisk said.

Carlo Buffone said to himself about these flattering words, “I have a better opinion of his faith than to think it will be so corrupted. I do not think that Puntarvolo will be taken in by Fastidious Brisk’s words.”

Sogliardo said to Sordido, “Come, brother, I’ll make you acquainted with gentlemen and good fellows, such as shall do you more grace than —”

Sordido interrupted, “— brother, I don’t hunger for such acquaintance.”

He did not want to know these people.

Carlo Buffone came toward them.

Sordido said, “Take heed, lest —”

Sogliardo interrupted, “— hush!”

He then said to Carlo Buffone, “This is my brother, sir, for lack of education, sir, somewhat nodding to the boor, the clown.”

“Nodding to” means “inclining toward.”

A “noddy” is a fool.

“But I request to speak to you in private, sir,” Sogliardo said to Carlo Buffone.

Sogliardo and Carlo Buffone talked quietly together.

Looking at Fastidious Brisk, Fungoso said to himself, “By Jesus, it’s a very fine suit of clothes.”

Cordatus said, “Do you observe that, signor? There’s another humor that has newly cracked the shell and sprung into existence.”

Fungoso’s humor was an obsession with fashionable clothing.

“What?” Mitis said. “He is enamored of the fashion, is he?”

“Oh, you anticipate the jest,” Cordatus said.

Fastidious Brisk and Puntarvolo talked together quietly.

Fungoso said to himself, “I wonder what such clothing might cost him.”

Sogliardo said to Fungoso, “Nephew?”

Still engrossed in his thoughts, Fungoso said to himself, “Before God, it’s an excellent suit, and as neatly becomes him.”

He then asked, “What did you say, uncle?”

“When did you see my niece?” Sogliardo asked.

His niece was Fungoso’s married sister, Fallace, who was living in London.

“By the Virgin Mary, yesterday I supped there,” Fungoso said.

He then said to himself about Fastidious Brisk's boots, "That kind of boot is very splendid, too."

"And what news did you hear?" Sogliardo asked.

Fungoso said to himself, "The gilt spur and all. I wish I would be hanged, if it isn't exceedingly good."

He then asked his uncle, "What did you say?"

"Your mind is carried away with something else," Sogliardo said. "I asked you what news did you hear."

"Indeed, we heard none," Fungoso said.

He then said to himself, "In good faith, I was never so pleased with a fashion, in all the days of my life. Oh, if I might have but my wish, I'd ask no more of God now but such a suit, such a hat, such a flat linen collar, such a doublet, such a hose, such a boot, and such a —"

Sogliardo said, "They say there's a new puppet-show about the city of Nineveh, with Jonah and the whale, to be seen at Fleet Bridge. You can tell me about it, nephew?"

Fungoso said to himself, "Here's such a world of questions with him now! He is asking so many questions!"

He then said to his uncle, "Yes, I think there is such a thing. I saw the advertisement."

He said to himself, "I wish he would once be satisfied! Let me see, the doublet, say, fifty shillings the doublet, and between three or four pounds the hose. Then boots, the hat, and band. Some ten or eleven pounds would do it all and suit me for the heavens!"

A band is a linen collar that is worn under a ruff.

The heavens were high: on the underside of the roof over the stage. Fashionable gentlemen were seated in the higher seats in the theater.

“I’ll see all those devices, if I come to London once,” Sogliardo said.

The devices were puppet-shows.

Fungoso said to himself, “By God’s eyelid, if I could acquire such clothing, it would be splendid.”

He then said out loud, “Listen, uncle.”

“What does my nephew say to me?” Sogliardo asked.

Fungoso said:

“Indeed, uncle, I’d have desired you to have made a motion — proposal — for me to my father in a thing, that — walk aside and I’ll tell you, sir — is no more than this:

“There’s a parcel of law books, some twenty pounds’ worth, that lie in a bookshop and sell for little more than half the money they cost, and I think for some twelve pounds or twenty marks I could go near to purchase them.

“There are books by Plowden, Dyer, Brooke, and Fitzherbert, and other eminent jurists and legal authors such as I must have before long; and you know I might as well save five or six pounds as not, uncle. Please, propose such a purchase to him for me.”

“That I will,” Sogliardo said. “When would you have me do it? Immediately?”

“Oh, aye, please, good uncle,” Fungoso said.

Sogliardo left to talk to Sordido.

“God send me good luck!” Fungoso said to himself. “Lord, if it is thy will, prosper it. Oh, Jesus, now, now, if my plan to get money for new clothes works — oh, Christ — I am made forever!”

Fastidious Brisk said to Puntarvolo, who had asked if he had found favor with a certain lord, “Shall I tell you, sir, by this air, I am the most indebted to that lord of any gentleman living. He does treat me the most honorably, and with the greatest respect, more indeed than can be uttered with any opinion of truth.”

“... more indeed than can be uttered with any opinion of truth”? Hmm. Sounds like Fastidious Brisk knows that he is lying.

“So then, you do know the Count Gratiato?” Puntarvolo said.

Fastidious Brisk replied:

“He is as truly noble a gentleman, too, as any gentleman who breathes. I am exceedingly endeared to his love. By Jesus, I protest to you, signor, I speak it not vaingloriously nor out of affectation, but there’s he, and the Count Frugale, Signor Illustre, Signor Luculento, and a group of them, who, when I am at the court, they share me among them.

“Happy is he who can enjoy me most privately. I do wish myself sometime an ubiquitous — that is, someone who can be everywhere — for their love, in good faith.”

“Happy is he who can enjoy me most privately”? Hmm. Sounds like a homosexual subtext there.

Hearing him speak, Carlo Buffone said to himself, “There’s never a one of these gentlemen but might lie a week on the rack, before they could bring forth his name, and yet he pours them out as familiarly as if he had seen them stand by the fire in the royal presence chamber, aka reception room, or taken tobacco with them over the stage in the lords' room."

The rack is an instrument of torture: one that stretches one's limbs painfully. Carlo Buffone guessed that influential people could be tortured for a week on the rack without remembering Fastidious Brisk's name, although Fastidious tried to make it sound as if he knew well these people of influence.

A place by the fire is a privileged place because it is warm.

The lords' room in the theater is where Fungoso has said that he would like to sit and smoke once he has new clothing.

Puntarvolo said, "Then you must of necessity know our court-star there, that planet of wit, Madonna Saviolina?"

"Oh, Lord, sir, she is my mistress!" Fastidious Brisk said.

A mistress is a woman whom a man admires and who returns that admiration. In this context, the word "mistress" does not necessarily imply sexual intercourse.

"Is she really your mistress?" Puntarvolo asked.

Good question.

Fastidious Brisk answered:

"Indeed, here are some slight favors — tokens of friendship or love — of hers, sir, that announce that she is: such as this scarf, sir, or this ribbon in my ear, or so."

Audiologists sometimes remove long "ribbons" of dead skin and ear wax from ear canals.

Fastidious Brisk continued:

“This feather grew in her sweet fan sometimes, though now it is my poor fortunes to wear it as you see, sir — slight, slight, a foolish toy.”

“Well, she is the lady of a most exalted and ingenious spirit,” Puntarvolo said.

“Did you ever hear any woman speak like her?” Fastidious Brisk asked. “Or any woman so enriched with a more plentiful discourse?”

A woman with a plentiful discourse is a talkative woman.

Carlo Buffone said, “Oh, villainous! Nothing but sound, sound, a mere echo. She speaks as if she goes attired in cobweb lawn, light, thin — good enough to catch flies with.”

Cobweb lawn is flimsy, transparent linen.

According to Fastidious Brisk, Madonna Saviolina spoke at length.

According to Carlo Buffone, Madonna Saviolina had nothing to say.

Also according to Carlo Buffone, Madonna Saviolina’s conversation was good enough to attract flatterers such as Fastidious Brisk.

“Oh, manage your affections!” Puntarvolo said to Carlo Buffone. “Restrain your outbursts of feelings!”

He did not want to hear insults directed toward Madonna Saviolina.

He was chivalrous that way.

Fastidious Brisk said to Carlo Buffone, “Well, if thou are not plagued for this blasphemy one day —”

“Come, don’t pay attention to a jester,” Puntarvolo said. “It is in the power of my purse to make him speak well or ill of me.”

Fastidious Brisk said, “Sir, I affirm it to you, upon my credit and judgment, that Madonna Saviolina has the most harmonious and musical strain of wit that ever tested a true ear; and yet we see here that a rude tongue will profane heaven.”

It was Carl Buffone’s tongue that would profane heaven.

“I am not ignorant of it, sir,” Puntarvolo said.

Fastidious Brisk said, “Oh, wit flows from her like nectar, and she does give it that sweet, quick grace and exornation — rhetorical embellishment — in the composition that, by this good heaven, she observes as pure a phrase and use as choice figures of speech in her ordinary conversations as any that appear in the Arcadia.”

Arcadia is a pastoral romance by Sir Philip Sidney.

Carlo Buffone said, “Or rather in Greene’s works, from which she may steal with more security.”

Robert Greene was less admired and less read in intellectual circles than Sir Philip Sidney. Therefore, Madonna Saviolina could plagiarize Greene’s witticisms with less chance of being caught out than if she were to plagiarize Sir Philip Sidney’s witticisms.

Sordido said to Fungoso, “Well, if ten pounds will fetch the law books, you shall have the money, but I’ll part with no more.”

“I’ll try what that will do, if you please,” Fungoso said.

“Do so, and when you have the books, study hard,” Sordido said.

“Yes, sir,” Fungoso said.

He then said to himself, “If I could find a way to get forty shillings more now! Well, I will put myself into the fashion, as far as this money will go, immediately.”

“I wonder that it doesn’t rain!” Sordido said. “The almanac says we should have a store of rain today.”

Puntarvolo said to Fastidious Brisk, “Why, sir, tomorrow I will associate” — he meant “accompany” — “you to the court myself, and from thence to the city about a business, a project I have. I will expose” — he meant “explain” — “it to you, sir. I am sure that Carlo has heard of it.”

“What’s that, sir?” Carlo Buffone said.

Puntarvolo answered:

“I do intend, this year of jubilee, to travel; and because I will not altogether go at my own expense, I am determined to put forth some five thousand pounds to be paid me five for one, upon the return of myself, my wife, and my dog from the Turk’s court in Constantinople.”

Many people in a year of jubilee would travel to the Holy Land.

The Turk was the Ottoman Sultan.

Puntarvolo continued:

“If all or either of us miscarry in the journey, it is gone; if we should be successful, why, there will be twenty-five thousand pounds to entertain time with.”

Sordido started to leave.

Puntarvolo said:

“Nay, don’t go, neighbor Sordido.

“Stay tonight and help to make our society the fuller. Gentlemen, frolic and have fun.”

A traveler could bet that he could return from a hazardous journey within a certain time; others could bet that he would not be able to do it. The traveler would have to provide evidence that he had successfully reached his destination.

Puntarvolo’s bet was unusual in that it included the safe return of his dog.

“Carlo?” Puntarvolo said. “What? Dull now? Nothing to say?”

“I was thinking on your project, sir, if you call it so,” Carlo Buffone replied. “Is this the dog that will go with you?”

“This is the dog, sir,” Puntarvolo said.

“He doesn’t go barefoot, does he?” Carlo Buffone asked.

Silly question.

“Go away, you traitor — you rascal — go away,” Puntarvolo said.

Carlo Buffone said:

“Nay, before God, I speak sincerely. He may prick his foot with a thorn and be as much as the whole venture is worth.”

If the dog does not return safely, then Puntarvolo loses his wager. The dog could die of natural causes. But also, rather than lose their bets, the people who bet against him may try to kill his dog.

“Besides, for a dog that never travelled before, it’s a huge journey to Constantinople. I’ll tell you now, if he were mine, I’d have some immediate conversation with a physician, what antidotes would be good to give him, and preservatives against poison, for I assure you, if once your money is put down for the wager, there'll be diverse attempts made against the life of the poor animal."

"Thou are always negative," Puntarvolo said.

Fastidious Brisk said to Sogliardo, "Is Signor Deliro's wife your kinswoman?"

"Aye, sir, she is my niece, my brother's daughter here, and my nephew's sister," Sogliardo replied.

"Do you know her, sir?" Sordido asked Fastidious Brisk.

"Oh, God, sir, Signor Deliro, her husband, is my merchant," Fastidious Brisk replied.

Merchants were often also money-lenders — that is, usurers.

Fungoso pointed to Fastidious Brisk and said to Sordido, "Aye, I have seen this gentleman there often."

"I beg your mercy, sir," Fastidious Brisk said. "Let me ask you what is your name, please."

"I am Fungoso, sir," he answered.

"Good Signor Fungoso, I shall request to know you better, sir," Fastidious Brisk said.

"I am her brother, sir," Fungoso said.

"In fair time, sir," Fastidious Brisk said.

This greeting meant something like "We are well met" or "It is good to meet you."

"Come, gentlemen, I will be your guide," Puntarvolo said. "I will lead you there."

They started to exit.

Fastidious Brisk said to Fungoso, “Nay, please, you go first, sir.”

People would exit in order of social prominence. Fungoso, who admired Fastidious Brisk’s clothing, wanted to allow him to exit first, but Fastidious, flattering Fungoso, insisted on Fungoso exiting first.

Fastidious Brisk said to Fungoso, “We shall meet at Signor Deliro’s often.”

Sogliardo said, “You shall find me at the heralds’ office, sir, for a week or so, at my first coming up to London.”

He then said, “Come, Carlo.”

They exited.

Mitis said, “I think, Cordatus, he — Asper the playwright — dwelt somewhat too long on this scene; it hung in the hand.”

Like a hand dragging a weight hung on a string, this scene dragged on.

Cordatus said, “I don’t see where he could have settled for less, and still have made the humors perspicuous — easily understood — enough.”

In other words, the scene needed to be long in order to competently develop the characters and their humors.

Mitis replied, “True, as his satire of humors lies; but he might have altered the shape of the plot and explicated the characters and their humors better in single scenes rather than in one long scene.”

“That had been single — singular — indeed,” Cordatus said. “Why, aren’t they the same persons in this one long scene as they would have been in those shorter scenes? And isn’t it an object of more flowering, flourishing state to behold the scene full of characters, and furnished with a variety of speakers to the end, than to see a vast empty stage and the actors come in one by one, as if they were dropped down with a feather into the eye of the audience?"

In Ben Jonson's society, feathers were used as eyedroppers to drop small amounts of liquid onto an eye.

Mitis said, "You are better acquainted with these things than I, and therefore I'll submit to your judgment."

He added that he still wanted to make criticisms of the play: "By the Virgin Mary, you shall give me permission to make objections."

"Oh, what else?" Cordatus said. "It's the special intention of the author that you should do so, for thereby others who are present — that is, the members of the audience — may as well be satisfied who perhaps would happily object the same as you do."

Mitis asked, "That is so, sir, but when does Macilente appear again?"

Macilente, Deliro, and Fido entered. Fido was carrying flowers, herbs, and incense. Fido was Deliro and Fallace's boy-servant. Deliro was married to Fallace.

Cordatus said:

"By the Virgin Mary, he waited just until our silence gave him an opportunity to appear again. Here he comes, and with him Signor Deliro, a merchant, at whose house he has come to sojourn.

"Make your own observation now, only transfer your thoughts to the city with the scene change, where you may suppose they speak."

This scene was set in the backyard of Deliro's house in London.

Deliro said to a client just off-stage, "I'll tell you by and by, sir."

He then said, "Welcome, good Macilente, to my house to sojourn even forever, if my best in delicate, choice foods and every sort of good entreaty may persuade you to stay with me."

Deliro turned to his serving-boy, Fido, and signaled, and Fido began strewing the flowers on the ground to act as air fresheners to please Deliro's wife.

"I thank you, sir," Macilente replied.

He then said to himself:

"And yet the muffled — inscrutable — Fates, had it pleased them, might have supplied me from their own full store without this utterance, 'I thank you,' to a fool.

"I see no reason why that dog called Chance should fawn upon this fellow more than me. I am a man, and I have limbs, flesh, blood, bones, sinews, and a soul as well as he."

Chance is Old Lady Chance, aka Lady Fortune.

He continued:

"My parts are in every way as good as his. If I would have said that my parts are better, why, I would not have lied.

"Nonetheless, his wealth, simply nodding with casual generosity on my wants, must make me bow and cry, 'I thank you, sir.'"

Deliro said to Fido, “Hurry. Take heed your mistress doesn’t see you.”

This kind of mistress is a female boss.

“I promise you, she won’t see me, sir,” Fido said as he exited.

All that they had done to perfume the air was done to prepare for the arrival of Deliro’s wife.

Deliro said, “Nay, gentle, distinguished friend, be merry, raise your looks out of your bosom. I protest, by heaven, that you are the man most welcome in the world.”

“I thank you, sir,” Macilente replied.

He said to himself, “I know my cue, I think!”

Fido returned with two censers. Censers are incense-burners. Burning incense and herbs sweetened the air.

“Where will you have them burn, sir?” Fido asked.

“Here, good Fido,” Deliro said. “What? She did not see thee?”

“No, sir,” Fido said.

“That’s well,” Deliro said. “Strew, strew, good Fido, the freshest flowers. Good.”

“What does this mean, Signor Deliro?” Macilente asked.

Deliro said to Fido, “Cast in more frankincense. Yet more. Well done.”

He then answered Macilente, “Oh, Macilente, I have such a wife, so surpassingly beautiful, so passing-fair — superbly — unkind, and of such worth and right to be unkind, since no man can be worthy of her kindness.”

He adored his wife.

In Ben Jonson's society, wives were supposed to be kind — affectionate and submissive — to their husbands. Deliro's wife was not kind to him.

“What, no man is worthy of her?” Macilente said.

Deliro said:

“No, that is sure as death; no man alive is worthy of her. I do not say ‘is not’ but instead I say ‘cannot possibly be worth’ her kindness.

“Nay, that is certain; let me do her right.

“What did I say? ‘Do her right’?”

“As though I could! As though this dull gross tongue of mine could utter the rare, the true, the pure, the infinite rights that sit, as high as I can look, within her.”

“This is such dotage as was never heard,” Macilente said.

Dotage can mean 1) infatuation, and 2) foolishness.

“Well, what I have said about my wife must necessarily be granted to be true,” Deliro said.

“Must be granted, did you say?” Macilente asked.

Deliro replied:

“Nay, Macilente, do not so discredit the goodness of your judgment to deny it, for I speak the very least of her.”

“I speak the very least of her” is ambiguous. It can mean, “The praise I give her does not come close to what she deserves.” Or it can mean, “Although I praise her, you can tell that she does not deserve any of that praise.”

Deliro continued:

“And I would crave and beg no more of heaven, for all my fortunes here, but to be able to utter first, in fit terms, what she is, and then the true joys I conceive in her.”

Chances are, Deliro wanted to have children with her. He certainly wanted the sexual rights of a husband.

“Is it possible she should deserve as well as you pretend?” Macilente asked.

“Pretend” can mean 1) profess, and/or 2) assert without evidence or belief.

Deliro replied:

“Aye, and she knows so well her own value that, when I strive to enjoy it” — as a husband, he could, or was supposed to, enjoy his wife, including sexually — “she weighs the things I do with what she merits and deserves, and, seeing my worth outweighed so in her graces, she is so formal, so scrupulous, so hard to please and headstrong that no courteous attention I can give to her can make her kind to me. If she finds fault, I mend that fault, and then she says I faulted in that I did mend it.

“Now, good friend, advise me how I may temper — lessen and control — this strange spleen in her.”

Macilente answered:

“You are too amorous and fond of her, too obsequious, and you make her too assured she may command you.

“When women doubt most of their husband’s loves, they are the most loving. Husbands must take heed that they give no gluts of kindness to their wives, but treat them like their horses, whom they feed not with a manger-full of meat — food — together, but half a peck at a time, and keep them so always with an appetite to that which they give them.”

Macilente believed that husbands can be too subservient to their wives.

He also believed that wives ought to be like horses: legal possessions.

He was also talking about sex. The word “meat” can refer to a penis, and the word “appetite” can refer to sexual appetite. But it seems unlikely that Deliro’s wife ever had sex with him, at least not recently.

Macilente continued:

“He who desires to have a loving wife must bridle and check all the show of that desire. Be kind, not amorous. Do not reveal kindness as if love wrought it, but act out of considerate and deliberate legal and moral duty and obligation.

Macilente advised that Deliro act out of reason, not love-passion.

Macilente quoted a maxim:

“Offer no love-rites, but let wives still [always] seek them,

“For when they come unsought, they seldom like them.”

Deliro said:

“Believe me, Macilente, this is gospel.

“Oh, that a man were his own man so much to rule himself thus! I will strive, in faith, to be more strange and careless — distant and emotionally uninvolved; yet I hope that I have now taken such a perfect course to make her kind to me and live contented that I shall find my kindness well returned and have no need to fight with my affections.

“She lately has found much fault with every room within my house. One was too big, she said. Another was not furnished to her liking, and so through all the rooms in my house. All of which rooms I have altered.

“Then here she has a place, on my back side, wherein she loves to walk, and that, she said, had some ill smells about it.”

Deliro’s back side is 1) Deliro’s backyard or back garden, or 2) Deliro’s backside, aka butt. Backsides can at times have ill smells.

Deliro continued:

“Now this walk have I, before she knows it, thus perfumed with herbs and flowers, and laid in diverse places, as it were on altars consecrated — dedicated — to her, perfumed gloves and delicate necklaces of amber to keep the air in awe of her sweet nostrils.”

Perfumed gloves and delicate amber necklaces were popular lovers’ gifts.

Deliro was mistaken about amber (fossilized resin), which does not have a scent unless it is heated.

Deliro continued:

“This I have done, and this I think will please her.

“Look, she is coming.”

Fallace, Deliro’s wife, entered the scene.

She complained:

“Here’s a sweet stink indeed!

“What, shall I always be thus crossed by and plagued by and sick of my husband? Oh, my head aches, as if it would be split in two with these savors and smells!

“All my rooms are altered, and just one poor walk that I delighted in, and that is made so fulsome and cloying with perfumes that I am afraid — my brain does sweat so! — that I have caught the plague.”

“Why, gentle wife, is now thy walk too sweet-sweeting?” Deliro said. “Thou said recently it had sour airs about it, and thou found much fault that I did not correct it.”

“What if I did find fault, sir?” Fallace said.

“Nay, dear wife,” Deliro said. “I know thou have said thou have loved perfumes, and no woman better loves them than thee.”

Fallace said:

“Aye, long ago, perhaps, but now that sense has changed.”

“You want me, like a puddle or a standing, stagnant pool, to have no motion nor no spirit within me.

“No, I am like a pure and sprightly quickly flowing river that moves forever, and yet is always the same, or fire that burns much wood, yet is always one flame.”

The Greek philosopher Heraclitus said that you can’t step into the same river twice because it is constantly changing.

“Only yesterday, I saw thee at our garden smelling roses and purple flowers,” Deliro said. “And since then, I hope, the humor of thy sense has not at all changed.”

“Why, those were growing flowers, and these within my walk are cut and strewed,” Fallace said.

“But yet they have one and the same scent,” Deliro said.

Fallace asked:

“Is that really true?”

She answered her own question:

“In your gross judgment.

“If you make no difference between the scent of growing flowers and cut ones, you have a sense to taste lamp-oil, truly.”

She was accusing him of being insensitive: The only thing he could smell was something strong such as lamp-oil. Also, she was saying that if that was what his sense of smell was like, he must think that lamp-oil smells good and he would like to taste it.

Fallace continued:

“And with such judgment you have changed the chambers, leaving no room that I can feel joy to be in, in all your house; and now my walk and all you smoke me from, as if I were a fox, and you long, it is likely, to drive me quite away.”

Hunters used smoke to drive a fox from its lair.

Fallace continued:

“Well, you walk there, and I’ll walk where I wish.”

“What shall I do?” Deliro said. “Oh, I shall never please her.”

Macilente said to himself:

“Get out of here, you dotard!

“What star — astrological influence — ruled his birth that brought him such a star — such a beautiful woman? Blind Fortune always bestows her gifts on such as cannot use them.

“How long shall I live before I am so happy to have a wife of this surpassing body shape?”

Deliro said to Fido:

“Take these things away! I wish I had broken a joint when I thought up this that should so displease her.

“Away, carry everything away!”

Fido carried the gloves, censers, and other love-tokens away as he exited.

Fallace said:

“Aye, do, for fear anything that is there should please her — by whom I mean me.

“Oh, this man, how cunningly he can conceal himself and make it seem as though he loved! Loved? Nay, honored and adored!”

“Why do you say that, my sweetheart?” Deliro asked.

Fallace said:

“Sweetheart? Oh, better still!

“And asking, ‘Why? Wherefore?’ And looking strangely, as if he were as white as innocence.

“Alas, you’re simple and unsophisticated, you. You cannot change, look pale at your pleasure — when you please — and then look red with wonder.

“No, no, not you.

“I did but cast an admiring eye even now upon a pair of gloves that I somewhat liked, and immediately he noted it, and gave the command that all should be taken away.”

“May those gloves be my bane, my poison, then, if they are taken away,” Deliro said.

He called, “What! Sirrah! Fido!”

Fido returned.

Deliro ordered, “Bring in those gloves again you took away from here.”

Fallace said to Fido, “By God’s body, sirrah, do not do that. Bring in no gloves to spite me. If you do —”

Fido exited.

“My lot in life is sorrow!” Deliro said. “I am very wretched. How my wife misinterprets me!”

Macilente said to himself:

“Oh, how she tempts my heartstrings with her eye, to knit them to her beauties, or to break!

“What moved the heavens that they could not make me such a woman, but made me a man, a beast, who has no bliss like to others?

“I wish to God, in revenge for my misfortunes, that I would be turned into some fair water-nymph, so that, set upon the deepest whirlpool of the ravenous seas, my adamant — magnetic — eyes might headlong hale this iron world to me, and drown it all.”

Macilente knew that Fallace was a beautiful woman, but he envied more her power: She bossed her husband.

In mythology, the iron age is the last and most evil age. The first and best age is the golden age.

To a savage satirist, the present age is always the iron age.

Fungoso entered the scene. He was wearing a replica of the suit of clothing that Fastidious Brisk had been wearing earlier.

Cordatus said to Mitis, “Look, see the translated gallant!”

“Oh, he is welcome,” Mitis said.

Fungoso said to Deliro and Fallace, “God save you, brother-in-law and sister.”

He said to Macilente, “God save you, sir.”

He said to Fallace, his sister, “I have commendations for you from out in the country.”

He then said to himself, “I marvel that they haven’t noticed my new suit of clothing.”

He then continued talking to Fallace:

“My uncle Sogliardo is in town.

“Sister, I think you are melancholy. Why are you so sad? I think you mistook me for Master Fastidious Brisk, sister, didn’t you?”

He was trying to draw attention to his new clothes.

“Why should I mistake you for him?” Fallace asked.

“Nay, no reason,” Fungoso said.

Then he added, “I was lately in Master Fastidious’ company, and I think we are very similar.”

“You have a fair suit of clothing, brother-in-law,” Deliro said. “May God give you joy of it.”

“Indeed, it is good enough to ride in, brother,” Fungoso said. “I had it made to ride in.”

This implies that he had other fancy suits of clothing to wear when he was not riding on horseback.

“Oh, now I see the cause of his frivolous question was his new suit of clothing,” Fallace said.

Deliro said quietly to Fungoso, “Please, good brother-in-law, see if you can change her mood.”

Fallace seemed to always be in a peevish mood.

Fungoso replied quietly, “I assure you I will. Leave it to me. I’ll put her out of her dumps.”

He then said to Fallace, “Sister, how do you like my suit of clothing?”

“Oh, you are a gallant in print — a perfect gallant — now, brother,” Fallace said, referring to his clothing.

Since Fungoso had gotten the money by claiming he needed it to buy books but had instead spent it on clothing, he was indeed a gallant in print.

Fungoso replied, “Indeed, how do you like the fashion? It’s the last edition — the latest edition — I assure you.”

“I cannot but like it as it deserves,” Fallace replied.

Considering how Fungoso had gotten the money to get the new clothes, did they deserve to be praised?

“To tell the truth, sister, I was obliged to borrow these spurs,” Fungoso said. “I have left my gown as security for them. Please, lend me an angel.”

A gown is a kind of men’s upper garment that can be worn in public.

An angel is a gold coin.

“Now, beshrew — curse — my heart, then,” Fallace said.

She was reluctant to lend him money.

Fungoso said, “In good truth, I’ll pay you again at my next exhibition.”

His exhibition was his allowance. His father gave him money periodically to enable him to be a law student.

He continued, "I had just barely ten pounds from my father, and it would not reach to put me wholly into the fashion."

He had bought everything except the spurs.

"I don't care," Fallace said.

"I had spurs of my own before, but they were not jinglers," Fungoso said.

Fastidious Brisk had worn spurs that jingled, and so Fungoso had wanted some of his own.

Fungoso added, "Monsieur Fastidious will be here soon, sister."

"You jest!" Fallace said.

"Never lend me one penny more, while you live, then, if I am jesting," Fungoso said, "and that is something I'd be loath and reluctant to say, in truth."

He was loath and reluctant to tell her to never lend him any more money.

"When did you see him?" Fallace asked.

"Yesterday," Fungoso said. "I became acquainted with him at Sir Puntarvolo's. Nay, sweet sister —"

Macilente said to himself:

"I would like to know of heaven, now, why yonder fool should wear a suit of satin. He? That rook — that fraud! That painted jay — flashily dressed fool — with such a deal of outside? He is all show and no substance. What is his inside, do you think? Ha, ha, ha, ha, ha! Good heaven, give me patience!

"A number of these popinjays — chatterers — there are whom, if a man bring to mind and just compare their inward merit with the inward merit of such men as lack the popinjay's financial resources, Lord, Lord, what things they are!"

Popinjays are literally chattering birds with fine feathers.

Macilente considered himself to be a man of inward merit who lacked the money to buy fine clothing.

Scholars and gallants are different. Scholars are supposed to seek a well-furnished mind; gallants are thought to seek a well-furnished — that is, well-clothed — body.

Fungoso was a law student, but he wanted to be dressed like a gallant. He valued clothing more than books.

Macilente thought of himself as a scholar, but he wanted to be dressed like a gallant.

Fallace said, "Come, when will you pay me again? Tell me now."

She may or may not have given him money.

"Oh, God, sister!" Fungoso said.

He may have caught sight of Fastidious Brisk, who entered the scene while wearing a new suit of clothing in the newest fashion.

Seeing Fastidious Brisk, Macilente said to himself, "Here comes another."

He meant another popinjay.

Fastidious Brisk greeted Deliro and Fallace:

"May God save you, Signor Deliro.

"How are thou, sweet lady? Let me kiss thee."

Fungoso said, "What! A new suit of clothing? My lot is sorrow!"

He had thought he was wearing the latest fashion, but now he learned that he was not.

"And how does Master Fastidious Brisk?" Deliro asked.

Fastidious Brisk, who sometimes left words out of his sentences, said, "Indeed, [I] live in court, Signor Deliro, in favor and grace, I thank God, both of the noble masculine and feminine."

He meant upperclass lords and ladies.

He added, "I must speak with you in private by and by."

He wanted to borrow money.

"When you please, sir," Deliro said.

"Why do you look so pale, brother?" Fallace asked.

"By God's eyelid, all this money is cast away now," Fungoso said.

He had spent much money on his clothing, and now his clothes were not the latest fashion.

Macilente said to himself, "Aye, there's a newer edition come forth."

The new edition was a new fashion.

"It is just my hard fortune," Fungoso said. "Well, I'll have my suit of clothing changed. I'll go and fetch my tailor soon, but first I'll devise a letter to my father. Have you any pen and ink, sister?"

"What would you do with it?" Fallace asked.

“I would use it,” Fungoso said. “By God’s light, if it had come but four days sooner, I would have had the fashion!”

If he had had the money four days earlier, he would have been fashionable for four days. Or, if Fastidious Brisk had worn his new suit of clothing four days earlier, Fungoso would have been able to copy it and would have been fashionable now.

He exited.

Fastidious Brisk said:

“There was a countess [who] gave me her hand to kiss today, in the presence chamber” — the royal reception room — “did [which did] me more good, by Jesus, then — and yesternight sent her coach twice to my lodging to entreat me [to] accompany her, and my sweet mistress, with some two or three nameless ladies more.”

The ladies must be nameless out of discretion — or because they didn’t exist.

Fastidious Brisk again left out some words: ’did above means “Which did,” and This below means “This is.”

“Oh, I have been graced by them beyond all aim of affection! This’ [This is] her garter my dagger hangs in. And they so commend and approve my apparel, with my judicious wearing of it, it’s above wonder.”

Fallace said, “Indeed, sir, it is a most excellent suit, and you do wear it as extraordinary — uncommonly well.”

Fastidious Brisk replied, “Why, I’ll tell you now, in good faith, and I swear by this chair — which, by the grace of God, I intend soon to sit in — I had three suits in one year [that] made three great ladies [fall] in love with me. I had three other [suits that] undid [ruined] three gentlemen in imitation, and three other [suits that] got three other gentlemen widows of three thousand pound a year.”

In other words: He claimed that he had three suits of clothing made in one year that made three great ladies fall in love with him. He also claimed that he had three other suits of clothing that financially ruined three gentlemen who imitated him. He also claimed that that he had three other suits of clothing that got three other gentlemen who imitated him widows who each had an income of three thousand pounds a year. Apparently, these three gentlemen married the three widows and got their money, as was the norm in Ben Jonson’s society.

“Is it possible?” Deliro asked.

“Oh, believe it, sir, a good face is the witch and good apparel is the spells that bring all the pleasures of the world into their circle,” Fastidious Brisk said.

The bawdy meaning of “circle” is vagina.

“Ah, the sweet grace of a courtier!” Fallace said.

Macilente said to himself, “Well, I wish my father had left me just a good face for my inheritance yet; even if I had shared the unfortunate wit that goes with it, I wouldn’t have cared. I might have passed for someplace in the world then.”

Macilente had inherited nothing except his intelligence, which he wishes he could exchange for a good face. With a good face, he would have a better chance of rising in the world.

Fastidious Brisk said to Deliro:

“Why, [I] assure you, signor, rich apparel has strange virtues:

“It makes him who has rich apparel without means, esteemed for an excellent wit.

“It makes him who enjoys rich apparel with means able to put the world in remembrance of his means.

“Rich apparel helps the deformities of nature and gives luster to nature’s beauties.

“Rich apparel makes continual holiday where it shines.

“Rich apparel sets the wits of ladies at work who otherwise would be idle.

“Rich apparel furnishes your two-shilling ordinary.

“Rich apparel takes possession of your stage at your new play.

“And rich apparel enriches your oars, as scorning to go with your scull.”

A two-shilling ordinary is an eating-place that sells two-shilling meals.

Fashionably dressed people in the audience may upstage the actors because people will look at their fashionable clothing.

A scull is a boat with only one oar. Water-taxis were more fashionable and had more oars. Fashionably dressed people would scorn to take a scull.

Macilente said, “Please, sir, add this: Rich apparel gives respect to your fools, and it makes many thieves, as many strumpets, and no fewer bankrupts.”

“Bah! Bah! You are unworthy to speak where he breathes!” Fallace said.

Fastidious Brisk asked Deliro about Macilente, “Who is he, signor?”

“A friend of mine, sir,” Deliro answered.

“By heaven, I wonder at you citizens. I wonder what kind of creatures you are,” Fastidious Brisk said.

“Why, sir?” Deliro asked.

“[I wonder] that you can consort yourselves with such poor seam-rent fellows,” Fastidious Brisk said.

Seam-rents are garments with ripped seams. Macilente lacked money and good clothing.

“He says the truth,” Fallace said.

“Sir, I will assure you, however you esteem of him, he’s a man worthy of respect,” Deliro said, defending Macilente.

“Why?” Fastidious Brisk asked. “What virtue has he in him that he should be respected? Huh?”

“By the Virgin Mary, he is a scholar, sir,” Deliro said.

“Nothing else?” Fastidious Brisk asked.

“And he is well travelled,” Deliro said.

“He should get himself good clothes,” Fastidious Brisk said.

“I would cherish those good qualities learned from the experience of travel in him, and I would recommend him to some nobleman of high position.”

“Sir, such a benefit should bind me to you forever for my friend’s sake,” Deliro said, “and I don’t doubt that his merit shall more than justify my praise.”

“Why, if he had fine clothes, I’d carry him to the court with me tomorrow,” Fastidious Brisk said.

Deliro said, “He shall not lack fine clothes, sir, if gold and any place in the whole city will furnish him with credit.”

Gold would definitely furnish him with credit. With gold, he could pay the bill for clothing.

“You say well, sir,” Fastidious Brisk said. “Indeed, Signor Deliro, I have come to have you play the alchemist with me and change the species of my land into that metal you talk of.”

Fastidious Brisk wanted to borrow money, using his land as security. In alchemical terms, he would turn earth into gold.

In Ben Jonson’s society, one meaning of “species” is coined money. Certainly, land can be converted into money.

“With all my heart, sir,” Deliro said. “What sum will serve you?”

“Indeed, some three- or fourscore pounds,” Fastidious Brisk answered.

“To tell the truth, sir, I have promised to meet a gentleman this morning in St. Paul’s Cathedral, but upon my return I’ll quickly dispatch your business.”

“I’ll accompany you there,” Fastidious Brisk said.

“As you please, sir, but I’m not going there directly,” Deliro said.

“It doesn’t matter. I have no other designment — appointment — in hand, and therefore I might as well go along with you,” Fastidious Brisk said.

Deliro said to himself, “I might as well have a quartan fever follow me now, for I shall never be rid of him.”

A quartan fever is hard to get rid of. It is a fever that keeps recurring every few days.

Deliro called to his servants, “Bring me a cloak there, someone!”

He said to himself, “Still, with the aid of Fastidious Brisk’s help at the court, I am sure to be visited by notables. I was a beast to give him any hope. Well, I wish that I were in, that I am out with him once, and —”

The notables whom he would meet would raise his social status. Possibly, they would become his customers.

Deliro had already lent Fastidious Brisk money and he would like to have that repaid: He had lent money out and he would like to have it repaid with an introduction at court (or repaid into his moneybag). Also, he would like to be in a certain part of his wife’s body that he was currently out of, partly because his wife was infatuated with Fastidious Brisk.

Deliro then said, “Come, Signor Macilente, I must confer with you as we go.”

He said to Fallace, “Nay, dear wife, I ask thee to forsake these moods; look not like winter thus. Here, take my keys, open my money-counting houses, spread all my wealth before thee, choose any object that delights thee. If thou will eat of the spirit of gold, and drink dissolved pearl in wine, it is for thee.”

Small amounts of gold in food was thought to promote health.

Cleopatra once dissolved a very valuable pearl in wine and drank it in order to win a bet with Marc Antony that she would host the most expensive banquet in history.

Such waste of a valuable pearl is the epitome of the vice known as Luxuria.

So is poop glitter: gold flakes that people eat in order to make their poop glitter.

“So, sir,” Fallace said.

“Nay, my sweet wife,” Deliro said.

“Good Lord!” Fallace said. “How you are perfumed in your terms and all! Please leave us.”

“Come, gentlemen,” Deliro said.

“Adieu, sweet lady,” Fastidious Brisk said.

Everyone exited except Fallace.

Alone, Fallace said to herself about Fastidious Brisk:

“Aye, aye, let thy words forever sound in my ears, and thy graces — elegance and charms — disperse contentment through all my senses. Oh, how happy is that lady above other ladies who enjoys so absolute a gentleman to be her servant!”

In this context, a servant is a man who admires a woman.

Fallace continued:

“A countess give him her hand to kiss! Ah, foolish countess, he’s a man worthy — if a woman may speak of a man’s worth — to kiss the lips of an empress.”

Fungoso and his tailor entered the scene.

“What! Has Master Fastidious gone, sister?” Fungoso asked.

“Aye, brother,” Fallace said.

Still thinking about Fastidious Brisk, Fallace said to herself, “He has a face like a cherub.”

“God’s me, what luck’s this!” Fungoso said. “I have fetched my tailor and all. Which way did he go, sister? Can you tell me?”

“Not I, in good faith,” Fallace said.

Still thinking about Fastidious Brisk, Fallace said to herself, "And he has a body like an angel."

"How long is it since he went?" Fungoso asked.

"Why, but just now," Fallace said. "Didn't you meet him?"

Still thinking about Fastidious Brisk, Fallace said to herself, "And a tongue able to ravish any woman in the earth."

He could ravish a woman with flattery, with kisses, and/or with cunnilingus.

"Oh, for God's sake!" Fungoso said.

He said to the tailor, "I'll pay you for your pains."

He said to Fallace, "But just now, did you say?"

He said to the tailor, "Come, good sir."

He said to himself, "By God's eyelid, I had forgotten it, too."

He said to Fallace, "Sister, if anybody asks for my uncle Sogliardo, they shall find him at the heralds' office yonder by St. Paul's."

Fungoso exited with his tailor.

Alone again, Fallace said to herself:

"Well, I will not altogether despair. I have heard of a citizen's wife who has been beloved by a courtier, and so why shouldn't I be beloved by one, too? Well, I will go into my private chamber, lock the door, and think over all his good parts one after another."

"Heigh ho" expresses sadness: a sigh.

Fallace's speech was filled with double entendres:

Her private chamber can be 1) her bedroom, and/or 2) her vagina.

A lock and key can be symbols of a vagina and a penis.

The door can be the entrance to her vagina.

Fastidious Brisk's good parts can be his private parts.

Chances are excellent that she was going to masturbate while thinking about Fastidious Brisk.

Fallace exited.

Mitis said to Cordatus, "Well, I fear that this last scene will endure some grievous torture."

"What?" Cordatus said. "You fear it will be racked by some hard construction?"

Ben Jonson wanted to avoid being accused of slander, and so Cordatus and Mitis talked here about Jonson's words being tortured and misconstrued as attacking a particular person instead of attacking a vice shared by many people.

"Don't you fear that, too?" Mitis asked.

Cordatus said:

"No, in good faith.

"Unless my eyes could enable me to see beyond what I can physically see, I see no reason why this should be more liable to the rack than the rest.

"You'll say perhaps the city will not take it well that the merchant Deliro is made here to dote so entirely upon his wife, Fallace, and also that she is so fastidiously affected as she is."

"You have uttered my thought, sir, indeed," Mitis said.

Cordatus said:

“Why, by that analogy, the court might as well take offence at him we call the courtier, and with much more reason, by how much the real place — the royal court — transcends and is superior in dignity and virtue.

“But can you imagine that any noble or true spirit in the royal court — whose sinewy and tough-minded and altogether unaffected graces very worthily express that he, the true spirit, is a courtier — will make any complaint at the opening of such an empty trunk as this Brisk is? Or think that his own worth is impeached by beholding his motley inside?”

No real, worthy courtier will take offense at the portrayal of Fastidious Brisk, who cannot possibly be thought to represent any real, worthy courtier. Only a courtier who actually is like Fastidious Brisk would take offense.

“No, sir, I do not,” Mitis said.

Cordatus said:

“No more, I assure you, will any grave wise citizen or modest matron object to this folly in Deliro and his wife, but rather apply it as the foil to their own virtues.”

A foil is a thin piece of metal placed under a gemstone to better display its glitter. Here, the follies of Ben Jonson’s characters are the foils that show off his audience’s virtues better by the contrast of folly and virtue.

Cordatus continued:

“For to take personal affront at a satiric character would be to affirm that a man writing of Nero should mean all emperors, or speaking of Machiavelli, comprehend all statesmen, or in our character Sordido, all farmers, and so of the rest; than which, nothing can be uttered that is more malicious and absurd.

“Indeed, there is a kind of these narrow-eyed decipherers, I confess, who will extort strange and abstruse meanings out of any subject, although it is ever so obvious and innocently delivered.

“But to such — wherever they sit concealed — let them know that the author defies them and the writing-tablets that they use to write down what they perceive as slanders, and the author hopes no sound or trustworthy judgment will infect itself with their contagious comments, who indeed come here only to pervert and poison the sense of what they hear, and for nothing else.”

Seeing another actor walking onto the stage, Mitis asked, “Wait! What new mute is this who walks so suspiciously?”

— 3.1 —

Cavalier Shift, holding two si quises — notices to be posted in St. Paul’s Cathedral — in his hand walked onto the stage. Shift was a swaggerer and a pimp. Si quis is Latin for “if anyone.” The notices could request employment and information, or they could be about lost items. Cavalier Shift’s notices were about employment.

Cordatus said, “Oh, by the Virgin Mary, this is one for whose better illustration we must desire you to imagine that the stage is the middle aisle in St. Paul’s Cathedral, and that, the west end of it.”

The middle aisle was a place for people to meet and gossip; the west end is where the notices were posted.

“So, sir, and what follows?” Mitis asked.

“Indeed, a whole volume of humor, and it is worthy the unclasping.”

Many books of the time had clasps to keep them shut when not in use.

“As how?” Mitis asked. “What name do you give him first?”

“He has shift of names, sir,” Cordatus answered. “Some call him Apple-John, some Signor Whiff. By the Virgin Mary, his main standing — most used — name is Cavalier Shift; the rest are but as clean shirts to his natures.”

An apple-john may be an apple-squire, aka pimp. An apple-john is an apple that will not rot quickly, and an apple-squire is a pimp with a steady supply of prostitutes. Since a “john” is a man, and “apple” can refer to the fruit of the tree of knowledge, aka the forbidden fruit, an apple-john may also be a prostitute’s client.

Signor Whiff refers to Shift's habit of smoking tobacco.

Cavalier Shift shifted — changed — his alias frequently — as frequently as some men change their shirts. He did this in order to suit whatever character he was adopting.

“And what is he doing in St. Paul's now?” Mitis asked.

“Truly, as you see, for the promotion of a si quis or two, wherein he has so varied himself and presented himself in various roles that if any one of them take, he may hull up and down in the humorous world a little longer.”

In his notices, he varied his character, and he probably used various names. If one advertisement got a taker, he would keep using that character and name. He would be like a ship and follow that current and wind for a while. As you might guess, the word “shift” meant “stratagem.”

“It seems, then, he bears a very changing sail?” Mitis said.

In other words, Cavalier Shift can change direction very often. If one stratagem doesn't work, he moves in another direction and tries another.

“Oh, as the wind, sir,” Cordatus said. “Here comes more actors.”

Orange, a coxcomb, entered the scene. Coxcombs are fools.

“This is splendid,” Cavalier Shift said. “I have set up my bills without being noticed.”

Being noticed might result in his being arrested.

“What? Signor Whiff?” Orange said. “What fortune has brought you into these west parts?”

Cavalier Shift (aka Signor Whiff) answered, “Indeed, signor, nothing but phlegm. I have been taking an ounce of tobacco nearby here with a gentleman, and I have come to spit privately in St. Paul's. God save you, sir."

Spitting phlegm in a cathedral? Yuck.

"Privately" means alone and not in front of others.

"Adieu, good Signor Whiff," Orange said.

He walked aside.

Clove, Orange's friend, entered the scene. Like Orange, Clove was a coxcomb, aka a fool.

"Master Apple-John!" Clove said. "You are well met. When shall we sup together, and laugh and be fat with those good wenches? Huh?"

"Indeed, sir, I must now leave you upon a few humors and occasions. But when you please, sir," Cavalier Shift (aka Master Apple-John) said.

He exited.

"Farewell, sweet Apple-John," Clove said. "I wonder that there is no greater number of gallants here?"

"Who are these two, signor?" Mitis asked Cordatus about Orange and Clove.

"By the Virgin Mary, they are a couple, sir, who are mere strangers to the whole scope of our play, by chance come only to walk a turn or two in this scene set in St. Paul's."

Orange and Clove would have very small parts in the play.

Orange and Clove walked together.

"May God save you, good Master Clove," Orange said.

"Sweet Master Orange," Clove replied.

"What?" Mitis said. "Clove and Orange?"

Sometimes, cloves were stuck in oranges.

Cordatus said:

“Aye, and they are well met, for it is as dry an orange as ever grew.”

Dry fruit is withered. This man Orange lacked juice and taste. He lacked wit and intelligence.

Cordatus continued:

“Their conversation is nothing but salutation, and ‘Oh, God, sir!’ and ‘It pleases you to say so, sir.’”

These were fashionable expressions.

Cordatus continued:

“Orange is one who can laugh at a jest for fellowship’s sake with a most plausible and extemporal grace, and some hour afterward will in private ask you what the jest was.”

Orange pretends to understand a joke but asks someone later, in private, to explain it.

Cordatus continued:

“The other, Monsieur Clove, is a more spiced — seasoned with ‘wit’ — youth. He will sit a whole afternoon sometimes in a bookseller’s shop reading the Greek, Italian, and Spanish, when he understands not a word of any of those languages. If he had the tongues to his suits, he would be an excellent linguist.”

If Clove actually knew the languages he pretended to know, and if he knew as many languages as he had suits of clothing, he would be an excellent linguist.

Continuing their private conversation, Clove asked, “Do you hear this reported for certainty?”

Orange replied, "Oh, good sir!"

Puntarvolo and Carlo Buffone entered the scene, accompanied by two serving-men following them. One serving-man was leading Puntarvolo's dog and one was holding a cat in a bag.

Puntarvolo said to the serving-men, "Sirrah, take my cloak, and you, sir knave, follow me closer. If thou lose my dog, thou shall die a dog's death; I will hang thee."

Unwanted dogs were often killed either by hanging or by drowning.

Carlo Buffone said, "Tut, don't worry about the serving-man's vigilance, he's a good lean rascal, he loves a dog well, I assure you. I see by his looks, aye, by the Mass, he's somewhat like him."

The dog and the serving-man resembled each other, or perhaps both were melancholy since dogs were proverbially melancholy.

He then whispered to the serving-man, "By God's blood, poison him, make away with him with a crooked pin or something, man; thou may have more security of thy life."

If the dog were to eat a crooked pin placed in its food, that could kill the dog.

If the dog were to die before Puntarvolo's journey, he would almost certainly stay at home and not undertake the dangerous journey and take the servant with him.

Carlo Buffone then said to Puntarvolo, "And so, sir, what? You have not gotten financial backers for your whole venture yet, have you?"

“No, I still lack backers for some fifteen or sixteen hundred pounds,” Puntarvolo answered. “But my lady, my wife, is out of her humor; she does not now intend to go.”

Earlier, Puntarvolo, his wife, and his dog were to travel to Constantinople. Now his wife had decided to stay home.

“No?” Carlo Buffone said. “What then will happen?”

“By the Virgin Mary, I am now forced to change the terms of the wager, and make them upon the return of myself, my dog, and my cat,” Puntarvolo said.

“Your cat?” Carlo Buffone said. “Where is she?”

“My squire has her there in the bag,” Puntarvolo said.

He then said to the serving-man, “Sir, look after her.”

Puntarvolo wanted his dog and cat well taken care of so he could undertake and return successfully from his journey.

He then asked, “How do thou like my substituting of my cat for my wife, Carlo?”

In the slang of the time, “cat” could mean “prostitute.”

“Oh, for the better, sir,” Carlo Buffone said. “Your cat has nine lives, and your wife has but one.”

“Besides, she will never be seasick, which will save me so much money in medicines and herbal remedies,” Puntarvolo said.

Cats were supposed to be able to influence storms and ward them off.

Perhaps Puntarvolo’s wife had decided not to travel because of the danger of seasickness.

Puntarvolo then asked, “When did you see Signor Sogliardo?”

“I came away from him just now,” Carlo Buffone answered. “He is at the heralds’ office yonder. He requested me to go ahead of him and hire a serving-man or two for him in St. Paul’s, in preparation for when his cullison was ready.”

Servants wore liveries: distinctive clothing bearing the cullison, aka badge, that indicated whose servants they were. A serving-man or two wearing his cullison would give Sogliardo social prominence.

“What?” Puntarvolo said. “Has he purchased arms, then?”

Sogliardo had bought a coat of arms.

“Aye, and splendid ones too, of as many colors as ever you saw any fool’s coat in your life,” Carlo Buffone said.

Sogliardo’s coat of arms was parti-colored — of many colors — like the motley clothing that a Fool, aka jester, wore.

Most coats of arms were restrained in their use of color.

“I’ll go look among yonder bills to see if I can fit him with legs to his arms,” Carlo Buffone said.

The legs were those of the serving-men.

He was going to look at the bills to see if anyone was requesting employment as a servant.

“With legs to his arms!” Puntarvolo said. “Good.”

It was a good witticism.

He added, “I will go with you, sir.”

They went to look at the bills.

Fastidious Brisk, Deliro, and Macilente entered the scene.

Fastidious Brisk said:

“Come, let’s walk in the Mediterraneum.”

The Mediterranean was the middle aisle of St. Paul's.

The Mediterranean is the sea in the middle of land.

Fastidious Brisk continued:

“I assure you, sir, I am not the least respected among ladies, but let that pass.”

In other words: Ladies love Fastidious Brisk. So says Fastidious Brisk.

But his words were ambiguous: They could mean that ladies respect one or more other men than they respect Fastidious Brisk.

Or they could mean that ladies do not at all respect Fastidious Brisk.

Fastidious Brisk continued:

“Do you know how to go into the presence room, sir?”

The royal presence room was the royal reception room at court.

“Why, on my feet, sir,” Macilente said.

Fastidious Brisk answered:

“No, on your head, sir, for it is that which must bear you out — aid you and carry the day for you, I assure you.”

Of course, another meaning of “bear you out” is “carry you out of the royal presence room.”

Fastidious Brisk continued:

“I mean thus, sir: You must first have a special care so to wear your hat, [so] that it will not make a mess of this your predominant or foretop, because when you come at the presence door, you may, with once or twice stroking up your forehead thus, enter with your predominant perfect, that is, standing up stiff.”

The predominant or foretop was a hair style in which the forelock was grown long and brushed back.

Fastidious Brisk’s words contained sexual innuendo: “stroking up” and “standing up stiff.”

“Hair standing up as if one were frightened?” Macilente asked.

“Aye, sir,” Fastidious Brisk answered.

“Which indeed, a true fear of your mistress should do, rather than gum water, or whites of eggs, isn’t that so, sir?” Macilente said.

Men who love women sometimes tremble in the presence of those women.

Gum water and whites of eggs were used in hair-dressing. They made hair stand up straight.

“An ingenious observation,” Fastidious Brisk said. “Give me permission to ask your name, sir.”

“His name is Macilente, sir,” Deliro said.

Fastidious Brisk said:

“Good Signor Macilente, if this gentleman, Signor Deliro, furnish you as he says he will with clothes, I will bring you tomorrow by this time into the presence of the most divine and acute — sharp-witted — lady of the court. You shall see sweet silent rhetoric and dumb — mute — eloquence speaking in her eye; but when she herself speaks, it is such an anatomy of wit, so sinewized and arterized, that it is the goodliest model of pleasure that ever was to behold.

“Oh, she strikes the world into admiration of her — oh, oh, oh! — I cannot express them, believe me.”

An anatomy of wit is a model of understanding.

“So sinewized and arterized” means “so thoroughly examined, as if every sinew and artery were examined.”

Fastidious Brisk’s “oh, oh, oh!” may be orgasmic.

Fastidious Brisk’s “cannot express them” means he cannot describe all of her good points.

“Oh, your only admiration is your silence, sir,” Macilente said.

Proverbially, the greatest admiration is silence: One is so awed that one cannot speak.

Reading a notice, Puntarvolo said:

“Before God, Carlo, this is good. Let’s read them again.

He read a notice out loud:

“If there be any lady or gentlewoman of good carriage who is desirous to entertain, to her private uses, a young, straight, and upright gentleman of the age of five- or six- and-twenty, at the most, who can serve in the nature of a gentleman usher and has little legs of purpose, and a black satin suit of his own to go before her in (which suit, for the more sweetening, now lies in lavender), and can hide his face with her fan to give her privacy, if need require, or sit in the cold at the stair foot for her as well as another gentleman, let her write her name and place at the bottom of this notice, and diligent attention shall be given.”

The phrase “lady or gentlewoman of good carriage” is ambiguous. It can mean 1) lady or gentlewoman of good character or 2) prostitute or other woman who carries — or bears — the weight of the man in the missionary position.

Other words and phrases can be interpreted as referring to or necessitating a man with an erection: “desirous to entertain,” “private uses,” “straight,” “upright.”

A “gentleman usher” can provide “private uses” — that is, sexual services.

“Little legs” can be a series of erections, or the legs of a servant.

“Little legs of purpose” can be used in running errands, making bows, being a go-between between a lady and her lover, or providing sexual services.

The black satin suit that lies in lavender may be stored with lavender to make it smell good, but “lies in lavender” was then-current slang for “has been pawned.”

The notice has two meanings: 1) I am a gentleman looking for a job as an usher to a gentlewoman, and 2) I am a man looking for a job as a pimp to a prostitute or as a gigolo to a gentlewoman.

“This is exceedingly excellent, huh?” Puntarvolo said.

Carlo Buffone pointed to another notice and said, “No, this, this, here’s a fine servant.”

Puntarvolo read out loud:

receive or take in — that is, inhale — here at London and evaporate — that is, exhale — at Uxbridge [sixteen miles from London], or farther, if it please him — if there be any such generous spirit who is truly enamored of these good arts, may it please him, but (by a note of his hand) to specify the place or ordinary where he is accustomed to eat and lodge, and most sweet attendance with tobacco and pipes of the best sort shall be ministered. Stet quaeso candide lector.”

The Latin sentence meant: “Please let this stand, honest reader.”

A gentleman of the first, second, or third generation is a new gentleman: an upstart.

The Cuban ebullition was a way of smoking that involved rapidly inhaling and exhaling a large amount of pipe-smoke.

Euripus was a way of smoking that involved alternating quick inhalations and exhalations and slow inhalations and exhalations.

Whiff was a way of smoking that involved inhaling smoke through the mouth and exhaling it through the nose.

Shift was advertising his availability to teach a new gentleman how to smoke tobacco.

“Why, this is without parallel, this is!” Puntarvolo said.

“Well, I’ll mark this fellow for Sogliardo’s use presently,” Carlo Buffone said.

He wanted the man in the notice — Cavalier Shift — to be employed by Sogliardo.

Puntarvolo said, “Or rather, Sogliardo for his use.”

Puntarvolo was able to guess that Sogliardo would be taken advantage of by the man in the notice.

The word “use” can be a sexual reference.

“Indeed, either of them will serve,” Carlo Buffone said. “They are both good properties. I’ll designate the other a place, too, where we can meet so that we may see him.”

“Properties” meant “tools.”

Carlo Buffone wanted Sogliardo to hire both men who had posted the notices. “Both men” were Cavalier Shift, but he had not put his name on the notices.

“No better place than the Mitre Tavern, so that we may be spectators with you, Carlo,” Puntarvolo said.

Sogliardo entered the scene.

Puntarvolo added:

“Wait, look who enters here.

“Signor Sogliardo! God save you.”

Sogliardo said:

“God save you, good Sir Puntarvolo. Your dog’s in health, sir, I see.

“How are things now, Carlo?”

“We have taken some small pains to choose for you followers here,” Carlo Buffone answered.

The followers were servants.

“Come hither, signor,” Puntarvolo said to Sogliardo.

They showed Sogliardo the notices.

Clove and Orange had been strolling around, not hearing the others’ conversation, except perhaps in snatches.

Clove said quietly, “Monsieur Orange, yonder gallants are observing us. Please, let’s talk fustian a little and gull them and make them believe we are great scholars.”

Fustian is pompous, pretentious language. Jargon can be fustian.

“Oh, Lord, sir!” Orange said.

“Nay, please let’s, by Jesus,” Clove said. “You have an excellent habit in discourse.”

“It pleases you to say so, sir,” Orange said.

Clove said:

“By this church, you have it, indeed! Nay, come, begin.”

Clove began to use fustian:

“Aristotle in his Daemonologia approves Scaliger for the best navigator in his time, and in his Hypercritiques he reports him to be Heautontimorumenos. You understand the Greek, sir?”

Aristotle never wrote on demonology, although King James VI of Scotland (later King James I of England) did, and Julius Caesar Scaliger never contributed to travel literature.

A “navigator” is a traveler.

Hypercritiques means “hyper-critical.”

Heautontimorumenos means “self-tormentor.”

“Oh, God, sir!” Orange said.

Macilente said to himself, “For society’s sake he does ‘understand’ the Greek, as well as Italian and Spanish. Oh, here are a couple of fine tame parrots.”

Did Clove understand the Greek? On occasion, he pretended to.

Ladies kept tame parrots as pets and spent much money on them.

Note to Readers: If you don't understand the fustian above and the fustian that follows, don't worry. No one else understands it, either. In fact, it is nonsense and there is nothing to understand.

Clove said loudly to Orange:

“Now, sir, whereas the ingenuity of the time and the soul's synderesis [the innate understanding of good and evil] are but embryons [embryos] in nature, added to the paunch of esquiline [a latrine] and the intervallum [intervening space or time] of the zodiac, besides, the ecliptic line being optic [able to be seen by the naked eye] and not mental, but by the contemplative and theoretic part thereof, does demonstrate to us the vegetable circumference and the ventosity [flatulence, and bombast] of the tropics, and whereas our intellectual or mincing capriole [leap in a dance], according to the Metaphysics, as you may read in Plato's Histriomastix.

“Do you understand me, sir?”

Plato did not write Histriomastix, which is an Elizabethan play.

“Oh, Lord, sir!” Orange said.

Clove continued using fustian loudly:

“Then coming to the ingenious animal, as reason long since is fled to animals, you know, or indeed for the more modelizing [shaping or framing] or enamelling [embellishing] or rather diamondizing [making brilliant] of your subject, you shall perceive the hypothesis or galaxia [the Milky Way], whereof the meteors long since had their initial inceptions and notions, to be merely Pythagorical, mathematical, and aristocratical; for you see, sir, there is always a kind of concinnity [stylistic elegance] and species [appearance of beauty] —”

He then said quietly to Orange, “— let us return to our former discourse, for they are not paying us any attention.”

They walked aside.

Fastidious Brisk said, “By the Mass, yonder’s the knight Puntarvolo.”

“And my cousin Sogliardo, I think,” Deliro said.

Sogliardo was the brother of Deliro’s father-in-law.

Macilente said to himself, “Aye, and his familiar that haunts him, the devil with a shining face.”

A familiar is a supernatural assistant to a witch or a devil.

The devil with the shining face is literally Lucifer, the shining one, and figuratively Carlo Buffone.

“Let them alone,” Deliro said. “Don’t notice them.”

Sogliardo, Puntarvolo, and Carlo Buffone began to walk.

The middle aisle of St. Paul’s Cathedral was a place for walking and for meeting people.

Sogliardo said, “Nay, I will have him, I am resolute for that. By this parchment, gentlemen, I have been so toiled among the harrots [heralds] yonder at the College of Heraldry, you will not believe. They do speak in the strangest language, and they give a man the hardest terms for his money that ever you knew.”

The parchment was a sketch of his new coat of arms.

Heralds have their own vocabulary, which the uninitiated find hard to understand.

The “hardest terms” are those terms that are very hard to understand or they are exorbitant financial terms. In this case, they are both.

“But have you arms?” Carlo Buffone asked. “Have you arms?”

He was referring to a coat of arms.

“Indeed, I thank God I can sign myself as a gentleman now,” Sogliardo said.

He showed them the parchment and said, “Here’s my patent. It cost me thirty pounds, by this breath.”

A patent is a document that authorizes the creation of a new coat of arms.

The patent included a sketch of his new coat of arms.

Puntarvolo said, “A very fair coat, well charged — full of heraldic devices — and full of armory.”

“Well charged” can also mean overly expensive, and it can mean overly full of heraldic devices.

“It has as much variety of colors in it as you have seen a coat have,” Sogliardo said. “How do you like the crest, sir?”

Two or three colors were best; too many colors were disgraceful.

The crest was the heraldic figure at the top of the shield bearing a coat of arms. Often the heraldic figure was a lion.

“I don’t well understand it,” Puntarvolo said. “What is it?”

“By the Virgin Mary, sir, it is a boar without a head, rampant.”

A boar without a head is a stupid bore and/or a stupid boor.

A bore is a boring person, and a boor is an ill-mannered person or a peasant or both.

Of course, one person can be both a bore and a boor.

A boar rampant is a boar standing on two legs with its front legs raised; a bore/boor rampant is a bore/boor standing on two legs with his front arms raised.

The raised front legs suggest climbing. Sogliardo was a social climber.

Boars standing with front legs raised is an unnatural position.

Sogliardo's being a gentleman is also unnatural. He was not born a gentleman, and he did not have gentlemanly qualities.

"A boar without a head," Puntarvolo said. "That's very rare."

Carlo Buffone whispered to Puntarvolo, "Aye, and rampant, too. Indeed, I commend the herald's wit, he has deciphered — understood and depicted — him well: a swine without a head, without brain, wit, anything indeed, ramping to gentility."

A ramping woman is an immodest woman.

A farmer/peasant who ramps after gentility is a social climber.

Carlo Buffone said to Sogliardo, "You can blazon the rest, signor, can't you?"

"Blazon" means 1) describe using heraldic terms, and 2) boast.

"Oh, aye, I have it in writing here for that purpose. It cost me two shillings for the drawing."

The drawing was black and white; the colors were indicated with abbreviations.

“Let’s hear,” Carlo Buffone said. “Let’s hear.”

Puntarvolo said quietly to Carlo Buffone, “It is the most vile, foolish, absurd, palpable, and ridiculous escutcheon — shield — that this eye ever survived — surveyed.”

They greeted Fastidious Brisk, Deliro, and Macilente as they met in the walk.

Puntarvolo said, “God save you, good Monsieur Fastidious.”

“Silence, good knight,” Carlo Buffone said.

He then said to Sogliardo, “Go on, go on.”

Sogliardo read out loud:

“Gyrony of eight pieces, azure and gules, between three plates a chevron engrailed checky, or, vert, and ermins, on a chief argent between two ann’lets sables, a boar’s head proper.”

The gyrony is the lower two-thirds of the shield.

The plates are small O’s, aka silver roundels.

The chevron is an inverted V.

“Checky” means “checked.”

Ann’lets sables are black rings.

Some more colors will be mentioned later.

These are the colors of Sogliardo’s coat of arms:

Argent: silver

Azure: blue

Ermine: white with black spots

Gules: red

Or: gold

Proper: a proper color for a boar

Sable: black

“What’s that?” Carlo Buffone said. “On a chief argent?”

The chief argent is the upper third of the shield, colored argent, aka silver.

Sogliardo read out loud:

“On a chief argent, a boar’s head proper between two ann’lets sables.”

“By God’s blood, it’s a hog’s cheek and puddings in a pewter field, this,” Carlo Buffone said.

Puddings are entrails. Anlets are rings, and intestines are long circular tubes. Plates were made of pewter.

“How do you like them, signor?” Sogliardo asked Puntarvolo.

“Let the word be: Not without mustard,” Puntarvolo advised. “Your crest is very rare, sir.”

The crest was the heraldic figure at the top of a shield bearing a coat of arms.

The word is a motto.

Thomas Nashe wrote a play about Pierce Penniless, who went to sea and suffered hardships, including seasickness and eating salt fish without mustard. He made a vow never again to eat salt fish if God helped him get home safely, but once he got home safely, he qualified his vow: He would never again eat salt fish without mustard.

Some mottos in history include:

Ad summa virtus: Courage to the last

Omnia vincit amor: Love conquers all

Semper fidelis: Always faithful

Spes mea superne: My hope is from above

Carlo Buffone said to himself, “A frying pan to the crest would have no fellow.”

Yes, frying pans have never yet been seen in coats of arms.

Fastidious Brisk, Deliro, and Macilente approached again.

The strollers changed strolling companions:

Fastidious Brisk paired with Puntarvolo; Carlo Buffone paired with Sogliardo; Deliro paired with Macilente. Clove and Orange were the fourth couple.

A fifth couple was the two servants with the dog and the cat.

Fastidious Brisk said to Carlo Buffone, “Entreat your poor friend — Sogliardo — to walk off a little distance, signor, I will salute the knight.”

Carlo Buffone said to Sogliardo, “Come, lap’t up, lap’t up.”

This can mean, “Come closer.” A dog laps up water to bring it closer to its throat so it can swallow it.

Sogliardo had been lapping up insults because he was too stupid to know that they were insults.

Sogliardo walked over to Carlo Buffone, and Fastidious Brisk walked over to Puntarvolo.

Fastidious Brisk said to Puntarvolo, “You are right well encountered, sir. How does your fair dog?”

“My dog is in a reasonable state, sir,” Puntarvolo said.
“What citizen is that you were coupled with? A merchant of any worth?”

“He is Signor Deliro, sir,” Fastidious Brisk said.

“Is it he?” Puntarvolo said.

As Puntarvolo and Deliro walked past each other, Puntarvolo said, “God save you, sir.”

Deliro returned the greeting: “Good Sir Puntarvolo.”

Macilente said to himself, “Oh, what an abundance of fools would this place supply to one endowed with patience to observe it!”

Carlo Buffone said to Sogliardo:

“Nay, look, sir, now you are a gentleman, you must carry a more exalted presence, change your mood and habit to a more austere form, be exceedingly proud, stand upon your gentility and be a snob, and scorn every man.

“Speak nothing humbly, never discourse with anyone lower than the status of a nobleman; even if you never saw him except when he rode to the Star Chamber, it doesn’t matter.”

The Star Chamber was an English Court that tried cases of great importance.

Carlo Buffone was not a nobleman, and so he was advising Sogliardo not to talk to him. That’s good advice.

Carlo Buffone continued:

“Love no man, trust no man, speak ill of no man to his face, and speak well of no man behind his back.

“Salute them fairly to their front, and wish them hanged when they turn their backs.

“Spread yourself upon his bosom and publicly hug him whose heart you would eat in private.

“These are principles; think on them.

“I’ll come to you again soon.”

Carlo Buffone exited.

Sogliardo mingled with Puntarvolo and Fastidious Brisk.

Puntarvolo said to a serving-man, “Sirrah, keep close, yet not so close; thy breath will thaw — collapse — my ruff.”

The lower classes were noted for having bad breath.

Fungoso arrived, accompanied by his tailor.

Sogliardo said to Fungoso, “Oh, good cousin, I am a little busy. How does my niece? I am to walk with a knight here.”

In Ben Jonson’s society, “cousin” meant “relative”; Fungoso was Sogliardo’s nephew.

Fungoso pointed to Fastidious Brisk and said to his tailor, “Oh, he is here. Look, sir, that’s the gentleman.”

“Who, he in the blush-colored satin?” the tailor replied.

Fastidious Brisk was wearing a blush-colored suit of clothing.

“Blush-colored” meant “maiden’s blush”: The color was damask-rose.

“Aye, he, sir, although his suit blushes, he does not — he wears the clothing with pride,” Fungoso said. “Look, that’s the suit, sir. I would have for me such a suit exactly the same as his: such fabric, such a wing, such a sleeve, such a skirt, belly, and all.”

A wing is a shoulder flap. It hides the seam between the torso of the coat and a detachable sleeve.

The skirt is the lower part of a man's coat.

"Therefore, please, observe it," Fungoso said. "Have you a writing tablet?"

The tailor used his writing tablet to write notes.

Fastidious Brisk said to Puntarvolo:

"Why, do you see, sir? They say I am fantastical."

He thought Fungoso and the man with him were criticizing his suit of clothing.

The word "fantastical" can mean 1) excessively foppish in attire, and/or 2) excessively grotesque in attire.

"Why, true, I know it, and I pursue my humor still in contempt of this censorious age. By God's light, if a man should do nothing but what a bunch of stale judgments about this town will approve in him, he would be a sweet ass. I'd beg him, indeed. I never knew any persons more likely to find fault with a fashion than they who didn't know how to put themselves into it. For my own part, as long as I please my own appetite for fashion, I don't care what the fusty, musty, old-fashioned world speaks of me. Puh!"

Fastidious Brisk ignored conventional public opinion when it came to fashion: He wore what he wanted to wear.

If someone were financially well-to-do but mentally impaired, another person could go to court and beg — a legal term — him for a fool. That way, they would get custody of the person and the use of the person's financial assets.

Of course, Fastidious Brisk was wrong in this case. He knew that Fungoso was closely looking at his clothing, but Fungoso wanted to copy it, not criticize it.

Fungoso said to the tailor, “Do you see how it hangs from the knee there?”

“I assure you that I do, sir,” the tailor replied.

“For God’s sake, do — note everything,” Fungoso said. “Do you see the collar, sir?”

“Fear nothing,” the tailor said. “The suit of clothing I shall make for you shall not differ in a stitch from his suit of clothing, sir.”

“Pray God it doesn’t,” Fungoso said. “You’ll make these linings serve, and help me to a merchant for the outside, won’t you?”

The linings of the suit of clothing he was wearing now would serve as the linings of the new suit of clothing.

He would borrow money from a merchant, aka money-lender, so he could buy fabric for the outside of the suit of clothing.

“I’ll do my best, sir,” the tailor said. “You’ll soon take off the suit of clothing you are wearing now?”

“Aye,” Fungoso said. “Go with me to my chamber, and you shall have it. But make haste of it, for the love of Christ, for I’ll sit in my old suit or else lie in bed and read the Arcadia until you have done.”

Sir Philip Sidney’s Arcadia was a pastoral romance.

Fungoso and the tailor exited.

Carlo Buffone entered the scene and said to Fastidious Brisk, Puntarvolo, and Sogliardo, “Oh, if ever you were struck with a jest, gallants, now one is coming, now! I can usher you to the strangest piece of military profession that ever was discovered in Insula Paulina.”

Insula Paulina is a pun: 1) Paul’s isle, and 2) St. Paul’s aisle.

“Where?” Fastidious Brisk asked. “Where?”

“What kind of creature is he?” Puntarvolo asked.

“A pimp, a pimp, whom I have observed yonder, the rarest superficies — face or surface — of a humor. He comes every morning to empty his lungs — cough up phlegm and spit — in St. Paul’s here, and offers up some five or six hecatombs of faces and sighs, and then goes away again.”

A hecatomb is literally a hundred animal sacrifices.

Cavalier Shift habitually sighed many times while making the appropriate face before he left St. Paul’s.

Carlo Buffone said, “Here he comes — nay, walk, walk, don’t be seen to look at him, and we shall have excellent entertainment.”

Shadow-fencing with his rapier, Cavalier Shift walked by them.

“By God’s eyelid, he heaved such a sigh just now that I thought he would have blown up the church,” Puntarvolo said.

“Oh, you shall have him give a number of those false fires — deep sighs — before he departs,” Carlo Buffone said.

“See! Now he is conversing with his rapier,” Fastidious Brisk said. “Look! Look!”

“Did you ever in your days observe better passion — strong emotion — about a hilt and sword?” Carlo Buffone said.

“Unless it were in the person of a cutler’s boy, or that the fellow were nothing but vapor, I should think it impossible,” Puntarvolo, a knight, said.

A cutler’s boy is an apprentice to a man who makes, repairs, and sells knives.

Cavalier Shift was acting so strangely with his rapier that he must be in the business of repairing swords or else he must be mentally ill.

“See, again, he claps his sword on the head, like one who should say, ‘Well, come on!’” Carlo Buffone said.

Cavalier Shift had slapped his rapier on the hilt.

“Oh, violence!” Fastidious Brisk said. “I wonder the blade can contain itself, being so provoked.”

Possibly, Cavalier Shift now hit himself in the head while doing a maneuver with his rapier.

Carlo Buffone recited:

“With that, the moody squire thumped his breast,

“And reared his eyes to heaven for revenge.”

“Indeed, if you are gentlemen, let’s make them friends, and mend the quarrel between his rapier and him,” Sogliardo said.

“Nay, if you intend that, you must dispose of the problem,” Carlo Buffone said, “for this rapier, it seems, is in the nature of a hanger-on, and the good gentleman would happily be rid of him.”

A hanger-on is 1) something (such as a rapier) that hangs from a loop on a belt, or 2) a human parasite.

“By my faith, if it is to be suspected that he would like to sell his rapier, I’ll ask him,” Fastidious Brisk said.

Macilente said to Deliro:

“Oh, here’s rich stuff for people to laugh at.

“For Christ’s sake, let us go. A man would wish himself a senseless pillar rather than view these monstrous prodigies, aka freaks of nature:

“Nil habet in foelix paupertas durius in se,

“Quam quod ridiculos homines facit.”

The Latin quotation, which is from the satirist Juvenal (Satires 3.152-153), means:

“Harsh in itself, poverty has no effect more unfortunate than to expose paupers to ridicule.”

Macilente and Deliro exited.

Fastidious Brisk approached Cavalier Shift, while the others watched from a distance.

“Signor,” Fastidious Brisk said.

“At your service,” Cavalier Shift responded.

“Will you sell your rapier?” Fastidious Brisk asked.

Observing Shift’s reaction, Carlo Buffone said, “By God’s blood, he has turned wild upon the question! He looks as if he had seen a sergeant.”

Sergeants had the power to arrest people.

“Sell my rapier?” Cavalier Shift said. “Now God bless me!”

Being without a sword was a grave indignity for a military man.

“Amen,” Puntarvolo said.

They were in St. Paul’s Cathedral, after all.

“You asked me if I would sell my rapier, sir?” Cavalier Shift asked.

“I did indeed,” Fastidious Brisk said.

“Now Lord have mercy upon me!” Cavalier Shift said.

“Amen, I say still,” Puntarvolo said.

“By God’s blood, sir, what should you behold in my face, sir, that should move you, as they say, sir, to ask me, sir, if I would sell my rapier?” Cavalier Shift asked.

“Nay, let me ask that you, sir, not be moved — angered,” Fastidious Brisk said. “I protest I would rather have been silent than in any way offensive, had I known your nature.”

Cavalier Shift said loudly:

“Sell my rapier? By God’s eyelid! Nay, sir, for my own part as I am a man who has served in military actions, and such, so I am not apt to injure any gentleman in the degree of behaving without honor.”

This is ambiguous: Who would be behaving without honor? Cavalier Shift? Any gentleman? Would Cavalier Shift injure any gentleman if that would mean that Cavalier Shift would be behaving without honor? Or would Cavalier Shift not injure any gentleman who was behaving without honor?

Cavalier Shift continued:

“But sell my rapier?”

“I will tell you, sir, I have served with this ‘foolish’ rapier where some of us dare not appear in haste. I name no man, but let that pass.

“Sell my rapier? Death to my lungs!”

His habit of using tobacco may have led him to make this curse.

Cavalier Shift continued saying loudly:

“This rapier, sir, has travelled by my side, sir, the best part of France and the Low Country. I have seen Flushing, Brill, and the Hague with this rapier, sir, in My Lord of Leicester’s time, and by God’s will, he who should try to dis-rapier me now, I would —”

He claimed to have participated in many military campaigns, including one or more in the Low Country — the Netherlands.

In 1586, My Lord of Leicester — Robert Dudley — led a military expedition that ended in disaster, being defeated by the Spanish. Sir Philip Sidney was one of those who died.

The current year was 1599, and according to one of Cavalier Shift’s two si quises, he was twenty-six years old at the most, so in 1586, he would have been thirteen years old at the most.

Cavalier Shift then said quietly, “Look, sir, you presume to be a gentleman of good breeding, and so likewise your friends here.”

Normally, one would say, “I presume you to be a gentleman of good breeding,” but Cavalier Shift’s word choice may be accurate.

He continued:

“If you have any disposition to travel, for the sight of service or so, one, two, or all of you, I can lend you letters to diverse officers and commanders in the Low Countries who shall for my sake do you all the good offices that shall pertain or belong to gentlemen of your —”

The Low Countries are the Netherlands, but a person with a bawdy mind who is aware that Cavalier Shift is a pimp might think that the Low Countries are between women's legs.

Gentlemen of good breeding, indeed.

Cavalier Shift then pleaded directly:

“Please show the bounty of your mind, sir, and impart some ten groats or half a crown to our use, until our ability to earn is of growth enough to return it, and we shall think ourself ___”

Fastidious Brisk turned away and joined his group.

Cavalier Shift said loudly:

“By God's blood, sell my rapier!”

Sogliardo asked Fastidious Brisk, “Please, what did he say, signor? He's a proper man — a good-looking man.”

“By the Virgin Mary, he tells me that if I please to show the bounty of my mind, I can impart some ten groats or so to his use,” Fastidious Brisk said.

Puntarvolo advised, “Break his head, and give it to him.”

“Break his head” meant to hit his head hard enough to draw blood.

“Give it to him” probably meant “Give him the money.”

“I thought he had been playing on the Jew's trump, I did,” Carlo Buffone said.

“Playing on the Jew's trump” meant “scheming to get money.”

A Jew's harp is a simple musical instrument.

A trump can be a trick.

Cavalier Shift approached Fastidious Brisk and remonstrated:

“My rapier? No, sir, my rapier is my guard, my defense, my revenue, my honor!”

He then said quietly to Fastidious Brisk:

“If you cannot impart money to me, then be secret and quiet about it, I beseech you.”

Remonstrating, he said loudly:

“And I will maintain it, where there is a grain of dust or a drop of water!”

He then said quietly to Fastidious Brisk:

“Hard is the choice when the valiant must eat their arms or else clem — starve.”

“Eat their arms” means to sell their weapons and use the money to buy food.

Remonstrating, Cavalier Shift said loudly:

“Sell my rapier?”

He addressed his rapier loudly:

“No, my dear, I will not be divorced from thee yet, I have always found thee true as steel, and —”

Cavalier Shift then quietly asked Fastidious Brisk:

“You cannot impart money to me, sir?”

He said loudly to the others:

“God save you, gentlemen.”

Cavalier Shift quietly said to Fastidious Brisk:

“Nevertheless, if you have a fancy to buy my rapier, sir ....”

Fastidious Brisk said to his companions, “Please, let’s leave now.”

Not seeing Deliro, he asked, “Has Signor Deliro departed?”

Ignoring the question, Carlo Buffone said, “Have you seen a pimp outface his own wants better?”

“Outface” can mean 1) brazen out, or 2) vehemently deny.

Cavalier Shift needed money, but he did not want the disgrace of selling his sword.

Fastidious Brisk wanted money, and he did not want to lose sight of Deliro.

“I commend that man who can dissemble them so well,” Sogliardo said.

“True, and having no better a cloak for it than he has, neither,” Puntarvolo said.

A cloak can be a cover. Cavalier Shift’s cloak for his needs is the notices he had put up in order to attempt to get money.

Also, he was trying to cover up the fact that he was actually willing to sell his rapier to Fastidious Brisk.

Fastidious Brisk’s cloak, or suit of clothing, was costly, but it was also something to draw the negative notice of other people (not including Fungoso).

“By God’s precious body, what mischievous — evil — luck is this!” Fastidious Brisk said. “Adieu, gentlemen.”

“To where are you going in such haste, Monsieur Fastidious?” Puntarvolo asked.

“After my merchant, Signor Deliro, sir,” Fastidious Brisk answered.

Carlo Buffone said to the others, “Oh, don’t hinder him; he may perhaps lose his tide.”

Fastidious Brisk might lose his opportunity to get money since Deliro had left.

Carlo Buffone added, “A good flounder, indeed.”

Fastidious Brisk could be floundering because of debts, and he could have opened his mouth wide like a wide-mouthed flounder — bottom feeder — when he learned that Deliro had left earlier.

Fastidious Brisk exited.

Orange and Clove called Cavalier Shift over to them.

“Listen, Signor Whiff, may we have a word with you?” Orange asked.

“What?” Carlo Buffone said. “Signor Whiff?”

He did not know that Cavalier Shift used that alias.

“What was the quarrel between that young gallant who’s gone and you, sir?” Orange asked.

The gallant was Fastidious Brisk.

“No quarrel,” Cavalier Shift said. “He would have given me five pounds for my rapier, and I refused it, that’s all.”

“Oh, was it no otherwise?” Clove said. “We thought you had been having words with each other.”

“No other than you saw, sir,” Cavalier Shift said.

“Adieu, good Master Apple-John,” Clove said.

Orange and Clove exited.

Carlo Buffone, who had been eavesdropping, said, “What! Whiff, and Apple-John, too? By God’s heart, what’ll you say if this be the appendix, accessory, or label to both yonder indentures?”

The appendix, accessory, or label was the name that should be attached to the notices. Cavalier Shift had many names.

The indentures were contracts for services. Carlo Buffone now guessed that Cavalier Shift had put up both notices.

“It may be,” Puntarvolo said.

“Solve the riddle for us, Janus, thou who look every way, or thou, Hercules, who have travelled all countries,” Carlo Buffone said.

Janus is a two-faced Roman god who can look forwards and backwards.

Hercules was a panhellenic hero who travelled to all countries and knew many notables.

“Nay, Carlo, don’t spend time in invocations now — it is late,” Puntarvolo said.

Invocations are appeals to gods such as Janus.

Carlo Buffone said to Cavalier Shift, “Signor, here’s a gentleman wanting to know your name, sir.”

The gentleman was Sogliardo.

“Sir, my name is Cavalier Shift. I am known sufficiently in this walk, sir.”

“Shift?” Carlo Buffone said. “I heard your name varied and altered just now, as I take it.”

Yes, he had heard Cavalier Shift called Whiff and Apple-John.

“True, sir, it pleases the world (as I am her excellent tobacconist) to give me the style of Signor Whiff; as I am a poor esquire about the town here, they call me Master Apple-John. A variety of good names does well, sir.”

An esquire is 1) a gentleman, and/or 2) a squire of ladies. This kind of squire can be a pimp.

“Aye, and good qualities to make those good names, out of which I imagine yonder bills to be yours,” Carlo Buffone said.

“Sir, if I should deny the scriptures — the notices — I would be worthy to be banished from the middle aisle of St. Paul’s forever,” Cavalier Shift said.

“I take you at your word, sir,” Carlo Buffone said. “This gentleman has subscribed to your notices, and he is most desirous to become your pupil.”

Sogliardo’s name was subscribed — written — on the notices to show his interest in interviewing and perhaps hiring the notice’s writer.

Carlo Buffone added, “By the Virgin Mary, you must use expedition and make haste.”

He then said, “Signor Insulso Sogliardo, this is the professor.”

Cavalier Shift professed to have certain skills, such as in the smoking of tobacco.

“In good time, sir,” Sogliardo said.

This was a polite greeting.

Cavalier Shift took off his hat.

Sogliardo said, “Nay, good sir, house your head.”

Cavalier Shift put on his hat.

“Do you profess these sleights in tobacco?” Sogliardo asked.

“Sleights” are “tricks” or “skills”: different ways of smoking.

Cavalier Shift replied, “I do more than profess, sir, and if you please to be a practitioner, I will undertake in one fortnight to teach you so well that you shall take it plausibly and with public admiration in any ordinary, theatre, or the Tilt Yard if need be, the most popular assembly that is.”

An ordinary is an eating-house.

The Tilt Yard was a place for tilting, aka jousting.

“But you cannot bring him to the whiff so soon?” Puntarvolo said.

“Yes, as soon as that, sir,” Cavalier Shift said. “He shall inhale the one, two, and three whiff, if it pleases him, and upon the inhalation take his horse, drink his three cups of canary wine, and expose — exhale and vomit — one (whiff of smoke and cup of wine) time at Hounslow, a second time at Staines, and a third time at Bagshot.”

Each of these three towns was over ten miles from London.

Apparently, Cavalier Shift was saying that he would teach new smokers how to inhale smoke and then exhale that smoke in three widely separate locations. Because they were new smokers, they would get sick and vomit their wine in these three locations.

“Bow-wow!” Carlo Buffone said.

The proverb “Bow-wows are no wedding” means that noisy protestations are not necessarily to be trusted.

To inhale smoke and then hold one’s breath in order to exhale the smoke at these three widely separated locations is impossible.

“You will not serve me, sir, will you?” Sogliardo said. “I’ll give you more than countenance.”

He was offering Cavalier Shift a job.

“Countenance” is “maintenance,” aka “what is necessary to maintain oneself,” including monetary recompense.

It can also mean 1) patronage, and 2) goodwill.

By “serve,” Sogliardo meant “work as a servant.”

“Pardon me, sir, I scorn to serve any man,” Cavalier Shift responded.

One meaning of “serve” is “have sex with.”

Today, farmers still talk of a bull servicing a cow.

“Who? He serve?” Carlo Buffone said. “By God’s blood, he keeps high men and low men, he; he has a fair living at Fulham.”

“High men and low men” are servants, but another meaning of the phrase is loaded dice.

Cavalier Shift did not have servants, but he could very well gamble with loaded dice.

Loaded dice were also called high fulhams and low fulhams and were named after the town of Fulham, where many people gambled.

“But in the nature of a fellow, I’ll be your follower if you please,” Cavalier Shift said.

A fellow is a companion rather than a servant.

“Sir, you shall stay and dine with me, and if we can agree, we’ll not part in haste,” Sogliardo said. “I am very bountiful to men of quality. Where shall we go, signor?”

Men of quality are 1) men of skill, and/or 2) men of good birth.

“Mitre is the best house,” Puntarvolo said.

“I can make this dog take as many whiffs as I please, and he shall retain or effume them at my pleasure,” Cavalier Shift said about Puntarvolo’s dog.

“Effume” meant “puff out smoke.”

“By your patience,” Puntarvolo said.

“By your patience” meant “excuse me.”

He did not want his dog to be taught how to smoke. Smoking could make his dog ill, and he loved his dog.

He then said to his serving-men, who were taking care of his dog and cat, “Follow me, fellows.”

“Sir Puntarvolo!” Sogliardo said.

“Pardon me, my dog shall not eat in his company for a million pounds,” Puntarvolo said.

He, his serving-men, and his dog and cat exited.

Carlo Buffone said, “Nay, don’t you be amazed, Signor Whiff, whatever that stiff-necked gentleman says.”

Puntarvolo’s usual posture was stiffly upright. He was also stubborn, and he was determined to take care of his dog.

“No, for you do not know the humor of the dog as we do,” Sogliardo said.

Puntarvolo was very devoted to his dog. That was one of his humors.

“Where shall we dine, Carlo?” Sogliardo said. “I would like to go to one of these ordinaries, now that I am a gentleman.”

“So you may,” Carlo Buffone said. “Weren’t you ever at one yet?”

“No, indeed,” Sogliardo said, “but they say your most choice gallants resort there.”

Carlo Buffone replied:

“True, and the fashion is, when any stranger comes in among them, they all stand up and stare at him, as if he were some unknown beast brought out of Africa. But that’ll be helped with a good adventurous face: A bold manner can overcome their hostility.

“You must be impudent enough, sit down, and don’t be deferential. When anything’s propounded above your capacity to understand it, smile at it, make two or three faces, and it is excellent; they’ll think you have travelled — though you argue a whole day in silence thus, and discourse in nothing but laughter, it will pass.

“Only now and then give fire, discharge a good full oath, and offer a great wager — it will be admirable.”

“I assure you, I am resolute to do so,” Sogliardo said.

He then gave Cavalier Shift a coin and said, “Come, good signor, there’s a poor French crown for your ordinary — for your meal.”

“It comes well, for I had not so much as the least portcullis of coin before,” Cavalier Shift said.

A portcullis is a small coin: a silver half-penny.

They exited.

Mitis said to Cordatus, “I travail — am in labor with — with another objection, signor, which I fear will be charged against the author, before I can be delivered of it.”

“What’s that, sir?” Cordatus asked.

Mitis replied, “That the subject-matter of his comedy might have been of some other nature, as of a Duke to be in love with a Countess, and that Countess to be in love with the Duke’s son, and the son to love the lady’s waiting maid; some such cross-wooing, with a clown as their serving-man, and that would be better than to be thus nearly, closely, particularly, and familiarly linked to the current time and way of life.”

This description of comedic subject-matter applied to some of William Shakespeare’s comedies.

Cordatus said, “You say well, but I would like to hear one of these autumn-judgments define once the question ‘Quid sit comoedia?’”

“Autumn-judgments” are old critics, including those who are going senile.

Quid sit comoedia means: What should be comedy?

Cordatus continued:

“If he cannot, let him content himself with Cicero’s definition (until he have strength to propose to himself a better), who would have a comedy to be imitatio vitae [an imitation of life], speculum consuetudinis [a mirror of customs], imago veritatis [an image of truth]; a thing throughout pleasant, jocular, laughable, and ridiculous, and accommodated to the correction and improvement of social manners and behavior.

“If the poet-playwright should have failed in any particle of this, they may worthily and justifiably tax him, but if not, why, you (who are for them) should be silent, as I will be for the poet-playwright, and give way to the actors.”

Alone on his farm, Sordido, who had a noose around his neck because he was thinking about committing suicide, said to himself:

“By God’s precious blood, if the weather and the season are so indifferent to social conditions that beggars shall live as well as their betters, and that my hunger and thirst for riches shall not make them hunger and thirst with poverty, and that my sleeps shall be broken and their hearts not broken, and that my coffers shall be full and yet I still worry, and that their coffers shall be empty and yet they are merry, then it is time that a cross — a gibbet — should bear flesh and blood, since flesh and blood cannot bear this cross.”

His cross was that the weather had been good. He had expected excessive rain that would ruin the harvest and make his already stored grain much more valuable.

Mitis asked, “What! Will he hang himself?”

“Indeed, aye,” Cordatus said. “It seems his prognostication — predictive weather report — has not kept faith with him, and that makes him despair.”

“Curse me, he will be out of his humor then indeed,” Mitis said.

Sordido will no longer display his personal idiosyncrasy — his greed — because he will be dead.

Sordido continued:

“Tut, these star-monger knaves, these astrological weather predictors, who would trust them? One says ‘dark and rainy’ when it is as clear as crystal, another says ‘tempestuous blasts and storms’ and it is as calm as a milk bowl.

“Here are sweet rascals for a man to trust his whole fortunes to.

“You sky-staring coxcombs, you; you fat brains, a curse upon you! You are good for nothing but to sweat into night-caps and make scholars’ rug-gowns expensive.

“You are learned men, and yet haven’t a legion of devils à votre service, à votre service — at your service, at your service?”

Scholars such as Doctor Faustus summoned demons who would act as their servants for a predetermined number of years as long as Satan received the scholar’s soul at the end of the demons’ service.

“By heaven, I think I shall die a better scholar than they.”

Seeing a servant enter the scene, he said, “But wait.”

Then he asked, “What is it now, sirrah?”

The servant handed him a document and said, “Here’s a letter that has come from your son, sir.”

“From my son, sir?” Sordido said. “Why would my son write, sir? Some good news, no doubt.”

Because of his mood, he was sarcastic.

He began to read the letter out loud:

“Sweet and dear father:

“Desiring you first to send me your blessing, which is more worth to me than gold or silver, I desire you likewise to be informed that this Shrovetide, contrary to custom, we are accustomed always to have revels, which is indeed dancing, and makes an excellent show, in truth, especially if we gentlemen are well-attired, which our seniors — barristers and benchers — of the Inns of Court note, and think the better of our fathers the better we are maintained; and that they — the barristers and benchers — shall know if they — the fathers — come up and have anything to do in the law.”

Shrovetide is the Sunday, Monday, and Tuesday before Ash Wednesday, which is the first day of Lent. Lent is a six-week period of fasting and penitence observed by some branches of Christianity before Easter.

Christmas revels usually ended on Candlemas, February 2.

In his letter, Fungoso was hinting that the seniors of the Inns of Court would take note if he wore new clothing and they would therefore respect Sordido more if he ever had a case in the law courts.

Sordido continued to read the letter out loud:

“Therefore, good father, these lines in my letter are, for your own sake as well as mine, to re-desire you that you let me not lack that which is fit for the setting-up of our name in the honorable volume of gentility, so that I may say to our calumniators with Tully, Ego sum ortus domus meae, tu occasus tuae.”

The Latin lines stated this: “I am the rising star of my house; you are the falling star of your house.”

Marcus Tullius Cicero is not known to have written those lines. The lines are derived from Plutarch.

Sordido continued to read the letter out loud:

“And thus, not doubting of your fatherly benevolence, I humbly ask for your blessing, and I pray to God to bless you.

“Yours, if his own.”

Sordido said to himself:

“What’s this? ‘Yours, if his own’? Isn’t he my son, unless he is his own son?”

“Likely, this is some new kind of subscription the gallants use.”

A subscription is a complimentary close to a letter; for example, “yours” or “yours sincerely.”

The complimentary close could mean, “I am yours, if I am my own man.”

Such a close could be meant to be complimentary: If I am a man, it is because I have had you as my father and you have raised me well.

Unfortunately, in the letter, Fungoso was asking for money and so he was not his own man. He also hardly seemed to be the rising star of his house.

Sordido said to the servant, “Well, why do thou stay, knave? Away, go.”

The servant exited.

Sordido said to himself:

“Here’s a letter indeed! Revels? And benevolence? Is this a weather to send benevolence? Or is this a season to revel in? By God’s eyelid, the devil and all conspire to vex me, I think.”

In Ben Jonson’s society, “benevolence” meant 1) affection and goodwill, and 2) a gift of money.

Sordido continued:

“This letter would never have come now else, now, now, when the sun shines and the air is thus clear.

“By my soul, if this good weather continues, we shall shortly have an excellent crop of corn spring out of the highways; the streets and houses of the town will be hid with the rankness — the fertility — of the fruits that grow there in spite of good husbandry.”

To Sordido, “good husbandry” was stockpiling grain in order to sell it at high prices in a time of famine.

Sordido was despairing much too early. The time was before Ash Wednesday, and the earliest that Ash Wednesday can occur is 4 February, and the latest it can occur is 10 March. In 1599, Ash Wednesday fell on 21 February. Since the location was Britain, the time was much too early to worry about the harvesting of grain.

In this play, time moves differently for Sordido than it does for other characters.

Sordido continued:

“Bah, I’ll prevent the sight of it. Come as quickly as it can, I will prevent the sight of it. I have this remedy, heaven.

“Wait, I’ll test the pain thus a little.”

He was going to test the pain of hanging by experiencing the pull of the noose at his neck.

He climbed up a ladder, attached the noose to something that would hold his weight, grabbed the rope, and pulled at his neck.

Sordido continued:

“Oh, nothing, nothing.”

The pain was nothing he thought he couldn’t handle.

Sordido continued:

“Well, now shall my son gain a benevolence — a generous inheritance — by my death? Or shall anybody be the better for my gold or so forth?

“No.

“Alive, I kept it from them, and dead, my ghost shall walk about it and preserve it; my son and daughter shall starve before they touch it. I have hidden it as deep as hell from the sight of heaven, and to it I go now.”

He dropped from the ladder.

Five or six rustics — country folk — one after the other, entered the scene.

Seeing the hanging Sordido, the first rustic said, “Oh, what pitiful sight is this! Help! Help! Help!”

“What is it now?” the second rustic asked. “What’s the matter?”

The first rustic answered, “Oh, here’s a man who has hanged himself! Help me to get him down and revive him again!”

The first rustic cut the hanging rope.

“Hanged himself?” the second rustic said. “By God’s eyelid, carry him before a justice; it is chance-medley, on my word.”

Actually, “chance-medley” is manslaughter, not deliberate suicide.

“What is this now?” the third rustic said. “What’s going on here?”

“How did this happen?” the fourth rustic asked.

“Someone has executed himself contrary to the order of law, and by my consent he shall answer for it,” the second rustic said.

To do that, the man would have to recover from the hanging.

“I wish he were in a condition to answer for it,” the fifth rustic said.

Sordido began to revive.

“Stand aside,” the first rustic said. “Give him room. He recovers. Give him breath.”

“Oh!” Sordido said.

The fifth rustic said to the first rustic, “By the Mass, it was well you went by way of the footpath and not by way of the highway, neighbor.”

“Aye, if I had not cut the noose,” the first rustic said.

“What?” Sordido said. “Cut the noose? Aye me, I am undone! I am undone!”

“Aye me” is an expression used when upset or worried.

The meaning of this “undone” is “ruined.”

“By the Virgin Mary, if you had not been undone, you would have been hanged, I can tell you,” the second rustic said.

The meaning of this “undone” is “cut down from the noose.”

Sordido said, “You threadbare horsebread-eating rascals, if you had to meddle, couldn’t you have untied the rope, but instead you must cut it? And in the middle, too? Aye me!”

He was complaining because the rope was ruined after having been cut in the middle.

Horsebread was beans and grains that are used as horse fodder: lentils, oats, peas. Poor people ate them when wheat and barley were too expensive.

“Curse me, it is the caterpillar Sordido!” the first rustic said.
“How cursed are the poor because the viper was blessed with this good fortune!”

A caterpillar is metaphorically a rapacious person.

Sordido was literally a rapacious person.

The other rustics turned against the first rustic.

“Nay, how accursed are thou, who are the cause of the curse of the poor!” the second rustic said to the first rustic.

The first rustic had kept Sordido alive, and Sordido had behaved badly toward the poor.

“Aye, and to save so wretched a caitiff — a villain!” the third rustic said.

“Cursed be thy fingers that loosed him!” the fourth rustic said.

“May some desperate Fury possess thee, so that thou may hang thyself, too!” the fourth rustic said.

The Furies are avenging spirits that come from hell.

“Never may thou be saved and receive salvation, who saved so damned a monster!” the fifth rustic said.

Hearing all this, Sordido said to himself:

“What curses these men utter! How have my deeds made my looks differ from another man’s, with the result that they should thus detest and loath my life?”

“Curses on my wretched humor! It is that which makes me thus monstrous in true human eyes.”

His humor was greed.

Sordido then said to the rustics:

“Pardon me, gentle friends. I’ll make fair amends for my past foul errors, and twenty-fold I will restore to all the men whom with wrong I robbed. My barns and garner shall stand open continually to all the poor who come, and my best grain shall be made alms-bread — charity-food — to feed half-famished mouths.

“Although hitherto among you I have lived like an unsavory muckhill — stinking manure-heap — to myself, yet now my gathered heaps, being spread outside my home, shall turn to better and more fruitful uses.”

A proverb stated, “Money, like dung, does no good unless it is spread.”

Sordido pointed to the first rustic and said:

“Bless then this man. Curse him no more for saving my life and soul and keeping them together.

“Oh, how deeply the bitter curses of the poor do pierce!

“I am by a wonderful miracle changed. Come in with me and witness my repentance.

“Now I prove:

“No life is blest that is not graced with love.”

He exited.

The wonderful miracle was to see himself as others saw him.

Later, the Scottish poet Robert Burns would write:

“O wad some Power the giftie gie us, to see oursels as ithers see us!”

[“Oh, would some Power the gift give us, to see ourselves as others see us.”]

Sordido was now a man out of his humor. His humor had been to make lots of money even if it meant disobeying the law and withholding grain from the market even though the result was that impoverished people would starve. Now he wanted to make amends and become a good person.

“Oh, a miracle!” the second rustic said. “See when a man has grace.”

“Wouldn’t it have been a pity that so good a man should have been cast away?” the third rustic said.

According to Sordido’s society, he would have been damned and cast into hell if he had succeeded in committing suicide.

“Well, I’ll get our parish clerk to put his conversion in the chronicle — the church records,” the second rustic said.

“Do, for I will assure the cleric that Sordido is a virtuous man,” the fourth rustic said.

“Oh, God, how he wept, if you noticed it!” the fourth rustic said. “Did you see how the tears trilled?”

“Trilled” can mean 1) flowed in a steady stream, or 2) rolled along like a ball.

“Yes, believe me, like master vicar’s bowls upon the green, for all the world,” the fifth rustic said.

The third or fourth rustic said to the first rustic, “Oh, neighbor, God’s blessing on your heart, neighbor, it was a good, pleasing deed!”

They exited.

Cordatus said, “What do you think now, Mitis? What’s that you are thinking about so seriously?”

Mitis replied:

“Indeed, I am thinking about that which does in fact please me: the warping and twisting condition of this green and soggy — waterlogged with tears — multitude.

“But in good faith, signor, your author has largely outstripped my expectation in this scene — I will liberally confess it. For when I saw Sordido so desperately intending to do a desperate act, I thought I had a grasp — an understanding — of him then.”

“What?” Cordatus said. “You supposed he should have hung himself indeed?”

Mitis replied, “I did, and I had framed and fashioned my objection to it ready, which may yet be very fitly and aptly urged, and with some necessity; for though his purposed violence lost the effect and extended not to death, yet the intent and horror of the object was more than the nature of a comedy will in any sort allow.”

“Oh?” Cordatus said. “What do you think of Plautus in his comedy called Cistellaria there, where he brings in Alcestimarchus with a drawn sword ready to kill himself, and as he is ready to fix his breast upon it, he is restrained from his resolved outrage and act of violence by Silenium and the Bawd? Doesn’t Plautus’ authority have the power to give our scene approbation and approval?”

Cistellaria is the play The Casket, aka The Small Chest.

Mitis replied, “Sir, this your single example has left me to say this: I think it is so indeed, your memory is happier than mine. But I wonder what device the playwright will use to bring the rest out of their humors?”

Cordatus said:

“That will appear soon. Don’t occupy your imagination with other thoughts.

“Let your mind keep company with the scene still, which now removes itself from the country to the court. Here comes Macilente and Signor Brisk freshly outfitted in new clothing.

“Don’t get lost in side issues, for now the epitasis or busy part of our subject is in action.”

Ben Jonson divided his play into three parts:

Protasis: the beginning, in which his characters demonstrate their humors.

Epitasis: the middle, in which his characters have experiences that take away their humors. This has already happened with Sordido.

Catastrophe: the conclusion. This occurs in the final scene of this play: 5.6.

— 3.3 —

At court, Macilente, Fastidious Brisk, and Cinedo talked together. Macilente and Fastidious Brisk were wearing new suits of clothing, and Cinedo was holding tobacco. Cinedo was Fastidious Brisk’s page.

A viola da gamba was hanging up. was also known as a bass viol, and it was played between the legs like a cello, inspiring some wits to make bawdy comments about it.

“Well, now, Signor Macilente, you are not only welcome to the court, but also to my mistress’ withdrawing-chamber,” Fastidious Brisk said.

This chamber was a drawing-room, a large room in which guests could be received.

He then said to Cinedo, his page, “Boy, get me some tobacco.”

Cinedo prepared a pipe of tobacco.

Fastidious Brisk said to Macilente, "I'll just go in and show I am here, and come to you presently, sir."

He exited.

Macilente said to himself:

"What's that he said? By heaven, I wasn't paying attention to him. My thoughts and I were of another world.

"I was admiring my own outside — my new suit of clothing — here. I was thinking what privilege and palm — emblem of excellence — it bears here in the court.

"No matter how vile a man is in wit, in judgment, manners, or what else, if he can just purchase a silken cover of fine clothing, he shall not only pass, but pass well regarded.

"In contrast, let a man be poor and meanly clad, although ever so richly talented and intelligent, you shall have a fellow who knows nothing but his beef — and so is beef-witted and stupid and uncouth — or how to rinse his clammy guts in beer, who will take the poor man by the shoulders or by the throat and kick him down the stairs.

"Such is the state of virtue in bad clothes — ha, ha, ha, ha!

"That raiment should be in such high regard and so much in vogue! How long should I live and wait before I should take off my hat to my lord chancellor's tomb or the shrieve's posts? By heaven, I think, a thousand thousand years."

"My lord chancellor's tomb" was the impressive tomb of Sir Christopher Hatton in St. Paul's Choir.

The shrieve's posts were set up in front of the house of the sheriff or mayor. On it, proclamations were posted.

A shrieve is a sheriff.

If Macilente were to take off his hat to my lord chancellor's tomb or the shrieve's posts, he would be paying homage to appearances, the way that some people pay homage to fine clothing. Better to pay homage to a good person, no matter how well or badly they are dressed.

Macilente continued:

“Sir Christopher's gravity, his wisdom, and his faith and loyalty to my dread sovereign — graces that survive him — these I could well bear to venerate, but not his tomb, no more than I'll commend the chapel organ for the gilt on its outer surface, or this bass viol for the varnished face.”

He would pay respect to Sir Christopher's gravity, wisdom, and loyalty to Queen Elizabeth I, but not to his tomb, impressive though it was. The same applied to other appearances, such as the gilt on the cabinet of an organ or the varnish on a bass viol.

Fastidious Brisk returned and said to Macilente, “Indeed, I have made you wait somewhat long, sir.”

He then said to Cinedo, “But is my tobacco ready, boy?”

“Aye, sir,” Cinedo replied.

“Give it to me,” Fastidious Brisk said.

He then said to Macilente, “My mistress is at the point of coming. You shall see her soon, sir.”

He puffed tobacco and said, “You'll say you never accosted a more piercing wit.”

He then said to Cinedo, “This tobacco is not dried, boy, or else the pipe's defective.”

He gave the pipe to Cinedo, who mended it.

Fastidious Brisk then said:

“Oh, your wits of Italy are nothing compared to her; her brain’s a very quiver of jests, and she darts them abroad with that sweet release of an arrow and judicial aim that you would —

“Here she comes, sir.”

Saviolina, a court lady, entered the scene.

Macilente said to himself, “It’s about time. His invention of archery metaphors would have bogged down if she had not come.”

Saviolina called to a servant, “Give me my fan there.”

She exited.

“How are you now, Monsieur Brisk?” Macilente said.

“A kind of affectionate reverence strikes me with a cold shivering, I think,” Fastidious Brisk said.

“I like such tempers well, such tempers as stand before their mistresses with fear and trembling, and before their Maker — their Creator — like impudent mountains,” Macilente said, sarcastically.

“By Jesus, I’d spend twenty pounds for my vaulting horse to stand here now, so that she might see me do just one trick!” Fastidious Brisk said.

“Why, does she love activity?” Macilente asked.

A trick can be a sexual act; activity includes sexual activity.

A vaulting horse was a piece of gymnastics equipment; a vaulting-house is a brothel.

Cinedo said, “Or if you just had your long stockings on to be dancing a lively galliard dance, as she comes by.”

“Aye, either of those,” Fastidious Brisk said. “Oh, these stirring humors make ladies mad with desire.”

“Stirring” means “sexually exciting.”

He then said, “She comes. May my good genius embolden me! Boy, give me the pipe quickly.”

His “good genius” was his guardian angel.

Saviolina returned.

Macilente said to himself, “Will he give her music?”

“Tunes” could be played on a different kind of pipe.

“A second good morrow to my fair mistress,” Fastidious Brisk said.

By “morrow,” Fastidious Brisk was using the now-obsolete meaning “morning.”

“Fair servant,” Saviolina said, “I’ll thank you a day hence — tomorrow — when the date of your salutation comes forth.”

This kind of mistress is a woman who is admired, and this kind of servant is a man who admires a woman.

“How do you like that answer?” Fastidious Brisk asked Macilente. “Isn’t it admirable?”

“I would be a simple-minded courtier if I could not admire trifles, sir,” Macilente said.

“Trifles” are trivial jokes.

Smoking, Fastidious Brisk punctuated his discourse with puffs on his pipe:

“Indeed, sweet lady, I shall” — puff — “be prepared to give you thanks for those thanks, and” — puff — “study more attentive and obsequious” — puff — “to your fair beauties” — puff.

He then said to Cinedo, “Mend the pipe, boy.”

He gave Cinedo the pipe.

Macilente said to himself, “I never knew tobacco taken as a parenthesis before.”

“Before God, sweet lady, believe it, I honor the meanest, lowliest rush in this chamber for your love,” Fastidious Brisk said.

Rushes were reeds that were used as floor coverings.

He prized the lowliest reed simply because Saviolina had trodden on it.

“For your love” meant “because of my love for you.”

“Aye, you need not tell me that, sir,” Saviolina said. “I think you do prize a rush before my love.”

She was pretending that Fastidious Brisk had said ’fore, not for.

If he prized the lowliest reed before her love, then he prized the lowliest reed more than he prized her love.

Macilente, not impressed by her wit, said to himself, “Is this the wonder of nations?”

“Oh, by Jesus, pardon me, I said, ‘for your love,’ by this light,” Fastidious Brisk said, “but it is the accustomed sharpness of your ingenuity, sweet mistress to —”

By “ingenuity,” he meant “sharpness of wit.”

He interrupted himself, “— by the Mass, your viol’s newly strung, I think.”

Fastidious Brisk took down the bass viol from the wall and began to tune it.

Macilente said to himself, “Ingenuity? I see his ignorance will not suffer him to slander her, which he would have done most notably, if he had said ‘wit’ for ‘ingenuity,’ as he meant it.”

Macilente thought that Fastidious Brisk had said the truth about Saviolina when he mentioned “ingenuity,” which Macilente was pretending to be “ingenuous,” or well-born.

In Ben Jonson’s society, the adjective form of “ingenuity” could be either “ingenious” or “ingenuous.”

Macilente knew that Saviolina was well-born; he did not believe that she was witty.

Humming, Fastidious Brisk began to tune the bass viol, “By the soul of music, lady. Hum, hum.”

“I wish that we might hear it once,” Saviolina said.

Either Fastidious Brisk’s tuning was taking a long time, or his tuning already provided evidence that his playing would be bad and so once was enough.

Fastidious Brisk said, “I do more adore and admire your — hum, hum — predominant and powerful perfections than — hum, hum — ever I shall have power and faculty to express — hum.”

“Upon the viol da gamba, do you mean?” Saviolina said.

“It’s miserably out of tune, by this hand,” Fastidious Brisk said.

“Nay, rather by the fingers,” Saviolina said.

Fastidious Brisk’s fingers were miserably tuning the bass viol.

Macilente said to himself, “It makes good harmony with her wit.”

The bass viol and her wit were both out of tune, in his opinion.

“Sweet lady, tune it,” Fastidious Brisk said, giving up.

He handed her the bass viol and then said to Cinedo, “Boy, some tobacco.”

Macilente said to himself, “Tobacco again? He does court his mistress with very exceedingly good changes.”

The changes were in his behavior, but the word “changes” is also a musical term.

Fastidious Brisk said, “Signor Macilente, you take no tobacco, sir?”

He puffed.

“No, unless I had a mistress, signor, it would be a great indecorum for me to take tobacco,” Macilente said.

“How do you like her wit?” Fastidious Brisk said.

He puffed.

“Her ingenuity is excellent, sir,” Macilente said.

Again, in Ben Jonson’s society, the adjective form of “ingenuity” could be either “ingenious” or “ingenuous.”

Indicating Saviolina tuning the bass viol, Fastidious Brisk said:

“You see the subject of her sweet fingers there?”

He puffed.

“Oh, she tickles it so that she makes it laugh most divinely.”

He puffed.

“I’ll tell you a good jest now, and you yourself shall say it’s a good one: I have wished myself to be that instrument, I think, a thousand times, and not so few as a thousand times, by heavens.”

He puffed.

Macilente said, “That’s not unlikely, sir, but how? To be cased up and hung by on the wall?”

“Cased up” means the bass viol would be put in its case.

In Ben Jonson’s society, the word “case” meant vagina, and jokes were made about male instruments being put in feminine cases.

Fastidious Brisk said, “Oh, no, sir, to be in use, I assure you, as your judicious eyes may testify.”

He puffed.

“In use” referred both to the musical instrument and to male and female sexual parts.

Offering Fastidious Brisk the bass viol, Saviolina said, “Here, servant, if you will play, come.”

Continuing to puff, Fastidious Brisk said:

“Instantly, sweet lady.

“In good faith, I say that here’s most divine tobacco.”

“Nay, I cannot stay to dance after your pipe,” Saviolina said.

The word “pipe” sometimes was used to refer to the male sexual instrument.

A bawdy ballad titled “The Shaking of the Sheets” had an alternate title: “Dance After My Pipe.”

She began to leave.

“Good — nay, dear lady, stay,” Fastidious Brisk said. “By this sweet smoke, I think your wit is all fire.”

He puffed.

Macilente said to himself, “And he’s the salamander that lives by it.”

Ben Jonson’s society believed that salamanders were able to live in fire.

“Is your tobacco perfumed, sir?” Saviolina asked. “Is that why you swear by the sweet smoke?”

Fastidious Brisk said:

“Still more excellent. Before God and these bright heavens, I think” — he puffed — “you are made of ingenuity, I do.”

He puffed.

Macilente said to himself, “True, as your discourse is. Oh, abominable!”

“Will Your Ladyship take any tobacco?” Fastidious Brisk asked.

“Oh, be quiet, I ask you,” Saviolina said. “I don’t love the breath of a woodcock’s head.”

Pipe-smokers had bad breath.

Woodcocks were fools.

“Meaning my head, lady?” Fastidious Brisk asked.

“Not altogether so, sir,” Saviolina said. “But, as it were fatal to their follies who think to grace themselves with taking tobacco when they lack better entertainment, you see your pipe bears the true form of a woodcock’s head.”

Fastidious Brisk's pipe bowl was carved into the image of a woodcock, an easily caught bird that was therefore deemed to be stupid.

Saviolina was saying that people who smoke pipes when they have nothing better to do may think they look sophisticated but they resemble the woodcock.

"Oh, admirable simile!" Fastidious Brisk said.

"It is best leaving you in admiration, sir," Saviolina said.

Fastidious Brisk was doing little except praising Saviolina. Some praise can be good, but excessive admiration is cloying and can lead to the admired person's dislike.

Saviolina exited.

Macilente said to himself, "Are these the admired lady-wits, who, having so good a plainsong, can run no better division upon it?"

Plainsong is the theme, and division is a variation on the plainsong.

He added, "By God's heart, all her jests are of the fashion March was fifteen years ago."

Every Man Out of His Humor was first performed in 1599. In 1583 the Throckmorton plot against Elizabeth I and England was discovered. Part of the plot was to free Mary, Queen of Scots. Sir Francis Throckmorton was arrested in November 1583, and he was executed on 10 July 1584.

Also on 10 July 1584, William the Silent, aka William Prince of Orange was assassinated. From 1581, Balthasar Gérard plotted to assassinate him. The assassination led Parliament to pass the Bond of Association, a document intended to protect Elizabeth I.

According to Wikipedia:

The document obliged all signatories to execute any person that:

- attempted to usurp the throne
- successfully usurped the throne
- made an attempt on Elizabeth's life
- successfully assassinated Elizabeth

In the last case, the document also made it obligatory for the signatories to hunt down the killer.

March 1584 was no time to be making jokes.

Macilente was unimpressed with Saviolina, whose jokes he regarded as old.

Macilente asked out loud, "Is this the blazing comet of wit, Monsieur Fastidious, whom your gallants wonder at so?"

Fastidious Brisk replied:

"Heart of a gentleman, to neglect me in the presence of a guest like this!

"Sweet sir, I beg you to be silent and don't tell anybody about my disgrace. By Jesus, I never was in so vile a humor in my life. And her wit was at the flood, too.

"Don't gossip about it for a million pounds, good sir. Let me be so far endeared to your love."

They exited.

Mitis said, "What follows next, Signor Cordatus? This gallant's humor is almost exhausted, I think; it ebbs apace, with this contrary breath of his mistress."

Cordatus replied:

“Oh, but it will flow again, for all this, until there shall come a general drought of humor among all our actors, and then I don’t doubt that his will fall as low as any.

“See who presents himself here!”

That person was Fungoso.

“What! In the old case?” Mitis asked.

The old case could be 1) in the same condition of needing money, or 2) in the same clothing he was wearing before.

Cordatus replied:

“Indeed, that which makes it the more pitiful.

“Do you understand where the scene is?”

ACT 4 (Every Man Out of His Humor)

— 4.1 —

Fungoso and Fallace talked together in Deliro's house.

"Why are you so melancholy, brother?" Fallace asked.

"I am not melancholy, I thank you, sister," Fungoso replied.

"Why aren't you merry, then?" Fallace asked. "There are just two of us siblings in all the world, and if we should not be comforts to one another, God help us."

Fungoso said, "Indeed, I cannot tell, sister, but if a man had any true melancholy in him, it would make him melancholy to see his yeomanly father cut his neighbors' throats to make his son a gentleman; and yet when he has cut them, he will see his son's throat cut, too, before he makes him a true gentleman indeed, before death cuts his own throat. I must be the first head of our house, and yet he will not give me the head until I am made so. Is any man termed a gentleman who is not always dressed in the latest fashion? I would like to know that."

The "first head" is a first-generation gentleman.

"Give me the head" means "give me freedom."

Fallace said:

"If you are melancholy for that, brother, I think I have as much cause to be melancholy as one, for I'll be sworn I live as little in the fashion as any woman in London.

"By the bible of heaven (beast that I am to say it), I have not one friend in the world besides my husband."

The word "friend" can mean 1) lover, or 2) well-wisher or patron.

Fallace then asked, “When did you see Master Fastidious Brisk, brother?”

Fungoso said:

“Just a while ago, sister, I think. I don’t know well, in truth.

“By God’s eyelid, I could fight with all my heart, I think.”

“Nay, good brother, don’t be resolute to brawl,” Fallace said.

“I sent him a letter, and he writes me no answer neither,” Fungoso said.

By “him,” Fungoso meant their father, Sordido, but Fallace immediately thought of Fastidious Brisk.

Fallace said:

“Oh, sweet Fastidious Brisk! Oh, fine courtier! Thou are he who makes me sigh and say, ‘How blessed is that woman who has a courtier as her husband! And how miserable a dame she is who has neither husband nor friend in the court!’

“Oh, sweet Fastidious! Oh, fine courtier!

“How comely he makes a bow in his curtsy! How full he hits a woman between the lips when he kisses! How upright he sits at the table! How daintily he carves meat! How sweetly he talks and tells news of this lord and of that lady! How cleanly he wipes his spoon at every spoonful of any white-meat he eats, and what an elegant case of toothpicks he carries about him always!

“Oh, sweet Fastidious! Oh, fine courtier!”

White-meat is made of dairy foods — milk, cheese, and curds — and of eggs.

Toothpicks were fashionable.

Deliro entered the scene with a band of musicians.

“See, yonder she is, gentlemen,” Deliro said. “Now, as ever you’ll bear the name of musicians, touch your instruments sweetly. She has a delicate ear, I tell you; don’t play a false note, I beg you.”

“Don’t worry, Signor Deliro,” a musician said.

“Oh, begin, begin, play some sprightly thing,” Deliro said.

The musicians played.

“Lord, how my imagination races with thoughts of the success of it!” Deliro said. “Well done. Good, indeed! Heaven grant it will please her. I’ll not be seen, for then she’ll be sure to dislike it.”

He hid himself.

Hearing the music, Fallace said, “Heyday, this is excellent. I’ll bet my life this is my husband’s dotage.”

Her husband was foolishly in love with her.

Seeing her husband, she said, “I thought so. Nay, never play peekaboo with me. I know you do nothing but study how to anger me, sir.”

Her husband was peeking out from his hiding place.

“Anger thee, sweet wife?” Deliro asked. “Why, didn’t thou send for musicians to play during supper last night thyself?”

“To supper, sir?” Fallace said. “Now come off it! To supper, I say to you! As though there were no difference between suppertime when folks should be merry and this time when they would be melancholy! I would never take upon me to take a wife if I had no more judgment to please her.”

“Be pleased, sweet wife, and they shall have finished,” Deliro said.

He motioned to the musicians to stop playing and leave.

He then said, “And I wish to Christ that my life were done, if I can never please thee!”

The musicians exited.

Macilente entered the scene and said, “May God save you, lady. Where is Master Deliro?”

“Here, Master Macilente,” Deliro said. “You’re welcome from the court, sir. No doubt you have been graced exceedingly by Master Brisk’s mistress, and the rest of the ladies, for his sake.”

Macilente replied:

“Alas, the poor fantasist, he’s scarcely known to any lady there, and those who know him know him to be the simplest — most foolish and least sophisticated — man of all they know.

“They deride and play upon his amorous humors, although he just apishly — ridiculously — imitates the most gallant courtiers, kissing ladies’ pumps — shoes — holding to the side the cloth hanging over a doorway for them, praising their wits, and servilely observing everyone who may do them pleasure, fearful to be seen with any man, although that man is ever so worthy, who’s not in grace with some who are the greatest.

“Thus courtiers do, and these he counterfeits, but he does not set such a sightly carriage upon their vanities as they themselves, and therefore they despise him; for indeed he’s like a zany clown to a tumbler, who tries tricks after him to make men laugh.”

Fastidious Brisk tries to imitate the real courtiers, but his imitation is poor.

The ladies laugh at him.

Fallace said to herself, "Here's an unthankful spiteful wretch! The good gentleman — Fastidious Brisk — condescended to make him his companion because my husband put him into a few rags, and now see how the unrude — dreadful — rascal backbites him."

The "rags" were Macilente's new set of clothing.

"Is he no more graced among them then, say you?" Deliro asked.

"Indeed, he is like a pawn at chess," Macilente said. "He fills up a space, that's all."

The pawn is the least valuable piece in a game of chess.

Fallace said to herself, "Oh, monster of men! Can the earth bear such an envious caitiff, such an envious wretch?"

"Well, I repent that I ever believed him so much," Deliro said. "But, now that I see what he is and that his masquing visor is off, I'll forbear — endure and tolerate — him no longer."

A masquing visor is a mask that a person would wear at an entertainment called a masque.

Deliro continued, "All his lands are mortgaged to me, and they are forfeited. Besides, I have bonds of his in my hand for the receipt of now twenty pounds, now thirty, now twenty-five. Still, as he has had a fan but wagged at him, he would be in a new suit."

If a woman wagged her fan at him, it raised his hopes and made him want a new set of clothes to impress her.

Deliro continued, "Well, I'll salute him by a sergeant the next time I see him, indeed, I'll suit him."

He will sue Fastidious Brisk with a lawsuit, and a sergeant will arrest him.

“Why, you may soon see him, sir, for he is to meet Signor Puntarvolo at a notary’s by the Royal Exchange, soon, where he means to take up upon return,” Macilente said.

Puntarvolo was going to get his travel wager written up as a formal contract.

Fallace said to Macilente, “Now, out upon thee, Judas! Can’t thou be content to backbite thy friend, but thou must also betray him? Will thou seek the undoing and ruin of any man? And of such a man, too?”

She then asked Deliro, “And will you, sir, get your living by the counsel of traitors?”

A living is an income. Deliro could get Fastidious Brisk’s land and get the income from it.

“Dear wife, have patience,” Deliro said.

“The house will fall, the ground will open and swallow us!” Fallace said. “I’ll not stay here for all the gold and silver in heaven.”

Fallace exited.

“Oh, good Macilente, let’s follow and appease her, or the peace of my life is at an end,” Deliro said.

Deliro exited.

“Now peas, and not peace, feed that life whose head hangs so heavily over a woman’s manger!” Macilente said.

Peas are horse-fodder — and ass-fodder.

A manger can be 1) a sumptuous feast, or 2) an open box or trough from which animals can eat fodder.

The reader can decide for him- or herself which definition better applies to what Deliro's wife metaphorically provides him.

Macilente exited.

Fallace ran into a room, shut the door, and called, "Help me, brother!"

Deliro was outside the door.

She told him, "By God's body, if you come here, I'll do myself an evil!"

Deliro said, "Nay, hear me, sweet wife, unless thou will have me go, I will not go."

He would not leave the house to have Fastidious Brisk arrested without her permission.

"Tut, you shall never have that advantage of me, to say you are undone and ruined by me," Fallace said. "I'll not bid you stay, I won't."

She gave Fungoso money and said:

"Brother, sweet brother, here's four angels — gold coins — I'll give you toward your suit of clothing. For the love of Jesus, and as ever you were born a Christian, make haste to the water-side — you know where Master Fastidious is accustomed to land — and give him warning of my husband's intent, and tell him of that lean rascal's — Macilente's — treachery.

"Oh, Jesus, how my flesh — gorge — rises at him!

"Nay, sweet brother, make haste. You may say I would have written to him, but that the necessity of the time would not allow it — he cannot choose but take it as an extraordinary sign of favor from me — and commend me to him, good brother.

“Say that I sent you.”

Fallace exited.

Fungoso said to himself, “Let me see: These four angels, and then forty shillings more I can borrow on my gown in Fetter Lane by pawning it — well, I will go soon, try on my suit of clothing, pay as much money as I have, and swear myself into credit with my tailor for the rest.”

Fungoso exited.

— 4.2 —

Deliro and Macilente spoke together.

“Oh, on my soul, you wrong her, Macilente,” Deliro said. “Although she is froward — unruly — yet I know she is honest and chaste.”

“Well, then I have no judgment,” Macilente said. “Would any woman, but one who were wild and licentious in her affections, have broken out into that immodest and violent passion against her husband? Or is it possible —”

“If you love me, stop,” Deliro said. “All the arguments in the world shall never wrest my heart to believe it.”

Macilente and Deliro exited.

Cordatus asked Mitis, “How do you like the depiction of Deliro’s dotage concerning his wife?”

Mitis replied:

“Oh, strangely and uncommonly, and of the other’s malice, too, who labors so seriously to set debate between a man and his wife.

“Wait, here comes the knight adventurer.”

“Aye, and his scrivener comes with him,” Cordatus said.

A scrivener is a notary who can write legal contracts and other documents.

— 4.3 —

Puntarvolo and a notary talked together. Also present were a serving-man leading Puntarvolo's dog and a serving-man holding Puntarvolo's cat.

"I wonder that Monsieur Fastidious hasn't come!" Puntarvolo said. "But notary, if thou will please take notes on the indentures — the legal contract — while we wait, I will give thee the theory."

The theory was the terms and conditions: the rules that must be followed.

Fastidious Brisk was supposed to wager that Puntarvolo, his dog, and his cat would not successfully journey to Constantinople and back in the time allotted.

"With all my heart, sir, and I'll write them down immediately," the notary said.

"Well then, first, the amount of the wager is to be clearly written," Puntarvolo said.

Writing down notes, the notary said, "Good, sir."

"Next, our different names and the distinctive markings of my dog and my cat must be known," Puntarvolo said.

He said to a serving-man, "Show him the cat, sirrah."

"So, sir," the notary said.

Puntarvolo said, "Then, write that the intended destination is the Turk's court in Constantinople; the time limited for our return, a year; and that if any of us — me, my dog, or my cat — miscarry and fail to return on time, the whole venture — the whole amount of the wager — is lost — these are general articles, do thou understand? — or if any of us turn Turk.”

“Turn Turk” can mean 1) become a Muslim, 2) go to work for the Sultan of the Ottoman Empire (and become a traitor to one’s country), and/or 3) engage in homosexual acts with boys.

If Puntarvolo, his dog, or his cat were to turn Turk and do any of the above activities, then Puntarvolo would lose his wager.

“Aye, sir,” the notary said.

Puntarvolo said:

“Now for particulars:

“That I may make my travels by sea or land, to my best liking; and that, hiring a coach for myself, it shall be lawful for my dog and my cat to ride with me in the said coach.”

“Very good, sir,” the notary said.

Puntarvolo continued:

“That I may choose to or choose not to give my dog or my cat fish, for fear of bones, or any other nutriment that, by the judgment of the most authentic and authoritative physicians where I travel, shall be thought dangerous.”

“That is well, sir,” the notary said.

Puntarvolo continued:

“That, after the receipt of his money, Fastidious Brisk shall neither in his own person, nor any other, either by direct or indirect means, as magic, witchcraft, or other such exotic and foreign arts, attempt, practice, or conspire anything to the injury of me, my dog, or my cat; neither shall I use the help of any such sorceries or enchantments, such as ointments, to make our skins impenetrable, or to travel invisible by virtue of a powder or a ring, or to hang any three-forked charm about my dog's neck, secretly conveyed into his collar — do you understand? — but that all shall be performed sincerely, without fraud or imposture.”

In the Middle Ages, before trials by combat, the participants swore that they were not using any enchantments.

“So, sir,” the notary said.

Puntarvolo continued:

“That, for testimony of the performance — proof that I actually completed my journey — I myself am to bring from Constantinople a Turk's mustachio, my dog a hare's lip, and my cat the train or tail of a rat.”

A train can be a trap or snare.

“It is done, sir,” the notary said. “I have written it down.”

Puntarvolo said:

“It is said, sir, not done, sir.

“But let's go forward:

“That upon my return and landing on the Tower Wharf with the aforesaid testimony, I am to receive five for one, according to the proportion of the sums wagered.”

Fastidious Brisk was wagering five to one that Puntarvolo or his dog or his cat would not return by the appointed time. If they returned on time, he would pay Puntarvolo five hundred pounds.

“That is well, sir,” the notary said.

Puntarvolo said:

“Provided that, if before our departure or setting-forth, either I myself or my dog or my cat should be visited with sickness or any other unexpected accident, so that the whole course of the adventure be hindered thereby, that then the wager is off. He is to return, and I am to receive the prementioned proportion, upon fair and equal terms. In other words, all money wagered is to be returned.”

“Very good, sir,” the notary said. “Is this all?”

Puntarvolo said, “It is all, sir, and dispatch it all, good notary. Write out the legal contract.”

“As fast as is possible, sir,” the notary said.

He exited.

Seeing Carlo Buffone coming toward him, Puntarvolo said, “Oh, Carlo, welcome. Have you seen Monsieur Brisk?”

“Not I,” Carlo Buffone said. “Did he make an appointment to meet you here?”

“Aye, and I wonder that he should be so tardy,” Puntarvolo said. “He is to wager a hundred pounds on my venture, if he maintains his promise.”

“Is his hour past?” Carlo Buffone asked. “Has he missed his appointment?”

“Not yet, but the end of it comes on quickly,” Puntarvolo said.

“Tut, don’t be mistrustful of him,” Carlo Buffone said. “He will sooner break all the ten commandments than his hour. Upon my life in such a case, trust him.”

“I think, Carlo, that you look very smooth?” Puntarvolo said. “Huh?”

“Smooth” can mean 1) clean-shaven, or 2) glib and flattering.

“Why, I come but now from a hothouse, so I must necessarily look smooth,” Carlo Buffone said.

A hothouse can be 1) a bathhouse, or 2) a whorehouse.

“From a hothouse?” Puntarvolo said.

“Aye, do you make a wonder of it?” Carlo Buffone said. “Why, it’s your only medicine. Let a man sweat once a week in a hothouse and be well rubbed and frotted with a good plump juicy wench, and sweet, fresh linen, and he shall never have the pox.”

“Frotted” means massaged or rubbed, including sexual rubbing.

“What!” Puntarvolo said. “The French pox?”

“The French pox? Our pox!” Carlo Buffone said. “By God’s blood, we have the pox in as good form as they, man, what!”

The French pox is syphilis, but pox can also be the plague.

“Let me perish and go to hell, but I must say that thou are a villain,” Puntarvolo said. “Was your newly created gallant there with you? Sogliardo?”

“Oh, porpoise!” Carlo Buffone said. “Hang him, no!”

Porpoises were thought to be neither flesh nor fish. They lived in the sea, but they kept jumping out of the water.

Sogliardo was not born a gentleman, but he became one by paying money.

Carlo Buffone said, “He’s a lodger at Horn’s Ordinary, yonder. His villainous Ganymede — Cavalier Shift — and he have been puffing a tobacco pipe there as if he were puffing a bagpipe, ever since yesterday noon.”

Ganymede was a beautiful youth who became the cup-bearer and lover of Jupiter, king of the gods.

“Who? Signor Tripartite, the man who would give my dog the whiff and teach him how to smoke?” Puntarvolo asked.

Cavalier Shift was also known as Apple-John and Signor Whiff, and so he had three names.

Carlo Buffone said:

“Aye, he.

“They have hired a chamber and tobacco paraphernalia, private, to practice in, for the making of the patun, the receipt reciprocal, and a number of other mysteries not yet seen in public.”

“Patun” was a Native American name for tobacco.

The receipt reciprocal may be a French form of smoking in which the smoker inhales simultaneously with mouth and nose.

Carlo Buffone continued:

“I brought some dozen or twenty gallants this morning to view them, as you’d do a piece of perspective, in at a keyhole.”

In perspective painting one looked at the image through a peephole that was attached to the frame at an oblique angle. Look at it straight on and the picture was distorted.

“And there we might see Sogliardo sit in a chair, holding his snout up like a sow under an apple-tree, while the other opened his nostrils with a poking-stick to give the smoke a more free delivery. They had spit some three- or fourscore ounces of phlegm between them before we came away.”

“What!” Puntarvolo said. “Spit three- or fourscore ounces!”

“Aye, and preserved it in soup bowls, as a barber does his blood when he pricks a vein,” Carlo Buffone said.

Barbers would bleed some patients as a medical treatment to restore the correct proportion of their humors. In the Middle Ages, barbers were also surgeons.

“Get out, pagan and infidel!” Puntarvolo said. “How do thou prick the vein of thy friend!”

Carlo Buffone casually said bad things about Sogliardo behind his back. This offended Puntarvolo’s sense of honor.

“Friend?” Carlo Buffone said. “Is there any such foolish thing in the world? Ha? By God’s eyelid, I have never yet relished friendship.”

“Thy humor is the more dangerous,” Puntarvolo said.

Carlo Buffone’s humor was to be cynical. This was more dangerous than friendship.

Carlo Buffone said:

“No, not a whit, signor.

“Tut, a man must keep time in all situations: He must suit his behavior to the situation. I can oil my tongue and speak flatteringly when I meet him next and look with a good slick — sleek and smooth and pleasant — forehead; it will take away all soil of suspicion, and that’s enough.

“What Lynceus can see my heart?”

Lynceus was one of the Argonauts who sailed with Jason on the Argo. His eyesight was so keen that he could see objects buried underground.

“Pish, the title of a friend, it’s a vain idle thing, only venerable and respectable among fools.

“No one who has any reputation for wit and intelligence will affect it.”

Deliro and Macilente entered the scene.

“God save you, good Sir Puntarvolo,” Deliro said.

“Signor Deliro!” Puntarvolo said. “Welcome.”

“I ask you, sir, did you see Master Fastidious Brisk?” Deliro said. “I heard he was to meet Your Worship here.”

“You heard no incorrect statement, sir,” Puntarvolo said. “I expect him every minute that my watch strikes.”

Some watches struck the hour — not the minute.

Travelers were advised not to carry such watches: Someone could hear the chime and know that the person wearing the watch had money. Such watches were expensive.

“In good time, sir,” Deliro said.

This was a polite way to end a conversation.

He walked aside with Macilente.

Carlo Buffone pointed to Deliro and said:

“There’s a fellow now, who looks like one of the stern patricians of Sparta. By the Virgin Mary, his wit’s after ten in the hundred.”

Ten percent interest was the legally allowed amount.

Carlo Buffone continued:

“A good bloodhound, a close-mouthed dog, he follows the scent well.”

A moment later, he said:

“By the Virgin Mary, he’s at a fault now, I think.”

Bloodhounds were silent while following a scent. They bayed when they saw the prey.

Being at a fault means: He’s lost the scent.

“I would marvel at any creature who is free from the danger and dominion of thy tongue,” Puntarvolo said.

Carlo Buffone was quick to talk about people behind their back.

“Oh,” Carlo Buffone said, “I cannot abide these limbs of satin, or rather Satan indeed, that’ll walk like the children of darkness all day in a melancholy shop, with their pockets full of blanks, ready to swallow up as many poor unthrifths as come within the Verge.”

Tradesmen wore satin jackets.

The limbs of Satan were the devils that follow Satan’s orders.

The children of darkness were dishonest shopkeepers.

A melancholy shop was poorly lit on purpose so that customers couldn’t clearly see the lack of quality of the goods offered for sale.

Blanks were contracts with blank areas to be filled in.

The Verge was an area where people could not be arrested for debt.

“So, and what have thou for him who is with him now?” Puntarvolo asked.

The person with Deliro now was Macilente, who was wearing a new suit of clothes.

“Oh, damn me, immortality!” Carlo Buffone said. “I’ll not meddle with him, the pure element of fire, all spirit, extraction.”

The four elements were fire, water, earth, and air.

Extraction is an alchemical process that was supposed to produce the essence of something.

Carlo Buffone was cynical and harsh-talking; Macilente could match Carlo’s words and even best him. Therefore, Carlo would leave him alone — may immortality damn Carlo if he did not.

“What, Carlo!” Puntarvolo said. “Ha, who is he, man?”

Carlo Buffone replied, “He is a scholar named Macilente. Don’t you know him? A lank and lean raw-boned skeleton, he walks up and down like a charged musket, no man dares encounter him. That’s his rest there.”

The “rest” was Deliro, who was Macilente’s support. A rest is a support for a musket.

“His rest?” Puntarvolo said. “Why, has he a forked head?”

A forked head has horns that can be used as a rest for a musket.

In Ben Jonson’s society, people joked that a cuckold — a man with an unfaithful wife — had invisible horns growing on his head.

“Pardon me, that’s to be suspended,” Carlo Buffone said.

He wanted to suspend the joke.

“You are too quick, too perceptive,” Carlo Buffone added.

Puntarvolo caught onto his jokes quickly and matched his puns and similes.

They walked aside.

Deliro and Macilente returned.

Deliro said to Macilente, “Indeed, now I think on it — think about arresting Fastidious Brisk for debt — I’ll defer it until some other time.”

“By God’s precious blood, not by any means, signor, you shall not lose this opportunity,” Macilente said. “He will be here soon now.”

“Yes, indeed, Macilente, it is best not to pursue the arrest now,” Deliro said. “For look, sir, I shall so exceedingly offend my wife in it that —”

Macilente said:

“Your wife?”

“Now for shame, lose these thoughts and become the master of your own spirits.”

“Spirits” can be semen.

Macilente said:

“Should I, if I had a wife, suffer myself to be thus passionately carried to and fro with the stream of her humor? And should I neglect my deepest affairs of business to serve her affections? By God’s blood, I would geld myself first.”

“Oh, but signor, if you had such a wife as mine is, you would —” Deliro said.

Many men with a wife like that would castrate themselves, at least metaphorically. Maybe more than metaphorically.

Macilente said:

“Such a wife?”

“Now God hate me, sir, if ever I discerned any wonder in your wife yet, with all the power of sight I have. I have seen some who have been thought fairer than she, in my time; and I have seen those who have not been altogether so tall, esteemed proper handsome women; and I have seen less — smaller — noses grow upon sweeter faces, who have done very well, too, in my judgment.

“But in good faith, signor, for all this, the gentlewoman is a good pretty-proud and hard-favored — very proud but unpleasant — thing, by the Virgin Mary, not so peerlessly — without equal — to be doted upon, I must confess.

“Nay, don’t be angry.”

Deliro said, “Well, sir, however you please to forget yourself and behave inexcusably, I have not deserved to be thus played upon. But henceforth, I tell you to keep away from my house, for I can scarcely endure the smell of a person’s breath at my table who shall thus treat me like a jade and insult me in return for my courtesies.”

A jade is a poor-quality horse.

“Then, signor,” Macilente said, “let me tell you that your wife is no proper woman, by Jesus, and I suspect her chastity, what’s more, which you may likewise suspect, if you please. Do you see? I’ll urge you to nothing against your inclinations, but if you please, you may suspect it.”

“Good, sir,” Deliro said.

This was a polite response, but Deliro did not believe Macilente.

Deliro exited.

Macilente said, ““Good, sir”? Now may horn upon horn pursue thee, thou blind egregious dotard! May you be cuckolded over and over.”

Carlo Buffone said quietly to Puntarvolo, “Oh, you shall hear him speak like Envy — like Malice.”

He then said out loud, “Signor Macilente, have you seen Monsieur Brisk lately? I heard you were with him at the court.”

“Aye, Buffone, I was with him,” Macilente replied.

“And how is he respected there?” Carlo Buffone asked. “I know you’ll speak plainly and truthfully to us. Is he made much of among the sweeter sort of gallants?”

The sweeter sort of gallants are the perfumed gallants.

“Indeed, aye, his civet — his perfume — and his casting glass — his bottle for sprinkling perfume — have helped him to a place among the other perfumed gallants, and there his seniors give him good slight looks in their fashion, and they smile and greet in French with some new compliment,” Macilente said.

“What, is this all?” Carlo Buffone said.

Macilente said:

“Why, suppose that they should show the frothy, frivolous fool such grace as they pretend comes from the heart. Then he would have a mighty windfall and it would benefit him, no doubt.”

The windfall would be something good he did not expect, but it would consist of wind — empty talk.

Macilente continued:

“Why, all their graces are not to do grace to virtue or desert, but to ride both with their gilt spurs quite breathless away from themselves.”

This kind of riding was deriding.

The courtiers don’t care to show favor to virtue or merit; instead, they drive — deride — them away.

Macilente continued:

“It is now esteemed precisianism in wit — pedantical and puritanical — and a disease in human nature to be kind toward earned merit, to love or seek good reputations.

“Who feeds himself with a good reputation? Who thrives with lovingly serving the commonwealth and doing acts of charity?

“Who can provide a feast for his own desires by serving others? Ha, ha, ha!

“It is folly by our wisest worldlings proved,

“If not to gain by love, to be beloved.”

In other words: It is foolish to be beloved unless you can benefit in some way from the person who loves you.

Carlo Buffone said to Puntarvolo, “How do you like him? Isn’t he a good spiteful slave? Ha?”

“Shrewd, shrewd,” Puntarvolo said.

These days, the word “shrewd” is positive. In Ben Jonson’s day, the word was negative and meant “evil-minded.”

Who is shrewd?

Carlo Buffone? Macilente?

Both.

“Damn me, I could eat his flesh now, divine sweet villain,” Carlo Buffone said.

“Nay, please stop,” Macilente said.

He did not want approval and attention from Carlo Buffone. He did not want to be called “divine sweet villain” by him.

Drawing Carlo aside, he asked him about Puntarvolo, “Who’s he there?”

Carlo Buffone quietly replied, “Who? This man in the stiffened-by-starch beard? It’s the dull stiff — pompous and straight-backed — knight Puntarvolo, man. He’s to travel now, very soon; he has a good knotty intelligence, by the Virgin Mary — he carries little intelligence out of the land with him.”

According to Carlo Buffone, Puntarvolo was knotty-pated; in other words, he was a knot-head or blockhead.

“How then?” Macilente said.

“He puts his intelligence forth in venture, as he does his money, upon the return of a dog and a cat,” Carlo Buffone said.

“Is this he?” Macilente said.

“Aye, this is he, a good tough gentleman,” Carlo Buffone said. “He looks like a chine of brawn — a sirloin roast of boar — at Shrovetide, out of date and ready to be thrown out, or a store of dried, salted cod upon Easter-Eve, cod that is left over from the cod that has furnished the table all Lent, as he has done the city this last vacation.”

During the vacation — Shrovetide and Lent — Puntarvolo was keeping some people such as the notary busy.

“Come, you’ll never leave your back-stabbing similes,” Macilente said. “I shall catch you aiming at me with them by and by, but —”

“Oh, renounce me then!” Carlo Buffone said. “Pure, honest, good devil, I love thee above my love for women: I could even melt in admiration of thee now. By God’s soul, look here, man. Here come Sir Dagonet and his squire.”

In Ben Jonson’s society, one kind of “melting” was having a sexual orgasm.

Carlo Buffone was calling Sogliardo Sir Dagonet, the Fool in stories about King Arthur and the Round Table. Sogliardo’s squire is Cavalier Shift.

Sogliardo and Cavalier Shift walked over to them.

Sogliardo said, “May God save you, my dear gallantos.”

By “gallantos,” Sogliardo meant “gallants.” The Italian gallante means the adjective “gallant.” The Italian galano means “wears gay clothing.” The Italian galantino means “pretty” or “darling.”

Sogliardo said to Cavalier Shift, “Nay, come, approach, good cavalier.”

He then said to Puntarvolo, “Please, sweet knight, become acquainted with this gentleman; he’s one whom it pleases me to treat as my good friend and companion, and therefore do him kindnesses and favors.”

He said to all the others about Cavalier Shift, “I beseech you, gentles, to become acquainted with him and know him.”

“Sir, for Signor Sogliardo’s sake, let it suffice I know you,” Puntarvolo said.

“Why, by Jesus, I thank you, knight, and it shall suffice,” Sogliardo said. “Listen, Sir Puntarvolo, you’d little think it, but he’s as brave a piece of man-flesh as any is in the world.”

“Indeed, sir?” Puntarvolo said.

“Upon my gentility, sir, on my word as a gentleman,” Sogliardo said.

He then said to Carlo Buffone, “Carlo, a word with you.”

He pointed to Cavalier Shift and said, “Do you see that same fellow there?”

“Who? Cavalier Shift?” Carlo Buffone asked.

“Oh, you know him,” Sogliardo said. “I cry you mercy! I beg your pardon! Before God, I think that he is the tallest — most valiant — man living within the walls of Europe.”

“The walls of Europe!” Carlo Buffone said. “Take heed what you say, signor. Europe’s a huge thing within the walls.”

Sogliardo said, “Tut, if the walls were as huge again — twice as huge — I’d still affirm what I speak. By God’s eyelid, he swaggered even now in a place where we were. I never saw a man do it more resolutely.”

“Nay, indeed, swaggering is a good argument of resolution,” Carlo Buffone said.

In one sense, no. In another sense, yes.

Resolution can mean 1) confidence and steadfastness of mind, or 2) decay.

Resolute men ought not to swagger and especially they ought not to swagger among prostitutes who can give them venereal disease.

Carlo Buffone asked Macilente, “Do you hear this, signor?”

“Aye, to my grief,” Macilente said.

He then said to himself:

“Oh, that such muddy flags — dirty battle-standards — for every drunken flourish should achieve the name and reputation of manhood, while true perfect valor, hating to show itself out of modesty, goes by despised!”

A flourish is a wave of a sword in the air.

“By God’s blood, I do surely know now, in a fair just cause, I dare do more than he, a thousand times. Why shouldn’t they — notable people — take knowledge of this, huh? And give my worth allowance before his? Because I cannot swagger. Now may the pox alight on your Pickt-hatch prowess!”

Pickt-hatch is a London district frequented by prostitutes.

Sogliardo said:

“Why, I tell you, sir, he has been the only bid-stand — highwayman — who ever was, and kept Newmarket, Salisbury Plain, Hockley-i’the-Hole, Gad’s Hill, all the chief places that people talk about.

“He has had his mares and his geldings, he has, which have been worth forty, threescore, a hundred pounds a horse, and would have sprung you over hedge and ditch like your greyhound.

“He has done five hundred robberies in his time, more or less, I assure you.”

“What!” Puntarvolo said. “And escaped?”

“Escaped!” Sogliardo said. “Indeed, aye. He has broken the jail when he has been in irons and more irons, and been out and in again, and out and in, forty times and not so few, he.”

Macilente said to himself, “Sogliardo is a fit trumpet to proclaim such a person.”

“But can this be possible?” Carlo Buffone asked.

Cavalier Shift said, “Why it is nothing, sir, when a man gives his affections — his emotional commitment — to it.”

Sogliardo said, “Good Pylades, tell about a robbery or two, to satisfy these gentlemen of thy worth.”

Pylades and Orestes were two good friends. When Agamemnon returned home to Greece after fighting the Trojan War for ten years, his wife, Clytemnestra, killed him. She had taken a lover during the years that he was away from home. Her son, Orestes, killed her because she killed his father, and Orestes was sentenced to die. His friend Pylades was willing to die in Orestes’ place, although Orestes did not want him to, so both told the executioners, “I am Orestes!”

Cavalier Shift replied, “Pardon me, my dear Orestes, causes have their quiddities, and it is ill jesting with bell-ropes.”

“Causes” could be 1) law cases, or 2) reasons. Law cases have their abstruse legal points that common citizens don’t know, and robberies have some points that are kept secret from those who are not robbers because if word gets out about who committed a robbery, the robber can be hung.

Cavalier Shift was reluctant for good reason to talk about robberies in front of people he did not know.

A hanged criminal was called a “gallows-clapper.”

Clappers were the tongues of bells.

A proverb stated: “No jesting with the bell-ropes.”

Jests about robberies to the wrong people could get one hung.

“What?” Carlo Buffone said. “Pylades and Orestes?”

Sogliardo replied, “Aye, he is my Pylades, and I am his Orestes. How do you like the comparison?”

Carlo Buffone replied, “Oh, it’s an old-fashioned and stale interlude entertainment. No, I’ll give you names myself. Look, he shall be your Judas, and you shall be his elder tree to hang on.”

Judas, who betrayed Jesus, hanged himself from an elder tree. In the comparison, Cavalier Shift was a hanger-on to Sogliardo.

Macilente said, “Nay, rather, let him be Captain Pod, and this his motion, for he does nothing but show him.”

A motion is a puppet or a puppet-show, and Captain Pod was a puppet master. Sogliardo was showing off Cavalier Shift: his puppet.

“Excellent!” Carlo Buffone said. “Or thus: You shall be Holden, and he your camel.”

Holden was an animal-trainer.

“You do not mean to ride, gentlemen?” Cavalier Shift said.

In addition to “ride” as in riding a camel, “ride” can mean 1) harass, and 2) sexually ride.

“Indeed, let me end this nicknaming game for you, gallants,” Puntarvolo said. “You shall be his Countenance, and he shall be your Resolution.”

Sogliardo will give Cavalier Shift a countenance (income), and he will countenance (approve of) Shift’s criminal behavior.

Cavalier Shift will be Sogliardo's resolution, or swaggerer. He will swagger around Sogliardo and tell him stories about robberies.

Resolution can mean determination, as in having a resolute temper. It can also mean decay, as of one's body — and it can mean death. Cavalier Shift's kind of resolution was swaggering.

"Indeed, that's pretty," Sogliardo said. "What do you say, cavalier, shall it be so?"

"Aye, aye," Carlo Buffone said. "Most voices — the majority — approve."

"Indeed, I am easily yielding to any good impressions," Cavalier Shift said.

Something that is resolute is firm; wax is softened so that it can take an impression of a seal.

"Then give hands, good Resolution," Sogliardo said. "Let's shake hands."

"By the Mass, Cavalier Shift cannot say good Countenance now, properly, to Sogliardo again," Carlo Buffone said.

Sogliardo does not have a good countenance: He is ugly. But he can pay a good countenance: a good maintenance, or allowance.

"Yes, by an irony," Puntarvolo said.

Macilente said, "Oh, sir, the countenance of Resolution should, as he's altogether grim and unpleasant."

Resolution is Cavalier Shift. He and his stories are morally repugnant, and so his countenance should be ugly. He is the hanger-on to Sogliardo, who is his countenance and who is ugly.

The irony is that the wrong man is ugly.

Fastidious Brisk entered the scene.

He said:

“May good hours make music with your mirth, gentlemen, and keep time to your humors. May the times match your good humor.

“How are you now, Carlo?”

“Monsieur Brisk!” Puntarvolo said. “Many a long look have I extended for you, sir.”

Fastidious Brisk said:

“In good faith, I must ask your pardon. I was invited this morning, before I was out of my bed, by a bevy of ladies to a banquet of fruit and wine, whence it was almost one of Hercules’ twelve labors for me to come away, but that the respect of my promise did so prevail with me. I know they’ll take it very ill, especially one who gave me this bracelet of her hair as a love-token just last night, and this pearl another gave me that was dangling from her forehead; by the Virgin Mary, she —

“— what, are the writings ready?”

“I will send my man to find out,” Puntarvolo said.

He said to a serving-man, “Sirrah, go you to the notary’s and learn if he is ready. Leave the dog, sir.”

The serving-man exited.

Fastidious Brisk said:

“And how does my splendidly qualified and distinguished friend, Sogliardo?”

“Oh, Signor Macilente! By these eyes, I didn’t see you, I would have greeted you sooner else, I swear on my truth.”

He said quietly to Macilente, “I hope, sir, I may presume upon you that you will not divulge my recent embarrassment or disgrace, indeed, sir.”

“You may, sir,” Macilente said.

Seeing, but not hearing, this exchange, Carlo Buffone said to himself, “By God’s heart, Macilente knows some notorious deed about this fool, and so he has Fastidious behaving so obsequiously and deferentially to him.”

Indicating Cavalier Shift, Sogliardo said, “Monsieur Fastidious, do you see this fellow there? Doesn’t he look like a clown? Would you think there’s anything in him?”

In this culture, clowns were rustics and peasants.

“Anything in him?” Fastidious Brisk said. “Curse me, aye, the fellow has a good ingenious — clever — face.”

“By this element — the sky — he is as ingenious and tall — clever and brave — a man as ever swaggered about London,” Sogliardo said. “He and I call each other Countenance and Resolution, but his name is Cavalier Shift.”

Puntarvolo said to Cavalier Shift, “Cavalier, did you know Signor Clog, who was hanged for the robbery at Harrow-on-the-hill?”

“Clogs” were heavy pieces of wood attached to a prisoner’s leg or neck in order to prevent escape. As a name, the word “Clog” means “Blockhead.”

“Know him, sir!” Sogliardo said. “Why, it was he who gave all the directions for the action.”

“What?” Puntarvolo said to Cavalier Shift. “Was it your project, sir?”

Cavalier Shift said to Sogliardo, “Pardon me, Countenance, you do me some wrong to make public that which I imparted to you in private.”

“By God’s will, here are none but friends, Resolution,” Sogliardo said.

“That’s all one,” Cavalier Shift said. “That doesn’t matter. Things of consequence must have their respects, for example regarding where, how, and to whom they are imparted.”

He then said to Puntarvolo:

“Yes, sir, he showed himself a true clog in the uniting together of that affair, sir; for if he had managed matters as they were corroborated and confirmed and entrusted to him, it would have been better for him by forty score or fifty score of pounds, sir, and he himself might have lived, in spite of Fate, to have fed on woodcocks with the rest.

“But it was his heavy fortunes to sink, poor Clog, and therefore let us talk no more about him.”

Clog had impeded his own actions by not following the plan, and so he had been caught. If he had followed the plan, he would have made money and been able to feast on woodcocks at an eating-place. So said Cavalier Shift.

“Why, had he more agents, then?” Puntarvolo asked.

“Oh, God, sir, aye, there were some present there who were the Nine Worthies to him, indeed,” Sogliardo said.

The Nine Worthies were nine great men: three from the Bible, three from classical times, and three from romances.

The three from the Bible were Joshua, King David, and Judas Maccabaeus.

The three from classical times were Hector of Troy, Alexander the Great, and Julius Caesar.

The three from romances were King Arthur, Holy Roman Emperor Charlemagne, and Godfrey of Bouillon (or sometimes Sir Guy of Warwick).

Cavalier Shift said:

“Aye, sir, I can satisfy you and give you more information at a more convenient conversation.

“But, for my own part, I have now reconciled myself to other courses of action, and I now earn a living out of my other skills and qualities.”

Sogliardo said to the others:

“He has left all that criminal behavior now, I assure you, and he is able to live like a gentleman by his quality.

“By this dog, he has the most rare gift in tobacco that ever you knew.”

Carlo Buffone said to Macilente, “By God’s heart, he keeps more ado with this monster than ever Banks did with his horse, or the fellow with the elephant.”

Banks had a famous horse that he had trained. His horse would bow when Queen Elizabeth I of England or King James VI of Scotland was mentioned, and it would bite when the King of Spain was mentioned.

The elephant had been often exhibited and perhaps was trained to do tricks.

Macilente said to Carlo Buffone, “He will shortly hang out his picture painted on a cloth banner — he will advertise himself — you shall see.”

“Oh, he does manage a quarrel the best that ever you saw, for terms and circumstances,” Sogliardo said. “He knows all about dueling.”

Fastidious Brisk said:

“Good faith, signor, now you speak of a quarrel, I’ll acquaint you with a difference that happened between a gallant and myself.

“Sir Puntarvolo, you would know him if I should name him. He is Signor Luculento.”

“Luculento!” Puntarvolo said. “What inauspicious chance interposed itself between the friendship of you two?”

Fastidious Brisk answered:

“Indeed, sir, the same that sundered Agamemnon and great Thetis’ son.”

Thetis’ son is Achilles. In the first book of Homer’s Iliad, he and Agamemnon quarreled. One way to look at the quarrel is that it was over women. When Agamemnon, the leader of the Greek army, lost his sex-slave, he took the sex-slave of Achilles, the greatest warrior of the Trojan War. (A better way to look at the quarrel is that it was over honor; Achilles was dishonored by Agamemnon, so Achilles declined to fight in the war.)

“But let the cause escape, sir. Never mind the cause.

“He sent me a challenge, mixed with some few threats and boasts, which I responded to, and in short we met. Now, indeed, sir, I must tell you, he did fight at first very desperately, but without judgment; for look, sir, I cast myself into this figure.”

He struck a fencing pose.

Fastidious Brisk continued:

“Now he comes violently on, and, while he was advancing his rapier to strike, I thought to have hit his arm, for he had left his whole body open to my attack, and I was sure he could not recover his guard.

“Sir, I missed my purpose in his arm, for I slashed his doublet sleeve, ran him close by the left cheek, and through his hair.

“He in return struck me here — I had a gold cable hatband then in the latest fashion, which I wore about a mulberry-colored broad-brimmed French hat that I had. He cut my hatband (and yet it was massive, goldsmith’s work). He cut my hat brims, which, by good fortune, being thick-embroidered with gold twist and spangles, disappointed the force of the blow; nevertheless, his stroke grazed on my shoulder, and cut and took away six purls — loops of frilly lace edging on my collar — of an Italian cutwork collar I wore. It cost me three pounds in the Royal Exchange just three days before.”

“This was a strange encounter,” Puntarvolo said.

They were dueling, but the only thing being injured was their clothing.

Fastidious Brisk replied, “You shall hear, sir.”

He continued his description of the duel:

“With this we both fell out and rested and caught our breath.

“Now, upon the second sign of his assault, I resumed the former manner of my defense. He, on the other side, abandoned his body to the same danger as before, and followed me still with blows. But I, being loath to take the deadly advantage that lay before me of his left side, made a kind of stramazoun — a downright blow — and I ran him up to the hilts, through the doublet, through the shirt, and yet missed the skin.

“He, making a reverse blow — a backhand stroke — fell upon my embossed belt — I had thrown off the hangers for daggers and swords a little before — and he struck off a skirt of a thick-laced satin doublet I had, lined with some four taffetas, cut off two panes of cloth embroidered with pearl, and cut through the drawings-out of tissue, entered the linings, and skipped the flesh.”

Some jackets had slits cut in them to display the cloth underneath. The cloth could be pulled through the slits so it could be better seen. The cloth was of a different color than the jacket.

Carlo Buffone said to Macilente, “I marvel that he hasn’t mentioned his embroidered shirt.”

Fastidious Brisk continued his description of the duel:

“Here, because of the mutual damage we had done to each other, we paused.”

Well, damage to each other’s clothing, anyway.

Fastidious Brisk continued his description of the duel:

“But, before I proceed, I must tell you, signor, that in this last encounter, not having leisure to put off my silver spurs, one of the rowels caught hold of the ruffle of my boot, and, being Spanish leather and subject to tear, it overthrew and tripped me, tore two pairs of silk stockings that I put on — being somewhat a raw morning, a peach color and another — and struck some half-inch deep into the side of the calf.”

This was the first blood of the duel.

Fastidious Brisk fell because of the clothing he was wearing, which was not suitable to a duel. His opponent did not wound him; instead, Fastidious tripped because one of the rowels on his spurs caught on the top of one of his high boots, which was turned down in accordance with fashion. As Fastidious fell, his rowel cut him.

Fastidious Brisk continued his description of the duel:

“He, seeing the blood come, immediately took to his horse and rode away.”

Because his opponent fled, Fastidious Brisk won the duel.

Fastidious Brisk continued his description of the duel:

“I, having bound up my wound with a piece of my embroidered shirt —”

Carlo Buffone said quietly to Macilente, “Oh, now he mentions his embroidered shirt.”

Fastidious Brisk continued:

“— I rode after him, and, alighting at the court-gate both together, we embraced and marched hand in hand up into the royal presence chamber.”

By riding to the court, Fastidious Brisk’s opponent could get sanctuary and avoid arrest for dueling.

By embracing his opponent, Fastidious Brisk publicly showed that he thought that his opponent had fought well. Others may disagree.

Macilente said quietly to Carlo Buffone, “Well, by this we can guess what apparel the gentlemen wore.”

“Before God, it was an undertaking begun with much resolution, maintained with as much prowess, and ended with more humanity,” Puntarvolo said.

Puntarvolo, the knight, was perhaps sarcastic.

Seeing his serving-man return, Puntarvolo asked, "How are things now? What does the notary say?"

The serving-man answered, "The notary says he is ready, sir; he waits only at Your Worship's pleasure."

Puntarvolo said to Fastidious Brisk, "Come, we will go to him, monsieur."

He then said to the others, "Gentlemen, shall we entreat you to be witnesses?"

"You shall entreat me, sir," Sogliardo said. "Come, Resolution."

"I follow you, good Countenance," Cavalier Shift said.

Carlo Buffone said to Macilente, "Come signor, come, come."

Macilente said to himself, "Oh, that there should be fortune to clothe these men, so naked and devoid of merit, and that the just and well-deserved storm and affliction of a wretched life does not beat them ragged for their wretched souls, since they are not only as fruitless as coals, but also as black as coals!"

The actors exited.

Mitis said to Cordatus, "Why, but signor, how does it happen that Fungoso did not give his sister's information to Brisk?"

That information was that Deliro wanted to have him arrested for debt.

Cordatus answered, "By the Virgin Mary, because of the evil angels — money and demons — that she gave him, who have indeed tempted the good simple youth to follow the tail of the fashion and neglect the request of his friends."

The four angels were evil angels because they tempted Fungoso to neglect the message that his sister had given to him and instead to order new clothing for himself.

Cordatus then said, “Look, here Fungoso comes, very worshipfully attended, and with good variety.”

A number of people were following Fungoso and flattering him by calling him “Your Worship.”

— 4.4 —

Fungoso walked on stage. Following him were his tailor, shoemaker, and haberdasher.

“Great thanks, good shoemaker,” Fungoso said. “I’ll get my own shoe-ribbons myself.”

The ribbons were used to lace shoes.

The shoemaker exited.

Fungoso said to the haberdasher, “Now, sir, let me see, how much money must you have for this hat?”

“Here’s the bill, sir,” the haberdasher said, presenting him with it.

Putting on the hat, Fungoso asked, “How does it become me? Well?”

“Excellent, sir,” the tailor said. “It is as excellent as any hat you ever had in your life.”

“Indeed, sir, the hat’s as good as any man in this town can make for you, and will maintain fashion as long,” the haberdasher said. “Never trust me for a groat if it doesn’t.”

A groat is a very small amount of money.

“Does it go well with my suit?” Fungoso asked.

“Exceedingly well, sir,” the tailor said.

“How do thou like my suit, haberdasher?” Fungoso asked.

“I swear by my truth, sir, it is very splendidly well made,” the haberdasher replied. “I never saw a suit fit better that I can recall.”

The tailor said, ironically, “Nay, we have no art to please our friends, not we.”

In other words: “We do have the art needed to please our friends, we do.”

Fungoso handed over some money to the haberdasher and said, “Here, haberdasher, count this money.”

“In good faith, sir,” the haberdasher said, “the suit of clothing makes you have an excellent body.”

Suits can be designed to hide body flaws.

The tailor had praised the hat, and then the haberdasher had repaid the favor by praising the suit of clothing.

Fungoso said, “Believe me, I think I have as good a body in clothes as anyone else.”

“You lack points — ties — to bring your apparel together,” the tailor said.

Doublets, aka jackets, were tied to hose, a kind of stockings.

Without shoe-ribbons and points, Fungoso was only partially dressed.

“I’ll have points soon,” Fungoso said.

Indicating the money, he asked, “How do things stand now? Is it the right amount?”

“Indeed, sir, it is too little, but upon farther hopes — I will give you credit and you can pay me the rest later,” the haberdasher said. “Good morning to you, sir.”

The haberdasher exited.

“Farewell, good haberdasher,” Fungoso said.

He then said to the tailor, “Well now, Master Snip, let me see your bill.”

Mitis said to Cordatus, “I think he pays and sends away his followers too thickly — one right after the other.”

“Oh, therein he saucily imitates some great man,” Cordatus said. “I assure you that although he turns them off, he keeps this tailor in the position of a page to follow him always.”

A page is a servant.

Fungoso was behaving like a big shot.

He said, “This bill is very reasonable, indeed. Listen, Master Snip. Truly, sir, I am not altogether so well furnished with money at this present time as I could wish I were. But, if you’ll do me the favor to take part payment in cash, you shall have all the cash I have now, by Jesus.”

The tailor began, “Sir —”

Fungoso interrupted, “— and just give me credit for the rest, until the beginning of the next term when the courts are in session.”

The tailor began, “Oh, Lord, sir —”

Fungoso interrupted, “— before God and by his light, I’ll pay you to the utmost, and acknowledge myself very deeply engaged — obliged and indebted — to you, by this hand.”

“Why, how much do you have there, sir?” the tailor asked.

“By the Virgin Mary, I have here four angels and fifteen shillings of white money,” Fungoso said. “It’s all I have, as I hope to be saved.”

White money is silver money.

“You will not fail me at the next term with the rest?” the tailor asked.

Many big shots were late in paying their bills, if they paid their bills.

“No,” Fungoso said. “If I do, I pray to God that I will be hanged. Let me never breathe again upon this mortal stage, as the philosopher calls it. By this air, and as I am a gentleman, I’ll keep my word.”

Cordatus said to Mitis, “He would be an iron-hearted fellow, in my opinion, who would not believe him and give him credit upon these monstrous oaths.”

The tailor said, “Well, sir, I’ll not be unreasonable with any gentleman over a trifle. You know what amount it is that remains to be paid?”

Fungoso said:

“Aye, sir, and I give you thanks, in good faith.

“Oh, God, how happy am I made in this good fortune!

“Well, now I’ll go seek out Monsieur Brisk.

“By God’s soul! I have forgotten the ribbon for my shoes, and I have forgotten the points. By God’s eyelid, what luck’s this! What shall I do?

“Master Snip, please let me reduct — get back — some two or three shillings so I can buy points and shoe-ribbons.

“By Jesus, I have utterly disfurnished myself of money in the default because of my bad memory.

“Please, let me be beholden and indebted to you; it shall come home to you and be paid in full when I pay the bill, believe me.”

“Indeed, sir,” the tailor said, “I can hardly depart with the money, but I’ll take up and send you some points and shoe-ribbons out of my stock by my serving-boy quickly. What color of ribbon do you want?”

“Whatever color you shall think fitting, in your opinion, sir, for my suit of clothing,” Fungoso said.

“Well, I’ll send you some immediately,” the tailor said.

“And points, too, sir?” Fungoso asked.

“And points, too, sir,” the tailor replied.

“Good lord, how I shall endeavor to deserve this kindness of yours, sir!” Fungoso said. “Please let your youthful serving-boy make haste, for I should have finished a piece of business an hour ago, and now I fear that I shall come too late.”

The tailor exited.

Fungoso said, “Now, indeed, I am exceedingly proud of my suit!”

He exited.

Cordatus said to Mitis, “Do you observe the straits that this poor gallant is put to, signor, to purchase the fashion?”

“Aye, and to be still a fashion behind with the world, that’s the entertainment,” Mitis replied.

Fungoso was gifted at buying clothing just before that style of clothing went out of fashion.

“Wait,” Cordatus said, seeing some actors coming. “Oh, here they come from ‘sealed and delivered.’”

Puntarvolo and Fastidious Brisk had signed the contract and had it sealed and delivered to them. They each had part of the contract. Their two halves had irregular edges that fitted together perfectly and showed that it was a legal contract.

— 4.5 —

Puntarvolo, Fastidious Brisk, and the serving-men with the dog and the cat walked onto the stage.

Puntarvolo said, “Well, now that my whole journey is covered by wagers, I will resolve to depart shortly.”

“Indeed, Sir Puntarvolo, go to the court, and take leave of the ladies first,” Fastidious Brisk said.

“I don’t care if it should be this afternoon’s labor,” Puntarvolo said.

He then asked, “Where is Carlo?”

“Here he comes,” Fastidious Brisk said.

Carlo Buffone, Sogliardo, Cavalier Shift, and Macilente entered the scene.

Carlo Buffone said:

“Indeed, gallants, I am persuading this gentleman” — he pointed to Sogliardo — “to become a courtier. He is a man of fair revenue, and his estate will bear the expense well. Besides, for his other gifts of the mind, or so, why, they are as nature lent him them: pure, simple, without any artificial drug or mixture of these two threadbare beggarly qualities, learning and knowledge, and therefore the more suitable and genuine.”

Sogliardo was uneducated.

Carlo Buffone continued:

“Now, for the life of a courtier itself —”

Fastidious Brisk interrupted and described the life of a courtier as he understood it to be:

“Oh, the most celestial, and full of wonder and delight that can be imagined, signor, beyond all thought and understanding of pleasure! A man lives at court in such a divine rapture that he will think himself in the third heaven — God’s abode — for the time, and he will lose all sense of mortality whatsoever.”

The third heaven is Earth’s atmosphere, and the second heaven is the realm of the stars.

He continued:

“When he shall behold such glorious and almost immortal beauties, hear such angelical and harmonious voices, discourse with such flowing and ambrosian spirits — whose wit’s as sudden as lightning and honeyed as nectar — oh, it makes a man all quintessence and flame, and lifts him up in a moment to the very crystal crown of the sky, where, hovering in the strength of his imagination, he shall behold all the delights of the Hesperides, the Insulae Fortunatae, Adonis’ gardens, the beautiful Thessalian valley called Tempe, or whatever else is confined within the amplest verge of poesy and consider them to be mere umbrae — shadows — and imperfect figures, compared to the most essential felicity of your court.”

The garden of the Hesperides with its golden apples was located in the west in the Insulae Fortunatae or Fortunate Islands.

The Elizabethans believed that Adonis' gardens were an earthly paradise.

Macilente said to Carlo Buffone, "Well, this encomium — fancy speech of praise — was not extemporal; it came too perfectly off."

Fastidious Brisk's praise had been written and rehearsed earlier.

Carlo Buffone said to Sogliardo, "Besides, sir, you shall never need to go to a hothouse; you shall sweat there with courting your mistress, or sweat from losing your money at the card game primero, as well as sweat from being in front of all the stoves in Flanders."

Sweating was a treatment for venereal disease.

The inns in Flanders had stoves for warmth in common rooms in the winter. Of course, the windows were kept closed. Wet clothes hung near the stoves, and people stayed near the stoves for warmth. Many people complained about the odor.

"By the Virgin Mary, this, too, sir:

"You must always be sure to carry a good strong perfume about you, so that your mistress' dog may smell you out among the rest; and, in wooing her, never fear to be out, for you may have a pipe of tobacco, or a bass viol shall hang on the wall on purpose, and either will put you in presently."

"To be out" meant 1) to be at a loss for words, or 2) to be sexually rejected.

Carlo Buffone continued saying to Sogliardo:

“The tricks your Resolution has taught you in tobacco — the whiff, and those tricks — will stand you in very good ornament — grace — there.”

Fastidious Brisk said, “Aye, to some, perhaps. But, if he should come to my mistress Saviolina with tobacco, this gentleman knows” — he pointed to Macilente — “she’d reply sharply upon him, indeed. Oh, by this bright sun, she has the most acute, ready, and polished wit, that — tut, there’s no spirit able to withstand her.”

He then said to Macilente, “You can report it, signor, for you have seen her.”

“Then he can report no less based on his judgment, I assure him,” Puntarvolo said.

“Truly, I like her well enough, but she’s too self-conceited, I think,” Macilente said.

“Aye, indeed, she’s a little too self-conceited,” Fastidious Brisk said. “If it were not for that humor, she would be the most-to-be-admired lady in the world.”

“Indeed, it is a humor that detracts from her other excellencies,” Puntarvolo said.

“Why, her self-conceit may easily be made to forsake her, in my thought,” Macilente said. “She can be taught not to be self-conceited.”

“Easily, sir?” Fastidious Brisk said. “Then are all impossibilities easy.”

“You conclude too quickly that I cannot do it, signor,” Macilente said. “What will you say if I make it so plainly and clearly appear now that you yourself shall confess that nothing is more possible?”

“By the Virgin Mary, I will say that if you can do it, I will both applaud you and admire you for it,” Fastidious Brisk said.

“And I will second him,” Puntarvolo said.

“Why, I’ll show you, gentlemen,” Macilente said. “Carlo, come here.”

Macilente, Carlo Buffone, Puntarvolo, and Fastidious Brisk whispered together, forming a plan.

Sogliardo said to Cavalier Shift, “Indeed, I have a great fancy to go to the court. What does my Resolution think? Shall I venture to go there?”

“Indeed, Countenance, do as you please,” Cavalier Shift said. “The court is a place of good reputation and capacity.”

“Capacity” may mean that the court is a large court, or that the people there have much mental capacity, or both.

“Oh, my tricks in tobacco, as Carlo says, will appear excellent there,” Sogliardo said.

“Why, you may go with these gentlemen now and see fashions, and afterward, do as you shall see fit,” Cavalier Shift said.

“You say the truth,” Sogliardo said. “Will you go with me, Resolution?”

“I will meet you, Countenance, about three or four o’clock,” Cavalier Shift said. “But to say that I will go with you, I cannot, for, as I am Apple John, I am to go before the cockatrice you saw this morning, and therefore please make my excuse, good Countenance.”

A cockatrice can be a prostitute.

“Farewell, good Resolution, but don’t fail to meet me there,” Sogliardo said.

“I swear as I live that I will,” Cavalier Shift said.

He exited.

Macilente, Carlo Buffone, Puntarvolo, and Fastidious Brisk broke off their whispered conversation.

“This plan is admirably excellent,” Puntarvolo said.

“If you can just persuade Sogliardo to go to the court, that’s what we need now,” Macilente said.

“Oh, leave it to me,” Carlo Buffone said. “That’s my task.”

Carlo took Sogliardo aside and talked to him.

“Now, by Jesus, Macilente, it’s above measure excellent,” Fastidious Brisk said. “It will be the only courtly exploit that ever proved a courtier ingenious.”

In other words: This will be the only courtly exploit that demonstrated that a courtier is intelligent.

“Upon my soul, it puts the lady quite out of her humor, and we shall laugh righteously,” Puntarvolo said.

Carlo Buffone returned to the others and said about Sogliardo, “Come, the gentleman was already resolved to go with you even before I urged it.”

“Why, then, gallants, you two and Carlo go ahead of us to prepare the jest,” Macilente said. “Sogliardo and I will come a little while after you.”

“Pardon me,” Carlo Buffone said. “I am not for the court.”

“That’s true. Carlo will not go to the court, indeed,” Puntarvolo said. “Well, you shall leave the plan to the ability of Monsieur Brisk and myself; upon our lives, we will manage it successfully and enjoyably. Carlo shall order supper at the Mitre Tavern in preparation for when we come back, where we will meet and dimple our cheeks with laughter at the success.”

“Aye, but will you all promise to come?” Carlo Buffone asked.

The bill for the meal would be high.

“I myself shall mansuete — manage — it concerning them,” Puntarvolo said. “I’ll bring them along tamely. He who fails, let his reputation lie under the lash of thy tongue.”

Wearing his new suit of clothing, Fungoso entered the scene.

“God’s so, look who comes here,” Carlo Buffone said.

“God’s so” means “By God’s soul,” but it is close to “Godso,” which is Italian slang for “penis.”

“What do you want, nephew?” Sogliardo asked.

“Uncle, God save you,” Fungoso said. “Did you see a gentleman, one Monsieur Brisk, a courtier? He goes in such a suit as I do.”

Pointing to Fastidious Brisk, Sogliardo said, “Here is the gentleman, nephew, but not in such a suit as you are wearing.”

“Another suit!” Fungoso said.

He fainted.

“How are you now, nephew?” Sogliardo asked.

Fastidious Brisk said to Fungoso, “Do you want to speak to me, sir?”

“Aye, when he has recovered himself, poor poll,” Carlo Buffone said.

A poll is a parrot. Parrots copy the speech of humans; Fungoso copies the clothing of Fastidious Brisk.

“He needs some rosa solis,” Puntarvolo said.

Literally “rose of the sun,” this was a medicinal drink.

“How are you now, signor?” Macilente asked Fungoso.

“I am not well, sir,” Fungoso said.

“Why, this is what it is to dog — follow — the fashion,” Macilente said.

“Come, gentlemen, remember your affairs,” Carlo Buffone said. “Fungoso’s disease is nothing but the flux — the fluctuation in fashion — of apparel.”

In medicine, “flux” is a discharge, including a discharge of excrement.

The affairs at hand concerned fooling Saviolina.

Puntarvolo said to his serving-men, “Sirs, return to the lodging. Keep the cat safe; I’ll be the dog’s guardian myself.”

The serving-men exited with the cat.

“Nephew, will you go to the court with us?” Sogliardo asked. “These gentlemen and I are for the court. Nay, don’t be so melancholy.”

“By God’s eyelid, I think no man in Christendom has that rascally fortune that I have,” Fungoso said.

“Indeed, your suit is well enough, signor,” Macilente said.

He thought that Fungoso was complaining about always being a little behind the latest fashion.

“Nay, not for that I protest, but I had an errand to carry information to Monsieur Fastidious, and I have forgotten the information,” Fungoso said.

Macilente replied:

“Why, go along to the court with us and remember it. Come.”

He then said:

“Gentlemen, you three take one boat, and Sogliardo and I will take another; we shall be there very quickly.”

“I am content with that,” Fastidious Brisk said.

He then said to Fungoso, “Good sir, grant us your pleasance — your company.”

“Farewell, Carlo,” Puntarvolo said. “Remember.”

In additional words: Remember to order the meal.

“I assure you I will,” Carlo Buffone said. “I wish that I had one of Kemp’s shoes to throw after you.”

Throwing a shoe after someone is supposed to bring that someone good luck. Will Kemp was a famous actor of the time.

Puntarvolo said, “Good fortune will close the eyes of our jest: No one will know what we are up to. Fear not, and we shall frolic and have fun.”

The actors exited.

Mitis said to Cordatus, “This Macilente, signor, begins to be more sociable all of a sudden, I think, than he was before. There’s some portent in it, I believe.”

“Oh, he’s a fellow of a strange nature,” Cordatus said. “Now does he, in this calm of his humor, plot and store up a world of malicious thoughts in his brain, until he is so full of them that you shall see the very torrent of his malice break forth, and against the course and charge of all their affections — emotions aroused by malice — oppose itself so violently that you will almost be amazed to think how it is possible the current of their dispositions shall receive so quick and strong an alteration.”

Mitis replied, “Aye, by the Virgin Mary, sir, this is that on which my expectation has dwelt all this while; for I must tell you, signor, although I was loath to interrupt the scene, yet I questioned in my own private thoughts how the playwright should properly call it Every Man Out of His Humor when I saw all his actors so strongly pursue and continue their humors.”

Cordatus said:

“Why, therein his art appears most full of luster, and approaches truest to life, especially when in the flame and height of their humors they are laid flat; it fills the eye better and with more contentment.

“How tedious a sight it would be to behold a proud lofty tree lopped and cut down by degrees, when it might be felled in a moment with one blow!

“And, to set the axe to it before it came to that pride and fulness, would be the same as not to have it grow.”

In other words: Ben Jonson was making sure that the humors of his characters were at their fullest height before he took the characters out of their humors. It would be a mistake to take the characters out of their humors too soon. But when he took them out of their humors, he would do so quickly.

“Well, I shall long until I see this fall you talk of,” Mitis said.

Cordatus said:

“To help your longing, signor, let your imagination be swifter than a pair of oars, and, by this imagination, suppose Puntarvolo, Brisk, Fungoso, and the dog arrived at the court gate and going up to the great hall.

“We’ll leave Macilente and Sogliardo them on the water until possibility and natural means may land them.

“Here come the gallants; now prepare your expectation.”

ACT 5 (Every Man Out of His Humor)

— 5.1 —

Puntarvolo, Fastidious Brisk, Fungoso, and the dog walked onto the stage.

“Come, lordings,” Puntarvolo said.

He then said to Fungoso, “Signor, you are sufficiently instructed in what you need to do?”

“Who, I, sir?” Fastidious Brisk asked.

Indicating Fungoso, Puntarvolo said, “No, this gentleman. But wait, I am worried about where to put my dog. He is no suitable companion for the presence chamber.”

“By the Mass, that’s true indeed, knight,” Fastidious Brisk said. “You must not carry him into the presence chamber.”

“I know it, and I, like a dull beast, forgot to bring one of my cormorants to attend me,” Puntarvolo said.

Cormorants are literally rapacious large birds and figuratively gluttons. Masters frequently complained about the large appetites of their servants.

“Why, you would do best to leave him at the porter’s lodge,” Fastidious Brisk said.

“No,” Puntarvolo said. “His worth is too well known among the porters to be returned when I wish.”

The dog was valuable to him in part because it would accompany him in his voyage to and from Constantinople. If the dog were to die before Puntarvolo set out on his journey, all bets would be off and he would not make the journey. Puntarvolo, however, genuinely loved his dog.

“By God’s light, what will you do then?” Fastidious Brisk asked.

“I must leave him with someone who is ignorant of my dog’s worth, if I will have him kept safe,” Puntarvolo said. “And look, here comes one who will carry coals, and therefore he will hold my dog.”

The servants who carried charcoal were accustomed to doing menial work. Looking after a dog should be an OK task to them.

A servant carrying a basket of coals entered the scene.

“My trustworthy friend, may I commit the safekeeping of this dog to thy prudent care?” Puntarvolo asked.

“You may if you please, sir,” the servant said.

“Please, let me find thee here at my return,” Puntarvolo said. “It shall not be long until I will ease thee of thy employment and please thee.”

What would please the servant would be a good tip.

To the others, Puntarvolo said, “Let’s go forth, gentlemen.”

Fastidious Brisk said to Puntarvolo, “Why, but will you leave your dog with so slight command, and impart no more admonitions upon the fellow?”

Didn’t he have any instructions for the servant regarding the care of the dog?

“Admonitions?” Puntarvolo said. “No, there would be no strategy in that; that would be to let him know the value of the gem he holds, and so to tempt frail nature against her inclination to be honest.”

He said to the servant, “No, please let thy honesty and trustworthiness be sweet and short.”

By short, he meant for the short time the servant would need to look after the dog.

His words, however, could be interpreted as an insult: Didn't he think that the servant could be honest and trustworthy for a longer time?

"Yes, sir," the servant said.

Puntarvolo said to the others, "But listen, gallants, and chiefly Monsieur Brisk: When we come in eyeshot or the presence of this lady, don't let other matters carry us away from our project, but if we can, let us single her forth to some place."

"Single forth" was a hunting term meaning to separate one animal from the rest of the pack so it could be killed.

"I assure you we will," Fastidious Brisk said.

"And don't be too sudden, but let the plan induce itself with good circumstance," Puntarvolo said. "Let it seem plausible and arise out of the situation and not out of a plot. Let's go onward."

"Is this the way?" Fungoso asked.

He looked at the wall hangings and said, "Truly, here are fine tapestries."

Puntarvolo, Fastidious Brisk, and Fungoso exited.

Mulling over Puntarvolo's words, the servant said to himself:

"Honesty, sweet — and short?

"By the Virgin Mary, it shall, sir, don't doubt that.

“For even at this very instant if one would give me twenty pounds, I would not deliver the dog to him: There’s for the sweet.

“But now, an instant later, if any man would come and offer me just twopence, he shall have the dog: There’s the short — the short-lived honesty — now.

“By God’s blood, what a mad humorous gentleman is this to leave his dog with me. I could run away with him now if he were worth anything.

“Well, I pray God send the gentleman back quickly again.”

Puntarvolo had upset the servant, who thought he was being looked down on: He felt that Puntarvolo had insulted him.

Macilente and Sogliardo entered the scene.

“Come on, signor,” Macilente said. “Now prepare to court this all-witted lady, most naturally and like yourself.”

Sogliardo was a rustic whose “like [him]self” was unlikely to appeal to a court lady.

In Ben Jonson’s society, a “natural” was a half-wit.

Part of the meaning of “like yourself” was that Saviolina was like Sogliardo in being a half-wit. So Macilente said.

“Indeed, if you say the word, I’ll begin to court her while smoking tobacco,” Sogliardo said.

Macilente said:

“Oh, bah to tobacco.

“No, you shall begin with ‘How does my sweet lady?’ or ‘Why are you so melancholy, madam?’ Although she may be very merry, it’s all one — it doesn’t matter.

“Be sure to kiss your hand often enough.”

Kissing one's hand was an action of courtly etiquette.

Macilente continued:

“Pray for her health and tell her how ‘more than most fair’ she is.

“Screw your face to one side like this” — he demonstrated — “and profess your devotion to her. Let her scoff and look askance and hide her teeth with her fan when she laughs a fit. The reaction will draw her into more conversation; that's nothing to worry about.

“You must talk continuously, eagerly, and boldly. Although it may be without sense, as long as it is without blushing, it is most court-like and well.”

“But shall I not use tobacco at all?” Sogliardo asked.

“Oh, by no means use tobacco,” Macilente said. “It will but make your breath suspected of being bad and she may think that you use it only to cover up the rankness of your breath.”

“I will be advised, sir, by my friends,” Sogliardo said. “I will do what they advise me to do.”

He believed that his friends included Macilente.

“God's my life, see where Sir Puntar's dog is!” Macilente said, seeing the servant and the dog.

Macilente was shortening Puntarvolo's name. A “punter” is a gambler.

The servant said to himself, “I wish the gentleman would return for his follower — his dog — here. I'll leave him — the dog — to his fortunes else.”

Macilente said to himself, “By God's heart, it would be the very best jest — notable deed — in the world to poison the dog now. Ha! By God's will, I'll do it, if I can but get him away from the fellow."

He then said, "Signor Sogliardo, walk aside, and think upon some device to entertain the lady with."

"So I do, sir," Sogliardo said.

Sogliardo walked off, meditating.

Macilente said to the servant, "How are you now, my honest friend? Whose dog-keeper are thou?"

"Dog-keeper, sir?" the servant said. "I hope I scorn that, indeed."

"Why, don't thou keep a dog?" Macilente asked.

"Sir, now I do, and now I do not," the servant said.

He released the dog and said, "I think this is sweet and short. Make me his dog-keeper, does he?"

The servant exited.

He had taken care of the dog as asked — that was the sweet. But he had taken care of the dog for only a short time — that was the short.

"This is excellent above expectation," Macilente said to himself.

He said to the dog, "Nay, stay, sir. You'd be travelling to Constantinople, but I'll give you a dose of medicine that shall shorten your voyage."

He fed poison to the dog and said, "Here. So, sir, I'll be bold to take my leave of you. Now go to the Turk's court in the devil's name, for you shall never go in God's name."

Macilente kicked the dog away.

He then called, “Sogliardo! Come.”

Sogliardo came over to him and said, “I have a device — a plan — indeed now, that will sting it.”

A sting was a tool that would repair a thatched roof.

Sogliardo had something in mind that would make him attractive to Saviolina.

The “sting” could also be his penis, which he could use to “sting” Saviolina.

“Take heed you don’t leese — accidentally lose — it, signor, before you come there,” Macilente said. “Preserve it and keep it safe.”

They exited.

Cordatus said to Mitis, “How do you like this first exploit of his?”

He was referring to poisoning the dog.

“Oh, it is a piece of true malice,” Mitis said. “But I eagerly await the conclusion of the other plot: the one involving Sogliardo and Saviolina.”

“Here the actors come,” Cordatus said. “They will make the conclusion of that plot appear.”

— 5.2 —

Puntarvolo, Saviolina, Fastidious Brisk, and Fungoso entered the scene.

“Why, I thought, Sir Puntarvolo, that you had been gone on your voyage by now?” Saviolina said.

Puntarvolo replied, “Dear and most amiable — worthy to be loved — lady, your divine beauties do bind me to those courtly and attentive services, so that I cannot depart when I would.”

“It is most courtly spoken, sir,” Saviolina said, “but what might we do to have a sight of your dog and cat?”

“His dog’s in the courtyard, lady,” Fastidious Brisk said.

“And not your cat?” Saviolina said. “How dare you trust her to be left behind you, sir?”

“Indeed, madam, she has sore eyes and she stays in her chamber,” Puntarvolo said. “By the Virgin Mary, I have left her under sufficient guard. Two of my servants are attending to her.”

“I’ll give you some medicinal herbal water for her eyes,” Saviolina said. “When do you go, sir?”

“Certainly, sweet lady, I don’t know,” Puntarvolo said.

Fastidious Brisk said, “He does stay the rather, madam, to present your acute judgment with so courtly and well-parted — multi-talented — a gentleman, as yet Your Ladyship has never seen.”

“Who’s he, gentle Monsieur Brisk?” Saviolina asked.

She pointed to Fungoso and asked, “Not that gentleman?”

“No, lady, the man I mean is a kinsman of Justice Silence,” Fastidious Brisk said.

He was referring to Sogliardo.

Puntarvolo said, “Please, sir, give me permission to describe him:

“He’s a gentleman, lady, of such rare and splendid and admirable faculty, that I assert that I don’t know his like in Europe.

“He is exceedingly valiant, an excellent scholar, and so widely travelled that he is able in discourse to deliver you a model of any prince’s court in the world.

“He speaks the languages with that purity of phrase and facility of accent that it breeds astonishment.

“His wit is the most exuberant and (above wonder) pleasant of all that ever entered the concave of this ear!”

“It is most true, lady,” Fastidious Brisk said.

He added something negative about Sogliardo: “By the Virgin Mary, he is no very excellent proper man: He is not a handsome man.”

“His travels have changed his complexion, madam,” Puntarvolo said.

Puntarvolo was saying that Sogliardo was tanned from his travels, but actually Sogliardo was tanned from his life on a farm in rural England.

Ben Jonson’s society valued light complexions.

“Oh, Sir Puntarvolo, you must not think that every man was born to have my servant Brisk’s features,” Saviolina said.

She realized that not every man is handsome.

Puntarvolo said:

“But he has that which transcends all that, lady.

“He does so peerlessly imitate any manner of person for gesture, action, passion, or whatever —”

“Aye,” Fastidious Brisk said. “He does so imitate especially a rustic or a clown, madam, that it is not possible for the sharpest-sighted wit in the world to discern any sparks of the gentleman in him, when he does it.”

“Oh, Monsieur Brisk, don’t be so tyrannous to confine all wits within the compass of your own: Don’t judge the wit of other people by your own,” Saviolina said. “Not find the sparks of a gentleman in him, if he is a gentleman?”

She believed that if he were really a gentleman, she could find signs of it.

“No, in truth, sweet lady, I believe you cannot,” Fastidious Brisk said.

“Do you believe so?” Saviolina said. “Why, I can find sparks of a gentleman in you, sir.”

In other words: If I can find sparks of a gentleman in you, then I can find sparks of a gentleman in him.

“Aye, he is a gentleman, madam, and a reveler,” Puntarvolo said.

Playwright Francis Beaumont satirically identified three types of students at the Inns of Court: Revelers were law students who engaged in many entertainments. Young students were naïve first-year law students, and plodders were those who were studying law seriously in order to make a living from it.

“Indeed, I think I have seen Your Ladyship at our revels,” Fungoso said.

“Likely enough, sir,” Saviolina said. “But I wish that I might see this wonder you talk of. May one have a sight of him for any reasonable sum?”

“Yes, madam, he will arrive soon,” Puntarvolo said.

“And shall we see him play the clown and act like a country bumpkin?” Saviolina asked.

“Indeed, sweet lady, that you shall,” Fastidious Brisk said. “See, here he comes.”

Macilente and Sogliardo entered the scene.

“This is the man,” Puntarvolo said. “Please observe him, lady.”

“Curse me, but he clowns it properly indeed,” Saviolina said.

Sogliardo really did look like a country bumpkin.

“Closely observe his courtship,” Puntarvolo said.

“How is my sweet lady?” Sogliardo asked.

He took Saviolina’s hand and said, “Hot and moist? Beautiful and lusty? Ha!”

In Ben Jonson’s society, a hot and moist palm was regarded as a sign of a lecherous nature.

“Beautiful, if it pleases you, sir, but not lusty,” Saviolina replied.

“Oh, ho, lady, it pleases you to say so, in truth,” Sogliardo said. “And how is my sweet lady? Is she in health? Bona-roba, quaeso que nouvelles? Que nouvelles, sweet creature?”

Bona-roba refers to a woman as if she were a commodity: good stuff.

Quaeso que nouvelles is sort of Italian, sort of French, and sort of Spanish for “I ask what is the news?” The words “Que nouvelles” appeared at the openings of some satiric skits at the Inns of Court.

“Oh, excellent!” Saviolina said. “Why, gallants, is this the man who cannot be deciphered? They would be very bleary-and dim-witted, indeed, who could not discern the gentleman in him.”

“But do you, in earnest, see the gentleman in him, lady?” Puntarvolo asked.

Saviolina said:

“Do I, sir?”

“Why, if you had any true court-judgment in the carriage of his eye, and that inward power that forms his countenance, you might perceive his counterfeiting as clearly as you perceive the noonday.”

“Carriage” is “bodily department” and seems to be ill matched with “eye.” “Countenance” is “facial features” and seems to be ill matched with “inward power.”

Saviolina continued:

“Alas — nay, if you wanted to have tested my wit indeed, you should never have told me he was a gentleman, but instead have presented him for a true clown indeed, and then have seen if I could have deciphered him.”

“Before God, Her Ladyship says the truth, knight,” Fastidious Brisk said to Puntarvolo.

He then asked Saviolina, “But doesn’t he imitate the clown most naturally, mistress?”

“Naturally” means 1) realistically (as if born to it), and/or 2) like a half-wit.

“Oh, she cannot but affirm that, out of the bounty and excellence of her judgment,” Puntarvolo said.

“Nay, no doubt he does well for a gentleman imitating a clown,” Saviolina said. “But I assure you, he graces his natural carriage — bodily department — of the gentleman much better than his clownery.”

“It is strange, indeed, that Her Ladyship should see so far into him,” Fastidious Brisk said.

“Aye, isn’t it?” Puntarvolo said.

“Indeed, as easily as may be,” Saviolina said. “Not decipher him, did you say?”

“In all seriousness, I wonder at it,” Fungoso said.

“Why, has she deciphered him, gentlemen?” Macilente asked.

“Oh, most miraculously, and beyond admiration,” Puntarvolo answered.

“Is it possible?” Macilente said.

“She has given in front of witnesses a statement about the most infallible signs of the gentleman in him, that’s for certain,” Fastidious Brisk said.

“Why, gallants, let me laugh at you a little,” Saviolina said. “Was this your plot to test my judgment in a gentleman?”

“Nay, lady, do not scorn us,” Macilente said. “Although you have this gift of perspicacy and clear-sightedness above others, what if he should be no gentleman now, but a clown indeed, lady?”

“What would you think of that?” Puntarvolo asked. “Wouldn’t Your Ladyship be out of your humor?”

“Oh, but she knows it is not so,” Fastidious Brisk said.

“What if he weren’t a man, you may as well say,” Saviolina said. “Nay, if Your Worships could fool me so indeed, you would be wiser than you are thought to be.”

“In good faith, lady, he is a very perfect clown, both by father and mother, that I’ll assure you,” Macilente said.

“Oh, sir, you are very jocular,” Saviolina replied.

Macilente said, “Just look at his hand, and that shall tell you the truth.”

He showed her one of Sogliardo's palms, which was heavily calloused, and said, "Look, lady, what a palm is here."

"Tut, that was with holding the plow," Sogliardo said.

"The plow!" Macilente said. "Did you discern any such thing in him, madam?"

"Indeed, no, she saw the gentleman as bright as at noontide, she did," Fastidious Brisk said. "She deciphered him from the first moment she saw him."

"Truly, I am sorry Your Ladyship's sight should be so suddenly struck," Macilente said.

"Oh, you're goodly beagles!" Saviolina said.

Beagles hunt in packs. So do Puntarvolo, Macilente, and Fastidious Brisk. To a much lesser extent, so does Fungoso.

Saviolina began to leave.

"What! Has she gone?" Fastidious Brisk said.

"Nay, stay, sweet lady!" Sogliardo said. "Que nouvelles? Que nouvelles? What news? What news?"

"Get out, you fool, you!" Saviolina said.

She exited.

"She's out of her humor, indeed," Fungoso said.

True, but she had been correct: Sogliardo was a gentleman; he had purchased a coat of arms.

"Nay, let's follow it while it's hot, gentlemen," Fastidious Brisk said.

"Come, on my honor, we'll make her blush in the presence chamber," Puntarvolo said. "My spleen is great with laughter."

In Ben Jonson's society, the spleen was regarded as the organ most associated with laughter.

"Your laughter will be a child of a feeble life — it will be short-lived, I believe, sir," Macilente said.

He then said to Fungoso, "Come, signor, your looks are too dejected, I think. Why don't you mix mirth with the rest of us?"

"By God's will, this suit of clothing frets me at the soul," Fungoso said. "I'll have it altered tomorrow, to be sure."

They exited.

Cavalier Shift entered and said to himself:

"I have come to the court to meet with my Countenance, Sogliardo. Poor men must be glad of such patronage, when they can get no better. Well, need and poverty may insult and wound a man, but it shall never make him despair of being a man of consequence.

"The world will say, 'It is base.' Tush, base! It is base to live under the earth, not base to live above it, by any means."

"Base" can mean "low," as in "under the earth in a grave," and it can mean "morally low." To Cavalier Shift, it is not base to find a means — by any means — to get what you need to stay alive.

Puntarvolo, Fastidious Brisk, Sogliardo, Fungoso, and Macilente entered the scene.

Fastidious Brisk said, "The poor lady is most miserably out of her humor, indeed."

"There was never so witty a jest played at the Tilt Yard of all the court wits who were ever born and christened!" Puntarvolo said.

The Tilt Yard was a place for tilting, aka jousting, and other sports. Wits tilt — jest — with words.

Macilente said to himself, “Oh, this applause taints it foully.”

All this self-congratulation was lessening the goodness of the practical joke, according to Macilente.

The purpose of the practical joke had been to lessen the too-great self-regard of Saviolina, but now most of the jokers were building too high their own self-regard.

“I think I did my part in courting,” Sogliardo said.

Noticing Cavalier Shift, he said, “Oh, Resolution!”

Looking for the servant who had been keeping his dog, Puntarvolo said, “Aye me, my dog!”

“Aye me” is a cry of distress.

“Where is he?” Macilente, who had poisoned Puntarvolo’s dog, asked.

“By God’s precious blood, go seek for the fellow, good signor,” Fastidious Brisk said to Fungoso.

Fungoso exited to look for the dog and the coal-carrier who had been supposed to take care of the dog.

“Why, no one was here when we came in now but Cavalier Shift,” Macilente said. “Ask him where the dog is.”

Fastidious Brisk asked Cavalier Shift, “Did you see Sir Puntarvolo’s dog here, cavalier, since you came?”

“His dog, sir?” Cavalier Shift replied. “He may look for his dog, sir; I see nothing of his dog, sir.”

Macilente said to Puntarvolo, "Upon my life, Shift has stolen your dog, sir, and he has been hired to do it by some who have bet money with you. You may guess this by his peremptory and obstinate answers."

"That's not unlikely, for he has been a notorious thief by his own confession," Puntarvolo replied.

He asked Cavalier Shift, "Sirrah, where's my dog?"

"Do you blame me for the loss of your dog, sir?" Cavalier Shift said. "I have nothing to do with your dog, sir."

"Villain, thou lie!" Puntarvolo said.

Being called a liar was justification enough to challenge a man to a duel.

"Lie, sir?" Cavalier Shift said. "By God's blood, you are merely a man, sir, and thus you are mortal and able to die."

"Rogue and thief, restore my dog to me!" Puntarvolo said.

"Take heed, Sir Puntarvolo, what you do," Sogliardo said. "He'll bear no coals, I can tell you, on my word."

"Bear no coals" means "bear no insult."

"This is splendid," Macilente, a troublemaker, said to himself.

Sogliardo said to Puntarvolo, "It's a wonder he doesn't stab you. By this light, he has stabbed forty men for forty times less matter, I can tell you, from my knowledge."

"I will make thee stoop and obey me, thou abject man," Puntarvolo said.

One meaning of "stoop" is a dog's lowering its head to catch a scent. Another meaning is humble submission.

Puntarvolo and Shift threatened each other.

“Make him stoop, sir?” Sogliardo said. “Gentlemen, pacify him or he’ll — Puntarvolo will — be killed!”

“Is Shift so tall — brave — a man?” Macilente asked.

“Tall a man?” Sogliardo said. “If you love Puntarvolo’s life, stand between them. Make Cavalier Shift stoop!”

Puntarvolo said to Cavalier Shift, “Give me my dog, villain, or I will hang thee! Thou have confessed robberies and other felonious acts to this gentleman, thy Countenance —”

“I’ll bear no witness,” Sogliardo interrupted.

He would not give evidence that could get his friend, Cavalier Shift, hung.

Puntarvolo continued, “— and without my dog, I will hang thee for them!”

Cavalier Shift knelt before Puntarvolo. He was afraid of being hung.

“What! Kneel to thine enemy!” Sogliardo said, astonished.

“Pardon me, good sir,” Cavalier Shift said. “As God is my judge, I swear I never did robbery in all my life.”

Fungoso returned from looking for the dog and said, “Oh, Sir Puntarvolo, your dog lies giving up the ghost in the woodyard.”

Macilente, who had poisoned the dog, said to himself, “By God’s blood, isn’t he dead yet?”

“Oh, my dog was born to endure a disastrous fortune!” Puntarvolo said. “Please lead me to him, sir.”

Puntarvolo and Fungoso exited.

Sogliardo said to Cavalier Shift, “What! Did you never do any robbery in your life?”

“Oh, this is good,” Macilente said to himself.

He said to Sogliardo, “So he swore, sir.”

“Aye, I heard him,” Sogliardo said.

He asked Cavalier Shift, “And did you swear truly, sir?”

“Aye, as God shall have an interest in my soul, sir, I never robbed any man, I,” Cavalier Shift said. “I never stood by the highway side as a highwayman, sir, but only said I did so because I wanted to get myself a reputation and be accounted a brave man.”

Sogliardo said to Cavalier Shift:

“Now get out, base viliaco — rascal! Thou, my Resolution? I, thy Countenance?”

Sogliardo said to the others:

“By this light, gentlemen, he has confessed to me the most inexorable and unforgivable multitude of robberies, and he has damned himself in swearing that he did them — you never heard the like.”

Sogliardo said to Cavalier Shift:

“Out, scoundrel, get out, follow me no more, I command thee! Get out of my sight, go away from here and don’t speak! I will not hear anything you say! Away, camouccio!”

Camouccio is supposed to be an insult in a language that resembles but is not quite Italian.

Cavalier Shift exited.

Macilente said to himself:

“Oh, how I do feed upon this now, and fatten myself!”

He was feeding his humor — malicious envy — and metaphorically growing fat.

Macilente continued saying to himself:

“Here were a couple unexpectedly dishumored: Sogliardo and Cavalier Shift.”

Saviolina was expectedly dishumored.

Macilente continued saying to himself:

“Well, by this time, I hope, Sir Puntarvolo and his dog are both out of humor to travel.”

He then said out loud:

“Gentlemen, why don’t you seek out the knight and comfort him?”

“Our supper at the Mitre must of necessity be held tonight, if you love your reputations.”

“Before God, I am so melancholy for his dog’s disaster, but I’ll go,” Fastidious Brisk said.

“Indeed, and I may go, too, but I know I shall be so melancholy,” Sogliardo said.

“Tush, melancholy?” Macilente said. “You must forget that now, and remember that you lie at the mercy of a Fury: Carlo will rack your sinews asunder and scold you to a dusty death, if you don’t come.”

The three Furies were avenging goddesses out of hell.

The actors exited.

Mitis said to Cordatus, “Oh, then their fear of Carlo, likely, makes them hold their meeting.”

Cordatus replied, “Aye, here he comes. Just imagine him to have entered the Mitre, and it is enough.”

— 5.3 —

Carlo Buffone walked on stage, which now represented the Mitre Tavern. Some others brought a table and chairs on stage.

Carlo Buffone said, “Holla! Where are these shot-sharks?”

Shot-sharks are bartenders who bring the drinkers the — sometimes inflated — bill.

A drawer — that is, a drawer of wine and ale, aka bartender — arrived, saying to an out-of-sight customer, “By and by.”

This meant: I’ll be there soon.

The drawer then said, “You’re welcome, good Master Buffone.”

“Where’s George?” Carlo Buffone said. “Call George here for me quickly.”

George was Carlo Buffone’s favorite drawer at the Mitre.

“What wine will you please to have, sir?” the drawer said. “I’ll draw you wine that’s neat, Master Buffone.”

Neat wine is undiluted.

“Go away, neophyte, and do as I tell you to do,” Carlo Buffone said. “Bring my dear George to me.”

George arrived before the drawer exited.

“By the Mass, here he comes,” Carlo Buffone said.

“Welcome, Master Carlo,” George said.

“Is supper ready, George?” Carlo Buffone asked.

“Aye, sir, almost,” George replied. “Will you have the cloth laid, Master Carlo?”

“Oh, what else?” Carlo Buffone said. “Have any of the gallants come yet?”

“None yet, sir,” George answered.

He began to leave, but Carlo Buffone said, “Wait, take me with you, George.”

This meant: Wait, I have more instructions for you, George.

He then said, “Let me have a good fat loin of pork laid to the fire immediately.”

“It shall be done, sir,” George said.

“And also, listen, draw me the biggest shaft you have out of the butt you know of,” Carlo Buffone said. “Go away now — you know which cask I mean, George — quickly.”

“Shaft” means “draught,” and “butt” means “wine cask.”

He wanted George to fill up the biggest flagon with Carlo’s favorite wine from the wine cask that George knew about.

“It will be done, sir,” George said as he exited.

Carlo Buffone said to himself:

“By God’s blood, I never hungered so much for anything in my life as I do to know our gallants’ success or lack of it at the court. Now is that lean bald-rib Macilente — that witty, stinging villain — plotting some evil plan, and he lies a-soaking in their frothy humors like a dry crust, until he has drunk them all up.”

The Elizabethans often floated a piece of dry bread or toast in ale and consumed both. Macilente is like a sop that soaks up all the ale.

Carlo Buffone continued talking to himself:

“Could the kex — that dry, hollow stem of a man — but hold up his eyes at other men’s happiness in any reasonable proportion, by God’s eyelid, the slave would be loved next to heaven, above honor, wealth, rich fare, apparel, wenches, all the delights of the belly and the groin — gluttony and lust, appetites and passions — whatever.”

Macilente does have the virtue of being a good social critic, but unfortunately his malicious envy makes him unlovable.

George returned, bringing wine in a flagon and two cups.

“Here, Master Carlo,” George said.

“Is it right, boy?” Carlo Buffone asked.

“Aye, sir, I assure you it is right,” George said.

“Well said, my dear George, depart now,” Carlo Buffone said.

George exited. The other drawer remained in the room.

Carlo Buffone said, “Come, my small gimlet, you in the false scabbard, go away!”

A gimlet is a boring-tool used to make holes in casks so that the wine or ale can be drawn out.

A scabbard is a sheath for a knife or a sword, both of which can be phallic symbols. The Latin word vagina means “sheath.” If the drawer were wearing a codpiece — a piece of clothing for holding male genitals — the codpiece could be a false sheath.

Carlo Buffone put the drawer out of the room and shut the door.

Alone, Carlo Buffone said to the huge flagon of wine George had brought, “Good. Now to you, Sir Burgomaster, let’s taste of your bounty.”

Mitis said to Cordatus, “Will he start drinking such quantities of wine alone?”

“You shall perceive that soon enough, sir,” Cordatus answered.

Carlo Buffone drank.

He then said to himself:

“Aye, by the Virgin Mary, sir, here’s purity. Here’s undiluted wine! Oh, George, I could bite off thy nose for this now!”

In Ben Jonson’s society, “I could bite off thy nose” was an endearment, similar to “I could eat you up.”

Carlo Buffone continued saying to himself:

“Sweet rogue, he has drawn nectar, the very soul of the grape. I’ll wash my temples and get pleasantly drunk with some of it now and drink some half-a-score draughts.

“It will heat the brain and kindle my imagination; I shall talk nothing but crackers and fireworks tonight. I will dazzle my hearers with eloquence.”

“Crackers” can be 1) firecrackers, or 2) liars and boasters.

George had brought two cups for wine-drinking. Carlo Buffone set the two cups apart.

He said, “So, sir, please you to be here, sir, and I here. Good.”

He was going to pretend to be two drinkers and drink out of one cup and then out of the other.

Cordatus said to Mitis, “This is worth the observation, signor.”

Carlo Buffone (first cup) said, “Now, sir, here’s to you, and I present you with so much of my love.”

He drank from the first cup.

Carlo Buffone (second cup) said, “I take it kindly from you, sir” — he drank from the second cup — “and will return to you the like proportion, but also, sir, remembering the merry night we had at the countess’ — you know where, sir.”

Carlo Buffone (first cup) said, “By Jesus, you do put me in mind now of a very necessary office that I will propose in your pledge, sir: the health of that honorable countess, and the sweet lady who sat by her, sir.”

Carlo Buffone (second cup) said, “By I do vail to it with reverence.”

“Vail” means respectfully lower one’s sails. Carlo Buffone bowed.

He drank from the second cup.

Carlo Buffone (second cup) added, “And now, signor, with these ladies, I’ll be bold to mix the health of your divine mistress.”

Wine was often diluted with water.

One meaning of “mix” is “have sexual intercourse with.”

Carlo Buffone (first cup) asked, “Do you know her, sir?”

Carlo Buffone (second cup) said, “Oh, lord, sir, aye, and in the respectful memory and mention of her, I could wish this wine were the most precious drug in the world.”

Carlo Buffone (first cup) said, “In good faith, sir, you do honor me in it exceedingly.”

He drank from the first cup.

Mitis asked Cordatus, “Whom would he be impersonating in this scene, signor?”

Possibly, Ben Jonson was not satirizing anyone in particular, but he did make jokes about his own wine-drinking, as in his play The Staple of News and in the Induction of this play.

“Indeed, I don’t know, sir,” Cordatus said, “Observe, observe him.”

Carlo Buffone (second cup) said, “If it were the basest filth or mud that runs in the channel, I am bound to pledge it, by God, sir.”

He drank from the second cup.

The particular channel he was talking about was for sewage.

Carlo Buffone (second cup) added, “And now, sir, here is again a replenished bowl, sir, that I will reciprocally return upon you to the health of the Count Frugale.”

As he was drinking, Carlo kept refreshing the wine-bowl with more wine.

Carlo Buffone (first cup) said, “The Count Frugale’s health, sir? I’ll pledge it on my knees, by Jesus.”

He knelt and drank from the first cup.

Carlo Buffone (second cup) said, “Will you, sir? I’ll drink it on my knees, then, by the Lord.”

He knelt and drank from the second cup.

Mitis said to Cordatus, “Why, this is strange.”

“Have you ever heard a better drunken dialogue?” Cordatus asked.

Carlo Buffone (second cup) said, “Nay, do me right, sir.”

Carlo Buffone (first cup) said, “So I do, in good faith.”

Carlo Buffone (second cup) said, “In good faith, you do not; my cup was fuller.”

Carlo Buffone (first cup) objected, “Why, by Jesus, it was not.”

When drinking toasts, people were supposed to drink the same amount of wine.

Carlo Buffone (second cup) said, “By Jesus, it was, and you do lie.”

Carlo Buffone (first cup) said, “Lie, sir?”

Carlo Buffone (second cup) said, “Aye, sir.”

Carlo Buffone (first cup) said, “By God’s wounds, you rascal!”

Carlo Buffone (second cup) said, “Oh, come, stab if you have a mind to it.”

Being called a liar was grounds for a duel that could be fought with swords and daggers.

Carlo Buffone (first cup) said, “Stab? Do thou think I don’t dare to?”

Carlo Buffone (as himself) said, “Nay, I beseech you gentlemen, what is the meaning of this? Nay, look, for shame, respect your reputations.”

He overturned the wine, pot, cups, and all else.

Macilente entered the scene and asked, “Why, how are you now, Carlo? What humor is this you are in?”

“Oh, my good mischief, have thou come?” Carlo Buffone asked. “Where are the rest? Where are the rest?”

“Indeed, three of our ordnance have burst,” Macilente said.

He was comparing three of their number to war machines that had blown up.

“Burst?” Carlo Buffone said. “How did that come to happen?”

“Indeed, they were overcharged, overcharged,” Macilente said.

“Overcharged” meant “overloaded with explosives.”

“But didn’t the train — the fuse — hold?” Carlo Buffone asked.

“Oh, yes, and the poor lady is irrecoverably blown up,” Macilente said.

He was comparing Saviolina to the target of war machines such as artillery.

“Why, but which of the weapons has miscarried, then?” Carlo Buffone asked.

Macilente replied, “Imprimis, Sir Puntarvolo; next, the Countenance and Resolution.”

Imprimis is Latin for “in the first place.”

The Countenance and the Resolution, of course, were Sogliardo and Cavalier Shift.

“What?” Carlo Buffone said. “How, for the love of God?”

“Indeed, the Resolution has been proven to be a coward, the Countenance has changed his copy, and the passionate knight is shedding funeral tears over his departed dog,” Macilente said.

“Changed his copy” means “changed his behavior and role model.”

Cavalier Shift was no longer Sogliardo’s hero.

“What about Puntarvolo’s dog?” Carlo Buffone asked. “Is he dead?”

Macilente replied:

“Poisoned, it is thought.

“By the Virgin Mary, how, or by whom, that’s left for some cunning woman — some witch — here on the Bankside to resolve.

“As for my part, I know nothing more than that we are likely to have an exceedingly melancholy supper of it.”

“By God’s life, and I had purposed to be extraordinarily merry,” Carlo Buffone said. “I had drunk off a good preparative of old sack here. But will they come, will they come?”

A “preparative” is 1) a medicinal drink, and 2) a military order to get ready.

Old sack is a kind of old wine.

“They will assuredly come,” Macilente said. “By the Virgin Mary, Carlo, as thou love me, run over them all freely tonight with your satiric attacks, and especially the knight. Spare no sulphurous jest that may come out of that sweaty forge of thine, but ply them with all manner of shot: minion, saker, culverine, or anything whatsoever thou will.”

A sweaty forge is 1) a forge on wheels used for military purposes, and 2) the creative imagination.

Minion, saker, and culverine are different sizes of cannon.

“I want thee, my dear case of petronels, so that I won’t stand in dread of thee, to second me and support me in satiric duels,” Carlo Buffone said.

A case of petronels is literally a pair of pistols and metaphorically satiric weapons. In this case, the satiric weapons were words from the mouth of Macilente.

Carlo Buffone wanted Macilente’s help as he mocked the others.

“Why, my good German tapster, I will,” Macilente said.

A tapster is a bartender, and soon Carlo Buffone will be pouring wine for the others.

The Germans and the Dutch were reputed to be big drinkers. At the moment, certainly, Carlo Buffone was a heavy drinker.

Carlo Buffone called, “What, George!”

Drunk, he danced as he sang: “Lomtero! Lomtero!”

George entered the scene and asked, “Did you call, Master Carlo?”

“More nectar, George.”

He sang: “Lomtero! Lomtero!”

A montero is a Spanish cap that has flaps to protect the ears. A lamb is an innocent person.

Innocent people need protection for their ears so they aren’t hurt by the satiric gibes of people such as Carlo Buffone and Macilente.

“Your meat and food’s ready, sir, if your company have come,” George said.

“Is the loin of pork cooked enough?” Carlo Buffone asked.

“Aye, sir, it is cooked enough,” George said.

Macilente said, “Pork? By God’s heart, what do thou with such a greasy dish? I think thou do varnish thy face with the fat on it — it looks so like a glue-pot.”

“Greasy” can mean 1) oily, and 2) filthy.

A glue-pot is used for melting glue.

Carlo Buffone replied:

“True, my raw-boned rogue, and if thou would farce — fill out — thy lean ribs with it, too, they would not, like ragged laths, rub out and fray as many doublets as they do.”

Laths are slats of wood.

“But thou don’t know a good dish, thou don’t. Oh, it’s the only nourishing meat in the world.

“It’s no wonder, though, that that saucy, insolent, and stubborn — because they rejected Christianity — generation that is the Jews were forbidden it; for what would they have done, when well pampered with fat pork, who dared to murmur at their Maker with a diet of garlic and onions?

“By God’s blood, fed with it, the whoreson strummel-patched (men made of straw), goggle-eyed grumbledories would have gigantomachized.”

“Strummel” is straw. A “patch” is 1) a simpleton, or 1) a piece of cloth used to repair a piece of clothing. Therefore, “strummel-patched” probably refers to straw men.

A “drumbledore” is a bumblebee. A “dory” is a fish. Therefore, “grumbledories” probably refers to grumbling non-human creatures.

“Gigantomachized” may mean “become like the Giants who fought against the gods.”

The suffix “-mach” means “fight with” whatever comes before the “-mach.”

“Gigantomachized” may mean “fight with the giants,” but “fight with” can mean 1) fight on the side of or 2) fight against. The word “Gigantomachized” may mean that the Jews are treacherous and can change sides.

Also, whether they fought on the side of the giants or on the side of the pagan gods, a Christian would say that they were fighting on the wrong side.

Whatever these words mean, they convey an anti-Semitic meaning.

George returned with wine and winecups.

Carlo Buffone said, “Well done, my sweet George! Fill the cups! Fill the cups!”

George served the wine, and then he exited.

“This savors too much of profanation,” Mitis said.

Carlo Buffone was being drunkenly profane. His opinions were not necessarily those of Ben Jonson.

Cordatus said, “O, servetur ad imum, qualis ab incepto processerit, et sibi constet.”

C. Smart translated the lines: “let it be preserved to the last such as it set out at the beginning, and be consistent with itself.”

The Latin is from Horace, Ars Poetica 126-127. Basically, Cordatus was saying that Carlo Buffone's character had remained consistent from the beginning until now. His humor was now the same as it had been earlier.

Cordatus added, "The necessity of his vein compels a toleration; for, bar this, and dash him out of humor before his time."

In other words: We now must tolerate his drunken blasphemy, for if we don't, we will take him out of his humor before it is the best time to do so.

Carlo Buffone said:

"It is an axiom in natural philosophy: What comes nearest the nature of that it feeds, converts quicker to nourishment, and does sooner essentiate and become bodily substance.

"Now, nothing in flesh and entrails assimilates or resembles man more than a hog or swine."

"Assimulates" is a too-fancy way of saying "simulates," aka "imitates" or "counterfeits."

In other words: Since a man and a pig resemble each other closely, a pig's flesh when eaten by a man is converted quickly into man's flesh.

Carlo Buffone drank.

Macilente said, "True, and the man, to requite the pigs' courtesy, often takes off his own nature and puts on theirs, as when he becomes as churlish as a hog, or as drunk as a sow. But continue on to your conclusion."

Carlo Buffone was well on his way to being as drunk as a sow. He was already as churlish as a hog.

Macilente drank.

Carlo Buffone said:

“By the Virgin Mary, I say, nothing resembling man more than a swine, it follows, nothing can be more nourishing; for indeed, except that it shrinks from our nice nature and makes us squeamish, if we fed one upon another, we would shoot up a great deal faster, and thrive much better. I refer to your Long Lane cannibals, or such like.”

Long Lane “cannibals” are greedy pawnbrokers and old-clothes dealers.

“But since cannibalism is so contrary to us, pork, pork, is your only feed.”

Macilente said, “I take it the devil is of the same diet; he would never have desired to have been incorporated into swine otherwise.”

Mark 5 (King James Version) tells about Jesus casting devils out of a man and, at their request, into swine:

11 Now there was there nigh unto the mountains a great herd of swine feeding.

12 And all the devils besought him, saying, Send us into the swine, that we may enter into them.

13 And forthwith Jesus gave them leave. And the unclean spirits went out, and entered into the swine: and the herd ran violently down a steep place into the sea, (they were about two thousand;) and were choked in the sea.

Puntarvolo, Fastidious Brisk, Sogliardo, and Fungoso entered the scene.

Macilente said, “Oh, here comes the melancholy dinner-party mess. Upon them, Carlo, charge, charge!”

A mess is a party of four.

Macilente was encouraging Carlo Buffone to satirically attack the others.

Carlo Buffone, who was drunk as a sow, was happy to do so.

In a mocking voice, he said, "Before God, Sir Puntarvolo, I am sorry for your heavy grief. By the body of Christ, I swear it was a grievous mischance. Why, didn't you have any unicorn's horn or bezoar's stone about you? Huh?"

Unicorn's horn and bezoar's stone were reputed to be antidotes for poison.

"Sir, I would request you to be silent," Puntarvolo said.

Wishing to cause trouble, Macilente said to Carlo Buffone, "Nay, go to him again."

Carlo Buffone said to Puntarvolo, "Take comfort, good knight, if your cat has recovered from her sore eyes, fear nothing; your dog's mischance may be helped."

Fastidious Brisk said:

"Say how, sweet Carlo, for so God mend me, the poor knight's moans draw me into fellowship of his misfortunes.

"But be not discouraged, good Sir Puntarvolo. I am content your adventure shall be performed with only your cat: You shall go to Constantinople and back with your cat and leave the dog out of the contract."

Macilente said to himself, "I believe you, musk-cod, I believe you; for rather than thou would make immediate repayment, thou would take it upon his own bare return from Calais."

Literally, a musk-cod is a small bag for perfume. Figuratively, it is the perfumed Fastidious Brisk.

From London to Calais (across the English Channel and back) was a much shorter — and safer — journey than to Constantinople and back.

Macilente was saying that Fastidious Brisk did not want to return the 100 pounds that Puntarvolo had given to him as a deposit for their five-for-one wager, and therefore Brisk would agree to a different wager, even one that Puntarvolo could fairly easily win, such as going to Calais and back alone, as long as Brisk did not have to return the money now.

Overhearing Macilente's words, Carlo Buffone said, "Nay, by God's life, he'd be content, as long as he were well rid of his company, to pay him five for one at his next meeting him in St. Paul's."

"Well rid of his company" meant that Fastidious Brisk would not have to witness Puntarvolo's grief at the death of his dog. But especially it meant that Fastidious Brisk would not have to immediately return the 100 pounds.

Carlo Buffone said to Puntarvolo, "But as for your dog, Sir Puntar, if he is not outright dead, there is a friend of mine, a quacksalver, who shall put life in him again, that's certain."

"Sir Puntar" was a nickname that Carlo Buffone was using for Sir Puntarvolo. A "punter" is a gambler.

A quacksalver is a medical quack: a fraudulent doctor.

"Oh, no, that comes too late," Fungoso said.

Macilente pointed to Carlo Buffone and said to Puntarvolo, "By God's precious blood, knight, will you endure this?"

Macilente was trying to stir up trouble between Carlo Buffone and Puntarvolo.

Puntarvolo called, "Drawer, get me a candle and hard wax, immediately."

Hard wax was sealing wax. It was melted and dripped on a document to seal it.

Sogliardo called, "Aye, and bring up supper, for I am so melancholy."

His courting of Saviolina had not gone well.

Carlo Buffone said to Sogliardo, "Ah, signor, where's your Resolution?"

"Resolution! Hang him, the rascal!" Sogliardo said. "Oh, Carlo, if you love me, do not mention him."

"Why, why not?" Carlo Buffone said. "Why not?"

"Oh, he is the arrantest crocodile — the most arrant hypocrite — that any Christian was acquainted with," Sogliardo replied. "By Jesus, I shall think the worse of tobacco while I live, for his sake. I did think him to be as brave a man —"

Macilente whispered to Carlo, "Nay, Buffone, the knight, the knight."

Macilente still wanted to stir up trouble between Carlo Buffone and Puntarvolo.

Hoping to make Puntarvolo angry, Carlo Buffone said to the others:

"By God's blood, Puntarvolo looks like an image carved out of box, full of knots."

"Box" is a kind of wood; it is similar to knotty pine.

Carlo Buffone continued:

"His face is, for all the world, like a Dutch purse, with the mouth downward; his beard's the tassels, and he walks —" let me see — as melancholy as one of the Master’s side in the Counter.

“Do you hear, Sir Puntar?”

Dutch purses had tassels.

Prisons had better quarters for those who could pay for them. One side of the prison contained the Knights’ ward, which was on the side of the Master: the prison Warden.

Puntarvolo’s grief showed in his face.

He said to Carlo Buffone, “Sir, I ask you no more, but instead I tell you to be silent, if you desire your peace and wish to avoid a fight with me.”

Carlo Buffone said, “Nay, but dear knight, understand (here are none but friends, and such as wish you well) that I would have you do this now: Skin your dog immediately (but in any case, keep the head), and stuff his skin well with straw, as you see these dead monsters at Bartholomew Fair —”

“I shall be sudden, I tell you,” Puntarvolo said.

When he took action, he would do so quickly.

“Or, if don’t you like that, sir, get a somewhat smaller dog and clap it into the skin.

“There’s a slave about the town here, a Jew, one Johan, or a fellow who makes wigs, who will glue it on artificially, it shall never be discerned; besides, it will be so much the warmer for the hound to travel in, you know —”

“Johan” is not a stereotypical Jewish name. In Ben Jonson’s society, Jews were stereotypically regarded as greedy, and a non-Jewish greedy person could be called a Jew.

A slave in this context is a working man whom Carlo Buffone looked down on.

Macilente said, “Sir Puntarvolo, by God’s death, how can you be so patient?”

“Or do this, sir:

“You may have, as you come through Germany, a familiar spirit that for little or nothing shall turn itself into the shape of your dog, or anything — what you will — for certain hours —”

A familiar spirit was an attendant spirit of a witch or demon. They often took the form of animals.

Puntarvolo drew his sword.

“God’s my life, knight, what do you mean?” Carlo Buffone said. “You’ll offer no violence, will you?”

Puntarvolo beat Carlo Buffone with the hilt.

“Stop! Stop!” Carlo Buffone cried.

“By God’s blood, you slave, you bandog, you!” Puntarvolo said.

A bandog is a ferocious dog.

A drawer arrived, carrying a candle and sealing wax.

“As you love God, stop the enraged knight, gentlemen!” Carlo Buffone said.

“By my knighthood, he who tries to rescue Carlo, dies,” Puntarvolo said.

He then ordered, “Drawer, leave.”

He did not want unnecessary witnesses.

The drawer exited.

“Murder! Murder! Murder!” Carlo Buffone yelled.

The drawer went to summon a constable.

“Aye, are you howling, you wolf?” Puntarvolo said to him.

He then said to the others, “Gentlemen, as you value your lives, allow no man to enter until my revenge is completely done.”

He then said, “Sirrah Buffone, lie down. Make no exclamations, but lie down.”

Carlo Buffone tried to leave, but Puntarvolo threatened him: “Down, you cur, or I will make thy blood flow on my rapier hilts!”

“Sweet knight, hold in thy fury, and, before God, I’ll honor thee more than the Turk does Mahomet,” Carlo Buffone begged.

“Down, I say!” Puntarvolo said.

Carlo Buffone lay on the table.

Knocking sounded on the door.

Puntarvolo called, “Who’s there?”

From outside the door, a constable yelled, “Here’s the constable! Open the doors!”

Carlo Buffone began, “Good Macilente —”

Puntarvolo interrupted and said:

“Open no door! If the Adelantado — Governor — of the Spanish Netherlands were here, he should not enter.

“Proceed.

“Help me with the light, gentlemen.”

He melted the wax as the knocking continued.

As he melted the wax, he said, “You knock in vain, sir officer.”

Carlo said to Macilente, “Et tu, Brute.”

These were Julius Caesar’s words to a man whom he thought was his friend — Brutus — but who helped assassinate him: “You, too, Brutus?”

Macilente was the man who had encouraged Carlo Buffone to irritate Puntarvolo. He had even promised to be Carlo’s second, aka assistant, in a fight. Now Macilente was helping Puntarvolo to punish Carlo.

Puntarvolo threatened, “Sirrah, close your lips, or I will drop the melted wax in thine eyes, by heaven.”

“Oh! Oh!” Carlo Buffone cried as the melted wax fell onto his mustache and beard and sealed his lips until he was unable to speak or cry, “Oh! Oh!”

The constable yelled outside the door, “Open the door, or I will break it open!”

Macilente called, “Nay, good constable, have patience a little, you shall come in very soon; we have almost done.”

Puntarvolo said to Carlo Buffone, “So, now, are you out of your humor, sir?”

He then said, “Make your escape, gentlemen.”

Puntarvolo, Macilente, and Sogliardo all drew their weapons and, leaving Carlo Buffone behind, exited. Fungoso hid under the table.

Fastidious Brisk began to exit, but he was behind the others.

The constable entered with some other police officers, and they stopped Fastidious Brisk.

“Lay hold upon this gallant, and pursue the rest,” the constable ordered.

“Lay hold on me, sir?” Fastidious Brisk said. “For what?”

“By the Virgin Mary, for your riot here, sir, with the rest of your companions,” the constable said.

“My riot!” Fastidious Brisk said. “As God’s my judge, take heed what you do.”

He then asked, “Carlo, did I offer any violence?”

Knowing that Carlo Buffone’s lips were sealed shut with wax, the constable said, “Oh, sir, you see he is not in a position to answer you, and that makes you so peremptory and obstinate.”

Fastidious Brisk was wasting time and trying to avoid arrest by asking Carlo Buffone a question.

“Peremptory and obstinate?” Fastidious Brisk said. “By God’s life! I appeal to the drawers if I did him any hard measure.”

George and the younger drawer entered the scene.

“They are all gone,” George said. “There’s none of them will be laid any hold on.”

The constable said to Fastidious Brisk, “Well, sir, you are likely to be held responsible until the rest can be found out.”

“By God’s blood, I appeal to George here,” Fastidious Brisk said.

“Tut, George was not here,” the constable said.

He then said to the police officers about Fastidious Brisk, “Take him to the Counter, sirs.”

The Counter was a jail.

The constable said to Carlo Buffone, “Come, sir, it is best that you get yourself medical treatment somewhere.”

The Constable, police officers, Fastidious Brisk, and Carlo Buffone exited.

The two drawers remained behind.

George said, “Good Lord, that Master Carlo could not take heed, and knowing what a gentleman the knight is when he is angry!”

Carlo Buffone’s excuse might be that he was drunk and that Macilente encouraged him to irritate Puntarvolo.

Puntarvolo is a gentleman, but he is a not-so-gentle man when he is angry.

“A pox on them,” the drawer said. “They have left all the food on our hands! I wish that they were choked with it as far as I’m concerned!”

No one had paid the bill for the food.

Macilente returned and said, “What, are they gone, sirs?”

“Oh, here’s Master Macilente,” George said.

Noticing Fungoso under the table, Macilente said, “Sirrah George, do you see that concealment there? That napkin under the table?”

George looked under the table and said, “God’s so, it’s Signor Fungoso!”

Macilente said, “He’s a good pawn for the reckoning — to make responsible for paying the bill. Be sure you keep him here, and don't let him go away until I come again, even if he offers to discharge and pay the entire bill. I'll return soon."

He exited.

George said to the other server, "Sirrah, we have a pawn for the reckoning."

"Who?" the drawer asked. "Macilente?"

"No, look under the table," George said.

Macilente and the two drawers had been talking quietly enough that Fungoso had not heard them.

Fungoso said to himself, "I hope that all is quiet now. If I can get away from this street, I don't care about anything else."

He looked out from under the table and asked, "Masters, please tell me, has the constable gone?"

In this usage, "masters" meant "my fine fellows."

"What!" George said, pretending to just become aware of Fungoso's presence. "Master Fungoso!"

"Wasn't it a good trick to hide under the table? Wasn't it good of me, sirs?" Fungoso asked.

"Yes, indeed," George said. "Have you been here all this while?"

"Oh, God, aye," Fungoso said. "Good sirs, look and see if the coast is clear. I'd like to be going."

"All's clear, sir, except the reckoning, and that you must clear and pay before you go, I assure you," George said.

"I pay?" Fungoso said. "By God's light, I ate not a bit since I came into the house yet."

“Why, you may eat when you please, sir,” the drawer said. “All the food that was ordered is all ready below in the kitchen.”

“Ordered?” Fungoso said. “Not by me, I hope?”

“By you, sir?” George said. “I don’t know that, but it was for you and your company, I am sure.”

“My company?” Fungoso said. “By God’s eyelid, I was an invited guest, so I was.”

“Indeed, we have nothing to do with that, sir,” the drawer said. “They’re all gone but you, and we must be paid, that’s the short and the long of it — that’s the way it is.”

Fungoso said, “Nay, if you will grow to extremities, my masters, then I wish this pot, cup, and all were in my belly, if I have a cross — a small coin — about me.”

Fungoso was in extremities: He was broke.

“What, and have such apparel?” George said.

“Apparel” means clothing, but “appareil” was a legal word for debt.

George continued, “Do not say so, signor, for that mightily discredits your clothes.”

“By Jesus, the tailor had all my money this morning, and yet I must be obliged to alter my suit, too,” Fungoso said.

He needed to update his suit of clothing once again to try to keep up with the latest fashion.

He continued, “Good sirs, let me go; it is Friday night, a fast day, and, in good truth, I have no stomach in the world to eat anything — I am not hungry.”

“That doesn’t matter, as long as you pay, sir,” the drawer said.

“Pay?” Fungoso said. “By God’s light, with what conscience can you ask me to pay what I never drank for?”

“Yes, sir, I did see you drink once,” George said.

“By this cup, which is silver, but you did not,” Fungoso said. “You do me infinite wrong. I looked in the pot once indeed, but I did not drink.”

Silver is less valuable than gold; lies are less valuable than the truth.

“Well, sir, if you can satisfy my master, it shall be all one to us,” the drawer said.

Someone called George from another room.

George replied, “By and by!”

The actors exited.

Cordatus said to Mitis, “Don’t lose yourself now, signor. Get ahold of yourself.”

In other words, pay attention. The exciting conclusion comes on apace.

— 5.4 —

Macilente and Deliro walked on stage. The new location was Deliro’s house.

Macilente said, “Tut, sir, you did bear too bad an opinion of me in our earlier quarrel, but I will now make my friendship to you most transparent, in spite of any dust of suspicion that may be raised to dim it; and henceforth, since I see it is so against your humor, I will never labor to persuade you that your wife is not chaste and not loyal to you.”

“Why, I thank you, signor,” Deliro said. “But what’s that you tell me may concern my peace so much?”

Macilente said:

“Indeed, sir, it is this:

“Your wife’s brother, Signor Fungoso, being at supper tonight at a tavern with a group of gallants, there happened some division and disagreement among them, and he is left in pawn for the reckoning.

‘Now, if ever you look for a time when you shall have a happy occasion to do your wife some gracious and acceptable service, take hold of this opportunity, and immediately go and redeem him by paying the tavern bill; for being her brother, and his credit so amply engaged as now it is, when she shall hear — as he cannot himself behave otherwise, but he must out of need and embarrassment report it — that you came and offered yourself so kindly, and with that respect of his reputation, by God’s blood, the benefit that you gave to her brother cannot but make her dote on you and fall madly in love with you because of your goodwill toward her brother.’”

“Now, by heaven, Macilente, I acknowledge myself exceedingly indebted to you by this kind offer of your friendship, and I am sorry to remember that I was ever so rude as to neglect a friend of your worth,” Deliro said.

He called, “Bring me shoes and a cloak there!”

He said to Macilente, “I would be going to bed if you had not come. What tavern is it?”

“The Mitre, sir,” Macilente replied.

“Oh,” Deliro said.

He called, “Why, Fido, my shoes!”

He then said, "In good faith, it cannot but please my wife exceedingly."

Fallace and Fido entered the room. Fido was carrying Deliro's shoes and cloak.

Fallace said to her husband, "Come, I marvel what piece of nightwork — what sexual adventure — you have in hand now, that you call for your cloak and your shoes."

She pointed to Macilente and asked, "Is this man your pander?"

"Oh, sweet wife, speak lower," Deliro said. "I would not he should hear thee for a world —"

"Hang him, rascal!" Fallace said. "I cannot abide him for his treachery, with his wild bristly beard there. To where are you going now with him?"

"No 'whither with him,' dear wife," Deliro said. "I go alone to a place from whence I will return instantly."

He whispered to Macilente, "Good Macilente, don't tell her where I am going and what I am doing by any means; it may come so much the more accepted the less it is expected. Invent some other answer. Don't tell her the truth."

He said out loud to his wife, Fallace, "I'll come back immediately."

Deliro and Fido exited.

Fallace called after her husband, "Nay, if I am not worthy to know where you are going, wait until I take knowledge of your coming back."

"I hear you and understand you, Mistress Deliro," Macilente said.

"So, sir, and what do you say?" Fallace asked.

“Indeed, lady, my intentions will not deserve this slight respect, when you shall know them,” Macilente said.

“Your intentions?” Fallace asked. “Why, what may your intentions be, for God’s sake?”

Macilente replied, “Truly, the time allows for no lengthy explanations, lady. Therefore know that this was merely a device of mine to remove your husband from here and bestow him securely, until, at a more convenient time, I might report to you a misfortune that has happened to Monsieur Brisk.”

Fallace looked worried.

Macilente continued:

“Nay, be comforted, sweet lady.

“This night, being at supper, a group of young gallants committed a riot, for the which only Monsieur Brisk was apprehended and carried to the Counter, where, if your husband and other creditors would just have knowledge of him, the poor gentleman would be ruined forever.”

The Counter was a city prison.

“I would feel terrible if that were to happen to him!” Fallace said.

“Now, therefore, if you can think upon any immediate means for his delivery from prison, do not forslow and delay it,” Macilente said. “A bribe to the officer who committed him will get him out of prison.”

“Oh, God, sir, he shall not lack for a bribe,” Fallace said. “Please, will you commend me to him — Fastidious Brisk — and say I’ll visit him soon?”

“No, lady, I shall do you better service in protracting your husband’s return, so that you may go with more safety,” Macilente said.

“In good truth, so you may,” Fallace said. “Farewell, good sir.”

Macilente exited.

Alone, Fallace said to herself, “Lord, how a woman may be mistaken in a man! I would have sworn upon all the testaments in the world that Macilente did not respect Master Brisk.”

She called, “Bring me my keys there, maid!”

She said to herself about Fastidious Brisk, “Alas, good gentleman! If all I have in this earthly world will pleasure him, it shall be at his service.”

Part of what she had in this earthly world was her body.

She exited.

Mitis said to Cordatus, “How Macilente sweats in this business, if you pay close attention to him!”

“Aye, you shall see the true picture of spite soon,” Cordatus said. “Here comes the pawn and his redeemer.”

— 5.5 —

Deliro and Fungoso entered the scene. George the drawer followed them.

“Come, brother-in-law, don’t be discouraged because of this, man,” Deliro said. “What is bothering you?”

“No, truly, I am not discouraged,” Fungoso said. “But I assure you, brother-in-law, I have finished imitating any more gallants either in purse or apparel — spending and debt and clothing.

“But I shall act as shall become a gentleman for good carriage — honorable conduct and manners — and such.”

“You say well,” Deliro said.

He said to George, “This is all in the bill here, isn’t it?”

“Aye, sir,” George said.

“There’s your money,” Deliro said. “Count it.”

He then said to Fungoso, “And brother-in-law, I am glad I met with so good an occasion to show my love and respect to you.”

“I will endeavor to deserve it, in good truth, if I live,” Fungoso said.

“Is the amount of money correct?” Deliro asked George.

“Aye, sir, and I thank you,” George replied.

“Let me have a capon’s leg saved, now the reckoning is paid,” Fungoso said.

A capon is a castrated rooster.

“You shall, sir,” George said as he exited.

Macilente entered the scene and asked, “Where’s Signor Deliro?”

“Here I am, Macilente,” Deliro said.

Macilente whispered to him, “Listen, sir, have you dispatched this business?”

“Aye, by the Virgin Mary, I have,” Deliro said.

“Well, then, I can tell you the news,” Macilente said. “Brisk is in the Counter.”

“In the Counter?” Deliro asked.

“It is true, sir,” Macilente said. “He has been committed for the brawl here tonight. Now I would have you send your brother-in-law home before you, with the report of this your kindness done him to his sister, which will so pleasingly possess her, and out of his mouth, too, so that in the meantime you may slap your lawsuit on Brisk, and your wife — being in so happy a mood — cannot entertain it ill by any means.”

“That is very true,” Deliro said. “She cannot indeed, I think.”

“Think? Why, it’s past thought,” Macilente said. “You shall never have again the like opportunity, I assure you.”

“I will do it,” Deliro replied.

He then said to Fungoso, “Brother-in-law, I want you to go home before me — this gentleman and I have some private business — and tell my sweet wife I’ll come soon.”

“I will, brother-in-law,” Fungoso said.

Macilente said to Fungoso, “And signor, acquaint your sister with how liberally and out of his bounty your brother-in-law has treated you — do you see? He has made you a man of good reckoning (one who pays his bills); redeemed that which you never were possessed of (credit); gave you as gentlemanlike terms of repayment as might be; found no fault with your trying to keep up with the latest fashion but failing; nor has he found fault in you for anything.”

Fungoso had no credit at the Mitre Tavern, and probably little credit (so far) as a human being.

The terms of repayment were probably this: No repayment needed.

Deliro was a wealthy and generous man.

“Nay, I am out of those humors now,” Fungoso said.

“Well, if you are out of those humors, keep your distance, and don’t be made a shot-clog anymore,” Macilente said.

A shot-clog is a fool who is tolerated because he pays the tavern bill for all.

He then said to Deliro, “Come, signor, let’s make haste.”

The actors exited.

— 5.6 —

Fastidious Brisk and Fallace talked together in the Counter prison.

“Oh, Master Fastidious, what a pity it is to see so sweet a man as you are, in so sour a place!” Fallace said.

She kissed him.

“As upon her lips, does she mean?” Cordatus asked.

What sour place? Her lips?

“Oh, this is to be imagined the Counter, perhaps?” Mitis said.

The Counter is another sour place.

“Indeed, fair lady, it is first the pleasure of the Fates, and next of the constable, to have it so,” Fastidious Brisk said, “but I am patient and indeed comforted and cheered the more in your kind visitation.”

A visitation is a social call.

“Nay, you shall be comforted in me more than this, if you please, sir,” Fallace replied.

By “comforted in me,” she meant “comforted by me,” but readers may be forgiven if they thought she was making a sexual invitation.

She continued, “I sent you word by my brother, sir, that my husband wanted to arrest you this morning. I don’t know whether you received it or not.”

“No, believe it, sweet creature, your brother gave me no such information,” Fastidious Brisk said.

“Oh, the Lord!” Fallace said.

“But has your husband any such purpose in his mind?” Fastidious Brisk asked. “Does he want to have me arrested?”

“Oh, God, Master Brisk, yes, and therefore be quickly discharged,” Fallace said, “for if he would come with his actions upon you — Lord deliver you! — you will be in prison for one half-a-score years — ten years. He kept a poor man in Ludgate, once, for twelve years for sixteen shillings.”

This seems unlikely, given what we have seen of Deliro’s character, although debtors were kept in prison until either they paid their debt or their debt was forgiven.

“Where’s your keeper?” Fallace said. “For God’s love, call him, let him take a bribe and dispatch you. Lord, how my heart trembles! Here are no spies, are there?”

“No, sweet mistress,” Fastidious Brisk said. “Why are you in this passion?”

Fallace answered:

“Oh, Christ, Master Fastidious, if you knew how I rebuked my husband today when he said he would arrest you, and how I railed at Macilente, the man who persuaded him to do it and who is the scholar there (and who, on my conscience, loves and respects you now), and what care I took to send you intelligence by my brother, and how I gave him four sovereigns — forty shillings — for his pains, and now, how I came running out here without a serving-man or serving-boy with me, as soon as I heard about it, you'd say I were in a passion indeed — your keeper, for God's sake!"

Respectable gentlewomen would never leave their homes without a chaperone.

A "keeper" could be 1) a jailor, or 2) a person who kept someone. E.g., a woman who kept a gigolo, or a man who kept a mistress.

Fallace continued:

"Oh, Master Brisk, as it is in John Lyly's Euphues His England:

"Hard is the choice, when one is compelled either by silence to die with grief, or by speaking to live with shame."

She had chosen to speak out in defense of Fastidious Brisk.

He replied, "Fair lady, I understand you, and may this kiss assure you that, where adversity has, as it were, contracted, prosperity shall not —"

In other words: ... where bad fortune has brought us together, good fortune shall not [separate us].

Deliro and Macilente entered the scene.

Fastidious Brisk said, "By God's light, your husband!"

"Oh, me!" Fallace said.

"Aye!" Deliro said. "Is it thus?"

“Why, how now, Signor Deliro? Has the wolf seen you? Ha? Has a Gorgon’s head made marble out of you?” Macilente asked.

A superstition stated that when a wolf saw a man before the man saw the wolf, the man would be stricken dumb. (If I were to turn around and see a wolf looking at me, I would lose my power of speech — and maybe some body contents.)

In mythology, the sight of a Gorgon’s head would turn a man to stone.

“May some planet strike me dead!” Deliro said.

Macilente said:

“Why, look, sir, I told you that you might have suspected this long before, had you pleased, and you might have saved this labor of astonishment now, and strong emotion, and such extremities as this frail lump of flesh is subject to.

“Nay, why don’t you dote on Fallace now and make excuses for her behavior, signor? I think you should say it were some enchantment, deceptio visus — an illusion, or so, ha? If you could persuade yourself it were a dream now, it would be excellent.

“Indeed, try what you can do, signor. It may be possible that your imagination will be brought to it in time; there’s nothing impossible.”

“Sweet husband!” Fallace said.

“Sweet husband”? Fallace was out of her humor.

“Get out, lascivious strumpet!” Deliro said.

“Lascivious strumpet”? Deliro was out of his humor.

He exited.

Macilente said to Fallace:

“What! Did you see how ill that stale vein became him before, of ‘sweet wife’ and ‘dear heart’? And are you fallen just into the same now, with ‘sweet husband’?”

“Away, follow him!

“Go, and keep your state — keep your dignity!

“What! Remember that you are a woman: Turn impudent. Don’t give him the head, although you give him the horns.

“Away! Follow him!”

Giving her husband the head meant giving him his freedom.

Giving her husband the horns meant making him a cuckold.

Macilente was sarcastically advising Fallace not to admit she was wrong.

He continued:

“And yet I think you should take your leave of the enfants-perdus here, your forlorn hope.”

Enfants-perdus [lost children] and “forlorn hope” are French and English military terms for a sentinel(s) who is (are) in a position where he (they) will probably not survive a battle. Here it applies to Fastidious Brisk, whose financial position is past hope.

Fallace exited.

Macilente then asked:

“How are you now, Monsieur Brisk? What! Friday at night? And in affliction, too?”

Religious people went meatless on Friday, and Fastidious Brisk had gone supperless at the Mitre. Also, religious people sorrowed as they repented their sins, and Fastidious Brisk was sorrowing in prison.

Macilente was sarcastically asking Fastidious Brisk if he had become religious.

He continued:

“And yet your pulpamenta? Your delicate morsels?”

Pulpamenta means finely seasoned meat. Fastidious Brisk’s delicate morsel was Fallace, Deliro’s wife. So maybe Fastidious Brisk was not becoming religious since he may still have his delicate morsel.

Macilente continued:

“I perceive that the erotic love of ladies and gentlewomen pursues you wheresoever you go, monsieur.”

Fastidious Brisk replied, “Now, in good faith, and as I am a gentleman, there could not have come a thing in this world to have distracted and distressed me more than the wrinkled — spoiled — fortunes of this poor dame.”

Macilente replied:

“Oh, yes, sir, I can tell you a thing that will distract and distress you much better, believe it.

“Signor Deliro has entered three actions against you, three actions, monsieur. By the Virgin Mary, one of them — I’ll put you in comfort — is only three thousand marks, and the other two some five thousand pounds together. Trifles, trifles.”

This was poor comfort. These debts were much more than Fastidious Brisk could pay.

“Oh, God, I am ruined!” Fastidious Brisk said.

Macilente replied:

“Nay, not altogether so, sir. The knight — Puntarvolo — must have his hundred pounds repaid; that’ll help add to your debt, too. And then six-score pounds for a diamond, you know where.”

Fastidious Brisk may have pawned the diamond. Or he may have bought a diamond on credit so he could lie and say that it was a gift from a female admirer.

Macilente continued:

“These are things that will weigh, monsieur; they will weigh.”

They will weigh him down with debt and sorrow.

“Oh, Jesus!” Fastidious Brisk said.

Macilente said:

“What! Do you sigh?

“This is what it is to kiss the hand of a countess, to have her coach sent for you, to hang poniards — small daggers — in ladies’ garters as favors, to wear bracelets of their hair, and for every one of these great favors to give some slight jewel of five hundred crowns or so.”

Fastidious Brisk paid for small feminine favors with great gifts.

Macilente continued:

“Why, it is nothing!

“Now, monsieur, you see the plague that treads upon the heels of your foppery.

“Well, go your ways in. Remove yourself to the two-penny ward quickly to save charges, and there set up your rest to spend Sir Puntar’s hundred pounds for him.”

At this point, all the money that Fastidious Brisk had was the hundred pounds he had gotten from Puntarvolo — one hundred pounds that was supposed to be returned to him because Puntarvolo’s dog had died and so Puntarvolo would not set out on his journey.

Macilente was advising Fastidious Brisk to spend the one hundred pounds on himself to make his stay in prison somewhat comfortable. Since he was likely to be there a long time, he ought to conserve money by going to the two-penny ward rather than a more expensive ward.

Macilente then said, “Away, good Pomander, go away!”

A pomander is literally a scent container. Figuratively, it is a perfumed courtier: Fastidious Brisk.

Fastidious Brisk exited.

An actor portraying Queen Elizabeth I entered the scene and walked across the stage.

Suddenly, against expectation and all the steel of Macilente’s malice, the very wonder of her presence struck Macilente to the earth, dumb and astonished. From there he rose.

Recovering his heart, Macilente expressed his passion – his strong emotion:

“Blessed, divine, unblemished, sacred, pure,

“Glorious, immortal, and indeed immense —

“Oh, that I had a world of attributes

“To lend or add to this high majesty!

“Never until now did [any] object greet mine [my] eyes

“With any light [enlightening] content, but in her graces

“All my malicious powers have lost their stings.

“Envy has fled my soul at sight of her,

“And she hath [has] chased all black thoughts from my bosom,

“Like as [Just as] the sun doth [does] darkness from the world.”

Queen Elizabeth I was sometimes compared to Astraea, the goddess of justice who exited from the Earth because of the worsening behavior of human beings who engaged in such vices as malicious envy.

The sight of Queen Elizabeth had driven Macilente’s malicious envy out of his mind.

Macilente next spoke of his former humor — his malicious envy — and compared it to a stream of sewage flowing into the Thames, which then diluted and drowned it:

“My stream of humor is run out of me;

“And as our city’s torrent, bent to infect

“The hallowed bowels of the silver Thames,

“Is checked by [the] strength and clearness of the river

“Until it has spent itself even at the shore,

“So in the ample and unmeasured flood

“Of her perfections are my [former malignant] passions drowned,

“And I have now a spirit as sweet and clear

“As the most rarefied and subtle air;
“With which, and with a heart as pure as fire,
“Yet humble as the earth, do I implore —”
He knelt: This was a prelude to his prayer:
“O heaven, that she, whose figure hath [has] effected
“This change in me may never suffer change
“In her admired and happy [fortunate] government!
“May still [always] this island be called Fortunate,
“And rugged Treason tremble at the sound
“When Fame [Reputation] shall speak it with an emphasis!
“Let foreign Policy [that is, the Policy of hostile countries, not England] be dull as lead,
“And pale Invasion come with half a heart
“When he but [just] looks upon her blessed soil;
“The throat of War be stopped within her land,
“And turtle-footed [turtledove-footed — that is, elegant and graceful] Peace dance fairy rings
“About her court, where never may there come
“Suspect [Suspicion] or danger, but all trust and safety.
“Let Flattery be dumb, and Envy blind
“In her dread presence; [may] Death himself admire her,
“And may her virtues make him to forget
“The use of his inevitable hand.
“Fly from her, Age. Sleep, Time, before her throne!

“Our strongest wall falls down when she is gone.”

The actor playing Queen Elizabeth exited.

The trumpets sounded, and the actor playing Macilente, no longer performing a role in the play within a play that had just finished, joined his friends: Mitis and Cordatus.

The actor who had played Macilente asked Mitis and Cordatus, “How are you now, sirs?” How did you like the play? Hasn’t it been tedious?”

“Nay, we have finished censuring now,” Cordatus said. “There will be no more critical commentary from us.”

“Yes, indeed,” Mitis said.

“Why?” the actor who had played Macilente asked.

Cordatus answered:

“By the Virgin Mary, because we’ll imitate your actors, and be out of our critical humors.

“Besides, here are those” — he pointed to the audience, including you, dear readers — “round about you, of more ability in censure than we, whose judgments can give it a more satisfying allowance of approval and applause; we’ll refer you to them.”

The actor who had played Macilente replied:

“Aye? Is it even so?”

He then said to you, the audience:

“Well, gentlemen [and gentlewomen], I should have gone in and returned to you as I was, Asper the playwright, at the first.

“But because the costume-change would have been somewhat long, and we are loath to draw your patience any farther, we’ll entreat you to imagine it.

“And now, so that you may see I will be out of humor for the sake of good company, I long only for your kind approbation, and, indeed, I am not at all as peremptory and obstinate as I was in the beginning of the play.

“By the Virgin Mary, I will not do as Plautus in his Amphitryo, for all this: Summi Iovis causa, plaudite. I will not beg a plaudit for God’s sake.”

The Latin meant: For the sake of great Jove, applaud.

Jove is Jupiter, Roman king of the gods.

The actor who had played Macilente continued:

“But if you, out of the bounty of your good liking, will bestow it, why, you may in time make lean Macilente as fat as Sir John Falstaff.”

In Ben Jonson’s society, lean people were thought to be envious and fat people were thought to be jovial.

The actors exited.

JUBILEE DEFINITION

Francis announces new global jubilee, the Holy Year of Mercy

Symbolically calling on the entire global Roman Catholic church to take up his papacy's central message of compassion and pardon, Pope Francis on Friday announced that he is convoking a jubilee year to be called the Holy Year of Mercy.

A jubilee year is a special year called by the church to receive blessing and pardon from God and remission of sins. The Catholic church has called jubilee years every 25 or 50 years since the year 1300 and has also called special jubilee years from time to time, known as extraordinary jubilee years.

The last jubilee year was held in 2000 during the papacy of Pope John Paul II and was known as "the Great Jubilee." The last extraordinary jubilee year was held in 1983 to celebrate 1,950 years since the death and resurrection of Jesus.

PLENARY INDULGENCE DEFINITION

“What is a plenary indulgence?”

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — Pope Francis said he will grant a plenary indulgence to the faithful who watch or listen to his extraordinary blessing “urbi et orbi” (to the city and the world) at 6 p.m. Rome time March 27.

Special indulgences have also been granted to those suffering from COVID-19, their caregivers, friends and family and those who help them with their prayers.

But what is this ancient practice of offering indulgences through prayer and penance and what is needed to receive them?

An indulgence is not a quick ticket to heaven, as St. John Paul II once said; rather, it is an aid for the real conversion that leads to eternal happiness.

[...]

An indulgence, then, is the result of the abundance of God’s mercy, which he offers to humanity through Jesus Christ and through the church, he said.

But this gift cannot be received automatically or simply by fulfilling a few exterior requirements nor can it be approached with a superficial attitude, St. John Paul said.

The reception of an indulgence depends on “our turning away from sin and our conversion to God,” he said.

That is why there are several conditions for receiving an indulgence:

— A spirit detached from sin.

— Sacramental confession as soon as possible.

— Eucharistic communion as soon as possible.

— Prayer for the Holy Father’s intentions.

— Being united spiritually through the media to the pope’s special prayer and blessing on March 27.

[...]

The faithful can claim the indulgence for themselves or offer it on behalf of someone who has died.

<https://www.britannica.com/topic/Saint-Swithins-Day>

The passage seems to indicate that the date of the play is July 15, but the letter by Fungoso in 3.2 indicates that the date is before Lent. See note on 3.2 below.

Possibly, Sordido means “Why, it should rain forty days after now [now = this date in the almanac], more or less.”

Much of Every Man in His Humor seems to take place in a day (assuming Fungoso’s tailor works very, very quickly and travel takes place very, very quickly) or, more likely, a few days, but the Sordido subplot seems to take place over weeks or months — long enough for a crop to grow.

One definition of “ribbon” in the Oxford English Dictionary is this:

Anything that forms a narrow strip or that is suggestive of a ribbon; = riband n. 3a; spec. a strip of land, esp. a path or road.

However, the first date for this usage is 1656.

Here is some information from Caroline Oraderio’s article titled “Watch an audiologist vacuum a ‘huge ribbon of skin’ from someone’s ear.”

Here is some information about amber:

There are three things called "amber" associated with perfumery.

The first is ambergris. It's produced in whale stomachs, possibly to protect them from hard sharp objects (squid beaks, for instance), hence the nickname "whale vomit", although "whale pearl" might be just as accurate. Fresh ambergris is a byproduct of the whaling industry, but considered unsuitable for use in perfume; the good stuff spends years in the ocean before finally washing up on shore. I haven't smelled the real thing, but the synthetics have a distinctive fresh-woody character with some resemblance to clary sage; the real thing is said to be smoother, more complex, and somewhat animalic.

The second is mineral amber. This is fossilized tree sap. It's translucent and kind of an orange brown color, like honey; it is, I suspect, what the color "amber" refers to. Actually, this isn't used in perfumery at all; mineral amber has no smell unless it's heated (by burning, or working with power tools) and the smell is supposedly an unpleasant resinous or "burning plastic" smell. According to some sources on the internet, it's possible to extract an oil from the resin, but the smell is similar to when it burns.

The third is perfume amber, which is often confused with mineral amber. Perfume amber isn't any kind of fossilized sap; it's a solid perfume, typically composed of labdanum, benzoin, and beeswax, with any number of other ingredients as the maker desires (patchouli, frankincense, and vanilla being probably the most common). The scent is heavy, resinous, and sweet, but not particularly like ambergris. It's also possible to extract an amber oil from the solid, or to construct an amber oil by using extracts of the resin ingredients.

So when a scent says it has “amber” notes in it, which of these three do they mean? Unfortunately, there’s no way to tell. Ambergris has a kind of legendary status, being known as a precious material that makes any perfume better but is too rare and expensive to use in modern commercial formulation ... a kind of unattainable exotic luxury from the past. The word “amber” has an evocative, mysterious quality that makes it sound desirable even to people who don’t know what it is. No perfume marketer would hesitate an instant to claim that something has “amber” or “ambergris” notes; their real stock in trade is genuine 100% Grade A bullshit, and they’ll say anything, anything, to sell a bottle of juice. But since ambergris has its own word, I generally assume that when a perfume says it has amber in it, they mean the solid perfume kind ... and I think most perfumes with “amber” in the name have the characteristic smell of perfume amber.

Here is some information about Cleopatra drinking a pearl dissolved in wine:

Among the most colorful tales in the pearl world is that of a legendary banquet, where Cleopatra bet Marc Antony that she could host the most expensive dinner in history. According to author and noted pearl expert Fred Ward, in his book, Pearls, the queen hoped to impress Antony and the Roman Empire he represented with the extent of Egypt's wealth. In her clever attempt to do so, she crushed one large pearl from a pair of earrings and dissolved it in a goblet of wine (or vinegar), before gulping it down.

"Astonished, Antony declined his dinner—the matching pearl—and admitted she had won," Ward writes.

The famous story of Cleopatra's pearls is told by Pliny the Elder in his Natural History. Pliny, often called the world's first gemologist, estimated the two pearls' worth at 60 million sestertii, or roughly $28.5 million in today's dollars.

Cleopatra was often seen as the epitome of Luxuria, a medieval vice pictured as a bejewelled naked woman, the embodiment of extravagant lust. It was her association with pearls which was the real reason for her early notoriety as Luxuria.

As Pliny related,

“The first place and the topmost rank among all things of price is held by pearls ... Their whole value lies in their brilliance, size, roundness, smoothness and weight ... There have been two pearls that were the largest in the whole of history; both were owned by Cleopatra ... they had come down to her through the hands of the kings of the East.”

The following information is from the Wikipedia article titled “Ash Wednesday”:

Ash Wednesday is exactly 46 days before Easter Sunday, a moveable feast based on the cycles of the moon. The earliest date Ash Wednesday can occur is 4 February (which is only possible during a common year with Easter on 22 March), which happened in 1598, 1693, 1761 and 1818 and will next occur in 2285. The latest date Ash Wednesday can occur is 10 March (when Easter Day falls on 25 April) which occurred in 1666, 1734, 1886 and 1943 and will next occur in 2038.

Possibly, Macilente is merely saying that Saviolina’s jokes are old, but Every Man Out of His Humor was first performed in 1599, and in March 1894 Sir Francis Throckmorton was under arrest for high treason against Queen Elizabeth I and England, and also in March 1894 Balthasar Gérard was plotting to assassinate William of Orange. So possibly Macilente was also saying that Saviolinia's jokes came from a time when jokes ought not to be made.

CHAPTER 11: Ben Jonson's *The Fountain of Self-Love, or Cynthia's Revels

CAST OF CHARACTERS (The Fountain of Self-Love, or Cynthia's Revels)

Note: The names of characters who are definitely female are in bold.

1. CYNTHIA: Goddess of the Moon and of Hunting. She is also called Diana. Her Greek name is Artemis. In Elizabethan drama, Cynthia is often allegorically Queen Elizabeth I. She does not drink from the Fountain of Self-Love.

2. MERCURY: God of Thieves. He disguises himself as a page and serves Hedon.

3. CUPID: God of Love. He disguises himself as a page and serves Philautia. Cupid can make people fall in love with each other who ought not to fall in love with each other.

4. HESPERUS: Personification of the Evening Star.

5. ECHO: former attendant of Juno, Queen of the Gods. Echo is a woman.

Echo fell in love with Narcissus, a beautiful mortal, but he saw his reflection in a pool of water and fell in love with it. Unable to move away from the sight of himself in the pool of water, he wasted away and died. After he died, a flower sprang up where he died. Echo also wasted away from grief until she became no more than her voice, which repeats the words that others say.

According to one myth, Juno took away Echo's voice because Echo helped Juno's husband, Jupiter, king of the gods, to hide his adulteries from her.

6. CRITICUS. The name means “critic.” Good critics (as in the case of good satirists) are capable of pointing the way (and following the way) to moral improvement. Criticus is a wise scholar. He does not drink from the Fountain of Self-Love.

7. ARETE. The name means “Excellence” or “Virtue.” Lady Arete is wise, excellent, and virtuous. She does not drink from the Fountain of Self-Love.

8. AMORPHUS. The name means “Shapeless” and “Misshapen” and “Deformed.” Amorphus may be adaptable, and he may have a shifting nature and character. He is a foolish male courtier.

9. PHANTASTE. The name means “Fantasy,” which can mean Self-Delusion. Phantaste has a Light Wittiness. Phantaste is a woman. She is a foolish female courtier. Courtiers are attendants at court. The word “light” can mean unimportant and trivial.

10. ASOTUS. The name means “Prodigal.” The Prodigal engages the Beggar to be his attendant and serve him. Asotus is a foolish male courtier.

11. ARGURION. The name means “Silver,” or “Money” since some money is silver. Argurion is a woman. She does not drink from the Fountain of Self-Love.

12. HEDON. The name means “Voluptuous,” as in “Hedonistic.” He is a hedonistic courtier. He is a foolish male courtier.

13. PHILAUTIA. The name means “Self-Love.” Philautia is a court lady. She is a foolish female courtier.

14. ANAIDES. The name means “Shameless.” He is an impudent courtier. He is a foolish male courtier.

15. MORIA. The name means “Folly.” Moria is a woman. She is like a mother to some of the young unmarried women: She is the Mother of the Maidens. She is a foolish female courtier.

16. PROSAITES. The name means “Beggar.” He is a boy. He is a foolish page.

17. COS. The name means “Whetstone.” Liars were punished by being made to wear whetstones around their neck. He is a boy. He is a foolish page.

18. MORUS. The name means “Simpleton.” He is a foolish page.

19. GELAIA. The name means “Laughter.” Laughter is the daughter of Folly. In the play, Laughter is a young woman (a wench dressed in a page’s clothing). She serves Anaiides as a page. She is a foolish female courtier.

Note: In Ben Jonson’s society, the word “wench” is not necessarily negative. It can be affectionate.

20. PHRONESIS mute. The name means “Prudence.” She does not drink from the Fountain of Self-Love.

Note: The word “mute” means “a character who does not speak.”

21. THAUMA mute. The name means “Wonder.” She does not drink from the Fountain of Self-Love.

22. TIMÈ mute. The name means “Honor.” She does not drink from the Fountain of Self-Love.

THE SCENE: GARGAPHIE

Gargaphie is a forested valley in Boeotia, Greece. It was sacred to Diana, goddess of the hunt. It is also the place where Actaeon was killed: See Ovid, Metamorphoses 3.155-156. In the play, it is spelled “Gargaphia” one time.

***

An archaic meaning of “fountain” is a spring of water that comes from the Earth and forms a pool of water. The surface of the pool can be still and form a natural mirror.

In Ben Jonson’s society, a person of higher rank would use “thou,” “thee,” “thine,” and “thy” when referring to a person of lower rank. (These terms were also used affectionately and between equals.) A person of lower rank would use “you” and “your” when referring to a person of higher rank.

“Sirrah” was a title used to address someone of a social rank inferior to the speaker. Friends, however, could use it to refer to each other.

The word “wench” at this time was not necessarily negative. It was often used affectionately.

A presence chamber is a reception room.

This play was first performed by a company of boy actors. In Ben Jonson’s society, boys always played the parts of women.

Ben Jonson mostly uses the Roman names of the gods, but he sometimes uses the Greek names. Here are the names of some of the gods (Roman name first):

Apollo: Apollo

Cupid: Cupid

Diana: Artemis

Juno: Hera

Jupiter, aka Jove: Zeus

Latona: Leto

Mercury: Hermes

Minerva: Athena

Neptune: Poseidon

Vulcan: Hephaestus

Venus: Aphrodite

Artemis (also called Diana and Cynthia and some other names) and Apollo are twins. Their father is Jupiter, and their mother is Leto. In the form of a swan, Jupiter went to Leto and impregnated her.

***

Cynthia has many names: Diana: Artemis, Phoebe, etc.

One reason for this is that the Greeks and the Romans worshipped goddesses who were similar and so were conflated as one.

Another reason is that Cynthia was a tripartite goddess of the Moon, the Earth, and the Underworld.

- As a goddess of the Moon, she was known as Phoebe and as Luna and as Selene.
- As a goddess of the Earth, she was known as Artemis and as Diana.
- As a goddess of the Underworld, she was known as Hecate.

In slightly other words:

Cynthia is a tripartite goddess: a goddess with three forms.

- In Heaven, she is Luna, goddess of the Moon.
- On Earth, she is Diana (Roman name) and Artemis (Greek name), goddess of the hunt.
- In Hell, she is Hecate, goddess of witchcraft.

Cynthia was born on Mount Cynthus on the island of Delos.

In this play, Cynthia (derived from Mount Cynthus) is also sometimes called Delia (derived from the island of Delos).

Samuel Daniel wrote a sonnet cycle about a woman named Delia. The sonnet cycle, which is mentioned in Cynthia's Revels, can be found here:

<http://www.luminarium.org/renascence-editions/delia.html>

Artemis has many epithets or bynames. Delia is an epithet or byname for the goddess Artemis (Cynthia).

***

Myths frequently contradict other myths. They were told orally in many widely separated parts of Greece and Italy and other countries around the Mediterranean, and they changed in the retelling.

And so, according to various myths, the father of Cupid is Jupiter or Mercury or Mars. His mother, however, is always Venus.

AD LECTOREM (The Fountain of Self-Love, or Cynthia's Revels)

[To the Reader]

Nasutum volo, nolo polyposum.

The Latin is from Martial, Epigrammata 12.37.2.

An anonymous translator (Bohn's Classical Library (1897)) rendered the full epigram in this way:

You wish to be regarded as having an extremely good nose.

I like a man with a good nose, but object to one with a polypus.

<https://topostext.org/work/677>

“Polypus” is an archaic term for “polyp,” which is a small growth protruding from the surface of a mucous membrane.

A person who is nasutum is a person who is more than ordinarily intelligent.

Ben Jonson is saying that he wants good audience members: people who can enjoy a good play without being biased against it without good reason.

PRELUDE (The Fountain of Self-Love, or Cynthia's Revels)

Three children entered the scene and began to argue over which of them would speak the Prologue to the play. All of them wanted to speak it because each child possessed Self-Love. The first child was wearing a cloak. The children were all boys.

“Please, you children, go away!” the first child said to the other two children. “Why, children? God’s so, what do you mean?”

“God’s so” is a variant of “catzo” or “cazzo,” Italian slang for “penis.” It may also or instead mean “By God’s soul.”

“By the Virgin Mary, we mean that you shall not speak the prologue, sir,” the second child said.

“Why?” the third child asked. “Do you hope to speak it?”

“Aye, and I think I have the most right to speak it,” the second child said. “I am sure I studied it first.”

“That doesn’t matter if the author of the play thinks I can speak it better,” the third child said.

“I plead possession of the cloak,” the first child said.

The person who spoke the Prologue at the beginning of plays customarily wore a cloak.

The first child said to the audience, “Ladies and gentlemen, give me your attention, for God’s sake.”

A voice from offstage said, “Why, children, aren’t you ashamed? Come in there! Let the Prologue be performed!”

“By God’s eyelid, I’ll play nothing in the play, unless I speak the Prologue,” the third child said.

“Why, will you stand to most voices of the gentlemen?” the first child suggested. “Let that decide it.”

The first child wanted the audience to vote with their voices for whichever child they wanted to speak the Prologue.

“Oh, no, sir gallant!” the third child said. “You presume to have the start of us there, and that makes you offer so bountifully.”

“No, I wish that I would be whipped if I had any such thought,” the first child said. “Try it by lots, either of you.”

“Indeed, I dare tempt my fortune in a greater venture than this,” the second child said.

“Well said, resolute Jack,” the third child said to the second child. “I am content, too, as long as we two draw first.”

The third child said to the first child, “Make the cuts.”

The cuts would be made in three straws to make two of equal length and the third of a different length.

The first child said, “But will you snatch my cloak while I am stooping to make the cuts?”

“No, we scorn treachery,” the third child said.

“Which cut shall determine which of us speaks the Prologue?” the second child asked. “The shortest straw? Or the longest straw?”

“The shortest,” the third child said.

The first child, holding three straws in his hand, said, “Agreed. Draw.”

The two other children drew straws, leaving the third straw in the first child’s hands.

“The shortest straw has come to the shortest child,” the first child said. “Fortune was not altogether blind in this.”

The first child was the shortest child; the first child had drawn the shortest straw and so was supposed to say the Prologue. The first child was also the child with the cloak.

Lady Fortune is usually thought to be blind.

“Now, children, I hope I shall go forward without your malicious envy,” the first child said.

The first child wanted to speak the Prologue without being interfered with by the other children.

“Curses on all evil luck!” the second child said. “I touched the winning straw. I could have picked it.”

“Wait, Jack,” the third child said. “By God’s eyelid, I’ll do something now before I go in, although it be nothing but to revenge myself on the author, since I don’t speak his Prologue. I’ll tell all the argument — the plot — of his play beforehand, and so make stale his invention to the auditory — the audience — before the play begins.”

“Oh, don’t do that,” the first child said.

“By no means,” the second child said.

The third child began to tell you, the audience, the plot of the play, while the other two children interfered with and bothered him.

The third child said:

“First, the title of his play is Cynthia’s Revels, as any man who has hope to be saved by his book can witness.”

The title of the play was written on a banner above the stage. People who were literate could read the banner. They could also plead benefit of clergy if they were literate and so be tried in an ecclesiastical court rather than a civil court. Doing so could keep a person accused of a crime from being hung.

Also, a person who reads a satire and recognizes him- or herself in that satire can reform him- or herself and so be saved.

The third child continued:

“The scene is Gargaphia, which I do vehemently suspect to be some fustian country, but let that vanish.”

One meaning of “fustian” is “imaginary.”

“Here is the court of Cynthia, whither Ben Jonson, our playwright, brings Cupid, travelling on foot, resolved to pretend to be a page: a boy servant.

“Along the way, Cupid meets with Mercury. (As that’s a thing to be noted, take any of our playbooks without a Cupid or a Mercury in it and burn it for a heretic in poetry.)”

One of the boys pinched him.

The third child said to that boy, “Please, let me alone!”

He then continued:

“Mercury, in the nature of a conjurer, raises up Echo, who weeps over her love, or daffodil, Narcissus. She then sings a little and curses the spring wherein the pretty, foolish gentleman melted himself away, and there’s an end of her.”

A boy pinched him.

The third child continued:

“Now, I am to inform you that Cupid and Mercury both become pages in the play.”

Pages are boy servants.

“Cupid attends on and serves Philautia, or Self-Love, a court lady.

“Mercury follows and serves Hedon, the Voluptuous — Hedonistic — courtier, one who ranks himself even with Anaides, or the Impudent gallant (and that’s my part), a fellow who keeps Laughter, the daughter of Folly (a wench in boy’s attire) to wait on him.”

The three boys would play parts in the forthcoming play. The third boy would play Anaides.

A boy pinched him.

The third child continued:

“These, in the court, meet with Amorphus, or the Deformed, a traveler who has drunk from the Fountain of Self-Love and there tells the wonders about the water; they immediately dispatch away their pages with bottles to fetch water from it, and themselves go to visit the ladies. But, I should have told you —”

The other boys were continuing to pinch the third child, who said, “Look, these emmets — that is, these ants, the other children — put me out here. They interfere with my speech.”

The third child then continued with what he had been saying:

“— that with this Amorphus, there comes along a citizen’s heir, Asotus, or the Prodigal, who, in imitation of the traveler who has the Whetstone following him, engages the Beggar to be his attendant.”

The Whetstone is a page named Cos.

A boy pinched him.

The third child continued:

“Now, the nymphs who are mistresses to these gallants are Philautia (Self-Love), Phantaste (Fantasy, who has a Light Wittiness), Argurion (Money), and their guardian, Mother Moria (Mistress Folly).”

“I say to thee, say no more,” the second child said, pinching him.

The third child continued:

“There Cupid strikes Money in love with the Prodigal, makes her dote upon him, give him jewels, bracelets, carcanets [necklaces or ornamental collars], etc., all of which he most ingeniously — naïvely — gives away, to be made known to the other ladies and gallants; and in the heat of this newfound wealth increases his train of servants with the Fool to follow him, as well as the Beggar.”

In Ben Jonson’s society, the word “ingenious” was sometimes used to mean “ingenuous,” which can mean “well-born” or high-minded” or “innocent.”

A boy pinched him.

“By this time the Beggar has begun to wait in close attendance, and he has returned with the rest of his fellow bottle-men — servants who are in charge of bottles.”

Bottle-men can be in charge of a wine cellar, and they can be servers of wine. These particular “bottle-men” bring back water in bottles.

A boy pinched him.

“There they all drink, except for Argurion, who has fallen into a sudden apoplexy —”

“Stop his mouth!” the first child said, attempting to put his hand over the third child’s mouth. The first child was worried that the third child would reveal too much of Ben Jonson’s plot before the play even began.

The third child continued:

“And then there’s a retired — that is, not in public life — Scholar there (you would not wish a thing to be better condemned and despised by a society of gallants than it — the Scholar — is), and he applies his service, good gentleman, to the Lady Arete, or Virtue, a poor nymph of Cynthia’s train of attendants who is scarcely able to buy herself a gown; you shall see her play in a black robe soon. She is a creature who, I assure you, is no less scorned than the Scholar is.”

Criticus is a wise critic and scholar.

Ben Jonson, a satirist, believed that his society often scorned scholarship and virtue.

The third child then asked:

“Where am I now? At a standstill?”

“Come, leave off at last yet,” the second child said. “Stop talking.”

The other children covered the eyes of the third child, who said:

“Oh, the night has come (it was somewhat dark, I thought) and Cynthia intends to come forth; that helps it a little yet.”

Cynthia is goddess of the Moon; she would bring moonlight.

The third child continued:

“All of the courtiers must provide for revels; they decide upon a masque, the device of which is —”

A masque is an entertainment in which the performers wear masks. The masquers need not be professionals.

The third child said to the other two children, who were continuing to torment him, “What! Will you ravish — rape — me?”

The third child then continued with what he had been saying:

“— that each of these vices, being to appear before Cynthia, would seem other than indeed they are, and therefore assume and simulate the most neighboring virtues as their masquing costumes.”

The third child said to the other two children, who were continuing to torment him, “I’d cry a rape except that you are children.”

The second child said, “Come, we’ll have no more of this anticipation. To give them the inventory of their cates — delicacies — beforehand is the custom of a tavern, and not befitting this company.”

The first child said, “Tut, the purpose of all this exposition was but to show us the happiness of his memory. I thought at first he would have played the ignorant critic with everything along as he had gone. I expected some such trick.”

“Oh, you shall see me do that splendidly,” the third child said. “Lend me thy cloak.”

“Be calm, sir,” the first child said. “Do you intend to speak my prologue while wearing this cloak?”

“No, I wish that I might never stir from — leave — this place if I did,” the third child said.

“Lend it to him,” the second child said. “Lend it to him.”

“Well, have you sworn that you will not speak the Prologue?” the first child asked.

“I have,” the third child said.

The first child gave him the cloak.

The third child said:

“Now, sir, suppose that I am one of your gentlemanly auditors — audience members — who has come in, having paid my money at the door with much ado, and here I take my place and sit down.

“I have my three different kinds of tobacco in my pocket, my light by me, and thus I begin:

“By God’s soul, I wonder that any man is so mad to come to see these rascally tits — that is, these rascally young men — play here.”

He puffed on an imaginary pipe and continued:

“They do act like so many wrens or pismires [ants]” — he puffed — “not the fifth part of a good face among them all” — he puffed — “and then their music is abominable” — he puffed — “able to stretch and distress a man’s ears worse than ten” — he puffed — “pillories, and their ditties” — he puffed — “are most lamentable things, like the pitiful fellows who make them” — he puffed — “poets.”

Some people were punished by having their ears nailed to a pillory, which is a wooden frame with holes for restraining an offender’s head and hands. The pillory was often mounted on a post.

“By God’s eyelid, if it weren’t for tobacco” — he puffed — “I think” — he puffed — “the very stench of them would poison me. I would not dare to come in at their gates — a man would better visit fifteen jails” — he puffed — “or a dozen or two of hospitals — than once risk to come near them.

“How was my speech? Well?”

“Excellent,” the first child said. “Give me my cloak.”

“Wait!” the third child said. “You shall see me do another imitation now, but this time it will be of a more sober or better-composed gallant who is (as it may be thought) some friend or well-wisher to the house. And here I enter —”

“What!” the first child interrupted. “You’ll step upon the stage, too?”

The second child said, “Yes, he will, and I step forth like one of the children and ask you, the gentleman: ‘Would you have a stool, sir?’”

Gentlemen could rent a stool for sixpence and sit on the stage.

“A stool, boy?” the third child said.

“Aye, sir, if you’ll give me sixpence, I’ll fetch you one,” the second child said.

“For what, I ask thee?” the third child said. “What shall I do with it?”

“Oh, God, sir!” the second child said. “Will you betray your ignorance so much? Why, you will enthrone yourself in state on the stage as other gentlemen are accustomed to do, sir.”

“Away, wag!” the third child said. “What, would thou make an implement — a piece of furniture — out of me? By God’s eyelid, the boy takes me for a piece of prospective, I hold my life, or some silk curtain come to hang on the stage here.”

A perspective — not prospective — is a painted cloth that is used as a piece of stage background scenery.

The third child continued, “Sir Crack, I am none of your fresh pictures that are used to beautify the decayed dead arras — decorative cloth hangings — in a public theatre.”

A “crack” is a cheeky child.

The second child said, “It is a sign, sir, that you don’t put that confidence in your good clothes and your better face that a gentleman should do, sir. But I ask you, sir, to so let me be a suitor to you that you will quit our stage then and take a place. The play is soon to begin.”

“Most willingly, my good wag,” the third child said. “But I would speak with your author. Where is he?”

The author is Ben Jonson.

The second child said:

“He is not this way, I assure you, sir.

“We are not so officiously befriended by him as to have his presence in the tiring-house — dressing room — to prompt us aloud, stamp at the book-holder, aka prompter, swear for our properties, curse the poor tire-man, aka costumer, rail at the out-of-tune music, and sweat for every venial trespass we commit, as some authors would, if they had such fine ingles — favorite boys — as we.

“Well, it is just our hard fortune.”

“Nay, Crack, don’t be disheartened,” the third child said.

“Not I, sir,” the second child said. “But if you please to confer with our author by attorney — proxy — you may, sir; our proper self here stands for him.”

The second child was offering to stand in the place of the playwright, Ben Jonson, and engage in conversation with the third child.

The third child said:

“Indeed, I have no such serious affair to negotiate with him, but what may very safely be turned upon thy trust.

“It is in the general behalf of this fair society here that I am to speak, at least the more judicious part of it, which seems much distasted with the immodest and obscene writing of many in their plays.

“Besides, they could wish that your poets would stop being promoters of other men’s jests, and would waylay and ambush all the stale apophthegms — so-called witty sayings — or old books they can hear of, in print or otherwise, to farce — stuff — their scenes with.”

Ben Jonson’s preferred term for “playwright” was “poet.”

The third child continued:

“They wish that your poets would not so penuriously glean wit from every laundress or hackney-man who lends horses for money, or derive their best grace with servile imitation from common stages, or observation of the company they converse with, as if their invention lived wholly upon another man’s wooden dinner plate.”

Ben Jonson’s Cynthia’s Revels was performed at Blackfriars, which was NOT a common stage.

The third child said:

“Again, that feeding their friends with nothing of their own, but what they have twice or thrice cooked, they should not wantonly give out how soon they had dressed — prepared — it; nor how many coaches came to carry away the broken meat — the leftovers — besides hobby-horses and foot-cloth-wearing nags.”

Hobby-horses are small horses.

Footcloths were decorative pieces of cloth laid over the back of a horse.

In Ben Jonson’s society, the word “nag” simply meant “horse” and not necessarily a bad horse.

The second child said, “So, sir, this is all the reformation you seek?”

The reformation requested was for originality in plays.

“It is,” the third child said. “Don’t you think it necessary to be practiced, my little wag?”

“Yes,” the second child said, “where there is any such ill-habited custom received.”

“Oh, I had almost forgotten it, too,” the third child replied. “They say the umbrae or ghosts of some three or four plays departed a dozen years since have been seen walking on your stage here.”

The accusation was that old plays were often performed on this stage.

The third child continued, “Take heed, boy. If your house is haunted with such hobgoblins, aka imps, it will frighten away all your spectators quickly.”

The hobgoblins were old plays.

The second child said:

“Good, sir, but what will you say now if a poet, untouched with any breath of this disease, were to find God’s tokens — signs of the bubonic plague — upon you who are of the audience?”

The second child mentioned some kinds of people who had been infected with this metaphorical bubonic plague:

“For example, a perfumed wit among you who knows no other learning than the price of satin and velvets, nor other perfection than the wearing of a neat suit, and yet will censure — judge to be good or bad — as desperately as the most professed critic in the house, presuming his clothes should bear him out in it.

“Another, whom it has pleased nature to furnish with more beard than brain, prunes — preens — his mustachio, lisps, and, with some score of affected oaths, swears down all who sit near him, ‘that the old Hieronimo,’ as it was first acted, ‘was the only, best, and judiciously penned play of Europe.’”

Hieronimo is the major character in Thomas Kyd’s play The Spanish Tragedy. This is one of the hobgoblins that the third child had criticized. Although popular, The Spanish Tragedy was old-fashioned.

The second child continued mentioning some kinds of people who had been infected with this metaphorical bubonic plague:

“A third great-bellied juggler — buffoon — talks of twenty years since and when Monsieur — Francis, Duke of Alençon — was here to court Queen Elizabeth, and he would enforce all wit to be of that fashion because his doublet — jacket — is still of that fashion.

“A fourth miscalls all by the name of ‘fustian’ that his grounded capacity cannot aspire to.

“A fifth only shakes his bottle-head, and out of his corky — frivolous — brain squeezes out a pitiful-learned face, and is silent.”

People who are bottle-heads shake their heads. According to the cynical, they shake their heads in an attempt to hear whether anything is inside them.

The third child said, “By my faith, Jack, you have put me down. I wish I knew how to get off the stage with any reasonable grace. Here, take your cloak and promise some satisfaction in your prologue or, I’ll be sworn, we have marred all.”

The third child exited.

“Tut, fear not, Sall,” the second child said to the first child.

“Sall” is short for the name “Salomon.”

The second child continued:

“This will never offend the taste of a true sense. Don’t forget your lines and do be good enough; I wish thou had some sugar that has been candied — crystallized — to sweeten thy mouth.”

The second child exited.

PROLOGUE (The Fountain of Self-Love, or Cynthia's Revels)

Wearing the cloak, the first child said the Prologue:

“If gracious silence, sweet attention,

“Quick sight, and quicker apprehension

“(The lights of judgment’s throne) shine anywhere,

“Our doubtful [uncertain whether the play will be a success] author [Ben Jonson] hopes this is their sphere [natural home].

“And therefore opens he himself to those;

“To other weaker beams his labors close,

“As loath to prostitute their virgin strain

“To every vulgar and adulterate [contaminated] brain.

“In this alone his muse her sweetness has:

“She shuns the print of any beaten path,

“And proves [tests] new ways to come to learned ears;

“Pied [Multi-colored, like the clothing of a Fool] ignorance she neither loves nor fears.

“Nor hunts she after popular applause,

“Or foamy [insubstantial] praise, that drops from common jaws;

“The garland that she wears, their hands must twine,

“Who can both censure [judge to be good or bad], understand, define

“What merit is. Then cast those piercing rays

“Round as a crown, instead of honored bays [wreath of laurel leaves],

“About his poesy; which, he knows, affords

“Words above action, matter above words.”

***

The matter is the intellectual content of the play, which in this case is a satire. In this play, Ben Jonson is placing intellectual content above bombastic poetry and actions such as violent murders, both of which can be found in The Spanish Tragedy.

ACT 1 (The Fountain of Self-Love, or Cynthia's Revels)

— 1.1 —

Cupid and Mercury met each other.

“Who goes there?” Cupid asked.

“Blind archer, it is I,” Mercury answered.

Cupid is often depicted as blindfolded. He shoots arrows that cause people to fall in love, but people often fall in love with the wrong or “wrong” person. Two boys may be very similar, but one boy may be rich and the other boy may be poor. A girl’s father may wonder why she didn’t fall in love with the rich boy instead of the poor boy.

“Who?” Cupid asked. “Mercury?”

“Aye,” Mercury answered.

“Farewell,” Cupid said.

“Stay, Cupid,” Mercury requested.

“Not in your company, Hermes, unless your hands were riveted — handcuffed — at your back,” Cupid replied.

Hermes (Mercury’s Greek name) was the god of thieves. On the day that he was born, he stole 50 cattle from the god Apollo.

“Why so, my little rover?” Mercury replied.

A rover is 1) a person who wanders, aka roves, or 2) an arrow.

“Because I know you have not a finger but is as long as my quiver, cousin Mercury, when you please to extend it,” Cupid answered.

Mercury used his long fingers to thieve. One thing that Cupid had to steal was his arrows.

In Ben Jonson's society, "cousin" and "cuz" meant "relative." The words could also mean "friend."

According to various myths, Cupid's father was either Mercury, or Mars, or Jupiter. His mother was Venus, goddess of beauty and sexual passion. Mars was the god of war, and Jupiter was the king of gods. Jupiter was the father of Mercury and Mars.

"Whence derive you this speech, boy?" Mercury asked.
"Why do you say this?"

"Oh, it is your best policy to be ignorant," Cupid said.

He now mentioned some of Mercury's previous thefts:

"You did never steal Mars' sword out of the sheath, you? Nor Neptune's trident? Nor Apollo's bow? No, not you!

"Alas, your palms, Jupiter knows, are as tender as the foot of a foundered nag or a lady's face new mercuried; they'll touch nothing."

A foundered nag is a horse that is suffering from founder, a disease of the horse's foot.

Some women used mercury as a cosmetic. We now know that mercury is a poison. Ladies' facial skin could be irritated by the application of mercury, which can cause skin rashes and inflammation.

"Bah, infant, you'll be daring still," Mercury said.

Cupid said:

"Daring? Oh, Janus, what a word is there!"

Janus is a two-faced god.

Cupid continued:

“Why, my light feather-heeled” — Mercury wore feather-heeled sandals that made him fast — “coz, what are you any more than my uncle Jove’s pander, aka pimp?”

Actually, Jove, aka Jupiter, is Mercury’s father and Cupid’s grandfather, but Ben Jonson’s society used the words “uncle” and “cousin” loosely.

Jupiter had many, many affairs with goddesses and mortal women, and Mercury carried messages that facilitated these affairs.

Cupid continued:

“What are you any more than a lackey who runs on errands for him and can whisper a light message to a loose wench with some round — fluent — volubility, wait at a table with a trencher, and warble — play or sing while playing — upon a crowd a little?”

A crowd is a musical instrument similar to a viol.

Cupid continued:

“What are you any more than one who sweeps the gods’ drinking room every morning, and sets the cushions in order again that they threw one at another’s head overnight?”

“That’s the catalogue of all your employments now.

“Oh, no, I err.

“You have the marshalling of all the ghosts, too, that pass the Stygian ferry, and I suspect you for a share with the old sculler there, if the truth were known — but let that pass by and be ignored.”

One of Mercury’s duties as a god was to escort the souls of the dead to the Land of the Dead. He took them to the ferryman Charon, who ferried them across the Styx River to the Underworld.

Charon received money from the souls of the dead — corpses were buried with a coin on their eyes or in their mouths so they could pay the ferryman. Cupid is accusing Mercury of splitting the profits with Charon.

Scullers are rowers of sculls, aka small boats.

Cupid continued:

“You possess one other peculiar virtue in lifting — that is, thieving — or legerdemain, which few of the house of heaven have else besides, I must confess.”

Legerdemain is sleight of hand, a good quality for a magician or a thief to have.

Cupid continued:

“But I think that should not make you set such an extreme distance between yourself and others, with the result that we should be said to over-dare in speaking to your nimble deity.

“So Hercules might challenge a priority of us both because he can throw the heavy bar farther or lift more joint-stools at the arm’s end than we.

“If this might carry it, then we who have made the whole body of divinity tremble at the twang of our bow, and enforced Saturnius — Jupiter, a son of the god Saturn — himself to hide his curly haired forehead, thunder, and three-forked fires — lightning bolts — and put on a costume for masquing too light for a reveler of eighteen to be seen in —”

Jupiter could well tremble at the twang of Cupid’s bow. Jupiter had a jealous wife, Juno, who hated his affairs.

Costumes for masques could be revealing.

Angry, Mercury interrupted, “— what is the meaning of this, my dancing braggart in decimo-sexto?”

A “decimo-sexto” is a small book; Cupid is still a boy.

The gods tend to be born and then grow to an age they will be at forever. Cupid is a boy forever, Mercury is a young man forever, and Jupiter is a mature man forever. A few gods or goddesses are already fully grown when they are born.

Mercury continued, “Charm your skipping tongue, or I’ll —”

“What?” Cupid said. “You would use the virtue of your snaky tipstaff there upon us?”

Mercury carried a caduceus, a winged staff with two snakes wrapped around it.

Court officials carried a tipstaff.

These items were symbols of authority and could be used to hit someone such as Cupid.

Mercury said:

“No, boy, but I would use the stretched vigor of my arm about your ears.”

He was threatening to box Cupid’s ears with his fist.

Mercury continued:

“You have forgotten since the time when I took your heels up into air, on the very hour I was born, in sight of all the seated deities, when the silver roof of the Olympian palace rung again with the applause of the fact.”

Cupid replied, “Oh, no, I remember it freshly and by a particular instance; for my mother Venus, at the same time, just stooped to embrace you, and — to speak by metaphor

— you ‘borrowed’ a girdle of hers just as you ‘borrowed’ Jove’s scepter, while he was laughing, and you would have ‘borrowed’ his thunder, too, except that it was too hot for your itching fingers.”

“It is well, sir,” Mercury said.

Cupid said:

“I heard you just looked in at Vulcan’s forge the other day and ‘entreated’ a pair of his new tongs to go along with you for company.”

Vulcan is the blacksmith god. According to the ancient Greek satirist Lucian, when Mercury was still a baby, he stole Vulcan’s tongs and hid them in his baby clothes.

Cupid continued:

“It is joy on you, indeed, that you will keep your hooked talons in practice with anything.

“By God’s light, now that you are on Earth, we shall have you filch spoons and candlesticks rather than fail.

“Pray Jove the perfumed courtiers keep their casting-bottles, toothpicks, and shuttlecocks away from you, or our more ordinary gallants their tobacco-boxes, for I am strangely jealous of your fingernails.”

Casting-bottles are bottles for sprinkling perfumed water.

In Ben Jonson’s society, toothpicks were fashionable items.

Mercury said:

“Never trust me again, Cupid, if you have not turned into a most acute gallant recently.

“The edge of my wit is completely taken off with the fine and subtle stroke of your thin-ground — eloquent — tongue; you fight with too poignant a phrase for me to deal with.”

Cupid said, “Oh, Hermes, your craft cannot make me confident. I know my own steel — strength — to be almost spent, and therefore entreat my peace with you in time. You are too cunning for me to encounter at length, and I think it my safest ward to close.”

Cupid was using a fencing metaphor. If he were to be very close to Mercury (Hermes) — within him, as within his arms — he would be safe from the thrusts of his sword.

“Well, for once I’ll suffer you to come within me, wag,” Mercury said, “but don’t use these strains of speech too often, for they’ll stretch my patience.”

He then asked, “To where might you be marching now?”

Cupid answered:

“Indeed, to recover thy good thoughts, I’ll reveal my whole plan and project.

“The huntress and queen of these groves, Diana, is aware of some black and envious slanders hourly breathed against her for her divine justice on Actaeon.”

Cynthia, aka Diana, aka Artemis, is a virgin goddess who is militant about protecting her virginity as shown by the story of Actaeon:

Actaeon was out hunting with his dogs, and he saw the virgin goddess bathing naked. She turned him into a stag, and his own dogs ran him down and killed him. He suffered horribly because his mind was still human although his body was that of a male deer.

Cupid continued:

“Therefore, as she asserts, she has here in the valley of Gargaphie proclaimed ceremonial revels that she will grace with the full and royal expense of one of her clearest moons — the Moon will be bright.

“In this time of revels, it shall be lawful for all sorts of ingenuous — spirited — persons to visit her palace, to court her nymphs, to exercise all variety of generous and noble pastimes, as well to intimate how far she treads such malicious imputations beneath her, as also to show how clear her beauties are from the least wrinkle of austerity they may be charged with.”

“But what is all this to you, Cupid?” Mercury asked.

Cupid answered, “Here I mean to put off the title of a god and take the clothing of a page, in which disguise, during the interim of these revels, I will get to follow some one of Diana’s maids, where, if my bow hold and my shafts fly but with half the willingness and aim they are directed, I doubt not but I shall really — and royally — redeem the minutes I have lost by their so long and over-nice — overly fastidious — proscription of my deity from their court.”

Diana/Cynthia was a virgin goddess, and her attendants were virgins, but on this night, Cupid had a chance to woo and pursue her attendants.

Normally, Cupid was banned from Diana’s court. It’s not good to have the god of love around attendants who are supposed to stay virgins.

Cupid was hoping to make one of Diana’s virgin attendants a former virgin.

“Pursue it, divine Cupid,” Mercury said. “It will be splendid!”

The gods frequently had affairs with goddesses, with mortal women and with nymphs, who were long-lived and almost immortal.

“But will Hermes second me and back me up?” Cupid asked.

Hermes/Mercury answered, “I am now to put in action and carry out a special assignment from my father Jove, but once that has been performed, I am ready for any fresh action that offers itself.”

“Well, then we part,” Cupid said.

He exited.

Alone, Mercury said to himself:

“Farewell, good wag. Now to my charge.”

He called:

“Echo, fair Echo, speak! It is Mercury who calls thee. Sorrowful nymph, salute me with thy repercussive — echoing — voice, so that I may know what cavern of the Earth contains thy airy spirit; and so that I may know how or where I may direct my speech so that thou may hear me.”

— 1.2 —

Echo, a voice underneath the stage, echoed Mercury’s last word: “Here.”

“So nigh?” Mercury said.

“Aye,” Echo echoed.

Mercury said:

“Know, gentle soul, then, I am sent from Jove, who, pitying the sad burden of thy woes still growing on thee, in thy lack of words to vent thy passion — strong emotion — for Narcissus’ death, commands that now, after three thousand years that have been exercised in Juno's spite, thou will take on a corporal figure and ascend, enriched with vocal and articulate power.

“Make haste, sad nymph. Thrice does my winged rod — my caduceus — strike the obsequious Earth to give thee way.

“Arise, and speak thy sorrows! Echo, rise.”

Echo ascended from below the stage. Mercury, by the command of Jupiter, had given her a corporeal body and the ability to speak her own thoughts in her own words rather than merely repeating the words of others.

Three thousand years earlier, Echo had fallen in love with Narcissus, a beautiful mortal, but he saw his reflection in a pool of water and fell in love with it. Unable to move away from the sight of himself in the pool of water, he wasted away and died. After he died, a flower sprang up where he died. Echo also wasted away from grief until she became no more than her voice, which repeated the words that others said.

According to one myth, Juno took away Echo's voice because Echo helped Juno's husband, Jupiter, king of the gods, to hide his adulteries from her.

Mercury said, “We are here by this fountain where thy love did pine, whose memory lives fresh to vulgar — commonly known — fame, enshrined in this yellow flower that bears his name.”

Daffodils are yellow flowers of the genus Narcissus.

Echo said:

“His name revives and lifts me up from Earth. Oh, which way shall I first convert — turn — myself, or in what mood shall I assay to speak, so that in a moment I may be delivered of the prodigious grief I go with?”

“See, see, the mourning fountain whose spring weeps yet the untimely fate of that too beautiful boy, that trophy of Self-Love and spoil of nature, who, now transformed into this drooping flower, hangs the repentant head back from the stream as if it wished, ‘I wish that I had never looked in such a flattering mirror.’

“Oh, Narcissus, thou who were once, and yet are, my Narcissus, had Echo but been privy to and known thy thoughts, she would have dropped away herself in tears until she had turned into all water, so that in her, as in a truer mirror, thou might have gazed and seen thy beauties by a kinder reflection.

“But Self-Love never yet could look on truth except with bleared beams — blurred eyesight; sleek Flattery and Self-Love are twin-born sisters, and they so mix their eyes — look into each other’s eyes and unite their souls — so that if you sever one, the other dies.”

If you take away Self-Love, Flattery dies (the person will cease to flatter him- or herself); and if you take away Flattery, Self-Love dies.

Self-Love and Flattery are very close: They are as close as twins.

Echo continued:

“Why did the gods give thee a heavenly form and earthy thoughts to make thee proud of it?

“Why do I ask? It is now the known disease that beauty has, to bear too deep a sense of her own self-conceived excellence.

“Oh, had thou known the worth of heaven’s rich gift, thou would have turned it to a truer use.”

A truer use of beauty is to attract a mate with whom one can reproduce.

Echo continued:

“And not, with lean and covetous ignorance, pined in continual eyeing that bright gem, the glance whereof to others had been more than to thy famished mind the wide world’s store.”

To Narcissus, his beauty was worth the entire world.

To others such as Echo, Narcissus’ beauty was worth more than the entire world. It was worth the entire world plus the baby that would be born to Narcissus and his wife (whom Echo would have liked to be).

Echo continued:

“So wretched is it to be merely rich.”

Narcissus was rich in beauty, but he could have been rich both in beauty and in children.

Echo concluded:

“Witness thy youth’s dear sweets here spent untasted,

“Like a fair taper — candle — with his — its — own flame wasted.”

Mercury said, “Echo, be brief; Saturnia is abroad, and if she hears you, she’ll storm at Jove’s high will.”

“Saturnia” means “daughter of Saturn.” Here it means in particular Juno, the wife of Jupiter. Yes, they are brother and sister as well as husband and wife.

If Juno hears Echo, Juno will be angry at Jupiter because he has restored her voice, at least temporarily. Yes, even after three thousand years, Juno still wants to punish Echo.

Echo replied:

“I will, kind Mercury, be brief as time.”

Time can be brief or long. Here, it means the time needed, which is brief.

Echo continued:

“Allow me to do him these last rites: Just to kiss his flower and sing some mourning strain — song — over his watery hearse.”

An obsolete meaning of “hearse” is “tomb.”

Mercury said:

“Thou do obtain thy wish. I would be no son to Jove if I were to deny thee.

“Begin, and more to grace thy cunning voice, the humorous air shall mix her solemn tunes with thy sad words.

“Strike, Music, from the spheres,

“And with your golden raptures swell our ears.”

“Humorous” here means “filled with humors,” aka moods.

At one time, people thought that the planets and the Sun and the stars were encased in crystalline spheres that revolved around the Earth.

The music of the spheres was thought to be beautiful.

Music played.

Echo said:

“Slow, slow, fresh fountain, keep time with my salt tears. Yet, slower, yet, O faintly gentle springs. Listen to the heavy part the music bears.

“Woe weeps out her division — her melody — when she sings.”

Echo sang:

“Droop herbs, and flowers,

“Fall grief in showers;

“Our beauties are not ours.

“Oh, I could still,

“Like melting snow upon some craggy hill,

“Drop, drop, drop, drop,

“Since nature’s pride is now a withered daffodil.”

Mercury said, “Now, have you finished?”

Echo said, “I will be finished soon, good Hermes; be patient a little while. Allow my thirsty eye to gaze a little while, just even to taste the place, and I am vanished.”

Mercury replied, “Forgo thy use and liberty of tongue — thy freedom of speech — and thou may dwell on Earth and entertain thee there.”

If Echo would refrain from freely speaking and criticizing the gods, she could dwell again on Earth in bodily form and with her voice. If she would not refrain from freely speaking and criticizing the gods, her voice would become an echo again and she would live in caves without a bodily form.

Echo criticized some of Cynthia’s actions:

“Here young Actaeon fell, pursued and torn by Cynthia’s wrath, more eager than his hounds.

“And here — woe is me, the place is deadly — see the weeping Niobe transported hither from Phrygian mountains, and by Phoebe reared as the proud trophy of her sharp revenge.”

Niobe was proud. She had given birth to six sons and six daughters, and she boasted aloud, “I am more worthy of respect than the goddess Leto, who has given birth to only two children: the twins Apollo and Artemis.” Leto’s children were angry at the disrespect shown to their mother, and with the anger of the gods, they killed all of Niobe’s children in one day by shooting them with arrows. Because of Niobe’s pride, Apollo and Diana turned her to stone. Even when she was stone, she grieved for the deaths of her children, and tears trickled down her marble cheeks. Niobe was so proud that she thought she was a better mother than the goddess mother of the god Apollo and goddess Diana.

Phoebe, Diana, and Artemis are other names for Cynthia. Cynthia was a virgin goddess; she was also a tripartite goddess, and as Phoebe (and as Luna) she was the goddess of the Moon.

Mercury said, “Nay, but listen —”

Echo interrupted, “But here, oh, here, is the Fountain of Self-Love in which Latona and her careless — without cares, and uncaring — nymphs, regardless of my sorrows, bathe themselves in hourly pleasures.”

Latona is the Roman name of Leto, the mother of Cynthia.

Possibly, “Latona” should be “Latonia,” or “daughter of Latona.” In that case, “Latonia” would be Cynthia.

Mercury said:

“Stop thy babbling tongue, fond — foolish and doting — Echo. Thou profane the grace that is done to thee. Similarly idle worldlings — worldly minded people — merely made of voice, censure and judge the powers above them.

“Come away!

“Jove calls thee from here away and his will brooks — tolerates — no stay.”

Echo said:

“Oh, stay! Wait!

“I have just one poor thought to clothe in airy garments and speak out loud, and then, indeed, I will go.”

She cursed the fountain:

“Henceforth, thou treacherous and murdering spring, be forever called the Fountain of Self-Love; and with thy water let this curse remain as a plague that cannot be separated from the water:

“My curse is that any person who tastes even a drop thereof may with the instant touch grow dotingly enamored on themselves.

“Now, Hermes, I have finished.”

Mercury (Hermes) replied:

“Then thy speech must here forsake thee, Echo, and thy voice, as it was accustomed to do, will rebound but the last words someone speaks to you.

“Farewell.”

“Well,” Echo echoed.

She meant that she understood what he had told her about losing her freedom of speech. She had used her freedom of speech to criticize the gods, and now her voice would again become an echo.

She began to descend into the Earth again.

Mercury said:

“Now, Cupid, I am for you and your mirth

“To make me light and happy before I leave the Earth.”

— 1.3 —

Amorphus entered the scene and saw Echo.

The word “amorphous” means “shapeless.”

Amorphus said to Echo, “Dear spark of beauty, don’t go so fast away!”

“Away!” Echo echoed.

Seeing this, Mercury said to himself, “Wait, let me observe this portent still.”

Amorphus said to Echo, “I am neither your minotaur, nor your centaur, nor your satyr, nor your hyena, nor your baboon, but just a traveler, believe me.”

The Minotaur is a half-human, half-bull monster.

Centaur is half-human and half-horse.

Satyrs are woodland gods, half-human and half-goat.

“Leave me,” Echo echoed.

Unimpressed with Amorphus, Mercury said to himself, “I guessed it should be some travelling motion — puppet — who pursued Echo so.”

Amorphus asked Echo, “Do you know from whom you flee, or whence?”

“Hence!” Echo echoed.

She exited.

Thinking himself alone, Amorphus said to himself, “This is somewhat above strange: a nymph of her feature and lineament to be so preposterously rude. Well, I will just cool myself at yonder spring and then follow her.”

Mercury said to himself, “Nay, then, I am familiar with the issue: I know how things will turn out. I’ll leave you, too.”

How will things turn out? Amorphus will drink the cursed water.

Mercury exited.

Now alone, Amorphus said to himself:

“I am a rhinoceros if I had thought a creature of her symmetry would have dared so improportionable — out of proportion — and abrupt a digression — an exit.

“Liberal and divine fountain, allow my profane hand to partake of thy bounties.”

He drank water from the fountain.

He then said to himself:

“By the purity of my taste, here is most ambrosiac water. I will sup of it again.

“With thy permission, sweet fountain.”

Ambrosia is the food of the gods.

He drank again.

Filled with Self-Love, Amorphus said to himself:

“See, the water, a more running, subtle, and humorous nymph than she [Echo], permits me to touch and handle her.

“What should I infer from this rejection?”

“If my behaviors had been of a cheap or customary garb, my accent or phrase vulgar, my garments trite [frayed], my countenance illiterate or unpracticed in the encounter of a beautiful and brave-attired piece [splendidly dressed woman], then I might, with some change of color, have suspected my faculties and abilities.

“But knowing myself to be an essence so sublimated and refined by travel, of so studied and well-exercised a gesture, so alone and unequalled in fashion, able to make — imitate — the face of any statesman living, and to speak the mere extraction — that is, the finest essence — of language; and one who has now made the sixth return upon venture —”

Amorphus was a traveler and a gambler. He made bets that he could travel to and from a certain place within an allotted time. He had won six such bets.

He continued:

“— and was the first who ever enriched his country with the true laws of the duello [duel]; whose optics — eyes — have drunk the spirit of beauty in some eight score and eighteen princes’ courts, where I have resided, and been there fortunate in the amours of three hundred forty and five ladies, all nobly descended, whose names I have in catalogue; to conclude, in all so happy as even admiration herself does seem to fasten her kisses upon me.

“Certainly I do neither see, nor feel, nor taste, nor savor the least smell, steam, or fume of a reason that should invite this foolish, fastidious nymph so peevishly to abandon me.

“Well, let the memory of her fleet — fly — into air; my thoughts and I are for this other element: water.”

Criticus and Asotus entered the scene. Criticus was a man of good judgment; Asotus was a man of prodigality.

“What?” Criticus said. “The well-dieted Amorphus has become a water-drinker? I see he does not intend to write verses then.”

Some people believe that alcohol is a source of poetic inspiration.

“No, Criticus?” Amorphus said. “Why?”

Criticus replied, “Quia nulla placere diu, nec vivere carmina possunt, quae scribuntur aquae potoribus.”

The Latin quotation (with Quia added to it), which is from Horace’s Epistles 1.192-3, means “Because no songs that have been written by drinkers of water can please or live on for a long time.”

“What do you say to your Helicon?” Amorphus asked.

Helicon is a mountain in Boeotia that is the source of a spring sacred to the Muses. Drinking its water was thought to cause poetic inspiration.

“Oh, the Muses’ well!” Criticus said. “That’s always excepted.”

“Sir, the Muses have no such water as the water in this fountain, I assure you,” Amorphus said. “Neither nectar nor the juice of nepenthe is anything compared to it. It is better than metheglin, believe it!”

Nectar is the drink of the gods.

Nepenthe is a drug mentioned in Homer’s Odyssey; the drug banishes worry.

Metheglin is a Welsh spiced drink.

“Metheglin!” Asotus said. “What’s that, sir, may I be so audacious to demand?”

“A kind of Greek wine I have met with, sir, in my travels,” Amorphus answered. “It is the same that Athenian orator Demosthenes usually drank in the composure — the composition — of all his exquisite and mellifluous orations.”

Criticus said, “That’s to be argued, Amorphus, if we may credit Lucian, who in his Encomium Demosthenis — Praise of Demosthenes — affirms that Demosthenes never drank anything but water in any of his composition sessions.”

“Lucian is absurd; he knew nothing,” Amorphus said. “I will believe my own travels before all the Lucians of Europe. He feeds you with fictions and leasings.”

Leasings are lies.

Indeed, Lucian wrote a book about travelling to the Moon.

“Indeed, I think, next to a traveler, he does prettily well,” Criticus said.

“I assure you that it was wine,” Amorphus said. “I have tasted it, and from the hand of an Italian antiquary who derives it — traces its genealogy — authentically from the Duke of Ferrara’s bottles.”

The Duke of Ferrara was a patron of the arts.

Amorphus then asked, “What is the name of the gentleman you are in rank with there, sir?”

“He is Asotus, son to the late deceased Philargyrus the citizen,” Criticus answered.

Philargyrus is derived from the Greek word for “money-lover.”

“Was his father of any eminent place or means?” Amorphus asked.

“He was to have been praetor next year,” Criticus answered.

The office of Praetor was the second highest political office of the Roman Republic. Praetors were subject only to the veto of the Consuls. Among other duties, Praetors could take the auspices, the performance of which was a religious rite.

The location, however, was Greece, and “praetor” meant a high administrative office, such as mayor or chief magistrate.

Amorphus said:

“Ha! He’s a pretty formal — shapely — young gallant, truly. It’s a pity he is not more genteelly propagated — better born.

“Listen, Criticus; you may say to him who I am, if you please. Although I do not affect — desire — popularity, yet I would be loath to stand out to — that is, spurn — anyone whom you shall grant to call your friend.”

“Sir, I fear I may do wrong to your sufficiencies — abilities — in the reporting them by forgetting or misplacing some one of them,” Criticus replied. “You can best inform him about yourself, sir, unless you have some catalogue or inventory of your faculties ready-drawn that you would request me to show him for you, and for him to take notice of.”

Realizing that Criticus did not want to praise him to Asotus, Amorphus said to himself, “This Criticus is sour.”

He then said out loud, “I will think, sir.”

He would think about the best way to get to know Asotus.

“Do so, sir,” Criticus said.

He then said to himself, “Oh, heaven, that anything in the likeness of man should endure these racked extremities for the uttering of his sophisticate — adulterated — good parts!”

Asotus then took Criticus aside and said to him quietly, “Criticus, I have a request to make to you, but you must not deny me. Please make this gentleman and me friends.”

Criticus said, “Friends! Why? Is there any difference between you? Have you quarreled?”

“No,” Asotus said. “I mean make us acquaintances: for us to know one another.”

“Oh, now I understand you,” Criticus said. “I did not understand your meaning before.”

Actually, Criticus was leery of introducing the two men for fear that Amorphus would take advantage of Asotus, the young prodigal.

Asotus said, “In good faith, he’s a most excellent rare — splendid — man, I am sure.”

Criticus said to himself, “By God’s light, they are mutually enamored by this time.”

“Will you, sweet Criticus?” Asotus pleaded.

“Yes, yes,” Criticus replied.

“Nay, but when?” Asotus said. “You’ll defer it now and forget it?”

“Why, is it a thing of such immediate necessity that it requires so violent and quick a dispatch?” Criticus asked.

“No, but — I wish I might never stir — he’s a most ravishing man,” Asotus said. “Good Criticus, you shall endear me to you indeed, I say!”

“Well, your longing shall be satisfied, sir,” Criticus said.

“And in addition you may tell him who my father was, and how well-off he left me, and that I am his heir,” Asotus said.

“Leave it to me, I’ll forget none of your dear graces, I assure you,” Criticus said.

“Nay, I know you can better marshal these affairs than I can,” Asotus replied.

He then said to himself, “O gods, I’d give all the world, if I had it, for an abundance of such acquaintances.”

Criticus said to himself, “What ridiculous circumstance might I devise now to bestow this reciprocal brace — pair — of coxcombs — fools — one upon another?”

They were reciprocal because each wished to be introduced to the other.

Thinking of a way to get to know Asotus, Amorphus said to himself:

“Since I trod on this side of the Alps, I was not so frozen in my invention.

“Let me see, to accost him with some choice remnant of Spanish, or Italian would indifferently express my languages now.”

“Indifferently” can mean 1) “casually,” or 2) “poorly.”

Amorphus continued speaking to himself:

“By the Virgin Mary, then, if Asotus would turn out to be ignorant, it would be both hard and harsh on him.

“How else can I get to know him?

“Step into some discourse of state — politics — and so make my introduction? That would be above him, too, and out of his element, I fear.

“Pretend to have seen him in Venice or Padua, or some face near his in similitude? It is too pointed and open.

“No, it must be a more quaint and collateral — indirect — device as — wait: to frame some encomiastic — praising — speech upon this our metropolis, or the wise magistrates thereof, in which politic — wise — number it is likely that his father filled up a room?

“Descend into a particular admiration of their justice, for the due measuring of coals, burning of cans, and such like?”

Weights and measures are an important part of a magistrate’s duties. “Cans” are wooden drinking vessels, and a magistrate would make a burn mark on the vessel to show what is a full measure.

Amorphus continued speaking to himself:

“Or also to praise their religion in pulling down a superstitious cross and advancing a Venus or Priapus in place of it?”

In Ben Jonson’s London, crosses were removed because people thought they were Catholic. In the city of this play, statues of Venus and Priapus are put up in place of crosses.

Venus is the goddess of sexual passion, and Priapus, statues of whom displayed a giant phallus, was the god of fertility.

Amorphus continued speaking to himself:

“Ha! It will do well!

“Or to talk of some hospital whose walls record his father as a benefactor, or of so many emergency buckets for getting water to put out fires bestowed on his parish church in his lifetime, with his name at length, for lack of a coat of arms, tricked upon them? Any of these?

“Or to praise the cleanness of the street wherein he dwelt, or the provident painting of his posts in preparation for the time he should have been praetor.”

Officials often began their careers by being responsible for the cleaning of streets.

Mayoral proclamations were placed on posts.

Amorphus continued speaking to himself:

“Or, leaving aside his parent, come to some special ornament about himself, such as his rapier, or some other of his accoutrements?”

“I have it! Thanks, gracious Minerva.”

Minerva is the Roman goddess of wisdom. Her Greek name is Athena.

Asotus said to himself, “I wish I had just at once spoken to him [Amorphus], and then —”

Amorphus then praised the collar that Asotus was wearing as a means of becoming introduced to him:

“It is a most curious and neatly wrought neckband, this same, as I have seen, sir.”

“Oh, God, sir,” Asotus said.

“Oh, God, sir” was a fashionable expression of little meaning.

“You forgive the humor of my eye in observing it?” Amorphus asked.

“Humor” was a fashionable word of many meanings and often of little meaning.

“Oh, Lord, sir, no such apology is needed, I assure you,” Asotus said.

Criticus said to himself, “I am anticipated. They’ll make a solemn deed of gift of themselves, you shall see.”

“Your rose, too, suits you most gracefully, indeed,” Amorphus said.

The rose was an ornamental ribbon worn on shoes.

“It is the most genteel and received wear now, sir,” Asotus said.

Amorphus said, “Believe me, sir — I speak it not to humor you — I have not seen a young gentleman, generally, put on his clothes with more judgment.”

Asotus was well and fashionably dressed.

“Oh, it is your pleasure to say so, sir,” Asotus said.

“No, I swear as I am virtuous, being altogether untraveled, it strikes me into wonder,” Amorphus said.

“Being altogether untraveled” was badly expressed; the phrase referred to Asotus, not to Amorphus, who was well traveled, according to his previous statements.

“I do purpose to travel, sir, at spring,” Asotus said.

“I think I shall affect and take a liking to you, sir,” Amorphus said. “This last speech of yours has begun to make you dear to me.”

“Oh, God, sir, I wish there were anything in me, sir, that might appear worthy the least worthiness of your worth, sir,” Asotus said. “I avow, sir, that I should endeavor to show it, sir, with more than common regard, sir.”

Criticus said to himself, “Oh, here’s excellent motley, sir.”

Fools, aka jesters, wore motley: multi-colored clothing.

Amorphus said:

“Both your desert — merit — and your endeavors are plentiful. Do not suspect them.

“But your sweet disposition to travel, I assure you, has made you another myself — an alter ego — in my eye, and struck me enamored on your beauties.”

Amorphus and Asotus were forming a mutual admiration society, one that had begun at first sight.

“I wish I were the fairest lady of France for your sake, sir, and yet I would travel, too,” Asotus said.

Amorphus said, “Oh, you should digress from yourself else, for, believe it, travel is the only thing that rectifies or, as the Italian says, vi rendi pronto all’ attioni.”

He translated the Italian: “makes you fit for action.”

“I think it is a great expense, though, sir,” Asotus said.

Amorphus said:

“Expense? Why, it is nothing for a gentleman who goes private — alone — as yourself, or so; my intelligence shall cover my expenses at all times.”

Amorphus lived by his wits. He found ways for other people to pay his expenses.

He then said:

“By my good faith, I swear this hat has possessed my eye exceedingly: It is so pretty and fantastic.

“What! Is it a beaver hat?”

A beaver hat is an expensive hat made out of beaver fur.

“Aye, sir. I’ll assure you it is a beaver hat,” Asotus said. “It cost me six crowns just this morning.”

“A very pretty fashion, believe me, and a most novel kind of trim,” Amorphus said. “Your button is conceited — cleverly designed — too!”

The button may have been an ornament on the hat.

“Sir, it is all at your service,” Asotus said.

“Oh, pardon me,” Amorphus said.

“I beseech you, sir, if you please to wear it, you shall do me a most infinite favor,” Asotus said.

He wanted to give his expensive beaver hat to Amorphus.

Criticus said to himself, “By God’s light, will he be praised out of his clothes?”

“By heaven, sir, I do not offer it to you after the Italian manner,” Asotus said. “I wish you would believe that of me.”

The Italian manner was to offer someone something but with the expectation that the gift will be declined.

The people who defined “the Italian manner” in this way were not Italian.

Amorphus replied:

“Sir, I shall fear to appear rude in denying your courtesies, especially being invited by so proper a distinction between the Italian manner and your manner.

“May I please ask for your name, sir?”

“My name is Asotus, sir.”

Amorphus replied:

“I take your love, gentle Asotus, but let me persuade you to receive this in exchange —”

They exchanged hats, and Criticus said to himself, “By God’s heart, they’ll exchange doublets — jackets — soon.”

Amorphus continued:

“— and from this time esteem yourself in the first rank of those few whom I profess to love.

“Why are you in the company of this scholar here? I will make you known to gallants such as Anaides the courtier, Hedon the courtier, and others whose society shall render you graced and respected.

“This scholar is a trivial fellow, too mean, too coarse for you to converse with.”

Examining Amorphus’ hat, Asotus said, “By God’s eyelid, this hat is not worth a crown, and my hat cost me six crowns just this morning!”

Criticus said, “I looked for the time when Asotus would repent this exchange; he has begun to be sad for a good while.”

Amorphus said:

“Sir, shall I say to you about that hat — be not so sad, be not so sad — that it is a relic I could not so easily have departed with, except as the hieroglyphic — the sign — of my affection.

“You shall alter it to what form you please; it will take any block. I have varied it myself to the three thousandth time, and not so few.”

A block was a wooden mold for a hat. From it we derive the insult “blockhead.”

Since he had varied its shape for the three thousandth time, it was a well-worn hat.

Amorphus continued:

“It has these virtues beside: Your head shall not ache under it, nor your brain leave you without permission; it will preserve your complexion to eternity, for no beam of the Sun, should you wear it under zona torrida — the torrid zone, aka tropics — has the force to approach it by two ells; it is proof against thunder and enchantment.”

An ell is a unit of measurement.

Amorphus was claiming that his hat was made of a material that would repel lightning; such materials supposedly included hawthorn, laurel, and seal-skin.

Amorphus continued:

“And it was given to me by a great man in Russia as an especially prized present; and constantly affirmed to be the hat that accompanied the politic — crafty — Ulysses in his tedious and ten years’ travels.

Ulysses is also known by his Greek name: Odysseus. He is one of the heroes of Homer’s Iliad and the main hero of Homer’s Odyssey. He left his home island of Ithaca, went to Troy, and fought until the Greeks conquered Troy, and then it took him another ten years of trouble to return home.

Once back on his home island of Ithaca, he discovered that his palace had been taken over by suitors who mistreated his wife and son. In order to stay alive until he could find a way to kill the suitors, he pretended to be a beggar.

Asotus said, “By Jove, I will not depart with this hat, no matter who would give me a million crowns for it.”

Cos and Prosaites entered the scene.

The name “Prosaites” means “Beggar.”

The name “Cos” means “Whetstone.”

Looking for employment, Cos said, “May God save you, sweet bloods — young gentlemen. Do any of you want a creature or a dependent?”

Criticus said to himself, “Curse me, he’s a fine blunt slave.”

A creature is someone’s creation: Give someone a job as a servant, and he is your creature. He is also your dependent: You will feed him.

In this context, a slave is a beggar.

Amorphus said to himself, “A page of good timber: He is well built. It will now be my grace to entertain him first, though I cashier — dismiss — him again in private.”

Amorphus wanted to impress Asotus by hiring a servant.

He asked, “What are thou called?”

“Cos, sir, Cos.”

Criticus said to himself, “Cos? How happily has Fortune furnished him — Amorphus — with a whetstone!”

In Ben Jonson’s society, liars were punished by having a whetstone hung around their neck while they were in a pillory. Amorphus was a traveler, and travelers were known for telling lies about their travels.

Amorphus said:

“I do entertain you, Cos.”

This kind of “entertain” means “hire.”

Amorphus quietly added:

“Conceal your quality — your character — until we are private.”

He was worried that Cos’ character may be bad; after all, “Cos” meant “whetstone” and whetstones were hung around the necks of liars as punishment. In addition, he had hired him without an interview, simply in order to impress Asotus by hiring someone to be his page.

“If your parts are — that is, your character is — worthy of me, I will countenance — support — you; if not, I will catechize you.”

A catechism is a set of religious questions and answers about Christian principles.

He then said out loud, “Gentlemen, shall we go?”

“Wait, sir,” Asotus said, “I’ll just entertain — hire — this other fellow and then —”

He said quietly to himself, “I have a great humor — desire — to taste of this water, too, but I’ll come again alone for that.”

The word “taste” can mean “touch.” Asotus is usually generous, so he would be willing to share and drink the water with other people. He may have meant that he would come back later to bathe in the water.

Asotus continued out loud from where he had left off, “— mark the place.”

He then asked, “What’s your name, youth?”

“Prosaites, sir.”

“Prosaites?” Asotus said. “A very fine name, Criticus, isn’t it?”

“Yes, and a very ancient name, sir,” Criticus said. “It means ‘the beggar.’”

“Follow me, good Prosaites,” Asotus said. “Let’s talk.”

Asotus, Prosaites, Cos, and Amorphus exited.

Alone now, Criticus said to himself:

“He will rank even with you before long if you hold on to your course.”

The prodigal — Asotus — would soon be like the beggar — Prosaites — if he continued wasting his money.

Criticus continued:

“O Vanity, how are thy painted beauties doted on by light and empty idiots!”

People in this society called makeup “paint.” In this context, “painted” was metaphorical as well as literal.

Criticus continued:

“How pursued with open and extended appetite and eagerness!

“How they sweat and run themselves out of breath, raised on their toes, to catch thy airy forms, always turning giddy until they reel like drunkards who buy the merry madness of one hour with the long irksomeness of following time!”

Drunk people pay for the happiness of one alcoholic hour with a long hangover the next day.

“Oh, how despised and base a thing is man if he does not strive to erect his groveling — face-down — thoughts above the strain of flesh!

“But how much cheaper he is when even his best and understanding part, the crown and strength of all his faculties, floats like a dead drowned body on the stream of vulgar humor mixed with the commonest dregs!”

The word “humor” has many meanings, including “fluid.” Much more often, it means “mood” or “fashion.”

Criticus continued:

“I suffer for their guilt now, and my soul, like one who looks on ill-affected — diseased — eyes, is hurt with mere intention — simply gazing — on their follies.

“Why will I view them then, my sense might ask me?”

“Is it either a rarity, or some new object, that strains my strict observance to this point?”

“Oh, I wish it were, therein I could afford that my spirit should draw a little near to theirs to gaze on novelties, so long as Vice were a novelty.”

Criticus is disgusted because he is watching the fools. If vice were a novelty, he might forgive himself a little for watching this display of vice. But he, like most or all of us, has seen lots of vice and so vice is no novelty.

Criticus continued:

“Tut, she — Vice — is stale, rank, foul, and were it not that those who woo her greet her with locked — closed — eyes, in spite of all the impostures, paintings, drugs, which her bawd Custom, aka Habit, daubs her cheeks with, she — personified Vice — would betray and reveal her loathed and leprous face, and frighten the enamored dotards away from themselves.”

These dotards, aka imbeciles, were doting on themselves: They possessed Self-Love, although only one had so far drunk from the Fountain of Self-Love.

Criticus continued:

“But such is the perverseness of our nature, that if we once but fancy levity, how antique and ridiculous soever it may appear on us, yet will our muffled thought choose rather not to see its ridiculousness than to avoid it.

“And if we can just banish our own sense, we act our mimic — deceitful — tricks with that free license, that lust (that feeling of delight), that pleasure, that security as if we practiced in a pasteboard case, and no one saw the motion but the motion.”

A motion is a puppet. The puppeteer is concealed in a pasteboard case and no one sees his motions as he manipulates the puppets. Because no one sees him, he can freely move as he likes.

A fool who does not know that he is a fool also acts freely. Because he is a fool, he does not see that his actions are foolish, and so he performs them.

Criticus continued:

“Well, check thy passion lest it grow too loud;

“While fools are pitied, they grow fat and proud.”

ACT 2 (The Fountain of Self-Love, or Cynthia's Revels)

— 2.1 —

Cupid and Mercury spoke together.

“Why, this was most unexpectedly followed, my divine delicate Mercury,” Cupid said. “By the beard of Jove, thou are a precious deity!”

Mercury said:

“Nay, Cupid, cease to speak improperly. Since we are turned cracks, let's study to be like cracks.”

Cracks are cheeky children. Cupid and Mercury were disguised as pages: boy servants.

Cupid was speaking improperly because he was not speaking like a cheeky page. He needed to be cheekier and wittier and less complimentary. He also needed to talk to Mercury as if Mercury were a cheeky page and not a god.

Mercury continued:

“We must practice their language and behaviors, and not with a dead imitation. We must act freely, carelessly, and capriciously, as if our veins ran with quicksilver, and not utter a phrase but what shall come forth steeped in the very brine of conceit and sparkle like salt in fire.”

“Quicksilver” is mercury, and mercurial people have sudden changes of mood. Think of the character Mercutio in Shakespeare's Romeo and Juliet.

Cupid replied, “Being cheeky and witty is not everyone's good fortune, Hermes. Though you can presume upon the easiness and dexterity of your wit, you shall give me permission to be a little solicitous of mine and allow me to not desperately hazard it after your capering humor.”

“Nay then, Cupid, I think we must have you hoodwinked — blindfolded — again, for you are grown too provident and prudent since your eyes were at liberty,” Mercury said.

“Not so, Mercury, I am still blind Cupid to thee,” Cupid said.

“And what are you to the lady nymph you serve?” Mercury asked.

Cupid answered, “Indeed, I am ‘page,’ ‘boy,’ and ‘sirrah.’ These are all my titles.”

“Then thou have not altered thy name with thy disguise?” Mercury asked.

“Oh, no, that would have been supererogation — too much,” Cupid said. “You shall never hear your courtier called except by one of these three names.”

“Indeed, then both our fortunes are the same,” Mercury said.

“Why, what parcel — piece — of man have thou alighted on for a master?” Cupid asked.

“Such a one as, before I begin to decipher him, I dare not affirm him to be anything other than a courtier,” Mercury said. “So much he is during this open time of revels that Cynthia has proclaimed, and he would be longer except that his means — his sources of income — are to leave him shortly afterward. His name is Hedon, and he is a gallant wholly consecrated to his pleasures.”

“Hedon?” Cupid said. “He frequents my lady’s chamber, I think.”

“Tell me what she is called and then I can tell thee,” Mercury said.

“She is Madam Philautia,” Cupid said.

The name “Philautia” means “Self-Love.”

Mercury said:

“Oh, aye, he affects her very particularly indeed.

“These are his graces: He does, besides me, keep a barber and a monkey.”

Monkeys were fashionable pets.

Mercury continued:

He has a richly embroidered waistcoat to entertain his visitants in, with a cap almost suitable. His curtains and bedding are thought to be his own; his bathing tub is not suspected.”

Hedon owned his own bath. Other courtiers might have a rented bath that had previously been used for treating some other people’s venereal disease.

Mercury continued:

“He loves to have a fencer, a pedant, and a musician seen in his lodging in the mornings.”

A pedant is a teacher.

“And not a poet?” Cupid asked.

Mercury answered:

“Fie, no! He himself is a rhymmer, and that’s a thought better than a poet.”

He added:

“He is not lightly within to his mercer, no, although he comes when he takes medicine, which is commonly after his play.”

A mercer sells silk and other fine fabrics. Hedon does not always come when his mercer calls, perhaps because the mercer is there to collect money he is owed.

The medicine is perhaps a purgative or an alcoholic drink.

The play could be in the theater or at a gambling table.

Mercury continued:

“He beats a tailor very well, but a stocking-seller admirably; and so, consequently, he beats anyone he owes money to who dares not resist him.

“He never makes general invitation — invitations — except in preparation for the publishing of — making known that he has — a new suit of clothing.

“By the Virgin Mary, then you shall have more drawn to his lodging than come to the launching of some three ships, especially if he is furnished with supplies for the retrieving of his old wardrobe from pawn; if he doesn’t have the money that is needed to get his clothes out of the pawnshop, he rents a stock — suit — of apparel, and some forty or fifty pounds in gold for that afternoon to show.”

A careless display of gold in one’s home is a way to impress guests. Unfortunately for Hedon, he has to rent the gold.

Mercury continued:

“He’s thought a very necessary perfume — accessory — for the presence chamber — the royal reception chamber — and only for that reason is he welcome thither: six milliners’ shops won’t give you the same scent.”

Hedon smells good because of his perfume, and for that reason he is welcome in the royal reception room.

Mercury continued:

“He courts ladies with how many great horses he has ridden that morning, or how often he has done the whole or the half pomado in the seven-night — the week — before.

Hedon tries to impress ladies by telling them how many pomados he has performed. A pomado is a leap onto or over a horse’s back; it is performed with the assistance provided by grabbing the saddle’s pommel.

Mercury continued:

“And he sometimes ventures so far upon the virtue of his pomander — perfume ball — that he dares tell them how many shirts he has sweat through at tennis that week, but he wisely conceals so many dozen of balls he is on the score.”

The score can be the result of the tennis game, but it can also be the tally of a debt. The balls may be the zeros in the figure owed.

Mercury continued:

“Here he comes, he who is all this.”

— 2.2 —

Hedon, Anaides, and Gelaia entered the scene.

Hedon is a hedonistic courtier.

The name “Anaides” means “Shameless.” He is an impudent courtier.

The name “Gelaia” means “Laughter.” Laughter is the daughter of Folly. She was dressed in boys’ clothing and served Hedon as a page.

“Boy!” Hedon called.

“Sir,” Mercury answered.

Mercury was disguised as a young mortal, and he was serving Hedon as a page.

“Are any of the ladies in the presence chamber?” Hedon asked.

“None yet, sir,” Mercury answered.

“Give me some gold,” Hedon ordered.

Mercury gave him some gold.

Some servants carried the purses — the wallets — of their masters.

“Give me more gold,” Hedon ordered.

Mercury gave him more gold, and then Mercury and Cupid stood to the side and watched the others.

“Is that thy serving-boy, Hedon?” Anaides asked.

“Aye, what do thou think of him?” Hedon answered.

“By God’s heart, I’d geld him; I swear he has the philosopher’s stone,” Anaides said.

“Geld” means “castrate.”

Alchemists sought the philosopher’s stone, which was supposed to be able to turn base metals such as iron into precious metals such as gold.

In Ben Jonson’s society, “stone” was slang for “testicle.”

Mercury, being a god, although they did not know that, was able to supply Hedon with money — more money than Hedon actually had.

“Well said, my good melancholy devil,” Hedon said to Anaides. “Sirrah, I have devised one or two of the prettiest oaths, this morning in my bed, as ever thou have heard, to use inside the presence chamber.”

“Please, let’s hear them,” Anaides requested.

“Wait, thou shall use them before me,” Hedon said.

“No,” Anaides said. “If I do, then damn me. I have more oaths than I know how to utter, I swear by this air.”

Hedon said, “Indeed, one is ‘by the tip of your ear, sweet lady.’ Isn’t it pretty and genteel?”

“Yes, for the person it is applied to, a lady,” Anaides said. “It should be light and —”

“Nay, the other is better, and it exceeds it by much,” Hedon said. “The invention is farther fetched, too: ‘By the white valley that lies between the Alpine hills of your bosom, I avow — etc.’”

Anaides said, “Well have you traveled — and travailed — for that phrase, Hedon.”

In a translation of Ovid’s Banquet of Sense, George Chapman used the phrase “Cupid’s Alps” to describe the breasts of Corinna.

The travail may have been the trouble needed to steal the idea from Ovid.

Mercury said to himself, “Aye, he traveled in a map, where his eyes were but blind guides to his understanding, it seems.”

Hedon said, “And then I have a salutation that will nick — outdo — all, by this dance-caper, ho!”

He leapt into the air.

“What salutation is that?” Anaides asked.

Hedon answered:

“You know I call Madam Philautia my ‘Honor,’ and she calls me her ‘Ambition.’

“Now, when I meet her in the presence chamber, soon, I will come to her and say, ‘Sweet Honor, I have hitherto contented my sense with the lilies of your hand, but now I will taste the roses of your lip,’ and with that I will kiss her; to which she cannot but blushing answer, ‘Nay, now you are too ambitious.’

“And then I will reply, ‘I cannot be too ambitious of honor, sweet lady.’ Won’t that be good? Huh? Huh?”

“Oh, assure your soul that it will,” Anaides said.

“By heaven, I think it will be excellent, and a very politic achievement of a kiss,” Hedon said.

“I have thought upon one for Moria of a sudden, too, if it take,” Anaides said.

The name “Moria” means “Folly.”

“What is it, my dear mischief?” Hedon said.

“By the Virgin Mary, I will come to her — and she always wears a muff if you remember — and I will tell her, ‘Madam, your whole self cannot but be perfectly wise, for your hands have wit enough to keep themselves warm,’” Anaides said.

Hedon said:

Anaides’ page was Gelaia, who had laughed. Gelaia was dressed in a page’s clothing.

Phoebus is Phoebus Apollo, who drives the chariot of the Sun.

Hedon continued:

“My sweet facetious rascal, I could eat water-gruel with thee for a month for this jest — oh, my dear rogue!”

Water-gruel is thin gruel made with water rather than milk.

Gruel made with milk is better.

Anaides said, “Oh, by Hercules, it is your only dish, above all your potatoes or oyster-pies in the world.”

Hedon said:

“I have ruminated upon a most rare — splendid — wish, too, and the prophecy to it, but I’ll have some friend to be the prophet, as thus: ‘I wish that I were one of my mistress’ ciopinos.’”

Ciopinos are shoes with a thick cork sole.

Hedon continued:

“Another demands, ‘Why would he be one of his mistress’ ciopinos?’

“A third answers, ‘Because he would make her higher.’

“A fourth shall say, ‘That will make her proud.’

“And a fifth shall conclude, ‘Then do I prophesy, pride will have a fall, and he shall give it to her.’”

“Fall” was a double entendre with one meaning being falling backwards into the missionary position.

Hedon’s wish was that Madam Philautia would go to bed with him.

Hedon wanted to set up a wish concerning Madam Philautia, but he needed help with it. A “prophet” would say the line about a wish that would set up Hedon’s wish: “I wish that I were one of my mistress’ ciopinos.”

A prophet in this sense is like a straight man: The prophet prophesizes the punch line.

“I’ll be your prophet,” Anaides said. “By God’s soul, it will be most exquisite! Thou are a fine inventious — inventive — rogue, sirrah.”

“Nay, and I have posies for rings, too, and riddles that they dream not of,” Hedon said.

Posies are short sayings that are engraved inside rings. For example: “As gold is sure, love is pure.” “I love you.” “Amor vincit omnes” [Love conquers all].

“Tut, they’ll do that when they come to sleep on them — the riddles — for enough time,” Anaides said. “But were thy devices never in the presence chamber yet, Hedon?”

“Oh, no, I disdain that,” Hedon said.

Anaides said, “It would be good we went there ahead of time, then, and made them acquainted with the room where they shall act, lest the strangeness of it put them out of countenance when they should come forth.”

The “devices” were the people who would assist Hedon in making his wish. They had not yet been in the presence chamber: the royal reception room.

Hedon, Anaides, and Gelaia exited.

Cupid asked, “Is that man a courtier, too?”

He was referring to Anaides.

Mercury said:

“In truth, no.

“He has two essential parts of the courtier: pride and ignorance. I mean of such a courtier who is indeed only the zany, aka clown, to an exact — perfect — courtier — by the Virgin Mary. His other parts come somewhat after the ordinary gallant.”

The Oxford English Dictionary defines “zany” in this way:

“A comic performer attending on a clown, acrobat, or mountebank, who imitates his master’s acts in a ludicrously awkward way; a clown’s or mountebank’s assistant, a merry-andrew, jack-pudding; sometimes used vaguely for a professional jester or buffoon in general.”

Mercury continued:

“Anaides is impudence itself. He is one who speaks all that comes in his cheeks and will blush no more than a sackbut. The words that come into his cheeks tend not to pass through his brain first.”

A sackbut is 1) a wine barrel or 2) a musical instrument that is similar to a trombone.

Mercury continued:

“He lightly occupies the jester’s room at the table and keeps laughter, Gelaia, a wench in page’s attire, following him in place of a squire, whom he now and then tickles with some strange ridiculous stuff, uttered — as his land came to him — by chance.

“He will censure — judge to be good or bad — or discourse of anything, but as absurdly as you would wish.

“His fashion is not to take knowledge of a man who is beneath him in clothes. He pretends not to know him.

“He never drinks below the salt.”

A salt cellar placed on a long table marked a division in status. Those seated above the salt had a higher social class than those seated below the salt. The host and hostess and their honored guests sat above the salt.

Mercury continued:

“He does naturally admire the wit of a man who wears gold lace or the rich cloth known as tissue, and he stabs any man who speaks more contemptibly of the scholar than he.”

The play has no mention of Anaides ever stabbing any man who speaks more contemptibly of the scholar than he, and so it is likely that no man speaks more contemptibly of the scholar than he.

Mercury continued:

“He is a great proficient in all the illiberal sciences, such as cheating, drinking, swaggering, whoring, and such like.

“He never kneels except to pledge healths, nor prays except for a pipe of pudding-tobacco.”

Pudding-tobacco was tobacco that had been pressed in rolls that resembled a sausage.

Mercury continued:

“He will blaspheme in his shirt even before he is fully dressed.

“The oaths that he vomits at just one supper would maintain a town with a garrison of profane soldiers in good swearing for a twelvemonth.

“One other genuine quality he has that crowns all these, and that is this: To a friend in need, he will not depart with the weight of a soldered groat, lest the world might judge him to be a prodigal or report that he is a gull — a fool.”

A groat is a coin of little value. People would clip the edges of gold and silver coins to get some of the metal. Clipped coins could be repaired with solder.

Mercury continued:

“But by the Virgin Mary, he will give to his cockatrice or punchetto, half-a-dozen taffeta gowns or satin kirtles, aka skirts, in a pair or two of months — why, they are nothing.”

A cockatrice and a punchetto are both prostitutes.

“I commend him,” Cupid said. “He is one of my clients.”

A person who would do such things is a follower of Cupid.

— 2.3 —

Amorphus, Asotus, and Cos entered the scene.

Amorphus said to Asotus, “Come, sir. You are now within sight of the presence chamber, and you see the privacy of this room, how sweetly it offers itself to our retired intendments — our private intentions.”

He then said to Cos, “Page, cast a vigilant and inquiring eye about, so that we are not rudely surprised by the approach of some ruder stranger.”

“I promise you, sir, that I’ll tell you when the wolf enters,” Cos said. “Fear nothing.”

A Latin proverb stated, lupus in fabula: the wolf in the story. The wolf is a person who comes into a place suddenly while he or she is being gossiped about.

Mercury said quietly to Cupid, “Oh, what a mass of benefit shall we possess, in being the invisible spectators of this strange show now to be acted!”

They would be greatly entertained by witnessing what was about to happen.

Servants are sometimes treated as if they are invisible, but Mercury and Cupid are gods who have the power of making themselves invisible.

Amorphus said to Asotus:

“Plant yourself there, sir, and observe me.

“You shall now be the ocular-witness as well as the ear-witness [he would both see and hear] how clearly I can refute — refute — that paradox, or rather pseudodox, aka false teaching, of those who hold the face to be the index of the mind, which, I assure you, is not so in any politic — crafty — creature.”

Some people believe that the face reveals the intentions of the person whose face it is, but Amorphus was going to show Asotus that he could put on and take off faces as he wished.

Amorphus continued:

“For instance, I will now give you the particular and distinct face of all of your most noted species of persons — as for example your merchant, your scholar, your soldier, your lawyer, courtier, etc. — and each of these so truly, as you would swear — except that your eye sees the variation of the lineament, aka facial features — that the expression were my most proper and genuine aspect.

“First, as for your merchant’s, or city-face, it is thus.”

He made a face like a merchant’s face.

Amorphus continued:

“A merchant’s face is a dull, plodding face, always looking in a direct line forward; there is no great matter in this face.

“Then you have your student’s, or academic face, which is here.”

He made a face like a student’s face.

Amorphus continued:

“A student’s face is an honest, simple, and methodical face, but somewhat more spread — broader — than the former.

“The third is your soldier’s face.”

He made a face like a soldier’s face.

Amorphus continued:

“A soldier’s face is a menacing and astounding face that looks broad and big; the grace of this face consists much in a beard.

“The anti-face — the opposite face — to this is your lawyer’s face.”

He made a face like a lawyer’s face.

Amorphus continued:

“A lawyer’s face is a contracted, subtle, and intricate face, full of quirks and turnings; a labyrinthian face, now angularly, now circularly, every way aspected.

“Next is your statist’s — statesman’s — face.”

He made a face like a statesman’s face.

Amorphus continued:

“A statesman’s face is a serious, solemn, and supercilious face, full of formal and square gravity; the eye, for the most part, artificially and deeply shadowed; there is great judgment required in the making of this face.

“But now, to come to your face of faces, or courtier’s face, it is of three sorts, according to our subdivision of a courtier: elementary, practic, and theoric.

“One kind is concerned with practice, and the other is concerned with theory.

“Your courtier theoric is he who has arrived to his farthest, and now knows the court rather by speculation — that is, contemplation — than practice, and this is his face: a fastidious, aka disdainful, and oblique face that looks as if it went with a vice and were screwed up like thus.”

He made a face like a courtier theoric’s face.

Amorphus continued:

“Your courtier practic is he who is yet in his path, his course, his way, and has not touched the punctilio or point of hopes; this face is here.”

He made a face like a courtier practic’s face.

Amorphus continued:

“A courtier practic’s face is a most promising, open, smooth, and overflowing face, which seems as if it would run and pour itself into you.

“Your courtier elementary is one just newly entered or as it were in the alphabet, or ut-re-mi-fa-sol-la, of courtship; note well this face.”

He made a face like a courtier elementary’s face.

Amorphus continued:

“For it is this face — the courtier elementary’s face — that you must practice.”

“Ut-re-mi-fa-sol-la” is a musical scale; later, “doh” replaced “ut.” One who practices the musical scale is likely a beginner.

“I’ll practice them all, if you please, sir,” Asotus said.

Amorphus said:

“Aye, hereafter you may, and it will not be altogether an ungrateful — unrewarding — study. For let your soul be assured of this: In any rank or profession whatsoever, the most general or major part of opinion goes with the face, and simply respects nothing else. Therefore, if that can be made exactly, curiously, exquisitely, thoroughly, it is enough.

“But, for the present, you shall apply yourself only to this face of the elementary courtier: a light, reveling, and protesting — one that frequently says, ‘I protest,’ aka ‘I declare’ — face, now blushing, now smiling, which you may help much with a wanton wagging of your head thus.”

He wagged his head:

Amorphus continued:

“A feather will teach you how to wag your head.

“Or you may help that face much with kissing your finger that has the ruby, or playing with some string of your hatband, which is a most quaint kind of melancholy besides.

“Where is your page? Call for your casting-bottle — your perfume-bottle — and place your mirror in your hat, as I told you.”

Asotus placed a small mirror in his hat.

Amorphus continued:

“Good.

“Come, don’t look pale, observe me; set your face, and enter into the character of the elementary courtier.”

Mercury said to himself, “Oh, for some excellent painter, to have painted the copy of all these faces!”

Asotus called for his page: “Prosaites!”

Amorphus admonished him: “Bah, I premonished — forewarned — you of that; in the court, say ‘boy’ or ‘sirrah.’”

Prosaites entered the room.

Cos said to Amorphus, “Master, lupus in — Oh, it is Prosaites.”

He had begun to say “lupus in fabula” to warn Amorphus about a newcomer, but then he saw that the newcomer was only Prosaites.

Asotus said to Prosaites:

“Sirrah, prepare my casting-bottle for me.

“I think I must be forced to purchase me another page; you see how Cos waits at hand here.”

Cos was very close to Amorphus, while Prosaites had been so far from Asotus that Asotus had to call for him to come closer.

Amorphus, Asotus, Cos, and Prosaites exited.

“So will he, too, in time,” Mercury said.

As time goes on, Asotus the prodigal will waste more and more of his wealth and grow closer and closer to Prosaites the beggar.

“Who’s he, Mercury?” Cupid asked.

He was referring to Asotus.

Mercury answered:

“He is a notable finch, aka gullible fool. He is one who has newly entertained the beggar — Prosaïtes — to follow and serve him, but he cannot get him to wait near enough. He is Asotus, the heir of Philargyrus.

“But first I’ll give you the other man’s character, which may make his — Asotus’ character — the clearer.

“The man who is with him is Amorphus, a traveler.

“He is a man so made out of the mixture and shreds of forms that he himself is truly deformed.

“He walks most commonly with a clove or toothpick in his mouth.

“He’s the very mint of compliment; all his behaviors are printed, his face is another volume of essays, and his beard an Aristarchus.”

Aristarchus was an ancient Greek critic who wrote commentaries.

Amorphus’ face was a volume of essays, and his beard was the commentary on his face.

Just as clothing can reveal much information about social class, so can hair styles and beard styles. The Elizabethans sometimes starched their beards. But often beards were long and not starched. A person with a starched beard was concerned about fashion and so could be a courtier. Peasants would be unlikely to starch their beards.

A glance at Amorphus’ beard would at least sometimes show whether the beard matched the face he was making.

Mercury continued:

“He speaks all cream, skimmed, and more affected than a dozen waiting women.”

“All skimmed cream” means “all cream,” and “all skimmed of cream” means “no cream.”

Mercury continued:

“He’s his own promoter in every place; the wife of the ordinary — an eating house — gives him his diet to maintain her table in discourse, which indeed is a mere tyranny over her other guests, for he will usurp all the talk — ten constables are not so tedious.”

In Ben Jonson’s society, constables had a reputation for dullness.

Mercury continued:

“He is no great shifter — changer — of clothing. Once a year his apparel is ready to revolt.

“He does act much to arbitrate quarrels, and he himself fights exceedingly well, out at a window.”

The implication is that Amorphus does not fight so well when he is within arm’s distance of the person he is willing to shout at from a window.

Mercury continued:

“He will lie cheaper than any beggar and louder than most clocks, for which he is right properly accommodated to the whetstone, his page.”

Amorphus and his page, Cos, snore loudly.

Mercury then began to describe the character of Asotus:

“The other gallant — Asotus — is his zany, aka assistant to a clown, and does most of these tricks after him, sweats to imitate him in everything to a hair, except a beard, which is not yet extant.”

Asotus is so young that he does not yet have a beard.

Mercury continued:

“Asotus learns to eat anchovies and caviar because Amorphus loves them.

“Asotus speaks as he — Amorphus — speaks.

“Asotus looks and walks, Asotus goes so in clothes and fashion, and Asotus is in all things, as if he — Asotus — were molded out of Amorphus.

“By the Virgin Mary, before they met, Asotus had other very pretty sufficiencies, aka competencies, which yet he retains some light impression of, as frequenting a dancing school and grievously torturing strangers with inquisition after his grace in his galliard — a French dance.

“Asotus buys a fresh acquaintance at any rate.

“His eye and his raiment confer much together as he goes in the street.

“He treads nicely, like a tightrope fellow who walks upon ropes, especially the first Sunday of his silk-stockings; and when he is most neat and new, you shall strip him of clothing with praise and commendations.”

Amorphus had already stripped Asotus of his hat by praising it.

Cupid said, “Here comes another man.”

Mercury said, “Aye, but he is a man of another strain, Cupid; this fellow weighs somewhat.”

This new man is not a fool.

The new man was Criticus, who walked past Mercury and Cupid.

“What is his name, Hermes?” Cupid asked.

Mercury (Hermes) replied:

“His name is Criticus.

“Criticus is a creature of a most perfect and divine temper; he is one in whom the humors and elements are peaceably met without emulation of precedency.

“Criticus is neither too fantastically melancholy [sad], too slowly phlegmatic [unemotional and calm], too lightly sanguine [optimistic], nor too rashly choleric [angry], but in all things he is so composed and ordered that it is clear Nature was about some full work; she did more than make a man when she made him.

“His discourse is like his behavior, uncommon but not unpleasing; he is prodigal of neither discourse nor behavior.

“Criticus strives rather to be that which men call judicious than to be thought so; and he is so truly learned that he does not desire to show it off.

“Criticus will both think and speak his thought freely, but he is as distant from depraving — disparaging — any other man’s merit as proclaiming his own.

“As for his valor, it is such that he dares as little to offer an injury as to receive one.

“In sum, he has a most ingenious — intelligent — and sweet spirit, a sharp and seasoned wit, a straight judgment, and a strong mind, constant and unshaken.

“Fortune could never break him or make him less.

“Criticus counts it his pleasure to despise pleasures, and he is more delighted with good deeds than goods. It is a competency — a sufficient reward — to him that he can be virtuous.

“Criticus neither covets nor fears; he has too much reason to do either — and that commends all things to him.”

Cupid said, “Not better than Mercury commends him.”

Mercury replied, “Oh, Cupid, it is beyond my deity to give him his due praises; I could leave my place in heaven to live among mortals, as long as I were sure to be no other than he is.”

“By God’s light, I believe he is your minion — your favorite,” Cupid said. “You seem to be so ravished with him.”

“He’s one I would not willingly have a wry thought darted against,” Mercury said.

Cupid said, “No, but a straight shaft in his bosom, I’ll promise him, if I am Cytherea’s son.”

Cytherea is Venus. She was born in the surf near the island of Cythera, which is off the southwest coast of the Peloponnese in Greece. A temple on Cythera was dedicated to her.

“Shall we go, Cupid?” Mercury asked.

“Let’s stay and see the ladies now; they’ll come soon,” Cupid said. “I’ll help to paint them.”

“Paint” can mean “makeup” as a noun and “put on makeup” as a verb, but Cupid was using the word to metaphorically mean “paint a verbal description of them.”

“What, lay color upon color?” Mercury said. “That affords only an ill blazon.”

Since one meaning of “color” is makeup, if Cupid were to literally paint the ladies’ portrait, he would be using paint to paint their paint.

“Color” can also mean a heraldic device such as one painted on a metal blazon, aka war shield.

The word “blazon” can also mean “a portrait of a woman.”

Argurion walked by them.

“Here comes metal to help it: the Lady Argurion,” Cupid said.

“Argurion” means “silver,” and since silver is used in the making of coins, it also means “money.”

“Money, money,” Mercury said.

Cupid said:

“The same.

“Argurion is a nymph of a most wandering and giddy disposition, as humorous as the air.

“She’ll run from gallant to gallant, as they sit and play the card game primero in the presence chamber, most strangely, and she seldom stays with any.

“Argurion spreads money around as she goes.

“Today you shall have her look as clear and fresh as the morning, and tomorrow as melancholy as midnight.

“Argurion takes special pleasure in a close, obscure lodging, and for that reason visits the city so often, where she has many secret and true-concealing favorites.”

Some people conceal the truth about her. Misers can pretend to be poor, and some spendthrifts can pretend to be wealthier than they are.

Cupid continued:

“When Argurion comes abroad, she’s more loose and scattering — erratic — than dust, and she will fly from place to place as if she were rapt — seized — with a whirlwind.

“A young student, for the most part, she does not favor. She only greets him, and then leaves.

“A poet or a philosopher she is hardly brought to take any notice of, no, even though he may be some part of an alchemist.”

No alchemist ever succeeded in making the philosopher’s stone.

Cupid continued:

“Argurion loves a player well, and a lawyer infinitely, but your fool above all.”

Players — gamblers — can get lucky at gambling sometimes.

Cupid continued:

“Argurion can do much in the court for the obtaining of any suit whatsoever; no door but flies open to her, her presence is above a charm.

“The worst in her is a lack of keeping state and maintaining dignity and too much descending into inferior and base offices. She’s for any coarse employment you will put upon her, such as to be your procurer or pander or pimp.”

Mercury said, “Quiet, Cupid, here comes more work for you, another character or two.”

Cupid’s work was introducing some new characters.

Phantaste, Moria, and Philautia entered the scene.

“Phantaste” means “Fantasy,” which can mean Self-Delusion.” She has a light wittiness.

“Moria” means “Folly.” She is the mother of Gelaia, whose name means “Laughter.” She is older than Phantaste and Philautia, who are of an age to be married soon.

“Philautia” means “Self-Love.”

Phantaste said, “Wait, sweet Philautia, I’ll just change my fan and go immediately.”

She exited.

Moria said, “Now, in very good seriousness, ladies, I will have this order reversed; the presence chamber must be better maintained from you. A quarter past eleven and never a nymph in prospective — in view! Curse my hand, there must be a reformed discipline.”

Moria perhaps wanted the nymphs — Phantaste and Philautia — to arrive before any other guests. They had arrived in the presence chamber only to find some men there first.

Moria then asked Philautia, “Is that your new ruff, sweet ladybird? By my truth, it is most intricately splendid.”

Mercury and Cupid talked together at the side.

“Good Jove, what reverend gentlewoman in years might this be?” Mercury asked.

Cupid was the grandson of Jupiter, aka Jove.

Cupid said:

“This gentlewoman, Madam Moria, guardian of the nymphs, is one who is not now to be persuaded of her wit and intelligence.”

Or lack of them.

In Queen Elizabeth I’s court, the Mother of the Maids was responsible for taking care of the unmarried maidens of the court.

Cupid continued:

“She will think herself wise against all the judgments that come.

“She is a lady made all of voice and air, and she talks anything of anything.

“She is like one of your ignorant poetasters — inferior poets — of the time who, when they have got acquainted with a strange word, never rest until they have wrung it in, even though it loosens the whole fabric of their sense.”

In other words, they pretensify the pretentiousness of their pretentoxicity.

Mercury said, “That was prettily and sharply noted, Cupid.”

Cupid said:

“She will tell you that Philosophy was a fine reveler when she was young and he was a gallant, and that then, even though she is the one who says it, she was thought to be the Dame Dido and Helen of the court.”

Dido, the Queen of Carthage, nearly kept the Trojan War survivor Aeneas from fulfilling his destiny of becoming an important founder of the Roman people.

Helen is Helen of Troy, whose beauty became a cause of the Trojan War when Paris ran off with her and took her to Troy.

Her character was ambiguous: Some sources say she willingly left her legitimate husband, Menelaus, the King of Sparta, while other sources say she was kidnapped by Paris.

Cupid said:

“She will also speak about what a sweet dog she had this time four years ago, and how it was called Fortune, and that, if the Fates had not cut his thread, he would have been a dog to have given entertainment to any gallant in this kingdom.”

The three Fates commanded the pulse of life; they controlled human life. Clotho spun the thread of life. Lachesis measured the thread of life, determining how long a person lived. Atropos cut the thread of life; when the thread was cut, the person died.

Ancient literature does not contain accounts of Atropos cutting the thread of life of a dog.

Moirai's name is “Folly,” and Fortune is a good name for Moira's dog. A proverb stated, “Fortune favors fools.”

Mercury said, “Oh, please tell me no more about her. I am full of her.”

Cupid said, “Yes, I must necessarily tell you that she composes a sack-posset well, and she would court a young page sweetly, except that her breath is against it.”

Sack-posset is hot milk curdled with sack, a kind of white wine.

Moria had bad breath.

Mercury said:

“Now, may her breath, or something stronger, protect me from her!

“Tell me about the other, Cupid.”

The other was Madam Philautia, Cupid's mistress, aka lady-boss. He served her as her page.

"Philautia" means "Self-Love."

Cupid said:

"Oh, that's my lady and mistress, Madam Philautia.

"She does not admire herself for any one particularity — particular thing — but for all:

"She is fair, and she knows that; she has a pretty light wit, too, and she knows that; she can dance, and she knows that, too; she can play at the game of shuttlecock, and she knows that, too.

"No quality she has but she shall take a very particular knowledge of and, most ladylike, commend it to you.

"You shall have her at any time read to you the history of herself, and she will very subtly run over another lady's sufficiencies — abilities — in order to come to her own.

"She has a good superficial judgment in painting, and she would like to appear to have such in poetry.

"She is a most complete lady in the opinion of some three people besides herself."

Philautia said to Moria, "Indeed, how did you like my quip to Hedon about the garter? Wasn't it witty?"

"Exceedingly witty and integrate," Moria replied. "You did so aggravate the jest with it — quite so."

Moria sometimes misused words. "Integrate" perhaps meant "complete." "Aggravate" perhaps meant "instigate."

"And didn't I dance movingly last night?" Philautia asked.

“Movingly!” Moria replied. “Out of measure, in truth, sweet lady.”

Mercury said, “A happy commendation, to dance out of measure.”

“Out of measure” can mean 1) outstandingly, or 2) out of time with the music. A measure is a type of stately dance.

Moria said, “Save only that you lacked the swim in the turn. Oh! When I was at fourteen —”

A “swim” is a smooth movement.

Philautia interrupted, “Nay, that’s my own from any nymph in the court, I am sure of it, therefore you mistake me in that, guardian. Both the swim and the trip are properly mine. Everybody will affirm it who has any judgment in dancing, I assure you.”

A trip is a dance movement.

Phantaste returned and said, “Come now, Philautia, I am ready. Shall we go?”

“Aye, good Phantaste,” Philautia said. “What! Have you changed your headdress?”

“Yes, indeed; the other was so like the common style, it had no extraordinary grace,” Phantaste replied. “Besides, I had worn it for almost a day, truly.”

Philautia said, “I’ll be sworn that it is most excellent for our project, and it is splendid. It is after the Italian print we looked at the other night.”

The Italian print had shown an illustration of a headdress like the one Phantaste was wearing now.

“It is so,” Phantaste said. “By this fan, I cannot abide anything that savors the poor overworn cut, anything that has any kindred with it. I must have variety, I must. I hate this mixing in fashion worse than to burn juniper in my chamber, I declare.”

Juniper was burned as an aromatic. Juniper smoke was also thought to clean the air.

Philautia said, “And yet we cannot have a new peculiar court-attire, for if we attempt to do that, these retainers will imitate it — these suburb-Sunday-waiters, these courtiers for high days, aka festival days — I don’t know what I should call them —”

Suburb-Sunday-waiters were people who visited the court on special days, but they were not in attendance daily, as were more important people.

Phantaste interrupted and said, “Oh, aye, they do most pitifully imitate; but I have a tire coming, indeed, that shall ___”

Phantaste wore many headdresses. She changed her headdress because she had worn it almost a day, and she had a new headdress coming.

“Tire” can also mean “attire.” Phantaste may have coming a new outfit of clothing that includes a new headdress.

Moria interrupted and said to Phantaste, “In good certain, madam, it makes you look most heavenly. But, lay your hand on your heart, you never skinned a new beauty more prosperously in your life, nor more supernaturally.”

“Skinned a new beauty” perhaps meant putting on a new face of makeup.

Or “skinned a new beauty” perhaps meant putting on a new headdress or a new outfit of clothing. In that case, Phantaste would be the beauty in an outfit. Her beauty would be new because it was brought out by the new clothing.

Or Phantaste may have ordered an animal to be skinned so that its fur could be used in some clothing she was wearing.

Or Phantaste may have had a beauty rest to refresh her skin.

“Supernaturally” perhaps meant that Phantaste never looked more heavenly.

Moria said to Philautia, “Look, good lady, sweet lady, look.”

She meant: Look at Phantaste.

Philautia said:

“It is very clear and well, believe me. But if you had seen mine yesterday when it was young, you would have —

“Who’s your doctor, Phantaste?”

This kind of doctor — an expert in an area of learning — may be a cosmetician.

Or this kind of doctor — an expert in an area of learning — may be a medical doctor.

Phantaste replied:

“Nay, that’s counsel — that’s a secret. Philautia, you shall pardon me.

“Yet I’ll assure you that he’s the most dainty, sweet, absolute, splendid man of the whole college. Oh! His very looks, his discourse, his behavior, all he does is medicine, I declare.”

Philautia said, “For heaven’s sake, what’s his name? Good, dear Phantaste —”

Phantaste interrupted, “No, no, no, no, no, no! Believe me, not for a million of heavens. I will not make him cheap. Bah —”

Philautia, Phantaste, and Moria exited.

Cupid said about Phantaste, “There is a nymph, too, of a most curious and elaborate strain, light, all motion, an ubiquitary, she is everywhere, Phantaste —”

An ubiquitary is someone who is everywhere.

Mercury interrupted:

“Her very name speaks — describes — her; let her pass.

“But are these, Cupid, the stars of Cynthia’s court? Do these nymphs — Philautia and Phantaste — attend upon Diana?”

Cupid replied:

“They are in her court, Mercury, but not as stars; these nymphs never come in the presence of Cynthia.

“The nymphs who make up Cynthia’s train of attendants are the divine Arete [Excellence, Virtue], Timè [Honor], Phronesis [Prudence], Thaumà [Wonder], and others of that high sort.

“These nymphs — Philautia and Phantaste — are privately brought in by Moria in this licentious time, against Cynthia’s knowledge; and, like so many meteors, they will vanish when she appears.”

This licentious time was the time of revels that Cynthia was permitting. It was a time of freedom.

Meteors are seen for only a short time. In Ben Jonson’s society, comets were called meteors. The light of comets can be outshone and drowned out by the light of the Moon.

— 2.5 —

Prosaites, Gelaia, and Cos entered the scene. They were carrying bottles.

Prosaites sang:

“Come follow me, my wags, and say as I say.

“There’s no riches but in rags, hey day, hey day.

“You that [who] profess this art, come away, come away,

“And help to bear a part, hey day, hey day.

“Bear-wards [Bear-keepers] and blackingmen [sellers of shoe polish],

“Corn-cutters [cutters of corns on feet] and car-men [cart-men],

“Sellers of marking stones [chalk that was used to mark cattle so their owners could be identified],

“Gatherers-up of marrow bones [the marrow was edible],

“Pedlars [Peddlers] and puppet-players,

“Sow-gelders [Sow-spayers] and soothsayers, “Rat-catchers and railers [scoffers],

“Gypsies and jailers,

“Beadles [minor parish officials] and ballad-singers,

“Fiddlers and fadingers [dancers of an Irish dance],

“Thomalins [itinerants] and tinkers,

“Scavengers and skinkers [bartenders],

“There goes the hare away,

“Hey day, hey day.

“Bawds and blind doctors,

“Paritors [ecclesiastical court officials] and spital proctors [hospital officials],

“Chemists [Alchemists] and cuttlebungs,

“Hookers and horn-thumbs —”

These were types of thieves: Cuttlebungs used knives to cut the strings of purses (moneybags that could be tied to a person’s belt), hookers used hooks to hook and steal items through open windows, and cuttlebungs used thimbles made of horn to protect their fingers as they cut purses.

Prosaites continued singing:

“— with all cast [cast-off, jobless] commanders

“Turned post-knights [professional informers] or panders, “Borrowers of testers [six-pences],

“Jugglers and jesters,

“And all the troop of trash

“That’re [Who’re] allied to the lash [whipping was the trash’s punishment],

“Come and join with your lags [fellows],

“Shake up your muscle-bags [thighs, or buttocks].

“For beggary bears the sway [is dominant],

“Then [So then] sing: cast care away,

“Hey day, hey day!”

Mercury said:

“What? Those who were our fellow pages just now are so soon promoted to be yeomen of the bottles?”

The yeomen of the bottles were literally the court officials who were in charge of the wine.

Mercury continued:

“The mystery, the mystery, good wags?”

The mystery was: What are you doing?

Cupid speculated, “Some diet — medicinal — drink they have the guard of.”

Prosaites said, “No, sir, we are going in quest of a strange fountain lately found out.”

“By whom?” Cupid asked.

“My master, or the great discoverer, Amorphus,” Cos said.

“Thou have well entitled him a discoverer, Cos, for he will reveal all he knows,” Mercury said.

The word “discover” can mean “reveal.”

“Aye, and a little more, too, when the spirit is upon him,” Gelaia said.

Yes, the alcoholic spirit. The “little more” than he knows will be lies.

Prosaites said, “Oh, the good travelling gentleman yonder — Amorphus — has caused such a drought in the presence chamber with reporting the wonders of this new water, that all the ladies and gallants lie languishing upon the rushes — floor covering — like so many impounded cattle in the midst of harvest to keep them from eating the crops, sighing one to another, and gasping, as if each of them expected a cock — a spout — from the fountain to be brought into his mouth; and, unless we return quickly, they are all, as a youth would say, no better than a few trouts cast ashore, or a dish of eels in a sandbag.”

Mercury said:

“Well, then, you had best dispatch and have a care of them.

“Come, Cupid, thou and I will go peruse this dry wonder.”

ACT 3 (The Fountain of Self-Love, or Cynthia's Revels)

— 3.1 —

Amorphus and Asotus entered the scene. Asotus had not made a good impression on the courtiers in or near the presence chamber. He had been tongue-tied.

Amorphus said to Asotus:

“Sir, don’t let this discountenance or disgallant you — empty you of gallantry — a whit; you must not sink under the first disaster. It is with your young grammatical — as if still in grammar school — courtier as with your neophyte actor, a thing usual to be daunted at the first presence or inter-view.”

An inter-view is also an enter-view. Asotus had entered and been inside this area that was frequently by courtiers for his first time, and the sight had daunted him.

Amorphus continued:

“There you saw Hedon and Anaides, who are far more practiced gallants than yourself, who were both out, aka at a loss of words, and that should comfort you.

“It is no disgrace to be discomfited, no more than for your adventurous reveler to fall by some inauspicious chance in his galliard, or for some subtle politician to undertake the bastinado, so that the state might think worthily of him and respect him as a man well beaten to the world.”

A galliard is a dance in triple time.

The bastinado was a Turkish punishment in which a person was beaten on the feet.

A man who is well beaten to the world may be a man who is well traveled and has beaten a path to various parts of the world. One would have to travel to undergo the bastinado.

Amorphus continued:

“What, has your tailor provided the property — the outfit — we spoke of at your chamber, or not?”

“I think he has,” Asotus said.

Amorphus said:

“Nay, I entreat you, don’t be so flat and melancholic. Erect your mind. Rouse yourself. You shall redeem this with the courtship I will teach you in preparation for this afternoon.

“Where will you eat today?”

“Wherever you please, sir, anywhere, I say,” Asotus said.

Amorphus said:

“Come, let us go and taste some light dinner, a dish of sliced caviar or so.”

Normally, caviar is eaten as a garnish or a spread. It can be eaten with sliced foods such as bread or salmon.

Amorphus continued:

“And after we eat, you shall practice an hour at your lodging some few forms that I have remembered. If you had but so far gathered your spirits to you as to have taken up a rush from the floor, when you were out, and wagged it like this —”

He demonstrated by picking up a rush — a plant whose stalks were used as floor coverings — from the floor and wagging it.

Amorphus continued:

“— or cleaned your teeth with it, or just turned aside and feigned some business to whisper with your page until you had recovered yourself, or just had found some slight stain in your stocking or any other pretty invention, so long as it had been sudden, you might have come off with a most clear and courtly grace.”

Asotus said, “A poison of all, I think, I was forspoke — I was bewitched! I was!”

“Forspeak” means “speak evil of” as well as “bewitched.”

Amorphus said:

“No, I do partly aim at the cause, which was ominous indeed: For as you enter at the door, there was opposed to you the form of a wolf in the wall hangings, which, your eye taking suddenly, gave a false alarm to the heart, and that was what called your blood out of your face and so disordered the whole rank of your spirits.

“I urge you to labor to forget it.”

They exited.

— 3.2 —

Hedon and Anaides talked together. Hedon had conceived a deep dislike of Criticus. Hedon was a hedonistic courtier, and Anaides was an impudent courtier.

They had been in the same place as Amorphus and Asotus, and Hedon had also been discomfited. Hedon and Anaides had planned a way for Hedon to compliment his mistress — the woman he admired — Madam Philautia. The plan, however, had not gone well.

Hedon said, “By God’s heart, was there ever so prosperous an invention — my plan — thus unluckily perverted and spoiled by a whoreson bookworm, a candle-waster?”

He was talking about Criticus, although he did not know his name.

Some people “waste” candles by using their light to study at night.

Anaides replied, “Nay, don’t be impatient, Hedon.”

“By God’s light, I would like to know his name,” Hedon said.

Anaides said:

“Hang him, the poor grogram-wearing rascal. Please don’t think about him.”

Grogram is a coarse cloth of the type that a scholar could wear.

Anaides continued:

“I’ll send for him to come to my lodging, and have him blanketed whenever thou wish, man.”

Some disliked men were put in a blanket and tossed high in the air.

“By God’s soul, I wish thou could,” Hedon said. “Look, here he comes. Laugh at him, laugh at him. Ha, ha, ha!”

Criticus passed by them and stood to the side.

Anaides said, “Bah, he smells like lamp-oil because of his studying by candlelight.”

“How confidently he went by us, and how carelessly!” Hedon said. “He was never moved, nor stirred to anger at anything! Did you observe him?”

“Aye, a pox on him,” Anaides said. “Let him go, dormouse; he is in a dream now. He has no other time to sleep but thus when he walks abroad to take the air.”

Dormice were known for sleeping much of the time.

Anaides may have meant to say, "Let him go — the dormouse." If he had, then the "dormouse" would be Criticus, not Hedon.

Hedon said, "By God's precious blood, this afflicts me more than all the rest, that we should so particularly direct our hate and contempt against him, and he to carry it thus without wound or passion! It is insufferable."

Criticus was unconcerned about what they thought of him.

Anaides said, "By God's eyelid, my dear Envy, if thou wilt just say the word now, I'll undo and ruin him eternally for thee."

"How, sweet Anaides?" Hedon asked.

"By the Virgin Mary, half a score of us will get him in one night and make him pawn his wit for a supper," Anaides answered.

They would get Criticus to speak entertainingly while being fed a meal. Apparently, Anaides thought that Criticus would make a fool of himself. Or, possibly, they thought that Criticus would flatter anyone who bought him a meal.

Hedon said:

"Get out! Go away! Thou have such unseasonable jests!

"By this heaven, I wonder at nothing more than our gentlemen ushers, who will allow a piece of serge or perpetuana to come into the presence chamber. I think that they should, out of their experience, better distinguish the silken disposition of a courtier than to let such terrible coarse rags mix with them, able to fret — fray — any smooth or genteel society to the threads with their rubbing devices — their irritating conversation."

Serge and perpetuana are rough kinds of cloth that a scholar might wear.

Anaides said, “Damn me if I should adventure — come — on his company once more without a suit of buff — thick leather — to defend my wit. He does nothing but stab, the slave. How mischievously he crossed thy device of the prophecy there! And Moria came without her muff, too, and there my invention was lost.”

“Well, I have decided what I’ll do,” Hedon said.

“What, my good spirituous spark — my spirited gallant?” Anaides asked

“By the Virgin Mary, I’ll speak all the venom I can of him, and poison his reputation in every place where I come,” Hedon said.

He would maliciously gossip about him.

“Before God, that is most courtly,” Anaides said.

Courtly behavior is supposed to be behavior that shows good etiquette, but some courtiers at this court engaged in malicious gossip.

Hedon added, “And if I chance to be present where any question is made of his sufficiencies and abilities, or of anything he has done in private or public, I’ll censure — judge — it slightly, and ridiculously —”

Anaides replied:

“At any hand, beware of that, lest you may draw your own judgment into suspicion.”

The judgment of Criticus was much better than the judgment of Hedon.

Anaides continued:

“No, I’ll instruct thee in what thou shall do, and by a safer, more secure means: Approve anything thou hear of his according to the received opinion of it. If other people think it is good, then you also say that it is good.

“But if what he says is extraordinarily good, give the credit of it not to him but to some other person whom thou more particularly like.

“That’s the way to plague him, and he shall never come to defend himself.

“By God’s blood, I’ll give out the gossip that all he says is dictated from — that is, he copied the conversation of — other men; and I’ll swear it, too, if thou shall allow me to, and I’ll swear that I know the time and place where he stole it.

“Although my soul is not guilty of believing any such thing, and although I think, from the bottom of my heart, he hates such barren shifts and imaginative tricks as plagiarism; yet to do thee a pleasure and him a disgrace, I’ll damn myself, or do anything.”

Hedon said, “Many thanks, my dear devil. We’ll put it seriously in practice, indeed.”

— 3.3 —

Criticus had overheard their conversation.

Alone, he said to himself:

“Do, good Detraction — Anaides — do, and I the while “Shall shake thy spite off with a careless — worry-free — smile.

“Poor piteous — contemptible — gallants, what lean idle sleights and tricks their thoughts suggest to flatter their starved hopes!

“As if I didn’t know how to entertain these straw-devices — harmless plots — but of force must yield to the weak stroke of their calumnious and abusive tongues.

“Why should I care what every dor — fool — buzzes of gossip into credulous ears?

“It is a crown — a mark of distinction — to me that the best judgments can report me wronged, them liars, and their slanders impudent.

“Perhaps, upon the rumor of their speeches, some grieved friend will whisper, ‘Criticus, men speak ill of thee.’

“As long as they are ill men, if they spoke worse of me, it would be better, for to be dispraised and criticized by such men is the most perfect praise.

“What can his censure hurt me — the censure of a man whom the world has censured vile before me?

Criticus continued:

“If good Chrestus [Honest], Euthus [Straightforward], or Phronimus [Sensible] had spoken the words, they would have moved me, and I should have called my thoughts and actions to a strict account upon the hearing.

“But when I remember it is Hedon and Anaides, alas, then, I think but who and what they are, and I am not stirred to anger:

“The one is a light voluptuous reveler.

“The other is a strange arrogating puff of nothing.

“Both are impudent and ignorant enough.

“They are courtiers who talk as they are accustomed to talk, not as I merit and deserve.

“They instead traduce by habit just as most dogs bark by custom.

“They do nothing out of judgment, but out of disease.

“They speak ill because they never could speak well.

“And who would be angry with this race of creatures? What wise physician have we ever seen moved by a frantic man? The same feelings that a wise physician bears to his sick patient a right mind should carry to such as these.

“And I count it a most rare revenge that I can thus, with such a sweet neglect, pluck from them all the pleasure of their malice.

“For that’s the mark — the target — of all their ingenious craft — their deceitful plots — to wound my patience, howsoever they seem to aim at other objects, which if missed, their envy’s like an arrow shot upright, an arrow which in the fall endangers their own heads.”

— 3.4 —

Arete entered the scene.

The name “Arete” means “Excellence” or “Virtue.” Lady Arete is wise.

“What, Criticus!” Arete said. “Where have you spent the day? You have not visited your jealous friends!”

In Ben Jonson’s society, one meaning of “jealous” is “anxious for your welfare.”

Criticus replied:

“I have been where I have seen, most honored Arete, the strangest pageant, fashioned like a court — at least I dreamt I saw it — so diffused and disordered, so painted with makeup, so outfitted in fools’ pied — multi-colored — clothing, and so full of rainbow strains and streaks of color, as never yet, either by time or place, was made the food to my distasted — disgusted — sense.

“Nor can my weak, imperfect memory now render to my tongue half the forms that were convolved — coiled together — within this thrifty — fertile — room.”

The room was fertile ground for a satirist such as Ben Jonson.

Criticus then began to list a few types of people whom he had seen by the presence chamber:

“Here stalks by me a proud and spangled-clothing sir who looks three hands-breadths higher than the top of his head. He savors himself alone, is only kind and loving to himself. He is one who will speak darker and more doubtful — ambiguous — than six oracles. He salutes a friend as if he had a stitch of sudden pain. He is his own chronicle, and he scarcely can eat because he is busy registering himself.”

This courtier who is his own chronicle and is constantly registering himself is someone who constantly writes notes, perhaps to remember things to write in a journal later.

The parish would register — keep a record of — important events, including births, weddings, and deaths.

Criticus continued:

“He is waited on by mimics [buffoons], jesters, panders, parasites and hangers-on, and other such-like prodigies — monsters — of men.

“This courtier having gone past, there comes some subtle Proteus.”

Proteus is a mythological sea-god who is a shape-shifter: He can change his shape into many other forms.

Criticus continued:

“He is one who can change and vary with all the forms he sees. He can be anything but honest, serves the time by following whatever is the current fashion, hovers between two factions, and explores the plots of both. With cross — opposite — faces, he bears news of these plots to the divided heads, and he is received with mutual grace by either head.”

This type of courtier plays both sides. When two factions are opposed, he will present one face to the head of one faction and an opposite face to the head of the other faction. In each case, he seems to favor the faction of the person to whom he is speaking and not favor the other faction.

Criticus continued:

“He is one who dares do deeds worthy the hurdle or the wheel, to be thought somebody; and is, in truth, such as the satirist points truly forth:

“Criminibus debent hortos, praetoria, mensas.”

The hurdle was a sled on which a convicted criminal was drawn to the place of execution.

To be broken on the wheel was to be bound to a wheel and endure the breaking of one’s bones. Or a person could be tied up and an executioner would drop a heavy wheel on the person and break that person’s bones.

The Latin quotation, which is from Juvenile, Satire 1, line 75, means “To their crimes they owe their gardens, their palaces, and their tables.”

“You tell us wonders, Criticus,” Arete said.

Criticus replied:

“Tut, this is nothing.

“There stands a neophyte, glazing of his face — that is, making his face sleek — in preparation for when his idol — the woman he loves — enters, and repeats, like an unperfect prologue at third music, his part of speeches and confederate jests in passion — passionately — to himself.”

“An unperfect prologue at third music” is a prologue speaker who is imperfect — that is, he hasn’t memorized his lines properly. “Third music” was the signal for the speaker to begin saying his prologue at the beginning of a play.

“Confederate jests” are those that need a collaborator to set up the jest or witticism. An example of a confederate jest is the one about ciopinos in which Hedon needed the assistance of Anaides.

Criticus continued:

“Another swears his scene of courtship over, and then seems as if he would kiss away his hand in kindness.”

Courtiers would sometimes kiss their own hand.

Criticus continued:

“A third is most in action, swims and frisks, plays with his mistress’ paps, aka breasts, salutes her pumps, aka shoes, and will spend his patrimony — inheritance — for a garter, or the least feather in her bounteous fan.

“A fourth, he comes in only to act as a mute, divides the act with a dumb show, and exits.”

The acts of some Elizabethan plays were divided by a dumb show in which the actors did not speak. A mute is a character that does not speak.

Criticus continued:

“Then must the ladies laugh, but straightaway comes their scene, a six-times-worse confusion than the rest.

“Where you shall hear one woman talk about this man’s eye, another woman talk about his lip, a third woman talk about his nose, a fourth commend his leg, a fifth his foot, a sixth his hand, and everyone commends a limb, so that you would think the poor distorted gallant must there expire.

“Then they fall in discourse about tires — headdresses — and fashions: how and in which order of social prominence they must take their places, where they may kiss [!], and whom; when to sit down, and with what grace to rise; and if they greet someone, what courtesy they must use.

“They talk such cobweb stuff as would force the commonest sense to abhor the Arachnean workers.”

Arachne was a Greek woman who out of pride challenged the goddess Athena to a weaving contest. Arachne created a weaving with no flaws, and Athena turned her into a spider that created light, airy cobwebs.

The court ladies — the Arachnean workers — described by Criticus are proud and without substance.

Arete said:

“Have patience, Criticus.

“This knot of spiders will be soon dissolved, and all their webs swept out of Cynthia’s court when once her glorious deity appears and just presents herself in her full light.

“Until then, go in, and spend your hours with us your honored friends, Timè [Honor] and Phronesis [Prudence], in contemplation of our goddess’ name.”

The goddess’ name is Cynthia, and Arete, Timè, and Phronesis honored her and her name.

Arete then asked Criticus to create an entertainment to honor Cynthia.

Arete continued:

“Think on some sweet and choice artistic invention now that is worthy her serious and lustrous and illustrious eyes, so that from the merit of it we may take the desired occasion to prefer and promote your worth, and make your service known to Cynthia.

“It is the pride of Arete to grace her studious lovers, and in scorn of time, envy, and ignorance, to lift her studious lovers’ state and condition above a vulgar height.

“True happiness consists not in the multitude of friends, but in their worth and choice; nor would I have Virtue pursue a popular regard.

“Let them be good who love me, although they may be but few.”

Criticus said, “I kiss thy hands, divinest Arete, and vow myself to thee and Cynthia.”

— 3.5 —

Amorphus and Asotus talked together. A tailor was present who had brought Asotus the clothing he had ordered.

Amorphus said to Asotus, “A little more forward, so, sir.”

He meant, Look more confident.

He then said to Asotus, ‘Now, go in, take off your cloak yourself, and come forth.’”

Asotus exited.

Amorphus then said, “Tailor, bestow thy absence upon us, and be not prodigal of this secret except to a dear customer.”

Amorphus did not want news of Asotus’ new suit of clothing to get out before Asotus had made a grand appearance in the presence chamber.

The tailor exited, and Asotus returned.

Amorphus began to teach Asotus about courtly behavior and about wooing a court lady:

“It is well entered, sir — you are making a good entrance.

“Stay, you come on too fast; your pace is too impetuous.

“Imagine this to be the palace of your pleasure, or place where your lady is pleased to be seen. First, you present yourself, thus —”

He demonstrated.

Amorphus continued:

“— and, spying her, you fall off, aka withdraw, and walk some two turns around the area; in which time it is to be supposed your passion has sufficiently whited your face.

“Then, stifling a sigh or two and closing your lips, with a trembling boldness and bold terror, you advance yourself forward.

“Try thus much, I ask you to.”

Affected by his love for his lady, whoever she may be, when Asotus saw her, he was supposed to turn pale and tremble.

Asotus said, “Yes, sir, I pray to God that I can light on it and get it right. Here I come in, you say, and present myself?”

“Good,” Amorphus said.

“And then I spy her and walk off?” Asotus asked.

“Very good,” Amorphus said.

“Now, sir, I stifle a sigh and advance forward?” Asotus asked.

“Trembling,” Amorphus said.

Asotus replied, “Yes, sir, trembling. I shall do it better when I come to it. And what must I speak now?”

Amorphus answered, “By the Virgin Mary, you shall say, ‘Dear beauty,’ or ‘Sweet honor,’ or by what other title you please to remember her, ‘I think you are melancholy.’ This is what you will say if she is alone now and discompanied — without any company.”

“Well, sir, I’ll enter again,” Asotus said. “Her title shall be ‘My dear Lindabrides.’” “Lindabrides?” Amorphus asked.

Lindabrides was a character in a romance that Margaret Tyler translated as The Mirrour of Knighthood. Lindabrides was the Princess of Tartary.

Asotus explained, “Aye, sir, the Emperor Alicandro’s daughter, and the Prince Meridian’s sister, in The Knight of the Sun. She should have been married to him, except that the Princess Claridiana —”

Lindabrides is a kinda, but not quite a, bride. Asotus remembered that she was unlucky in love. In the romance, she spends a lot of time weeping.

“Lindabrides” is also known as a name for a mistress, in the sense of “lady-love.”

“Oh, you betray your reading,” Amorphus said.

One meaning of “betray” is “reveal.” Another is “be false to.”

Asotus said:

“Nay, sir, I have read history, I am a little humanitian.”

By “humanitian,” he meant “student of the humanities.”

Asotus continued:

“Don’t interrupt me, good sir.”

He then said what he would say to his loved one:

“My dear Lindabrides — my dear Lindabrides — my dear Lindabrides, I think you are melancholy.”

Amorphus said, “Aye, and take her by the rosy-fingered hand.”

Homer’s Odyssey refers to “rosy-fingered dawn.”

Asotus said:

“Must I do so?”

“Oh, ‘My dear Lindabrides, I think you are melancholy.’”

Amorphus said:

“Or say this, sir:

“May all variety of divine pleasures, choice sports, sweet music, rich fare, brave attires [outfits], soft beds, and silken thoughts attend this dear beauty.”

Asotus said:

“Believe me, that’s pretty!

“May all variety of divine pleasures, choice sports, sweet music, rich fare, brave attires [outfits], soft beds, and silken thoughts attend this dear beauty.”

Amorphus continued to offer wooing advice, using some military metaphors:

“And then, offering to kiss her hand, if she shall coyly recoil, and signify your repulse, you are to re-enforce yourself with these words:

“More than most fair lady, let not the rigor of your just disdain thus coarsely censure of your servant’s zeal’; and, in addition, profess her to be ‘the only and absolute unparalleled creature I — that is, you — ‘do adore, and admire, and respect, and reverence in this court, corner of the world, or kingdom.’”

“This is hard, by my faith,” Asotus said. “I’ll begin it all again.”

“Do so, and I will act the part of your lady,” Amorphus said.

Pleased, Asotus said:

“Will you grant me the favor of playing the lady, sir?”

In the character of the wooer, Asotus said:

“May all variety of divine pleasures, choice sports, sweet music, rich fare, brave attire, soft beds, and silken thoughts attend this dear beauty.”

In the character of the lady, Amorphus said:

“So, sir, please go away.”

In the character of the wooer, Asotus said:

“More than most fair lady, let not the rigor of your just disdain thus coarsely censure of your servant’s zeal. I say that you are the only and absolute unapparelled” —

“Unapparelled” “ means “naked.”

Amorphus corrected him, “Unparalleled.”

In the character of the wooer, Asotus said:

“Unparalleled creature, I do adore, and admire, and respect, and reverence in this court, corner of the world, or kingdom.”

Amorphus said:

“This is, if she abides — is waiting for — you.

“But now, let’s assume that she should be passant [passing by] when you enter, as thus” — he demonstrated — “then you are to frame your gait thereafter, and call upon her, ‘Lady, nymph, sweet refuge, star of our court.’”

“Then if she be guardant [on guard]” — he demonstrated — “you are to come on and, laterally disposing yourself, swear ‘by her blushing and well-colored cheek, the bright dye of her hair, her ivory teeth,’ or some such white and innocent oath to induce you.

“If she is reguardant [on guard and facing you]” — he demonstrated — “then maintain your station, brisk and irpe [typo for ‘ripe,’ aka mature], show the supple motion of your pliant body, but, in chief, of your knee and hand, which cannot but arride — gratify — her proud humor exceedingly.”

The situation may be that the lady is carefully looking at Asotus to see if he would be a good sex partner. He would show off his supple body, including the parts — knees and hands — that he would use to hold himself up in the missionary position. He would be making the case that he could gratify her by riding her and making her feel gratified and proud because she is wanted sexually.

Asotus said, “I conceive you, sir. I shall perform all these things in good time, I don’t doubt, they do so hit — impress — me.”

Amorphus said:

“Well, sir, I am your lady.

“Make use of any of these beginnings, or some other out of your own invention, and prove how you can hold up and follow it.

“Say, say.”

Asotus knelt and said, “Yes, sir.”

In the character of the wooer, Asotus began:

“My dear Lindabrides’ —”

Amorphus interrupted:

“No, you affect that Lindabrides too much, and, let me tell you, it is not so courtly. Your pedant — scholar — should provide you some parcels of French, or some pretty commodity of Italian to commence with, if you want to be exotic and exquisite.”

Asotus said, “Yes, sir, he was at my lodging the other morning; I gave him a doublet — a jacket.”

Amorphus responded:

“Double your benevolence, and give him the hose — the leggings — too. If you clothe his body, he will help to apparel your mind.

“But now, see what your proper genius — your own guiding spirit — can perform alone, without adjection — without the addition — of any other Minerva.”

“I understand, sir,” Asotus said.

Amorphus said, “I do stand — support — you, sir; fall back to your first place.”

Asotus stood up and assumed the first posture he had been taught.

Amorphus said, “Good, surpassingly well, very properly pursued.”

In the character of the wooer, Asotus said:

“Beautiful, ambiguous, and sufficient lady. What, are you all alone?”

“Ambiguous” and “sufficient” are poor words to use to compliment a lady.

In the character of the lady, Amorphus said:

“We would be, sir, if you would leave us.”

In the character of the wooer, Asotus began:

“I am at your beauty’s appointment, bright angel; but —”

In the character of the lady, Amorphus interrupted:

“But what?”

In the character of the wooer, Asotus said:

“No harm, more than most fair feature.”

“That touch relished well,” Amorphus said.

A “touch” is a hit in fencing.

In the character of the wooer, Asotus began:

“But, I protest’ —”

In the character of the lady, Amorphus interrupted:

“And why should you protest?”

In the character of the wooer, Asotus said:

“For good will, dear esteemed madam, and I hope Your Ladyship will so conceive of it — if ever you have seen great Tamburlaine.”

Tamburlaine was a violent man in Christopher Marlowe’s plays Tamburlaine, Part One and Tamburlaine, Part Two. If Tamburlaine wants a lady to conceive of something, or to conceive, the lady would be well advised to do it — out of fear.

Amorphus said:

“Oh, that line of blank verse was excellent! If you could pick out more of these play-particles, aka pieces of plays, and, as occasion shall greet you, embroider or damask — ornament — your discourse with them, persuade your soul, it would judiciously commend you.

“Come, this was a well-discharged and auspicious bout. Prove the second. Let have a second bout.”

In the character of the wooer, Asotus said:

“Lady, I cannot swagger it in black and yellow.”

Malvolio wears black clothes and yellow stockings in Shakespeare’s Twelfth Night. He thinks the yellow stockings are what the woman he wants to marry wants him to wear. They aren’t.

In the character of the lady, Amorphus said:

“Why, if you can revel it in white, sir, it is sufficient.”

In the character of the wooer, Asotus said:

“Say you so, sweet lady? Lan, tede de, de, dant, dant, dant, dante, etc. No, in good faith, madam, whosoever told your ladyship so, abused you; but I would be glad to meet your ladyship in a measure.”

A measure is a stately dance.

The English word “lante” means “bestows.” The Italian word tediante means “wearisome” and “boring.” Many ladies would likely think that Asotus’ wooing bestows wearisomeness and boredom.

In the character of the lady, Amorphus said:

“Me, sir? Perhaps you measure me by yourself, then?”

In the character of the wooer, Asotus said:

“I wish I might, fair feature.”

In the character of the lady, Amorphus said:

“And what were you the better, if you might?”

In the character of the wooer, Asotus said:

“The better it please you to ask, fair lady.”

Amorphus said:

“Why, this was ravishing, and most acutely continued.

“Well, don’t spend your humor too much; you have now competently exercised your conceit.

“This kind of exercise, once or twice a day, will render you an accomplished, elaborate, and well-levelled — poised — gentleman.

“Convey in your courting-stock — take me to the ladies; we will, in the heat of this, go visit the nymphs’ chamber.”

ACT 4 (The Fountain of Self-Love, or Cynthia's Revels)

— 4.1 —

Phantaste, Philautia, Argurion, Moria, and Cupid, who was still disguised as a page, were in a room together. The ladies were seated on chairs and couches. They were waiting for the water from the fountain to be brought to them.

“I wish this water would at once arrive that our travelling friend so commended to us,” Phantaste said.

“So would I, for he has left all of us in travail with expectation of it,” Argurion said.

“I pray to Jove that I will never rise from this couch if ever I thirsted more for a thing in my whole time of being a courtier,” Phantaste said.

A courtier is an attendant at court. Women can be courtiers. They can be ladies of the court.

Philautia said, “Nor will I, I’ll be sworn; the very mention of the water sets my lips in a worse heat than if he had sprinkled them with mercury.”

The chemical element mercury was used as a cosmetic. It could blister and cause a rash.

She then ordered her page, “Reach me the glass, sirrah.”

Cupid handed her a glass and said, “Here, lady.”

Moria asked, “Philautia, your lips don’t peel, sweet charge, do they?”

“Yes, they peel a little, guardian,” Philautia answered.

“Oh, it is an imminent good sign,” Moria said. “Whenever my lips peel, I am sure to have some delicious good drink or other approaching.”

Argurion said, “By the Virgin Mary, this sign may be a good sign for us ladies; for, it seems, the fountain water is far-fetched and fetched from afar by their delay in returning.”

“I bet my palate against yours, dear Honor, that the water shall prove to be most elegant, I assure you,” Moria said. “Oh, I do fancy this gear — this thing, the water — that’s long in coming, with an unmeasurable strain.”

Phantaste said:

“Please sit thee down, Philautia.

“That rebato — your stiff collar — becomes thee singularly.”

“Isn’t it quaint?” Philautia said.

“Yes, indeed,” Phantaste said.

She added, “I think thy servant Hedon is not at all as obsequious to thee as he used to be. I don’t know why, but he’s grown out of his garb — his clothing — lately. He’s warped.”

A “servant” in this context is a man who loves a woman and serves her.

“Warp” and “weft” are terms used in weaving.

Moria said, “In trueness, I think so, too. He’s much converted and changed.”

Philautia replied:

“Tut, let him be what he will; he is an animal I dream not of.

“This tire — headdress — I think, makes me look very ingenuously — that is, ingeniously — quick, and spirited; as if I should be some Laura or some Delia, I think.”

The Italian poet Petrarch loved Laura. He wrote about her in Rerum vulgarium fragmenta (Fragments of Vernacular Matters).

The poet Samuel Daniel wrote a sonnet sequence about Delia titled “To Delia.”

Moria said, “As I am wise, the fair honors that Philautia gave Hedon to be her Ambition spoiled him. Before, he was the most propitious and observant young novice —”

Phantaste interrupted:

“— no, no; you are the whole heaven awry, guardian. It is the swaggering tilt-horse — that Anaides — who draws with him there who has been the diverter of him.”

Phantaste thought that Anaides had corrupted Hedon, who then diverted his attention away from Philautia.

In Phantaste’s image, Hedon and Anaides are yoked together.

Tilt-horses are used in jousting tournaments.

Philautia said, “For Cupid’s sake, speak no more about him. I wish I might never dare to look in a mirror again if I ever respect a marmoset — small monkey — of them all, otherwise than I would respect a feather or my shuttlecock, to make fun and entertainment of now and then.”

Phantaste said:

“Come sit down.

“Indeed, if you are good beauties, let’s run over and discuss all of them — all the men — now.

“Which man is the properest — most handsome — man among them? I say the traveler, Amorphus.”

They looked at pictures of the male courtiers.

Philautia said, "Oh, fie on him. He looks like a Dutch trumpeter in the sea battle of Lepanto in the gallery yonder, and he speaks to the tune of a country lady who comes always in the rearward or train of a fashion."

"I should have judgment in a feature, sweet beauties," Moria said.

"A body would think so, at these years of yours," Phantaste said.

Moria was older than the other women present.

"And I prefer another now, far before him, a million at least," Moria said.

"Who might that be, guardian?" Phantaste asked.

"By the Virgin Mary, fair charge, I prefer Anaides," Moria answered.

Phantaste said:

"Anaides? You talked of a tune, Philautia.

"Anaides is one who speaks in a key, like the opening of some justice's gate or a post-boy's horn, as if his voice feared an arrest for some ill words it should give and were loath to come forth."

The gate of a justice may creak when it opens or when a key turns in its lock.

A post-boy's horn is loud.

Anaides the impudent courtier may be played by a boy-actor whose voice is breaking.

"Aye, and he has a very imperfect face," Philautia said.

“Like a squeezed orange: sour, sour,” Phantaste said.

Possibly, the boy-actor playing Anaides had acne.

“His hand’s too great, too, by at least a straw’s breadth,” Philautia said.

A puppy’s paws grow big before the rest of its body.

“He has a worse fault than that, too,” Phantaste said.

“A long heel?” Philautia asked.

Phantaste said:

“That would be a fault in a lady rather than him.”

The heel of the hand is the bottom of the palm. The heel pad is the fleshy part of the palm by the little finger.

According to a superstition, a man who has small hands also has a small penis. If Anaides has a long heel on his hand, he has a long penis.

Chances are, Phantaste was also talking about the heel of a foot.

According to a superstition, a man who has big feet also has a big penis.

Phantaste continued:

“No, they say he puts off the calves of his legs with his stockings every night.”

In other words, his stockings are padded so that he will seem to have powerful calves.

“Bah to him!” Philautia said. “Turn to another of the pictures, for God’s sake. What does Argurion say? Whom does she commend before the rest?”

Cupid said to himself, "I hope I have instructed her sufficiently for an answer."

Cupid had done what Cupid does: Make someone fall in love with someone else. In this case, he had made Argurion fall in love with Asotus.

Moria said, "Truly, I made the motion to her ladyship for one today in the presence, but it appeared she was other ways furnished before; she would none."

Moria had been trying to be a match-maker. She had been unsuccessful.

"Who was that, Argurion?" Phantaste asked.

"By the Virgin Mary, the little, poor, plain gentleman in the black there," Moria said.

Moria had wanted Argurion to fall in love with Criticus.

"Who, Criticus?" Phantaste asked.

"Aye, aye, he," Argurion said. "A fellow whom nobody so much as looked upon, or regarded, and she would have had me done him particular grace."

"That was a true trick of yourself, Moria, to persuade Argurion to affect and love the scholar," Phantaste said.

It really does seem sometimes that only Folly (Moria) could make Money (Argurion) fall in love with a Scholar (Criticus). Don't believe it? Ask a scholar if the scholar is wealthy.

"Tut, but she shall be no chooser for me," Argurion said. "In good faith, I like the citizen's son there, Asotus. I think none of the others come near him."

"Not Hedon?" Phantaste asked.

Argurion said:

“Hedon, indeed, no.

“Hedon’s a pretty slight courtier, and he wears his clothes well and sometimes in fashion; by the Virgin Mary, his face is but indifferent, and he has no such excellent body.

“No, the other one — Asotus — is a most delicate youth, a sweet face, a straight body, a well-proportioned leg and foot, a white hand, a tender voice.”

A white hand shows that Asotus does no outside work.

Asotus’ late father is Philargyrus, whose name is derived from the Greek word for “money-lover.”

Argurion’s name, of course, means “Silver,” aka “Money.”

“How are things now, Argurion?” Philautia asked.

“Oh, you should have let her alone,” Phantaste said. “She was bestowing a copy — a verbal portrait — of him upon us.”

“Why, she dotes more palpably upon him than his father ever did upon her,” Philautia said.

Phantaste said:

“Believe me, the young gentleman — Asotus — deserves it; if she could dote more, it would not be amiss. He is an exceedingly proper youth, and he would have made a most neat barber-surgeon, if he had been put to it in time.”

Gentlemen were not barber-surgeons.

“Do you say so?” Philautia said. “I think he looks like a tailor already.”

Gentlemen were not tailors.

“Aye, Asotus looks like a tailor who had assayed — tried — on one of his customers’ suits,” Phantaste said.

“Well, ladies, jest on,” Argurion said. “The best of you both would be glad of such a servant — such a male admirer.”

Moria said:

“Aye, I’ll be sworn they would. Go on, beauties, make much of time, and place, and occasion, and opportunity, and favorites, and things that belong to them, for I’ll ensure — assure — you that they will all relinquish and disappear; they cannot endure above another year.

“I know it out of future experience, and therefore take exhibition and warning: I was once a reveler myself, and although I am the one who says it, as my own trumpet, I was then esteemed —”

By her “future experience,” which can be an oxymoron, Moria meant her own past experience of the then-future, which was now the past.

“Exhibition” can mean 1) display, and 2) financial support.

Philautia finished Moria’s sentence: “— the very marchpane of the court, I say!”

“Marchpane” is the sweet treat known as marzipan.

“And all the gallants came about you like flies, didn’t they?” Phantaste teased.

Moria said:

“Bah. They did somewhat, but that doesn’t matter now.

“Here comes Hedon.”

Hedon, Anaides, and Mercury entered the scene. Mercury was disguised as a page. He served Hedon.

Hedon said:

“God save you, sweet and clear beauties! By the spirit that moves in me, you are all most pleasingly bestowed, ladies. Only I can take it for no good omen to find my Honor so dejected.”

Philautia called him “Ambition”; Hedon called her “Honor.”

They were pet names.

“You need not fear, sir,” Philautia said. “I did on purpose humble myself against your coming, to decline the pride of my Ambition.”

Hedon replied, “Fair Honor, Ambition dares not stoop; but if it should be your sweet pleasure, I shall lose that title. I will, as I am Hedon, apply myself to your bounties.”

“That would be the next way to distill myself — take away the title — of Honor,” Philautia said. “Oh, no, rather still be Ambition and ambitious, I ask you.”

If Hedon ceased to be Ambition, Philautia would cease to be Honor.

Hedon replied:

“I will be anything that you please while it pleases you to be yourself, lady.”

He then greeted the others:

“Sweet Phantaste, dear Moria, most beautiful Argurion —”

“Farewell, Hedon,” Anaides said.

“Anaides, stay!” Hedon said. “Where are you going?”

“By God’s light, what should I do here?” Anaides said. “If you engross them all for your own use, it is time for me to look elsewhere.”

“Them all” means “all the ladies.”

“Engross them all” can mean 1) take all their attention, or 2) buy all of them wholesale.

“I engross them?” Hedon said. “Away, mischief, this is one of your extravagant jests now because I began to salute and greet them by their names —”

Anaides said, “By my faith, you might have spared us Madam Prudence — Moria, the guardian there — although you had more covetously aimed at the rest.”

“By God’s heart, take them all, man!” Hedon said. “Why do you speak to me about aiming or being covetous?”

Anaides said:

“Aye, do you say so?”

“Nay, then, I’ll have a go at them.

“Ladies, here’s one who has distinguished you by your names already. It shall only become me to ask, ‘How do you do?’”

“By God’s soul, was this the design you travailed with?” Hedon asked.

Was this his opening move with the ladies?

And earlier, he had shown a lack of couth when referring to Hedon’s engrossing — buying — the ladies for his own use.

One meaning of “use” is “have sex with.”

The ladies were silent until Phantaste said, “Who answers the brazen head? It spoke to somebody.”

In legend, the magician Roger Bacon created a head out of bronze that spoke. Bacon was exhausted and so he was sleeping, and his foolish servant did not wake him up when the brazen head spoke. The Brazen Head spoke three times and was ignored each time, and then a supernatural hand destroyed it. Bacon had wanted the brazen head to tell him the secrets of the universe.

You can read the story in Robert Greene’s play Friar Bacon and Friar Bungay.

Phantaste’s point was that everyone was ignoring Anaides.

Anaides asked Moria, “Lady Wisdom, do you interpret — speak — for these puppets?”

He was calling the young ladies puppets because they were silent.

Moria chastised the young ladies:

“In truth and sadness, honors, you are in great offence for this. Bah!

“The gentleman (I’ll undertake to speak up for him) is a man of fair living [a good income], and able to maintain a lady in her two coaches a day, besides pages, monkeys, and paraquitos [parakeets], with such attendants as she shall think fitting for her turn; and therefore there is more respect requirable, howsoever you seem to connive and take no notice of him.”

Moria then chastised Anaides:

“Listen, sir, let me discourse a syllable with you. I am to say to you, these ladies are not of that close and open behavior as happily you may suspend.”

Chances are, Moria was trying to say, “I am saying to you that these ladies are not of that secret [close] and open-legged behavior as perhaps you may suspect.”

In other words, she was trying to say that these young ladies were not sexually promiscuous.

Moria continued:

“Their carriage is well known to be such as it should be, both gentle and extraordinary.”

“Carriage” can mean 1) how a person moves his or her head and body, and 2) the act of carrying or bearing something.

A woman can bear the weight of a man in the missionary position.

Mercury said, “Oh, here comes the other pair.”

— 4.3 —

Amorphus and Asotus entered the scene.

Amorphus said quietly to Asotus, “That woman was your father’s love, the nymph Argurion. I would have you direct all your courtship toward her; if you could but endear yourself to her affection, you were eternally engallanted — made a gallant.”

“Truly, sir?” Asotus said. “I pray to Phoebus Apollo that I prove favorsome — worthy of favor — in her fair eyes.”

Amorphus said to those present, “I wish all divine mixture and increase of beauty to this bright bevy of ladies; and to the male courtiers, I wish compliment and courtesy!”

Hedon replied, “In the behalf of the males, I gratify — thank — you, Amorphus.”

“And I of the females,” Phantaste said.

Amorphus replied, "Succinctly spoken. I do vail — bow — to both your thanks and kiss them, but primarily to yours, most ingenious, acute, and polite lady."

He bowed and kissed Phantaste's hands.

Amorphus had greeted Phantaste first, and that made Philautia jealous.

Philautia said, "God's my life, how he does so much to bequalify — give qualities to — her! Ingenious, acute, and polite? As if there were not others in place as ingenious, acute, and polite as she!"

"Yes," Hedon said, "but you must know, lady, he cannot speak outside of a dictionary method."

Phantaste comes alphabetically before Philautia.

Phantaste said, "Sit down, sweet Amorphus. When will this water come, do you think?"

"It cannot now be long, fair lady," Amorphus said.

Cupid said quietly to Mercury, "Now observe, Mercury."

Asotus and Argurion had been speaking privately, and Argurion had just let him know she loved him and had given him permission to love her.

Asotus said to Argurion, "What, most ambiguous beauty, love you? That I will, I swear by this handkerchief."

Mercury said quietly to Cupid, "By God's eyelid, he draws his oaths out of his pocket."

"But will you be constant and loyal to me?" Argurion asked.

Asotus replied:

"Constant, madam? I will not say for constantness, but I swear by this purse — which I would be loath to swear by unless it were embroidered — I state, you more than most fair lady, that you are the only absolute and unparalleled creature I do adore, and admire, and respect, and reverence in this court, corner of the world, or kingdom.

“I think you are melancholy.”

He was remembering Amorphus’ advice in 3.5 to tell the woman he loved that he thought she was melancholy, but a woman who has just acquired a boyfriend ought not to be melancholy.

Actually, Amorphus had told him to say, “I think you are melancholy,” only “if she be alone now and discompanied — without any company.”

“Does your heart speak all this?” Argurion asked.

“What did you say?” Asotus asked.

Mercury said quietly to Cupid, “Oh, he is groping for another oath.”

Asotus had not been listening to Argurion because he was trying to think of another oath.

Asotus said to Argurion:

“Now, by this watch —”

He said to himself:

“I marvel at how much forward and advanced the day is.”

Asotus said to Argurion:

“— I do unfeignedly vow myself —”

He said to himself:

“By God’s light, it is deeper and later than I took the time to be. It is past five.”

Asotus said to Argurion:

“— yours entirely addicted — devoted, madam.”

Argurion replied, “I require no more, dearest Asotus. Henceforth let me call you mine; and in remembrance of me, grant to me that you will wear this chain and this diamond.”

A chain is a necklace.

She presented him with the gifts.

“Oh, God, sweet lady,” Asotus said.

Cupid said quietly to Mercury:

“There are new oaths for him.”

Now Asotus could swear by the chain and the diamond.

Cupid continued:

“Doesn’t Hermes taste any alteration in all this?”

Mercury/Hermes said quietly to Cupid, “Yes, thou have struck Argurion enamored on Asotus, I think?”

Sarcastically, Cupid replied quietly, “Alas, no. I am nobody, I. I can do nothing in this disguise.”

He was not carrying a bow and arrows, but he had an arrow hidden on him. Readers find out later that he need not shoot someone with an arrow to make them fall in love; he can just brandish — wave — an arrow at them.

Recognizing the sarcasm, Mercury then asked quietly, “But thou have not wounded any of the rest, Cupid?”

Cupid replied quietly, “Not yet; it is enough that I have begun so prosperously.”

Argurion said to Asotus:

“Tut, these are nothing to the gems I will hourly bestow upon thee. Be but faithful and kind to me and I will lade — load — thee with my richest bounties.

“Behold, here, my bracelets from my arms.”

She offered him her bracelets.

“It shall not be so, good lady, I swear by this diamond,” Asotus said.

This was the diamond that she had just given to him.

Argurion said, “Take them; wear them; my jewels, chain of pearl, pendants, all I have.”

Asotus said, “Then, I swear by this pearl, you make me a wanton — you spoil me.”

This was one of the pearls in the chain — the necklace — she had just given to him.

Cupid whispered to Mercury, “Shall not she answer for this to maintain him thus in swearing?”

Asotus was swearing with each gift she gave him.

Mercury whispered to Cupid, “Oh, no, there is a way to wean him from this. The gentleman may be reclaimed.”

In other words, the gentleman may be made to not swear by her gifts.

Cupid whispered to Mercury, “Aye, if you had the airing of his apparel, coz, I think.”

Clothes were washed and then left in the air to dry. Thieves often stole drying clothing.

Mercury was a thief, and if he stole Asotus’ clothing, then Asotus would have no pockets to put Argurion’s gifts in and so Asotus would have no gifts to swear by.

In addition, since Mercury was a thief, if he stole the gifts that Argurion was giving to Asotus, then Asotus would have no gifts to swear by.

Argurion had just asked, quietly, whether Asotus would be loving to her.

Asotus replied, “Loving? It would be a pity I should be living if I were not loving to you, believe me.”

He said to Hedon, “God save you, sir.”

He then said:

“God save you, sweet lady.

“God save you, Monsieur Anaides.

“God save you, dear madam.”

Anaides asked, “Do thou know the man who saluted thee, Hedon?”

Hedon replied, “No, he is some idle fungoso, I promise you.”

A fungoso is a mushroom. The word was used for someone who seemed to rise high in society overnight.

“By God’s blood, I never saw him until this morning, and he greets me as familiarly as if we had known each other since the first year of the siege of Troy,” Anaides said.

The traditional date of the fall of Troy is 1184 B.C.E. Since the Trojan War lasted for 10 years, the first year of the siege was 1194 B.C.E.

Amorphus said, “A most right-handed and auspicious encounter. Confine yourself to your fortunes.”

The Latin word sinister means “left.” A right-handed encounter is a fortunate encounter.

Philautia proposed that they play a game while waiting for the water from the fountain to arrive: “For God’s sake, let’s have some riddles or purposes!”

In the game of purposes, each player whispers a question to the person who is next to him or her, and that person comes up with an answer. Then a question and an answer are stated out loud, but in such an order that the questions and the answers are not asked and answered in the correct order, so that the answers are at cross-purposes, often amusingly so, with the questions.

Phantaste said, “No, indeed, your prophecies are the best game; the other games are stale.”

Possibly, the game of prophecies was talked about in 2.2 when Hedon said, “I have ruminated upon a most rare — splendid — wish, too, and the prophecy to it, but I’ll have some friend to be the prophet, as thus: ‘I wish that I were one of my mistress’ ciopinos.’”

Philautia said:

“Prophecies? We cannot all sit in at them; we shall make a confusion.

“No, what did you call that game we played in the forenoon — the morning?”

“Substantives and adjectives,” Phantaste said. “Isn’t that right, Hedon?”

Substantives are nouns.

“I say aye to that game,” Philautia said. “Who begins?”

“I have thought of a substantive,” Phantaste said. “Speak your adjectives, sirs.”

“But don’t you change your substantive, then,” Philautia said.

“I won’t,” Phantaste said. “Who says the first adjective?”

“Odoriferous,” Moria said.

“Popular,” Philautia said.

“Humble,” Argurion said.

“White-livered,” Anaides said.

“Barbarous,” Hedon said.

“Pythagorical,” Amorphus said.

Hedon said to Asotus, “It’s your turn, signor.”

“What must I do, sir?” Asotus asked.

Amorphus answered, “Give forth your adjective with the rest; for example, prosperous, good, fair, sweet, well.”

Hedon added, “Any adjective that has not been spoken previously.”

“Yes, sir, ‘well-spoken’ shall be my adjective,” Asotus said.

“Have you all done?” Phantaste asked.

All answered, “Aye.”

Phantaste said:

“Then the substantive is ‘breeches.’

She asked Moria:

“Why odoriferous breeches, guardian?”

The game was for a player to silently think of a noun and for the other players to name out loud an adjective each. The first player then announces what the noun is, and the other players explain how their adjective modifies that noun.

Moria answered:

“Odoriferous, because odoriferous: That which contains most variety of savor and smell, we say is most odoriferous.

“Now, breeches I presume are incident to that variety, and therefore, odoriferous breeches.”

Breeches can smell differently before and after being washed. They can also smell differently if given to someone else who wears them. A fart can make breeches smell differently.

“Well, we must take it howsoever we can,” Phantaste said. “Who’s next? Philautia.”

Philautia said, “My adjective is ‘popular.’”

“Popular” can mean “common, or popular with commoners.” It can mean “not noble” and “vulgar.” An antonym of “popular” is “highbrow.”

Phantaste asked, “Why popular breeches?”

Philautia answered, “By the Virgin Mary, that is when they are not content to be generally noted in court, but will press forth on common stages and brokers’ stalls to the public view of the world.”

Common stages do not include Blackfriars, where this play by Ben Jonson was performed. Blackfriars was a private theater.

Brokers’ stalls are second-hand stalls.

“Good,” Phantaste said. “Why humble breeches, Argurion?”

Argurion answered, “They are humble, because they are accustomed to be sat upon. Besides, if you don’t tie them up, their property is to fall down about your heels.”

Having one’s breeches fall down in public can be a humbling experience.

Mercury said quietly to Cupid, “She has worn the breeches, it seems, which have done so.”

Mercury was joking that at some time Argurion had worn pants that had fallen down.

Some women wear the breeches in a relationship.

“But why white-livered?” Phantaste asked.

Anaides said:

“Why? By God’s heart, aren’t their linings white?”

Breeches can have white linings.

Anaides added:

“Besides, when they come in swaggering company, and will pocket up anything, may they not properly be said to be white-livered?”

Swaggerers were bullies, and their insults could be pocketed — cowardly endured. White-livered (or lily-livered) people were cowards.

Phantaste said:

“Oh, yes, we cannot deny it.

“And why barbarous, Hedon?”

Hedon answered, “Barbarous, because commonly when you have worn your breeches sufficiently, you give them to your barber.”

“That’s good,” Amorphus said. “But now Pythagorical.”

Pythagoras was a Greek philosopher who believed in reincarnation: the transmigration of souls from one body into another.

“Aye, Amorphus,” Phantaste said. “Why Pythagorical breeches?”

“Oh, most kindly of all, it is a conceit of that fortune I am bold to hug my brain for,” Amorphus said.

“What conceit — idea — is it, exquisite Amorphus?” Phantaste asked.

“Oh, I am rapt with it,” Amorphus said. “It is so fit, so proper, so happy.”

“Nay, do not rack us thus!” Philautia said.

In other words: Don’t torture us with anticipation.

Amorphus said, “I never truly relished myself before. Give me your ears: breeches are Pythagorical, by reason of their transmigration into several shapes!”

Different people could wear the breeches — the gallant first and then his barber — and so the breeches were transmigrated from one body into another. Since bodies differ, and clothes stretch and adapt to suit the wearer (clothes are more comfortable after they have been worn a few times), the trousers can transmigrate into different shapes.

“Most splendid, in sweet truth!” Moria said. “By the Virgin Mary, this young gentleman, for his well-spoken —”

Phantaste interrupted, “Aye — why well-spoken breeches?”

“Well-spoken?” Asotus said. “By the Virgin Mary, well-spoken because whatsoever they speak is well taken, and whatsoever is well taken, is well-spoken.”

Breeches speak when their wearer farts, and listeners tend to laugh. Laughter is good, and so the breeches are well-taken.

Breeches can also speak by proclaiming the wearer's social class. Gentlemen wear clothing different — better quality and more expensive — from the clothing farmers wear.

“This is excellent, believe me,” Moria said.

“Not so, ladies, neither,” Asotus said, modestly.

“But why breeches now?” Hedon asked.

Phantaste answered, “Breeches, quasi — as if — bear-riches; when a gallant bears all his riches in his breeches.”

Asotus had placed Argurion's gifts to him in his breeches' pockets.

Changing the subject, Philautia said, “In good faith, these unhappy pages would be — ought to be — whipped for staying away thus long.”

The pages were the people who had gone to get water from the fountain. They were taking a long time.

“Curse my hand and my heart else,” Moria said.

“I do wonder at their protracted absence,” Amorphus said.

“I pray to God that my whore has not discovered — revealed — herself to the rascally boys, and that is the reason of their stay and delay,” Anaides said.

His “whore” was Gelaia, a woman dressed in the clothing of a page. The boys were Prosaites and Cos. They were the pages bringing back the water.

“I must suit myself with another page,” Asotus said. “This idle Prosaites will never be brought to wait well.”

“Sir, I have a kinsman I could willingly wish to your service, if you would deign to accept him to your service,” Moria said.

She was talking about her relative becoming Asotus' page.

“And I shall be glad, most sweet lady, to embrace him,” Asotus said. “Where is he?”

“I can fetch him, sir, but I would be loath to make you turn away and fire your other page,” Moria said.

“You shall not, most sufficient lady. I will keep them both employed as my pages,” Asotus said. “Please, let's go and see him.”

“Whither goes my love?” Argurion asked Asotus.

“I'll return soon,” Asotus said. “I am going just to see a page with this lady.”

Asotus and Moria exited.

Anaides said about Gelaia, his page:

“As sure as fate, it is so. She has opened all — a pox on all cockatrices!”

“Cockatrices” are literally monsters that are also known as basilisks. They are figuratively prostitutes.

“Opened all” means 1) revealed all, and 2) opened both legs.

Anaides continued:

“Damn me if she has played loose with me. I'll cut her throat within a hair's breadth, so it may be healed again.”

Anaides was threatening to cut the skin of her throat, but he would not kill her.

He exited.

Mercury said quietly to Cupid, “What, is he jealous of his hermaphrodite?”

Anaides' "hermaphrodite" was Gelaia, who served Anaides as a page. She was female, but she was dressed as a male page.

Cupid whispered back, "Oh, aye, this will be excellent entertainment."

Philautia said:

"Phantaste, Argurion, what? You are sudden struck, I think."

"Struck" may be 1) wonderstruck, 2) struck silent, or 3) struck ill.

Philautia continued:

"For God's will, let's have some music until they come back with the water.

"Ambition, hand me the lyra, please."

Hedon said as he handed her a harp, "Anything to which my Honor shall direct me."

Philautia then said, "Come, Amorphus, cheer up Phantaste."

Earlier, Amorphus had greeted Phantaste before he had greeted Philautia.

Amorphus said:

"It shall be my pride, fair lady, to attempt all that is in my power.

"But here is an instrument that alone is able to infuse soul in the most melancholic and dull-disposed creature upon Earth.

"Oh, let me kiss thy fair knees!"

A knee can be an angular piece of wood, so he may be saying that he wanted to kiss the wooden musical instrument.

Amorphus asked Philautia:

Will you have ‘The Kiss,’ Honor?”

Philautia answered, “Aye, good Ambition.”

Hedon sang “The Kiss”:

“Oh, that joy so soon should waste!

“Or so sweet a bliss

“As a kiss,

“Might not forever last!

“So sugared, so melting, so soft, so delicious,

“The dew that lies on roses,

“When the morn herself discloses [discloses herself],

“Is not so precious.

“Oh, rather than I would it smother,

“Were I to taste such another;

“It should be my wishing

“That I might die kissing.”

Hedon then said:

“I made this ditty and the musical notes to it about a kiss that my Honor gave me.

“How do you like it, sir?”

Amorphus answered, “It is a pretty air! In general, I like it well. But, in particular, your long ‘die’ note did arride — gratify — me most, but it was somewhat too long. I can show one almost of the same nature but much before it, and not so long, in a composition of my own. I think I have both the note and ditty about me.”

The “die” note is the note on which the word “die” is sung.

Hedon said, “Sir, see if you have it.”

Amorphus produced a paper and said:

“Yes, there is the note and all the parts, if I am not misthinking — mistaken.

“I will read the ditty to your beauties here, but first I will make you familiar with the occasion, which presents itself thus:

“Once upon a time, going to take my leave of the Emperor and kiss his great hands, there being then present the Kings of France and Aragon, the Dukes of Savoy, Florence, Orleans, Bourbon, Brunswick, the Landgrave, Count Palatine — all of which had individually feasted me — besides an infinite number more of inferior persons, such as Earls and others — it was my chance, the Emperor being detained by some other affair, to wait for him the fifth part of an hour, or much near it.

“In which time, retiring myself into a bay-window, I encountered the Lady Annabel, niece to the Empress and sister to the King of Aragon, who, having never before eyed me but only heard the common report of my virtue, learning, and travel, fell into that extremity of passion for my love that she there immediately sounded — that is, swooned — that is, fainted.

“Physicians were sent for; she had recourse to her chamber; so to her bed, where languishing some few days, after many times calling upon me, with my name in her mouth, she expired and died.

“As that, I must necessarily say, is the only fault of my fortune, that as it has always been my hap — my luck — to be sued to by all ladies and beauties where I have come, so I never yet sojourned or rested in that place or part of the world where some great and admirable fair creature did not die for my love — die out of love for me.”

Mercury said quietly to Cupid, “Oh, the sweet power of travel! Are you guilty of this, Cupid?”

Cupid quietly replied, “No, Mercury; and that his page, Cos, knows, if he were here present to be sworn.”

In other words, Amorphus was lying.

Philautia asked Amorphus, “But how does this draw on the ditty, sir? What does it have to do with the story?”

Mercury said quietly to Cupid, “Oh, she is too quick with him. He has not devised an answer for that yet.”

Mercury was wrong.

Amorphus said to Philautia, “By the Virgin Mary, some hour before she departed, she bequeathed to me this glove” — he displayed the glove — “which the Emperor himself took care to send after me, in six coaches, covered all with black velvet, attended by the stately principal people of his empire; all of which he freely gave me, and I reciprocally (out of the same bounty) gave it to the lords who brought it; only reserving, and respecting, this glove — the gift of the deceased lady — upon which I composed this ode, and set it to my most affected — loved — instrument, the lyra.”

Amorphus read out loud the lyrics to his song about a lady’s glove:

“Thou more than most sweet glove,

“Unto my more sweet love,

“Suffer [Allow] me to store with kisses

“This empty lodging, that now misses

*“The pure rosy hand that ware [wore] thee, “Whiter than the kid [baby goat] that bare [bore] thee.
“Thou art [are] soft, but that was softer;
“Cupid’s self hath [has] kissed it ofter [oftener],
“Than e’er [ever] he did his mother’s doves,
“Supposing her the Queen of Love’s,
“That [Who] was thy mistress,
“Best of gloves.”*

Doves were sacred to Venus: They pulled her chariot, sometimes assisted by swans.

Mercury said to Cupid, “Blasphemy, blasphemy, Cupid!”

Amorphus had said that Cupid had kissed the lady’s glove more often than he had ever kissed his mother’s doves.

Cupid replied quietly, “Aye, I’ll revenge it time — soon — enough, Hermes.”

“Good Amorphus, let’s hear it sung,” Philautia requested.

“I am not concerned negatively about doing that, since it pleases Philautia to request it,” Amorphus said.

“Here, sir,” Hedon said, offering him the harp.

“Nay, you play it, please,” Amorphus said, declining to take the harp. “You do well, you do well.”

Amorphus sang his lyrics while Hedon played.

Amorphus then asked, “How do you like it, sir?”

“Very well, indeed,” Hedon said.

Amorphus said:

“Only ‘very well’? Oh, you are a mere mammothrept in judgment then!”

“Mammothrept” can mean 1) a spoiled child, or 2) a severe critic.

Amorphus continued:

“Why, don’t you observe how excellently the ditty is affected — good — in every place?”

“Don’t you observe that I do not marry a word of short quantity [time] to a long note, nor an ascending syllable to a descending tone?”

“Besides, upon the word ‘best’ there, you see how I do enter with an odd minim and drive it through the breve, which no intelligent musician I know but will affirm to be very rare, extraordinary, and pleasing.”

Quantity [time] can be long or short.

A breve is a musical note four times the length of a minim.

One wonders how Hedon could play the tune: He must have practiced it ahead of time. Amorphus must have planned to sing the song to the ladies at some time.

Amorphus’ criticism of Hedon is unjustified because Hedon had helped him by playing the harp.

Mercury said quietly to Cupid, “And yet the song is not fit to lament the death of a lady for all this.”

As the inventor of the harp, Mercury has some knowledge of music.

Cupid replied quietly, “Tut, here are people who will swallow anything.”

“Please, let me have a copy of it, Amorphus,” Phantaste requested.

“And me, too,” Philautia requested. “Indeed, I like it exceedingly.”

“I have denied it to princes; nevertheless, to you, the true female twins of perfection, I am won over to depart with it,” Amorphus said.

Amorphus gave sheets of paper containing the lyrics to Philautia and Phantaste.

He was prepared to give away copies of the song: This was more evidence that the song’s performance was pre-planned.

“I hope I shall have my Honor’s [Philautia’s] copy,” Hedon said.

“You are ambitious in that, Hedon,” Phantaste said.

Hedon was Ambition to Philautia’s Honor.

Anaides entered the scene. He seemed upset.

“How are you now, Anaides?” Amorphus asked. “What is it that has conjured up this distemperature in the circle of your face?”

“By God’s blood, what have you to do with it?” Anaides said. “A pox of God on your filthy travelling beard! Hold your tongue.”

“Have you heard some evil?” Hedon asked Anaides.

“Go away, musk-cat!” Anaides said.

Musk-cats stank, although their musk was made into perfume. Sometimes, wearing too much perfume makes a person stink.

“I say to thee, thou are rude, impudent, coarse, impolished, aka unpolished or badly polished; a frapler, and base,” Amorphus said.

A frapler is a blusterer.

Hedon said to himself, “By the heart of my father, what a strange alteration has half a year’s haunting of ordinaries wrought in this fellow! He came with a tuftaffeta jacket to town just the other day, and now he has turned into Hercules; he lacks only a club!”

Tuftaffeta is tufted taffeta.

The great PanHellenic hero Hercules carried a club.

“Sir, I will garter my hose with your guts and that shall be all,” Anaides said.

He exited.

Mercury said quietly to Cupid, “By God’s eyelid, what splendid fireworks are here? Flash! Flash!”

“What’s the matter with Anaides, Hedon?” Phantaste asked. “Can you tell?”

Hedon replied, “I can guess nothing except that he lacks money, and he thinks we’ll lend him some to be friends.”

Asotus, Moria, and Morus entered the scene.

The name “Morus” means “Simpleton.”

He was Moria’s nephew, and Asotus had just hired him to be his second page.

Asotus, who had asked Moria for her picture and had given her a gift and had made promises to her, said to her:

“Come, sweet lady, in good truth I’ll have it, you shall not deny me.”

He then said:

“Morus, persuade your aunt to give me her picture, by any means necessary.”

Morus said:

“Yes, sir.”

He then said to Moria:

“Good aunt, now, let him have it. He will treat me the better, so if you love me, do give him your picture, good aunt.”

“Well, tell him he shall have it,” Moria said.

Morus said to Asotus, “Master, you shall have it, she says.”

“Shall I?” Asotus said. “Thank her, good page.”

Cupid whispered to Mercury, “What, has he entertained — hired — the fool?”

Mercury whispered back, “Aye, he’ll wait close by him, you shall see, although the beggar — Prosaites — hang off at a distance.”

Morus said to Moria, “Aunt, my master thanks you.”

“Call him to come here,” Moria said.

“Yes,” Morus said.

He then called, “Master!”

Moria said, “Yes, in very truth, and he gave me this purse, and he has promised me a most fine dog that he will have drawn with my picture, and he desires most vehemently to be known to Your Ladyships.”

Moria liked dogs.

Phantaste said, “Call him to come here; it is good groping — examining and exploiting — such a gull.”

A gull is a fool.

Moria called, “Master Asotus! Master Asotus!”

Asotus said to Argurion, who loved him, “For God’s sake, let me go. You see I am called to the ladies.”

“Will thou forsake me, then?” Argurion asked.

“By God’s soul, what would you have me do?” Asotus asked.

Moria called:

“Come here, Master Asotus.”

She then said to the ladies:

“I do ensure — assure — Your Ladyships that he is a gentleman of a very worthy desert and of a most bountiful nature.”

Moria said to Asotus:

“You must show and insinuate yourself responsible and equivalent now to my commendment.”

She then said to the ladies:

“Good honors, grace him.”

Asotus recited part of a speech he had practiced with Amorphus in 3.5:

“I protest, more than most fair ladies, I do wish all variety of divine pleasure, choice entertainment, sweet music, rich fare, brave attires, soft beds, and silken thoughts attend these fair beauties.”

Asotus then said to Phantaste:

“Will it please Your Ladyship to wear this chain of pearl, and this diamond for my sake?”

He presented her with the pearl necklace and diamond that Argurion had given to him earlier to remember her by.

“Oh!” Argurion said.

Asotus then said to Philautia:

“And I present to you, madam, this jewel and pendants.”

He presented her with a jewel and some pendants that Argurion had given to him earlier to remember her by.

“Oh!” Argurion said.

Phantaste said, “We don’t know how to deserve these bounties out of so slight merit, Asotus.”

Who has the slight merit? The ladies? Asotus? Both?

“No, indeed, but there’s my glove for a favor,” Philautia said.

She offered him a glove.

“And soon after the revels I will bestow a garter on you,” Phantaste said.

Asotus replied:

“Oh, Lord, ladies, it is more grace than ever I could have hoped, but that it pleases Your Ladyships to extend. I protest it is enough that you just take knowledge of my — if Your Ladyships want embroidered gowns, tires [headdresses] of any fashion, rebatoes [stiff collars], jewels, or carcanets [ornamental collars or necklaces], anything whatsoever, if you vouchsafe to accept.”

Hmm. To “just take knowledge of my —” The Bible sometimes mentions a particular kind of knowledge.

Cupid whispered to Mercury, “And for it they will help you to shoe-ties and devices.”

Asotus was giving the ladies big gifts such as pearls and diamonds, and they were giving him the small gift of a glove and the promise of a small gift of a garter.

A shoe-tie is a ribbon to be worn as a decoration on shoes.

“Devices” are tricks.

Asotus said, “I cannot express myself well, dear beauties, but you can conceive —”

Yes, they can become pregnant.

“Oh!” Argurion said.

“Sir, we will acknowledge your service, fear not,” Phantaste said. “Henceforth, you shall be no more ‘Asotus’ to us but our goldfinch, and we shall be your cages.”

The word “finch” can mean “fool.” Asotus is their goldfinch: a fool who gives his gold away.

“Oh, God, madams, how shall I deserve this?” Asotus said.

He then said to himself:

“If I were only made acquainted with Hedon now! I’ll try.”

He said to Argurion, who loved him, “Please, go away.”

Mercury whispered to Cupid, “How he prays Money to go away from him!”

Asotus said quietly, “Amorphus, let me have a word with you. Here’s a watch I would bestow upon you. Please make me known to that gallant.”

Amorphus said quietly, “That I will, sir.”

He then said out loud, “Monsieur Hedon, I must entreat you to exchange knowledge with this gentleman.”

To exchange knowledge meant to get to know each other.

“It is a thing, next to the water we expect, I thirst after, sir. Good Monsieur Asotus,” Hedon said.

Asotus said:

“Good Monsieur Hedon, I would be glad to be loved and respected by men of your rank and spirit, I declare.

“Please accept this pair of bracelets, sir; they are not worth the bestowing.”

The bracelets were those Argurion had earlier given to him.

Asotus offered Hedon the gifts.

Mercury whispered to Cupid, “Oh, Hercules, how the gentleman purchases! This must necessarily bring Argurion to a consumption.”

Cupid had much power, as did Hercules. He had made Argurion love Asotus, and now Argurion was suffering because of her love for Asotus.

Asotus was attempting to purchase friends.

Ironically, the phrase “to purchase” at this time also meant “to become rich,” Asotus was becoming poorer, but his “friends” were becoming richer.

Consumption is a wasting-away disease.

Argurion — Money — was wasting away because Asotus was giving away all the wealth that she had given to him to remember her by.

“Sir, I shall never stand in the merit of such bounty, I fear,” Hedon said.

In other words, he did not deserve such valuable gifts.

Asotus replied, “Oh, Lord, sir, your acquaintance shall be sufficient. And if at any time you need my bill or my bond —”

He was willing to make legal agreements that could result in his paying the expenses and debts of a man to whom he had just been introduced: Hedon.

“Oh! Oh!” Argurion said.

She fainted.

“Help the lady there!” Amorphus said.

“God’s dear, Argurion!” Moria said. “Madam, how are you?”

“Sick,” Argurion said.

“Take her forth and give her air,” Phantaste said.

“I will come back again straightaway, ladies,” Asotus said.

Mercury whispered to Cupid, “Well, I doubt all the physic — medicine — he has will scarcely recover her; she’s too far spent.”

Asotus and Morus helped Argurion to leave the scene.

— 4.4 —

Anaides, Gelaia, Cos, and Prosaites entered the scene. They were carrying bottles filled with water from the Fountain of Self-Love. Anaides and Gelaia had been arguing.

Philautia said:

“Oh, here’s the water come.

“Fetch some glasses, page.”

Gelaia said to Anaides, “Heart of my body, here’s a coil — a fuss — indeed with your jealous humors and moods. Nothing but ‘whore,’ and ‘bitch,’ and all the villainous swaggering names you can think of to call me! By God’s eyelid, take your bottle and put it in your guts for all I care, I’ll see you poxed — infected with syphilis — before I follow you any longer!”

One way for Anaides to put his bottle in his guts would be for him to stick it up his —

“Nay, good punk, sweet rascal,” Anaides said. “Damn me if I am jealous now.”

A “punk” is a prostitute, but Anaides may now be using the word affectionately.

“That’s true indeed,” Gelaia said.

She then said, “Please, let’s go.”

To whom was she speaking? Anaides? Or Moria?

“What’s the matter there?” asked Moria, who was Gelaia’s mother.

Gelaia replied, “By God’s light, he has me upon interrogatories — he keeps asking me questions.”

She said to Anaides, “Nay, my mother shall know how you treat me.”

She said to her mother, “He asks where I have been? And why I should stay so long? And how is it possible? And in addition he calls me at his pleasure I don’t know how many cockatrices and things.”

“Cockatrices” are prostitutes.

Moria said, “In truth and sadness, these are no good epithets, Anaides, to bestow upon any gentlewoman; and, I’ll ensure — assure — you, if I had known you would have dealt thus with my daughter, she should never have fancied you as deeply as she has done. Go to!”

Go to where? Hell?

“Why, do you hear, Mother Moria?” Anaides said. “By God’s heart!”

“Nay, please, sir, do not swear,” Moria said.

Anaides replied, “Swear? Why, by God’s blood, I have sworn before now, I hope. Both you and your daughter mistake me. I have not honored Arete, who is held the worthiest lady in the court (next to Cynthia), with half that observance and respect as I have done her in private, howsoever outwardly I have carried myself careless — without cares and worries — and negligent.”

He then said to Gelaia, “Come, you are a foolish punk and don’t know when you are well employed. Kiss me. Come on. Do it, I say!”

Moria said, “Nay, indeed I must confess that Gelaia is apt to misprision — misapprehension and misunderstanding.”

She then said to Anaides, “But I must have you stop what you are doing, minion.”

The meaning of the word “minion” can be good or bad. The word can mean “darling” or “favorite,” or it can mean “slave” or “underling.”

Asotus entered the scene.

Seeing him, Amorphus asked, “How are you now, Asotus? How is the lady Argurion doing?”

“Indeed, she is ill,” Asotus said. “I have left my page with her at her lodging.”

His page was Morus, who had helped him assist Argurion.

Hedon drank some of the water.

“Oh, here’s the rarest and most splendid water that ever was tasted,” Hedon said.

He then said to Prosaites, Asotus’ first page, “Fill a glass with some water for him.”

The water was for Asotus.

Prosaites whispered to Mercury, “What? Has my master a new page?”

Mercury whispered back, “Yes, a kinsman of the Lady Moria’s. You must serve your master better now or you are cashiered — fired, Prosaites.”

“Come, gallants, you must pardon my foolish humor,” Anaides said. “When I am angry that anything crosses me, I grow impatient straightaway. Here, I drink to you.”

He drank.

Philautia said, “Oh, I wish that we had five or six bottles more of this liquor!”

“Now, I commend your judgment, Amorphus,” Phantaste said.

A knock sounded on the door.

Phantaste asked, “Who’s that who is knocking? Go and see, page.”

Cupid went to the door.

“Oh, this water is most delicious!” Moria said. “A little of this would make Argurion well.”

Phantaste said, “Oh, no, give her no cold drink, by any means.”

“Slud — by God’s blood, this water is the spirit of wine — I’ll be hanged if it isn’t,” Anaides said.

All the courtiers present — male and female — had drunk the water.

“Here’s the Lady Arete, madam,” Cupid said.

— 4.5 —

Arete entered the scene.

“What, at your beverages, gallants?” Arete said.

“Will it please Your Ladyship to drink?” Moria asked. “It is water from the new fountain.”

The new fountain was, of course, the Fountain of Self-Love.

Arete, whose name means “Virtue” and “Excellence,” said:

“Not I, Moria, I thank you.

“Gallants, you must provide some solemn — ceremonial — revels tonight. Cynthia is minded to come forth and grace your entertainments with her presence.

“Therefore, I could wish there were something extraordinary to entertain her.”

“What do you say to a masque?” Amorphus asked.

A masque is an informal court entertainment such as a dance with the dancers wearing masks. Or it could be an allegorical tableau in which the allegorical characters wear masks. Or both.

Hedon said, “Nothing is better, if the invention or project is new and splendid.”

“Why, I’ll send for Criticus and have his advice,” Arete said.

She said to Phantaste, “You will be ready in your endeavors?”

“Yes, but won’t Your Ladyship stay for a while?” Phantaste asked.

“Not now, Phantaste,” Arete said.

She exited.

“Let her go, please,” Philautia said. “That good Lady Sobriety, I am glad we are rid of her.”

All too often, Virtue and Excellence are not liked and respected.

“What a set face the gentlewoman has, as if she were always going to a sacrifice!” Phantaste said.

“Oh, she is the extraction of a dozen of Puritans for a look,” Philautia said.

“Of all nymphs in the court I cannot tolerate her; it is the coarsest thing —” Moria said.

Arete and Moria — Virtue/Excellence and Folly — do not go together.

Philautia said, “I wonder how Cynthia can love her so above the rest! Here are nymphs who are in every way as fair as she, and a thought fairer, I am sure.”

“Aye, and as ingenious and conceited — filled with conceits, aka ideas — as she,” Phantaste said.

“Aye, and as politic as she, for all she sets such a forehead on it,” Moria said. “She makes a show that she is opposed to it.”

Politic people scheme to get their way.

“I would wish I were dead if I would change to be Cynthia!”
Philautia said.

One must be filled with Self-Love to not want to be more like Cynthia — or like Arete.

“Or I,” Phantaste said

“Or I,” Moria said.

Phantaste and Moria were saying that they also would wish to be dead if they would change to be Cynthia, but it sounded as if they were saying that Philautia would wish she were dead if she would change to be more like them.

Amorphus said, “And there’s her minion — her darling — Criticus; why is his advice worth more than Amorphus’ advice? Haven’t I invention before him? Learning, to better that invention, above him? And travail —”

Anaides interrupted:

“— by Death, why are you talking about his ‘learning’? He understands no more than a schoolboy.

“I have put him down myself a thousand times, I swear by this air, and yet I never talked with him but twice in my life.

“You never saw his like; I could never get him to argue with me but once, and then, because I could not construe a piece of Horace at first sight, he went away and laughed at me.

“By God’s will, I scorn him, as I do the sodden nymph who was here just now, his mistress Arete, and I love myself for nothing else.”

Apparently, Criticus declines to argue with Anaides because he does not respect Anaides.

Hedon said, “I wonder why the fellow does not hang himself, being thus scorned and contemned — regarded with contempt — by us who are held the most accomplished society of gallants!”

Mercury whispered to Cupid, “That is, ‘held the most accomplished society of gallants’ by themselves, and by no one else.”

Hedon said, “I declare, if I had no music in me, no courtship, if I were not a reveler and could dance, or had not those excellent qualities that give a man life and perfection, but instead I were a mere poor scholar as he is, I think I should make some desperate way — and make away — with myself; whereas now, I wish that I might never breathe more if I do know that creature in this kingdom with whom I would exchange selves.”

Hedon so loved himself that he wished to be no other person than himself. The same was true of all the others who drank water from the Fountain of Self-Love. No wonder none of the ladies liked Arete or wished to be Cynthia.

One characteristic of Self-Love is looking down on other people.

Self-Love is different from Proper Pride, which is pride of oneself that is reasonable and justifiable.

Proper Pride builds oneself up by doing things to be proud of; Self-Love builds oneself up by tearing others down.

Cupid whispered to Mercury, “This is excellent entertainment! Well, I must alter this soon.”

Mercury whispered back, “Be sure that you do, Cupid.”

Asotus said:

“Oh, I shall tickle it soon. I did never appear until then. By God’s eyelid, I am the neatest-made gallant in the company and have the best presence; and my dancing — I know what the usher said to me the last time I was at the school.

“I wish that I might lead Philautia in the measure, if it would be God’s will! I am most worthy, I am sure.”

Morus, Asotus’ new page, entered the scene and said, “Master, I can tell you news: The lady kissed me yonder, and played with me, and says she loved you once as well as she does me, but that you cast her off.”

Fortune favors fools.

The lady was Argurion.

“Peace, my most esteemed page,” Asotus said. “Be quiet.”

“Yes,” Morus said.

Amorphus said, “Gallants, think upon your time, and take it by the forehead.”

Time (and opportunity) must be seized by the forelock; she is bald except for the forelock. Once time (and opportunity) have passed by you, you cannot seize them.

Amorphus then said, “Anaides, we must mix this gentleman with you in acquaintance, Monsieur Asotus.”

Anaides said, “I am easily entreated to grace any of your friends, Amorphus.”

“Sir, and his friends shall likewise grace you, sir,” Asotus said. “Nay, I begin to know myself now.”

“To know thyself” is something good, but one can wonder whether Asotus really knows himself.

Amorphus whispered to Asotus, “Oh, you must continue your bounties.”

In other words: You must continue to give away valuable items.

Asotus whispered back, "Must I? Why, I'll give him this ruby on my finger."

"Come, ladies," Hedon said. "But wait, we shall want one to lady it — act as a lady — in our masque in place of Argurion."

"Why, my page — Gelaia — shall do it," Anaides said.

"In truth, and he'll do it well," Hedon said. "It shall be so."

Hedon apparently did not know that Gelaia was a young woman dressed in the clothing of a page.

Hedon, Phantaste, Philautia, Moria, Gelaia, and Amorphus exited.

Asotus said to Anaides, "Do you hear, sir? I heartily wish your acquaintance, and I partly know myself worthy of it. Please you, sir, to accept this poor ruby in a ring, sir. The poesy is of my own device: 'Let this blush for me,' sir."

Asotus offered him a ruby ring.

"So it must blush for me, too," Anaides said. "For I am not ashamed to take it."

He took the ruby ring and exited.

Morus said:

"Sweet man, by my truth, master, I love you; will you love me, too, for my aunt's sake? I'll serve you well, you shall see, I'll still be here.

"I wish I might never stir, but you are in gay clothes."

Morus wanted Asotus' clothes as a gift.

“As for that, Morus, thou shall see more hereafter,” Asotus said.

Perhaps Asotus was planning to strip off his clothes later so he could give them away.

He looked in his pockets, found nothing of value — he had given much or all of his wealth away — and said, “In the meantime, by this air, or by this feather, I’ll do as much for thee as any gallant shall do for his page whatsoever, ‘in this court, corner of the world, or kingdom.’”

Everyone except for the pages — Mercury, Cupid, Prosaites, Cos, and Morus — exited.

Mercury said, “I marvel that this gentleman Asotus should affect to keep a fool; I think he makes entertainment enough with himself.”

Some fools, aka Fools, are jesters. Other fools are fools.

Cupid said, “Well, Prosaites, it would be good if you waited closer at hand to your master.”

“Aye, I’ll look to it,” Prosaites said. “It is time.”

“We are likely to have sumptuous revels tonight, sirs,” Cos said.

Mercury said, “We must necessarily have sumptuous revels, when all the choicest singularities — the most notable people — of the court are up in pantofles; never a one of them but is able to make a whole show of itself.”

“Up in pantofles” can mean 1) standing on shoes with thick, built-up soles, or 2) standing on one’s dignity.

Hedon called from another room, “Sirrah, a torch! A torch!”

“Oh, what a call is there!” Mercury said. “I will have a canzonet — a short song — made with nothing in it but ‘sirrah’; and the burden — the refrain — shall be ‘I am coming.’”

Everyone exited.

— 4.6 —

Arete and Criticus talked together about the masque. They were virtuous courtiers who were not guilty of Self-Love.

Criticus, who opposed having the masque, said:

“A masque, bright Arete?

“Why, it would be a labor more for Hercules.

“Better and sooner would I dare undertake to make the different seasons of the year, the winds, or the elements to sympathize, than undertake to make their (the self-loving courtiers’) unmeasurable (that is, immeasurable, and unable to dance the measures of songs) vanity dance truly in a measure.

“They agree?

“So what if all concord is borne of contraries? So many follies will prove to be confusion and destruction, and like a group of jarring instruments, all out of tune.

“Why? Because, indeed, we see that there is not that analogy between discords as between things that are completely opposite.”

Harmony can come from dissimilar sounds, but no such harmony can come from the self-loving courtiers because they are so similar in their Self-Love.

Making these self-loving courtiers harmonize is a labor worthy of Hercules, who performed twelve nearly impossible-to-accomplish labors.

Arete, who wanted the vain courtiers to participate in Cynthia's revels, said:

“There is your error. For Hermes' wand charms the disorders of tumultuous ghosts — one of Mercury's responsibilities is to lead the ghosts of the dead to the Underworld — and the strife of Chaos then did cease when better light than Nature's did arrive.

“Just like those two examples, what could never in itself agree forgets the eccentric property and turns forthwith regular at the sight of her whose scepter guides the flowing ocean.”

In Ptolemaic astronomy, an eccentric orbit is one whose exact center is not the Earth.

Cynthia is goddess of the Moon, and she has power over the tides. Queen Elizabeth I, whom Cynthia often represents in poetry written during Elizabeth's reign, had much sea power.

Just the sight of Cynthia ought to turn the vain courtiers away from their vanity and toward Proper Pride.

Arete continued:

“And even if the sight of Cynthia does not work its transformative magic on the self-loving courtiers, yet respect of majesty, the place, and the presence of Cynthia will keep most of them, being either courtiers or not wholly rude, within ring — within limits.

“This is true especially when they are not presented as themselves, but are masked like others. For, in truth, not so to incorporate them — that is, make them into a team, or make them a new body — could be nothing else than 1) like a state ungoverned, without laws, or 2) a body made of nothing but diseases.

“The one state would be through impotency poor and wretched.

“The other state would be, because of the anarchy, absurd.”

Criticus next argued that people other than the vain courtiers ought to participate in Cynthia’s revels:

“But lady, for the revelers themselves it would be better, in my poor conceit — understanding and opinion — that others would be employed to participate in the revels; for such as are unfit to be in Cynthia’s court can seem no less unfit to be in Cynthia’s entertainments.”

Arete then argued that Cynthia had a particular purpose for holding her revels, and that purpose was to create a reformation:

“That is not done, my Criticus, without particular knowledge of the goddess’ mind.

“Cynthia, who holds true intelligence and information about what follies have crept into her palace, has resolved on holding entertainments and triumphs; under that pretext, she has resolved to have them muster in their pomp and fullness, so that she might more strictly and to the root effect the reformation she intends.”

Convinced by Arete’s words, Criticus agreed to do what Arete and Cynthia wished him to do:

“I now conceive Cynthia’s heavenly drift in all, and I will apply my spirits to serve thy will.

“Oh, thou, you are the very power by which I am, and but for which it would be in vain to be.

“You are chief and are second only to Diana.

“You are virgin, heavenly fair, admired Arete, admired by them whose souls are not enkindled — set on fire with lust — by the senses ...

“Disdain not my chaste fire, but feed the flame

“Devoted truly to thy gracious name!”

Arete replied:

“Leave — cease — to suspect us. Criticus shall find

“As we are now most dear, we’ll prove most kind.”

A voice from another room called, “Arete!”

Arete said, “Listen, I am called.”

She exited.

Alone, Criticus said to himself:

“I will follow instantly.”

He then began a prayer to Apollo and Mercury:

“Phoebus Apollo, if with ancient rites and due devotions, I have ever hung elaborate paeans on thy golden shrine or sung thy triumphs in a lofty strain, fit for a theater of gods to hear, and thou the other son of mighty Jove, Cyllenian Mercury — who was born on Mount Cellene to his mother, Maia — sweet Maia’s joy ...”

He then asked for something good:

“... if in the busy tumults of the mind thou ever have illuminated my path, for which thine altars I have often perfumed and decked thy statue with many-colored flowers:

“Now cause invention to thrive in this glorious court,

“So that not of bounty only, but of right,

“Cynthia may grace and give it life by sight!”

Just the sight of Cynthia will grace the court and give it sight.

Just seeing Cynthia will improve the vain courtiers and make them better.

ACT 5 (The Fountain of Self-Love, or Cynthia's Revels)

— 5.1 —

Hesperus, Cynthia, Arete, Timè, Phronesis, and Thaumata were together.

Hesperus is the personification of the evening star.

The name “Timè” means “Honor.”

The name “Phronesis” means “Prudence.”

The name “Thaumata” means “Wonder.”

Hesperus sang a hymn to Cynthia, who was both a Moon goddess and the goddess of hunting:

“Queen and huntress, chaste and fair,

“Now the Sun is laid to sleep,

“Seated in thy silver chair,

“State in wonted [accustomed] manner keep;”

“To keep state” means “to maintain one’s dignity” and “to observe the ceremony that a person of high rank deserves.”

Hesperus continued singing:

“Hesperus entreats thy light,

“Goddess excellently bright.

“Earth, let not thy envious [malicious] shade

“Dare itself to interpose!”

In other words: Earth, don’t cause a lunar eclipse.

Hesperus continued singing:

“Cynthia’s shining orb [the Moon] was made

“Heaven to clear, when day did close.

“Bless us then with wished [wished-for] sight,

“Goddess excellently bright.

“Lay thy bow of pearl apart,

“And thy crystal-shining quiver;

“Give unto the flying hart [fleeing deer, fleeing heart]

“Space to breathe, how short soever [however short];”

In other words: Be merciful to the deer who flee from you in your character as a huntress and be merciful to the hearts of the vain courtiers who flee from correct behavior.

Hesperus continued singing:

“Thou, that mak’st [who make] a day of night,

“Goddess excellently bright!”

A bright Moon reflects light by which we can see at night.

Hesperus exited.

Cynthia/Diana began to speak.

First, she denied that she is like a malicious miser:

“When has Diana, like an envious wretch who glitters and is splendid only to his soothed — comforted and flattered — self, denying to the world the precious use of hoarded wealth, withheld her friendly aid?”

She is not a miser because she gives light to people on Earth:

“Monthly we expend our constantly repaired — waning and waxing — shine, and we do not forbid our virgin-waxen torch to burn and blaze while nutriment does last.

“Our virgin-waxen torch, once consumed, out of Jove’s treasury anew we take, and stick it in our sphere to give the mutinous race of lacking men their looked-for light.”

She then asked if the receivers of her — the Moon’s — light deserve to receive it:

“Yet what is their desert? Do they deserve the light?

“Bounty is wronged, interpreted as due.

“Mortals can challenge not a ray by right,

“Yet they do expect the whole of Cynthia’s light.

“But if deities were to withdraw their gifts because of human follies, what would men deserve but death and darkness?”

According to Cynthia, she and other high beings ought to do things worthily for their own sakes — simply because the things are worthy and because the high beings are worthy:

“It behooves the high beings for their own sakes to do things worthily.”

Arete said:

“What you said is most true, most sacred goddess, for the heavens receive no good from all the good they do.

“Neither Jove, nor you, nor other heavenly powers are fed with fumes which rise from incense, or sacrifices reeking — steaming — in their bloody gore.”

When the ancient Greeks sacrificed, they ate the meat, and the smoke from the sacrificial fires rose to Mount Olympus.

Arete continued:

“Yet because of the care and concern that you have for mortals, whose proper good it is that they be so, you well are pleased with odors redolent.”

The gods are happy with the odor of roasting meat from the sacrificial fires. This shows their concern for human beings, whom they allow to eat the meat.

Arete continued:

“But ignorant is all the race of men,

“Which always complains, not knowing why or when.”

According to Arete, human beings always complain about the gods although they ought not to.

Cynthia said:

“Else, noble Arete, they would not blame and tax, either as unjust or as proud, thy Cynthia in the things that are indeed the greatest glories in our starry crown.

“Such a great glory is our chastity, which safely scorns not love — for who more fervently loves immortal honor and divine renown?

“Instead, our chastity scorns giddy Cupid, Venus’ frantic son.

“Yet, Arete, neither night nor court would enjoy our light, if by this veiled and dimmed light, we just discerned — what we in fact do not discern — even the least of imputations standing ready to sprinkle our unspotted reputation with note of lightness — unchastity — from these imminent revels.

“If we did discern such imputations, not even for the empire and rulership of the universe would either night or court enjoy any shine or grace at all of ours.

“Let me repeat:

“If we did discern such imputations, neither night nor court would unhappily — inappropriately — enjoy any shine or grace at all of ours.”

She continued:

“Place and occasion are two privy thieves, and from poor innocent ladies often steal the best of things: an honorable name.

“To stay with follies, or where faults may be,

“Infers a crime, although the party be free.”

She meant “be free of crime.”

The word “crime” means “sin.”

Arete said:

“How Cynthia — that is, how worthily and like herself — the matchless Cynthia speaks!

“Infinite jealousies, infinite watchfulness, do watch about the true virginity, but Phoebe [Cynthia as Moon goddess] lives free from all not only fault, but as from thought, so from suspicion free.”

This kind of jealousy is devotion and eagerness to serve.

Arete continued:

“Thy presence broad-seals — gives the highest authorization to — our delights for pure.

“What’s done in Cynthia’s sight is done safely and securely.”

Cynthia said:

“That, then, so answered, dearest Arete, what the argument — subject and theme — or of what sort our entertainments are likely to be this night, I will not demand to know.

“Nothing that duty and desire to please bears written in the forehead — plainly expressed — comes amiss.

“But unto whose invention must we owe the complement — completion — of this night’s entertainment? Who is the author?”

Arete said:

“Excellent goddess, the credit for the entertainment is due to a man’s inventiveness, whose worth, without hyperbole, I thus may praise:

“He is one, at least, who is studious of deserving well, and, to speak the truth, indeed he is deserving well.

“Potential merit stands for actual where only opportunity is missing.

“Neither will nor power are missing in him: Both of them in him abound.

“He is one whom the Muses and Minerva love — for whom should they love more than Criticus, whom Phoebus the god of poetry, although not Lady Fortune, holds dear?

“And, which argues convincingly excellence in him, he is a principal admirer of yourself.

“Even through the ungentle injuries of fate, and difficulties, which choke virtue, thus much of him appears.

“What other things of farther note do lie unborn in him, them I leave for nourishing cherishing to show, and for a goddess graciously to judge.”

Cynthia said:

“We have already judged him, Arete.

“Nor are we ignorant how noble minds suffer too much through those indignities that times and vicious persons cast on them.

“Ourself have always vowed to esteem virtue as worthy in itself, and so esteem fortune as base.

“Virtue is first in worth, and so virtue is first in place.

“Nor farther notice, Arete, we crave than thine approval’s sovereign warranty.

“Let it be thy care to make us known to him.

“Cynthia shall brighten what the world made dim.”

— 5.2 —

The First Masque began.

Cupid, appearing like Anteros, held a crystal globe, aka crystal ball.

Anteros is Anti-Eros, the half-brother and enemy to Eros, who is also known as Cupid. Ben Jonson regarded Anti-Eros highly as the god of Requited Love and as Love of Virtue. Cupid, in contrast, is often a causer of chaos.

In his costume as Anteros, Cupid carried a bow and arrows.

Appearing but not speaking in the masque were these four allegorical characters:

Philautia appeared as Storge, or Natural Affection. Her motto is “Each to his own standard.”

Gelaia appeared as Aglaia, or Pleasant and Delectable Conversation. Her motto is “I dispel the clouds of worry.”

Phantaste appeared as Euphantaste, or Wittiness. Her motto is “Thus the praise of wit [increases].”

Moria appeared as Apheleia, or Simplicity. Her motto is “No makeup is present.”

The masquers carried imprese with mottoes. These imprese were pasteboard shields bearing a symbolic picture called a device. Each shield also bore a motto.

The four female allegorical characters served their queen, Perfection.

Cupid, in the character of Anteros, said:

“Clear pearl of heaven, and not to be farther ambitious in titles, Cynthia:

“The fame of this illustrious night, among others, has also drawn these four fair virgins from the palace of their queen, Perfection — a word that makes no sufficient difference between hers and thine — to visit thy imperial court; for she, their sovereign lady, not finding where to dwell among men, before her return to heaven, advised them wholly to consecrate themselves to thy celestial service, as in Cynthia’s clear spirit — the proper element and sphere of virtues — they should behold not her alone, their ever honored mistress, but themselves, more truly themselves, to live enthroned.

“Perfection herself would have commended them unto thy favor more particularly, except that she knows no commendation is more available with thee than that of proper virtue.

“Nevertheless, she willed them to present this crystal globe, a note of monarchy and symbol of perfection, to thy more worthy deity; which as here by me they most humbly do, so among the rarities thereof, that is the chief, to show whatsoever the world has excellent, howsoever remote and various.

“But your irradiate — illuminate — judgment will soon look into the crystal ball and discover the secrets of this little crystal world.

“The four virgins themselves, to appear the more plainly, because they know nothing more odious than false pretexts, have chosen to express their several qualities thus in several colors.

1. Natural Affection. Allowable Self-Love.

“The first, in citron — pale yellow — color, is Natural Affection, which given to us to procure our good, is sometimes called Storge, and as everyone is nearest to himself, so this handmaid of Reason, Allowable Self-Love, as it is without harm, so are none without it; her place in the court of Perfection was to quicken minds in the pursuit of honor.

“Her device is a perpendicular level upon a cube or square.”

These items are used in making measurements.

Cupid, in the character of Anteros, continued:

“The motto is se suo modulo [each to his own standard], alluding to that true measure of one’s self, which as everyone ought to make, so is it most conspicuous in thy divine example.”

Aristotle in his Nicomachian Ethics made a distinction between Vicious Self-Love and Virtuous Self-Love. A person who has Virtuous Self-Love will love and respect him- or herself and will want to preserve that self. Such a person will have Proper Pride.

Horace in his Epistles 1.7.9 wrote “metiri se quemque suo modulo ac pede verum est.” Translation: “Every man should measure himself by his own standard and yardstick.”

2. Delectable and Pleasant Conversation.

“The second, in green, is Aglaia, Delectable and Pleasant Conversation, whose property it is to move a kindly delight, and sometimes not without laughter.

“Her office is to entertain assemblies and to keep societies together with fair familiarity.

“Her device is this: within a ring of clouds, a heart with shine about it.

“The motto curarum nubila pello [I dispel the clouds of worry] is an allegory of Cynthia’s light, which no less clears the sky than her fair mirth clears the heart.

3. Wittiness.

“The third, in a pale mantle spangled all over, is Euphantaste, a well-conceited Wittiness, and employed in honoring the court with the riches of her pure invention.

“Her device is a crescent upon a petasus, aka a mercurial (worn, with additional wings, by Mercury) hat with a low crown and broad brim.

“Her motto, sic laus ingenii [thus the praise of wit], infers that the praise and glory of wit does ever increase as does thy growing Moon.

4. Simplicity.

“The fourth, in white, is Apheleia, a nymph as pure and simple as the soul, or as an abrase table [a blank tablet], and is therefore called Simplicity; without folds, aka without pleats in which items can be hidden, without color, without counterfeit, and, to speak plainly, plainness itself. Her device is no device.

“The motto under her silver shield is omnis abest fucus [no makeup is present], alluding to thy spotless self, who are as far from impurity as from mortality.”

Anteros. Anti-Eros.

Cupid, in the character of Anteros, then identified whom he was portraying:

“I myself, celestial goddess, more fit for the court of Cynthia than the arbors of Cythere, am called Anteros, or Love’s Enemy; the more welcome therefore to thy court and the fitter to conduct this quaternion [set of four], who as they are thy professed votaries, and for that cause adversaries to Love, yet thee, perpetual virgin, they both love and vow to love eternally.”

Various kinds of Love exist, not all of them good.

Cynthia values Love of Virtue. She does not value the kind of Love that is Lust.

Cythere, aka Cythera, is the name of the island where Venus was born.

— 5.3 —

Cynthia looked into the crystal ball and saw a vision of Queen Elizabeth:

“Not without wonder, nor without delight, my eyes have viewed in contemplation’s depth — the depth of this crystal ball — this work of wit divine and excellent.

“What shape, what substance, or what unknown power, in virgin’s clothing crowned with the laurel leaves of victory and the olive branches of peace woven in between, on sea-girt rock shines similar to a goddess?

“O front [forehead]! O face! O all celestial sure and more than mortal!

“Arete, behold another Cynthia, and another queen, whose glory, like a lasting plenilune — full Moon — seems ignorant of what it is to wane.

“Not under heaven could an object be found more fit to please.”

Cynthia then called for Criticus:

“Let Criticus approach.

“Bounty forbids to pall and make pale our thanks with delay, or to defer our favor after view.

“The time of grace is, when the cause is new.”

Criticus entered the scene.

Arete said:

“Look, here is the man, celestial Delia, who, like a circle bounded in itself, contains as much as man in fullness may.

“Look, here is the man, who, not of usual earth, but of that nobler and more precious mold — Earth — which Phoebus’ self does temper, is composed.

“And who, even if all were not rewarding him, yet to himself he would not be lacking. He would have what he needs.

“The gain of thy favor is his greatest and best ambition,

“And the best goal of his labor; he is a man who, humble in his height,

“Stands fixed silent in thy glorious sight.”

Cynthia said:

“With no less pleasure than we have beheld this precious crystal, a work of rarest wit, our eye does read thee, now, our

Criticus, whom learning, virtue, and lastly our favor, exempts from the gloomy multitude.

“With common eye the supreme — the highest — should not see.

“Henceforth be ours, the more thyself to be.”

Criticus replied:

“Heaven’s purest light, whose orb may be eclipsed, but not thy praise, divinest Cynthia, how much too narrow for so high a grace thy, save therein, unworthy Criticus finds himself!

“May thy fame and thine honors shine forever, as thy beauties do.

“In me they must shine; they are my dark world’s chiefest lights, by whose propitious beams my powers are raised to hope some part of those most lofty points that blessed Arete has pleased to name as landmarks to which my endeavor’s steps should bend.

“Mine, as begun at thee, in thee must end.”

— 5.4 —

The Second Masque began.

Mercury appeared as a page.

Appearing but not speaking in the masque were these people, who were playing allegorical characters:

Amorphus appeared as Eucosmos. The name means “Orderly” and “Well-Mannered.”

Hedon appeared as Euphathes. The name means “Enjoying Good Things.”

Anaides appeared as Eutolmos. The name means “Brave-Spirited.”

Asotus appeared as Eucolos. The name means “Good-Natured” and “Benevolent.”

They were outfitted with suitable heraldic devices, including javelins.

They were the sons of Eutaxia. The name means Orderly Behavior: Eutaxia is Orderly Behaved and Well-Mannered.

Mercury, in the character of a page, greeted Cynthia:

“Sister of Phoebus Apollo, to whose bright orb we owe that which we do not complain of his absence.”

Apollo’s bright orb is the Sun, but the bright orb here is the brightly lit Moon, because of whose brightness no one needed to complain about the absence of the Sun. Of course, the Moon does not produce its own light — it instead reflects the light of the Sun.

Mercury, in the character of a page, presented the four allegorical beings:

“These four brethren — for they are brethren and sons of Eutaxia, aka Orderly Behavior, a lady known and highly beloved of your resplendent deity, and these brethren are not able to be absent when Cynthia holds a ceremonial event — dutifully move themselves into thy presence; for, as there are four cardinal virtues upon which the whole frame of the court does move, so are these the four cardinal properties without which the body of compliment does not move.”

The four cardinal virtues are Justice, Prudence, Temperance, and Fortitude.

Mercury, in the character of a page, continued:

“With these four silver javelins, ceremonial weapons that they bear in their hands, they support in princes’ courts the stateliness of the presence chamber, as by office they are obliged; which though here they may seem superfluous, yet for honor’s sake they thus presume to visit thee, having also been employed in the palace of Queen Perfection.

“And though to them, who would make themselves gracious to a goddess, sacrifices would be fitter than presents or impresse, yet they both hope thy favor, and, in place of either, use several symbols containing the titles of thy imperial dignity.

1. Eucosmos: Neat and Elegant.

“The hithermost, in the robe with the blue and green contrasting and changeable color effects, is the commendably fashionable gallant, Eucosmos. His courtly outfit is the grace of the presence and delight of the surveying eye; he is the gallant whom ladies understand by the names of Neat and Elegant. His symbol is divae virgini [to the divine virgin] in which he would express thy deity’s principal glory, which has always been virginity.

2. Eupathes: Enjoying Good Things.

“The second, in the rich accoutrement and robe of purple impaled — bisected — with a vertical line of gold, is Eupathes, who entertains his mind with a harmless but not careless variety. All the objects of his senses are sumptuous. He is a gallant who without excess can make use of superfluities, go richly in embroideries, jewels, and what not, without vanity, and dine delicately without gluttony. And therefore, not without cause, he is universally thought to be of fine humor. His symbol is divae optimae [to the best goddess], an attribute to express thy goodness in which thou so resemble Jove, thy father.

3. Eutolmos: Brave-Spirited; Good Audacity.

“The third, in the blush-colored suit, is Eutolmos, as duly respecting others as never neglecting himself. He is commonly known by the title of Good Audacity; he is a guest most acceptable at courts and courtly assemblies. His symbol is divae viragini [to the divine virago, aka female warrior], to express thy hardy courage in chase of savage beasts that harbor in woods and wilderness.”

Cynthia is a huntress.

4. Eucolos: Good-Natured, Kind, and Benevolent; Truly Beneficent.

“The fourth, in watchet-tinsel [sky-blue cloth with gold or silver thread], is the kind and truly beneficent Eucolos, who imparts not without respect, but yet without difficulty, and has the happiness to make every kindness seem double, by the timely and freely bestowing thereof.”

A proverb stated that the person who gives quickly gives twice.

“He is the chief of them who, by the common people, are said to be of good nature. His symbol is divae maximae [to the best goddess], an additional name to signify thy greatness, which in Heaven, Earth, and Hell is formidable.”

Cynthia is a tripartite goddess: a goddess with three forms.

In Heaven, she is Luna, goddess of the Moon.

On Earth, she is Diana, goddess of the hunt.

In Hell, she is Hecate, goddess of witchcraft.

The two masques joined: a masque of four women and a masque of four men. Because they were wearing masks, their identities were not readily apparent to Cupid.

Cupid asked Mercury, “Isn’t that Amorphus, the traveler?”

Mercury replied, “As though it could be anyone else. Don’t you see how his legs are in travail with a measure?”

“Hedon, thy master, is next,” Cupid said.

“What, will Cupid turn nomenclator — announcer — and cry out the names?” Mercury asked.

“No, indeed, but I have a comedy in mind that would not be lost for a kingdom,” Cupid said.

Cupid has the power — usually — to make the four women and the four men fall in love. Often, the result of falling in love is comedy.

“In good time, for Cupid will prove the comedy,” Mercury said.

One way to interpret this sentence is that Cupid will be the one who is laughed at.

“Mercury, I am studying how to be a matchmaker and match them,” Cupid said.

“How to mismatch them would be harder,” Mercury replied.

They were all full of Self-Love, and so they were all similar.

“It is the nymphs who must do it,” Cupid said. “I shall entertain myself with their passions above measure — exceedingly.”

“Those nymphs need to be tamed a little indeed, but I fear thou have not the arrows necessary for the purpose,” Mercury said.

“Oh, yes, I do,” Cupid said. “Here are arrows of all sorts: flights, rovers, and butt-shafts.”

Because he was impersonating Anteros, Cupid had a bow and arrows.

Flights are light arrows that can travel a long distance. Rovers are arrows for shooting at various targets selected by the archer. Butt-shafts are blunt arrows.

Cupid added, “But I can wound with a brandish — just by shaking an arrow at someone — and never draw bow for the matter.”

“I cannot but believe it, my invisible archer, and yet I think you are wearisome,” Mercury said.

As gods, Mercury and Cupid can turn themselves invisible.

Gods can definitely get on each other’s nerves.

Cupid said:

“It behooves me to be somewhat circumspect, Mercury, for if Cynthia should hear the twang of my bow, she’ll come close to whipping me with the string.

“Therefore, to prevent that, I thus discharge a brandish upon — it makes no matter which of the couples.

“Phantaste and Amorphus, I brandish my arrow at you.”

If all were to go as Cupid expected, Phantaste and Amorphus would now fall in love.

Mercury asked, “Will the shaking of a shaft strike them into such a fever of affection?”

“As well as the wink of an eye,” Cupid said. “But I pray thee hinder me not with thy prattle.”

“Jove forbid I hinder thee!” Mercury said. “By the Virgin Mary, all that I fear is Cynthia’s presence, which, with the cold of her chastity, casts such an antiperistasis — contrary circumstance — about the place that no heat of thine will tarry with the patient.”

The coldness of Cynthia’s chastity may make it impossible for Cupid’s arrows to cause sexual heat in anyone at whom he brandishes his arrow.

Cupid said, “It will tarry the rather, for the antiperistasis will keep it in.”

Cupid thought that Cynthia’s chastity would serve as an outer boundary that would keep sexual heat inside Phantaste and Amorphus. Think of an igloo with a fire inside.

“I long to see the experiment,” Mercury said.

“Why, their bone marrow boils already, or else they have all been turned into eunuchs,” Cupid said.

Phantaste and Amorphus should already be deeply in love.

“Nay, if it is so, I’ll give over speaking, and be a spectator only,” Mercury said.

All danced to the first strain of music.

Full of Self-Love, Amorphus said to himself, “Cynthia, by my bright soul, is a completely exquisite and splendidious and magnificent lady, yet Amorphus, I think, has seen more fashions, and I am sure I have seen more countries. But whether I have or not, what need have we to gaze on Cynthia when we have ourself to admire?”

Full of Self-Love, Phantaste said to herself, “Oh, excellent Cynthia! Yet if Phantaste sat where she does and had such a tire — a headdress — on her head (for attire can do much) ... I say no more — but goddesses are goddesses, and Phantaste is as she is! I wish the revels were done at once, so I might go to my school of glass — my mirror — again and learn to do myself right after all this ruffling.”

“Ruffling” means “contending.” The Self-Lovers were contending with Cynthia for supremacy.

Amorphus loved himself, and Phantaste loved herself. They doted on themselves, not on each other. They loved themselves more than they loved Cynthia.

Phantaste wanted to work on her makeup to make it better.

Mercury said sarcastically, “How are things now, Cupid? Here’s a wonderful change as a result of your brandishing your arrows! Don’t you hear how they dote?”

“What prodigy is this?” Cupid said. “No word of love? No mention of love? No motion toward each other? No commotion?”

“Not a word, my little hell-fire, not a word,” Mercury said.

Cupid’s arrows inflame the heart, and so he can be called a little hell-fire.

“Are my darts enchanted?” Cupid said. “Is their vigor gone? Is their virtue —”

Mercury said, “What? Cupid turned jealous of himself? Cupid troubled that his power has gone? Ha, ha, ha!”

“Does Mercury laugh?” Cupid asked.

“Is Cupid angry?” Mercury asked.

“Hasn’t he reason to be angry, when his purpose is so laughed at?” Cupid asked.

His purpose was to cause comedy by having Phantaste and Amorphus fall in love. Mercury was laughing because Cupid could not accomplish his purpose.

“A splendid comedy; it shall be titled Cupid’s Comedy,” Mercury said.

“Do not scorn us, Hermes,” Cupid said.

Mercury/Hermes replied, “Choler, aka Anger, and Cupid are two fiery things; I do not scorn them. But I see that come to pass which I presaged in the beginning.”

Earlier, Mercury had said, “By the Virgin Mary, all that I fear is Cynthia’s presence, which, with the cold of her chastity, casts such an antiperistasis — contrary circumstance — about the place that no heat of thine will tarry with the patient.”

In other words, he had worried that Cupid’s arrows would have no effect so near Cynthia.

“You cannot tell,” Cupid said. “Perhaps the medicine will not work as soon upon some as upon others. It may be the rest are not so resty — so sluggish.”

Mercury said, “Ex ungue. You know the old adage: As these, so are the remainder.”

Ex ungue leonum is a proverb: “From the claw of a lion,” you may discover its size.

If Cupid’s arrows didn’t work on Phantaste and Amorphus, chances were excellent that they would not work on other couples.

Cupid said, “I’ll try again. This is the same shaft with which I wounded Argurion.”

Argurion had fallen in love with Asotus after Cupid had brandished one of his arrows at her.

“Aye, but let me save you a labor, Cupid,” Mercury said. “There were certain bottles of water fetched and drunk off, since that time, by these gallants.”

“May Jove strike me into Earth!” Cupid said. “The Fountain of Self-Love!”

A person who is excessively in love with him- or herself may find it difficult or impossible to fall in love with someone else.

“Don’t faint, Cupid,” Mercury said.

“I did not remember that,” Cupid said.

Mercury said:

“Indeed, it was ominous to take the name of Anteros upon you; you don’t know what charm or enchantment lies in the word.

“You saw I did not dare to venture upon any device or plot in our presentation, but instead I was content to be no other than a simple page.

“Your arrows’ properties, to keep decorum and appropriateness, Cupid, are suited, it would seem, to the nature of him whom you impersonate: Anteros.”

Cupid’s arrows could not now be used to create romantic drama.

“This is an indignity not to be borne!” Cupid said.

“Nay, rather it is an attempt to have been forborne,” Mercury said. “You ought not to have attempted to use your arrows to make them fall in love.”

Cupid said to himself:

“How might I revenge myself on this insulting Mercury?”

“There’s Criticus, his minion; he has not tasted of this water. It shall be so.”

All danced to the second strain of music.

Cupid asked Mercury, “Has Criticus turned dotard on himself, too? Is he in love with himself, too?”

Mercury answered, “That does not follow from the fact that the venom of your shafts cannot pierce him.”

The venom of Cupid’s arrows could not pierce Criticus, but it does not follow that Criticus was filled with Self-Love.

“As though there were one antidote for these, and another for him?” Cupid asked.

The antidote for the foolish courtiers was their Self-Love. The antidote for Criticus was his strength of character and the protection of Cynthia.

“As though there were not two antidotes!” Mercury said. “Or as if one effect might not arise from diverse causes? What do you say to Cynthia, Arete, Phronesis, Timè, and others there?”

These beings were all immune to Cupid’s arrows.

“They are divine,” Cupid answered.

“And Criticus aspires to be so,” Mercury said.

Criticus aspired to the highest values and behavior.

“But that shall not serve him,” Cupid said. “That shall not be of use to him when I use my powers on him.”

“It is likely to serve him prettily well at this time,” Mercury said. “But Cupid has grown too covetous because he will not spare one of a multitude.”

In Genesis 18:23-33, Abraham bargains with God not to destroy Sodom if 50 righteous people are found to reside there. Abraham then bargains the number down to 45, then 40, 30, 20, and finally 10. Eventually, one righteous man — Lot — is found. God destroys Sodom, but Lot and his family flee from the destruction.

“One is more than a multitude,” Cupid said.

One virtuous man is worth more than a multitude of fools.

Not sparing one virtuous man is more destructive than not sparing a multitude of fools.

Mercury said, “Arete’s favor makes anyone shot-proof against thee, Cupid.”

All danced to the third strain of music.

Mercury then said, “Please, light honey-bee, remember thou are not now in Adonis’ garden, but in Cynthia’s presence, where thorns lie in garrison about the roses.”

Adonis was a mortal lover of Venus.

Mercury then said, “Quiet, Cynthia speaks.”

Cynthia now began to speak to the ladies and gallants. In doing so, she was speaking to the Virtues whom the foolish courtiers filled with Self-Love were portraying. She was not speaking to the foolish courtiers who were portraying those virtues.

Using the third person and the regal plural, and sometimes calling herself “Diana,” Cynthia said:

“Ladies and gallants,

“To give a timely period — end — to our entertainments, let us conclude them with declining night; dawn is coming soon. Our empire is only the darker half of the 24-hour day.

“If you judge to have earned Diana’s thanks to be any recompense for your fair pains, Diana grants to you her thanks, and bestows their crown to gratify your acceptable zeal.

“For you are not those who, as some have done, censure and judge us as too severe and sour.

“Instead, you judge us, as, more rightly, gracious to the good.

“Although we do not deny that unto the proud or the profane, we are perhaps indeed austere:

“For so Actaeon, by presuming far, did, to our grief, incur a fatal doom, and so swollen-with-pride Niobe, comparing more than he (Actaeon) presumed, was trophied into stone.”

Niobe compared herself to Leto, Cynthia’s mother, and she said that she was more worthy of admiration than Leto because Leto had given birth to only one son and only one daughter, while Niobe had given birth to six sons and six daughters. As punishment for her egotistic comparison, Niobe was transformed into a stone trophy. Ancient Roman generals could make a trophy by displaying an enemy general’s armor on a tree trunk whose branches had been lopped off: This would be a monument to commemorate a victory.

Actaeon was out hunting, and he saw Cynthia, a virgin goddess, bathing naked. As punishment for his presumption and impure thoughts, Cynthia punished him by turning him into a stag. Actaeon’s own hounds killed him.

Cynthia continued:

“But are we therefore judged to be too extreme?

“Does it seem to be no crime to enter sacred bowers and to pollute hallowed places most lewdly with impure gaze?”

Actaeon did that.

Cynthia continued:

“Does it seem to be no crime to brave and defy a deity?”

Niobe did that.

Cynthia continued:

“Let mortals learn to make religion of ‘offending’ heaven, and not at all to censure powers divine.

“To men, this argument should stand for firm:

“A goddess did it; therefore, it was good.”

Even when heaven offends or seems to offend, mortals ought not to judge it.

Cynthia continued:

“We are not cruel, nor do we delight in blood.

“But what have these serious repetitions of already-known narratives about Actaeon and Niobe to do with revels and the entertainments of court?

“We do not intend to sour your late delights with harsh expostulation. Let it suffice that we take notice of and can take revenge on these calumnious and lewd blasphemies.

“For we are no less Cynthia than we were, nor is our power, other than as ourself, the same, although we have now put on no tire of shine — shiny headdress — except that which mortal eyes undazzled may endure.”

Mortal eyes can endure looking at the Moon, but they are blinded when looking at the Sun. Cynthia is careful not to overwhelm mortals with her shine. Doing so can destroy them.

Jupiter, king of the gods, promised to give Semele, a mortal woman, anything she wanted if she would sleep with him. After they had slept together, she told him that she wanted to see him in his full divine glory rather than in just the form he took when he appeared to mortals. Because he had sworn an inviolable oath, he did as she requested. Unable to endure the sight, she burst into flames.

Cynthia continued:

“Years are beneath the spheres, and time makes weak the things under heaven; time does not make weak the powers which govern heaven.”

The first Ptolemaic sphere around the Earth was that of the Moon. According to Ptolemy, crystalline spheres have embedded in them the planets and the stars.

Cynthia continued:

“And although ourself be in ourself secure, yet let mortals not claim as a right for themselves immunity from ourself.

“Lo, this is all:

“Honor has store of spleen, but lacks gall.”

In other words: Honor is quick to become angry, but Honor does not carry around bitterness after becoming angry.

Mankind cannot expect to be immune from Cynthia’s anger; she does grow angry at calumnious and lewd blasphemies.

Cynthia continued:

“Once more, we cast the slumber of our thanks on your taken toil, which here let take an end.”

She was bringing their toil (of performing the masque) to an end. The slumber of her thanks is to allow them to rest.

Cynthia continued:

“And so that we do not mistake your several worths, nor you our favor, from yourselves remove what makes you not yourselves, those clouds of mask.

“Particular pains, particular thanks do ask.”

The eight foolish courtiers — four men and four women — took off their masks, revealing their real identities.

Cynthia said:

“Are we contemned and scorned?

“Is there so little awe of our disdain that any, under trust of their disguise, would mix themselves with others of the court?

“And, without forehead — shame — boldly press so far that nowhere farther is left that they can invade?

“How apt is lenity to be abused? Severity to be loathed?

“And yet, how much more does the seeming face of neighbor virtues, and their borrowed names, add of lewd boldness to loose vanities!

“Who would have thought that Philautia did dare either to have usurped noble Storge’s name and with that theft to have dared to approach our eyes?

“Who would have thought that all of them should hope so much of our connivance — tacit approval — as to come to grace themselves with titles not their own?

“Instead of medicines, have we maladies?

“And such impostumes — moral abscesses — as Phantaste is do grow in our palace? We must lance these sores, or all will putrefy.”

Abscessed sores are pierced with a lancet so that the pus can drain out and the sore can heal.

Cynthia continued:

“Nor are these all, for we suspect a farther fraud than this.

“Take off our veil so that shadows may depart and shapes appear, beloved Arete.”

Arete took the veil from Cynthia’s face.

The entire presence chamber brightened.

Cynthia said:

“So.

“Another face of things presents itself than did recently.

“What, feathered Cupid masked, and masked to appear like Anteros?

“But even more strange! Dear Mercury, our half-brother, like a page, to countenance and support the ambush of the boy?”

Cynthia and Mercury share the same father: Jupiter.

Cupid had planned to play tricks in Cynthia’s presence chamber. Mercury had not revealed Cupid’s plot to Cynthia, and so he had tacitly approved of it.

Cynthia continued:

“Nor ends our discovery as yet.

“Gelaia is now like a nymph, who just a while ago in male attire did serve Anaides as a page?

“Cupid came here to find entertainment and game. He, heretofore, has been too conversant among our train of servants, but he has never felt revenge.

“And Mercury gave Cupid company.

“Cupid, we must confess this time of mirth, which was proclaimed by us, gave opportunity to thy attempts to play tricks, although no privilege.

“Tempt us no farther, we cannot endure thy presence longer; vanish, go away from here. Go away!”

Cupid exited.

Cynthia continued:

“You, Mercury, we must entreat to stay, and hear what we determine of the rest, for in this plot you have the deepest hand.

“But — because we do not mean a censorian — too severe — task and yet we do mean to lance these ulcers grown so ripe and so ready to be lanced — dear Arete and Criticus, to you we give the charge and responsibility of inflicting punishment.

“Impose what pains you please. The incurable cut off, the rest reform.

“Remember always what we first decreed,

“Since revels were proclaimed, let now none bleed.”

Cynthia wanted Arete and Criticus to decide what will be the punishment, but the punishment may not be death.

Arete said:

“How well Diana can distinguish times and sort her censures! Keeping to herself the doom — the judgment — of gods, leaving the rest to us!

“Come, cite them — summon them to court — Criticus, and then proceed.”

Criticus summoned the female offenders:

“First Philautia, for she was the first,

“Then light [trivial] Gelaia in Aglaia’s name,

“Thirdly Phantaste, and Moria next,

“You are all strong follies, and of the female company.”

Criticus then summoned the male offenders:

“Amorphus, or Eucosmos counterfeit,

“Voluptuous [lustful] Hedon taken for Eupathes,

“Shameless Anaides, and Asotus last,

“With his two pages, Morus and Prosaites;

“And thou, the traveler’s evil, Cos, approach,

“All of you are impostors, and male deformities.”

The travelers’ evil is lying. Many travelers made up fantastic stories about their travels.

Self-Love, aka Pride, is the foundation of the other Seven Deadly Sins.

Arete said to Criticus:

“Go forward and continue, for I delegate my power, and I decree that at thy mercy they do stand — the mercy of you whom they so often so plainly scorned before.

“It is virtue that they lack, and lacking it,

“Honor no garment to their backs can fit.”

“Now, Criticus, use your discretion.”

Criticus, who was obliged to be both severe and merciful, said:

“Adored Cynthia, and bright Arete, another might seem fitter for this task than I, Criticus, except that you do not judge that to be so.

“For I, not to appear vindictive and revengeful, or mindful of contempts and insults, which I condemned and scorned as done out of impotence, must be negligent of my duty.

“As I was the author in some sort of this masque in order to bring knowledge of them into Cynthia’s sight, I should be much severer to revenge the indignity hence issuing to her name.

“But there’s not one of these who are unpained, or by themselves unpunished; for vice is like a fury and a Fury to the vicious mind, and it turns delight itself into punishment.

“But we must go forward and continue to define their doom.”

He said to the foolish courtiers (including the foolish ladies of the court) and foolish pages:

“You are offenders, and that you must confess.

“Do you confess it?”

All the foolish courtiers and foolish pages said, “We do.”

Criticus then asked:

“And do you acknowledge that you deserve sharp correction?”

All the foolish courtiers and foolish pages said, “We do.”

Criticus then said:

“Then we (reserving unto Delia’s [Cynthia’s] grace her farther pleasure, and to Arete what Delia grants) thus do sentence you.

“Your sentence is that from this place, for penance known of all, since you have drunk so deeply of Self-Love, you, two and two, singing a palinode [a song of repentance], will march to your separate homes by Niobe’s stone, and offer up two tears, one from each eye, apiece thereon, so that it may change the name, as you must change, and of a stone be called Weeping Cross because it stands cross of Cynthia’s highway, one of whose names is sacred Trivia [three ways meeting].”

Each of the foolish courtiers and foolish pages has a “home” by the Fountain of Self-Love because they are so full of Self-Love.

Criticus continued:

“And after this penance is thus performed, you must pass in like set order, not as Midas did to wash his gold off into Tagus’ stream, but you must pass to the Well of Knowledge, Helicon, and wash off your Self-Love.”

Midas was granted his wish that everything he touched would turn to gold, but it turned out to be a curse because his food and drink and his son turned to gold. Washing in the Tagus River cured his curse. Afterward, gold was found in the river.

The Helicon was a mountain that was sacred to the Muses. On the Helicon were sacred fountains.

Criticus continued:

“At Helicon, once you are purged of your present maladies, which are neither few nor slender, you will become such as you eagerly would seem to be; and you will then return, offering your service to great Cynthia.

“This is your sentence, if the goddess please

“To ratify it with her high consent;

“The scope of wise mirth unto fruit is bent.”

Cynthia said:

“We do approve thy judgment, Criticus.

“Mercury, thy true propitious friend, a deity who is beloved by us second to Jove, will undertake to see thy judgment exactly done.

“And for this service of discovery performed by thee, in honor of our name, we vow to reward it with such due grace as shall become our bounty and thy place.

“Princes who wish their people should do well

“Must at themselves begin, as at the heads of fountains;

“For men by their example pattern out

“Their imitations and regard of laws.

“A virtuous court, a world to virtue draws.”

Cynthia, Arete, Timè, Phronesis, Thagma, and Criticus exited.

PALINODE

A palinode is a song in which a previous viewpoint is retracted.

The Reformed Self-Lovers renounce their Self-Love in this song:

Amorphus sang:

“From Spanish shrugs, French faces, smirks, irpes, and all affected humors.”

[Spanish shrugs and French faces are affectations.]

[“Irpes” may mean “sinful sexual temptations.”]

The Chorus of Reformed Self-Lovers sang:

“Good Mercury defend us!”

Phantaste sang:

“From secret friends, sweet servants, loves, doves, and such fantastic humors.”

The Chorus of Reformed Self-Lovers sang:

“Good Mercury defend us!”

Amorphus sang:

“From stabbing of arms, flap-dragons, healths [toasts], whiffs [smoking tobacco], and all such swaggering humors.”

[A lover could stab his own arm and drink his own blood as a sign of devotion to the woman he loved.]

[Flap-dragons are raisins that have been soaked in burning brandy and then are eaten.]

The Chorus of Reformed Self-Lovers sang:

“Good Mercury defend us!”

Phantaste sang:

“From waving of fans, coy glances, glicks [sexy glances], cringes [bows], and all such simpering humors.”

The Chorus of Reformed Self-Lovers sang:

“Good Mercury defend us!”

Amorphus sang:

“From making love by attorney [indirectly], courting of puppets, and paying for new acquaintance.”

[Puppets are decoys; a lover may court a servant in order to gain access to the lady whom the servant serves.]

The Chorus of Reformed Self-Lovers sang:

“Good Mercury defend us!”

Phantaste sang:

“From perfumed dogs, monkeys, sparrows, dildos, and paraquitos [parakeets].”

[Dildos are sometimes shaped like animals.]

The Chorus of Reformed Self-Lovers sang:

“Good Mercury defend us!”

Amorphus sang:

“From wearing bracelets of hair [a kind of love-token], shoe-ties, gloves, garters, and rings with posies.”

The Chorus of Reformed Self-Lovers sang:

“Good Mercury defend us!”

Phantaste sang:

“From pargeting [plastering on of makeup], painting [putting on makeup], slicking [making glossy], glazing [making sleek], and renewing old rivelled [wrinkled] faces.”

The Chorus of Reformed Self-Lovers sang:

“Good Mercury defend us!”

Amorphus sang:

“From squiring [escorting] to tilt-yards [jousting yards], playhouses, pageants, and all such public places.”

The Chorus of Reformed Self-Lovers sang:

“Good Mercury defend us!”

Phantaste sang:

“From entertaining one gallant to gull [fool] another, and making fools of either.”

The Chorus of Reformed Self-Lovers sang:

“Good Mercury defend us!”

Amorphus sang:

“From belying [lying about] ladies’ [sexual] favors, noblemen’s countenance, coining counterfeit employments, vain-glorious taking to them other men’s services, and all self-loving humors.”

The Chorus of Reformed Self-Lovers sang:

“Good Mercury defend us!”

Cantus [Song] Sung By All the Reformed Self-Lovers

“Now each one of us [will] dry his or her weeping eyes,

“And to the Well of Knowledge make haste;

“Where purged of our maladies,

“We may of sweeter waters taste,

“And with refined voice report,

“The grace of Cynthia and her court.”

EPILOGUE (The Fountain of Self-Love, or Cynthia's Revels)

The Epilogue (person who spoke the epilogue) was Criticus, who had went in (gone backstage) before the Palinode was sung.

The Epilogue said:

“Gentles, be't [be it] known to you, since I went in

“I am turned rhymer, and do thus begin:

“The author, jealous [doubtful] how your sense doth [does] take

“His travails, hath [has] enjoined me to make

“Some short and ceremonious epilogue,

“But if I yet know what, I am a rogue.

“He ties me to such laws, as quite distract

“My thoughts, and would a year of time exact [require].

“I neither must be faint, remiss, nor sorry,

“Sour, serious, confident, nor peremptory,

“But betwixt [between] these. Let's see; to lay the blame

“Upon the children's action [child-actors' performance; the play was performed by children], that were lame [would be a lame idea].

“To crave your favors with a begging knee,

“Were [Would be] to distrust the writer's faculty [Ben Jonson's ability as a playwright].

“To promise better at the next we bring,

“Prorogues [Defers] disgrace, commends not anything.

“Stiffly to stand on this, and proudly approve

“The play, might tax [accuse] the maker of Self-Love.”

The maker — playwright — of The Fountain of Self-Love is Ben Jonson.

The Epilogue continued:

“I’ll only speak what I have heard him say:

“By God, ’tis [it is] good, and if you like’t [like it], you may.”

***

Ecce rubet quidam, pallet, stupet, oscitat, odit.

Hoc volo: nunc nobis carmina nostra placent.

***

The Latin quotes Martial’s Epigrammatica 60:3-4.

The entire poem is four lines:

Laudat, amat, cantat nostros mea Roma libellos,

Meque sinus omnes, me manus omnis habet.

Ecce rubet quidam, pallet, stupet, oscitat, odit.

Hoc volo: nunc nobis carmina nostra placent.

Translation:

Rome praises, loves, sings my little books

Every bosom has me, every hand has me.

Look! A man blushes, pales, is astonished, yawns, and hates.

I want this: Now our songs please us.

— Cast of Characters —

Whetstone. Whetstones were hung around the necks of liars as a punishment.

Here is some information about whetstones from “Whetstones for Dull Wits and Liars” by saucyindexer:

Punishment of the Pillory and Whetstone

In the Letter Books of the City of London from 1412 there is an account of the deceit of William Blakeney, a shuttlemaker. “Under the guise of sanctity” and also barefoot and with long hair he pretended to be a hermit and “under colour of such falsehood he had received many good things from divers persons.” As a skilled craftsman he was capable of supporting himself but for six years he “lived by such lies, falsities, and deceits, so invented by him, to the defrauding of the people.”

“It was adjudged that said William should be put upon the pillory for three market-days, there to remain for one hour each day, the reason for the same being there proclaimed; and he was to have, in the meantime, whetstone hung from his neck.”

The following information comes from “1500s: The Elizabethan Ruff, Manicured Beards and Arum Starch #2”:

Beard Starching.

Beard starching. Never done it? The Elizabeth era was the prime time for men to display their creativity in beard shaping, a somewhat neglected manicure amongst the gentlemen of today. A man wishing to sculpt his beard into a suitably fashionable and attractive shape had to take into account a number of considerations. Firstly there were the Elizabethan class dictates, so that where he lived and what profession he held played an important role in how his beard might be manipulated. Such important social signals were not to be overlooked. That decided, he was then free to enter the constantly changing fashion race of sculpting his beard into different angles, shapes, cuts, coils and contortions.

*'having starched their beards most curiously...'
To ensure such facial architecture would remain in place, men would stiffen their beards with starch.
Now, there is a persistent rumour that it was specifically Arum starch that was used for this. The source of this is usually Cecil Prime, who refers to a preface by Thomas Nashe in Robert Greene's Menaphon of 1589. The actual sentence is this:*

'Sufficeth them to bodge up a blank verse with ifs and ands, and otherwhile, for recreation after their candle-stuff, having starched their beards most curiously, to make a peripatetical path into the inner parts of the City, and spend two or three hours in turning over French dowdy, where they attract more infection in one minute than they can do eloquence all days of their life by conversing with any authors of like argument'.

The information below comes from the Wikipedia article “Breaking wheel”:

Those convicted as murderers and/or robbers to be executed by the wheel, sometimes termed to be “wheeled” or “broken on the wheel”, would be taken to a public stage scaffold site and tied to the floor. The execution wheel was typically a large wooden spoked wheel, the same as was used on wooden transport carts and carriages (often with iron rim), sometimes purposely modified with a rectangular iron thrust attached and extending blade-like from part of the rim. The primary goal of the first act was the agonizing mutilation of the body, not death. Therefore, the most common form would start with breaking the leg bones. To this end, the executioner dropped the execution wheel on the shinbones of the convicted person and then worked his way up to the arms. Here, rhythm and number of beatings were prescribed in each case, sometimes also the number of spokes on the wheel. To increase its effect, often sharp-edged timbers were placed under the convict’s joints. Later, there were devices in which the convicted person could be “harnessed”. Although not commonplace, the executioner could be instructed to execute the convicted person at the end of the first act, by aiming for the neck or heart in a “coup de grace”. Even less often, this occurred immediately from the start (from the head down).

In the second act, the body was braided into another wooden spoked wheel, which was possible through the broken limbs, or tied to the wheel. The wheel was then erected on a mast or pole, like a crucifixion. After this, the executioner was permitted to decapitate or garrote the convicted if need be. Alternatively, fire was kindled under the wheel, or the “wheeled” convict was simply thrown into a fire. Occasionally, a small gallows was set up on the wheel, for example, if there were a guilty verdict for theft in addition to murder.

Since the body remained on the wheel after execution, left to scavenging animals, birds and decay, this form of punishment, like the ancient crucifixion, had a sacral function beyond death: according to the belief at that time, this would hinder transition from death to resurrection.

If the convict fell from the wheel still alive or the execution failed in some other way, such as the wheel itself breaking or falling from its placement, it was interpreted as God’s intervention. There exist votive images of saved victims of the wheel, and there is literature on how best to treat such sustained injuries.

The survival time after being “wheeled” or “broken” could be extensive. Accounts exist of a 14th-century murderer who remained conscious for three days after undergoing the punishment. In 1348, during the time of the Black Death, a Jewish man named Bona Dies underwent the punishment. The authorities stated he remained conscious for four days and nights afterwards. In 1581, the possibly fictitious German serial killer Christman Genipperteinga remained conscious for nine days on the breaking wheel before expiring, having been deliberately kept alive with “strong drink”

Alternatively, the condemned were spreadeagled and broken on a saltire, a cross consisting of two wooden beams nailed in an “X” shape, after which the victim’s mangled body might be displayed on the wheel.

In my opinion, “irpe” is a typo for “ripe,” which means, according to The Oxford Dictionary:

Of grain, fruit, etc.: having developed to the point of readiness for harvesting and eating, or for the dispersal of seed for propagation; that is at the full extent of natural growth.

Of a person: fully developed in body or mind; mature, fully grown; (also) †marriageable (obsolete).

The lady is “reguardant,” which means, according to the Oxford English Dictionary:

Heraldry. Of an animal: looking backwards over the shoulder. Also: (in early use) = guardant adj. 2. Chiefly used postpositively.

Observant, watchful, attentive; contemplative.

What may be happening here is that the lady is considering whether Asotus would be a possible sex partner. She could be looking at him attentively to determine that. If she is looking backwards over her shoulder at him, she could be showing off her figure, offering — presenting — it to him.

Asotus, in turn, is showing off “the supple motion of [his] pliant body, but, in chief, of [his] knee and hand.”

In the missionary position, his knees and hands would be on the bed.

Asotus’ doing this would “arride her proud humour exceedingly.”

“Arride” means “gratify,” and there could be a pun on him gratifying her by riding her.

This is one meaning of “proud,” according to the Oxford English Dictionary:

Feeling greatly honoured, pleased, or satisfied by something which or someone who does one credit; acutely aware of some honour done to oneself, taking pride in something. Also more generally (chiefly in early use): gratified, pleased, glad (now regional).

In the Palinode, “irpes” may mean “sinful sexual temptations.”

— Whole Play —

Self-Love is Pride.

Pride is the foundation of all sins; pride makes a person think that he or she is the center of the universe. These are the seven deadly sins, and these are illustrations of how these sinners think:

- 1) Pride — A sinner who is guilty of Pride thinks, “I am the center of the universe, and I am better than other people. Quite simply, I am more important than other people.”
- 2) Envy — A sinner who is guilty of Envy thinks, “I am the center of the universe, and if you have something I want, I envy you.”
- 3) Wrath — A sinner who is guilty of Wrath thinks, “Because I am the center of the universe, everything ought to go my way, and when it does not, I get angry.”
- 4) Sloth — A sinner who is guilty of Sloth thinks, “I am the center of the universe, so I don’t have to work at something. Other people can do my work for me, and/or they can give me credit for work I have not done because if I had done the work, I would have done it excellently.”

5) Avariciousness and Prodigality — A sinner who is guilty of Avariciousness or Prodigality thinks, “I am the center of the universe, so I deserve to have what I want. If I want money, I get money and never spend it, or if I want the things that money can buy, then I spend every penny I can make or borrow to get what I want. Either way, I deserve to have what I want.”

6) Gluttony — A sinner who is guilty of Gluttony thinks, “I am the center of the universe, so I deserve these three extra pieces of pie every night. This is my reward for myself for being so fabulous.”

7) Lust — A sinner who is guilty of Lust thinks, “I am the center of the universe, so my needs take precedence over the needs of everyone else. If I want to get laid, it’s OK if I lie to get someone in bed and never call that person afterward. My sexual pleasure is more important than the hurt of someone who realizes that he or she has been used.”

In Dante’s Purgatory, the repentant sinners purge these sins in the order of the sins’ evil, starting with Pride.

By the way, according to Dante’s Inferno:

What is at the center of the universe?

The Earth.

What is at the center of the Earth?

Lucifer.

What is at the center of Lucifer?

His rectum.

What is at the center of Lucifer’s rectum?

Former food that isn't food anymore.

***

Perhaps, when Philautia, whose name means "Self-Love," drinks from the Fountain of Self-Love, the water has no effect on her. She already loves herself above all others.

Supposedly, when the others drink from the Fountain of Self-Love, they begin to love themselves above all others.

Actually, they all seem full of Self-Love even before drinking from the Fountain of Self-Love.

Amorphus is the first to drink from the Fountain of Self-Love, and he immediately says some egotistic things about himself, but even before he drinks the cursed water he is shocked that the nymph Echo runs away from him.

Still, after drinking from the Fountain of Self-Love, some of the drinkers say that they are better than Cynthia. Drinking from the Fountain of Self-Love seems to intensify their Self-Love.

CAST OF CHARACTERS (The Magnetic Lady, or Humors Reconciled)

LADY LOADSTONE the magnetic lady; a loadstone is a magnet (something that attracts)

MISTRESS POLISH her gossip (friend and companion) and she-parasite

PLACENTIA STEEL her niece; the Latin word placere means "to give pleasure"

PLEASANCE her waiting-woman and daughter of Polish

MISTRESS KEEP the niece's nurse. She is an old woman.

MOTHER CHAIR the midwife. She is an old woman.

MASTER COMPASS a scholar mathematic

CAPTAIN IRONSIDE a soldier

PARSON PALATE prelate of the parish

DOCTOR RUT physician to the house

TIM ITEM his apothecary

SIR DIAPHANOUS SILKWORM a courtier, a viscount

MASTER PRACTICE a lawyer. "Practice" can mean a trick or scheme.

SIR MOTH INTEREST a usurer, aka money-bawd, and brother to Lady Loadstone

MASTER BIAS a vi-politic [vice-politician, aka assistant to an official], or sub-secretary. He engages in political manipulation on behalf of another person. He is an assistant to a politician. According to the Oxford English Dictionary, one meaning of politician is “A schemer or plotter; a shrewd, sagacious, or crafty person.”

MASTER NEEDLE the lady’s steward and tailor

A FOOTBOY a boy-servant

A VARLET an official with the power to make arrests

CHORUS by way of Induction

MASTER PROBEE the Latin word probare means “to approve”; the name suggests “probity” (honesty and decency)

MASTER DAMPLAY an audience member who can damn a play without having understood it

Note: Master Probee is an example of a member of the intelligent audience whom Ben Jonson hopes will see and enjoy his play. Master Damplay is an example of a member of the unintelligent audience whom Ben Jonson dislikes.

JOHN TRYGUST boy of the house; he is a book-holder or prompter who helps actors when they forget their lines. “Trygust” means “Test Taste.” Plays tend to test the taste of audience members. Will they recognize a good play when they see it?

THE SCENE: LONDON

NOTES:

A compass is a device that uses magnetism to find the direction north.

A compass is also a device used to draw circles.

This society believed that the mixture of four humors in the body determined one’s temperament. One humor could be predominant. The four humors are blood, yellow bile, black bile, and phlegm. If blood is predominant, then the person is sanguine (active, optimistic). If yellow bile is predominant, then the person is choleric (angry, bad-tempered). If black bile is predominant, then the person is melancholic (sad). If phlegm is predominant, then the person is phlegmatic (calm, apathetic, indolent).

Humors are dominant personality characteristics. For example, a person could be optimistic, or angry, or melancholic, or calm, or something else.

A humor can also be a fancy or a whim.

The word “humor” was an in-vogue word in Ben Jonson’s day.

In Ben Jonson’s society, a person of higher rank would use “thou,” “thee,” “thine,” and “thy” when referring to a person of lower rank. (These terms were also used affectionately and between equals.) A person of lower rank would use “you” and “your” when referring to a person of higher rank.

“Sirrah” was a title used to address someone of a social rank inferior to the speaker. Friends, however, could use it to refer to each other.

The word “wench” in Ben Jonson’s time was not necessarily negative. It was often used affectionately.

A “gossip” is a friend or companion or neighbor.

THE INDUCTION, OR CHORUS (The Magnetic Lady, or Humors Reconciled)

Two gentlemen, Master Probee and Master Damplay, walked onto the stage.

A boy named John Trygust, who worked at the theater, met them.

“What do you lack, gentlemen?” he asked them. “What is it you need?”

This was the cry of shopkeepers as they tried to sell things to passersby.

John Trygust continued, “Any fine fancies, figures of speech, humors, characters, ideas, descriptions of lords and ladies?”

Humors are dominant personality characteristics. For example, a person could be optimistic, or angry, or melancholic, or calm, or something else.

John Trygust continued, “Waiting-women, parasites, knights, captains, courtiers, lawyers? What do you lack?”

Parasites are people who live on the wealth of other people.

Plays can supply all of the characters whom John Trygust was offering to the two gentlemen.

“He is a pretty prompt boy for the poetic shop,” Probee said about the boy.

The boy was the prompter for actors who forgot their lines, and he was a prompter trying to get more audience members to see the play.

Damplay said, “And he is a bold boy!”

He then asked, “Where’s one of your masters, sirrah? Where is the poet?”

Ben Jonson regarded playwrights as poets. In Elizabethan and Jacobean and Carolinian England, many plays included much poetry in the dialogue.

“Which of them?” John Trygust asked. “Sir, we have several poets who drive that trade now: poets, poetaccios, poetasters, poetitos —”

“Poetaccios, poetasters, poetitos” all are words used for poor, paltry poets.

“And all haberdashers of small wit, I presume,” Damplay said.

Haberdashers dealt with small items that were used in sewing.

Damplay was critical of poets and of plays.

He then said, “We would speak with the poet of the day, boy.”

The poet of the day was the playwright whose play would be performed that day. That playwright was Ben Jonson, author of The Magnetic Lady.

“Sir, he is not here,” John Trygust said. “But I have the dominion and management of the shop for this time under him, and I can show you all the variety the stage will afford for the present.

“Therein you will express your own good qualities, boy,” Probee said.

“And tie us two and make us indebted to you for the gentle office,” Damplay said.

“We are a pair of public persons, this gentleman and myself, who are sent thus coupled to you upon state business,” Probee said.

“Public persons” concern themselves with promoting the well-being of the public. The public is better off if good plays rather than bad plays are performed.

“It concerns only the state of the stage, I hope!” John Trygust said.

In this society, some playwrights were accused of putting political sedition in their plays. If found guilty, such playwrights could be severely punished.

“Oh, you shall know that by degrees, boy,” Damplay said. “No man leaps into a business of state without fording — crossing over — first the state of the business.”

“Business” can mean 1) commerce, and 2) political affairs.

In other words: No man leaps into a commerce of state without fording — crossing over — first the state of the political affairs.

Also in other words: Playwrights need to be concerned about making a profit. To do that, they need to avoid having their play suppressed because of suspected seditious political content.

“We are sent to you, indeed, from the people,” Probee said.

“The people!” John Trygust said. “Which side of the people?”

Liberals or conservatives? House of Peers or House of Commons? Government or the Loyal Opposition? Wealthy or impoverished?

When it comes to politics, much is uncertain, and a playwright may err and be accused of sedition.

“The venison side, if you know it, boy,” Damplay said.

Venison comes from a deer, aka hart. The heart beats more strongly on the left side of the body.

“That’s the left side,” John Trygust said. “I had rather they had been the right.”

The left side is the sinister side. Sinister is Latin for “left.”

“So they are,” Probee said. “Not the faeces [sediment] or grounds of your people, who sit in the oblique caves and wedges of your house, your sinful six-penny mechanics —”

Mechanics are manual laborers. They purchased less expensive tickets than nobles.

“Caves” comes from the Latin caveae, meaning “seats.” The word “wedges” comes from the definition of the Latin cunei, meaning “wedge-shaped seat divisions.”

“But the better and braver — more splendidly dressed — sort of your people!” Damplay said. “Plush-and-velvet outsides that stick to your house round like so many eminences —”

These expensively dressed playgoers decorated the theater like so many supporting columns as they sat in galleries around the theater. They paid more money for tickets and so supported the theater.

“Of clothes, not understandings?” John Trygust said. “They are at pawn.”

A pawn is used as collateral for debt, but in this society, a pawn is also a peacock, whose brilliant feathers are like the expensive clothing of some playgoers.

He continued, “Well, I take these as a part of your people, though.”

These expensively dressed playgoers are like Damplay: more splendid in clothing than intelligence.

John Trygust then asked, “What do you bring to me from these people?”

“You have heard, boy, the ancient poets had it in their purpose always to please this people?” Damplay asked.

Probee began, “Aye, their chief aim was —”

Damplay interrupted, “— populo ut placerent (if he understands so much).”

He was not certain that John Trygust understood Latin.

John Trygust did understand Latin and he finished the quotation: “— quas fecissent fabulas.”

Populo ut placerent quas fecissent fabulas is Latin for “Whatever plays they make should please the people” (Terence, Andria, Prologue, 3).

He continued, “I understand that since I learned Terence in the third form at Westminster. Go on, sir.”

“Third form” is a junior grade at school.

Probee said, “Now, these people have employed us to you in all their names to ask for an excellent play from you.”

“For they have had very mean — inferior — plays from this shop of late, the stage, as you call it,” Damplay said.

John Trygust said, “Truly, gentlemen, I have no wares that I dare thrust upon the people with praise. But this, such as it is, I will venture with — risk to have appear before — your people, your gay gallant people, so long as you again will undertake for them that they shall know a good play when they hear it and will have the conscience and ingenuity and nobility of mind and high-mindedness besides to confess it.”

The boy wanted Probee and Damplay to guarantee the audience's fairness. He wanted the two men to guarantee that the audience would recognize a good play when they saw it and that they would be fair-minded enough to confess that it was a good play.

Probee replied, "We'll pass our words for that. We'll vouch for it. You shall have a brace — a pair — of us to engage ourselves."

"You'll tender your names, gentlemen, to our book then?" John Trygust said.

This was metaphorically a book in a shop. A person would make a purchase on credit, and the person's name would be written in an account book. Probee and Damplay would stay and see the play: That was their purchase. They would also give their words to fairly evaluate the play.

"Yes, here's Master Probee, a man of most powerful speech and parts to persuade," Damplay said.

"And Master Damplay, who will make good all he undertakes," Probee said.

John Trygust said:

"Good Master Probee and Master Damplay! I like your securities: I trust your assurances.

"Whence do you write yourselves? Where do you come from?"

Probee said, "We are of London; we are gentlemen, but knights' brothers and knights' friends, I assure you."

They were younger brothers. In the tradition of primogeniture, the oldest son would inherit the bulk of the father's estate.

Damplay added, “And we are knights’ fellows, too. Every poet writes ‘squire’ now.”

England was and is a class-conscious society. An esquire is a gentleman, and sometimes poets’ publishers would add “esquire” to the name of the authors they published, whether or not the author actually had the right to use that title.

Historically, a squire or esquire was a knight’s attendant, one who hoped to himself become a knight.

“You are good names!” John Trygust said. “Very good men, both of you! I accept you.”

Damplay asked, “And what is the title of your play here? The Magnetic Lady?”

“Yes, sir, an attractive title that the author has given it,” John Trygust said.

“Attractive” means 1) pleasing, and 2) having magnetic force.

Probee said, “A magnete, I warrant you.”

He was confirming that the title was attractive, as a magnet is attractive. Such a title would attract an audience.

Damplay said, “Oh, no, from magnus, magna, magnum!”

Damplay’s Latin was faulty. Magnus, magna, magnum is a first and second declension adjective meaning “big” or “great.” Probee, however, was not using that adjective. A magnete means “from a magnet.” Magnes is the Latin word for “magnetic” or “magnet.” It is mixed (third) declension.

John Trygust pointed to Probee, whose Latin was correct, and said, “This gentleman has found the true magnitude —”

Damplay interrupted, “— of his portal or entry to the work, according to Vitruvius.”

Vitruvius was a Roman architect. A portal could be an elaborate entrance to a theater.

John Trygust said:

“Sir, all our work is done without a portal — or Vitruvius. “In foro, as a true comedy should be.”

This comedic play did not have an elaborate set. In foro is Latin for “in an open court or space.” Classical comedies also did not have elaborate sets and were in foro.

He continued:

“And what is concealed within is brought out and made present by report.”

In classical plays, important events that happened offstage would be reported by a messenger or other person. In The Magnetic Lady, a dinner party occurs offstage and some of the characters on stage report on the events that happen during it.

“We see that is not always observed by your authors of these times, or scarcely any other,” Damplay said.

Modern authors often did not follow the traditions observed by classical playwrights.

Such traditions included the three unities: unity of action, unity of time, and unity of place. Ben Jonson sometimes followed these unities:

The play had one main plot, with no subplots.

The play took place within one day.

The play took place in one main location.

John Trygust said, “Where it is not at all known, how should it be observed? The most of those your people call authors never dreamed of any decorum or what was proper in the scene, but grope at it in the dark and feel or fumble for it. I speak it both with their leave and the leave of your people.”

“Leave” means “permission.”

Yes, many playwrights of Ben Jonson’s time didn’t know much about stage theory.

Damplay asked, “But why is the play subtitled Humors Reconciled, I would like to know?”

By the end of this play, after some major revelations, all the characters will be reconciled to truth. The Magnetic Lady is a comedy and has a happy ending.

“I can satisfy you there, too — if you will,” John Trygust said. “But perhaps you desire not to be satisfied.”

“No?” Damplay asked. “Why should you conceive that to be so, boy?”

John Trygust said:

“My conceit — my understanding — is not ripe yet; I’ll tell you that soon.”

He was not sure how much to tell Damplay about the play. Often, it is better to simply watch a play without knowing much before seeing it. It is true, however, that a little knowledge can whet the appetite for seeing a play.

John Trygust continued:

“The author, Ben Jonson, beginning his studies of this kind with Every Man In His Humor and afterward, Every Man Out of His Humor, and since, continuing in all his plays (especially those of the comic thread whereof The New Inn was the most recent) some recent humors still, or manners of men, which went along with the times, finding himself now near the close or shutting up of his circle, has fancied to himself in idea and his imagination this magnetic mistress.”

Ben Jonson’s emblem (heraldic device) had the motto Deest quod duceret orbem: That which should complete the circle is lacking.

Ben Jonson, however, saw The Magnetic Lady as his last comedy of manners, one that would close the circle of his plays about humors. One more play by Jonson appeared on stage after The Magnetic Lady — A Tale of a Tub — but that play may be a revision of a play he wrote at or near the beginning of his career.

John Trygust continued:

“A lady, a brave, bountiful housekeeper [keeper of a house, not a housecleaner] and a virtuous widow, who, having a young niece ripe for a man and marriageable, Ben Jonson makes that his center attractive to draw thither a diversity of guests, all persons of different humors to make up his perimeter and circumference. And this he has called Humors Reconciled.”

The center of Ben Jonson’s comedy is the magnetic lady, who is virtuous and attractive and attracts people to her house.

The subtitle of Ben Jonson’s comedy is Humors Reconciled.

“A bold undertaking!” Probee said. “And far greater than the reconciliation and harmony of both churches — Protestant and Catholic — the quarrel between humors having been much the ancients and, in my poor opinion, the root of all schism and faction, both in church and commonwealth.”

John Trygust said:

“Such is the opinion of many wise men who meet at this shop still, but how Ben Jonson will succeed in this play we cannot tell, and he himself (it seems) less cares.

“For he will not be entreated by us to give it a prologue. He has lost too much time that way — writing prologues — already, he says. He will not woo the gentle, well-born ignorance so much.

“But not worrying or caring about all vulgar — common and ordinary — censure, as not depending on common approbation, he is confident it shall super-please judicious spectators, and to them he leaves it to work with the rest by example or otherwise.”

Ben Jonson was confident that his play would greatly appeal to judicious spectators, and he hoped that judicious spectators would be good examples for less judicious spectators to follow.

“He may be deceived in that, boy,” Damplay said. “Few follow examples now, especially if the examples are good.”

John Trygust said:

“The play is ready to begin, gentlemen, I tell you, lest you might defraud the expectation of the people for whom you are delegates!

“Please take a couple of seats and plant yourselves here as near my standing — where I stand — as you can.

“May everything you see fly to the mark.”

In other words: May every satiric arrow hit its target.

John Trygust continued:

“Judge it to be good or bad freely — as long as you don’t interrupt the series of dialogue or thread of the plot, to break or pucker and disrupt it with unnecessary questions.

“For I must tell you (not out of my own dictamen and command, but the author’s), a good play is like a skein of silk that, if you take it up by the right end, you may wind off at pleasure on the bottom or card of your discourse in a tale or so, how you will.”

A bottom is a core that thread is wound around.

A card is a comb with iron teeth used to comb fibers.

John Trygust continued:

“But if you light on the wrong end, you will metaphorically pull all into a knot or elf-lock (tangled hair), which nothing but the shears or a candle will undo or separate.”

The knots and tangles must be cut out or burned off.

“Wait!” Damplay said. “Who are these people, I ask you?”

He had seen some actors just offstage. The play was about to start.

John Trygust said, “Because it is your first question, and these are the prime — first and best — persons in the play, it would in civility require an answer. But I have heard the poet affirm that the most unlucky scene in a play is that which needs an interpreter, especially when the auditory are awake, and such are you, he presumes.”

Do good plays require interpreters? Ancient plays often had a chorus that commented on the action of the play.

Probee and Damplay are the interpreters of this play; they form a chorus that will comment on the action of this play.

John Trygust concluded:

“Ergo — therefore — pay attention.”

Probee and Damplay took their seats and watched the beginning of the play.

ACT 1 (The Magnetic Lady, or Humors Reconciled)

— 1.1 —

Compass and Captain Ironside met on the street in front of Lady Loadstone's house. Compass studied mathematics and its application to other sciences, and Captain Ironside was a soldier. They were friends and worthy men. The two men were "brothers," but not in a biological sense.

Lady Loadstone was hosting a dinner, and Compass wanted Captain Ironside to attend the dinner with him.

Compass greeted his friend:

"Welcome, good Captain Ironside, and brother, you shall go along with me. I'm lodged nearby here at a noble lady's house on the street, the Lady Loadstone's. She is one who will bid us welcome.

"At her house there are gentlewomen and male guests of different humors [strong personality characteristics], carriage [social behavior], constitution [disposition], and profession [belief, or occupation], too, but so diametrically opposed one to another and so much opposed that, if I can but hold them all together and draw them to a sufferance and tolerance of each other just until the dissolution — the end — of the dinner, I shall have just occasion to believe my wit is magisterial, and we ourselves shall take infinite delight in the outcome."

A magisterial intelligence is a masterful intelligence. The magisterium is the philosopher's stone, which was greatly desired by alchemists. It was thought to be able to turn lead into gold. A magisterial intelligence can turn pen and paper into a literary masterwork.

Compass was looking forward to the dinner. Many different personality types would attend Lady Loadstone's dinner, and there was great potential for arguments to break out. He had a reputation for getting along with many different kinds of people, and he wanted to test his ability to keep the guests at the dinner peaceful. But if he failed and arguments broke out, then that would provide entertainment for his friend Captain Ironside and him. And if at the end all arguments were resolved, that also would be a comedy.

Captain Ironside replied, “Truly, brother Compass, you shall pardon me. I don’t love so to multiply the number of my acquaintances when doing so can ruin a meal. It will take away much from my freedom and bind me to follow the most trivial customs of etiquette.”

He preferred to eat in peace and quiet and not to engage in the customs of etiquette that required people to get along with and be polite to other people whom they disliked.

Compass said, “Why, Ironside, you know I am a scholar and am in part a soldier; I have been employed by some of the greatest statesmen of the kingdom these many years, and in my time I have conversed with people who had various kinds of humors, suiting myself so to company, with the result that honest men and knaves, goodfellows and revelers, hypocrites, all sorts of people, although never so divided and separated by differences in and among themselves, have labored to agree still in their treatment and handling of me (which has been fair, too).”

In other words: Although all of these people I have met in my life are very different from each other, they have always treated me fairly (as I have treated them).

Captain Ironside said:

“Sir, I confess you to be one well read — knowledgeable — in men and manners, and that usually the most ungoverned and uncontrolled persons, you being present, would rather subject themselves to your censure — your criticism and judgment — than give you the least occasion of distaste and displeasure by making you the target of their jokes.”

Captain Ironside agreed that other people, even the most ungoverned, treated Compass well because they respected him. In turn, Compass treated them well.

Captain Ironside continued:

“But — to deal plainly with you, as a brother — whenever I distrust my own valor, I’ll never rely upon another’s wit and intelligence, or attempt to rescue or save myself by relying on the opinion of your judgment, gravity, discretion, or whatever else.”

The Oxford English Dictionary has as one meaning of “valor” this: “Worth or importance due to personal qualities or to rank.”

The dinner would include people of different social ranks, but even if Captain Ironside were to be of a lower social rank than some or all of the other dinner guests and got in an argument with someone, he would not rely on Compass to smooth things over.

Captain Ironside continued:

“But, if I am absent, you’re sure to have less wit-work — that is, less need to use your ingenuity and intelligence — gentle brother, my humor being as stubborn as the rest, and as unmanageable.”

Captain Ironside was aware that if he attended the dinner, he could very well get into one or more arguments.

Compass replied, “You mistake my characterization and valuation of your friendship all this while, or at what rate I reckon your assistance, knowing by long experience, to such animals, half-hearted creatures as these are, your fox — your sword — there, unkennelled and unsheathed with a choleric, angry, ghastly aspect, or two or three comminatory — threatening — terms, would make them run in their fears to any hole of shelter, worth a day's laughter. I am for the sport — the entertainment — and for nothing else.”

Part of the entertainment would be to see Captain Ironside, if he had need to, frighten cowards who attack him and make them run away. He would use his fox — a type of sword — to do that.

Captain Ironside objected:

“But brother, I have seen a coward, meeting with a man as valiant as our Saint George (not knowing him to be such, or having the least opinion that he was so), set upon him roundly, aye, and swinge — beat — him soundly.

“And in the virtue and strength of that error, having once overcome, resolved forever after to err, and think no person nor no creature more valiant than himself.”

Sometimes cowards get lucky in a fight, even when they are fighting a valiant man (and especially when they don't realize the man is valiant).

Compass said:

“I think that, too.

“But, brother, if I could over-entreat you and persuade you to do more than you want to do, I have a little plot against the other dinner guests.

“If you would be contented to endure a sliding, passing reprehension and condemnation and finding of faults at my hands, to hear yourself or your profession glanced at — criticized indirectly — in a few slighting terms, it would beget me such a main — strong — authority on the by (as a result) and do yourself no disrepute at all.”

Compass' plot involves him criticizing Captain Ironside and his profession of soldier. This criticism, he says, would benefit him and would have no ill effect on Captain Ironside.

Captain Ironside replied:

“Compass, I know that universal causes in nature produce nothing except as meeting particular causes, to determine those and specify their acts.”

Aristotle did not accept Plato's theory of ideal Forms. He did think that common, universal characteristics existed, but only in relation to material examples. Instead of believing in the ideal Form of Tree, Aristotle recognized that many individual trees existed and they shared common, universal characteristics that identified them as being trees.

Captain Ironside continued:

“This is a piece of Oxford science and philosophy that has stayed with me ever since I left that place, and I have often found the truth thereof in my private passions and feelings.

“For I never feel myself perturbed with any general words against my profession of soldiery, unless by some smart stroke upon myself they awake and stir me.”

In other words: General condemnations against the military profession did not bother Captain Ironside. What would make him angry was a condemnation made directly against him: an individual soldier.

Captain Ironside continued:

“In addition, to wise and well-experienced men, words carry only superficial meaning. They have no power, except with dull grammarians, whose souls are nothing but a syntaxis — arrangement — of them.”

A proverb stated, “Words are but wind.”

A physical attack on Captain Ironside, however, would be strongly resisted by him.

Seeing someone coming toward them, Compass said:

“Here comes our parson, Parson Palate here, a ‘venerable youth’! I must greet him.

“And he’s a great clerk and cleric! He’s going to the lady’s, and, although you see him thus without his cope, I dare assure you, he’s our parish pope.”

A cope is an outer ecclesiastical garment. Parson Palate was not wearing one.

Parson Palate walked over to them.

Compass said, “May God save my reverend clergyman, Parson Palate!”

— 1.2 —

“The witty Master Compass!” Parson Palate replied. “How is it with you? How are you?”

Compass replied, “My lady waits for you and for your counsel touching — concerning — her niece, Mistress Placentia Steel, who strikes the fire of fully fourteen years old today, ripe for a husband.”

Flint striking steel creates a spark that can light a fire.

The fire she is experiencing is metaphorical: Placentia Steel has reached puberty and is feeling sexual fire.

In this society, fourteen was a young age for a bride.

Parson Palate said:

“Aye, she chimes, she chimes.”

The chimes, as of a bell ringing the time, announce that she's ready and ripe enough to be married. She rings out her sexual desirability.

He continued:

“Have you seen the Doctor Rut, the house physician? He's sent for, too.”

“Sent for to counsel her?” Compass said. “It's time you were there. Make haste and give it a round, brisk, quick dispatch, so that we may go to dinner in good time, parson, and drink a health or two more to the business.”

Parson Palate exited.

Captain Ironside said, “This is a strange put-off!”

He felt that Compass had been rude to Parson Palate in how he had sent him on his way.

Captain Ironside continued:

“He is a reverend youth, and you treat him very surreverently — not reverently — I think.

“What do you call him? Palate Please? Or Parson Palate?”

Compass said:

“All's one, but shorter.”

Indeed, “Palate Please” is one syllable shorter than “Parson Palate.” Both together mean that he is a parson who pleases his palate.

Compass continued:

“I can give you a description of his character.”

Compass then described the parson's character, in couplets:

“He is the prelate of the parish here

“And governs all the dames, appoints the cheer [food and entertainment], “Writes down the bills of fare, pricks [records] all the guests,

“Makes all the matches and the marriage feasts

“Within the ward, draws up all the parish wills,

“Designs [Arranges] the legacies, and strokes the gills

“Of the chief mourners.”

Tickling the gills of trout was a way of catching them. Metaphorically, Parson Palate flatters the chief mourners as a preparation for taking money from them.

Compass continued:

“And, whoever lacks

“Of all the kindred, he has first his blacks [black hangings for funerals].”

Parson Palate probably rents out the black hangings as a source of income.

The “whoever lacks” is ambiguous. It can refer to 1) a lack of money, or 2) a lack of a family member due to death.

Compass continued:

“Thus holds he weddings up, and burials,

“As his main tithing [source of income], with the gossips’ stalls,

“Their pews.”

Parson Palate makes money by renting pews to godparents, aka gossips.

Compass continued:

“He’s top still [always] at the public mess [always sits at the head of the table], “Comforts the widow and the fatherless

“In funeral sack [sackcloth], sits above the alderman,

“For of the wardmote quest [a town ward’s judicial inquiry] he better can [knows]

“The mystery than the Levitic law.”

“That piece of clerkship [scholarship] does his vestry awe.”

Parson Palate understood secular law better than he understood church law. Many parsons attempted to understand such mysteries as the Trinity, but Parson Palate worked to understand secular mysteries. The people in his congregation were awed by his knowledge of secular law.

Compass continued:

“He is as he conceives himself, a fine,

“Well-furnished and apparellèd divine.”

Parson Palate concerned himself much with his income, and he knew much about secular matters. He also had a high opinion of himself and was very well dressed.

Different kinds of ‘fine’ exist. A person can have a fine figure or a fine mind.

Different kinds of “well-furnished” exist. The phrase can refer to a house that has fine furniture or to a well-stocked mind.

Actor/writer/director/raconteur Peter Ustinov was once asked why he read so many books. He replied that since he was a prisoner of his mind, he wanted it to be well furnished.

The description of Parson Palate was an epigram: a short witty poem.

“Who made this epigram?” Captain Ironside asked. “You?”

“No, the one who made it is as great clerk — scholar — as any is of his bulk,” Compass said. “Ben Jonson made it.”

This is true: Ben Jonson wrote The Magnetic Lady.

Ben Jonson was a bulky — heavy — man. At one time, he was just short of 20 stone, or 280 pounds. According to Jonson, he had a “mountain belly.”

Jonson’s knowledge of literature, including classical literature, was impressive: It was weighty.

“But what is the character description of Doctor Rut?” Captain Ironside asked.

Compass replied:

“The same man — Ben Jonson — made both character descriptions, but the description of Doctor Rut is shorter, and not in rhymed couplets, but unrhymed blank verse.

“I’ll tell you that, too.

“Rut is a young physician to the family, who, letting God alone, ascribes to nature more than her share.”

In a religious age, he ignored God and God’s help in healing.

Compass continued:

“He is licentious in discourse.”

In other words: He says more than he should.

Compass continued:

“And in his life he is a self-confessed voluptuary and lewd sexualist.

“He is the slave of money, a low buffoon and cruel fool in manners.

“He is obscene and indecorous in language, which he vents and speaks for wit.

“He is saucy and insolent in his logics and disputing.

“He is anything but civil or a man.”

Seeing people approaching them, Compass said, “Look, here they are!”

Lady Loadstone, Parson Palate, and Doctor Rut entered the scene.

Compass said to Captain Ironside:

“And they are walking with My Lady in consultation before the door.

“We will slip in as if we didn’t see them.”

Compass and Captain Ironside exited the scene and entered Lady Loadstone’s house, where Compass resided.

— 1.3 —

Lady Loadstone, Parson Palate, and Doctor Rut talked about Placentia Steel, Lady Loadstone’s niece. Today was her fourteenth birthday, and Lady Loadstone believed that she was ready to be married.

“Aye, it is his fault that my niece, Placentia, is not bestowed and given in marriage,” Lady Loadstone said. “It is my brother Interest’s fault.”

“Who, old Sir Moth?” Parson Palate asked.

“He keeps off all her suitors, keeps her marriage portion still in his hands, and will not part with it on any terms,” Lady Loadstone said.

The marriage portion was Placentia's dowry. Sir Interest Moth had control of the money until Placentia was married.

Mathew 6:19-20 (King James Version) states:

“19: Lay not up for yourselves treasures upon earth, where moth and rust doth corrupt, and where thieves break through and steal:

“20: But lay up for yourselves treasures in heaven, where neither moth nor rust doth corrupt, and where thieves do not break through nor steal.”

Sir Interest Moth, however, was a usurer, and he was busy laying up for himself treasure on earth.

“Hinc illae lachrimae,” Parson Palate said. “Thus flows the cause of the main grievance.”

Hinc illae lachrimae is Latin for “Hence [come] these tears.”

The line is a quotation from Terence, Andria, line 126.

“That — the grievance — it is a main one,” Doctor Rut said. “How much is the marriage portion?”

“No petty sum,” Lady Loadstone said.

“No more or less than sixteen thousand pounds,” Parson Palate said.

“He should be forced, madam, to lay it down and release it,” Doctor Rut said. “When is it payable?”

“When she is married,” Lady Palate said.

“Marry her, marry her, madam,” Parson Palate said.

“Get her married,” Doctor Rut said. “Lose not a day, an hour —”

Parson Palate interrupted:

“— not a minute. Pursue your project real.”

“Real” can mean 1) genuine, actual, 2) real estate, real property, and/or 3) chattel real — a lease or ward.

Placentia Steel is a ward of Lady Loadstone.

Hmm. Fourteen is a young age to be married. The haste for Placentia Steel to be married may have much to do with getting sixteen thousand pounds out of the hands of Sir Moth Interest, the brother of Lady Loadstone. But there could be a different, additional reason.

Parson Palate continued:

“Master Compass advised you, too. He is the perfect instrument your Ladyship should sail by.”

Parson Palate respected Compass.

Doctor Rut said, “Now, Master Compass is a fine, witty man. I saw him go in just now.”

“Has he gone in?” Lady Loadstone asked.

“Yes, and a feather with him,” Parson Palate said. “He seems to be a soldier.”

Captain Ironside was wearing a feather in his hat. At the time, that was a mark of a military man.

“He is some new suitor, madam,” Doctor Rut said.

“I am beholden to Compass,” Lady Loadstone said. “He always brings a variety of good persons to my table, and I must thank him, although my brother Interest dislikes and disapproves of it a little.”

“Sir Moth Interest likes nothing that runs your way,” Parson Palate said. “If you like something, he doesn’t like it.”

“Truly, and the other — Compass — doesn’t care about Sir Moth Interest’s opinion,” Doctor Rut said. “Compass will go his own way, if he thinks it right.”

Lady Loadstone said:

“Compass is a true friend.

“And there’s Master Practice, the fine young man of law who comes to the house. My brother does not tolerate him because he thinks that Master Practice is by me assigned for — intended to marry — my niece.

“My brother will not hear of it.”

Doctor Rut said:

“Not of that ear.”

“To hear of both ears” means to be impartial and to hear both sides of an argument. In this case, Sir Moth Interest is metaphorically deaf in one ear and will not hear the argument that Placentia ought to marry the lawyer Master Practice.

“But yet Your Ladyship does wisely in it —”

Parson Palate interrupted:

“— it will make him to lay down the marriage portion sooner, if he but dreams you’ll match her with a lawyer.”

A lawyer would know how to get the dowry money from Sir Moth Interest.

“So Master Compass says,” Lady Loadstone said. “It is between the lawyer and the courtier who shall have and marry Placentia.”

“Who, Sir Diaphanous Silkworm?” Parson Palate asked.

Yes, Sir Diaphanous Silkworm was the courtier.

“A fine gentleman,” Doctor Rut said. “He is Old Master Silkworm’s heir.”

Parson Palate said, “And he is a neat, well-dressed courtier, of a most elegant thread — appearance and clothing.”

“And so my gossip — my companion — Polish assures me,” Lady Loadstone said. “Here she comes!”

Mistress Polish entered the scene.

Lady Loadstone said, “Good Polish, you are welcome, truly! How are thou, gentle Polish?”

“Who’s this?” Doctor Rut whispered to Parson Palate.

Parson Palate quietly answered, “She is Dame Polish, the she-parasite of Lady Loadstone. She is her much-talking, soothing and flattering, sometime governing gossip.”

A she-parasite is a female dependent.

A gossip is a friend or companion.

Mistress Polish had been Placentia’s guardian.

— 1.4 —

Madame Polish said, “Your Ladyship is still the Lady Loadstone who draws and draws to you guests of all sorts: the courtiers, the soldiers, the scholars, the travelers, physicians, and divines, as Doctor Ridley wrote, and Doctor Barlow! They both have written about you and Master Compass.”

Mark Ridley wrote The Navigators Supply (1597), and William Barlow wrote Magneticall Advertisements ... experiments concerning the nature and properties of the Load-stone (1616).

“We intend that they shall write more before long,” Lady Loadstone said.

Mistress Polish said:

“Alas, they are both dead, if it please you.”

“If it please you” means “I hope you don’t mind my saying so.”

Mark Ridley had died in 1624, and William Barlow had died in 1625.

Mistress Polish continued:

“But Your Ladyship means well, and shall mean well, so long as I live.

“How does your fine niece, my charge, Mistress Placentia Steel? How is she?”

A “charge” is a responsibility.

Mistress Polish helped take care of her charge: Placentia Steel.

“She is not well,” Lady Loadstone said.

“Not well?” Mistress Polish asked.

“Her doctor says so,” Lady Loadstone said.

Doctor Rut said:

“She is not very well.

“She cannot shoot arrows at butts [targets] and practice archery, or manage and ride a great warhorse, but she can crunch a sack of small coal-cinder, eat limestone and hair, soap-ashes [wood ashes used in making soap], loam, and she has a dainty, delicate, delightful spice — perfume — of the green sickness.”

The green sickness is anemia brought about by puberty in young women and causing a faint greenish complexion. Some of the odd “snacks” listed here may replace iron lost through menstruation. An unusual appetite for odd items is a sign of anemia due to iron deficiency — and it is a sign of pregnancy.

This society believed that green sickness afflicted virgins, and one cure was to marry the young woman to a man.

Sir Moth Interest was willing for Placentia to continue to be sick and not marry because he would keep control of her money.

Now that Placentia was a young woman, she was giving up male exercises such as target shooting and riding large horses. She was no longer a tomboy.

“Od shield!” Mistress Polish said.

This means, “God shield and protect us!”

Doctor Rut then said:

“Or she has a dainty, delicate, delightful spice — perfume — of the dropsy.”

Dropsy is edema, which causes swelling, including a bloated stomach.

He continued:

“The illness is a toy, a trifle, a thing of nothing.

“But My Lady here, her noble aunt —”

Mistress Polish said, “She is a noble aunt, and a right worshipful — distinguished and worthy of respect — lady, and a virtuous one, I know it well.”

Doctor Rut said, “Well, if you know it, peace — be quiet.”

“Good sister Polish, hear your betters speak,” Parson Palate said.

Mistress Polish said:

“Sir, I will speak, with My good Lady’s leave, and speak and speak again.

“I did bring up My Lady’s niece, Mistress Placentia Steel, with my own daughter, who’s Placentia, too, and waits upon My Lady as her serving-woman.”

“Placentia” means “pleasure.” So does “Pleasance,” which is the name of Mistress Polish’s daughter. So both have the same name: Pleasure.

“Her Ladyship well knows Mistress Placentia Steel, as I said, her curious — fastidious and discriminating — niece, was left a legacy to me — bequeathed to me — by father and mother, along with the nurse, Keep, who tended her.”

In other words, Mistress Polish became Placentia’s guardian.

“Her mother died in childbed of complications resulting from her birth, and her father lived for not long afterward because he loved her mother.

“They were a godly couple!

“Yet both died, as must we all. No creature is immortal, I have heard our pastor say, no, not even the faithful, and they did die, as I said, both in one month —”

The first part of Psalm 89:48 states, “What man is he that liveth, and shall not see death?” (King James Version).

Doctor Rut whispered to Parson Palate, “Surely Mistress Polish is not likely to be long-lived, if she expends and wastes her breath like this.”

Mistress Polish continued:

“And did bequeath her to my care and hand to polish and bring up.”

The polish would be acquired through education and training.

Mistress Polish continued:

“I molded her and fashioned her and formed her; she had the sweat both of my brows and brains, My Lady knows it, since she could write a quarter old.”

The words “since she could write a quarter old” mean “since she — Pleasance — was a week old.”

The word “quarter” means “a fourth of a lunar month.”

Pleasance’s mother died giving birth to her, and her father quickly died afterward in the same month, and so Pleasance became Mistress Polish’s ward when Pleasance was one fourth of a lunar month old — one week old.

One meaning of “write” is “to be age [such-and-such].”

To tease Mistress Polish, Lady Loadstone interpreted “write” in the sense of “writing letters and words”:

“I don’t know that she could write so early, my good gossip.

“But I do know that she was so long in your care until she was twelve years old. It was then that I called for her and took her home, for which I thank you, Polish, and I am beholden to you.”

Doctor Rut whispered to Parson Palate, "I for sure thought that she had a lease of talking for nine lives —"

A lease is a legal arrangement. Some leases can be for a lifetime, but some were for more than one lifetime so the lease would apply to descendants. But if Mistress Polish were like a cat and had nine lives, she would be talking throughout each of them.

Parson Palate interrupted, "— it may be she has."

Overhearing him, Mistress Polish said to Parson Palate:

"Sir, sixteen thousand pounds was then her portion, for she was indeed their only child. And this was to be paid upon her marriage, provided that she married still — consistent — with My good Lady's liking here, her aunt.

"I heard the will read: Master Steel, her father, the world condemned him to be very rich and very hard, and he did stand condemned with that vain world until, as it was proved afterward, he left almost as much more to good uses in Sir Moth Interest's hands, the hands of My Lady's brother, whose sister Master Steel had married.

"Sir Moth Interest holds all the money in his close grip."

Master Steel had married the sister of Lady Loadstone and Sir Moth Interest. Sir Moth was now the trustee of Master Steel's estate, including the money that was supposed to go to charity and the money that was supposed to be Placentia's dowry.

Master Steel had left almost sixteen thousand pounds to good uses — charity. But since Sir Moth Interest was taking care of the money, and since as a usurer he considered earning interest to be a good use of money, he was probably using the money in usury.

“But Master Steel was liberal and generous, and he was a fine man, and his wife was a dainty dame, and she was a religious, and a bountiful —”

— 1.5 —

Compass and Captain Ironside now stepped forward.

They had entered somewhat earlier and had listened to the conversation, but now they walked over to the others.

“You knew her, Master Compass?” Mistress Polish asked.

“Her” was Master Steel’s wife, the mother of Placentia.

“Spare the torture,” Compass said. “I do confess without it.”

Some prisoners were tortured to exact confessions.

Compass was tortured by hearing about Master Steel’s wife because it reminded him that she was now dead. He had respected her.

“And her husband?” Mistress Polish asked. “What a fine couple they were, and how they lived?”

“Yes,” Compass said.

“And loved together like a pair of turtledoves?” Mistress Polish asked.

Turtledoves are symbols of constancy in love — they are lovebirds.

“Yes,” Compass said.

“And feasted all the neighbors?” Mistress Polish asked.

“Take her away,” Compass said. “Somebody who has mercy —”

Doctor Rut whispered to Parson Palate, “Oh, he knows Mistress Steel, it seems!”

Compass continued:

“— or any measure of compassion.

“Doctors, if you are Christians, undertake responsibility — one for the soul, the other for the body!”

The doctors were Parson Palate, Doctor of Theology, and Doctor Rut, Doctor of Medicine.

Mistress Polish said, “Mistress Steel would dispute and debate with the Doctors of Divinity at her own table! And the Spital preachers! And find out the errors of the Armenians.”

Preachers spoke Spital Sermons at the Church of St. Mary Spitalfields, which was near the hospital of St. Mary.

Doctor Rut asked, “Do you mean the Arminians?”

Doctor Rut was right. She actually meant the followers of James Arminius, aka Jacobus Arminius, who proposed that God’s sovereignty and human free will are compatible. This was a reaction to the Calvinist belief of predestination: that God chose which human beings he wanted to save; even before they were born, all human beings were predestined either for Heaven or for Hell.

The Arminians can be seen as a middle way between Calvinism and Catholicism.

“I say the Armenians,” Madam Polish said.

“I say so, too!” Compass said.

He wanted to have some fun at her expense.

“So Master Polish called them, the Armenians!’ Mistress Polish said.

“And the Medes and the Persians, didn’t he?” Compass said.

Compass was having fun with her, hoping that she would adopt these malapropisms. And so she did, using “Medes” to refer to those people who were middling — lukewarm — when it came to religious observance. She also used “Persians” to mean Precisians: strict Puritans.

Mistress Polish rose to his expectations:

“Yes, he knew them, and so did Mistress Steel! She was his pupil.

“The Armenians, he would say, were worse than Papists!

“And then the Persians were our Puritans, and they had the fine piercing wits!”

“And who were the Medes?” Compass asked.

“The middlemen, the lukewarm Protestants!” Mistress Polish said.

“Out, out! Bah, bah!” Doctor Rut said. “That’s what I say to the middle way!”

“Sir, she would find them by their branching: their branching sleeves, branched cassocks, and branched doctrine, beside their texts,” Mistress Polish said.

“Branching” and “branched” usually refer to embroidery, but when Mistress Polish refers to “branching doctrine,” she means “branching away from true religion,” aka “causing a schism or heresy.”

“Stint, carline!” Doctor Rut said. “Stop, old woman! I’ll not listen to her. Confute her, parson.”

A “carline” is an old woman.

“I respect no persons, chaplains, or doctors. I will speak,” Mistress Polish said.

By “persons,” Mistress Polish meant “parsons.”

“Yes,” Lady Loadstone said. “As long as she speaks reason, let her.”

Doctor Rut said, “Death, she cannot speak reason.”

“Death” is an oath: “By God’s death.”

“Nor can she speak sense, if we are masters of our senses,” Compass said.

Captain Ironside said, “What madwoman have they got here to bait — to torment?”

An entertainment of the time was bear-baiting, an activity in which dogs tormented a bear that was tied to a stake.

Another entertainment: Some people visited mentally ill people and laughed at them.

Mistress Polish said, “Sir, I am mad in truth and to the purpose, and I cannot but be mad, to hear My Lady’s dead sister slighted, witty Mistress Steel!”

Chances are, Her Lady’s dead sister was not slighted, just Mistress Polish’s interpretation of what Her Lady’s sister believed.

Captain Ironside said, “If she had a wit, death has gone near to spoil it, assure yourself.”

In other words: Death has destroyed her good intelligence.

Mistress Polish said:

“She was both witty [intelligent] and zealous in her faith, and she lighted all the tinder of the truth — she inspired fervor — (as one said) of religion in our parish.

“She was too learned to live long with us!

“She could — she conned and knew — the Bible in the holy tongue, Hebrew, and read it without pricks.”

To read Hebrew without pricks means to read it without torment: to read it fluently.

Also, “pricks” can refer to marks on Hebrew vowels. To read Hebrew without those linguistic marks would be difficult.

Mistress Polish continued:

“She had all her Masoreth; she knew Burton and his Bull, and scribe Prynne, gent., presto-begone, and all the Pharisees!”

Masoreth is a learned edition of the Talmud: a compilation of Jewish civil and ceremonial law and legend.

Henry Burton published The Baiting of the Popes Bull in 1627.

William Prynne was a militant Puritan who made attacks in his writings upon church policy under the Archbishop of Canterbury: William Laud. Because of his work Histriomastix, in which he criticized theater, he was accused of criticizing the Queen of England, who had performed in a play. The Queen was Henrietta Maria of France, who was married to King Charles I of England. As a result, Prynne spent time in the pillory, and suffered the amputation of both of his ears. Mistress Polish perhaps calls him “gent.” instead of “gentleman” because anyone who attacks and criticizes the Queen is not a gentleman. Some of his works list as the author “William Prynne, gent. Lincolnshire.”

John Presto was a Protestant divine. The word “prestidigitation” refers to entertaining magic tricks.

“Presto-begone,” however, may also or instead refer to Prester John, a legendary Christian priest-king.

Jesus criticized Pharisees for their public performances of piety.

Lady Loadstone said, “Dear gossip, leave at this time, too, and vouchsafe — condescend — to see your charge: my niece.”

“I shall obey, if Your wise Ladyship thinks fit,” Mistress Polish said. “I know enough to yield to my superiors.”

She exited.

Lady Loadstone said:

“She is a good woman!

“But when Mistress Polish is impertinent and grows earnest and strident, a little troublesome and out of season, then her love and zeal transport her.”

One meaning of “transport” is “to move from this world to the next world.” Another meaning is “to be carried away by emotions.”

Compass said:

“I am glad that anything could port — carry — her away from here. We now have hope of dinner, after her long grace.”

A long grace is a long prayer before a meal.

Compass continued:

“I have brought Your Ladyship a hungry guest here, a soldier and my brother, Captain Ironside, who being by custom and habit grown a sanguinary — someone who loves to shed the blood of others, the solemn and adopted son of slaughter — is more delighted in the chase of an enemy, an execution (in more ways than one) of three days and nights, than he is delighted by all the hope of numerous succession or happiness of issue — many children — could bring to him

—”

In other words, Captain Ironside preferred the act of killing to the act that might result in the production of children.

Doctor Rut whispered to Parson Palate, “He is no suitor to Placentia, then?”

Parson Palate whispered back, “So it would seem.”

Compass continued:

“And, if he can get pardon at heaven’s hand for all his murders, is in as good case as a new-christened infant, his employments continued to him without interruption, and not allowing him either time or place to commit any other sins but those.”

In other words: Captain Ironside has been so busy killing people that he has not been able to commit any other sins such as fornication. If heaven pardons his many killings, then he is as innocent as a newly christened infant.

Compass continued:

“Please make him welcome for a meal, madam.”

Lady Loadstone said, “The nobleness of his profession makes his welcome perfect, although your coarse description would seem to sully it.”

Of course, Compass had previously gotten his friend’s permission to somewhat denigrate his military profession.

Captain Ironside said, “Never, where a beam of so much favor does illustrate and illuminate it, right knowing lady.”

Lady Loadstone had looked approvingly at him as if she knew that he was a good man despite just meeting him.

Parson Palate whispered to Doctor Rut, “She has cured — healed — all well.”

Lady Loadstone was a peacemaker.

Doctor Rut whispered back, “And Captain Ironside has fitted well the compliment.”

He had made a good first impression.

— 1.6 —

Sir Diaphanous Silkworm and Master Practice entered the scene. Sir Diaphanous Silkworm was a courier, and Master Practice was a lawyer. Both were considered suitable suitors for Placentia.

Compass said:

“Here they come! The prime magnetic guests our Lady Loadstone so respects: the Arctic and the Antarctic!”

Sir Diaphanous Silkworm and Master Practice were the most likely male guests to attract other guests. They were the Arctic and the Antarctic: the places where the Earth’s magnetic poles were located.

They were also the two most likely suitors to wed Placentia.

Compass continued:

“Sir Diaphanous Silkworm, a courtier extraordinary who, by diet of meats and drinks, his temperate exercise, choice music, frequent baths, his horary shifts — hourly changes — of shirts and waistcoats, means to immortalize mortality itself, and makes the essence of his whole happiness the trim — fashionable dress — of court!”

“To immortalize mortality” means “to live a very long life.”

“I thank you, Master Compass, for your short encomiastic,” Sir Diaphanous Silkworm said.

By “encomiastic,” he meant “commendation.”

“It is much in little, sir,” Doctor Rut said.

Compass had described the courtier briefly, but well.

Parson Palate said, “It is concise and quick and lively: the true style of an orator.”

Compass said:

“But Master Practice here, My Lady’s lawyer, or man of law (for that’s the true writing): He is a man so dedicated to his profession and the preferments — promotions and privileges — that go along with it, as scarcely the thundering bruit and uproar of an invasion, another fifteen eighty-eight threatening his country with ruin, would no more work upon and affect him than Syracuse’s sack on Archimedes.

“So much he loves that nightcap (lawyer’s cap), the benchgown (lawyer’s formal gown that was worn in court) with the broad guard (ornamental trimming] on the back.”

The year 1588 was the year the Spanish Armada threatened England but was defeated.

Archimedes of Syracuse, Sicily, a famous mathematician and scientist, devised defensive war machines to protect his city; he was killed in 212 B.C.E. by a Roman soldier when Syracuse was sacked. According to legend, Archimedes was engrossed in solving a mathematical problem and so did not notice the Roman soldier.

Compass continued:

“These show a man betrothed — engaged — to the study of our laws!”

Master Practice replied, “You just think that the practice of law is the crafty impositions of subtle clerks, feats of fine understanding to abuse clots (fools) and clowns (more fools) with, Master Compass, having no ground in nature to sustain it or light from those clear causes that to the inquiry and search of which your mathematical head has so devowed and devoted itself.”

Master Practice believed that Compass thought that law lacked the firm foundation and clarity of mathematics, the subject that Compass studied. Law was not mathematical and was not scientific.

Compass replied:

“Tut, all men are philosophers to their inches — to the best of their abilities.

“There inside Lady Loadstone’s house is Sir Interest, as able a philosopher in buying and selling, who has reduced his thrift to certain principles, and in that method, as he will tell you instantly, by logarithms, the utmost profit of a stock (investment) employed, be the commodity (what is traded) what it will, the place or time but causing very, very little, or, I may say, no parallax (alteration) at all, in his pecuniary observations!

“He has brought your niece’s marriage portion with him, madam; at least, he has brought the man who must receive it.”

Compass had referred to Sir Interest, which is an incorrect way to refer to a knight. Sir Moth and Sir Moth Interest are both correct, but not Sir Interest. Such a wrong use of the name indicated Compass’ lack of respect for this man.

Compass noticed Sir Moth Interest and Master Bias entering the scene and said:

“Here they come, negotiating the affair.

“You may perceive the contract in their faces and read the indenture.

“If you’d sign them, so be it.”

An indenture was a contract that was divided into two halves with serrated edges. One half was given to each of the two people who had made the contract.

Compass believed that Sir Moth Interest and Master Bias were motivated mainly by the making of money. Because of that, Lady Loadstone ought to be careful about accepting their idea about whom Placentia ought to marry.

Their idea was that Placentia ought to marry Master Bias.

— 1.7 —

Sir Moth Interest and Master Bias walked over to them.

Sir Moth Interest was a usurer, or money-bawd, and brother to Lady Loadstone.

Master Bias was a vi-politic — a vice-politician, aka assistant to an official. The official was Lord Whach’um: Lord What-You-Call-Him.

Parson Palate asked Compass quietly about Master Bias: “What and who is he, Master Compass?”

Compass answered, “He is a vi-politic, or a sub-aiding (aiding-behind-the-scenes) instrument of state: a kind of laborious, painstaking secretary, one who does all the work, to a great man — and is likely to come on and be successful! He is full of attendance and assiduous service, and of such a stride — so confident — in business, political or economic, that his lord may as well stoop to take advice from him and be told what to do and be directed by him in affairs of highest consequence, when he is dulled or wearied with the less!”

Sir Diaphanous Silkworm the courtier said, “He is Master Bias, Lord Whach’um’s politic.”

A vi-politician can engage in political manipulation. Master Bias probably did some of Lord Whach’um’s dirty work for him.

“You know the man?” Compass asked.

Sir Diaphanous Silkworm answered, “I have seen him wait at court there with his maniples — bundles — of papers and petitions.”

Master Practice the lawyer said:

“He is a man who overrules others, though, by his authority of living there, and he cares for no man else.”

Much of his authority came from his living at court.

Master Practice continued:

“He neglects the sacred letter of the law, and he holds it all to be just a dead heap of civil institutions. It is the rest — the resort, the prop — only of common men and their causes, a farrago, aka hodgepodge, aka confused mass, or a made-dish — something concocted from many ingredients — in court, a thing of nothing.”

“And that’s your quarrel at him?” Compass said. “A just plea.”

Sir Moth Interest said to his sister, Lady Loadstone, “I tell you, sister Loadstone —”

Compass whispered to Captain Ironside, “Hang your ears this way and hear his praises: Now Moth opens.”

Master Practice had given a negative view of Master Bias, and now Sir Moth Interest will give a positive view of Master Bias.

Sir Moth Interest said:

“I have brought you here the very man, the jewel of all the court, close-mouthed and secret Master Bias.”

Personal secretaries know their superiors’ secrets, and so being secretive and close-mouthed can be a good quality in a secretary.

Sir Moth Interest continued:

“Sister, apply him to your side, or you may wear him here on your breast, or hang him in your ear.”

Sir Moth Interest called Master Bias a metaphorical jewel:

“He’s a fit pendant for a lady’s tip — earlobe. He is chrysolite, a gem, the very agate of state and polity. He is cut from the quarry of Machiavelli, as true a cornelian as Tacitus himself, and to be made the brooch to any true state-cap in Europe!”

In other words: He would be an ornament to any politician he assisted. He would help that politician to become more powerful and influential.

According to the Oxford English Dictionary, one meaning of “politician” is “A schemer or plotter; a shrewd, sagacious, or crafty person.”

Machiavelli, who wrote The Prince, had the reputation of being a consummate political manipulator.

Cornelius Tacitus was a Roman historian.

A cornelian is a gemstone, as is a chrysolite and an agate.

Lady Loadstone said, “You praise him, brother, as if you had hope to sell him.”

Compass said, “No, madam, as if he had hope to sell — praise — your niece to him.”

“Beware your true jests, Master Compass,” Lady Loadstone said. “They will not relish or please.”

A proverb states, “There’s many a true word spoken in jest.”

Sir Moth Interest said:

“I will tell you, sister, that I cannot cry his caract — character and carat — up enough: He is unvaluable.”

He meant invaluable: very valuable. “Unvaluable” means 1) very valuable, 2) incalculable, and/or 3) worthless.

Some things, of course, that are valuable in some ways can be worthless in other ways — such as being morally bankrupt.

Sir Moth Interest continued:

“All the lords have him in that esteem for his relations [accounts, narratives of events], courants [express messengers], advice, correspondences and letters with this ambassador and that agent. He will insinuate himself into a statist’s confidence and find out the secret of that statist —”

A statist is a skilled politician.

Compass said, “— as easy as some cobbler worms a dog.”

In this society, a preventative procedure against rabies was to remove a ligament from under a dog’s tongue. This was called “worming” the dog.

Sir Moth Interest continued, “— and lock it in the cabinet of his memory —”

Compass said, “— until it turns into a politic insect or a fly thus long.”

“It” refers to Master Bias’ memory and to Master Bias himself. Master Bias will keep the secret until it becomes politically expedient to reveal it.

Master Bias is a politic insect or fly: something despicable and annoying such as a buzzing fly or other insect.

Sir Moth Interest said, “You may be merry, Master Compass, but although you have the reversion of an office, you are not in it, sir.”

Having the reversion of an office meant having the right to succeed in — being next in line to have — it. Eventually, Compass would have that office.

“Remember that,” Master Bias said.

This was a threat. Someone like Master Bias knew ways to have someone else get that reversion.

Compass said, “Why, should that frighten me, Master Bi-, from telling whose -ass you are?”

Compass had separated the two syllables of Bias’ name so he could call him an ass. Actually, he called him twice-an-ass: a bi-ass.

Sir Moth Interest said, “Sir, he’s one who can do his turns there and deliver, too, his letters as punctually and in as good a fashion as ever a secretary can in court.”

In other words: Master Bias knew the tricks of the trade of political trickery.

Captain Ironside said, “Why, is it any matter in what fashion a man delivers his letters, as long as he does not open them?”

Master Bias said, “Yes, we have certain precedents in court from which we never swerve once in an age, and, whatsoever Compass thinks, I know the arts and sciences do not directlier — more directly — make a graduate in our universities than a habitual gravity prefers a man in court.”

Projecting an aura of gravitas helped a man earn promotions at court. It does that more directly and effectively than having a good education. Sometimes, appearance is more profitable than reality.

Compass said, “Which, by the truer style, some call a formal, flat servility.”

A “truer style” is a truer title or name.

“Formal” means “outward.” It is an outward appearance of gravitas that may not match what is inside the vi-politician. Some politicians and vi-politicians are hypocritical.

Master Bias said:

“Sir, you may call it what you please. But we who tread the path of public businesses know what a tacit shrug is, or a shrink, the wearing the calotte, the politic hood, and twenty other parerga, besides, you secular laymen — you non-political men — don’t understand.”

In politics, people know how to shrink and show fear when needed. They know who wears the calotte: a sergeant-at-law’s hat.

They also know many other things: Parerga means “secondary features.”

Master Bias said to himself:

“I shall trick Compass, if his reversion should come in my lord’s way.”

He would find a way to make Compass’ reversion the reversion of the politician he served.

“What is that, Master Practice?” Sir Diaphanous Silkworm asked. “You surely know Master Compass’ reversion?”

Master Practice said:

“It is a fine place, a fine office: Surveyor of the Projects General.

“I wish I had it.”

The office granted monopolies.

“What is it worth?” Parson Palate asked.

“Oh, sir, it is worth a nemo scit,” Master Practice said.

Nemo scit is Latin for “No one knows,” but no doubt one could guess its worth.

Lady Loadstone said to Sir Moth Interest, “We’ll think about it before dinner.”

She would think about whether Master Bias would be an appropriate suitor for Placentia.

CHORUS 1 (The Magnetic Lady, or Humors Reconciled)

John Trygust asked Probee and Damplay, “Now, gentlemen, what censure — judge — you about our protasis, or first act? What do you think about it?”

“Well, boy, it is a fair presentment of and performance by your actors,” Probee said. “And it is a handsome promise of something to come hereafter.”

“But there is nothing done in it, or concluded,” Damplay said. “Therefore I say, it is no act.”

John Trygust said:

“A fine piece of logic!

“Do you look, Master Damplay, for conclusions in a protasis? I thought the law of comedy had reserved them to the catastrophe, and that the epitasis, as we are taught, and the catastasis had been intervening parts, to have been expected. But you would have all come together, it seems. The clock should strike five at once with the acts.”

In other words: If all the parts of a play occurred at the same time, the play would be over quickly.

Also in other words: The introduction (protasis) of a play is for introducing things; the conclusion (catastrophe) of a play is for concluding things.

In classical drama, plays can be divided into four parts:

Protasis: The introductory part of a play, setting forth the characters and the subject of the play. In Jonson’s play and many other plays, this is the first act.

Epitasis: Trials and tribulations ensue and build toward a climax. In Jonson’s play, the epitasis includes negotiations about who will marry Placentia. The number of suitors increases, and the negotiations become complicated.

Catastasis: The action that was initiated in the epitasis continues, often resulting in the climax of a drama. The climax can be the turning point and/or a point of highest tension. In 4.4, Compass makes an important discovery.

Catastrophe: The conclusion, which in comedies is happy. In comedies, the catastrophe often includes one or more marriages.

Jonson’s play has an additional part:

Prologue/Induction: An opening that gives context and gives background details. In Jonson’s play, this is the Induction (Introduction) or Chorus.

“Why, if it could do so, it would be well, boy,” Damplay said.

John Trygust replied, “Yes, if the nature of a clock were to speak, not strike. So, if a child could be born in a play, and grow up to a man in the first scene, before he went off the stage, and then afterward to come forth a squire and be made a knight, and that knight to travel between the acts and do wonders in the Holy Land, or elsewhere: kill paynims [pagans], wild boars, dun [dull brown] cows, and other monsters; beget himself a reputation and marry an emperor’s daughter for his mistress; convert her father’s country; and at last come home, lame and all-to-beladen — heavily loaded — with miracles.”

Damplay said, “These miracles would please, I assure you, and take — captivate — the people. For there are those of the people who will expect miracles and more than miracles from this pen.”

“Do they think this pen — Ben Jonson — can juggle?” John Trygust asked. “I wish we had Hocus-Pocus for them, then, your people, or Travitanto Tudesko.”

Hocus-Pocus was a famous juggler of the times.

“Who’s Travitanto Tudesko, boy?” Damplay asked.

John Trygust answered:

“Another juggler with a long name.”

He then said:

“I wish either that those expecters you talk about would be gone hence now, at the first act, or that they would expect no more hereafter than they understand.”

“Why so, my peremptory jack?” Damplay said.

He felt that the theater boy was peremptory: overly confident in his opinions.

The theater boy — John Trygust — said:

“My name is John, indeed.”

The name “Jack” is a nickname for “John.”

John Trygust continued:

“My answer to your question is this: Because those who expect what is impossible or beyond nature defraud and cheat themselves.”

“There the boy said well: They do defraud and cheat themselves indeed,” Probee said.

John Trygust said:

“And therefore, Master Damplay, unless, like a solemn justice of wit — a judge without a sense of humor — you will damn our play unheard or unexamined, I shall entreat your Mistress, Madam Expectation, if she is among these ladies, to have patience but a pissing while — a short time, the time it takes to piss — in order to give our springs leave to open a little by degrees!

“A source of ridiculous, laughter-causing matter may break forth soon that shall steep their temples and bathe their brains in laughter, to the fomenting of stupidity itself and the awaking any velvet lethargy — well-dressed sleepy person — in the house.”

Probee said, “Why do you maintain your poet’s quarrel so with velvet and good clothes, boy? We have seen him in indifferent — neither especially good nor especially bad — clothes before now.”

The poet was Ben Jonson.

John Trygust said:

“And you may see him in better clothing, if it please the King, his master, to say amen and agree to it, and allow it, to whom he acknowledges all.”

If the King were to — ahem — give Ben Jonson more money, Ben Jonson would dress better.

John Trygust continued:

“But his clothes shall never be the best thing about him, though; he will have something in addition, either of humane letters and classical learning or severe honesty, that shall speak and reveal him to be a man even if he went about naked.”

For some people, their clothes — not their mind — are the best thing about them. This is not the case with Ben Jonson.

“He is beholden to you, if you can make this good, boy,” Probee said. “If you can do it, the author will owe much to you, boy.”

“He himself has done that already against envy,” John Trygust said.

Ben Jonson had criticized malicious envy in the induction of his play The Arraignment, or Poetaster.

In his plays, poems, and masques, Ben Jonson had shown that he was worthy of great respect no matter what clothes — if any — he was wearing.

“What’s your name, sir, or your country?” Damplay asked.

“John Trygust is my name,” the theater-boy said. “I am a Cornish youth, and I am the poet’s servant.”

The poet, of course, is Ben Jonson.

“West-country breed, I thought, you were so bold,” Damplay said.

John Trygust said, “Or rather saucy, to find out your palate, Master Damplay. Indeed, we do call a spade a spade in Cornwall. If you dare damn our play in the wrong place, we shall take heart — have the courage — to tell you so.”

“Good boy!” Probee said.

ACT 2 (The Magnetic Lady, or Humors Reconciled)

— 2.1 —

Nurse Keep, Placentia, and Pleasance spoke together in a room in Lady Loadstone's house.

Nurse Keep said to Placentia, "Sweet mistress, please be merry. You are sure to have a husband now."

"Aye, if the store does not hurt the choice," Placentia replied.

Placentia had a store — an abundance — of suitors: Sir Diaphanous Silkworm the courtier and Master Practice the lawyer. And now, although she did not know it yet, Master Bias.

A plentitude of suitors could make deciding among them difficult.

"Store is no sore, young mistress, my mother is wont to say," Pleasance said.

By "my mother," she meant "Mistress Polish."

The proverb "Store is no sore" means "Abundance is not a problem."

"And she'll say as wisely as any mouth in the parish," Nurse Keep said. "Fix on one, fix upon one, good mistress. Choose a suitor to marry."

"At this call, too, here's Master Practice who is called to the bench of purpose," Placentia said.

Master Practice was called to Lady Loadstone's dinner-table for the purpose of being a suitor.

Nurse Keep said, "Yes, and by My Lady's means —"

Lady Loadstone had encouraged Master Practice to court Placentia and to come to the dinner.

“He is thought to be the man who will marry you,” Pleasance said to Placentia.

One purpose of Lady Loadstone’s dinner was to decide on a husband for Placentia. Placentia’s preference among the suitors counted for something, but if she rejected Lady Loadstone’s suitors for her, she could lose her marriage portion. The decisive vote was that of her mother: Lady Loadstone.

Nurse Keep said, “A lawyer’s wife —”

Pleasance added, “— and a fine lawyer’s wife —”

Nurse Keep concluded, “— is a brave and fine calling.”

“Calling” is a form of address: what one is called. Often, one’s calling includes a title.

“Sweet Mistress Practice!” Pleasance said.

“Gentle Mistress Practice!” Nurse Keep said.

“Fair, open Mistress Practice!” Pleasance said.

“Open” means “free and frank,” among other meanings.

“Aye, and close and cunning Mistress Practice!” Nurse Keep said.

“Close” means “secretive.”

“Cunning” means “wise and crafty.”

“I don’t like that ‘Mistress Practice,’” Placentia said. “The courtier’s is the neater — more elegant — calling.”

Yes, she would be called “Lady” if she married the courtier.

“Yes, My Lady Silkworm,” Pleasance said.

“And to shine in plush,” Nurse Keep said.

“Plush” is an expensive fabric.

“Like a young night-crow, a Diaphanous Silkworm,” Pleasance said.

“Night-crows” are nocturnal birds of ill omen.

Courtiers such as Diaphanous Silkworm keep late hours and sleep late.

“The title ‘Lady Diaphanous’ sounds most delicate and delightful!” Nurse Keep said.

Actually, she would be Lady Placentia Silkworm.

“Which suitor would you choose now, mistress?” Pleasance asked.

“I cannot say,” Placentia said. “The copious abundance of suitors does confound and confuse one.”

“Here’s my mother,” Pleasance said.

— 2.2 —

Mistress Polish entered the scene.

She said, “How are things now, my dainty charge of delicate health and my diligent nurse? What were you chanting — chattering — about?”

A “charge” is a responsibility.

Pleasance, her daughter, knelt before her to receive her blessing.

“God bless you, maiden,” Mistress Polish said to her.

Pleasance rose.

Nurse Keep said, “All of us were enchanting, wishing for a husband for my young mistress here. A man to please her.”

“She shall have a man, good nurse, and she must have a man: a man and a half, if we can choose him out,” Mistress Polish said.

“A man and a half” is better than just a man.

“A man and a half” also means a man and a better half.

She continued:

“We are all in council within and sit about it: the doctors and the scholars and My Lady, who’s wiser than all of us.

“Where’s Master Needle? Her Ladyship needs him to prick out the man.”

Master Needle was Lady Loadstone’s steward and tailor.

Needles can be used to prick, but Master Needle was needed now to prick — choose — the name of the man who would marry Placentia. They were sitting in council to make that choice, and when the choice was made, Master Needle could metaphorically prick — mark — the man’s name. Think of a list of names written on a wax tablet.

Pleasance exited to get Master Needle.

Mistress Polish said to Placentia:

“How is my sweet young mistress?

“You don’t look well, I think. How are you, dear charge?

“You must have a husband, and you shall have a husband. There’s two men put forward as choices for making a match with you. And there’s a third man your uncle promises.”

That third suitor, put forward by Sir Moth Interest, was Master Bias.

“But you must still be ruled by your aunt, according to the will of your dead father and mother, who are in heaven.

“Your lady aunt has choice in the house — within the family — for you.

“We do not trust your uncle. He would keep you a bachelor — an unmarried maiden — always so he can keep control of your marriage portion — your dowry — and keep you not only without a husband, but with a sickness.

“Aye, and I mean the green sickness, the maiden’s malady, which is a sickness, a kind of a disease, I can assure you, and like the fish our mariners call remora —”

A remora was a fish that was believed to attach itself to a ship and slow its progress.

According to the Oxford English Dictionary, a remora is “Any of various slender marine fishes of the family Echeneidae, which have the dorsal fin modified to form a large oval suction disc for attachment to the undersides of sharks, other large fishes, cetaceans, and turtles.”

Never being married can retard a woman’s progress when she lives in a society where she is expected to marry and have children.

Nurse Keep interrupted, “— a remora, mistress!”

Annoyed, Mistress Polish, said:

“How now, goody nurse, Dame Keep of Kat’er’ne’s?”

“Goody” is short for “goodwife,” a title of address.

She was referring to Saint Katherine’s Hospital, where insane people were kept.

“Kat’er’ne’s” may also be an oblique reference to “cater’in’s,” or “caterwaulings.”

Nurse Keep was doing a fair amount of caterwauling

“What! Have you an oar in the cockboat because you are a sailor’s wife and come from Shadwell? I say a remora, for it will stay and delay a ship that’s under sail.”

A cockboat is a small boat.

“Shadwell” is a dock that had a bad reputation.

“An oar in the cockboat” may have a bawdy meaning.

Master Needle entered the scene, accompanied by Pleasance.

Mistress Polish continued:

“And stays and delays are long and tedious things to maidens! And maidens are young ships that would be sailing when they are rigged. For what reason is all their trim else?”

“Stays” and “rigging” are ship ropes.

“Stays” are also 1) delays, and 2) a corset’s stiffening support.

Removing a corset can delay a maiden who is eager to cease being a maiden (a virgin).

A rig is a wanton woman. A rigged woman is a well-dressed woman.

“Trim” can refer to 1) a ship’s being trimmed: rigged and ready to sail, or 2) good clothing.

Master Needle said, “True, and for them to be stayed —”

“The stay is dangerous,” Mistress Polish said. “You know it, Master Needle.”

Master Needle said, “I know something, I can assure you, from the doctor’s mouth.

“Placentia has a dropsy, and she must have a change of air before she can recover.”

Mistress Polish asked him, “Do you say so, sir?”

“The doctor says so,” Master Needle said.

Mistress Polish said:

“Says His Worship so?

“I warrant them he says the truth then; doctors are sometimes soothsayers and are always cunning-men.

“Which doctor was it?”

“Even My Lady’s doctor,” Master Needle said, “the neat — skillful — house-doctor. But he is a true stone-doctor.”

Stone-horses still had their testicles; they were not geldings.

Mistress Polish said:

“Why, do you hear this, nurse? How comes this gear — this trouble — to happen?

“This is your fault, in truth. It shall be your fault, and it must be your fault.

“Why is your mistress sick?

“She had her health all the time she was with me.”

Nurse Keep said, “Alas, good Mistress Polish, I am no saint, much less am I My Lady, to be urged to give health or sickness at my will, but I must await the stars’ good pleasure and I must do my duty.”

In other words: She lacked the power of the Fates and of Lady Loadstone and instead had to do her duty and hope for illness to be warded off, and when illness occurred, she had to hope for healing to occur.

Mistress Polish said, “You must do more than your duty, foolish nurse! You must do all you can — and more than you can, more than is possible — when folks are sick, especially when the sick person is a mistress, a young mistress.”

Doctor Rut and Lady Loadstone entered the room.

Nurse Keep said, “Here’s Master Doctor himself, who cannot do that.”

She exited.

Madame Polish said, “Doctor Do-all can do it. That’s why he’s called that.”

Mistress Polish had faith in Doctor Rut: He could do anything.

“Do,” however, can mean “have sex with.” The word “rut” also refers to sex.

— 2.3 —

Doctor Rut asked about “Doctor Do-All,” “Where is he from? What’s he called?”

Mistress Polish said, “Doctor, do all you can, I pray you and beseech you, for my charge here.”

Lady Loadstone said about Mistress Polish, “She’s my tendering gossip, my affectionate friend, and she loves and attends to my niece.”

“I know you can do all things, what you please, sir, for a young damsel, My good Lady’s niece here,” Mistress Polish said. “You can do what you wish.”

“Peace, tiffany,” Doctor Rut said.

Tiffany is a flimsy fabric: Doctor Rut was insulting Mistress Polish.

“Especially in this new case of the dropsy,” Mistress Polish said. “The gentlewoman, I fear, is leavened.”

Leavened bread has yeast: It rises. Think of a loaf of bread in the oven.

“Leavened?” Doctor Rut asked. “What’s that?”

Mistress Polish answered, “Puffed, blown, if it please Your Worship.”

“What!” Doctor Rut said. “Dark by darker? What is blown? Puffed? Speak English —”

Mistress Polish’s explanation of her comment was harder to understand than her original comment.

In English: Placentia’s belly was swollen.

Mistress Polish continued not speaking English:

“Tainted, if it please you, some do call it.”

In other words: Placentia’s belly was contaminated, corrupted.

Mistress Polish finally spoke English:

“She swells and swells so with it —”

Doctor Rut said

“Give her vent — an outlet — if she do swell. A gimlet that will make a hole must be had.

“It is tympanites that she is troubled with.

“There are three kinds.

“The first kind is anasarca [dropsy of the abdomen] under the flesh, a tumor: That’s not her kind.

“The second is ascites, or aquosus, a watery humor: That’s not her kind either.

“But her kind is a tympanites, which we call the drum.

“A wind bomb’s in her belly; it must be unbraced and loosened, and with a faucet — a tap — or a peg let the wind bomb out, and she’ll do well. Get her a husband.”

The faucet and peg are phallic symbols. They will drill a hole in Placentia and let the “wind bomb” out.

Mistress Polish said, “Yes, I say so, Master Doctor, and betimes — quickly — too.”

Yes, get Placentia a husband quickly.

“As soon as we can,” Lady Loadstone said. “Let her bear up and keep up her spirits today, laugh, and keep company at gleek or crimp.”

Gleek and crimp are card games. The names of the games refer to tricks and traps.

“Your Ladyship says the right thing,” Mistress Polish said. “Crimp, surely, will cure her.”

Doctor Rut said:

“Yes, and gleek, too.

“Peace and silence, Gossip Tittle-Tattle — Gossip Chatterbox.

“Placentia must tomorrow go down into the country some twenty miles. She must use a coach and six brave — splendid — horses, take the fresh air a month there, or five weeks, and then return as a new bride up to the town for any husband in the hemisphere to chuck at, when she has dropped her tympany.”

The husband could chuckle at her or gently chuck — tap — her under the chin.

The hemisphere is the part of the heavens that can be seen above the horizon.

“Drop” can mean 1) “get rid of,” or 2) “let fall.”

“Must she then drop it?” Mistress Polish asked.

Doctor Rut said:

“That is why it is called a dropsy.

“The tympanites is one spice of — a touch of — it: It is a toy, a trifle, a thing of nothing, a mere vapor.

“I’ll blow it away.”

Lady Loadstone said, “Needle, you get the coach ready for tomorrow morning.”

“Yes, madam,” Master Needle said.

Master Needle and Pleasance exited.

“I’ll go down with her into the country myself and thank the doctor,” Lady Loadstone said.

“We all shall thank him,” Mistress Polish said. “But, dear madam, think and resolve upon a man this day. Decide who the bridegroom will be.”

Lady Loadstone said:

“I have done it.

“To tell you true, sweet gossip — nobody is here except Master Doctor; he shall be of the council — the man I have designated for her, indeed, is Master Practice. He’s a neat — skillful — young man, forward and eager, ambitious, and precocious, and growing up in a profession in which he is likely to be somebody important, if Westminster Hall continues to stand and the pleading of law cases continues.

“To be a prime young lawyer’s wife is a very happy fortune.”

Doctor Rut said:

“And since she is bringing so plentiful a marriage portion, they may live like a king and a queen at common law together.”

He meant that they would have an interest in law together as a source of livelihood, but the phrase also has the meaning that they could have a marriage that is recognized by common law.

“They may sway judges; guide the courts; command the clerks and frighten the evidence; and rule at their pleasures, like petty sovereigns in all cases!”

“Sway judges?” “Guide the courts?” Hmm. Placentia’s dowry would give them enough money to sway and guide — that is, bribe — judges, jurors, and clerks.

“Frighten the evidence”? Hmm. Sounds like they would intimidate the witnesses.

Mistress Polish said:

“Oh, that will be a work of time. It will take a long while to achieve that! She may be old before her husband rises to the position of being a chief judge, and all her metaphorical flower will be gone.

“No, no, I would have her be a lady of the first head and in the royal court.”

A deer with its first set of antlers is said to have its first head. Metaphorically, new nobles would be of the first head.

Mistress Polish continued:

“I would have her be the Lady Silkworm, a diaphanous lady, and she would be a viscountess to carry all before her, as we say.

“Her gentleman-usher and cast-off pages will be bare to bid her aunt welcome to Her Honor at her lodgings.”

Given her dropsy, Placentia would be carrying her big belly in front of her and in front of everyone.

The gentleman-usher and pages would be bare-headed.

“Cast-off pages” are freely-moving pages; they are like dogs that have slipped — cast off — their leashes.

Readers with a bawdy mind may think that Placentia is a vice-cunt-woman — viscountess — and that the gentleman-usher and pages are bare-naked. They may also think that the pages are cast-off — former — lovers.

Yes, playwrights of the early 1600s were that bawdy.

Doctor Rut said, “You say well, lady’s gossip, if My Lady could admit and accept that and be willing to have her niece precede her.”

A viscountess would rank high socially — higher than Lady Loadstone.

Lady Loadstone was the widow of a knight, and so she was a gentlewoman, but a viscountess was the wife of a viscount, and so she was a noblewoman.

“For that, I must consult my own ambition, my zealous gossip,” Lady Loadstone said.

Mistress Polish said:

“Oh, you shall precede her: You shall be a countess.

“Sir Diaphanous shall get you made a countess. He will find a count for you to marry.”

Seeing Sir Diaphanous Silkworm coming, she said:

“Here he comes, he has my voice — vote — certainly — O fine courtier! O blessed man! The bravery pricked out — the splendid man chosen — to make my dainty charge a viscountess!”

A different kind of “prick” out would make Placentia a viscountess: A consummated marriage to Sir Diaphanous Silkworm would make her a viscountess.

Mistress Polish continued:

“And to make My good Lady, her aunt, countess at large!”

Readers with a bawdy mind can think that “countess at large” means sexually available cunt-ess.

The non-bawdy meaning is that Lady Loadstone will be widely recognized in society.

— 2.4 —

Sir Diaphanous Silkworm and Parson Palate entered the scene and spoke together apart from the others. Placentia had a dowry of sixteen thousand pounds, and Sir Diaphanous was willing to bribe other people so he could get it.

Sir Diaphanous Silkworm said, “I tell thee, parson, if I get her, you can reckon thou have a friend in court and shall command a thousand pounds to go on any errand — any quest — for any church preferment thou have a mind to.”

A proverb stated, “Better is a friend in court than a penny in purse.”

Sir Diaphanous Silkworm was bribing Parson Palate with money: a thousand pounds that he could use for expenses in seeking promotions.

Those expenses could include bribery. The use of bribes to secure advancement in ecclesiastical circles is called simony. If simony were to be discovered in the election of a pope, that election would be null and void.

Parson Palate said:

“I thank Your Worship. I will so work for you that you shall study and investigate all the ways to thank me. I’ll work on and persuade My Lady and My Lady’s friends: her gossip, and this doctor, and Squire Needle, and Master Compass, who is all in all — he is all-important to her, and the very fly she moves by.”

A fly is a component of a sailor’s compass. A compass points out the way for one to go.

Parson Palate continued:

“He is one who went to sea with her husband, Sir John Loadstone, and brought home the rich prizes.”

Prizes are ships captured during a war.

“All that wealth has been left to her, for which service she respects him, a dainty — excellent — scholar in the mathematics and one she wholly employs — relies on — to advise her.

“Now Dominus [Lord] Practice is already the man appointed by Her Ladyship, but there’s a trick to set his cap awry and interfere with him and his expectations, if I know anything.

“He has confessed to me in private that he loves another, My Lady’s serving-woman, Mistress Pleasance; therefore, that makes you safe from his rivalry. You won’t have to worry about him being your rival.”

“I thank thee, my noble parson,” Sir Diaphanous Silkworm said. “There’s five hundred pounds more that waits on thee for that. You’ll receive that much more money.”

Parson Palate said:

“Accost the niece. Yonder she walks alone.”

“Accost” means “board her” as if she were a prize to be captured — “woo her.”

Parson Palate continued:

“I’ll move — persuade — the aunt.

“But here’s the gossip, her friend: She expects a morsel.

“Haven’t you a ring or a toy — a trifle — to throw away?”

“Yes, here’s a diamond of some threescore pounds,” Sir Diaphanous Silkworm said. “Please give her that.”

He handed the parson a diamond.

“If she will take it,” Parson Palate said.

Sir Diaphanous Silkworm said:

“And there’s an emerald for the doctor, too.”

He handed over the emerald and then said:

“Thou, parson, thou shall coin me: I am thine. You shall make money out of me.”

Parson Palate said:

“Here Master Compass comes.”

Compass entered the scene.

Parson Palate said about him:

“Do you see My Lady and all the rest? How they do flutter about him! He is the oracle — the prophet and seer — of the house and family.

“Now is your time: Go nick it with the niece — take advantage of this opportunity.”

A nick is a winning throw in the dice game called Hazard.

Parson Palate then said:

“I will walk by and hearken how the chimes go. I will hear how things are going.”

Sir Diaphanous Silkworm began to court Placentia at the side of the room.

— 2.5 —

Seeing Parson Palate, Compass said:

“Nay, parson, don’t stand far off; you may approach.

“This is no such hidden point of state we handle, but you may hear it, for we are all of counsel.”

In other words: Come join us. We are not discussing a matter of national importance that we must keep secret from you.

“We are all of counsel” means “We are all in the know.”

Parson Palate walked over to the group.

Compass then said to Lady Loadstone, “The gentle Master Practice has dealt clearly and nobly with you, madam.”

“Have you talked with him, and made the overture?” Lady Loadstone asked.

The overture concerned marriage to Placentia. It was the opening gambit in a negotiation.

Compass said:

“Yes, first I put forward the business entrusted to me by Your Ladyship in your own words, almost your very syllables, except where my memory trespassed against their elegance and I forgot the elegant words you used and was forced to use my own words, for which I hope to have your pardon.

“Then I enlarged and spoke more fully about the advantages of marriage with Placentia in my own plain and homely style: the special goodness and greatness of your bounty in your choice and the free and voluntary conferring of a benefit so without concealed ends and ulterior purposes and conditions, and without any tie except his pure virtue.

“And I spoke about the value and worth of this marriage, to call him into your kindred, into your veins and bloodline, insert him into your immediate family, and make him a nephew by the offer of a niece with such a marriage portion.

“When he had heard this and most maturely acknowledged (as his professional training in the profession of law tends to make every matter a matter of due and mature deliberation), he returned a thanks as ample as the courtesy, in my opinion.

“He said it was a grace too great to be rejected or accepted by him.

“But as the terms stood and made common cause with his fortune, he was not to prevaricate and be evasive with Your Ladyship, but rather to require ingenious — noble, honest, and frank — permission that he might, with the same love and goodwill with which it was offered, refuse it, since he could not with his honesty — because he was engaged before — receive it.”

Master Practice had rejected the offer of marriage to Placentia.

This kind of engagement is attraction to another woman whom he would like to marry: His love was engaged.

“The same he said to me,” Parson Palate said.

“And did he name the party?” Compass asked.

The “party” is the woman Master Practice wanted instead of Placentia.

“He did, and he did not,” Parson Palate said.

Possibly, he did not name the woman he loved. Also possibly, however, the name of the woman he loved could be guessed.

“Come, leave your schemes and fine amphibolies, parson,” Compass said.

“Fine amphibolies” are deliberate ambiguities.

“You’ll hear more,” Parson Palate said.

“Why, now Your Ladyship is free to choose the courtier, Sir Diaphanous: He shall do it. I’ll put it forward to him myself,” Mistress Polish said.

“What will you put forward to him?” Lady Loadstone asked.

“The making you a countess,” Mistress Polish said.

“Stint and stop, foolish woman,” Lady Loadstone said.

Mistress Polish went to the side to join Placentia and Sir Diaphanous Silkworm.

Lady Loadstone asked Compass, “Do you know the party Master Practice means?”

Compass replied, “No, but your parson says he knows, madam.”

Lady Loadstone replied, “I fear he fables — I fear he invents things.”

She then asked, “Parson, do you know where Master Practice is engaged?”

Parson Palate said:

“I’ll tell you, but under seal — in strict confidence. Her mother must not know.

“It is with Your Ladyship’s serving-woman, Mistress Pleasance.”

“What!” Compass said.

“He is not mad?” Lady Loadstone said.

Master Practice could be mad because he has chosen a woman who has no dowry, or he could be not mad because he has chosen to love a good woman.

Or it is Compass who could be mad for a not-yet-revealed reason.

“Oh, hide the hideous secret from her mother: Mistress Polish!” Parson Palate said. “She’ll trouble all, otherwise. You hold a cricket by the wing.”

Proverbially, to hold a cricket or a grasshopper by the wing means to endure much noise.

“Did he name Pleasance?” Compass said. “Are you sure, parson?”

Lady Loadstone said:

“Oh, it is true! He named your mistress: the woman to whom you are devoted!

“I find where your shoe wrings you, Master Compass. I have found your sensitive spot.

“But you’ll look to him there and put him right. You will take care of your rival.”

Compass was also interested in Pleasance.

Master Practice entered the scene in the company of Sir Moth Interest and Master Bias. They were talking together.

Compass said, “Yes. Here’s Sir Moth, your brother, with his Bias and the party deep in discourse. It will be about making a bargain and sale, I see by their close working of their heads and running them together so in counsel.”

He knew that they were bargaining about Placentia and whom she would marry. They had put their heads together and were quietly negotiating.

“Will Master Practice be of counsel against us?” Lady Loadstone asked. “Will he be hired in his professional position to be against us?”

Sir Moth Interest could hire him in an attempt to keep Placentia’s marriage portion — or most of it.

Compass said:

“He is a lawyer, and he must speak for his fee against his father and mother, all his kindred, his brothers or his sisters.

“No exception — or objection — lies at the common law.”

In other words: As a lawyer, Master Practice must speak as he has been paid to speak: whether for or against. He had to speak for the side that had retained him. Natural affections such as familial ties must have no effect on his profession.

Compass continued:

“He must not alter nature for form.”

In other words: He has a nature (a capacity and talent) for form (legal procedures), and he must not alter it. That is, he must not allow such things as natural affections and familial ties to have an effect on how he performs in his profession.

Compass continued:

“Instead, he must go on in his path — it may be he will be for us and on our side.

“Don’t attempt to meddle.

“Let them take their course; let them dispatch and marry her off to any husband.

“Don’t be over-scrupulous. Don’t be overly particular.

“Let who can, have her, as long as Sir Moth lays down the marriage portion, though he geld it.”

Compass was advising that Placentia be married to any man who could get her dowry — or part of it — out of the hands of Sir Moth Interest.

Compass continued:

“It will maintain the lawsuit against him later if he holds back part of the dowry. To some extent, something in the hand is better than no birds.”

A proverb stated, “A bird in the hand is worth two in the bush.”

Compass hoped to get more than one metaphorical bird for Placentia: one “bird” now in the form of part of her dowry, and the other “bird or birds” in the form of the rest of her dowry after a successful lawsuit against Sir Moth Interest.

Compass continued:

“He shall at last — eventually — account for the utmost farthing, if you can keep your hand from signing any discharge or release of obligation.”

Lady Loadstone exited.

Mistress Polish said to Sir Diaphanous Silkworm, “Sir, do but make her worshipful aunt a countess, and Placentia is yours. Her aunt has worlds to leave you! The wealth of six East Indian fleets of merchant ships at least! Her husband, Sir John Loadstone, was the governor of the East India Company for seven years.”

“And came there home six fleets of ships in seven years?” Sir Diaphanous Silkworm asked.

“I cannot tell,” Mistress Polish said. “I must attend my gossip, Her good Ladyship.”

She exited.

Placentia asked:

“And will you make me a viscountess, too?”

“For how do they make a countess? In a chair?”

Can a court official rule that a woman is a countess?

She then asked:

“Or upon a bed?”

Yes, marry a count and you will be made a countess in bed.

A chair can also be the location where a marriage to a count is consummated.

Sir Diaphanous Silkworm answered, “Both ways, sweet bird: I’ll show you.”

Placentia and Sir Diaphanous exited.

Sir Moth Interest said:

“The truth is, Master Practice, now that we are sure that you are off the list and not a suitor, we dare come on the bolder:

“The portion left was sixteen thousand pounds — I do confess it as a just man should — and I call here Master Compass with these gentlemen to the relation.”

Compass and these other gentlemen were supposed to listen to the financial report, too.

Sir Moth Interest continued:

“I will continue to be just.

“Now as for the profits every way arising, it was the donor’s wisdom that those profits should pay me for my watchful wakefulness and the breaking of my sleeps.

“It is no petty charge and responsibility, you know, that sum. It will keep a man wakeful for fourteen years.”

Placentia was fourteen years old, and Sir Moth Interest had controlled her money for fourteen years.

Worrying about investments can result in poor sleep.

Master Practice said, “But, as you knew to use it in that time, it would reward your waking.”

Master Practice was pointing out that as a skilled usurer, Sir Moth Interest would be well rewarded for using that money in usury.

Sir Moth Interest said:

“That’s my industry and diligence, as it might be your reading, study, and counsel, and now your pleading — your argument.

“Who denies your calling to you?”

“I have my calling, too.”

“Well, sir, the contract is with this gentleman, ten thousand pounds — an ample portion for a younger brother, with a soft, tender, delicate rib of man’s flesh that he may work like wax and print upon.”

The “rib of man’s flesh” is a wife, as Eve was to Adam.

The husband may work her like wax and shape her as he pleases and print upon her by making her pregnant.

These days, we may want to call a pregnant woman’s uterus and vagina a biological 3-D printer.

“He expects no more than that sum to be tendered if he shall receive it: Those are the conditions.”

Sir Moth Interest wanted Master Practice to be the lawyer for Master Bias and him. Sir Moth Interest wanted Master Bias to marry Placentia and receive ten thousand pounds as her dowry. Sir Moth Interest would receive the remaining six thousand pounds of the dowry. Master Practice, of course, would be paid for his representation of and advocacy of the interests of Sir Moth Interest and Master Bias. And, readers will soon see, Sir Moth Interest wanted to receive much more than six thousand pounds.

“A direct bargain and in open sale in the market,” Master Practice said.

Sir Moth Interest said, “And what I have furnished him with on the side to appear or so: a matter of four hundred pounds, to be deducted upon the payment —”

Sir Moth Interest had advanced 400 pounds to Master Bias so that he could make a good appearance.

Master Bias interrupted, “Right. You deal like a just man still.”

“Write up this contract, good Master Practice, for us to sign, and be speedy,” Sir Moth Interest said.

Master Practice said:

“But here’s a mighty gain, sir, you have made of this one stock — this one dowry. The principal first doubled in the first seven years, and that redoubled in the next seven years!

“Besides six thousand pounds, there’s threescore thousand got in fourteen years after the usual rate of ten in the hundred, and the ten thousand paid.”

Through usury, Sir Moth Interest had made Placentia’s marriage portion grow.

At ten percent interest, 16,000 pounds had become 32,000 pounds in seven years, and 32,000 pounds had become 64,000 pounds in the next seven years.

Sir Moth Interest wanted Master Bias to get 10,000 pounds. The remaining 54,000 pounds (which includes the 6,000 pounds already discussed) would be Sir Moth Interest’s.

Of course, Sir Moth Interest was to be paid for his watchfulness in investing the money, but why wouldn’t much of the increase in the amount of money go to Placentia and her husband?

“I think it is so,” Sir Moth Interest said.

“How will you escape the clamor and the envy?” Master Practice said.

There would an outcry (clamor) and ill will (envy) against Sir Moth Interest getting so much. It would be a major scandal.

Lady Loadstone, Compass, and others had been afraid that Sir Moth Interest would attempt to do something like this. They wanted the money to go to Placentia and her husband.

Sir Moth Interest said:

“Let them exclaim and envy. What do I care?

“Their murmurs and complaints raise no blisters in my flesh.”

In other words: Their words cannot raise welts on his flesh.

“My moneys are my blood, my parents, and my kindred, and whoever does not love those is unnatural.

“I am persuaded that the love of money is not a virtue only in a subject, but also that it might befit a prince.

“And, if need be, I find that I would be able to make good the assertion to any reasonable man’s understanding and make him believe and confess it.”

Sir Moth Interest was going against scripture.

1 Timothy 6:10 states, “For the love of money is the root of all evil: which while some coveted after, they have erred from the faith, and pierced themselves through with many sorrows” (King James Version).

Compass said, “Gentlemen, doctors, and scholars, you’ll hear this and see as much true secular and worldly wit and deep lay sense as can be shown on such a commonplace.”

A commonplace is a topic for a debate or a sermon. It is a general truth or “truth” that the speaker defends.

Sir Moth Interest began his argument that love of money is a virtue:

“First, we all know the soul of man is infinite in what it covets. A man who desires knowledge desires it infinitely. A man who covets honor covets it infinitely.

“It will be then no hard thing for a coveting man to prove or to confess he aims at infinite wealth.”

Point One: Human beings want the infinite: some in knowledge, some in honor, some in wealth.

“His soul lying that way,” Compass said.

The word “lying” can mean 1) inclining toward, or 2) telling lies.

Sir Moth Interest continued his argument:

“Next, and secondly, every man is in the hope or possibility of a whole, complete, perfect world, this present world being nothing but the dispersed issue — result — of the first one.”

The first world is the Garden of Eden before the fall.

Sir Moth Interest continued his argument:

“And therefore I do not see but a just man may with just reason and out of duty propound to himself —”

Point Two: Every man hopes to become wealthy just as they hope to return to a world such as the Garden of Eden. The Garden of Eden is perfect, and infinite wealth is part of a perfect world.

“An infinite wealth!” Compass said. “I’ll bear the burden.”

Compass would the bear the burden of being wealthy, and he would bear the burden — sing the chorus — to Sir Moth Interest’s verses.

Compass then said: “Go on, Sir Moth.”

Sir Moth Interest continued his argument:

“Thirdly, if we consider man a member but of the body politic — a citizen — we know, by just experience, that the prince has need more of one wealthy man than ten fighting men.”

“There you went out of the road a little from us,” Compass said.

Compass was not wealthy, but he was in part a soldier.

Sir Moth Interest continued his argument:

“And therefore, if the prince’s aims be infinite, it must be in that which makes all —”

Compass interrupted, “— infinite wealth.”

Point Three: Money facilitates everything, and so a ruler needs wealthy men to tax. The ruler needs them much more than he needs soldiers to fight.

Sir Moth Interest continued his argument:

“Fourthly, it is natural to all good subjects to set a price on money —”

The word “natural” can mean 1) appropriate, or 2) foolish.

People really do put a value on money. In fact, the value of a coin is literally put on coins.

Sir Moth Interest continued his argument:

“— more than fools ought on their mistress’ picture, every piece from the penny to the twelpence being the hieroglyphic and sacred sculpture — the sacred symbol and the engraving — of the sovereign.”

Point Four: The image of the sovereign is stamped on coins. Citizens love their sovereign, and so they love coins.

“A manifest and clearly revealed conclusion, and a safe one,” Compass said.

It is not safe to run afoul of royalty, and so it is best to praise royalty.

Sir Moth Interest continued his argument:

“Fifthly, wealth gives a man the leading voice at all conventions and public meetings, and it displaces worth and merit with general allowance to all parties.”

In other words: Wealth is generally believed to outweigh virtue. It can also outweigh social rank. Wealthy people are respected, and they are listened to.

Sir Moth Interest continued his argument:

“Wealth makes a trade — a business — take the wall of virtue.”

“To take the wall” means “to take the best position.” Higher-ranking people took the position closest to the wall. Those walking further from the wall were in danger of being splashed with muddy water from the street. A wealthy businessman could take the wall.

Since trade and business take the wall instead of virtue, wealth gotten from trade and business is valued more highly than virtue.

Sir Moth Interest continued his fifth argument:

“Wealth makes the mere issue of a shop right honorable.”

The wealthy child of a shopkeeper can become a right honorable lord.

Point Five: Wealth gives shopkeepers and merchants influence. People who have money can speak freely. They are also respected and their children can rise high in social rank.

Sir Moth Interest continued his argument:

“Sixthly, it enables him who has it to do the performance of all real actions, referring him to himself always, and not binding his will to any circumstance without considering himself and his interests.”

In other words: Wealth enables a person to perform every action in such a way that it benefits himself; he need not perform actions that don't benefit himself. A wealthy man need not sell his time and labor to someone else unless he wants to and will benefit from doing so.

Sir Moth Interest continued his argument:

“It gives him precise knowledge of himself, for, if he is rich, he straightaway with evidence knows whether he has any compassion or any inclination to virtue or not.”

Point Six: Wealth allows people to know themselves. If a wealthy man is virtuous, he will do virtuous things with his wealth. If he is not virtuous, he will not do virtuous things with his wealth. What he chooses to do with his money will tell him much about himself.

Sir Moth Interest continued his sixth argument:

“Whereas the poor knave — the ordinary man — erroneously believes, if he were rich, he would build churches or do such mad things.”

According to Sir Moth Interest, it is mad to do such things as build churches.

Point Six, Part 2: Poor people always delude themselves into thinking that if they were wealthy, they would be virtuous.

Sir Moth Interest continued his argument:

“Seventhly, your wise poor men have always been contented to observe rich fools and so to serve their turns upon them, subjecting all their wit to the others’ wealth and become gentlemen parasites, squire bawds, to feed their patrons’ honorable humors.”

Point Seven: Wise but poor men will work for the wealthy but foolish man. They will use their intelligence to serve the wealthy but foolish man in return for sustenance.

Sir Moth Interest continued his argument:

“Eighthly, it is certain that a man may leave his wealth either to his children or his friends.

“His wit and intelligence he cannot so dispose by legacy as they shall be a harington — a brass farthing — the better for it.”

Point Eight: A man who has read and understood 10,000 books cannot pass on that knowledge to his children when he dies. They will have to read books on their own. Wealth, in contrast, can be passed on to children.

“A man of wit and intelligence may entail a jest upon his house, though —” Compass said.

Captain Ironside entered the scene. Among those present were Sir Moth Interest, Parson Palate, Doctor Rut, and Master Bias.

Compass continued, “—or leave a tale to his posterity to be told after him.”

Compass’ words are true:

- Harry Lehr, aka America’s Court Jester, got married, but he later grew to hate his wife. When he died, his will stated that he had left her “my houses, lands, silver plate, tapestries, pictures, carriages, yachts and motor cars.” However, Mr. Lehr didn’t own any of that stuff.

- John Custis hated being married to his wife, Fidelity. When he died, his tombstone stated that although he was 71 years old, he had lived only seven years — the years he had been an adult bachelor.

Ironside said:

“As you have done here?

“To invite your friend and brother to a feast where all the guests are so mere heterogeneous — so completely different — and such strangers that no man knows another man, or cares if those who here are met are Christians or Mohammedans!”

Compass asked, “Is it anything to you, brother, to know religions more than those you fight for?”

Is it really necessary to know another man’s religion?

Captain Ironside replied:

“Yes, and I need to know with whom I eat.

“I may get into a discussion, and how shall I have an argument with such men whom I know neither their humors nor their heresies, and I don’t know which heresies are religions now and so received?”

Some heresies become accepted and so they become religions.

“Here’s no man among these who keeps a servant whom I can ask questions about his master, yet in the house, I hear it buzzed and rumored that there are a brace of — a pair of — doctors, a fool and a physician [Parson Palate and Doctor Rut], with a courtier who feeds on mulberry leaves like a true silkworm [Sir Diaphanous Silkworm], a lawyer [Master Practice], and a mighty money-bawd, Sir Moth, who has brought his politic Bias with him.”

One species of mulberry is food for silkworms.

Captain Ironside continued:

“Bias is a man of a most animadverting — critical and censorious — humor, who, to endear himself to his lord, will tell him that you and I, or any of us who here are met, are all pernicious and destructive spirits and men of pestilent purpose meanly affected — disposed — toward the nation we live in; and he will beget himself a thanks with the great men of the time by breeding jealousies — suspicions — in them against us.

“Bias shall cross and thwart our fortunes, frustrate our endeavors, twice seven years after.”

“These seven years day” is an idiom for a long time. “Twice seven years” is a very long time.

Bias’ tricks will harm those whom he targets for a very long time.

“And this trick is called the cutting of throats with a whispering or a penknife.”

The “trick” was figurative murder caused by spreading rumors orally or in writing. Penknives are small knives that were used to make quill pens to dip into ink and write with.

Captain Ironside drew his sword and said:

“I must cut Bias’ throat now. I’m bound in honor and by the law of arms to see it done.

“I dare to do it, and I dare to profess openly the doing of it, being a deed to be done against such a rascal and rogue, who is the common offence — disgrace — grown of mankind and worthy to be torn up from society.”

Captain Ironside wanted to kill Master Bias, whom he regarded as the common disgrace of all mankind. The world would be better if Bias were dead.

“You shall not do it here, sir,” Compass said.

Captain Ironside asked:

“Why? Will you entreat yourself into a beating for him, my courteous brother?”

In other words: Do you intend to negotiate that I beat you instead of killing him?

“If you will, get ready to fight.

“No man deserves it better, now I think about it, than you, who will keep consort — company — with such fiddlers [triflers], pragmatic [busy and interfering] flies, fools, publicans [tax gatherers], and moths [people drawn to temptations that can destroy them like a moth is drawn to a flame], and leave your honest and adopted brother!”

“Consort with such fiddlers” sounds like “concert with such fiddlers.”

Sir Moth Interest said, “It would be best to call for help and raise the house against him to secure us and make us safe — he’ll kill us all!”

“I love no blades in belts!” Parson Palate said.

Swords and daggers were placed in scabbards that hung from belts.

“Nor I!” Doctor Rut said.

Master Bias said, “I wish that I were again at my shop — my place of business — in court, safely stowed up with my politic bundles of papers!”

Sir Moth Interest, Parson Palate, Doctor Rut, and Master Bias exited in a panic.

“How they are scattered!” Compass said.

“They have run away like cimici into the crannies of a rotten bedstead,” Captain Ironside said.

Cimici is Italian for bedbugs.

Cimici glances at vim-and-see: Show some vim and vigor and see them scatter.

Compass said, “I told you such a passage of events — including the sight of your sword — would disperse them, even if the house were their fee-simple in law — their absolute possession — and they were possessed of all the blessings in it.”

Captain Ironside said, “Pray heaven they are not so frightened from their stomachs that My Lady’s table will be disfurnished of the provisions!”

Captain Ironside still wanted to eat a meal.

Compass said:

“No, by this time the parson’s calling all the covey again together.

A covey is literally a group of birds.

Seeing Pleasance coming, Compass said:

“Here comes good tidings!

Pleasance entered the scene and said, “Dinner’s on the table.”

Captain Ironside and Master Practice exited.

Compass and Pleasance remained behind, close together.

— 2.7 —

Compass proceeded to ask Pleasance if she were engaged to marry Master Practice, but he did so using legal terms that were taken out of their usual context. In doing so, he made a series of legal puns.

“Stay, Mistress Pleasance. I must ask you a question,” Compass said. “Have you any suits in law?”

A suit in law can be a lawsuit, or it can be a suitor who is in the law profession.

“I, Master Compass?” Pleasance asked.

“Answer me briefly,” Compass said. “It is dinner time.”

“Briefly” can refer to a period of time or a limited number of words; it puns on “law brief.”

Compass said, “They say you have retained brisk Master Practice here of your counsel.”

Lawyers get retainers — preliminary payment of fees — to secure their services. A woman engaged to be married may give her fiancé a gift.

Compass continued:

“And they say you are to be joined a patentee with him.”

“Joined with” can mean “entered into a contract with.” That contract can be a marriage contract.

A “patentee” is someone who has been officially granted something.

“Joined with in what?” Pleasance asked. “Who says so? You are disposed to jest.”

Compass said:

“No, I am in earnest.”

“In earnest” can mean “with serious intent,” but “earnest” can also mean money paid in order to secure a contract.

Compass continued:

“It is given out in the house that what I said is so, I assure you, but keep your right to yourself and do not acquaint a common lawyer with your case.”

In this society, the word “quaint” can mean “cunt.”

The word “case” can mean 1) law case, or 2) vagina.

Compass continued:

“If he once find the gap, a thousand will leap after.”

“Gap” can mean “hole,” and therefore “vagina.”

The word “leap” can mean “have sex.” In this society, brothels were called leaping-houses.

Compass concluded:

“I’ll tell you more soon.”

He exited.

Alone, Pleasance said, “This riddle shows a little like a love-trick, of one face, if I could understand it. I will study it.”

Pleasance recognized that Compass was anxious about her virginity. This could be a love-trick: a way of showing that he was interested in her, or a way of tricking her into loving him.

Maybe the one face was a deceptive face.

Like many women, she sometimes had trouble understanding a man: Was he serious or not? Did he love her or not?

She exited.

CHORUS 2 (The Magnetic Lady, or Humors Reconciled)

Damplay asked, “But whom does your poet mean now by this Master Bias? What lord’s secretary does he purpose to impersonate and represent or to perstringe — censure and criticize?”

John Trygust replied, “You might as well ask me what alderman or alderman’s mate — companion — he meant by Sir Moth Interest; or what eminent lawyer he meant by the ridiculous Master Practice, whose name he invented for laughter — invented as a joke — rather than for any offence or injury it can stick on the reverend professors of the law. And so the wise ones will think.”

Probee said:

“It is an insidious, crafty, tricky question, brother Damplay. Iniquity itself would not have urged it.”

Many old plays included the evil-minded character known as Vice, aka Inequity, aka Wickedness.

Probee concluded:

“It is picking the lock of the scene, not opening it the fair way with a key.

“A play, though it apparel — dress — and present vices in general, flies from all particularities in persons.

“Would you ask of Plautus and Terence, if they lived now, who were Davus [in Terence’s Andria] or Pseudolus [title character of ‘The Liar’ in Plautus’ play] in the scene?”

“Who were Pyrgopolinices [in Plautus’ Miles Gloriosus, aka The Braggart Soldier] or Thraso [in Terence’s Eunuchus, aka The Eunuch]?”

“Who were Euclio [in Plautus’ Aulularia, aka The Pot of Gold] or Menedemus [in Terence’s Heutontimorumenos, aka The Self-Tormentor]?”

John Trygust said:

“Yes, he would.

“And he would inquire of Martial, or any other epigrammatist, whom he meant by Titius or Seius — the common John à Noke [John from the Oak] or John à Stile [John from the Stile] —”

These were fictitious names (like John Doe) used in law cases. The fictitious names Gaius Seius and Lucius Titius appear in Roman law.

John Trygust continued:

“— under whom they note all vices and errors taxable to — that can be blamed on — the times! As if there could not be a name for a folly fitted to the stage, but there must be a person found out in nature to own it.”

“Why, I can fancy — decide on — a person to myself, boy,” Damplay said. “Who shall hinder me?”

John Trygust said:

“And, in not publishing him and making his name known to others, you do no man an injury.

“But if you will utter and make public your own ill meaning on that person under the author’s words, you use his comedy to libel someone.”

Playwrights could run afoul of libel laws, and so Ben Jonson attempted to make clear that he was not satirizing real individuals, but instead he was satirizing character types.

“Oh, he told us that in a prologue long ago,” Damplay said.

Ben Jonson wrote, “They make a libel which he made a play” in the second Prologue to Epicene, or The Silent Woman.

“If you do the same reprehensible ill things, still the same reprehension — rebuke — will serve you, though you heard it previously,” John Trygust said. “They are his own words. I can invent no better, nor he.”

Probee said:

“It is the solemn, humorless vice of interpretation — misinterpretation — that deforms the figure of many a fair scene by drawing it awry, and it is indeed the civil, polite murder of most good plays.”

“Drawing it awry” can mean 1) “drawing it badly,” or 2) “pulling it out of shape.”

Probee continued:

“If I see a thing vively — vividly and clearly — presented on the stage, in such a way that the looking-glass of custom, which is comedy, is so held up to me by the poet that I can therein view the daily examples of men’s lives and images of truth in their manners, so drawn for my delight or profit as I may either way use them, then will I — rather than make that true use — hunt out persons to defame by my malice of misapplying?”

“And will I imperil the innocence and candor of the author by calumniating him?”

In other words: Suppose that a play vividly presents to me truthful images of men’s lives in such a way that I can be entertained or educated by them. Would I then seek to match real people with the characters seen on stage, thereby defaming the real people and putting the playwright in danger of being accused of libel?

Probee continued:

“It is an unjust way of hearing and beholding plays, this, and most unbecoming a gentleman to appear malignantly witty about another’s work.”

John Trygust said:

“They are no other but narrow and shrunk natures, shriveled up poor things that cannot think well of themselves, who dare to detract and disparage the reputations of others.

“That signature distinctive mark is upon them, and it will last. A half-witted barbarism that no barber’s art or his balls will ever expunge or take out!”

One of the barber’s arts is bloodletting.

In one of Martial’s epigrams appears a man named Cinnamus who is unable to efface the mark of Martial’s stigma: Martial’s harsh criticism of another man. In another of Martial’s epigrams, readers learn that Cinnamus is a barber.

Barber poles are signs that often consist of a red-and-white-swirled pole, capped with a ball on top and at the bottom. The ball at the top represents the basin in which leeches were kept for blood-letting (one of the barber’s arts or skills), and the ball at the bottom represented the basin in which blood was collected when a vein was cut in phlebotomy. The pole itself represents the pole that barbers gave patients to squeeze while blood was being collected.

According to the Oxford English Dictionary, a ball is “any (approximately) spherical object.”

The barber’s balls are 1) his round basins, and 2) his balls of soap.

Bloodletting will not expunge the illness of bad interpretation and libel. Nor will soap remove or take out the stain of bad interpretation and libel.

“Barber” also glances at “barbarian.”

Damplay said, “Why, boy, this would be a strange empire with an absolute ruler, or rather it would be a tyranny, you would entitle and give your poet a legal right to have, over gentlemen: with the result that they should come to hear and see plays, and say nothing for their money?”

“Oh, yes, say what you will, as long as it is about the matter at hand, to the point, and in its proper place and time,” John Trygust said.

“Can anything be out of purpose at a play?” Damplay said. “I see no reason, if I come here and give my eighteen pence or two shillings for my seat, but I should take it out in censure — judgment, good or bad — on the stage.”

John Trygust said:

“Your two shillingworth is allowed you, but you will take your ten shillingworth, your twenty shillingworth, and more.

“And you will teach others around you to do the like, who follow your leading face, as if you were to cry up or down — to praise or condemn — every scene by confederacy — unlawful conspiracy — be it right or wrong.”

“Who should teach us the right or wrong at a play?”
Damplay asked.

John Trygust said:

“If your own science — your own knowledge — cannot do it, or the love of modesty and truth, all other entreaties or attempts — are vain. You are fitter spectators for the bears than us, or for the puppets.”

Bear-baitings often occurred in the same theaters in which plays were performed.

Puppet shows were popular.

John Trygust continued:

“This is a popular — a common people’s — ignorance indeed, somewhat better appareled — dressed — in you than the people, but a hard-handed and stiff ignorance, worthy a trowel- or a hammer-man, and not only fit to be scorned, but to be triumphed over.”

“By whom, boy?” Damplay asked.

John Trygust said:

“By no particular person, but by the general neglect and silence of all.

“Good Master Damplay, be yourself still without a second — without a supporter. Few here are men of your opinion today, I hope; tomorrow, I am sure there will be none, when they have ruminated and thought about this.”

Probee said to Damplay, “Let us mind what you have come for, the play, which will draw on to the epitasis now.”

In the epitasis, trials and tribulations ensue and build toward a climax.

ACT 3 (The Magnetic Lady, or Humors Reconciled)

— 3.1 —

Tim Item met Master Needle and Nurse Keep. Tim Item was Doctor Rut's apothecary, aka pharmacist. Apothecaries make and sell medicine.

"Where's Master Doctor?" Tim Item asked.

"Oh, Master Tim Item, the doctor's learned 'pothecary!" Master Needle said. "You are welcome. He is inside at dinner."

"Dinner? By God's death!" Tim Item said. "To think that he will eat now, having such a business that so concerns him!"

"Why, can any business concern a man like his meat and food?" Master Needle asked.

Tim Item replied, "Oh, twenty million things are more important to a physician who is in practice. I bring him news from all the points of the compass (that's all the parts of the sublunary — under the Moon — globe) of times and double times."

"Times" means "the times." Master Tim Item brings news of the times from various places. "News" includes gossip.

"Double times" may be 1) times filled with deception, or 2) times doubly filled with business, or 3) times doubly filled with news.

Master Needle said, "Go in, in, sweet Item, and furnish forth and provide the table with your news. Deserve and earn your dinner. Sow out your whole bag full. Toss out your items of news as if you were sowing seed. The guests will listen to it."

Tim Item looked toward the dining room and said, "I heard they were fallen out and quarreling."

Master Needle said:

“But they are pieced and put together again.”

“Pieced” is a tailor’s term. “Piecework” is also known as “Patchwork.” In it, small pieces of cloth are sewn together to create a design.

Master Needle continued:

“Their quarrel has been mended and they are at peace. You may go in. You’ll find them at high eating.”

In other words: They are eating high on the food chain, aka eating luxuriously.

Master Needle continued:

“The parson has an edifying stomach and a persuading palate (like his name).”

An edifying stomach is a stomach that is physically being built up like an edifice, or it is an appetite that is morally edifying.

A persuading palate is a passion for converting others or an appetite that persuades him to eat vast amounts because his taste buds have been persuaded that the food tastes good.

Master Needle continued:

“Parson Palate has begun three draughts of sack — white wine — in doctrines and four in uses.”

Doctrines are church dogma or tenets; uses are rituals.

“And they follow him?” Master Item asked.

Master Needle said:

“No, Sir Diaphanous is a recusant in sack. He takes it — alcohol — only in French wine with an allay of water.”

A recusant is someone who rejects an item of church dogma. Here Sir Diaphanous Silkworm rejects sack — Spanish white wine — in favor of French wine mixed with water.

Master Needle continued:

“Go in, go in, Item, and stop your peeping.”

Tim Item exited.

Nurse Keep said, “I have a month’s mind to peep a little, too.”

“A month’s mind” is a commemorative Catholic Mass held one month after a person’s death. Often family members and friends of the deceased shared a meal together. This was a minding day: a day during which one minded — remembered — the dead.

The word “month” also refers to the month after childbirth. The mother was expected to be confined to bed.

Placentia’s mother died as a result of giving birth. Her month’s mind would have been roughly a month after she gave birth. Nurse Keep would likely have been one of the people observing the month’s mind.

The word “peep” has meanings related to 1) looking, and 2) emerging. Revelations about childbirth will emerge in this play, and Nurse Keep will be a part of them.

Master Needle prevented her from peeping at the dinner guests.

Nurse Keep said, “Sweet Mas’ [Master] Needle, how are they seated?”

Master Needle said, “At the board’s end — head — is My Lady — ”

“And my young mistress, Placentia, is by her?” Nurse Keep asked.

Master Needle said:

“Yes. The parson is on the right hand (as he’ll not lose his place for thrusting).”

Parson Palate was positioned in such a way that he could easily stab his knife at platters of food and put the stabbed item on his plate.

He also was in the place of honor: the right side of the hostess. No one had been able to thrust him out and take over that spot.

Presumably, dishes of the best kinds of food were close to the host/hostess and the seat of honor.

Master Needle continued:

“And opposite him is Mistress Polish.

“Next, Sir Diaphanous is opposite Sir Moth: The knights were one opposite the other.

“Then the soldier, the man of war, is opposite the man of peace, the lawyer.

“Then the pert doctor is opposite the politic Bias.”

“Pert” can mean 1) “skilled,” or 2) “ready to express an opinion.”

Master Needle continued:

“And Master Compass circumscribes all.”

The politic Bias was in the least honored position: the bottom of the table on the left of the hostess.

Compass is at the end of the table, opposite Lady Loadstone and Placentia. He completes the circle, and he has a clear view of everyone.

Compass' position was an anomaly, as seats were usually arranged in a U shape.

Noise came from inside the dinner room.

Running, Pleasance entered the scene and said, "Nurse Keep! Nurse Keep!"

"What noise is that inside?" Master Needle asked.

"Come to my mistress!" Pleasance said to Nurse Keep. "All their weapons are out!"

The word "weapon" can mean "penis."

Nurse Keep said:

"Mischief of men! What evil men are! What day, what hour is this?"

She then said to Master Needle:

"Run for the cellar of strong waters — quickly!"

A cellar is a case of bottles, and strong waters are stimulants, usually containing alcohol.

Master Needle exited.

Pleasance and Nurse Keep exited in the direction of the dining-room.

— 3.2 —

Compass and Captain Ironside appeared and talked together.

"Were you a madman to do this at the table?" Compass said. "And trouble all the guests, to frighten the ladies and gentlewomen?"

Captain Ironside said:

“A pox upon your women and your half-man there, Court-Sir Ambergris!”

A pox is an illness such as the plague or venereal disease. Smallpox is one example of a plague illness.

Ambergris comes from a whale and is used in perfume.

Of course, Captain Ironside was referring to Sir Diaphanous Silkworm, who was wearing perfume.

Captain Ironside continued:

“A perfumed braggart! He must drink his wine with three parts water, and he must have amber in that, too.”

The resin (amber) of some trees was used in medicine.

“And must you therefore break his face with a wine glass and wash his nose in wine?” Compass said.

“Can’t he drink in the orthodox, customary manner? Must he have his gums and paynim — pagan — drugs?” Captain Ironside asked.

“Gums” are medicinal resin.

Compass said:

“You should have used the wine glass rather as balance than as the sword of justice, but you have cut his face with it. He bleeds.”

Statues of Justice show her carrying a sword and a set of scales. Things that are in balance do not conflict.

Two people drinking wine together need not conflict.

Compass continued:

“Come, you shall take your sanctuary with me. The whole house will be up in arms against you else, within this half-hour. Let’s go this way to my lodging.”

A place of sanctuary is a place where a person can be safe from arrest.

Compass and Captain Ironside exited.

Doctor Rut, Lady Loadstone, Mistress Polish, and Nurse Keep entered the scene, carrying Placentia over the stage, assisted by Pleasance and Tim Item.

Captain Ironside’s violence may have made her ill.

Doctor Rut said:

“A most rude and violent action!”

“Carry Placentia to her bed and use the fricace to her with those oils — massage her with those oils.

“Keep your news, Item, for now, and attend to this business.”

Lady Loadstone said to Mistress Polish, “Good gossip, look after her.”

“How are you, sweet charge?” Mistress Polish asked Placentia.

A charge is someone to whom one has a duty. Mistress Polish’s duty was to help take care of Placentia.

“She’s in a sweat,” Nurse Keep said.

“Aye, and a faint sweat, by the Virgin Mary!” Mistress Polish said.

Doctor Rut said:

“Let her alone for Tim to treat. He has directions.”

Tim Item had the order for and the instructions for making the medicine prescribed for her.

Doctor Rut then said:

“I’ll hear your news, Tim Item, when you have done.”

Carrying Placentia, Tim Item, Mistress Polish, Nurse Keep, and Pleasance exited.

“Was ever such a guest brought to my table?” Lady Loadstone said.

Doctor Rut said:

“These boisterous soldiers have no better breeding.”

Seeing Compass approaching, Doctor Rut said:

“Here Master Compass comes.”

Compass entered the scene.

Doctor Rut asked, “Where’s your captain, Rudhudibras de Ironside?”

Rud Hudibras was a legendary figure in Britain. He was the son of King Leil, and he founded Carlisle, Canterbury, and Winchester.

His name suggests “Rude Hubris.”

Compass answered, “He has gone out of doors.”

Mistress Loadstone said:

“That he had never come in them, I may wish.

“He has discredited my house and board with his rude swaggering and blustering manners, and he has endangered my niece’s health by drawing his weapon — God knows how far — how dangerously — for Master Doctor does not know.”

A “weapon” can be a penis, and such a weapon can put a virgin maiden in danger of no longer being a virgin maiden.

Compass said, “The doctor is an ass then if he says so, and if he cannot with his conjuring names, Hippocrates, Galen, or Rasis, Avicen, Averroes, cure a poor wench’s falling in a swoon and fainting, which a poor farthing exchanged for rosa solis or cinnamon water would.”

“A poor farthing exchanged for rosa solis” is a farthing’s worth of the cure for fainting called rosa solis.

Rosa solis means “rose of the sun.” It was a medicinal drink made from the sundew plant (drosera).

The names to conjure by were those of famous doctors and authors.

Hippocrates (460-370 B.C.E.) and Galen (129-216 B.C.E.) were ancient Greek physicians.

Rasis (865?-935? C.E.) was a ninth-century Arabian physician.

Avicenna (980-1037 C.E.) was a Persian physician.

Averroes (1126-1198 C.E.) wrote about medicine and translated Aristotle.

Nurse Keep and Mistress Polish entered the scene.

Lady Loadstone said, “What is the news now? How is she doing?”

“She’s somewhat better,” Nurse Keep said. “Master Item has brought her a little about. She is recovering a little.”

Mistress Polish said:

“But there’s Sir Moth, your brother, who has fallen into a fit of the happyplex.

“It would be a happy place for him and us if he could steal to heaven thus.”

By “happyplex,” Mistress Polish meant “apoplexy,” aka stroke.

In other words: If Sir Moth Interest were in heaven, it would be a happy place for him. It would also make Mistress Polish and Placentia happy.

Mistress Polish continued:

“All in the house are calling ‘Master Doctor! Master Doctor!’

“The parson, he has given Sir Moth Interest gone — considered him dead — this half-hour.

“He’s pale in the mouth already for the fear of the fierce captain.”

Doctor Rut exited.

Lady Loadstone said:

“Help me to my chamber, Nurse Keep.

“I wish that I could see the day no more, and instead that night hung over me like some dark cloud so that, buried with this loss of my good name, I and my house might perish, thus forgotten.”

Lady Loadstone, Nurse Keep, and Mistress Polish exited.

“Her taking it to heart thus more afflicts me than all these accidents and incidents, for they’ll blow over and pass on,” Compass said.

— 3.3 —

Master Practice and Sir Diaphanous Silkworm entered the scene.

Master Practice said:

“It was a barbarous injury, I confess, but if you will be counseled and advised, sir, by me, the reverend, worthy-of-respect law lies open to repair your reputation. That will give you damages: I have known five thousand pounds to be given in court for a finger.

“And let me pack your jury. I will find jurors who will be partial toward you and your case.”

Sir Diaphanous Silkworm said, “There’s nothing that vexes me except that he has stained my new white satin doublet, and bespattered my spick and span silk stockings, on the day they were first put on,” Sir Diaphanous Silkworm said. “And here’s a spot on my hose, too.”

Hose cover the thighs and loins.

“Shrewd maims! Grievous injuries!” Compass said. “Your clothes are wounded desperately, and that, I think, troubles a courtier more, an exact, refined courtier, than a gash in his flesh.”

“My flesh?” Sir Diaphanous Silkworm said. “I swear, had he given me twice so much hurt, I never should have reckoned it — I would not have regarded it as worthy of comment. But my clothes to be defaced and stigmatized — marked with a stain — so foully! I take it as a contumely — an insult — done me above the wisdom of our laws to correct and put right.”

If the law won’t right wrongs, one can take matters into one’s own hands.

Compass said, “Why then, you’ll challenge him? You’ll formally challenge him to duel in a written letter?”

“I will take thought,” Sir Diaphanous Silkworm said, “though Master Practice here does urge the law and the creditable reputation for honor it will give me, besides great damages — let him pack my jury.”

Compass said to himself:

“He speaks like Master Practice, one who is the child of a profession he’s vowed and devoted to and servant to the study he has taken, a ‘pure and uncorrupted’ apprentice at law!”

He then said out loud:

“But you must have the counsel of the sword, and you must square your action to their canons and that brotherhood if you do right. You must follow the canons — the rules — of dueling.”

“The counsel of the sword” is advice from someone who has settled an argument by dueling.

Master Practice said:

“I tell you, Master Compass, that you don’t speak like a friend to the laws, nor even a subject to the laws, to persuade him thus to the breach of the peace.

“Sir, you forget that there is a court above, that of the Star Chamber, to punish routs and riots.”

Dueling was against the law.

Compass replied:

“No, young master, although your name is Practice there in term time when the courts are open, I do remember it.

“But you’ll not hear what I was bound to say, but, like a wild young haggard — untrained — justice, you will fly at and attack and breach the peace before you know whether the amorous knight dares to break the peace of conscience in a duel.”

A haggard is an untrained bird of prey that could fly at and attack something prematurely.

Amorous knights appeared in romances; Sir Diaphanous Silkworm was courting Placentia.

The “peace of conscience” could mean that Sir Diaphanous Silkworm is a conscientious objector to violence.

Sir Diaphanous Silkworm said, “Truly, Master Compass, I take you to be my friend and ask you to be my second — my assistant — in the duel. You shall settle for me any matter that’s reasonable, as long as we may meet fairly on even terms.”

“We” meant Captain Ironside and Sir Diaphanous Silkworm.

Compass said:

“I shall persuade — urge — no otherwise. And you shall take your learned counsel, Master Practice, to advise you. I’ll run and go along with him.

“You say you’ll meet him — Captain Ironside — on even terms.”

The duel will not be even. The odds for each duelist would not be even.

Compass then gave reasons why the duel could not be even:

“I do not see indeed how the duel can be even, between Ironside and you, now I consider it.

“He is my brother, I do confess — we have called each other ‘brother’ for twenty years — but you are, sir, a knight in court, with allies there, and you are so befriended, that you may easily answer the worst outcome.”

The worst outcome would be death. If Captain Ironside were to die in the duel, Sir Diaphanous Silkworm would be able to pay the probable fine that would result.

Advantage: Sir Diaphanous Silkworm.

But if Sir Diaphanous Silkworm were to die in the duel, that would be another kind of worst outcome; still, he could answer that, too — it would be easy for him to die in the duel. That would be his answer to the duel.

Advantage: Captain Ironside.

Compass continued:

“He is a known, noted, bold boy of the sword, and he has all men’s eyes upon him. And there’s no London jury but are led in evidence as far by common fame and reputation as they are by present deposition.”

According to Compass, London juries were swayed more by the reputation of and gossip about those involved in lawsuits than they were by evidence and testimony.

Captain Ironside has a reputation as a military man, and London juries are swayed by reputations.

Advantage: Captain Ironside.

Compass continued:

“Then you have many brethren and near kinsmen. If he should kill you, it will be a lasting quarrel between them and him.”

Captain Ironside may well kill Sir Diaphanous Silkworm.

Advantage: Captain Ironside.

But Sir Diaphanous Silkworm has many brethren and near kinsmen who will avenge him against this one captain.

Advantage: Sir Diaphanous Silkworm.

Compass continued:

“Whereas Rud Ironside, although he has got his head into a beaver with a huge feather, is just a currier’s son, and he has not two old Cordovan skins to leave in leather caps for others to mourn him in — to wear as a sign of mourning — if he should die.”

Rud Ironside is Rudhudibras de Ironside, the name Doctor Rut had given to Captain Ironside.

A beaver is the visor of a helmet; the feather was a decoration for the helmet.

A currier colors leather after it is cured. Curing removes water from the hide.

“Cordovan skins” is leather from Cordoba, Spain.

Captain Ironside can leave little behind for his survivors: people who will mourn him if Sir Diaphanous Silkworm should kill him. Sir Diaphanous Silkworm will leave much behind.

Advantage: Sir Diaphanous Silkworm.

Compass continued:

“Again, you are generally beloved, he hated so much, so that all the hearts and votes — prayers — of men go with you in the wishing all prosperity to your purpose.”

Advantage: Sir Diaphanous Silkworm.

Of course, as an experienced soldier, Captain Ironside has a huge advantage over the not-at-all experienced Sir Diaphanous Silkworm.

Advantage: Captain Ironside.

Compass then gave an equivocal speech. His words for each argument could be taken either to say that Captain Ironside was favored to win the duel, or to say that Sir Diaphanous was favored to win the duel.

Compass said:

“Captain Ironside is a fat, corpulent, unwieldy fellow.”

The adjectives “fat,” “corpulent,” and “unwieldy” have a negative sense in which the person they are applied to is excessively heavy, out of shape, uncoordinated, and unable to move well.

Point: Captain Ironside is fat and out of shape.

Advantage: Sir Diaphanous Silkworm.

In this society, however, the adjectives “fat,” “corpulent,” and “unwieldy” also have positive meanings as well as the usual negative. The adjectives can mean “big-bodied” and “muscular” and “difficult to move.” The word “fat” can mean “well fed.” (In some cultures, being plump is regarded as something good.) “Corpulent” can mean “massive.” Also, Captain Ironside is unwieldy: No one can push him around.

Point: Captain Ironside is well fed, massive, and hard to push around.

Advantage: Captain Ironside.

Compass continued:

“In contrast, you are a dieted spark, fit for the combat.”

“A dieted spark” can mean a spirited man who is not overweight or obese, someone who is ready to fight well.

Advantage: Sir Diaphanous Silkworm.

A “dieteted spark” can also mean a thin man with a fine figure. Sir Diaphanous Silkworm’s “fine figure” is likely to be due to his splendid clothing rather than hours spent in exercise. His fitness can mean that his clothing fits well, not that he is physically fit.

Advantage: Captain Ironside.

Compass continued:

“Captain Ironside has killed so many that it is ten to one his turn is next.”

According to this incorrect use of statistics and probability, Captain Ironside is likely to die in this fight.

Advantage: Sir Diaphanous Silkworm.

Compass continued:

“You never fought with any, much less slew any, and therefore you have the hopes before you.”

According to this incorrect use of statistics and probability, Sir Diaphanous Silkworm is likely to defeat Captain Ironside.

Advantage: Sir Diaphanous Silkworm.

Of course, as an experienced soldier, Captain Ironside has a huge advantage over the not-at-all experienced Sir Diaphanous Silkworm; however, Captain Ironside has said that lesser men sometimes defeat men of valor.

Advantage: Captain Ironside, but with a reservation.

Compass continued:

“I hope these things thus specified to you are fair advantages: You cannot encounter him upon equal terms.

“Besides, Sir Silkworm, he has done you wrong in a most high degree, and sense of such an injury received should so exacute — sharpen — and whet your choler that you should count yourself a host — an army — of men compared to him.

“And therefore you, brave sir, have no more reason to provoke or challenge him than the huge great porter has to try his strength upon an infant.”

King Charles I had a porter named William Evans who was reputed to be over seven feet tall.

If Sir Diaphanous Silkworm’s anger made him think that he was the equivalent of an entire army, he had no need to fight Captain Ironside. It was already certain that he would win.

Advantage: Sir Diaphanous Silkworm.

But in history, the huge porter — William Evans (d. 1636) — was not physically fit and healthy. If the army was metaphorically like the huge porter, the army was not powerful. Victory was not sure, after all.

Advantage: Captain Ironside.

Sir Diaphanous Silkworm said, “Master Compass, you rather spur me on than in any way abate and reduce my courage to the enterprise.”

According to his words, he was all the more eager to fight Captain Ironside after hearing Compass’ words.

Compass said:

“All counsel’s as it’s taken: All advice is what you make of it.”

This is true: Compass’ advice could be taken as encouragement to fight the duel, or as discouragement to fight the duel.

Compass continued:

“If you stand on point of honor not to have any odds, I have rather dissuaded you than otherwise.”

In other words: If as a point of honor, you wish to duel on even terms and not have anything to give you an advantage, I have given you reasons not to duel. I have given you reasons to think you will lose.

Compass continued:

“If you wish to duel upon terms of honor and revenge, I have encouraged you.”

In other words: If you wish to duel because of your temperament and a desire for revenge, I have given you reasons to think you will win.

Compass continued:

“So that I think that I have done the part of a friend on either side: In furnishing your fear with a basis for it first, if you have any; or, if you dare to fight, to heighten and confirm your resolution and determination to persist.”

“I now do crave your pardon, Master Compass,” Master Practice said. “I did not apprehend and understand your way before, the true perimeter and scope of it: You have circles and such fine draughts about!”

Master Practice was praising the thoroughness of Compass’ logic.

The perimeter is the circumference.

The scope is what is covered.

The circle is the figure of the circumference.

The draughts outline or plot the figure. They are drawn around the figure to define it.

In other words: Anyone who understands geometry has the intellectual power to speak rationally, as you have just shown.

Sir Diaphanous Silkworm said:

“Sir, I do thank you, I thank you, Master Compass, heartily.

“I must confess I have never fought before, and I’ll be glad to do things orderly, in the right place.

“I ask you to instruct me.

“Is it best to fight ambitiously or maliciously?”

A person ambitious to get a good reputation for honor would fight fairly. A person whose only objective is to win would fight dirty.

“Sir, if you never fought before, be wary,” Compass said. “Don’t trust yourself too much. Don’t be overconfident.”

“Why?” Sir Diaphanous Silkworm asked. “I assure you I’m very angry.”

Compass said:

“Do not allow, though, the flatuous [flatulent], windy choler — anger — of your heart to move the clapper — tongue — of your understanding, which is the guiding faculty: your reason.

“You don’t know if you’ll fight or not, once you are brought to the place of the duel.”

In other words: Don’t allow your anger to make you burst out in an angry speech made without the use of your reason.

Don't be like a bell that clangs in a high wind rather than a bell-ringer who makes harmonious music.

Sir Diaphanous Silkworm said, "Oh, yes, I have imagined him trebled-armed, provoked, too, and as furious as Homer makes Achilles; and I find that I am not frightened by his reputation one tiny jot."

"Treble-armed" can mean 1) with three arms, or 2) with three different kinds of weapons.

In Achilles' Iliad, Achilles first argues with Agamemnon, and later, after Hector kills Achilles' friend Patroclus, Achilles becomes furious at Hector.

Compass said:

"Well, yet take heed. These imaginary fights are less than skirmishes, the fight of shadows:

"For shadows have their figure, motion, and their umbratile — shadowy — action from the real physical posture and motion of the body's act. Whereas imaginarily many times those men may fight, yet in reality they scarcely dare eye one another, much less meet."

In other words: Men may imagine many times fighting each other, but when they actually meet in a duel, they scarcely dare to look at each other, much less fight.

Compass continued:

"But if there is no help for it and no stopping the duel, in faith, I would wish you to send him a fair challenge."

"I will go pen it immediately," Sir Diaphanous Silkworm said.

"But word it in the most high-minded, generous terms," Compass said.

“Let me alone,” Sir Diaphanous Silkworm said. “Leave it to me.”

“And word it with silken phrase: Make it the courtliest kind of quarrel,” Master Practice said.

Sir Diaphanous Silkworm exited.

“He’ll make it a petition for his peace,” Compass said.

In other words: Instead of fighting, he’ll get a legal bond to maintain peace between Captain Ironside and him. Or, possibly, his letter would ask for a peaceful resolution to their dispute; it need not be a request that the two meet in a duel.

“Oh, yes, of right, and he may do it by law,” Master Practice said.

In other words: His doing so is right and justified, as long as he follows the law.

— 3.4 —

Doctor Rut, Parson Palate, and Master Bias brought out Sir Moth Interest, who was in a chair. Tim Item and Mistress Polish followed them.

Doctor Rut said:

“Come, bring him out into the air a little. Set him down there. Bend him; yet bend him more.”

Parson Palate and Master Bias attempted to bend Sir Moth Interest’s head to his knees.

“Dash that glass of water in his face.”

Parson Palate splashed Sir Moth Interest’s face with water.

Doctor Rut continued:

“Now tweak him by the nose.”

Master Bias pulled Sir Moth Interest’s nose.

Doctor Rut continued:

“Hard, harder still. If it just calls the blood up from the heart, I ask no more.

“See what a fear can do!”

Sir Moth Interest was afraid of Captain Ironside. That fear had caused him to fall into this condition.

Master Bias pulled Sir Moth Interest’s nose harder.

Doctor Rut continued:

“Pinch him in the nape of the neck now.”

Tim Item hesitated.

“Nip him! Nip him!”

He demonstrated, pinching Sir Moth Interest, who startled.

“He feels the pinch,” Tim Item said. “There’s life in him.”

“He groans and stirs,” Parson Palate said.

“Tell him the captain’s gone,” Doctor Rut said.

Captain Ironside had left the vicinity.

Sir Moth Interest said, “Huh!”

“The captain’s gone, sir,” Master Palate said to Sir Moth Interest.

“Give him a box — hard! hard! — on his left ear,” Doctor Rut said.

No one moved.

Doctor Rut struck Sir Moth Interest on his ear.

“Ow!” Sir Moth Interest said.

“How do you feel?” Doctor Rut asked.

“Sore! Sore!” Sir Moth Interest said.

“But where?” Doctor Rut asked.

“In my neck,” Sir Moth Interest said.

“I nipped him there,” Doctor Rut said to the others.

“And in my head,” Sir Moth Interest said.

“I boxed him twice or thrice to move those sinews,” Doctor Rut said.

“Sinews” are muscles.

“I swear you did,” Master Bias said.

“What a brave — excellent — man is a doctor, to beat one into health!” Mistress Polish said. “I thought his blows would even have killed him. Sir Moth Interest did feel no more than a great horse.”

“Is the wild captain gone, that man of murder?” Sir Moth Interest asked.

“All is calm and quiet,” Master Bias said.

“Do you say so, Cousin Bias?” Sir Moth Interest said. “Then all’s well.”

The word “cousin” indicates kinship. Master Bias had not yet married Placentia, but Sir Moth Interest was firmly convinced that Master Bias would marry her.

“How quickly a man is lost!” Parson Palate said.

“And soon recovered!” Master Bias said.

Mistress Polish said, “Where there are means and doctors, learned men and their apothecaries, who are not now, as Chaucer says, their friendship to begin, well could they teach each other how to win [cure people] in their swath-bands —”

Chaucer, Gen. Prol., 428 wrote, “Hir frendship was nought newe to biginne.”

Ben Jonson interpreted “newe” to mean “now.”

Doctor Rut and apothecary Tim Item had long been friends. Because of their long working together, they could effect cures. By being friends and working together, they would long have been learning the art of medicine.

“Swath-bands” are swaddling bands. They are also bandages.

Doctor Rut interrupted, “— stop your poetry, good gossip, stop your Chaucer’s clouts, and wash your dishes with them. We must rub up — uproot — the roots of his disease, and so we request your silence for a while, or else your absence.”

“Clouts” are 1) swaddling-cloths, aka a baby’s garments, including cloth diapers, or 2) rags.

“Nay, I know when to hold my peace,” Mistress Polish said.

Doctor Rut said to her:

“Then do it.”

He then said:

“Give me your hand, Sir Moth. Let’s feel your pulse.”

He felt Sir Moth Interest’s pulse and said:

“It is a pursiness, a kind of stoppage or obstruction, or tumor of the purse, for want of exercise, that you are troubled with.”

“Pursiness” is “shortness of breath.” Of course, the word glances at the word “purse,” aka moneybag. One illness afflicting Sir Moth Interest is greed: an excessive love of money. The other illness is shortness of breath due to his fear of Captain Ironside.

A tumor is a swelling. A purse is a bag. A medical example of a swelling of the purse could be swollen testicles, but in Sir Moth Interest’s case, he suffers from a swollen moneybag. The obstruction was too-tight purse-strings.

“You have some ligatures in the neck of your vesica or marsupium that are so close-knit that you cannot evaporate, and therefore you must use relaxatives.”

“Ligatures” can be 1) ligaments, or 2) purse-strings.

A vesica is a bladder, and a marsupium is a pouch.

“Close-knit” means close-tied or tightly tied.

Sir Moth Interest’s moneybag is too full and too tightly tied, and it never gets exercise. His moneybag needs to be opened so that some of the coins can “evaporate” into general circulation. Sir Moth Interest is tight-fisted, and relaxatives — muscle relaxants — would help open his hand.

Doctor Rut said:

“Besides, they say you have grown so restive that you cannot except with trouble put your hand into your pocket to discharge a reckoning, and this we sons of physic do call chiragra, a kind of cramp or hand-gout. You shall purge for it.”

“Restive” can mean 1) inactive, or 2) stubborn.

Sir Moth Interest’s hand cannot reach into his pocket and take out money to discharge — pay — a reckoning, aka bill.

To correct this problem, Sir Moth Interest needs to be purged of some of his money. If he becomes more willing to spend money, his hand will more easily go into his pocket to pull out coins. His hand will no longer have the hand-gout, aka chiragra.

A medical kind of purge is vomiting or defecation.

Tim Item said, “Indeed, Your Worship should do well to advise him to cleanse his body all the three high ways: that is, by sweat, purge, and phlebotomy.”

Sweat, purge, and phlebotomy were means of medical cures. Patients would be made to sweat, to vomit or defecate, and/or to bleed.

Doctor Rut said:

“You say well, learned Tim. I’ll first prescribe him to give his purse a purge once, twice a week at dice or cards.

“And when the weather is open, sweat at a bowling alley, or be let blood in the lending vein, and bleed a matter of fifty or threescore ounces at a time.”

Sir Moth Interest needs to purge some of his money. He can do that by losing at dice or cards.

Losing money while betting on the game of bowls will make him sweat or vomit.

The “lending vein” is the frame of mind that would allow Sir Moth Interest to lend money, presumably not at usurious rates.

The important point is that Sir Moth Interest needs to bleed money.

“Then put your thumbs under your girdle — your belt — and have somebody else pull out your purse for you, until with more ease and a good habit — custom or habitual practice — you can do it yourself.

“And then be sure always to keep a good diet, and have your table furnished from one end to the other: It is good for the eyes, but feed yourself on one dish still.”

In other words, have guests at meals and spend money to feed them well.

“Have your diet-drink — your nutritional drink — habitually ready in bottles, which must come from the King’s Head Tavern on Fish Street Hill.”

In other words: Spend money on good strong ale. It will build up your constitution (and reduce the weight of your moneybag).

Doctor Rut continued:

“I will prescribe you nothing but what I’ll take before you my own self. That is my course with all my patients.”

Food and drink are some good things for Sir Moth Interest to spend his money on.

Doctor Rut followed his own advice about diet, and he was willing to help Sir Moth eat some of the food and drink some of the ale.

Doctor Rut said that he would take it before Sir Moth Interest. This can mean 1) He would follow his own nutritional advice before prescribing it for Sir Moth, 2) He would be Sir Moth's food-taster, eating some of the food before Sir Moth ate it to make sure it was not poisoned, and/or 3) He would eat the food in front of Sir Moth, at Sir Moth's table.

“Very methodical, secundum artem — according to the art,” Parson Palate said.

“And very safe pro captu recipientis — for the pleasing of the recipient,” Master Bias said.

“All errant learnèd men, how they 'spute Latin!” Mistress Palate said.

By “errant” (wrong-headed), Mistress Polish meant “arrant” (learned).

By “'spute,” Mistress Polish meant “dispute,” but “to spew” means “to vomit.”

Doctor Rut said, “I learned this prescription from a Jew, and a great rabbi, who every morning mixed his cup of white wine with sugar and, by the residence — residue — in the bottom, would make report of any chronic, lasting malady, such as Sir Moth's is, being an oppilation — an obstruction — in that which you call the neck of the money bladder, most anatomical and by dissection.”

The rabbi's report was “most anatomical and by dissection.” These were words that Doctor Rut used to show approval.

Chances are that the rabbi looked at the wine after it had passed through his bladder. Doctors then and now look at urine to help determine a patient's health. Urine should be clear, and cloudy urine can indicate a medical problem.

The rabbi suffered from the same disease as Sir Moth Interest.

Nurse Keep entered the scene and said, "Oh, Master Doctor, and his 'pothecary, good Master Item, and my Mistress Polish! We need you all above! She's fallen again into a worse fit than ever."

"Who?" Mistress Polish asked.

"Your charge," Nurse Keep answered.

Placentia was ill again.

"Come away, gentlemen," Mistress Polish said.

Mistress Polish, Nurse Keep, Parson Palate, Doctor Rut, and Tim Item exited.

Sir Moth Interest said, "This fit — this session — with the doctor has mended — cured — me past expectation."

He exited, leaving Master Bias behind, alone.

— 3.5 —

Compass, Sir Diaphanous Silkworm, and Master Practice entered the scene. Sir Diaphanous Silkworm was holding a letter.

"Oh, Sir Diaphanous, have you finished your letter?" Compass asked.

"I have brought it," Sir Diaphanous Silkworm said.

"That's well," Master Practice said.

"But who shall carry it now?" Compass asked.

“A friend,” Sir Diaphanous Silkworm said. “I’ll find a friend to carry it. Master Bias here will not deny me my request.”

“What request is it?” Master Bias asked.

“To carry a challenge I have written to Captain Ironside,” Sir Diaphanous Silkworm answered.

Master Bias said:

“By my faith, but I will deny you your request, sir; you shall pardon me.

“For a twi-reason — a double reason — of state, I’ll bear no challenges: I will not hazard my lord’s favor so or forfeit my own judgment with His Honor by turning into a ruffian.”

He would not risk his lord’s favor, and he would not give up the reputation he had with his lord.

Dueling was against the law, and carrying a challenge to duel to another person was against the law. If Master Bias were to do that, he would be a ruffian.

Master Bias continued:

“I have to commend me nothing except His Lordship’s good opinion, and in addition to it my calligraphy, a beautiful handwriting fit for a secretary — a professional writer.”

Secretaries used different kinds of styles of handwriting for different kinds of documents. One style was called the secretary hand.

Master Bias continued:

“Now you know a man’s hand, being his executing part in fight, is more obnoxious to — that is, more liable to be affected by — the common peril —”

Duelists use their hands to control their weapons, and so their hands were liable to be injured.

Sir Diaphanous Silkworm interrupted, “— you shall not fight, sir; you shall only find my antagonist and commit us fairly there upon the ground on equal terms.”

Master Bias would not fight, but he would have to find Captain Ironside, deliver the letter, and find a dueling ground that would be fair to both duelists and that both duelists would commit to.

“Oh, sir!” Master Bias said. “But if my lord should hear I stood at the end — participated in even a minor way — of any quarrel, it would be an end of me in a political career in state affairs. I have read the political writers, and I have heard the opinions of our best divines.”

In 1613, King James I made into law his Edict and Severe Censure against Private Combats and Combatants. Duelists and their seconds (supporters) and those who carried challenges would be banished from court for seven years. Master Bias, of course, wanted a career at court.

Divines would presumably be against dueling and the killing it causes.

Exodus 20:13 states, “Thou shalt not kill” (King James Version).

“The gentleman has reason,” Compass said. “Where was first the birth of your acquaintance, or the cradle of your strict friendship made?”

“We met in France, sir,” Sir Diaphanous Silkworm answered.

Compass said:

“In France, that garden of humanity and mental cultivation, the very seed-plot — seeding ground — of all courtesies!

“I marvel that your friendship sucked that aliment and nourishment, the milk of France, and see this sour effect it does produce in contrast to all the sweet benefits of travel.

“There, every gentleman professing to be skilled in arms thinks that he is bound in honor to embrace and welcome the bearing of a challenge for another without either questioning the cause or asking the least color — pretext or show — of reason.

“There’s no cowardice and no poltroonery such as urging ‘why?’ and ‘wherefore?’

“Instead, there is only this: Carry a challenge, die, and do the thing.”

A poltroon is a complete and utter coward.

France was (and is) a country of intellectual cultivation, and yet many gentlemen died in duels there.

Master Bias said out loud:

“Why, listen, Master Compass, I just desire to speak in your ear in private.”

He then said quietly to him:

“I would carry his challenge, if I only hoped your Captain Ironside was angry enough to kill him.

“For, to tell you the truth, this knight — Sir Diaphanous — is an impertinent, meddlesome person in court, we think, and he troubles my lord’s lodgings and his table with frequent and unnecessary visits, which we (the better sort of followers) don’t like, being his fellow equals in all other places except our master’s table, and we disdain to do those servile, unworthy-of-a-gentleman services that often his foolish pride and empire — that is, his tyranny — will exact against the heart or humor of a gentleman.”

Compass replied:

“In truth, Master Bias, I’d not have you think that I speak to flatter you, but you are one of the deepest politicians I ever met, and the most subtly rational. I admire you.”

In this context, a politician is a schemer. Does Compass admire him?

The word “subtle” can mean crafty and cunning.

Reason can be used for good or for evil.

The word “admire” can mean “marvel at.” Compass marvels that someone like Master Bias can exist.

Compass continued:

“But don’t you believe in such a case that you are an accessory to his death, an accessory because you carry a challenge from him with such a purpose and intention?”

That purpose, of course, was to get Sir Diaphanous Silkworm killed. Master Bias would be an accessory before the fact: He would help arrange things so that Captain Ironside could kill Sir Diaphanous Silkworm.

Bias said:

“Sir, the corruption of one thing in nature is held the generation of another.”

Dead things became fertilizer to grow living things.

A proverb stated, “The corruption of one is the generation of another.”

Bias continued:

“And therefore I had rather be accessory to his death than to his life.”

“A new moral philosophy, too!” Compass said. “You’ll carry the challenge then?”

An old moral philosophy stated, “Thou shalt not kill.”

“I would if I were sure that it would not incense and inflame Captain Ironside’s choler — his anger — and make him want to beat the messenger,” Master Bias said.

“Oh, I’ll secure you and keep you safe,” Compass said. “You shall deliver the letter to Captain Ironside in my lodging safely and do your friend Sir Diaphanous a service worthy of his thanks.”

“I’ll venture it, upon so good induction — inducement — in order to rid the court of an impediment, this baggage — worthless — knight,” Bias said.

Impedimenta is Latin for the baggage of an army.

Captain Ironside entered the scene.

He said:

“Peace to you all, gentlemen, except to this upstart mushroom, who I hear is menacing me with a challenge, which I come to anticipate and save the law a labor.”

Upstarts are mushrooms because mushrooms spring up overnight, as upstart social climbers seem to do. Captain Ironside was calling Sir Diaphanous Silkworm a mushroom, but since Sir Diaphanous is a knight, the insult is undeserved except that Sir Diaphanous Silkworm is instigating the duel as a way to gain credit for reputation and so rise in society.

By having the duel now, they would save the law the trouble of trying to prevent it.

Captain Ironside said to Sir Diaphanous Silkworm, “Will you fight, sir?”

“Yes, in my shirt,” Sir Diaphanous Silkworm said.

He took off his doublet: a kind of jacket.

“Oh, that’s to save your doublet,” Captain Ironside said. “I know it is a court trick! You would rather have an ulcer — a running sore — in your body than an additional pink in your clothes.”

A pink is a decorative hole in clothing. The colorful cloth underneath shows through it.

A pink is also a sword’s or dagger’s stab.

“Captain, you are a coward if you do not fight in your shirt,” Sir Diaphanous Silkworm said.

He drew his sword.

Captain Ironside said:

“Sir, I do not intend to delay the fight because you say that, nor do I intend yet to take off my doublet.”

Of course he would not delay the fight: Sir Diaphanous Silkworm had just called him a coward.

He drew his sword.

Captain Ironside continued:

“You’ve now a reason to call me coward: because I won’t fight in my shirt, I who fear more the touch of the common and life-giving air than all your fury and the panoply — the full suit of armor.”

“Which is at best but a thin linen armor,” Master Practice said. “I think a cup of generous, good-quality wine would be better than fighting in your shirts.”

“Sir, sir, my valor is a valor of another nature than to be mended by a cup of wine,” Sir Diaphanous Silkworm said.

“I would be glad to hear of any different kinds of valors,” Compass said. “I am one who has known hitherto only the one virtue that they call fortitude to be worthy of the name of valor.”

Valor is fortitude: courage.

“Anyone who has not fortitude is justly thought to be a coward,” Captain Ironside said. “And he — Sir Diaphanous — is such a coward.”

“Oh, you have read the play there, The New Inn of Ben Jonson’s, that decries and openly condemns all other valor but what is for the public,” Sir Diaphanous Silkworm said.

In Act 4, Scene 4 of Ben Jonson’s play The New Inn, the character Lovell discusses and defends true valor. He says that true valor is a true science of distinguishing what’s good or evil. It springs out of reason and tends to perfect honor; the end goal of true valor is always honor and the public good. He also says that an act is not valorous if it is done for a private cause or reason.

“I think that, too,” Captain Ironside said. “But I did not learn it there. I think no valor exists for a private cause or reason.”

“Sir, I’ll redargue — confute or challenge — you by disputation and argument,” Sir Diaphanous Silkworm said.

“Oh, let’s hear this!” Compass said. “I long to hear a man dispute in his shirt about valor, and his sword drawn in his hand.”

Master Practice said, “Sir Diaphanous’ valor will catch a cold.”

Both Compass and Master Practice would mock the various kinds of valor that Sir Diaphanous Silkworm would talk about.

Master Practice then said to Sir Diaphanous, “Put on your doublet.”

Compass said quietly to Master Practice:

“His valor will remain cold — he will stay calm — you are deceived, and it will relish — please — much the sweeter in our ears.

“It may be, too, in the ordinance of nature — the way nature orders things that their valors are not yet so combative or truly antagonistic as to fight but may admit to hear about some divisions — different kinds — of fortitude that may put them off their quarrel.”

Sir Diaphanous Silkworm said:

“I would have no man think me so ungoverned or subject to my passion — strong feeling — but I can deliver him a lecture between my undertakings and executions.”

This can mean 1) “in the time between my undertaking to fight a duel and my execution — actually doing — my undertaking,” or 2) “between what I say I will do and what I actually do.”

Sir Diaphanous Silkworm continued:

“I know all kinds of doing the business that the town calls valor.”

Compass said quietly to Master Practice, “Yes, he has read the town. Towntop’s his author!”

In other words: Sir Diaphanous Silkworm has studied the attitude of Londoners, and he has listened to gossip as people whipped the parish-top and made it spin. That is where he has gained his ideas about valor.

Towntop, aka parish-top, is a large whipping-top that provided entertainment and exercise for people in a community.

Compass asked Sir Diaphanous Silkworm out loud, “What is your first kind of valor?”

“First is a rash headlong unexperience — valor arising from lack of experience,” Sir Diaphanous Silkworm said.

The First Kind of Valor: People can show courage by recklessly rushing into danger without knowing how dangerous the situation is.

Compass said, “Which is in children, fools, or your street gallants of the first head.”

“Of the first head” means “superior to others.” Compass was being sarcastic.

“A pretty kind of valor!” Master Practice said.

Compass said quietly to Master Practice, “Commend him; he will spin it out in his shirt as fine and flimsy as the thread in that shirt of his.”

“The next is an indiscreet presumption, grounded upon frequent escapes,” Sir Diaphanous Silkworm said.

The Second Kind of Valor: People can show valor because they are very confident of being able to escape from a dangerous situation.

Compass said:

“Or the insufficiency — the lack — of adversaries, and this is in your common fighting brothers, your old perdu — sentinels at an outpost — who, after a time, do think, the one, that they are shot-free, the other, that they are sword-free.”

These are sentinels who have been placed at dangerous outposts, but the battle has moved away from them and they are beyond the reach of bullets and swords and therefore they are safe. Such sentinels can feel valorous.

Compass then asked Sir Diaphanous Silkworm, “What is your third kind of valor?”

He replied, “It is nothing but an excess of choler that reigns in testy, grumpy old men —”

The Third Kind of Valor: An excess of anger displayed by testy, grumpy old men. Such old men can threaten and bluster.

Compass interrupted, “Noblemen’s porters and self-conceited poets who think too highly of themselves.”

“And is rather a peevishness than any part of valor,” Sir Diaphanous Silkworm said.

Master Practice said quietly to Compass, “He but rehearses; he concludes no valor.”

In other words: Sir Diaphanous Silkworm talks about valor, but he has not described anything that is true valor.

Compass replied quietly to Master Practice, “His harangue — lecture — undertakes a history of distempers — incidents of angry people — as they are practiced, and no more.”

He then asked Sir Diaphanous Silkworm, “Your next form of valor?”

Sir Diaphanous Silkworm began, “It is a dull desperate resolving —”

Compass interrupted, “— in case of some necessitous, impoverished misery, or incumbent — threatening — evil.”

Master Practice said, “Narrowness of mind, or ignorance being the root of it.”

Sir Diaphanous Silkworm finished his sentence, “— which you shall find in gamesters quite blown up.”

The Fourth Kind of Valor: People who have been ruined by gambling or who are in some other desperate situation can resolve to do something desperate.

“Bankrupt merchants, undiscovered and still-hidden traitors,” Compass said.

People who are desperate can rebel against their government.

Master Practice said, “Or your exemplified malefactors — criminals who have been made an example to others and have survived their infamy and punishment.”

Compass said:

“For example, one who has lost his ears by a just sentence of the Star Chamber, a right valiant knave.

“And is a histrionical contempt of what a man fears most, it being an evil in his own apprehension unavoidable.”

If it is histrionical, then it is theatrically extravagant and hypocritical.

“Contempt of what a man fears most” is “disrespect to one’s sovereign,” whether secular or divine.

One kind of apprehension is being arrested.

Master Practice said, “This kind of valor is found in cowards wounded mortally, or thieves adjudged — sentenced — to die.”

Compass said, “This is a valor that I should desire much to see encouraged, as being a special entertainment for our rogue people who are spectators at an execution, and it does make often good sport to them from the gallows to the ground.”

The people who are being executed could die with some valor by accepting their fate and by repenting their sins. Such a display of valor and repentance would entertain and benefit the spectators from the time the criminals stepped on the gallows to the time when their bodies were taken from the rope and laid on the ground to be quartered.

This English punishment for high treason was on the books until 1870:

That you be drawn on a hurdle to the place of execution where you shall be hanged by the neck and being alive cut down, your privy members shall be cut off and your bowels taken out and burned before you, your head severed from your body and your body divided into four quarters to be disposed of at the King's pleasure.

In William Shakespeare's Macbeth, the old Thane of Cawdor was a traitor to King Duncan, but he died well. Malcom said to King Duncan:

*[...] I have spoke
With one that saw him die: who did report
That very frankly he confess'd his treasons,
Implored your highness' pardon and set forth*

*A deep repentance: nothing in his life
Became him like the leaving it; he died
As one that had been studied in his death
To throw away the dearest thing he owed,
As 'twere a careless trifle.*

(Macbeth 1.4.2-11, Signet Edition)

This is one kind of valor that Compass would encourage.

Sir Diaphanous Silkworm said, “But mine is a judicial resolving or liberal undertaking of a danger —”

The Fifth Kind of Valor: A nobleman shows valor when facing a risk worthy of a gentleman — such as a duel.

Compass interrupted, “— that might be avoided.”

“Aye,” Sir Diaphanous Silkworm said, “and with assurance that it is found in noblemen and gentlemen of the best sheaf — the best class.”

Such risks are avoidable, and they are sometimes avoided.

Compass said, “Who having lives to lose, like ordinary private men, have yet a world of honor, and public reputation to defend —”

Sir Diaphanous Silkworm interrupted, “— which in the brave historified Greeks and Romans you shall read of.”

They are historified — celebrated in history.

Compass said, “And, no doubt, many in our aldermen meet it, and their deputies, the soldiers of the city, valiant blades, who, rather than their houses should be ransacked, would fight it out like so many wild beasts, not for the fury they are commonly armed with, but the close manner of their fight and custom of joining head to head and foot to foot.”

The alderman would fight to protect their property not by physically fighting but by presenting a unified front to the enemy.

Soldiers can fight in close formation: Roman armies were famous for doing that.

“And which of these so well-pressed and well-argued resolutions am I to encounter now?” Captain Ironside said. “For commonly men who have so much choice before them have some trouble to resolve and decide on any one of them.”

Master Bias said, “There are three valors yet that Sir Diaphanous has, if he doesn’t mind my saying so, not touched.”

“Yeah?” Sir Diaphanous Silkworm said. “Which are those?”

Master Practice said quietly to Compass, “He perks up at that!”

Sir Diaphanous Silkworm had perked up because more discussion about valor meant putting off the duel for a while longer.

Compass said quietly to Master Practice, “Nay, he does more: He chatters.”

Sir Diaphanous Silkworm’s teeth could chatter out of fear.

Of course, more chatter from Master Bias meant putting off the duel.

Master Bias said:

“A philosophical contempt of death is one kind of valor.”

Marcus Porcius Cato Uticensis — often called Cato the Younger — lived according to strict ethical principles. He fought against Julius Caesar, whom he believed wanted to do away with the Roman Republic and make himself King of Rome. After Julius Caesar defeated the army of Cato the Younger at Utica in Africa, Cato committed suicide after reading the Phaedo, a dialogue by Plato in which appear arguments for the immortality of the soul. Believing that his soul is immortal, Cato the Younger killed himself because he loved freedom and did not want to live in what he thought would become a kingdom rather than a republic.

The Sixth Kind of Valor: Fortitude that comes from philosophy.

“Then, an infused, instilled kind of valor wrought in us by our genii or good spirits and guardian angels, of which the gallant ethnics — heathens — had deep sense, who generally held that no great statesman, scholar, or soldier ever did anything sine divino aliquo afflatu.”

The Latin quotation from Cicero’s De natura deorum, or On the Nature of the Gods, 2.167, means “Without any divine inspiration.”

The Seventh Kind of Valor: Fortitude that is a gift from non-Christian gods.

Master Practice said, “But there’s a Christian valor above these, too.”

Master Bias said, “Which is a quiet patient toleration of whatsoever the malicious world with injury does to you, and consists in passion more than action, Sir Diaphanous.”

The passion of Christ is His suffering and death.

Some Christians believe that the virtue of patience and suffering display a greater valor than physical fortitude and courage.

The Eighth Kind of Valor: Christian patience and suffering.

Sir Diaphanous Silkworm said, “To be sure, I do take mine to be Christian valor —”

If he does, he need not fight but instead can suffer patiently.

“You may be mistaken, though,” Compass said. “Can you justify on any reason this seeking to deface in a duel the divine image in a man?”

Exodus 20.13 states, “Thou shalt not kill” (King James Version).

Genesis 1:26 states, “And God said, Let us make man in our image, after our likeness: and let them have dominion over the fish of the sea, and over the fowl of the air, and over the cattle, and over all the earth, and over every creeping thing that creepeth upon the earth” (King James Version).

“Oh, sir!” Master Bias said. “Let them alone! Isn’t Diaphanous as much a divine image as is Ironside? Let images fight, if they will fight, in God’s name.”

Both Sir Diaphanous Silkworm and Captain Ironside are divine images: images of God.

Master Bias would be happy if Captain Ironside were to kill Sir Diaphanous Silkworm.

— 3.6 —

Nurse Keep entered the scene and interrupted them.

“Where’s Master Needle?” she asked. “Have you seen Master Needle? We are ruined!”

“What ails the frantic, lunatic nurse?” Compass asked.

“My mistress is undone — she’s crying out!” Nurse Keep said. “Where is this man, do you think? Where is Master Needle?”

Master Needle entered the scene and said, “Here I am.”

“Run for the party whom we need: Mistress Chair, the midwife,” Nurse Keep said.

Stupified by the request, Master Needle stood still.

Nurse Keep said, “Nay, look how the man stands, as if he were gowked — stupified! She’s lost, if you do not hasten away from the party.”

As would become clear, “she” is Placentia.

“Where is the doctor?” Master Needle asked.

Nurse Keep said:

“Where a scoffing, dismissive man is, and his apothecary is little better. They laugh and jeer at everything.

“Will you hurry?

“And fetch the person in question — the midwife — quickly to our mistress. We are all ruined! The tympany will out else!”

The tympany is a swelling. “The tympany will out” means 1) The baby will be born, and 2) The tympany — pregnancy — will become gossip.

Nurse Keep and Master Needle exited.

Sir Moth Interest entered the scene and said:

“News, news, good news, better than buttered news!”

Nathaniel Butter was an early newsman.

Sir Moth Interest continued:

“My niece is found with child, the doctor tells me, and has started labor.”

“What!” Compass said.

“The portion’s paid!” Sir Moth Interest said. “The portion —”

“The portion’s paid!” means “the portion is a dead issue!” or “the portion is settled!”

In this society, a man of high position would not want to marry a woman who gave birth out of wedlock to another man’s child. This meant that Sir Moth Interest would keep the dowry.

“Oh, the captain! Is he here?” Sir Moth Interest said, seeing Captain Ironside.

Sir Moth exited.

“He’s spied your swords out,” Master Practice said. “Put them away! Put them away! You’ve driven him away from here; and yet your quarrel’s ended.”

One quarrel was over who would get Placentia’s dowry.

Captain Ironside said, “It has ended in a most strange discovery and revelation.”

“Of light gold,” Master Practice said.

“Light gold” is a gold coin that is no longer legal tender because its edges have been clipped to collect bits of gold. Gold coins had rings, aka circles, and if the clipping extended inside the circle, the coin was no longer legal tender.

Sir Diaphanous Silkworm said:

“And cracked within the ring.”

One kind of circle or ring is a vagina. Placentia’s vagina had been metaphorically “cracked,” and in this society she was no longer regarded as wife material for an upper-class man.

Sir Diaphanous Silkworm said:

“I take the omen as a good omen.”

The omen was birth. One way in which it was a good omen was that Sir Diaphanous Silkworm would not first marry Placentia and then discover that she was pregnant with another man’s baby.

Master Practice said:

“Then put up — put away — your sword.”

In the confusion, Compass exited.

“And put on your doublet. Give the captain thanks.”

The two would-be combatants sheathed their swords.

Putting on his doublet, Sir Diaphanous Silkworm said:

“I would have been slurred else.”

He meant that his honor would have been stained due to being engaged to a woman who gave birth out of wedlock (assuming that he would have been chosen to be her husband).

He continued:

“Thank you, noble captain! Your quarrelling caused all this.”

The quarreling had kept all of Placentia’s suitors from being chosen to be engaged to and marry her.

“Where’s Compass?” Captain Ironside asked.

Master Practice said, “Gone, shrunk hence, contracted to his center, I fear.”

“Shrunk hence” can mean that Compass has shrunk away and left the scene.

A penis can shrink and contract, returning closer to a man’s center.

Another kind of center could be the center of a target. A metaphorical target for Compass’ “arrow” could be Placentia’s vagina.

Master Practice suspected that Compass was the father of Placentia’s child, and so Compass had gone to see her.

“The slip is his, then,” Captain Ironside said.

Compass had given them the slip. A “slip” is also a counterfeit, illegitimate coin. A “slip” is also a sexual slip, and it is the baby that can result from a sexual slip.

Captain Ironside’s words can be interpreted as saying that Compass was the father of Placentia’s illegitimate baby.

Sir Diaphanous Silkworm said, “I was likely to have been abused in the business, had the slip slurred on me, a counterfeit.”

The slip is the illegitimate child. Sir Diaphanous Silkworm could have married Placentia and been the non-biological father of a counterfeit — illegitimate and not his own — child.

Master Bias said, “Sir, we are all abused, as many as were brought on to be suitors, and we will all join in thanks to the captain, and to his fortune that so brought us off and rescued us.”

Captain Ironside's coming unannounced to duel Sir Diaphanous Silkworm had helped both Sir Diaphanous and Master Bias by delaying the choice of a husband for Placentia. They could have been engaged to marry a woman who was now giving birth to another man's child.

Captain Ironside's fortune, aka luck, had also brought them good fortune.

CHORUS 3 (The Magnetic Lady, or Humors Reconciled)

Damplay said, "This was a pitiful poor trick of your poet, boy, to make his prime woman character be with child — be pregnant — and fall into labor just to settle a quarrel."

John Trygust replied:

"With whose borrowed ears have you heard, sir, all this while, that you can mistake the current — the direction — of our scene so?"

"The stream of the plot threatened her being with child from the very beginning, for it presented her in the first part of the second act with some apparent note of infirmity or defect, from knowledge of which the members of the audience were rightly to be left hanging and kept in suspense by the author until the quarrel, which was only the accidental, by-chance cause, hastened on the discovery of it in occasioning her fright, which made her fall into her throes of childbirth quickly, and all of this happened within that compass of time allowed to the comedy wherein the poet expressed his prime artifice — his primary artistic construction. It is not an error that the detection of her being with child should bring to an end the quarrel that had produced it."

"The boy is too hard for you, Brother Damplay," Probee said. "You had best pay attention to the play and let him alone."

“I don’t care for marking — paying attention to — the play,” Damplay said. “I’ll damn it, talk, and do that which I have come for. I will not have gentlemen lose their privilege, nor I myself my prerogative, for never an overgrown or superannuated poet — fat and aged playwright — of them all! He shall not give me the law. I will censure and judge the play, and be witty, and take my tobacco, and enjoy my Magna Carta of reprehension and criticism, as my predecessors have done before me.”

Damplay believed that since he is a gentleman, he has the right and prerogative to criticize the play.

The Magna Carta recognized upper-class people’s right of free speech, including the right to criticize.

“Even to behavior and speech beyond control and absurdity,” John Trygust said.

Probee said, “Not now, because the gentlewoman is in labor and the midwife may come on stage all the sooner, to put her and us out of our pain.”

Damplay said to John Trygust, “Well, look to your business afterward, boy, that all things be clear and come properly forth, suited and set together in order; for I will search what follows severely and to the fingernail.”

Sculptors would scrape a fingernail on a marble statue to check for flaws.

“Let your fingernail run smooth then and not scratch, lest the author be bold to pare your fingernail to the quick and make it hurt,” John Trygust said. “You’ll find him as severe as yourself.”

Damplay said:

“He is a shrewd, cunning boy, and he has bested me everywhere!”

Seeing that the next scene was starting, he said:

“The midwife has come; she has made haste.”

ACT 4 (The Magnetic Lady, or Humors Reconciled)

— 4.1 —

Mother Chair and the midwife and Master Needle talked together.

“Stay, Master Needle, you do prick — hurry — too fast upon the business,” Mother Chair said. “I must take some breath. Give me my stool. You have drawn a stitch — a sharp pain — in my side upon me, in faith, son Needle, with your haste.

A midwife would sit on the stool to assist at a childbirth. The pregnant woman would be in a birthing-chair, some of which were three-legged stools.

The words “mother” and “son” did not mean a biological relationship. They were simply words of etiquette.

Master Needle said, “Good mother, piece up — mend — this breach; I’ll give you a new gown, a new silk grogram gown. I’ll do it, mother.”

A breach is a hole. Placentia’s pregnancy was something that needed to be patched up. It was a bad situation, and Mother Chair and the midwife and Master Needle wanted to make it less bad.

“Grogram” is a coarse silk fabric.

Nurse Keep entered the room.

She had overheard Master Needle’s last few words, and she said:

“What’ll you do? You have done too much already with your prick-seam, and through-stitch, Master Needle.”

A prick-seam is a kind of stitch used in making gloves, and a through-stitch is a stitch that is drawn through the material.

Hmm. The word “prick” has a bawdy meaning, and a needle can be likened to a male body part. Perhaps Compass is not the father of Placentia’s baby. Perhaps there is an explanation for Master Needle’s wanting to give Mother Chair a new silk program gown if she mends this breach.

Nurse Keep then said:

“I ask you to not sit fabling here old tales, good Mother Chair, the midwife. Just hurry and come up to Placentia’s bed-chamber.”

Mother Chair and Master Needle exited.

— 4.2 —

Compass and Master Practice entered the scene.

“How are things now, nurse? Where’s My Lady?” Compass asked.

“My Lady” is Lady Loadstone.

“In her bed-chamber locked up, I think,” Nurse Keep said. “She’ll speak with nobody.”

“Does she knows about this accident — this incident?” Compass asked.

“Alas, sir, no,” Nurse Keep said. “I wish that she might never know about it!”

She exited.

Master Practice said, “I think Her Ladyship is too virtuous and too nobly innocent to have a hand in and take part in so ill-formed, badly conceived, and poorly managed a business.”

The business was attempting to have Master Practice marry a woman who was pregnant with another man’s baby.

Compass said:

“Your thought, sir, is a brave, admirable thought and a safe one. The child now to be born is not more free from the aspersion — soil and defamation — of all spot — stain and moral disgrace — than she.

“Even if there were no other considerations, would Lady Loadstone have her hand in a plot against Master Practice, whom she so loves, cries up and speaks well about, and values?”

Compass then mentioned the other reasons why Lady Loadstone would not be involved in a plot against Master Practice:

“Whom she knows to be a man marked out for a chief justice in his cradle? Or a lord paramount, the head of the Hall, aka master of an Inn of Court, the top or the top-gallant of our law?”

“Top” and “top-gallant” are high sails. Master Practice will rise high in his legal career.

Compass continued:

“Assure yourself, she could not so deprave and impair the rectitude of her judgment to wish you to a wife who might prove to bring infamy and bad reputation to you, a wife whom she esteemed that part of the commonwealth and had up for honor to her blood.”

“I must confess a great beholdingness and obligation to Her Ladyship’s offer and good wishes,” Master Practice said. “But the truth is, I never had affection for or any liking of this niece of hers.”

“You foresaw something, then?” Compass asked.

“I had my notes and my prognostics,” Master Practice said.

“Notes” can mean gossip — people note what other people say and do.

“Prognostics” are foreknowledge: predictions of the future.

“You read almanacs and study them to some purpose, I believe?” Compass asked.

Almanacs were bound together with prognostics.

“I do confess it,” Master Practice said. “I do believe and pray, too, according to the planets at some times.”

According to astrology, some days are propitious for some tasks. Other days are not propitious for those tasks.

“And you do observe the sign of the zodiac in making love?” Compass asked.

In this society, “making love” meant wooing.

“As I do in phlebotomy,” Master Practice said.

Phlebotomy is the medical procedure of opening a vein to let out blood. Some days were regarded as propitious for this procedure; these days were determined by astrology.

“And you choose your mistress — the woman whom you are devoted to — by the good days, and leave her by the bad?”

“I do, and I do not,” Master Practice said.

In other words: I do choose her on the propitious days, and I do not choose her on the days that are not propitious.

Compass said to himself, “A little more would fetch all his astronomy from Allestree.”

In other words: A little conversation would show that he got all his prognostications from a man named Allestree.

Astonomy is perhaps a portmanteau word meaning “astonishing astronomy.” The phrase may be regarded as a description of astrology — which is the word that readers would expect to see there.

It would be astonishing if astrology were true.

Richard Allestree of Derby was a poor poet and an almanac writer. An enemy of Ben Jonson named Alexander Gill wrote that Allestree was a Homer in comparison to Jonson.

Master Practice said, “I tell you, Master Compass, as my friend, and under seal — in secret — I cast my eye long ago upon the other wench, My Lady’s serving-woman. She is another manner of piece — a different kind of sexual object — for handsomeness than is the niece — but that is sub sigillo — under seal, a secret — as I give it you in hope of your aid and counsel in the business.”

Compass said:

“You need counsel? You who are the only famous counsel of the kingdom and in all courts?”

“Counsel” can mean 1) advice, and 2) a lawyer.

Compass continued:

“That is a jeer, in faith, worthy your name and your profession, too, sharp Master Practice.”

“Sharp” can mean 1) intelligent, and 2) cunning in an unethical sense. A “sharper” is a cheat — a swindler.

“Sharp practice” is unethical practice — unethical tricks.

Master Practice replied, “No, upon my law, as I am a bencher and now double reader, I meant in pure simplicity of request.”

“Bencher” and “double reader” are positions in the Inns of Court, with “double reader” being the more senior position. The Inns of Court are buildings owned by legal associations.

Compass said:

“If you meant so.”

He may have emphasized the “If.”

He continued:

“The affairs are now perplexing and confused and full of trouble; give them time to breathe and to settle down.

“I’ll do my best.

“But in the meantime, prepare the parson.”

He said to himself:

“I am glad to know this, for I myself liked the young maiden before, and loved her, too.”

Compass was happy because he could now use this information to keep Master Practice from marrying Pleasance.

Compass then asked out loud:

“Do you have you a marriage license?”

“No, but I can fetch one quickly,” Master Practice said.

Compass said:

“Do, do, and remember the parson’s pint to engage him in the business.”

The parson’s pint is a gift — or a bribe.

Compass added:

“A knitting cup there must be.”

The knitting cup is a cup of wine that is passed around at weddings.

“I shall do it,” Master Practice said.

He exited, leaving Compass behind.

— 4.3 —

Master Bias and Sir Moth Interest entered the scene.

Master Bias complained to Sir Moth Interest, “It is an affront to me from you, sir. You brought me here to My Lady’s to woo a wife, who since has proved to be a cracked commodity. She is damaged merchandise. She has broken bulk too soon.”

“Broken bulk” means “unloaded cargo.” She gave birth too soon — she gave birth before being married.

Sir Moth Interest said:

“It is no fault of mine, if she is cracked in pieces or broke round.”

“Broke round” means broken around the edges. Her value had been lessened the way the value of a coin is lessened when its circumference has been clipped.

One kind of “round” is a vagina, and her virginity had been broken the way a hymen can be broken.

“It was the fault of my sister, who owns the house where my niece has got her clap, which makes all this uproar.”

The clap can mean 1) misfortune, 2) venereal disease, and/or 3) loud noise.

“I keep her marriage portion safe; that is not scattered.

“The moneys don’t rattle, nor are they thrown to make a muss yet among the gamesome — merry — suitors.”

According to the Oxford English Dictionary, the verb “rattle” can mean “to give out a rapid succession of short, sharp, percussive sounds.”

Also according to the Oxford English Dictionary, the noun “rattle” can mean “A state of uproar, commotion, or boisterous or exuberant activity” (first entry 1688; The Magnetic Lady was licensed for performance on 12 October 1632).

A rapid succession of short, sharp, percussive sounds uttered during exuberant activity could be this: “Oh! Oh! Oh! Oh! Oh!”

“Muss” is a scrambling and snatching game.

Compass said:

“Can you endure that flouting insult, close — secretive — Master Bias, who have been so bred in the politics?

“The injury is done to you, and by him only. He lent you impressed money, and he upbraids you with it.”

“Impressed money” is money that is paid in advance. Sir Moth Interest had given Master Bias 400 pounds so that he could buy new clothes and make a good impression on Lady Loadstone and Placentia. This money was an advance on the dowry that Master Bias would get if he married Placentia.

Compass continued:

“He has furnished you with money for the wooing, and now waives — disregards — you. He casts you aside.”

“That makes me expostulate — complain about — the wrong so with him, and that makes me resent it as I do,” Master Bias said.

“But do it home, then,” Compass said. “Carry this matter — this complaint — to a conclusion.”

“Sir, my lord shall know it,” Master Bias said.

“And all the lords of the court, too,” Compass said.

“What a moth you are, Sir Interest!” Master Bias said.

“In what way am I a moth, I ask you, Sweet Master Bias?” Sir Moth Interest asked.

Compass answered, “To draw in young statesmen and heirs of policy into the noose of an infamous matrimony.”

The verb “to moth” meant “to hunt for moths.” Sir Moth Interest hunted for moths such as Master Bias who, like Sir Moth Interest, were drawn to Placentia’s marriage portion the way that a moth is drawn to a candle.

“Heirs of policy” are those who are likely to gain political power.

Master Bias said:

“Yes, infamous and shameful, quasi in communem famam.”

The Latin quasi in communem famam means “as though in a public scandal.”

A marriage to Placentia would be a public scandal.

Master Bias continued:

“And matrimony, quasi [as if] matter of money.”

This means “marriage as if it were for the sake of money.”

Indeed, Placentia’s suitors were after her marriage portion.

“Learnedly urged, my cunning Master Bias,” Compass said.

Master Bias said, “Matrimony — matter of money — with his lewd, known, and prostituted niece.”

Master Bias meant that Sir Moth Interest wanted him to marry Placentia although she were known to be lewd.

A marriage to Placentia would be a public scandal.

“Lewd” can mean 1) unchaste, 2) uneducated, and 3) evil.

Sir Moth Interest said:

“My known and prostitute!”

As an adjective, the word “prostitute” means “licentious.”

Sir Moth Interest continued:

“How you mistake the situation and run upon a false ground, Master Bias!

“Your political lords will do me right.”

Sir Moth Interest meant that he did not know that Placentia was a lewd woman until now.

Also, if there were to be a trial about Placentia’s dowry, which he wanted to keep, he hoped that the lords of the Inns of Court would support him.

Sir Moth Interest continued:

“Now she is prostitute and now that I know it — please understand me — I mean to keep the marriage portion in my hands and pay no moneys.”

Compass said:

“Did you mark that, Don Bias? Are you paying attention?”

“Don” is a complimentary title, but Compass meant that Master Bias had been “done”: manipulated and taken advantage of.

Compass continued:

“And you shall still remain in bonds to Sir Moth for wooing furniture and impressed charges.”

Master Bias had been furnished with money in advance to buy furniture — clothing and gifts — so he could woo Placentia in style and impress her.

“Good Master Compass, for the sums Master Bias has had from me, I do acquit him,” Sir Moth Interest said. “They are his own. Here before you I do release him.”

“Good!” Compass said.

“Oh, sir!” Master Bias said.

Compass said to Master Bias, “By God’s eyelid, take it. I do witness it. Sir Moth cannot hurl away his money better.”

Sir Moth Interest said, “Master Bias shall get so much, sir, by my acquaintance, to be my friend. And now report to his lords as I deserve no otherwise.”

Master Bias would not have to repay the 400 pounds he had gotten from Sir Moth Interest. In return, he would be Sir Moth Interest’s friend at court.

Compass said:

“You deserve no otherwise but well, and I will witness it and I will be witness to the value: Four hundred pounds is the price, if I am not mistaken, of your true friend in court.

“Shake hands. You have bought him, and you have bought him cheap.”

Sir Moth Interest and Master Bias shook hands.

“I am His Worship’s servant,” Master Bias said.

Master Bias had been bribed and would now be Sir Moth Interest’s advocate at court.

Compass said to himself, “And you are his slave, Sir Moth. Sealed and delivered. Haven’t you studied the court compliment?”

The “court compliment” is a court ceremony. In this case, it is the ceremony of buying a courtier.

Sir Moth Interest and Master Bias exited.

Compass said to himself, “Here are a pair of humors reconciled now, whom money held at a distance and kept them apart from each other; or their thoughts, which are baser than money.”

Their base thoughts are love of money.

Money is not the root of all evil — love of money is.

Both men wanted Placentia’s dowry. Both men would have gotten a portion of it if Master Bias had married her. But Master Bias had been angry at Sir Moth Interest because Placentia was pregnant. He was also angry at having to repay the 400 pounds that he had been given in advance to woo Placentia.

The argument had been resolved by Master Bias becoming Sir Moth Interest’s friend at court in return for not having to repay the 400 pounds.

Ben Jonson’s play is subtitled “humors reconciled,” and these are the first two humors to be reconciled.

Mistress Polish and Nurse Keep entered the scene. They were arguing, quietly at first and then louder. They did not see Compass.

Mistress Polish said to Nurse Keep, “Get out, thou caitiff — base — witch! Bawd, beggar, gypsy! Anything indeed but an honest woman!”

“Whatever you please, Dame Polish, My Lady’s stroker and flatterer,” Nurse Keep said.

Compass said to himself, “What is going on here? The gossips have fallen out with each other!”

Madame Polish said to Nurse Keep, “Thou are a traitor to me, an Eve, the apple, and the serpent, too. Thou are a viper that has eaten a passage through me, through my own bowels, by thy recklessness.”

Vipers were thought to be born by biting their way out of their mother’s body. They were symbols of ingratitude.

Compass said to himself, “What frantic outburst is this? I’ll step aside and listen to it.”

He hid himself.

Madame Polish said:

“Did I trust thee, wretch, with such a secret of that consequence, which did so concern me and my child, our livelihood and reputation? And have thou undone and ruined us? By thy connivance with an evil person, with you nodding and napping in a corner, and allowing her to be gotten with child so basely?”

“Sleepy, unlucky hag! Thou bird of night and all mischance to me!”

Birds of night are birds of ill omen.

“Good lady empress!” Nurse Keep said. “Had I the keeping of your daughter’s clicket — latch — in charge? Was that committed to my trust?”

A clicket is the latch of a door or a gate. “Clicket” is also a word metaphorically related to sex. Think of a key being inserted into a lock. A latch-key raises the latch of a door or a gate. Doors and gates can be open or closed.

Compass said, “Her daughter?”

Mistress Polish’s daughter was Pleasance. Was Pleasance pregnant, like Placentia?

Compass wanted to marry Pleasance.

Mistress Polish said, “Softly, devil, not so loud. You’d have the house hear and be witness, would you?”

“Let all the world be witness,” Nurse Keep said. “Before I’ll endure the tyranny of such a tongue — and of such a pride —”

“What will you do?” Mistress Polish asked.

Nurse Keep answered:

“Tell truth and shame the she-man-devil in puffed sleeves!”

A proverb stated, “Tell truth and shame the devil.”

The “she-man-devil” wearing puffed sleeves is Mistress Polish.

Nurse Keep continued:

“Run any hazard by revealing all to My Lady about how you changed the cradles and changed the children in them!”

“Not so high!” Mistress Polish said. “Not so loud!”

Nurse Keep's voice traveled.

Nurse Keep said, "Calling your daughter Pleasance there 'Placentia,' and calling my true mistress Placentia by the name of 'Pleasance.'"

Not only had the babies been exchanged, but their names had also been exchanged.

To avoid confusion, this book will continue to use the name "Placentia" for the woman who has hitherto been called Placentia, and this book will continue to use the name "Pleasance" for the woman who has hitherto been called Pleasance.

Compass said to himself, "A horrid and detestable secret, this is — and it's worth the discovery!"

Pleasance was actually Lady Loadstone's niece, while Placentia was actually Mistress Polish's daughter.

Suitors had been trying to marry Placentia for the dowry, but the dowry actually belonged to Pleasance.

In Homer's Odyssey the suitors were trying to marry Penelope and become the King of Ithaca, but Penelope's husband, Odysseus, was still alive. His palace still belonged to him.

"And must you be thus loud?" Mistress Polish asked.

Nurse Keep said:

"I will be louder, and I will cry it through the house, through every room, and every office — workplace — of the laundry-maids, until it is borne hot to My Lady's ears.

"Before I will live in such a slavery, I'll do away myself. I'll kill myself."

“Didn’t thou swear to keep it secret?” Mistress Polish said.
“And upon what book? I remember now: The Practice of Piety.”

Lewes Bayly, Bishop of Bangor, wrote The Practice of Piety, which was a Puritan devotional manual.

Nurse Keep said:

“It was a practice of impiety out of your wicked forge and making. I know it now — my conscience tells me.”

Forges work with metal, and Mistress Polish had worked evil on the Steel family. Lady Loadstone was the widow of a man named Steel.

Nurse Keep continued:

“First, it was a practice of impiety against the infants, to rob them of their names and their true parents.

“Second, it was a practice of impiety to abuse the neighborhood, to keep them in error.

“Third, and most of all, it was a practice of impiety against My Lady. She has the main wrong, and I will let her know it instantly.

“Repentance, if it is true, never comes too late.”

Midwives, nurses, and guardians had the ethical duty not to switch babies. Parents wanted to raise their own children and leave the inheritance to them, not to other children.

Switching children would also abuse the neighborhood. If a midwife, nurse, or guardian switched one child, perhaps she had switched or would switch other children.

Nurse Keep exited.

Mistress Polish said:

“What have I done? Conjured a spirit up I shall not lay down again? Drawn a danger and ruin on myself thus, by provoking a peevish fool whom nothing will persuade to stop or will satisfy, I fear?”

“Her patience stirred has turned to fury.

“I have run my bark — my ship — on a ‘sweet’ rock by my own arts and trust, and I must get off again, or be dashed to pieces!”

She exited.

“This was a business worth the listening after,” Compass said to himself.

— 4.5 —

Pleasance, the true niece of Lady Loadstone, entered the scene and said:

“Oh, Master Compass, did you see my mother?”

“Mistress Placentia, My Lady’s niece, was newly brought to bed of the bravest — most splendid — boy!”

“Will you go see it?”

“First, I’ll know the father, before I approach these hazards,” Compass replied.

He did not want to cause gossip that he was the faather.

Pleasance said, “Mistress Midwife has promised to find out a father for it, if there is need.”

The father need not be the biological father.

“She may the safelier — the more safely — do it by virtue of her place as a midwife,” Compass said. “But, pretty Pleasance, I have a piece of news for you that I think will please you.”

“What is it, Master Compass?” Pleasance asked.

“Wait, you must earn it before you know it,” Compass said.

“Where’s My Lady?”

“She has retired to her chamber and shut it up,” Pleasance said.

“She has heard nothing about this yet?” Compass said.

“Well, command the coach to be made ready and prepare yourself to travel a little way with me.”

“To where, for God’s sake?” Pleasance asked.

“Where I’ll entreat you to do something not to your loss, believe it, if you dare trust yourself,” Compass said.

“I will go with you the world over!” Pleasance said.

“The news will well requite the pains, I assure you, and in this tumult you will not be missed,” Compass said.

“Command the coach to be made ready. It is an instant — an urgent — business that will not be done without you.”

Pleasance exited, and Parson Palate entered the scene.

Compass said, “Parson Palate, we are most opportunely met. Step into my chambers. I’ll come to you soon. There is a friend or two who will entertain and receive you.”

Parson Palate exited, and Master Practice, who was holding a marriage license, entered the scene.

Compass asked, “Master Practice, do you have the license?”

— 4.6 —

“Here it is,” Master Practice said.

“Let’s see it,” Compass said. “Your name’s not in it.”

“I’ll fill that in soon,” Master Practice said. “It has the seal, which is the main thing, and it is registered. The clerk knows me and trusts me.”

“Do you have the parson?” Compass asked.

“They say he’s here,” Master Practice said. “He said that he would come here.”

Compass said:

“I would not have him seen here for a world, to breed suspicion. Intercept him and prevent that. But take your license with you and fill in the blank, or leave it here with me. I’ll do it for you.”

Compass would both intercept the parson and fill in the blank. Actually, he had already intercepted the parson.

Compass continued:

“Wait for us at his church behind the Old Exchange; we’ll come in the coach and meet you there within this quarter of an hour at least.”

Master Practice gave him the marriage license and said:

“I am much bound to you, Master Compass. You have all the law and parts — abilities — of Squire Practice forever at your use.

“I’ll tell you news, too. Sir, your reversion’s fallen. Thinwit, Surveyor of the Projects General, is dead.”

This meant that Compass would become the new Surveyor of the Projects General. This was a desirable position.

“When did he die?” Compass asked.

“Just this morning,” Master Practice said. “I received the news from a right hand: an important aide.”

“Conceal it, Master Practice, and bear in mind the main affair you have in hand and are actively concerned with,” Compass said.

Master Practice exited the scene, and Pleasance entered the scene.

“The coach is ready, sir,” Pleasance said.

Compass said:

“It is well, fair Pleasance, although now we shall not use it.”

He had intended for the coach to take Pleasance and him to the church to be married. Now the coach was not needed. Parson Palate and a marriage license were here.

Compass continued:

“Tell the coachman to drive to the parish church and stay about there until Master Practice comes to him and employs him.”

Pleasance exited.

Compass said to himself, “I have a license now that must be registered before my lawyer’s license.”

“My lawyer” is Master Practice.

Master Practice was not his lawyer. Compass was using “my” the same way a person might say “my boy,” when referring to a boy who was not his son.

Parson Palate entered the scene.

Compass said to him, “Noble Parson Palate, thou shall be a mark advanced: Here’s a piece. And do a feat — an action — for me.”

Nobles, marks, and pieces are coins.

“What, Master Compass?” Parson Palate asked.

Compass answered, “Just run — speak — the words of matrimony over my head and Mistress Pleasance’s in my chamber. There’s Captain Ironside to be a witness, and here’s a license to make thee feel secure that the wedding is legitimate, Parson!”

Parson Palate did not look happy.

Compass asked, “What do you stick at? Why are you hesitating?”

Parson Palate said:

“It is afternoon, sir, directly against the canon law — the ecclesiastical law — of the church.”

According to the ecclesiastical law of the time and place, weddings had to take place between the hours of eight and twelve in the morning. Also, the wedding had to take place at a church.

Parson Palate continued:

“You know it, Master Compass, and besides, I am hired by and committed to our worshipful friend, the learned Master Practice, in that business.”

He was supposed to officiate at the marriage of Master Practice and Pleasance.

Compass said:

“Come on, engage yourself — commit yourself. Who shall be able to say you married us other than in the morning, the most canonical and legal minute of the day, if you affirm it?”

Compass wanted Parson Palate to lie about the time of the wedding and to break his previous commitment and promise made to Master Practice.

He continued:

“That’s a spiced — over-scrupulous — excuse, and it shows you have set the common law before any profession — religious vow — else of love or friendship.”

According to Compass’ rhetoric, Parson Palate was preferring the interests of Master Practice the lawyer over his religious vow to prefer the interests of love and friendship.

Pleasance had agreed to go with Compass the world over — that was evidence of love and friendship — and their marriage would also be evidence of love and friendship.

There is no evidence that Master Practice had even asked Pleasance to marry him, much less that she had accepted his proposal.

Pleasance returned.

Compass said to her, “Come, Mistress Pleasance, we cannot prevail with the rigid parson here.”

He then said to Parson Palate, “But, sir, I’ll keep you locked in my lodging until it is done elsewhere, and under fear of Ironside.”

Captain Ironside would guard him — a terrifying prospect to Parson Palate. While he was under guard, Parson Palate could not tell Master Practice what was happening.

“Do you hear me, sir?” Parson Palate said. “Listen to me.”

“No, no, it doesn’t matter,” Compass said.

Parson Palate said:

“Can you think, sir, that I would deny you anything? I would not even if it meant the loss of both my livings. I will do it for you.”

A living is a source of income; for example, a position as a vicar or other church official. Many parsons had more than one living.

Parson Palate asked:

“Do you have a wedding ring?”

Compass answered, “Aye, and a posy: Annulus hic nobis quod scit uterque dabit.”

A posy is a sentiment inscribed on the inside of a ring.

“Good!” Parson Palate said.

He loosely translated the posy: “This ring will give you what you both desire.”

He then said, “I’ll make the whole house chant it, and the parish.”

Literally, the Latin states: “This ring will give to us what each knows.”

Pleasance has yet to know that she is the daughter of Lady Loadstone; this is knowledge that Compass will give her. Readers will soon see that Pleasance has important knowledge to give to Compass.

“Why, well said, parson,” Compass said.

He then said, “Now I will give to you my news that comprehends my reasons for this action, Mistress Pleasance.”

— 4.7 —

Mother Chair, Master Needle, Mistress Polish, and Nurse Keep spoke together.

“Go, get a nurse, procure her at what rate you can, and out of the house with it, son Needle,” Mother Chair said. “It is a bad commodity — a bad piece of goods.”

“It” is the baby, which needed a wet nurse to breastfeed it.

“Good mother, I know it, but the best should now be made of it,” Master Needle said.

They needed to make the best of a bad situation, and they needed to do what they could for the baby.

Mother Chair replied:

“And it shall.”

Master Needle exited.

Mother Chair then said:

“You should not fret so, Mistress Polish, nor you, Dame Keep. My daughter shall do well, when she has taken my caudle — my medicinal drink. I have known twenty such breaches of trust pieced up and patched up and made whole without a bum of noise.”

Placentia was not Mother Chair’s biological daughter; “my daughter” was a term of etiquette.

Mother Chair meant “without a hum of noise,” but “bum” goes well with “breeches.” A bum of noise is a bum of farts.

A breach of trust can also be a vagina that has been breached out of wedlock. Mother Chair has known twenty out-of-wedlock births that ended well.

Of course, another breach of trust was the switching of babies.

Yet another breach of trust was the falling out between Mistress Polish and Nurse Keep.

“You two fall out?” Mother Chair said. “And you tear up one another?”

“Blessèd woman!” Mistress Polish said. “Blest be the peacemaker.”

Nurse Keep said:

“The pease-dresser!”

A “pease-dresser” is someone who prepares peas for cooking.

The word “pease” means “appease.”

“I’ll hear no peace from Mistress Polish. I have been wronged. So has My Lady, My good Lady’s Worship, and I will right her, hoping she’ll right me.”

Mistress Polish said, “Good gentle Keep, I ask thee, Mistress Nurse, to pardon my passion, to pardon my strong emotion. I was misadvised — I acted unadvisedly. Be thou yet better by this grave sage woman, Mother Chair, who is the mother of matrons and great persons and knows the world.”

Nurse Keep said, “I do confess, she knows something — and I know something —”

She knew something Mistress Polish did not want Lady Loadstone to learn.

“Put your somethings together then,” Mistress Polish said.

Mother Chair said:

“Aye, here’s a chance fallen out that you cannot help, and less can this gentlewoman help.

“I can and will for both.

“First, I have sent by-chop away; the cause gone, the fame ceases.”

In other words: Remove the cause of the gossip, and the gossip ceases.

The “by-chop” is the bastard. It is a by-blow: 1) a man’s illegitimate child, and 2) a side-blow not directed at the main target. The man’s “arrow” was not aimed at and did not hit the main target: a wife’s vagina.

Mother Moth said:

“Then, by my caudle [medicinal drink] and my cullis [meat broth], I set my daughter on her feet about the house here. She’s young and must stir and arouse herself somewhat for necessity. Her youth will bear it out: She’s young enough to do it.

“She shall pretend to have had hysteria — a fit of the mother — and that is all that is needed if you have but a secretary laundress — one who can keep secrets — to blanch and whiten the linen.”

Placentia would get up and be active and pretend that she had not given birth: “Baby? What baby?”

A laundress who could keep a secret would wash the bloodstained sheets.

“Take the former counsels — confidences — into you; keep them safe in your own breasts, and make your market of them at the highest.”

The best market and the best price for the secrets involved keeping them secret. They still hoped to get a good marriage for Placentia. Such a marriage could benefit them as well as benefit Placentia.

Mother Chair continued:

“Will you go peach — turn informer — and proclaim yourself to be a fool at Grannam’s Cross?”

Grannam’s Cross was a public place. “Grannam” means “Old Woman,” and “cross” is a crossroad.

“Will you be laughed at and despised?”

“Will you betray a purpose that the deputy of a double ward or even his alderman with twelve of the wisest questmen — officials who investigate misdemeanors — could find out? Will you betray a purpose to these officials who are employed by the authority of the city?”

The purpose of switching babies was to secure a high social position for Mistress Polish’s daughter. Punishment for such an action would be heavy.

“Come, come, be friends, and keep these women-matters, smock-secrets, women’s secrets, to ourselves in our own verge, aka jurisdiction.

“We shall mar all if once we open the mysteries of the attiring house — dressing rooms — and tell what’s done within.

“No theaters are more cheated with — tricked by — appearances, or these shop-lights, than the age is, and folk in them, who seem most curious — most careful.”

Theaters rely on deception, and seeing things as they really are can be disappointing. The dashing young figure on stage may be a tired middle-aged man off stage.

Shop-lights can be kept low so that customers cannot closely inspect the merchandise on sale.

Our age, and we people in our age, are very badly tricked by appearances. Think of United States Supreme Court Justices who gave the appearance at their confirmation hearings that they believed that Roe v. Wade was settled law. Think of United States Senators who pretended to be shocked that those United States Supreme Court Justices had lied at their confirmation hearings.

Mistress Polish said:

“Breath of an oracle! You shall be my dear mother, wisest woman who ever tipped her tongue with point of reasons to turn — persuade — her hearers! She has sharpened her tongue with persuasive points as sharp as arrow tips. Mistress Keep, relent!”

She knelt and continued:

“I did abuse thee, I confess as far as to do penance, and on my knees I ask thee for forgiveness.”

Mother Chair said, “Rise. She does begin to melt, I see it —”

“Nothing grieved me as much as when you called me ‘bawd,’” Nurse Keep said. “‘Witch’ did not trouble me, nor ‘gypsy,’ no, nor ‘beggar.’ But ‘bawd’ was such a terrible name!”

Mother Chair said:

“No more rehearsals. No more repeating old words.”

Mistress Polish rose.

Mother Chair continued:

“Repetitions make things worse. The more we stir — you know the proverb, and it signifies a — stink.”

A proverb stated, “The more you stir, the more you stink.”

Mother Chair continued:

“What’s done and dead, let it be buried. New hours will fit fresh handles to new thoughts.”

In other words: Time will heal their differences.

They exited.

— 4.8 —

Sir Moth Interest stood in a room with his footboy.

He ordered the footboy, “Run to the church, sirrah. Get all the drunkards to ring the bells and jangle them for joy. My niece has brought an heir to the house, a lusty — a vigorous and lively — boy.”

The footboy exited.

Sir Moth Interest then asked himself, “Where’s my sister Loadstone?”

Lady Loadstone entered the room.

Sir Moth Interest said to her:

“Asleep during afternoons! It is not wholesome, against all rules of health, lady sister. The little doctor will not like it.

“Our niece is newly delivered of a chopping — vigorous — child, who can call the father by his name already, if it just opens its mouth round.”

Like other people, Sir Moth Interest thought that Compass was the father. The instrument with two legs and a movable joint that is used to make circles is known as a compass, and the baby would be saying “Compass” if it opened its mouth wide.

Hmm. “Instrument with two legs and a movable joint that is used to make circles.” Yep, that’s bawdy.

Sir Moth Interest continued:

“Master Compass, he is the man, they say, rumor gives it out, who has done that act of ‘honor’ to our house and friendship, to pump out a son and heir who shall inherit nothing, surely nothing, from me at least.”

Illegitimate children who are known to be illegitimate often inherit little or nothing.

Compass entered the room.

Sir Moth Interest continued:

“I come to invite Your Ladyship to be a witness — a godmother.”

Puritans did not use the word “godparent,” but instead used the word “witness.” Mistress Polish was a Puritan, and so was Lady Loadstone’s and Sir Moth Interest’s dead sister.

“I will be your partner and give it a horn spoon and a treen dish — the badges of bastards and beggars — with a blanket for dame the doxy — Madam Slut — to march round the circuit with bag and baggage — with all her possessions.”

A horn spoon was an inexpensive spoon made out of horn. A christening-gift for an upper-class infant was usually two silver spoons, each decorated with the image of an apostle.

A treen dish is a wooden bowl. Beggars used bowls in their begging.

Prostitutes walked behind a cart as they were paraded in public and mocked as punishment.

Compass said:

“Thou malicious knight, envious Sir Moth, who eats on that which feeds thee and frets — gnaws — her goodness who sustains thy being!”

Sir Moth Interest was biting the hand that fed him. That hand belonged to Lady Loadstone.

A proverb states, “Envy eats nothing but her own heart.”

Compass continued:

“What company of mankind would acknowledge thy brotherhood, except as thou have a title — a claim — to her blood whom thy ill-nature has chosen to insult and triumph over and she be thus vexed over an accident in her house as if it were her crime, good innocent lady!

“Sir Moth Interest, thou show thyself to be a true corroding vermin, such as thou art.”

Corroding vermin eat into their prey. The word “corrody” means a right to free quarters given by a lord or a religious house.

“Why, gentle Master Compass?” Sir Moth Interest said. “Because I wish you joy of your young son and heir to the house whom you have sent us?”

Sarcastically, Compass replied:

“Whom I have sent you? I don’t know what I shall do.”

Actually, he knew what he would do: He would call into the room some witnesses:

“Come in, friends.”

Captain Ironside, Sir Diaphanous Silkworm, Master Bias, and Pleasance entered the room.

Compass said to Lady Loadstone, “Madam, I ask you to be pleased to trust yourself to our company.”

Lady Loadstone replied:

“I did that too recently, and it brought this calamity upon me with all the infamy I hear.

“Your soldier, that swaggering, quarrelsome guest —”

Compass interrupted:

“— who has returned here to you as our vowed friend and servant, comes to sup with you — and so we do all — and who will prove he has deserved that special respect and favor from you.

“Your fortunes with yourself to boot — in addition — cast on a featherbed and spread on the sheets under a brace — a pair — of your best Persian carpets, would scarcely be a price valuable enough to thank his happy merit.”

“Persian carpets” are bed and table coverings.

According to Compass, Captain Ironside had done something for Lady Loadstone that deserved to be repaid with all Lady Loadstone’s fortune and with Lady Loadstone herself.

“What impudence is this?” Sir Moth Interest asked. “Can you endure to hear it, sister?”

Compass said:

“Yes, and you shall hear it, who will endure it worse.”

Sir Moth Interest will suffer from hearing the news more than Lady Loadstone will.

Compass continued:

“What does he deserve in your opinion, madam, or your weighed judgment, he who — things thus hanging as they do in doubt, suspended and suspected, all involved and wrapped in error — can resolve the knot; redintegrate — restore and make perfect again — the reputation, first, of your house; restore Your Ladyship’s quiet; render and restore then your niece a virgin who is unvitiated and unspoiled; and make all plain and perfect, as it was?”

“What deserves the man who can stop a practice — a trick — to betray you and your name, and who can make all things right again?”

“He speaks impossibilities,” Sir Moth Interest said.

Compass drew Captain Ironside forward, and then he said:

“Here he stands whose fortune has done this, and you must thank him. To what you call his swaggering and quarrelsomeness, we owe all this.

“And that it may have credit with you, madam, here is your niece, whom I have married. These gentlemen — the knight, captain, and parson, and this grave and serious politic tell-truth of the court — witnessed the wedding.”

The “politic tell-truth” was Master Bias, who told the truth when it was politic to do so.

These people were able to confirm that Compass and Pleasance were married.

“Who is she whom I call niece, then?” Lady Compass asked.

If Pleasance were her niece, then who was Placentia?

Compass answered:

“She is Polish’s daughter. Her mother, Goody Polish, has confessed to Grannam Keep, the nurse, how they exchanged the children in their cradles.”

Lower-class women were called “Goody” or “Goodwife” as a respectful title.

“Grannam” meant 1) grandmother, or 2) old woman.

“For what purpose?” Lady Loadstone asked.

Compass answered, “To get the marriage portion, or some part of it.”

He then said to Sir Moth Interest, “You must now disburse the entire marriage portion to me, sir, providing that I gain Her Ladyship’s consent.”

“I bid God give you joy, if what you say is true,” Lady Loadstone said.

Compass said to her, “As true it is, lady, lady, in the song with the refrain ‘lady, lady.’”

One song that includes the words “lady, lady” is “There dwelt a man in Babylon,” about a woman named “Susannah,” who was true and loyal to her husband, Joacim.

“Susanna,” the source of and inspiration for the song, is an apocryphal book that is sometimes printed in Bibles.

Compass then said:

“The marriage portion’s mine with interest, Sir Moth.

“I will not ’bate you a single harington of interest upon interest. I won’t give you a single farthing.

“In the meantime, I commit you to the guard of Captain Ironside, my brother here, Captain Rudhudibras, from whom I will expect you or your ransom.”

The ransom would pay for Sir Moth Interest’s release from Captain Ironside.

“Sir, you must prove it and the possibility, before I believe it,” Sir Moth Interest said.

Compass would have to provide evidence that what he claimed was true. He would have to explain what had happened and how it had happened.

Compass replied:

“For the possibility, I leave to trial.

“Truth shall speak itself.”

Master Practice entered the scene.

“Oh, Master Practice, did you meet the coach?” Compass asked him.

“Yes, sir, but it was empty,” Master Practice said.

Compass said:

“Why, I sent it for you. The business was dispatched here before you came.

“Come in, I’ll tell you how. You are a man who will look for satisfaction and must have it.”

The satisfaction could be sought in a duel, or in a court of law. The latter was more likely.

All said, “So do we all, and long to hear the right — the truth that will make everything all right.”

CHORUS 4 (The Magnetic Lady, or Humors Reconciled)

Damplay said, “Truly, I am one of those who labor with the same longing for the right, for it is almost puckered and tangled and pulled into that knot by your poet, which I cannot easily, with all the strength of my imagination, untie.”

John Trygust replied, “Likely enough, nor is it in your office to be troubled or perplexed and confused with it, but to sit still and wait. The more your imagination busies itself, the more it becomes entangled, especially if (as I said in the beginning) you happen to find the wrong end.”

Probee said:

“He has answered sufficiently well, Brother Damplay.

“Our roles, which are the spectators who would hear a comedy, are to await the process and progress and outcome of things, as the poet presents them, not as we would corruptly fashion them.

“We come here to see plays and censure — judge — them as they are made and fitted and prepared for us, not to beslaver our own thoughts with censorious spittle tempering the poet’s clay as if we were to mold every scene anew. That would be a mere plastic ambition — creator’s invention — or potter’s ambition, most unbecoming the name of a gentleman.”

In other words: Audiences should allow the playwright to do his work without interference.

Probee continued:

“Let us pay attention and not lose the business on foot — in progress — by talking. Let us follow the right thread or find it.”

Damplay said, “Why, here his play might have ended, if he would have let it, and have spared us the vexation of a fifth act yet to come, which everyone here knows the issue of already, or may in part conjecture.”

Many comedies end with a marriage, but this play still has a few loose ends: Who is the father of Placentia’s baby? Will Sir Moth Interest hand over the marriage portion?

John Trygust said, “That conjecture is a kind of figure-flinging and astrological forecasting, or throwing the dice, for a meaning that was never in the poet’s purpose, perhaps. Stay and see his last act, his catastrophe — the outcome and final turn of events. See how he will perplex that, or spring some fresh cheat or surprise, to entertain the spectators with a convenient and appropriate delight, until some unexpected and new encounter breaks out to rectify all and make good the conclusion.”

In other words: We don’t have a happy ending yet. Ben Jonson still has a few plot elements to surprise the audience.

Probee said, “The play, ending here, would have shown itself to be dull, flat, and unpointed, without a clear purpose, without any shape or sharpness, Brother Damplay.”

“Well, let us wait and expect more then,” Damplay said. “And may the poet’s wit and intelligence help us.”

ACT 5 (The Magnetic Lady, or Humors Reconciled)

— 5.1 —

Master Needle and Tim Item talked together.

Master Needle said, “In truth, Master Item, here’s a house divided and quartered into parts by your doctor’s engine — his ingenious invention: He’s cast out such aspersions and false insinuations on My Lady’s niece here, of having had a child, as hardly will be wiped off, I doubt.”

“Why, isn’t it true?” Tim Item asked.

“True!” Master Needle said. “Did you think it to be true?”

“Wasn’t she in labor?” Tim Item asked. “Wasn’t the midwife sent for?”

“There’s your error now!” Master Needle said. “You have drunk of the same water. You believe what they believe!

“I believed it, and I gave it out as the truth, too,” Tim Item said. “I told it to others because I believed it.”

“More you wronged the party,” Master Needle said. “She had no such thing about her, innocent creature!”

“What had she then?” Tim Item asked.

“Only a fit of the mother!” Master Needle said. “She had a fit of hysteria! They burnt old shoes, goose-feathers, asafoetida, a few horn shavings, with a bone or two, and she is well again, and about the house —”

Asafoetida was a gum that was used as an antispasmodic.

“— is it possible?” Tim Item interrupted.

“See it, and then report it,” Master Needle replied.

“Our doctor’s urinal-judgment is half cracked, then,” Tim Item said.

Doctors examined a patient’s urine when diagnosing illness.

A half-cracked judgment is a judgment based on stupidity and ignorance.

“Cracked in the case most hugely, with My Lady and sad Sir Moth, her brother, who is now under a cloud a little,” Master Needle said.

A “case” can be a vagina.

“Of what?” Tim Item asked. “Disgrace?”

“He is committed into the custody of Rudhudibras, the Captain Ironside, because of displeasure from Master Compass, but it will blow off,” Master Needle said.

“The doctor shall reverse this instantly and set all right again, if you’ll assist in just a toy, a trifling matter, Squire Needle, that comes in my noddle — my head — now,” Tim Item said.

“Good — Needle and Noddle!” Master Needle said. “What may it be? I long for it.”

Tim Item said, “Why, just to go to bed and feign a distemper — a disorder — of walking in your sleep and talking in it a little idly and without sense, but so much as on it the doctor may have the grounds to raise a cure for his reputation.”

By “curing the illness,” Doctor Rut would “cure” his damaged reputation. Some people now knew him as the doctor who did not diagnose Placentia’s pregnancy.

“Anything to serve the worship — good name — of the man I love and honor,” Master Needle said.

Mistress Polish and Pleasance met each other.

Pleasance still believed that Mistress Polish was her mother.

Mistress Polish still wanted her daughter, Placentia, to wed a high-ranking man.

Mistress Polish said:

“Oh! May God give you joy, Mademoiselle Compass! You are his whirlpool now, all-to-be-married — thoroughly married — against your mother’s permission and without counsel!”

A whirlpool draws everything to itself.

“He’s fished fair and caught a frog, I fear.

“What fortune do you have to bring him in a marriage portion? What dowry do you have? You can tell stories now: You know a world of secrets to reveal.”

Pleasance knew about the birth of Placentia’s child.

“I know nothing but what is told to me, nor can I discover anything,” Pleasance said.

Neither Mistress Polish nor Pleasance (unless Compass had told her, which is possible) knew at this point that Compass had learned that Mistress Polish was not Pleasance’s mother.

Mistress Polish said:

“No, you shall not discover anything, I’ll take order — I’ll take steps to prevent it.

“Go, get you in there. It is Ember Week! I’ll keep you fasting from his flesh for a while.”

Ember Week was a time of fasting on Wednesday, Friday, and Saturday.

Mistress Polish would keep Pleasance and Compass from consummating their marriage for a while.

Pleasance exited.

“See who’s here?” Mother Chair said about Placentia. “She’s been with My Lady, who kissed her, all-to-kissed her — thoroughly kissed her — twice or thrice.”

“And called her niece again, and viewed her linen,” Nurse Keep said.

Placentia’s sheets were not bloodstained, as they would have been if she had given birth. Of course, a laundress had been busy.

“You have done a miracle, Mother Chair,” Mistress Polish said.

“Not I,” Mother Chair said. “My caudle has done it. Thank my caudle heartily.”

Her caudle — a medicinal drink — had enabled Placentia to leave her bed and see Lady Loadstone.

Mistress Polish said:

“It shall be thanked, and you, too, wisest Mother.

“You shall have a new, splendid, four-pound beaver hat, set with enameled studs, as mine is here, and a right — genuine — pair of crystal spectacles, crystal of the rock, thou mighty mother of dames, hung in an ivory case at a gold belt, and silver bells to jingle as you pace before your fifty daughters in procession to church, or from the church.”

The beaver hat would cost four pounds.

“Crystal of the rock” is transparent quartz.

Mother Chair had been present at the birth of fifty girls: her figurative daughters.

After childbirth women did not go to church for four weeks. The midwife then accompanied them as they went to church again.

“Thanks, Mistress Polish,” Mother Chair said.

“She deserves as many pensions as there are pieces in a — maidenhead, if I were a prince to give them,” Nurse Keep said.

“Pieces” are coins. They can also be penises.

A maidenhead can be sold. If a young prostitute is a good actress, it can be sold over or over.

Mother Chair deserved a pension for each young unmarried mother whom she helped to be married to a well-born man.

If Placentia can keep up the pretense of being a virgin, she can “sell” her “maidenhead” to a well-born husband.

Mistress Polish said to Placentia, “Come, sweet charge, you shall present yourself about the house. Be confident and bear up. You shall be seen.”

People needed to see that Placentia did not look like she had just given birth.

They exited.

— 5.3 —

Compass and Captain Ironside argued with Master Practice.

Compass wanted to make peace with him, but Master Practice was angry because he had wanted to marry Pleasance, but Compass had tricked him.

“What!” Compass said. “I can make you amends, my learned counsel, and satisfy a greater injury and violation of rights to chafed, irritated Master Practice. Who would think that you could be thus testy?”

“He has a grave head, given over to the study of our laws!” Captain Ironside said.

“And to the prime honors of the commonwealth,” Compass said.

“And he has you to mind a wife,” Captain Ironside said.

Compass was focusing his attention on a wife, something that perhaps Master Interest did not have time to do because of his professional interests.

“What should you do with such a toy as a wife who might distract you or hinder you in your career course?” Compass asked.

“He shall not think of it,” Captain Ironside said.

Compass said, “I will make over and transfer to you my possession of that same place that has fallen void, you know, to satisfy you: Surveyor of the Projects General.”

To make amends with Master Practice, Compass will give him the possession of the office of Surveyor of the Projects General.

“And that’s an office you know how to stir in and be busy in,” Captain Ironside said.

“And make your profits from,” Compass said.

“Profits are, indeed, the ends and objectives of a gowned man — a lawyer such as you,” Captain Ironside said. “Show your activity and show how you are built for business.”

“I accept it as a possession, even if it is only a reversion,” Master Practice said.

A reversion is the right to succeed in the office; when the person who has that office dies, the successor takes possession of the office.

“You were the first who told me it was a possession,” Compass said.

Master Practice had told Compass that Thinwit, who held the office of Surveyor of the Projects General, had died. If that was true, the reversion had become a possession.

“Aye, I told you that I heard that,” Master Practice said.

“All is one. That doesn’t matter,” Captain Ironside said. “He’ll make reversion a possession quickly.”

In other words: Thinwit will die soon, if he isn’t already dead, and the reversion will become a possession. Apparently, Thinwit was in the process of dying.

“But I must have a general release from you,” Compass said.

A general release would acknowledge that Compass had given Master Practice the right of succession to the office, and so, if for some reason Master Practice did not succeed in obtaining the office, Compass would not be liable.

“Do one; I’ll do the other,” Master Practice said.

They would write two documents: one for giving away the reversion/possession, and one for the general release.

“It’s a match — an agreement — before my brother Ironside,” Compass said. “He will be the witness.”

“It is done,” Master Practice said.

They shook hands.

“We two are reconciled, then,” Compass said.

Two more humors had been reconciled.

“To a lawyer who can make use of a place, any half-title is better than a wife,” Captain Ironside said.

A half-title is a half-claim. A lawyer would know how to make the best use of it.

“And it will save the expense of coaches, velvet gowns, and cut-work smocks for a wife,” Compass said.

Cut-work smocks have open embroidery.

“He is to occupy an office wholly,” Captain Ironside said.

The work of the office will entirely fill the lawyer’s — Master Practice’s — time.

Compass said:

“That is true.

“I must talk with you nearer — about something that affects me more closely, Master Practice. It is about the recovery of my wife’s marriage portion, and what course of action I would be best to take to get it from Sir Moth Interest.”

“The plainest way,” Master Practice said.

“What’s that, for plainness?” Compass said.

Master Practice said:

“Sue him at common law.

“Arrest him on an action of choke-bail: five hundred thousand pounds. It will frighten him and all his sureties.”

“Choke-bail” is bail that is a huge sum of money and is intended to keep the accused in jail due to inability to raise the bail.

“Sureties” are people who would normally guarantee the bail, but in this case they would balk at being sureties for so large a sum.

Master Practice then asked:

“You can prove your marriage?”

“Yes,” Compass said. “We’ll talk of it inside, and we will hear what My Lady has to say.”

They exited.

— 5.4 —

Sir Moth Interest and Lady Loadstone talked together.

“I’m sure the brogue of the house went all that way,” Sir Moth Interest said. “She was with child, and Master Compass got it.”

The brogue is 1) a cheat, and 2) an escheat.

Since Placentia bore an illegitimate child, she was not eligible for the marriage portion, according to Sir Moth Interest. Therefore, the escheat.

Lady Loadstone said:

“Why, that, you see, is manifestly false.

“He’s married the other, our true niece, he says. He would not woo them both; he is not such a stallion to leap on and have sex with all.

“Also, no child appears that I can find with all my search and all the strictest inquiry I have made through all my family.”

Her “family” included all her household servants.

Lady Loadstone continued:

“A fit of the mother — that is, a fit of hysteria — the women say she had, which the midwife cured with burning bones and feathers.”

Doctor Rut entered the scene.

Seeing Doctor Rut coming, Lady Loadstone said:

“Here’s the doctor.”

Sir Moth Interest said, “Oh, noble doctor, didn’t you and your Tim Item tell me that our niece was in labor?”

“If I did, what follows?” Doctor Rut asked.

“And didn’t you tell me that Mother Midnight was sent for?” Sir Moth Interest asked.

“Mother Midnight” can be 1) a midwife, or 2) a bawd.

Here, of course, it refers to Mother Chair.

“So she was, and she is in the house still,” Doctor Rut said.

“But here has a noise — a rumor — been since, that Placentia was delivered of a brave — a splendid — boy, and it was of Master Compass’ begetting,” Sir Moth Interest said.

Doctor Rut said:

“I know no rattle of gossips, nor their noises.

“I hope you do not take me for a pimp errant — a wandering, wrong-doing pimp — to deal in smock-affairs.”

“Smock-affairs” are women’s affairs.

He then asked:

“Where’s the patient, the infirm man about whom I was sent for — where’s Squire Needle?”

“Is Needle sick?” Lady Loadstone asked.

“My apothecary tells me that he is in danger,” Doctor Rut said.

The apothecary, Tim Item, entered the scene.

“How are things, Tim? Where is he?” Doctor Rut asked.

“I cannot hold him down,” Tim Item said. “He’s up and walks and talks in his perfect sleep with his eyes shut, as sensibly as if he were broad awake. Although he is sound asleep, he appears as if he is in control of his senses.”

“Look, here he comes,” Sir Moth Interest said, looking up. “He’s fast asleep: observe him.”

Doctor Rut said, “He’ll tell us wonders.”

Seeing some women with Master Needle, he asked, “What are these women doing here?”

— 5.5 —

Half-undressed, Master Needle entered the scene. He was followed by Mistress Polish, Mother Chair, Nurse Keep, and Placentia.

“Hunting a man half naked?” Doctor Rut said. “You are fine beagles! You’d have his doucets.”

Beagles are a pack of hunting hounds, and doucets are deer testicles.

Master Needle said, “I have linen breeks — breeches — on.”

“Breeches” are a kind of underwear.

Master Needle had heard the reference to “doucets,” and he was responding to it.

“He hears, but he can see nothing,” Doctor Rut said.

Master Needle responded, “Yes, I see who hides the treasure yonder.”

“Huh?” Sir Moth Interest said. “What treasure?”

He was interested in treasure.

“If you ask questions, he awakens at once,” Doctor Rut said, “and then you’ll hear no more until his next fit.”

And I see whom she hides it for,” Master Needle said.

Doctor Rut said quietly to Sir Moth Interest, “Do you note that, sir? Listen.”

“A fine she-spirit it is, an Indian magpie,” Master Needle said. “She was an alderman’s widow, and she fell in love with our Sir Moth, My Lady’s brother.”

Indian magpies are literally a species of thieving, acquisitive, hoarding birds. Figuratively, they are ladies with expensive tastes.

Having fallen in love with Sir Moth Interest, the alderman’s widow may have left treasure for him.

“Do you hear this?” Doctor Rut said quietly to Sir Moth Interest.

Master Needle said, “And she has hidden an alderman’s estate, dropped through her bill in little holes in the garden, and she scrapes earth over them, where none can spy but I, who see all by the glow-worm’s light that creeps before.”

Birds have beaks, aka bills. Like a bird that gathers and hides bright objects, the alderman’s wife had apparently hidden treasure in little holes in the garden.

Glow-worms are lightning bugs, aka fireflies.

Mistress Polish said, “I knew the gentlewoman, Alderman Parrot’s widow, a fine speaker as any was in the clothing or the bevy. She did become her scarlet and black velvet, her green and purple —”

Parrots speak without understanding what they say.

The clothing is the distinctive clothing of an alderman’s wife, or the livery of a company, and the bevy is a group of ladies.

Doctor Rut interrupted, “— save thy colors, rainbow —”

He then said to Master Needle, “— or she will run thee over, and all thy lights.”

In other words: Madame Polish will talk over you and your lungs.

One meaning of “lights” is lungs.

Her talking would interfere with Master Needle’s story about hidden treasure, a story that interested Sir Moth Interest, who was present, and which they wanted Sir Moth Interest to hear.

Mistress Polish kept talking:

“She dwelt in Dolittle Lane atop of the hill there in the round cage, which was after — in the style of — Sir Chime Squirrel’s. She would eat nothing but almonds, I assure you.”

Some rolling cages for squirrels had chiming bells. They are exercise wheels. Small rolling cages are called hamster wheels.

Almonds are a treat for a squirrel.

“I wish thou had a dose of pills, a double dose of the best purge, to make thee turn tale the other way!” Doctor Rut said.

“Tale” sounds like “tail,” or posterior. Purging can be done with the mouth through vomiting, or with the posterior through defecation.

Mistress Needle exited, followed by Mother Chair, Nurse Keep, and Placentia.

Mistress Polish, Lady Loadstone, Doctor Rut, Sir Moth Interest, and Tim Item remained behind.

Mistress Polish said to Doctor Rut:

“You are a foul-mouthed, purging, absurd doctor. I tell you true, and I did long to tell it to you.

“You have spread a scandal in My Lady’s house here on her sweet niece that you never can take off with all your purges or your plaster of oaths, even if you were to distil your ‘damn me’ drop by drop in your defense.”

A “plaster” is a bandage.

“As for your saying that she has had a child, here she spits on thee and defies thee, or I will do it for her.”

Doctor Rut said to Lady Loadstone:

“Madam, please bind and constrain her to her behavior.

“Tie your gossip — your companion — up, or send her to Bedlam Hospital for the Insane.”

Mistress Polish said:

“Go thou thither, who better has deserved it, shame of doctors!

“Where could she be delivered? By what charm could she be restored to her strength so soon? Who is the father? And where is the infant?”

“Ask your oracle — Master Needle — who walks and talks in his sleep.”

Doctor Rut said:

“Where is he? Gone?”

“You have lost a fortune listening to Mistress Polish, to her tabor.”

A tabor is literally a drum, and figuratively, here, a tongue.

The fortune, of course, was the treasure that Master Needle had been talking about as he “walked in his sleep.”

“Good madam, lock her up.”

“You must give losers — those who have lost something — their leave to speak, good doctor,” Lady Loadstone said.

A proverb stated, “Give losers leave [permission] to speak.”

Doctor Rut said, “Follow his footing — Master Needle’s track — before he gets to his bed. This rest is lost else.”

Doctor Rut, Sir Moth Interest, and Tim Item exited.

Lady Loadstone and Mistress Polish remained behind.

— 5.6 —

Compass, Master Practice, and Captain Ironside entered the scene.

“Where is my wife?” Compass asked Mistress Polish. “What have you done with my wife, you gossip of the counsels?”

Mistress Polish was one of the group of people who advised Lady Loadstone.

“I, sweet Master Compass?” Mistress Polish said. “I honor you and your wife.”

“Well, do so still,” Compass said. “I will not call you mother, though, but Polish. Good Gossip Polish, where have you hidden my wife?”

“I hide your wife?” Mistress Polish said.

“Or she’s run away,” Compass said.

“That would make all suspected, sir, afresh,” Lady Loadstone said.

If Pleasance had run away, that would make people suspicious that she was not in fact Lady Loadstone’s niece. It would look as if she were running away because she was guilty of trying to fraudulently get Placentia’s marriage portion.

Lady Loadstone continued:

“Come, we will find her, if she is in the house.”

“Why should I hide your wife, good Master Compass?” Mistress Polish asked.

“I know no reason except that you are Goody Polish, who is good at malice, good at evil, all that can perplex or trouble a business thoroughly,” Compass replied.

“You may say what you will,” Mistress Polish said. “You’re Master Compass, and you carry a large sweep, sir, in your circle.”

The large sweep was a large amount of influence among his friends and associates. It also glanced at a large area made by a compass.

Lady Loadstone said to Mistress Polish:

“I’ll sweep all corners, gossip, to spring this, to make it appear out of hiding, if it is above ground.”

She meant that she would make Pleasance appear from out of hiding; however, readers know that if things worked out well, she could also make Mistress Polish’s secret come out of hiding and be made public.

Lady Loadstone continued:

“I will have her cried by the common crier — the town crier — throughout all the ward, but I will find her.”

She would raise a hue and cry of people to set out and find her.

“It will be an act worthy your justice, madam,” Captain Ironside said.

“And it will become the integrity, innocence and soundness, and worship of her name,” Master Practice said.

— 5.7 —

Doctor Rut and Sir Moth Interest entered the scene.

“It is such a fly, this gossip,” Doctor Rut said about Mistress Polish. “With her buzz, she blows on everything in every place!”

A fly blows — lays eggs — on everything. It makes everything dirty.

Mistress Polish’s buzzing and blowing breath had made it difficult to hear the “sleepwalking” Master Needle’s words about buried treasure.

Sir Moth Interest said:

“A busy woman is a fearful grievance!”

In other words, a meddling woman is a dreadful cause of suffering.

Sir Moth Interest then asked:

“Won’t he sleep again?”

Doctor Rut said:

“Yes, quickly, as soon as he is warm. It is the nature of the disease, and all these cold dry fumes that are melancholic, to work at first slowly and insensibly in their ascent from the stomach to the brain, until being got up; and then distilling down upon the brain, they have a pricking, irritating quality that breeds this restless rest (which we, the sons — the followers — of the art of medicine, call a walking in the sleep) and the telling of mysteries and secret knowledge that must be heard — softly, with art, as if we were sewing pillows under the patients’ elbows.”

According to Doctor Rut, they needed to tend the patient — Master Needle — carefully and quietly and without disturbing him. If they don’t disturb the patient, they may be able to hear his story.

“If we don’t tend the patients gently, then they’d fly into a frenzy, run into the woods, where there are noises, huntings, shoutings, hallowings, amid the brakes and furzes and thickets and shrubs, run over bridges, fall into waters, scratch their flesh, sometimes drop down a precipice, and there be lost.”

Tim Item entered the scene.

Seeing him, Doctor Rut asked him:

“How are things now! What is Master Needle doing?”

“He is up again, and he begins to talk,” Tim Item said.

“About the former matter, Item?” Sir Moth Interest asked.

“The treasure and the lady: That’s his theme — that’s what Master Needle talks about,” Tim Item said.

“Oh, me, I am a happy — fortunate — man!” Sir Moth Interest said. “He cannot put off talking about it. I shall know all, then.”

Doctor Rut said quietly to himself:

“With what appetite and craving our own desires delude us!”

He then said:

“Listen, Tim. Let no man interrupt us.”

Tim Item replied, “Sir Diaphanous and Master Bias, his court friends, desire to kiss his niece’s hands and rejoice in and congratulate her in the firm recovery of her good fame and honor.”

Sir Moth Interest said:

“Good.

“Say to them, Master Item, that my niece, Placentia, is by My Lady’s side: they’ll find her there.

“I ask to be spared for only half an hour. I’ll see them soon.”

He wanted to stay and learn about the buried treasure.

Doctor Rut said:

“Do, put them off, Tim, and tell them the importance of the business.”

Master Needle entered the scene.

Seeing him, Doctor Rut said:

“Here, he has come, indeed, and we will have all the information out of him!

The “sleepwalking” Master Needle said:

“How do you do, ladybird? So hard at work still?

“What’s that you are saying? Do you bid me walk, sweet bird? And tell our knight?

“I will. What? Walk, knave, walk?

“I think you’re angry with me, Pol. Fine Pol! Pol’s a fine bird! O fine lady Pol! An almond for parrot. Parrot’s a brave — a splendid — bird.

“Three hundred thousand pieces have you stuck edge-long into the ground within the garden?

“O bounteous bird!”

“Edge-long” means “on the edge.” Doctor Needle is talking about Alderman Parrot’s widow placing coins on their edge into the hole.

“And me, most happy creature!” Sir Moth Interest said.

He was very happy indeed.

“Smother your joy!” Doctor Rut said, pretending that he was worried that Sir Moth Interest would wake up Master Needle.

“What?” Master Needle said. “And dropped twice so many —”

“Ha!” Sir Moth Interest said. “Where?”

This was an enormous number of coins: three hundred thousand coins buried, and six hundred thousand pieces dropped.

“Contain yourself,” Doctor Rut said to Sir Moth Interest.

“In the old well?” the “sleepwalking” Master Needle asked.

Sir Moth Interest said:

“I cannot contain myself. I am a man of flesh and blood.

“Who can contain himself to hear the ghost of a dead lady do such works as these? And a city lady, too, of the straight waist?”

A city lady with a straight waist was a city lady who was wearing a narrow-fitting corset. She was strait-laced, aka morally upright.

Master Needle started to leave.

“He’s gone,” Doctor Rut said.

“I will go and test the truth of it,” Master Needle said.

One way of testing the truth of what the ghost had said was to look for some of the coins.

He exited.

“Follow him, Tim,” Doctor Rut said. “See what he does. See if he brings you assay — a specimen — of it now.”

Tim Item exited.

“I’ll say he’s a rare fellow,” Sir Moth Interest said, “and he has a rare disease.”

“Rare” can mean 1) splendid, and/or 2) unusual.

“And I will work as rare a cure upon him,” Doctor Rut said.

“How, good doctor?” Sir Moth Interest asked.

Doctor Rut answered, “When he has uttered all that you would know from him, I’ll cleanse him with a pill as small as a pea and stop his mouth, for there is his issue between the muscles of the tongue.”

“His issue” is 1) his medical problem, and/or 2) his words that issue from his mouth.

The human tongue has eight muscles.

Tim Item returned.

“He’s come back,” Sir Moth Interest said.

“What did he do, Item?” Doctor Rut asked.

“The first step he stepped into the garden, he pulled these five pieces up in a finger’s breadth one after another,” Tim Item said. “The dirt sticks on them still.”

A “piece” is a coin. The five pieces were tightly packed together with little or no room between them.

Sir Moth Interest said:

“I know enough.

“Doctor, proceed with your cure. I’ll make thee famous, famous among the sons of the physicians, Machaon, Podalirius, Aesculapius.

Aesculapius is the god of medicine, and Machaon and Podalirius are his sons and also physicians.

Sir Moth Interest continued:

“Thou shall have a golden beard as well as Aesculapius had, and thy Tim Item here shall have one of silver: a livery beard. And so will all thy apothecaries who belong to — who work for — thee.”

A statue of Aesculapius at Epidaurus had a golden beard. Dionysius, the tyrant of Syracuse, ordered that the beard be detached.

The apothecaries who work for Doctor Needle would wear a beard made of silver to show that they worked for him. The silver beards would be part of their livery: distinctive clothing that showed for whom they worked.

Sir Moth Interest then asked:

“Where’s Squire Needle? Gone?”

“He’s pricked — gone — away, now he has done the work,” Tim Item said.

“Prepare his pill and give it to him before supper,” Doctor Rut said.

“I’ll send for a dozen laborers tomorrow to turn the surface of the garden up,” Sir Moth Interest said.

“In mold?” Doctor Rut said. “Bruise every clod?”

He was asking if the soil would be thoroughly dug up. “Mold” is the top soil of a garden or other cultivated land.

“Clods” can be 1) lumps of dirt, or 2), a blockhead, aka clodpate.

Sir Moth Interest was a clodpate whose foolishness in believing this tale would soon be revealed.

Sir Moth Interest continued, “And I’ll have all the soil sifted — for I’ll not lose a piece of the bird’s bounty — and I’ll take an inventory of it all.”

He wanted all of the buried three hundred thousand coins.

Doctor Rut began, “And then I would go down into the well —”

Sir Moth Interest interrupted, “— myself. No trusting other hands. Add six hundred thousand to the first three, and you have nine hundred thousand pounds —”

Doctor Rut interrupted, “— it will purchase the whole bench of aldermanity stripped to their shirts.”

Not only would that amount of money buy all the aldermen, but it would also buy their outer clothing.

Prostitutes were paraded half-naked behind carts as a punishment.

Sir Moth Interest said, “There never did accrue so great a gift to man, and from a lady whom I never saw but once. I remember now that we met at Merchant Taylors Hall at dinner in Threadneedle Street.”

This was a place for prestigious entertainment.

“The name of Threadneedle Street was a sign Squire Needle should have the threading of this thread,” Doctor Rut said.

“That is true,” Sir Moth Interest said. “I shall love parrots better while I know him.”

“I’d have her statue cut now in white marble,” Doctor Rut said.

“And have it painted in most orient — brilliant — colors,” Sir Moth Interest said.

“That’s right!” Doctor Rut said. “All city statues must be painted; otherwise, they are worth nothing in their subtle and cunning judgments.”

The city aldermen are capable of being bribed. In order for their subtle and cunning — and unethical — judgments to be regarded in a good light, the alderman must be painted. That is, they must be misrepresented — they must be given a false coloring.

Statues in ancient Greece and Rome were painted, but Sir Henry Wotton called the painting of statues “an English barbarism” in his The Elements of Architecture (1624).

Master Bias entered the scene.

“My truest friend in court, dear Master Bias!” Sir Moth Interest said. “Have you heard of the recovery of our niece in fame and reputation?”

“Yes, I have been with her and congratulated her and rejoiced with her, but I am sorry to find the author of the foul aspersion here in your company,” Master Bias said. “I mean this insolent doctor.”

Sir Moth Interest replied:

“You are mistaken about him. He is clear got off on it: He is not responsible for it. A gossip’s jealousy first gave the hint. He drives and goes another way now, the way that I would have him go.

“He’s a rare man, the doctor, in his way. He’s done the noblest cure here in the house on a poor squire, my sister’s tailor, Master Needle, who talked in his sleep and who would walk to St. John’s Wood and Waltham Forest, escape by all the ponds and pits in the way, run over two-inch-wide bridges with his eyes fast asleep and eyelids shut fast and in the dead of night!”

“I’ll have you better acquainted with him.”

He then said to Doctor Rut:

“Doctor, here is my dear, dear, dearest friend in court, wise, powerful Master Bias. I ask that you salute each other, not as strangers, but true friends.”

“Is this the gentleman you brought today to be a suitor to your niece?” Doctor Rut asked.

“Yes,” Sir Moth Interest answered.

“You made an agreement I heard,” Doctor Rut said. “Has the written agreement been drawn up between you?”

“And sealed and notarized,” Sir Moth Interest said.

“What broke you off?” Doctor Rut asked.

“This rumor about her, about Placentia, wasn’t it, Master Bias?” Sir Moth Interest asked.

“Which I find now false and therefore I have come to make amends in the first place,” Master Bias said. “I stand to — insist on — the old conditions.”

Doctor Rut said, “In faith, give them to him, Sir Moth, whatever they were. You have a brave, splendid occasion now to cross and thwart the flaunting, haughty show-off Master Compass, who pretends to have the right to the marriage portion by the other entail.”

An entail is a right to an inheritance.

“And he claims it,” Sir Moth Interest said. “You have heard that he’s married?”

Master Bias replied:

“We hear that his wife has run away from him, inside.

“She is not to be found in the house, despite all the hue and cry that is made for her through every room.

“The larders have been searched, the bake-houses, and bolting-tub, the ovens, the wash-house and the brew-house, indeed, the very furnace, and yet she is not heard of.”

Larders are places for storing food.

A bolting-tub is a tub in which bran is sifted from grain.

A furnace is an oven.

Sir Moth Interest said:

“May she never again be heard of. The safety of Great Britain lies not on it.”

In other words: Pleasance is not important; the safety of Great Britain does not rest on her.

“You are content with the ten thousand pounds, and with defalking — deducting — the four hundred pounds garnish money?”

The garnish money was for expenses: the expenses of fine clothing and whatever was necessary to impress Lady Loadstone and Placentia.

Sir Moth Interest continued:

“That’s the condition here, before the doctor, and that’s your demand, friend Bias?”

“It is, Sir Moth,” Master Bias said.

Parson Palate entered the scene.

“Here comes the parson, then, who shall make the agreement all sure and secure,” Doctor Rut said.

“Go with my friend Bias, Parson Palate, to my niece, Placentia,” Sir Moth Interest said. “Assure them — witness their engagement — we are in agreement about the wedding.”

“And Mistress Compass — Pleasance — too, is found inside,” Parson Palate said.

“Where was she hidden?” Sir Moth Interest asked.

“In an old bottle-house where they scraped trenchers; there her mother had thrust her,” Parson Palate said.

A bottle-house is a place for storing bottles of ale and wine.

Trenchers are plates, often wooden.

“You shall have time, sir, to triumph on Compass when this fine feat is done, and to triumph on his Rud Ironside,” Doctor Rut said.

They exited.

— 5.9 —

Compass, Pleasance (now Mistress Compass), Lady Loadstone, Captain Ironside, Master Practice, Mistress Polish, Mother Chair, and Nurse Keep met together. A few servants were present.

Compass said, “Was any gentlewoman ever used so barbarously by a malicious gossip, pretending and claiming to be the mother to her, too?”

Mistress Polish had treated Pleasance badly by pretending to be her mother. She had deprived Pleasance of the knowledge that Lady Loadstone was her aunt, and she had attempted — and was still attempting — to get Pleasance’s marriage portion and to have it benefit Placentia.

“Pretending and claiming!” Mistress Polish said. “Sir, I am her mother, and I challenge — I assert that I have — a right and legal power and authority for what I have done.”

Compass said:

“Out, hag! Out, witch! Out, thou who have put all nature off and behaved unnaturally, and who have put off women’s nature!

“For sordid, foul, corrupt gain, thou betrayed the trust committed to thee by the dead, just as you betrayed the trust from the living, and thou exchanged the poor innocent infants in their cradles.

“For sordid, foul, corrupt gain, thou defrauded them of their parent.

“For sordid, foul, corrupt gain, thou changed their names, calling Placentia ‘Plesance,’ and calling Plesance ‘Placentia.’”

Not only had the babies been exchanged, but their names had also been exchanged.

To avoid confusion, this book will continue to use the name “Placentia” for the woman who has hitherto been called Placentia, and this book will continue to use the name “Plesance” for the woman who has hitherto been called Plesance. The only exception will be when a varlet refers to Compass’ wife as Placentia.

Madame Polish whispered to Nurse Keep, “How does he know this?”

Compass continued:

“For sordid, foul, corrupt gain, thou abused and did wrong to the neighborhood.

“But most of all thou abused this lady; thou did force this poor woman” — he pointed to Nurse Keep — “to make an oath on a pious book that she would keep close and secret thy impiety towards her child: Plesance.”

The lady who was abused was Lady Loadstone, whose child was Plesance.

Mistress Polish whispered to Nurse Keep, “Have you told this to Compass?”

“I told it?” Nurse Keep whispered. “No, he knows it, and much more, as he’s a cunning-man.”

“A cunning fool, if that is all,” Mistress Polish whispered.

So far, Compass had made allegations but had produced no evidence.

Compass said, “But now let’s turn to your true daughter, Placentia, who had the child and who is the proper Pleasance. We must have an account of that, too, gossip.”

Earlier, readers learned that when Mistress Polish had exchanged the two babies, she had also exchanged their names, calling Placentia “Pleasance,” and calling Pleasance “Placentia.”

Therefore, the woman who has been called “Placentia” is actually Pleasance. And therefore, Mistress Compass’ real name is Placentia.

“This is like all the rest of Master Compass,” Mistress Polish said.

Again, so far, Compass had made allegations but had produced no evidence.

— 5.10 —

Doctor Rut ran into the room and shouted:

“Help! Help, for charity!”

“Sir Moth Interest has fallen into the well.”

“Where? Where?” Lady Loadstone asked.

“In the garden,” Doctor Rut said.

Lady Loadstone exited, followed by Captain Ironside.

Doctor Rut then said, “We need a rope to save his life!”

“How did he come to be there?” Compass asked.

“He thought to take possession of a fortune, there newly dropped for him, and the old chain broke, and he, in the bucket, fell down into the well,” Doctor Rut said.

“Is it deep?” Compass asked.

“We cannot tell,” Doctor Rut said. “A rope — help with a rope!”

Sir Diaphanous Silkworm, Captain Ironside, Tim Item, Master Needle, and a wet Sir Moth Interest entered the scene.

“He has gotten out again,” Sir Diaphanous Silkworm said. “The knight has been saved.”

“A little soused — drenched — in the water,” Captain Ironside said. “Master Needle saved him.”

“The water saved him,” Tim Item said. “It was a fair and fortunate escape.”

He had fallen into water instead of hitting ground.

Master Needle asked Sir Moth Interest, “Are you hurt?”

“I’m a little wet,” Sir Moth Interest said.

“That’s nothing,” Master Needle said.

Doctor Rut said to Sir Moth Interest, “I wished you to wait, sir, until tomorrow, and I told you that it was not a lucky hour; since six o’clock all stars were retrograde.”

In other words: The astrological signs were unfavorable after six o’clock.

“In the name of fate or folly, how did you come to be in the bucket?” Lady Loadstone asked.

Sir Moth Interest said:

“That is a quaere of another time, sister.”

In other words: That is a query to be answered at another time.

He still believed in the treasure’s existence.

Sir Moth Interest continued:

“The doctor will resolve you and tell you about why — the doctor who has done the admirablest cure upon your Needle!

“Give me thy hand, good Needle. Thou came timely — at a good time — to rescue me. Take off my hood and coat. And let me shake myself a little to throw the water off me.

“I have a world — a vast quantity — of business.”

He still thought that he had nine hundred thousand pieces of business to do.

Sir Moth Interest continued:

“Where is my nephew Bias? And where is his wife?”

Master Bias, Placentia, and Parson Palate entered the scene.

“Who bids God give them joy? Here they both stand as surely affianced — engaged to be married — as the parson or words can tie them.”

Master Bias and Placentia were not technically married, although Parson Palate had witnessed a betrothal ceremony between them.

“We all wish them joy and happiness,” Doctor Rut said.

“I saw the contract and can witness it,” Sir Diaphanous Silkworm said.

“He shall receive ten thousand pounds tomorrow,” Sir Moth Interest said. “You looked for and expected to get that amount of money, Compass, or a greater sum, but it is disposed of, this is, another way. I have but one niece, truly, Compass.”

“I’ll find another niece for you,” Compass said.

A varlet entered the scene.

“Varlet, do your duty,” Compass said.

A varlet is an official who has the power to arrest people.

The varlet said, “I arrest your body, Sir Moth Interest, in the king’s name, at the instigation of Master Compass and Dame Placentia, his wife. The action’s legally entered into the register. Five hundred thousand pounds is the bail.”

Mistress Compass’ real name (the name given at birth) was Placentia; however, to avoid confusion, this book will continue to use the name “Pleasant” for the woman who has hitherto been called Pleasant and who is now Mistress Compass.

“Do you hear this, sister?” Sir Moth Interest asked. “And has your house the ears to hear it, too? And to resound the affront?”

“I cannot stop the laws or hinder justice,” Lady Loadstone said. “I can be your bail, if it may be taken.”

Compass said, “With the captain’s, I ask no better.”

Compass was willing for Lady Loadstone and Captain Ironside to be sureties — guarantors — for Sir Moth Interest’s bail.

“Here are better men who will give their bail,” Doctor Rut said.

Compass said:

“But yours will not be taken, worshipful doctor. You are good security for a suit of clothes to the tailor who dares to trust you, but not for such a sum as is this action.”

People often owed tailors much money, but that amount of money would not come close to the sum needed now for bail: five hundred thousand pounds.

Compass then said, “Varlet, you know my mind.”

The varlet said to Sir Moth Interest, “You must go to prison, sir, unless you can find bail the creditor likes and is willing to accept as security.”

“I would eagerly find it, if you’d show me where,” Sir Moth Interest said.

Of course, Sir Moth Interest still believed that nine hundred coins were buried in the garden and dropped into the well.

“It is a terrible action, more indeed than many a man is worth,” Sir Diaphanous Silkworm said. “And it is called fright-bail.”

Captain Ironside said:

“In faith, I will bail him at my own apperil — my own risk.

“Varlet, begone. Go now.”

The varlet exited.

Captain Ironside continued:

“I’ll for this once have the reputation to be security for such a sum.

“Bear up, Sir Moth.”

Doctor Rut said to himself, “He is not worth the buckles about his belt, and yet this Ironside clashes.”

A saying of the time about a worthless person was that he was “not worth two shoe buckles.”

Captain Ironside was clashing: making a loud noise as of a soldier in combat.

Sir Moth Interest said quietly to Doctor Rut:

“Be quiet, lest he hear you, doctor. We’ll make use of him.”

Dionysus, the same tyrant of Syracuse who ordered that the golden beard of Aesculapius be detached from his statue, once said after seizing some gold and silver tablets from temples dedicated to the good gods, “Through their goodness we will make use of them.”

Captain Ironside had just volunteered to be a guarantor of Sir Moth Interest’s bail.

Sir Moth Interest then said to Captain Ironside:

“What does your brother Compass, Captain Ironside, demand of us by way of challenge thus?”

In other words: Why did Compass have me arrested? And what does he want?

“Your niece’s marriage portion, in the right of his wife,” Captain Ironside said.

Sir Moth Interest said:

“I have assured one marriage portion to one niece, and I have no more nieces to account for that I know of.

“What I may do in charity, if my sister will bid — ask for — an offering for her maid and him as a benevolent act of charity to them after supper, I'll spit into the basin and entreat my friends to do the like."

A wedding tradition was for guests to put gifts into a basin.

Compass replied:

"Spit out thy gall and heart, thou viper; I will now show no mercy, no pity of thee, thy false niece, and Needle."

He then said to Placentia:

"Bring forth your child, or I will appeal you — I will accuse you — of murder, you, and this gossip here, and Mother Chair."

He was referring to Placentia, Mistress Polish, and Mother Chair.

"The gentleman's fallen mad!" Mother Chair said.

Mother Chair was still denying that there was a baby.

Pleasance stepped forward and said:

"No, Mistress Midwife. I saw the child, and you did give it to me and put it in my arms; by this ill token, this evil token, you wished me such another, and it cried."

Mother Chair wanted Pleasance either 1) to give birth to a healthy baby, or 2) to give birth to a bastard.

"The law is plain," Master Practice said. "If it were heard to cry and you do not produce it, he may indict all who conceal it of felony and murder."

A cry indicated a live birth, not a stillbirth.

Infanticide is murder. Being an accessory before or after the fact is a felony.

Hiding a pregnancy was also a crime.

“And I will take the boldness, sir, to do it,” Compass said, “beginning with Sir Moth here and his doctor.”

He was accusing them of hiding the pregnancy and perhaps worse.

“In good faith, this same is like to turn a business,” Sir Diaphanous Silkworm said.

It was likely to become a source of great trouble and distress.

People could lose their lives, not just money and reputation.

“And a shrewd, dangerous business, by the Virgin Mary,” Parson Palate said. “They all start at it. It makes them afraid.”

Compass said:

“I have the right thread now, I’m on the right path, and I will keep on it.

“You, Goody Keep, confess the truth to My Lady, the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth.”

Mistress Polish said:

“I scorn to be prevented — deprived — of my glories and achievements. I will acknowledge what I have done.

“I plotted the deceit, and I will own up to it. Love to my child and lucre — money — gained from the marriage portion provoked and motivated me; wherein, although the eventual outcome has failed in part, I will make use of the best side.”

She would look on the bright side.

“This” — she pointed to Placentia — “is my daughter, and she has had a child this day — to her shame, I now profess and confess it — by this mere false-stick Squire Needle.”

Squire Needle is a false-stick because his “stick” made Placentia pregnant, but he did not marry her.

“But since this wise knight — Sir Moth Interest — has thought it good to change the foolish father of it by assuring — making sure of by engaging — her to his dear friend, Master Bias, and him again to her by clapping of him — making a bargain with him and clapping him on the back — with his free promise of ten thousand pounds, before so many witnesses —”

Mistress Polish was certain that Master Bias and Placentia would be married. There were witnesses that they were engaged to be married. Although Placentia’s true identity had been revealed, Mistress Polish thought that the marriage would occur because Placentia needed a husband and Master Bias wanted the ten thousand pounds that Sir Moth Interest had agreed to pay him in front of witnesses.

“Whereof I am one witness,” Sir Diaphanous Silkworm said.

“And I am another witness,” Parson Palate said.

Mistress Polish said:

“I would be unnatural to my own flesh and blood, if I would not thank him.”

She said to Sir Moth Interest:

“I thank you, sir, and I have reason for it.

“For here your true niece stands, fine Mistress Compass — I’ll tell you the truth, you have deserved it from me — fine Mistress Compass to whom you are by bond engaged to pay the sixteen thousand pounds that is her portion, due to her husband on her marriage-day.

“I speak the truth, and nothing but the truth.”

“You’ll pay it now, Sir Moth, with interest?” Captain Ironside said. “You see the truth breaks out on every side of you.”

“Into what nets of cozenage and trickery am I cast on every side!” Sir Moth Interest said. “Each thread has grown into a noose, a very mesh. I have run myself into a double brake — snare, trap — of paying twice the money.”

As things now stood, he would be paying money out twice, but not the same amount of money each time.

“You shall be released from paying me a penny, with these conditions,” Master Bias said.

“Will you leave her, Placentia, then?” Mistress Polish asked.

“Yes, and I will leave the sum twice told, before I take a wife to pick out — to unpick — Monsieur Needle’s basting threads,” Master Bias said.

“Basting” is “loosely sewed.”

Placentia had been loosely sowed. Master Needle had made her pregnant, but he had had no intention of being her husband or being a father to the child.

“Basting” is a procedure to keep meat moist.

“Basting threads” may be streams of semen.

“Basting” also means to pad a garment. Placentia’s belly had acquired padding.

“Picking out Monsieur Needle’s basting threads” may mean that marrying Placentia would ensure that Master Needle will no longer engage in basting Placentia. Master Bias, however, did not care what happened to Placentia.

Compass said to Mistress Polish:

“Gossip, you are paid.

“Although he is a fit nature, worthy to have a whore justly put on him, he is not bad enough to take your daughter on such a cheating trick.”

Mistress Polish had gotten a fit reward: Master Bias would not marry her daughter, and so there would be no husband and no ten thousand pounds for her.

Compass then asked Sir Moth Interest:

“Will you pay the marriage portion now?”

“What will you ’bate?” Sir Moth Interest asked.

“Not a penny the law gives me,” Compass said.

“Yes, Bias’ money,” Sir Moth Interest said.

Compass responded:

“Who? Your friend in court?”

“I will not rob you of him, nor the purchase, nor your dear doctor here.”

Compass would not rob Sir Moth Interest — take away from him — Master Bias. He also would not rob — take away from him — what he had bought: Master Bias’ influence at court. He also would not rob — take away from him — the credit for what he had bought.

Nor would he take away from him Doctor Rut.

Sir Moth Interest had paid Master Bias four hundred pounds to be his friend at court. This was a bribe with which he had purchased Master Bias. Compass would not take away the credit for that purchase by providing Sir Moth Interest with four hundred pounds from Pleasance’s marriage portion.

Compass continued:

“All of you stand all together —

“Birds of a nature all, and of a feather.”

A proverb stated, “Birds of a feather flock together.”

Lady Loadstone said:

“Well, we are all now reconciled to truth.”

In other words: All humors are now reconciled.

She continued:

“There rests yet a gratuity — a gift — from me to be conferred upon this gentleman” — she pointed to Captain Ironside — “who, as my nephew Compass says, was the cause, first of the offence, but since of all the amends.”

Compass was now her nephew-in-law because he was married to her niece.

Lady Loadstone continued:

“The quarrel caused the fright; that fright brought on the travail, which made peace; and then the peace drew on this new discovery, which ends all in reconciliation.”

The fright had caused Placentia to give birth.

“It ends in reconciliation when the marriage portion has been tendered — handed over — and received,” Compass said.

“Well, you must have it, as good do it at first as last,” Sir Moth Interest said.

He would hand over the marriage portion quickly.

Lady Loadstone said:

“It is well said, brother.

“And I, if this good captain will accept me, give him myself in marriage, endow him with my estate, and make him lord of me and all my fortunes. He who has saved my honor, though by chance, I’ll really study his honor and learn how best to thank him.”

“And I embrace you, lady, and your goodness,” Captain Ironside said, “and I vow to quit all thought of war hereafter, except what is fought under your colors and for your sake, madam.”

He would retire from being a soldier.

“More work then for the parson! I shall cap the Loadstone with an Ironside, I see,” Parson Palate said.

“Cap” can mean “cover.” In this context, it can mean the missionary sexual position.

Magnets attract iron.

What about Placentia and her baby?

Captain Ironside said:

“And I will take in these, the forlorn, wretched couple, with us, Needle and his thread — Placentia — whose marriage portion I will think about, as being a piece of business waiting on my bounty and generosity.

“Thus I do take possession of you, madam Loadstone, who are my true magnetic and attractive mistress and My Lady.”

CHORUS 5, AND EPILOGUE (*The Magnetic Lady, or

CHORUS 5, *changed into an epilogue to the King

John Trygust stepped forward, away from Probee and Damplay, and said to them:

“Well, gentlemen, I now must, under seal

“And the author’s charge, waive you [put you aside] and make my appeal

“To the supremest power, My Lord the King,

“Who best can judge of what we humbly bring.

“He knows our [the actors’] weakness and the poet’s [playwright’s] faults,

Wikipedia defines “Trout tickling”:

Trout tickling is the art of rubbing the underbelly of a trout with fingers. If done properly, the trout will go into a trance after a minute or so, and can then easily be retrieved and thrown onto the nearest bit of dry land.

Wikipedia quotes a 1901 book detailing the practice:

Thomas Martindale’s 1901 book, Sport, Indeed, describes the method used on trout in the River Wear in County Durham:

The fish are watched working their way up the shallows and rapids. When they come to the shelter of a ledge or a rock it is their nature to slide under it and rest. The poacher sees the edge of a fin or the moving tail, or maybe he sees neither; instinct, however, tells him a fish ought to be there, so he takes the water very slowly and carefully and stands up near the spot. He then kneels on one knee and passes his hand, turned with fingers up, deftly under the rock until it comes in contact with the fish's tail. Then he begins tickling with his forefinger, gradually running his hand along the fish's belly further and further toward the head until it is under the gills. Then comes a quick grasp, a struggle, and the prize is wrenched out of his natural element, stunned with a blow on the head, and landed in the pocket of the poacher.

“Green sickness” is hypochemic anemia.

Here is some information from the article “Hypochemic anemia” on Wikipedia:

Hypochromic anemia is a generic term for any type of anemia in which the red blood cells are paler than normal. (Hypo- refers to less, and chromic means colour.) A normal red blood cell has a biconcave disk shape and will have an area of pallor in its center when viewed microscopically. In hypochromic cells, this area of central pallor is increased. This decrease in redness is due to a disproportionate reduction of red cell hemoglobin (the pigment that imparts the red color) in proportion to the volume of the cell. Clinically the color can be evaluated by the mean corpuscular hemoglobin (MCH) or mean corpuscular hemoglobin concentration (MCHC). The MCHC is considered the better parameter of the two as it adjusts for effect the size of the cell has on its amount of hemoglobin. Hypochromia is clinically defined as below the normal MCH reference range of 27–33 picograms/cell in adults or below the normal MCHC reference range of 33–36 g/dL in adults.*

Red blood cells will also be small (microcytic), leading to substantial overlap with the category of microcytic anemia. The most common causes of this kind of anemia are iron deficiency and thalassemia.

Hypochromic anemia was historically known as chlorosis or green sickness for the distinct skin tinge sometimes present in patients, in addition to more general symptoms such as a lack of energy, shortness of breath, dyspepsia, headaches, a capricious or scanty appetite and amenorrhea.

[...]

Historical understanding

[...]

In 1554, German physician Johannes Lange described a condition, which he called “the disease of virgins” because, he said, it was “peculiar to virgins”. The symptoms were wide-ranging, including an appearance which is “pale, as if bloodless”, an aversion to food (especially meat), difficulty in breathing, palpitations and swollen ankles. He prescribed that sufferers should “live with men and copulate. If they conceive, they will recover.” The symptom picture overlaps to some extent with an earlier condition described in English medical texts, “the green sickness”, which was a form of jaundice. However, Lange shifted the cause from digestive errors to the sufferer remaining a virgin, despite being of the age for marriage. The name “chlorosis” was coined in 1615 by Montpellier professor of medicine Jean Varandal from the ancient Greek word “chloros” meaning “greenish-yellow”, “pale green”, “pale”, “pallid” or “fresh”. Both Lange and Varandal claimed Hippocrates as a reference, but their lists of symptoms do not match that in the Hippocratic Disease of Virgins, a treatise that was translated into Latin in the 1520s and thus became available to early modern Europe.

In addition to “green sickness”, the condition was known as morbus virgineus (“virgin’s disease”) or febris amatoria (“lover’s fever”). Francis Grose’s 1811 Dictionary of the Vulgar Tongue defined “green sickness” as: “The disease of maids occasioned by celibacy.”

Martial, Epigrams. Book 6. Bohn's Classical Library (1897)

LXIV. TO A DETRACTOR.

Although you are neither sprung from the austere race of the Fabii, nor are such as he whom the wife of Curius Dentatus brought forth when seized with her pains beneath a shady oak, as she was carrying her husband his dinner at the plough; but are the son of a father who plucked the hair from his face at a looking-glass, and of a mother condemned to wear the toga in public; <sup>1</sup> and are one whom your wife might call wife; <sup>2</sup> you allow yourself to find fault with my books, which are known to fame, and to carp at my best jokes,----jokes to which the chief men of the city and of the courts do not disdain to lend an attentive ear,----jokes which the immortal Silius deigns to receive in his library, which the eloquent Regulus so frequently repeats, and which win the praises of Sura, the neighbour of the Aventine Diana, who beholds at less distance than others the contests of the great circus. <sup>3</sup> Even Caesar himself the lord of all, the supporter of so great a weight of empire, does not think it beneath him to read my jests two or three times. But you, perhaps, have more genius; you have, by the polishing of Minerva, an understanding more acute; and the subtle Athena has formed your taste. May I die, if there is not far more understanding in the heart of the animal which, with entrails hanging down, and large foot, lungs coloured with concealed blood,----an object to be feared by all noses,----is carried by the cruel butcher from street to street You have the audacity, too, to write verses, which no one will read, and to waste your miserable paper upon me. But if the heat of my wrath should burn a mark upon you, it will live, and remain, and will be noted all through the city; nor will even Cinnamus, with all his cunning, efface the stigma. But have pity upon yourself, and do not, like a furious dog, provoke with rabid mouth the fuming nostrils of a living bear. However calm he may be, and however gently he may lick your fingers and hands, he will, if resentment and bite and just anger excite him, prove a true bear. Let me advise you, therefore, to exercise your teeth on an empty hide, and to seek for carrion which you may bite with impunity.

The below information comes from the Wikipedia article on “Barber’s pole”:

During medieval times, barbers performed surgery on customers, as well as tooth extractions. The original pole had a brass wash basin at the top (representing the vessel in which leeches were kept) and bottom (representing the basin that received the blood). The pole itself represents the staff that the patient gripped during the procedure to encourage blood flow. (and the twined pole motif is likely related to the Staff of Hermes, aka the Caduceus, evidenced for example by early physician van Helmont’s of himself as “Francis Mercurius Van Helmont, A Philosopher by that one in whom are all things, A Wandering Hermite,” op. cit., preface.)

For Your Information: John Hunter lived much later than Ben Johnson's time, but apparently leeches were sometimes applied to testicles during bloodletting:

John Hunter, the founder of modern surgery, advocated the use of bloodletting in his 1794 treatise for the treatment of apoplexy and inflammation.<sup>4</sup> He believed that in some cases bleeding could be effective in treating smallpox. For gonorrhoea, he recommended the application of leeches to the scrotum and testicles.

Since hard soap can be shredded and reformed soap balls came into being, a luxury product used by the upper classes. In Tudor times botanicals were introduced into soap, and scented soap became a "must-have" item of the elite. Fine soaps were produced in Europe from the 16th century on, and many of these soaps are still produced, both industrially and by small-scale artisans. Castile soap is a popular example of the vegetable-only soaps evolved from the oldest "white soap"

The below information comes from the 1911 Encyclopædia Britannica article on "Month's Mind":

MONTH'S MIND, in medieval and later England a service and feast held one month after the death of anyone in his or her memory. Bede speaks of the day as commemorationis dies. These "Minding days" were of great antiquity, and were survivals of the Norse minne or ceremonial drinking to the dead. "Minnyng Days," says Blount, "from the Saxon Lemynde, days which our ancestors called their Monthes mind, their Year's mind and the like, being the days whereon their souls (after their deaths) were had in special remembrance, and some office or obsequies said for them, as Orbits, Dirges." The phrase is still used in Lancashire. Elaborate instructions for the conduct of the commemorative service were often left in wills. Thus, one Thomas Windsor (who died in 1479) orders that “on my moneth’s minde there be a hundred children within the age of sixteen years, to say for my soul,” and candles were to be burned before the rood in the parish church and twenty priests were to be paid by his executors to sing Placebo, Dirige, &c. In the correspondence of Thomas, Lord Cromwell, one in 1536 is mentioned at which a hundred priests took part in the mass. Commemorative sermons were usually preached, the earliest printed example being one delivered by John Fisher, bishop of Rochester, on Margaret, countess of Richmond and Derby, in 1509.

Next, the dishes were brought in and laid in a very precise order on the table, presentation being very important. Dishes were brought first to the high table, and then to the rest of the diners. Dishes requiring carving might be carried to a sideboard for carving. There were typically vast numbers of different dishes, but unlike modern feasts where everyone is expected to get a serving of every dish in a meal, not every dish would be within reach of every diner. Diners were expect[ed] to pick the things they liked best from the “messe” that was within reach of them. A messe is a set of dishes usually shared between 2-4 people.

Masinissa, brought up in the midst of a barbarians, undid another man's sacrilege; but Dionysius, born at Syracuse, used to make jests of his sacrileges, of which he committed more than we have now room to recount: for having plundered the temple of Proserpina at Locri, and sailing upon the sea with a prosperous gale, laughing to his friends, he said, "What a pleasant voyage have the gods granted to us sacrilegious robbers!" Having taken also a golden cloak of great weight from Olympian Jupiter, which Hieron the tyrant had dedicated to him out of the spoils of the Carthaginians; and throwing over the statue a woollen mantle, told his companions that a cloak of gold was too heavy in the summer, too cold in the winter; but a woollen cloak would serve for both seasons. The same person commanded the golden beard of Aesculapius to be taken from his statue in his temple at Epidaurus, saying that it was not appropriate for Apollo the father to be without a beard, and the son to have so large a one. He also took away the silver and golden tables [tablets] out of other temples, where finding certain inscriptions, after the manner of Greece, that they belonged to the good gods, then said he, "Through their goodness we will make use of them." He also took away the little statues of Victory, cups and crowns which they held in their hands being all of gold, saying that he did but borrow them, not take them quite away, saying that was an idle thing, when we pray to the gods for good things, not to accept them when they hold them forth to us. CHAPTER 13: Ben Jonson's *The New Inn, or The Light Heart

CAST OF CHARACTERS (The New Inn, or The Light Heart)

THE SCENE: Barnet, England

GOODSTOCK, the HOST of the inn.

LOVEL, a complete and consummate gentleman, a soldier and a scholar, and a melancholic guest in the inn. At one point in the play, the Host asks him whether his name is Love-ill or Love-well.

FERRET, who is also called STOAT and VERMIN, is Lovel's man-servant, a fellow of a quick, nimble wit. His names suggest leanness.

FRANK, the Host's son, borrowed to be dressed as a lady.

NURSE, a poor charwoman in the inn, with an eyepatch over one eye, who tends the Host's son.

FRANCES, the Lady Frampul, reputed the Lord Frampul's sole daughter and heir, the barony descending upon her. She is a lady of great fortunes and beauty, but she is fantastical (devoted to fancies). She thinks nothing a felicity but to have a multitude of servants (men who admire her) and be called "Mistress" by them. She comes to the inn to be merry, with only a chambermaid and her guests, etc. The word "frampold" applied to a human means "bad tempered, cross, and peevish." But applied to a horse, it means "spirited, fiery, and mettlesome."

PRUDENCE, the chambermaid, is elected sovereign of the entertainments in the inn; as Queen of the Festivities, she governs and commands all. Prudence is the Lady Frampul's secretary, aka confidant.

LORD LATIMER and LORD BEAUFORT are a pair of young lords who are guests to the Lady Frampul. Both of them fall enamored of persons at the inn. Old French latimier means “Latin speaker.” A beau fort is a beautiful fortress. Lord Beaufort is attracted to beauty.

SIR GLORIOUS TIPTOE, a knight and colonel, has the luck to think well of himself and to think he is without a rival. He talks gloriously of anything, but he is very seldom in the right. He is Lady Frampul’s guest and her love-servant, too. He becomes friends with the Fly of the inn and the “militia” below stairs, and the servants Trundle, Barnaby, etc. His kind of “glorious” is “vainglorious.” A man who goes on tip toes is a man who bears himself with pride.

FLY is the parasite of the inn, the “inspector-general” of the house, one who is the inflamer of the reckonings — that is, he inflates customers’ bills. A parasite lives off someone else.

PIERCE, the drawer, knighted by Colonel Tiptoe, is called by him SIR PIERCE and is aka ANON, one of the chief of the “infantry,” aka metaphorical foot-soldiers. A drawer is a bartender. Bartenders had to pierce casks of alcoholic beverages, and they cried “Anon” — “Soon” — to customers who required their help.

JORDAN, the chamberlain, another of the metaphorical militia and a metaphorical officer, commands the tertia — the “regiment,” as of infantry — of the beds. A jordan is a chamber pot.

JUG, a tapster, is a thoroughfare of news — he collects and shares gossip. A tapster is a bartender.

PECK, the ostler. An ostler is a hostler: one who takes care of horses. A peck is a measure of the oats that horses eat.

BAT BURST, a broken citizen, is an in-and-in man. Brick-bats could be used to break things. “Burst” means bankrupt. “In-and-in” was a dice game. Bat Burst is a bankrupt gambler.

HODGE HUFFLE, Bar Burst’s champion. “Huffle” means “bluster.” “Hodge” is a nickname for someone named Roger. In Elizabethan and Jacobean theater, Roger is often the name of a rustic character.

NICK STUFF, Lady Frampul’s tailor. Tailors were stereotyped as dishonest and lecherous. Stuff is woven fabric.

PINNACIA, a wife. A pinnacle is a go-between or bawd. A pinnacle is also a boat.

TRUNDLE, a coachman.

BARNABY, a hired coachman.

STAGGERS, the blacksmith. Only talked about. He is frequently drunk.

TREE, the saddler. Only talked about. A saddler makes, repairs, and buys and sells saddles. A tree is the framework of a saddle.

FIDDLERS.

SERVANTS.

NOTE

Ben Jonson’s society existed before the age of modern medicine. Doctors in his society believed that the human body had four humors, or vital fluids. Each humor made a contribution to the personality, and for a human being to be sane and healthy, the four humors had to be present in the right amounts. If a man had too much of a certain humor, it would harm his personality and health.

Blood was the sanguine humor. A sanguine man was optimistic.

Phlegm was the phlegmatic humor. A phlegmatic man was calm.

Yellow bile was the choleric humor. A choleric man was angry.

Black bile was the melancholic humor. A melancholic man was gloomy.

ACT 1 (The New Inn, or The Light Heart)

— 1.1 —

The Host of the Light Heart Inn and Ferret, the servant of Lovel, a melancholic guest at the inn, talked together. The Host had a light heart — he was usually cheerful — and he wanted his customers to also have light hearts.

The sign of the Light Heart Inn could be seen from where they stood. It was a two-sided sign with a rebus — a pictorial representation of a name or proverb — on each side. One rebus depicted “Light Heart,” and the other depicted “A heavy purse makes a light heart.”

The Host said, “I am not pleased — indeed, you are in the right — nor is my house pleased if my sign could speak, the sign of the Light Heart.”

He pointed at the sign and said, “There you may read it; so may your master, too, if he looks at it.

“It shows a heart weighed in a scale with a feather, and outweighed, too, by the feather! This rebus is a brain-child of my own, and I am proud of it!”

A rebus is a pictorial representation of a name. The heart in the scale outweighed by a feather means “light heart.” The word “light” can also mean happy and frivolous.

The Host continued, “And if His Worship — your master, Lovel — thinks to be melancholy here in spite of me or my wit, he is deceived.

“I will maintain the rebus against all humors and all complexions in the body of man or in the isle of Britain. That’s my word!”

A humor is a characteristic disposition. Lovel's humor was to be melancholic. The Host's humor was to be light and cheerful and sanguine.

"You have reason for your belief, my good Host," Ferret said.

"Sir, I have rhyme, too," the Host said.

He turned the sign to the other side and said, "Whether it be by chance or art, 'a heavy purse makes a light heart.' There it is expressed!"

The sign showed the images of a purse of gold and two turtle-doves and a heart with a lantern or a candle inside it.

"First, a purse of gold means 'a heavy purse', and then two turtle-doves, who are mates for life, means 'makes,' and then a heart with a light stuck in it means 'a light heart'!"

The Host continued, "Old Abbot Islip could not invent better, nor could Prior Bolton with his bolt and tun."

Abbot Islip and Prior Bolton also had rebuses. Abbot Islip's rebus showed an eye and the slip of a tree. A slip is a small cutting that can be used for grafting. Prior Bolton's rebus showed a bird-bolt and a tun. A bird-bolt is a weapon such as a blunt arrow used to kill birds, and a tun is a large cask of beer or wine.

The Host continued, "I am an innkeeper and know my grounds — my fundamental principles — and I study them; by the brain of man, I study them.

"I must have jovial guests to drive my plows and whistling boys to bring my harvest home, or I shall hear no flails thwack. "

The Host needed jovial guests who would drink and be merry and pay their bills at the inn.

Flails were tools used when harvesting grain. The Host harvested metaphorical grain when his customers paid their bills.

The Host continued, “Here your master and you have been this fortnight, drawing fleas out of my mats and impounding them in cages — flea-traps — cut out of cards, and those roped round with packthread drawn through bird-lime — a fine and subtle trick!”

Bird-lime was a sticky substance used to catch birds.

The Host continued, “Or your master and you have been poring through a magnifying glass at a captive crab-louse or a cheese-mite, which are to be dissected, as the jokes of nature, with a clean, bright Spanish needle — such speculations do become the age, I confess!”

Lovel was a natural scientist; he studied nature and its creatures.

The Host continued, “As if measuring an ant’s eggs in relation to the silkworm’s eggs with an ingenious instrument of thread shall give you their just difference, to a hair!

“Or else the reviving of dead flies with crumbs — another ingenious experiment of natural science — which I have seen you busy at through the key-hole, but never had the fate to see a fly —”

Lovel entered the room as the Host continued to speak:

“— alive in your cups nor have I once heard, ‘Drink, my Host,’ nor some other such cheerful chirping charm come from you.”

— 1.2 —

“What’s that?” Lovel asked. “What’s that?”

He stood with crossed arms — the sign of a melancholic man.

Ferret, Lovel's servant, said to him, "A buzzing of my Host about a fly! A complaining murmur that he has."

The Host said to Lovel, "Sir, I am telling your stoat here, Monsieur Ferret — for I hear that's his name — and I dare tell you, sir, that if you have a mind to be melancholy and musty, there's other places for you to reside. There's Footman's Inn at the town's end, by which I mean the stocks, or Carrier's Place, at the sign of the Broken Wain."

Stocks are used to punish criminals. The criminals' head, hands, and/or feet would be restrained, and people who did not like the criminals could torment them.

A wain is a wagon. The Broken Wain Inn had the image of a broken wagon on its sign.

Charles' Wain, which is part of the constellation Ursa Major (Big Bear), resembles a wagon.

The Host continued, "They are mansions of state! Take up your harbor — your lodging — there. At these mansions of state, there are both flies and fleas, and all variety of vermin for inspection or dissection."

These "mansions of state" were poor inns.

Lovel replied, "We have set our rest up here, sir, in your Light Heart Inn. This is our long-term lodging."

"Sir, set your heart at rest, you shall not do it — unless you can be jovial," the Host said. "By the brain of man, be jovial first and drink, and dance and drink!"

"Your lodging here with your daily states of melancholy is an absolute libel against my house and me. And, then, your scandalous commons — your daily food —"

“— what about it, my Host?” Lovel interrupted.

“Sir, they do scandalize upon the road, here,” the Host said.

The Light Heart Inn was in a good location on a well-traveled road, and the Host felt that his customers ought to eat better food than Lovel had been ordering.

The Host continued, “A poor quotidian — ordinary — neck of mutton, roasted dry, to be grated! And that driven down with beer and buttermilk mingled together or with clarified — separated — whey instead of claret wine!

“It is against my freehold, my inheritance, my Magna Carta, cor laetificat, to drink such balderdash or bonny-clabber!”

Psalm 104.15 states, “Et vinem laetificat cor hominis.” This means, “And wine gladdens the heart of man.”

Balderdash is adulterated beer. It can be beer mixed with wine, or beer mixed with milk. The word also means “a jumble of words” in addition to meaning “a jumble of liquors.”

Bonny-clabber is sour buttermilk.

A good customer ate good cuts of meat and drank good wine. Lovel was not a good customer.

The Host continued, “Give me good wine, whether it is from a Catholic country or a Christian country.”

This society was anti-Catholic, but the Host did not care from which kind of country wine came from, as long as it was good wine.

The Host continued, “Wine is the word that gladdens the heart of man, and mine’s the house of wine. ‘Sack,’ says my bush; ‘be merry and drink sherry’ — that’s my posy!”

Sack is white wine. Sherry is an alcoholic drink.

A “bush” is a bunch of ivy. It was hung up as a sign of an inn. The Host may be using “bush” metaphorically — his sign is much different from a bunch of ivy. Or he may have had a bunch of ivy as well as his sign advertising his inn.

A “posy” or “poesy” is a short saying engaged on the inside of a ring.

The Host’s personal motto was “Be merry and drink sherry.”

The Host continued, “For I shall never feel joy in my Light Heart Inn as long as I conceive a sullen guest or anything that’s earthy!”

Melancholic people were associated with the earth, which was thought to be heavy and dull.

“Capricious Host!” Lovel exclaimed.

“I don’t care if I am capricious,” the Host said.

“But you are airy — cheerful — also,” Lovel said. “I am not trying to defraud you of your rights, or encroach upon your privileges or great charter — for those are every ostler’s language now.”

Some ostlers talked about their rights and privileges. Some highly born people thought that these ostlers were acting above their station in life.

Lovel continued, “I say you were born beneath those smiling stars that have made you lord and owner of the Heart, of the Light Heart in Barnet; however, allow those of us who are more saturnine to enjoy the shade of your good roof yet.”

The Host was jovial and usually cheerful; Lovel was saturnine and often gloomy.

“Sir, I keep no shades nor shelters, I, for either owls or rermice,” the Host said.

Shades are sequestered places.

Reremice are bats.

Owls and bats are birds of the night. They are regarded as ominous signs.

— 1.3 —

Frank, the Host's son, entered the room.

Ferret said to the Host, "He'll make you a bird of night, sir."

One kind of figurative bird of night is a procurer.

The Host had given Ferret no reason to think that about him.

This was a rough kind of joking.

The Host spoke quietly to Frank, "Bless you, child."

He then said to Lovel and Ferret, "You'll make yourselves such."

Another kind of figurative bird of night is a thief.

Lovel and Ferret had given the Host no reason to think that about them.

This was a rough kind of joking.

"Is that boy your son, my Host?" Lovel asked.

"He's all the sons I have, sir," the Host answered.

"Pretty boy!" Lovel said. "Does he go to school?"

Ferret answered for the Host, "Oh, Lord, sir, he prates Latin as if he were a parrot or a boy-actor on the stage."

Lovel said, "You ... praise him fitly."

"To the pitch he flies, sir," Ferret said.

The pitch is the highest point of a bird of prey's flight.

Ferret continued, "He'll tell you what is the Latin for a looking-glass, a beard-brush, a rubber, or a quick warming pan."

"What's the meaning of that?" Lovel said.

Ferret bawdily explained:

"A wench, in the inn-phrase, is all of these: a looking-glass in her eye, a beard-brush with her lips, a rubber with her hand, and a warming pan with her hips."

Ferret was punning. A rubber can be a towel as well as a hand, and the word "quick" can mean "living," as in "quick warming pan," or it can mean a fast (quickly) warming pan.

A Scotch warming pan is a wench; a traveler in Scotland wanted his bed warmed before he got into it, so a serving-maid lay in his bed and warmed it. As you would expect, in some versions of this tale, the serving-maid takes off her clothes.

"This is in your scurrilous dialect," the Host said. "But my inn knows no such language."

"That's because, my Host," Ferret said, "you profess the teaching him yourself."

The Host, who kept bad language out of his inn because of his child, said, "Sir, I do teach him somewhat. By degrees and with a funnel, I make shift to fill the narrow vessel; he is but yet a bottle."

"Oh, let him lose no time, though," Lovel said.

"Sir, he does not," the Host replied.

"And let him less lose his manners," Lovel said.

Both education and manners are important.

“I provide for those, too,” the Host replied.

He then said, “Come hither, Frank. Speak to the gentleman in Latin. He is melancholy; say that I long to see him merry, and merrily I would like to treat him.”

Frank said to Lovel, “Subtristis visu’ es esse aliquantulum patri, qui te laute excipere, atque etiam tractare gestit.”

This means, “You present a somewhat melancholic appearance to my father, who is eager to welcome and treat you cheerfully.”

Lovel said, “Pulchre.”

This means, “Excellent.”

The Host said to Frank, “Tell him that I fear that his excessive reservedness bodes for us some ill luck.”

Frank said to Lovel, “Veretur pater, ne quid nobis mali ominis apportet iste nimis praeclusus vultus.”

This means, “My father is afraid that a too-reserved face will bring an evil omen to us.”

“Belle,” Lovel said. “Prettily spoken. A fine child!”

He then asked, “You would not part with him, my Host?”

The Host asked, “Who told you I would not?”

“I am only asking you,” Lovel replied.

“And I answer: To whom? For what?” the Host said.

“To me,” Lovel said, “To be my page.”

A page is a boy who is the personal attendant to a man of rank who can educate him in chivalry and gentlemanly behavior.

The Host replied, "I know no mischief yet that the child has done to deserve such a destiny."

"Why do you say that?" Lovel asked.

Usually, people regarded being a page as a good thing.

"Go down, boy," the Host said to Frank, "and get your breakfast."

Both Frank and Ferret exited.

The Host then said to Lovel, "Trust me, I would rather take a fair noose, wash my hands, and hang him myself, make a clean riddance of him, than —"

Surprised, Lovel said, "What!"

The Host continued, "— than damn him to that desperate course of life."

Lovel said, "Do you call being a page desperate, this occupation which by a line of institution, law, and custom from our ancestors has been conveyed down to us, and received in a succession, to be the noblest way of breeding up our youth in letters, arms, fair carriage and bearing, discourses, civil exercise, and all the blazon — record of virtues — of a gentleman?"

"Where can he learn to vault, to ride, to fence, to move his body more gracefully, to speak his language purer, or to tune his mind or manners more to the harmony of nature than in these nurseries of nobility?"

The Host said, "What you say was true. Yes, that was true when the nursery's self was noble, and when only virtue made it, not the market, when titles were not offered for sale at the drum of public proclamation or common auction; when goodness gave the greatness, and when greatness gave the recognition and respect. Then, every house became an academy of honor, and those parts — well, we see those parts deviated from in the practice now, quite far from the institution.”

In other words, all of these virtues that were practiced then are no longer practiced now. The “virtues” of the Host’s “today” bear little resemblance to their originals. “Today,” for example, King James I sells titles for money when previously titles were granted for the virtue of excellence. Knights became knights through showing courage on the battlefield, not by paying the king money. Because of these changes, being a page “nowadays” is not a good thing, according to the Host.

“Why do you say so?” Lovel asked. “Why do you think so enviously? Don’t pages still learn there the Centaurs’ skill, the art of Thrace, which is to ride? Don’t they still learn Pollux’ skill, which is to fence? Don’t they still learn the Pyrrhic gestures, which are to both dance and spring in armor, so that they can be active for the wars?”

Centaurs are half-horse, half-man. Pollux (aka Polydeuces), the twin brother of Castor, was famed as a boxer. The Pyrrhic gestures are war-games that will help prepare their practitioners for battle.

Lovel continued, “Don’t pages still learn to study figures of speech and the numbers and proportions of rhetoric that may make them great in counsels and in the arts that grave Nestor and the wise Ulysses practiced — ‘To make their English sweet upon their tongue,’ as Reverend Chaucer says?”

Nestor was an aged king who advised Agamemnon, leader of the Greeks against the Trojans in the Trojan War. Odysseus was a master of rhetoric in both Homer’s Iliad and Odyssey.

The Friar in the Prologue to Chaucer's Canterbury Tales was described in this way: "Somewhat he lisped, for his wantonness, / To make his English sweet upon his tongue."

"Reverend" is a title indicating great respect.

"Sir, you are mistaken," the Host said. "What will a page of today learn?"

"To play Sir Pandarus and be a bawd, as my copy of Chaucer has it, and carry messages to Madam Cressida."

Pandarus was a go-between who enabled his niece Cressida and the Trojan warrior Troilus to have an affair.

The Host continued, "Instead of riding the brave steed in the mornings, to mount the chambermaid; and instead of a leap of the vaulting horse, to ply the vaulting house."

A vaulting horse is a piece of gymnastics equipment; a vaulting house is a brothel.

The Host continued, "For exercise of arms, a set of dice, or two or three packs of cards, to show the cheating trick and nimbleness of hand; to mis-take and steal a cloak from my lord's back, and pawn it; to ease my lord's pockets of a superfluous watch, or to geld a jeweled ornament of an odd stone, or so."

A stone can be a testicle.

The Host continued, "To pinch three or four buttons from off my lady's gown."

Buttons were sometimes made of gold.

The Host continued, "These are the arts or seven liberal deadly sciences of pagery, or rather paganism, as the times are now."

“To which, if the page applies himself, he may, perhaps, take a degree at Tyburn a year the earlier, come to deliver a lecture upon Aquinas at St Thomas a Waterings, and so go forth a laureate in a hemp circle!”

Tyburn was a place where public executions were held, as was St. Thomas a Waterings. A hemp circle is a noose.

St. Thomas a Waterings was located on a road taken by pilgrims to St. Thomas Becket’s shrine in Canterbury. The pilgrims watered their horses at St. Thomas a Waterings, which is how it got its name. St. Thomas Aquinas’ name contains a pun in aqua, Latin for “water.”

The Host was saying that pages no longer learned correct behavior; instead, they learned low behavior.

“You’re tart, my Host, and talk above your seasoning,” Lovel said. “You talk above what you seem to be; it should not come under your cap and occur to you, I think, this vein of salt and sharpness and these blows upon learning now and then.”

Normally, the host of an inn would not have such critical opinions about the doings of well-born people.

Lovel then asked the Host, “How long have you, if your dull guest may ask it, practiced this brisk and lively trade of keeping the Light Heart — your mansion, your palace here, your hostelry?”

“In truth, I was born to something, sir, above running an inn,” the Host said.

“I easily suspect that,” Lovel said. “My Host, what is your name?”

“They call me Goodstock,” the Host said.

A person who comes from good stock is well — that is, highly — born.

“Sir, you confess and reveal it, both in your language and discourse, and in your bearing,” Lovel said.

“Yet, sir, not all are sons of the white hen,” the Host said.

Eggs from white hens were valued more highly than eggs from brown and black hens. This was a metaphor for saying that not all people are highly born.

The Host continued, “Nor can we, as the ballad singer says, come all to be wrapped soft and warm in Lady Fortune’s smock when she is pleased to trick or trump mankind. Some may be wearing coats, as jacks, queens, and kings do in the playing cards, but then some must be knaves, some varlets, bawds, and ostlers, as aces, deuces, and cards of ten, to face and brazen it out in the game that all the world is.”

The face cards in a pack of playing cards are King, Queen, and Jack. A Jack is a knight’s knave — a servant to a knight.

Lovel said, “But it being in your free will, as it was, to choose what parts (as in a play) you would sustain, I think a man of your sagacity and clear nostril should have made another choice than of a place so sordid as the keeping of an inn, where every jovial tinker, for his chink, aka money, may cry, ‘My Host, to crambe! Give us drink, and do not slink, but skink, or else you stink!’”

The Latin word sagacitas refers to a keen sense of smell.

Crambe is a game in which a player gives a word or phrase and the next player must rhyme to it.

“Skink” means “draws liquor.”

Lovel continued, “Such people call you by the surnames ‘Rogue,’ ‘Bawd,’ and ‘Cheater’ — they are known synonyma — synonyms — of your profession.”

The Host replied, “But if I am not a rogue, a bawd, or a cheater, who then is the rogue — in understanding, sir, I mean? Who errs? Who tinkles and makes jingles then, or impersonates Tom Tinker?”

Tinkers had a reputation for being rogues.

The Host replied, “Your weasel — Ferret — here may tell you that I talk bawdy and teach my boy it; and you may believe him, but, sir, you do so at your own peril if I do not do that, and it is at his — Ferret’s — peril, too, if he does lie and affirm falsely that I do it.

“No slander strikes, much less hurts, the innocent.

“If I am honest, and if all the cheat is just of myself in keeping this Light Heart, where I imagine all the world’s a play, and where I imagine all the state of affairs and the state of men’s affairs, all the events and passages of life, where I imagine all these things to commence new scenes, to come in, to go out, and to change and vanish; and if I have got a seat to sit at ease here in my inn to see the comedy, and to laugh and chuckle at the variety and throng of humors and dispositions that come jostling in and out always, as if one drove away from here another one — why, will you envy me my happiness because you are sad and lumpish and low-spirited?

“Will you carry a loadstone in your pocket to hang knives on, or jet rings to entice light straws to leap at them?”

Loadstones and jet rings are amusing toys. A loadstone is a magnet. When a jet ring is rubbed, electromagnetism is created that will attract light objects such as straws.

“Aren’t you taken with the alacrities — the liveliness and sprightliness — of a host? Greater and more just, sir, is my wonder why you chose my house — a Fiddlers’ Hall, the seat of noise and mirth, an inn here — to be drowsy in and lodge your lethargy in the Light Heart, as if some cloud — some trouble — from court had been the harbinger of your arrival here, or Cheapside debt-books, or some mistress’ order, after she sees your love growing corpulent, to give it a diet by absence — some such moldy passion!”

The Host wondered why Lovel would choose an inn — a place of liveliness and music — to be gloomy in. Could the reason be problems at court, money problems, or love problems?

Lovel thought, Unhappily, he has guessed correctly.

Ferret entered the room and said, “My Host, you’re called for.”

Some new guests had arrived at the inn.

The Host said loudly, “I am coming, boys.”

He exited.

Lovel asked, “Ferret, have you been plowing with this mad ox, my Host? Or has he been plowing with you?”

“For what purpose, sir?” Ferret said.

“Why, to find my riddle out,” Lovel said.

The riddle was this: Why are you here in this inn, Lovel?

One of the answers the Host had guessed was the correct answer to the riddle.

In Judges 14:14, Samson posed a riddle: “Out of the eater came forth meat [food], and out of the strong came forth sweetness” (King James Version). The answer was honey from bees that had made their home in the carcass of a lion. Samson told the answer to his wife, who revealed it to her people, the Philistines, with whom Samson had made a bet. The Philistines told Samson the answer to his riddle, and in Judges 14:18, Samson said, “If ye had not plowed with my heifer, ye had not found out my riddle” (King James Version).

Cuckolds — men with unfaithful wives — were said to have invisible horns. The reference to the “mad ox” — the Host — was a joke that the Host was a cuckold, although the Host had given Lovel no reason to think that.

Ferret replied, “I hope you believe, sir, that I can find other discourse to be gossiping about my master with hosts and ostlers.”

“If you can, it is well,” Lovel said. “Go down and see what guests have come in, and then tell me what you have learned.”

Ferret exited.

— 1.4 —

Alone, Lovel said to himself, “Oh, love, what passion are you! So tyrannous and treacherous! First to enslave and then betray all who in loyalty do serve you! The result is that neither the wisest nor the wariest creature can ignore you no more than he can bear burning coals in his bare palm or bosom, and he can conceal or hide you less than he can conceal or hide a flash of inflamed powder, whose whole light lays it open to all discovery, even of those who have but half an eye, and less of nose!

“A host to find me out! A host who is, commonly, the log a little on this side of the signpost!”

According to Lovel, most hosts of inns have little more than the intelligence and sensitivity of a log — the support-post of the sign of the inn.

Lovel continued, “Or, at the best, some round-grown thing, a drinking-jug decorated with a bearded face, that and who pours out to the guests and takes in and receives from the fragments of their jests!

“But I may wrong this Host out of sullenness, or out of my mistaking, misjudging humor.”

The Host of the Light Heart Inn was a man of wit and intelligence.

Lovel continued, “I pray that you, fantasy — my delusive imagination — be laid to rest again. And, gentle melancholy, do not oppress me; I will be as silent as the tame lover should be, and as foolish.”

— 1.5 —

The Host returned and said, “My guest, my guest, be jovial, I ask you. I have fresh golden guests, guests of the game, guests who are gamesome, guests who seek entertainment, three coachfuls of guests! Lords and ladies newly arrived! And I will announce them to you and you to them, so that I can spring a smile in this brow of yours. You are like the rugged Roman alderman, old master Gross, surnamed Agelastos, who was never seen to laugh but at an ass.”

“Agelastos” is Latin for “unsmiling,” and it was the nickname of Marcus Licinius Crassus, who laughed just once in his life. The story is that rich Romans regarded thistles, properly prepared, as a delicacy, and they would not allow poor Romans to eat them. Agelastos laughed when he saw an ass eating thistles for free.

Ferret entered the room and said to Lovel, "Sir, here's the Lady Frampul —"

"What!" Lovel said.

Ferret continued, " — and her train of guests and servants: Lord Beaufort and Lord Latimer, the Colonel Tiptoe, with Mistress Pru the chambermaid, Trundle the coachman—"

"Stop!" Lovel ordered. "Settle the bill with the house and get my horses ready; tell the groom to bring them to the back gate."

Ferret exited to carry out his orders.

"What do you mean by this, sir?" the Host asked.

"To take fair leave of your inn, my Host," Lovel answered.

The Host replied, "I hope, my guest, that although I have talked somewhat above my share at large, and have been in the altitudes, the extravagants or regions beyond the ordinary boundaries — that is, although I have acted and talked above my social station — I hope that neither myself nor any of mine have given you the reason for you to quit my house thus so suddenly."

"No, I affirm that is not the reason for my leaving, I swear on my faith," Lovel replied. "Excuse me from such a rudeness. I was now beginning to relish and love you as a friend, and I am heartily sorry that any occasion should be so compelling to urge my abrupt departure thus. But — necessity's a tyrant and commands me to leave."

The Host said, "She shall command me first to set fire to my bush — the bunch of ivy that serves as one sign of my inn — and then to break up my house. Or if that will not serve, to break with all the world, turn country bankrupt in my own town upon the market day and be proclaimed for not paying my bills for my butter and eggs all the way to the last measure of oats and bundle of hay, before you shall leave me.

“Before that happens, I will break my Heart; I will order coach and coach-horses, lords and ladies, to pack up and go packing!

“All my fresh guests shall stink!

“I’ll pull my sign down, convert my inn to an almshouse, or to a hospital for lepers or the poor folks who sell switches as whips or whisks; turn it into an academy of rogues, or give it away to be an independently run school to breed up beggars in and send them to the canting universities.

“I will do all and any of that before you leave me.”

“Cant” is the secret language of thieves. Calling universities “canting” is an insult.

Lovel replied, “Truly, I confess that I am loath, my Host, to leave you; your expressions both take and hold me.

“But in case I stay, I must enjoin you and your whole family and household to privacy, and to conceal me. For the secret is, I would not willingly see or be seen by any of this gang, especially the lady.”

“By the brain of man,” the Host said, “what monster is she? Is she a cockatrice in velvet, who kills like this?”

A cockatrice is a basilisk: a monster that can kill something merely by meeting its gaze.

Lovel was behaving as if one look at or by Lady Frampul would kill him.

“Oh, say good words, my Host,” Lovel said. “She is a noble lady, great in blood and fortune; she is beautiful, and she is a wit!

“But she is of so resolute a capricious nature that she thinks nothing is a happiness except to have a multitude of servants; and to get them, although she is very chaste, yet she ventures upon these dangerously steep precipices that would make her not seem chaste to some prying, narrow natures.”

The kind of servants Lady Frampul wanted were men who were devoted to her. This kind of servant was not necessarily slept with.

Lovel continued, “We call her, sir, the Lady Frances Frampul, daughter of and heir to the Lord Frampul.”

“Who?” the Host asked. “The Lord Frampul? He who lived in Oxford first as a student, and afterward married the daughter of —”

The Host paused as if trying to remember the name.

Lovel finished for him, “— Syllly.”

“Right,” the Host said, “of whom the tale went that he turned puppet-master —”

Lovel interrupted, “— and traveled with young Goose, the man who mounted puppet shows —”

The Host interrupted, “— and lay and lived with the gypsies for half a year, away from his wife.”

“He is the very same man — the mad Lord Frampul!” Lovel said. “And this same Lady Frampul is his daughter, who is as cock-brained and foolish as ever her father was!”

“There were two daughters, Frances and Laetitia, who was nicknamed Lettice, but Lettice was lost young, and, as the rumor flew then, the mother upon that happening lost her wits and became mentally disturbed.

“A foolish weak woman, she went away in a melancholy. Because she had brought her husband no children but girls, she thought that he did not love her. And he, as foolish as she, too late repenting the reason she had given, went afterward in quest of her and has not been heard of since.”

“A strange division of a family!” the Host said.

Lovel said, “And a family scattered, as in the great confusion of language during the time of the Tower of Babel!”

Genesis 11:9 states, “Therefore is the name of it called Babel; because the Lord did there confound the language of all the earth: and from thence did the Lord scatter them abroad upon the face of all the earth” (King James Version).

“But yet the lady, the heir, enjoys the land,” the Host said.

Lovel said, “And she takes all lordly ways how to consume it as nobly as she can, if clothes and feasting, and the authorized and sanctioned means of riotous revelry will do it.”

Conspicuous consumption by women in the form of fancy clothing and fancy feasting can be paid for through the sale of land.

“She shows her extraction,” the Host said, “and I honor her for it.”

— 1.6 —

Ferret entered the room and said to Lovel, “Your horses, sir, are ready and the house is dis —”

Lovel interrupted and finished the word, “— pleased, do you think?”

“I cannot tell,” Ferret said. “But dis-charged I am sure it is.”

“Charge it again, good Ferret, and make unready the horses,” Lovel said. “You know how: Chalk and renew the rondels. I have now decided to stay here at the inn.”

Scores (aka bills or tabs) were written down in chalk in inns. A rondel is a round sign — a circle — meaning a unit of money.

“I easily and readily thought you would, when you would hear what’s purposed,” Ferret said.

“What’s that?” Lovel asked.

“To throw the house out of the window!” Ferret said.

This was a proverb meaning to engage in riotous merry-making.

“By the brain of man, I shall have the worst of that!” the Host said. “Won’t they throw my household stuff out first? Cushions and table covers, chairs, stools, and bedding? Won’t their sport be my ruin?”

“Don’t fear, my Host, I am not of the fellowship,” Lovel said.

“I cannot see, sir, how you will avoid it,” Ferret said. “All of them know already, all of them, that you are in the house.”

“Who knows?” Lovel asked.

“The lords,” Ferret said. “They saw me and inquired about you.”

“Why were you seen?” Lovel asked.

“Because indeed I had no medicine or drug, sir, to make me invisible,” Ferret said. “I had no fern-seed in my pocket, nor had I an opal wrapped in a bay-leaf in my left fist to charm their eyes with.”

“Fern-seed” was supposed to be an invisible seed that would make its possessor also invisible.

An opal was supposed to make clear the sight of its possessor while clouding the sight of other people near its possessor.

The Host said to Lovel, "He gives you reasons as round and circular — complete and accomplished — as Gyges' ring, which, the ancients say, was a hoop ring; and that is, as round as a hoop!"

A hoop ring is a plain-band ring.

Ferret's reasons were circular: They went round and round, meaning that Ferret's reasons did not truly answer the question.

In Plato's Republic, the shepherd Gyges finds a ring that makes him invisible.

"You will have your rebus still, my Host," Lovel said.

"I must," the Host replied.

"My lady, too, looked out of the window and called me," Ferret said.

"My Lady" is the Lady Frances Frampul.

Prudence, the chambermaid of the Lady Frances Frampul, entered the room.

Ferret saw her and said, "And see where Secretary Pru comes from her, employed upon some embassy to you —"

The word "secretary" meant "confidant."

Secretary Prudence had come as an ambassador to Lovel from Lady Frampul.

The Host said, "I'll meet her and see if she comes upon that employment."

He then said to Prudence, "Fair lady, you are as welcome as your Host can make you."

“Forbear, sir,” Prudence replied. “I am first to have my audience before the compliment. My address is to this gentleman.”

She had come upon that employment they suspected she had come upon.

“And it is in state,” the Host said. “Yours is an official ambassadorship.”

He was mildly joking. Prudence was a chambermaid and a confidant, not an official ambassador.

Prudence said to Lovel, “My lady, sir, as glad of the encounter to find a servant here, and such a servant, whom she so values, with her best respects desires to be remembered, and invites your nobleness to be a part today of the society and mirth intended by her and the young lords, your fellow-servants, who are alike desirous of enjoying the fair request; and to that end have sent me — their imperfect orator — to obtain it.”

The Lady Frampul had recognized Lovel; he was a former servant — that is, an admirer of hers.

Prudence continued, “Which if I may, they have elected me and crowned me with the title of a sovereign of the day’s entertainments devised in the inn, provided that you will be pleased to add your consent to it.”

The Lady Frampul enjoyed entertainments, and she wanted Lovel to be a part of them.

Lovel replied, “Provided that I will be pleased, my gentle mistress Prudence? You cannot think me of that coarse condition to begrudge you anything.”

A mistress can be a female boss. Prudence was a chambermaid, but Lovel was allowing her to tell him what he should do.

The Host said, “That’s nobly said, and like my guest.”

Lovel said to Prudence, “I congratulate Your Honor, and I should cheerfully lay hold on any opportunity that could advance it. But for me to think that I can be any rag or particle of your lady’s care, more than to fill her list — she being the lady who professes always to love no soul or body but for ends that are her entertainments, and is not reluctant to speak this but does proclaim it in all companies — her Ladyship must pardon my weak counsels, and my weaker will, if it declines to obey her.”

Lovel was saying that Lady Frampul simply needed him to fill the lists; for example, to be the fourth player in a game of cards that required four people. He was saying that was the only reason she wanted him to participate in her games.

Prudence replied, “Oh, Master Lovel, you must not give credit to all that ladies publicly profess or talk at random and without prudent consideration to their servants. Their tongues and thoughts often lie far asunder.

“Yet, when they please, they have their cabinet-counsels — private counsels — and reserved thoughts, and can remove themselves to a private place as well as others.”

In other words, not all of what women say publicly can be believed; however, women do have private conversations in which they reveal real and private thoughts.

“Aye, the subtlest of us!” the Host said. “All that is born within a lady’s lips —”

Prudence finished the sentence for him, “— is not the issue of their hearts, my Host. It does not necessarily come from their hearts.”

The Host said, “Either kiss or drink before me.”

This idiom meant: You have taken the words out of my mouth.

Possibly, the idiom also meant: You spoke before me and in my presence; now kiss or drink in my presence.

The Host tried to kiss her.

Prudence said to the Host, “Wait, excuse me; my errand is not done.”

She said to Lovel, “Yet, if Her Ladyship’s slighting or disesteem, sir, of your service has formerly begot any offence that I do not know of, here I vow to you upon a chambermaid’s simplicity, preserving always the honor of my Lady, that I will be bold to hold the mirror up to her to show Her Ladyship where she has erred and how to tender satisfaction, provided that you grant that you will undergo the day’s venture.”

As the Lady Frampul’s intimate confidant, Prudence could criticize the Lady Frampul.

The Host said to Lovel, who was silent a long time because he was thinking, “What do you say, sir? Where are you? Are you within?”

The Host thumped Lovel on the chest to make him alert again.

Lovel made his mind up and said, “Yes, I will wait upon her and the company.”

“It is enough, Queen Prudence,” the Host said. “I will bring him, and I swear on this kiss.”

He kissed Prudence, and then she exited.

“I have longed to kiss a Queen!” the Host said.

“There is no life on earth except being in love!” Lovel said. “There are no studies, no delights, no business, no intercourse, or trade — method — of sense or soul, except what is love!

“I was the laziest creature, the most unprofitable sign of nothing, the veriest and greatest drone, and slept away my life more than the dormouse until I was in love!”

Drones are literally male honeybees whose job is to impregnate the Queen bee, while other bees do the work of gathering the honey and maintaining the nest. Figuratively, a drone is a person who lives off the work of others.

Dormice spend much of their lives sleeping.

Lovel continued, “And, now, I can outwake the nightingale, outwatch an usurer and outwalk him, too, stalk like a ghost that haunts near a treasure, and all that fancied treasure, it is love!”

Usurers kept a close watch on their creditors, and when necessary they pursued them relentlessly.

The Host asked, “But is your name Love-ill, sir, or Love-well? I would like to know that.”

“I do not know myself which of the two it is,” Lovel said. “But it is love that has been the hereditary passion of our family, my gentle Host, and, as I guess, my friend.

“The truth is, I have loved this lady long and ineffectively, with desire enough but with no success; for I have always forborne to express it in my person to her.”

“How did you express your love to her then?” the Host asked.

Lovel answered, “I have sent her toys (trifles of rhymes or prose, or small gifts), verses, and anagrams, samples of wit, mere trifles she has commended, but she didn't know from where or whom they came, nor could she guess."

These anagrams were acrostic poems in which each line begins with a letter of the name of a loved one.

"This was a pretty riddling way of wooing!" the Host said.

True.

"I often have been, too, in her company," Lovel said, "and I have looked at her a whole day, admired her; loved her and did not tell her so, loved always, looked always and loved, and loved and looked and sighed. But, as a neglected man, I came off the field and retired from the encounter, and unregarded —"

"Could you blame her, sir," the Host said, "when you were silent and said not a word?"

"Oh, but I loved the more," Lovel said, "and she might read it best in my silence, had she been —"

The Host finished the sentence, "— as melancholic as you are."

He added, "Please tell me, why would you stand mute, sir?"

Lovel answered, "Oh, thereon hangs a history, my Host.

"Have you ever known, or heard, of Lord Beaufort, who served so bravely in France? I was his page and, before he died, his friend. I followed him, first in the wars; and then in the times of peace I waited on his studies, which were right.

"He had no King Arthurs, no Rosicleers, no Knights of the Sun, no Amadis de Gauls, no Primalions, and no Pantagruels, all of which are public nothings. He had no abortives of the fabulous, dark cloister, sent out to poison courts and attack manners."

All of the above names were names of characters in chivalric romances. Lovel (and Ben Jonson) regarded them as “public nothings.” The “abortives of the fabulous, dark cloister” were romances copied by monks.

Lovel continued, “But he did have the acts of great Achilles, Agamemnon’s acts, sage Nestor’s counsels, and Ulysses’ sleights, Tydides’ fortitude, as Homer wrought them in his immortal imagination, to serve as examples of the heroic virtue.”

The Lord Beaufort did have the good taste to revere the Iliad and Odyssey of Homer. One of the characters in the Iliad was Tydides: the Greek warrior Diomedes, the son of Tydeus.

Achilles, a Greek, was the greatest warrior of the Trojan War. Agamemnon was the leader of the Greeks against the Trojans. Nestor was an aged advisor to Agamemnon. Ulysses was the trickiest of the Greeks; he came up with the idea of the Trojan Horse. Diomedes was an important Greek warrior, and he was the youngest of the Greek kings fighting the Trojans.

Lovel continued, “And, as Virgil, that master of the epic poem, limned — described — Pious Aeneas, his religious prince, bearing his aged parent on his shoulders, carried him from the flames of Troy with his young son, and these Lord Beaufort brought to imitate and to use as examples.”

In Virgil’s Aeneid, Aeneas flees the sack of Troy while carrying his aged father on his shoulders and leading his young son by the hand. Aeneas was pious (in Latin, pius), which means he gave respect where respect was due, including to his gods, his city, and his family.

Lord Beaufort’s library was select: He had chosen the best examples of the heroic virtue from the works of the ancient epic poets.

Lovel continued, “Lord Beaufort gave me first my breeding, I acknowledge, and then he showered his bounties on me, like the Hours who open-handed sit upon the clouds and press the liberality of heaven down to the laps of thankful men.”

The Hours are goddesses who preside over seasonal changes: from spring to summer, from summer to autumn, etc.

Lovel continued, “But then the trust committed to me at his death was above all, and left so strong a tie on all my powers as time shall not dissolve it, until time dissolve and loosen itself, and bury all!

“The trust he gave to me was the care of his brave heir, and only son! Who being a virtuous, sweet, young, promising lord has cast his first affections on this lady.”

Lord Beaufort’s brave heir, now that Lord Beaufort had died, was now himself Lord Beaufort.

Lovel continued, “And although I know and may presume her such as out of her disposition will return no love, and therefore might without prejudice be made the courting-stock — object of courtship — for all to practice on” — a whipping-stock is a source of pain; for many people, a courting-stock is also a source of pain — “as she practices her scorn on all of us, yet, out of a religion — a scruple of conscience — to my charge and out of a professed debt to his father, I have made a self-decree never to reveal my personal feelings, although my passion burns me to cinders.”

The Host said, “Then you’re not so subtle or half so read in love-craft as I took you. Come, come, you are no phoenix; if you were, I would expect no miracle from your ashes.”

The Phoenix was a mythological bird that when old burned itself to ashes and then miraculously arose as a young bird.

The Host continued, "Take some advice; be always that rag of love you are. Burn on until you turn tinder."

Tinder was sometimes made of partially charred rags.

The Host continued, "This chambermaid may happen to prove the steel to strike a spark out of the flint, your mistress, who may yet beget bonfires. You do not know what light may be forced out and from what darkness."

"No," Lovel said. "I am so resolved that I will love still and always although I will not confess that I love."

"That's, sir, as it chances," the Host said. "We'll throw the dice for it. Cheer up!"

"I do," Lovel said.

ACT 2 (The New Inn, or The Light Heart)

— 2.1 —

Lady Frampul and Prudence, her chambermaid, talked together as Prudence pinned one of Lady Frampul's gowns on herself. Prudence was being dressed very well for a purpose that Lady Frampul had in mind: Prudence was going to be the Queen of the Festivities that Lady Frampul would hold at the Light Heart Inn.

"Come, wench, this dress will serve," Lady Frampul said. "Dispatch, make ready. This dress was a great deal too big for me, which made me stop wearing it after wearing it only once."

The dress was made by her tailor.

In this society, the word "wench" could be used affectionately. Its use was not necessarily derogatory.

She then asked, "How does it fit? Will the ends of the corset come together?"

Prudence, who had a much fuller figure than Lady Frampul, struggled with the gown to bring the ends of the corset together and said, "With difficulty."

"You must make do with it," Lady Frampul said. "Pride feels no pain. Girt thee hard, Pru — pull hard on the lacings. Pox on this errant tailor! He angers me beyond all limit of patience. These base people who work with their hands never keep their word in anything they promise."

Prudence replied, "It is their trade, madam, to swear and break — to swear their word and then break it. They all grow rich by breaking more than their words; their honesties and credits are always the first commodity they put off."

She was saying that tailors often break their word, and they often make money through dishonest means. Often, they break their word when they promise that a dress will be delivered by a certain date.

“And their credit grows worse and then worst, it seems, which makes them do it so often,” Lady Frampul said.

Although the tailors’ breaking their promises and doing dishonest actions might make them money in the short term, word soon got out about them and they ended up making less money in the long term, and so they had to double down on breaking their promises and doing dishonest actions.

Lady Frampul added, “If he had broken his promise with only me, I would have not cared, but with the company, the body politic —”

The body politic was her entourage at the Light Heart Inn. The tailor’s breaking his promise affected her entourage. The dress had been intended for Prudence, who would be Queen of the Festivities and would rule over the entourage.

Prudence interrupted Lady Frampul’s sentence, “— the tailor frustrates our whole design, having that time, and the materials in so long before!”

The tailor had all the materials and all the time he needed to make the dress and deliver it on time to Lady Frampul.

“And he to fail in all and disappoint us!” Lady Frampul said.

They were disappointed and dis-appointed. The word “appoint” means “accoutre” — impressively clothe.

Lady Frampul continued, “The rogue deserves a torture —”

Prudence suggested, “He should be cropped with his own scissors —”

She meant that the tailor's ears should be shortened and cut off with his own scissors.

"Let's devise a torture for him," Lady Frampul said.

Prudence continued, "— and have the stumps seared up with his own cering candle!"

"To cere" means "to cover with wax" or "to wrap in a cerecloth." A cerecloth is a shroud. Tailors used cering candles to waterproof garments. Of course, Prudence was punning on "searing."

Lady Frampul suggested, "Crop his ears close to his head, so his head will roll on his pillow! I'll have the lease of his house cut out to form measuring tapes."

Prudence asked, "And shall we strangle the tailor with them?"

Lady Frampul replied, "No, I would have no life touched, but he should be a little stretched on his own yard — his own measuring rod."

The rack was an instrument of torture in which the victim was stretched. The victim's arms were pulled in one direction, and the victim's legs were pulled in the opposite direction. The use of a measuring rod as a rack was a comic image because most measuring rods — yard sticks — used by tailors were too short to be used that way. Lady Frampul's tailor, however, was very short.

She added, "He should have the strappado."

The strappado was a torture in which the victim's hands were tied behind his back and he was lifted high with a pulley. He was then dropped partway down and his fall was suddenly stopped so his arms would be pulled out of their sockets.

Prudence suggested, “Or have an ell — 45 inches — of taffeta drawn through his guts by way of an enema and set on fire with aqua-vitae?”

Aqua-vitae was alcohol or brandy, which would soak the taffeta and then be set on fire.

Lady Frampul said, “Burning in the hand with the pressing iron cannot save him.”

An alternative to the death punishment was being branded on the hand. People who could read Latin were sometimes given this punishment instead of being executed. Avoiding death by being able to read Latin was known as benefit of clergy.

“Yes,” Prudence said. But she finished putting on the dress and said, “Now that I have finally gotten this dress on, I do forgive him for what robes he should have brought but did not.”

“You are not cruel, although you are strait-laced I see, Pru!” Lady Frampul said.

She was punning on cruel (severe) and crewel (a cheaper material for people who could not afford silk). She was also punning on “strait-laced” as meaning 1) tightly laced, and 2) strict in morality.

“This dress is well,” Prudence said.

“It is rich enough, but it is not what I meant you to have,” Lady Frampul said. “I would have had you braver — more splendidly dressed — than myself, and far brighter. It will fit the players yet, when you have done with it, and yield you somewhat.”

When Prudence was finished with the dress, she could sell it to actors, who would use it as a costume.

“Madam, it would be ill-bred and absolutely sordid and mercenary of me to allow a suit of clothing of yours to end up there,” Prudence said.

“Tut, all of us are players and but serve the scene,” Lady Frampul said. “Pru, dispatch. Finish your dressing. I fear you do not like the duty I have for you to perform because you are so long fitting yourself for it.”

She handed Prudence a scarf and said, “Here is a scarf to make you a finer knot.”

A knot is an ornamental bow.

“You send me a feast of clothing, madam,” Prudence said.

“Wear it, wench,” Lady Frampul said.

“Yes, I will,” Prudence said, “but with the permission of Your Ladyship, I would tell you that this can but bear the face of — look like — an odd journey.”

“Why, Pru?” Lady Frampul asked.

Prudence answered, “A lady of your rank and quality has come to a public inn, with so many men, young lords, and others in your company, and not a woman with you but myself, a chambermaid!”

Such an action can cause serious gossip.

“You fear that you will be over-laid, Pru?” Lady Frampul said. “Don’t worry; I’ll bear my part and share with you in the adventure.”

“To be over-laid” means 1) “to be over-laden, aka over-burdened,” and 2) “to be overly having sexual intercourse.”

Another pun is “bear my part,” which means “play my role,” and “bare my part,” which means “bare my genitalia.”

“Oh, but the censure and the gossip, madam, is the main concern,” Prudence said. “What will they say of you, or judge of me, who is transformed with quality clothing like this, above all the bound of fitness or decorum?”

Many people in this society regarded dressing above one’s station in life as a sin. In some cases, it was a crime.

“What, Pru!” Lady Frampul said. “Have you turned into a fool upon the sudden, and now talk idly in your best clothes? Do you shoot bolts and sentences — maxims — to frighten babies with?”

“Bolts” are arrows. A proverb stated, “A fool’s bolt is soon shot.” Anyone who shoots all the arrows in a quiver leaves him- or herself open to attack. A bolt is also a roll of fabric.

Lady Frampul continued, “As if I lived to any other degree or level than what’s my own, or sought myself, outside myself, away from my home, my natural place!”

“Your Ladyship, please pardon me for my fault,” Prudence said. “If I have over-shot, I’ll shoot no more.”

“Yes, do shoot again, good Pru,” Lady Frampul said. “I’ll have you shoot, and aim and hit; I know that what you say shows the love that is in you, and so I do interpret it.”

“Then, madam, I’d crave a farther leave,” Prudence said.

She wanted to make a request.

“Be it to license, it shall not lack an ear, Pru,” Lady Frampul said.

This meant, “Even if you want permission to live free and without restraints and licentiously, I will listen to what you say.”

Lady Frampul continued, “Tell me, what is it?”

“I have in mind a toy — a piece of fun — to raise a little mirth to the design you have in hand,” Prudence said.

“Out with it, Pru, if it will chime of mirth,” Lady Frampul said. “If it results in mirth, I am for it.”

Prudence said, “My Host has, madam, a pretty boy in the house: a dainty, delicate child, who is his son, and who is of Your Ladyship’s name, too. His name is Francis. This boy, if Your Ladyship would borrow him and give me permission to dress him as I would, should make the finest lady and kinswoman to keep you company, and deceive my lords upon the matter. This will be a fountain — a gushing source — of sport and entertainment.”

One of the lords in the inn might even be attracted to the boy, thinking him to be a lady.

“I understand you, and I understand the source of mirth that it may breed,” Lady Frampul said, “but is the child bold enough, and well assured?”

“He is as bold and well assured as I am, madam,” Prudence said. “Hold him in no more suspicion than you hold me.”

The Host entered the room.

Prudence said, “Here comes my Host. Will it please you to ask him for the loan of his son, or will you let me make the proposal?”

“You make the proposal, Pru,” Lady Frampul said.

— 2.2 —

“Your Ladyship and all your retinue of attendants are welcome,” the Host said.

“I thank my hearty Host,” Lady Frampul said.

“Your sovereignty is also welcome here,” the Host said, referring to Prudence.

He added, “Madam, I wish you joy in the possession of your new gown.”

“I should have had a new gown, my Host,” Lady Frampul said, “but Stuff, our tailor, has broken his word with us; you shall be of the counsel — you shall know the details.”

“He will deserve to hear such confidences, madam,” Prudence said to Lady Frampul.

She then said, “My lady has heard that you have a pretty son, my Host; she’d like to see him.”

“Aye, I am very eager to see him,” Lady Frampul said. “I ask you to please let me see him.”

“Your Ladyship shall see him immediately,” the Host said.

He called, “Ho!”

Pierce Anon, one of the Host’s employees, replied, “Anon!”

“Tell Frank to come here, Anon, to my lady,” the Host said.

Pierce the bartender was called “Anon,” aka “Quickly.” Pierce Anon, like many tapsters, aka bartenders, used that word often when serving customers.

The Host then said to Lady Frampul about his son, “He is a bashful child, unpretentiously brought up in a rude, devoid-of-culture hostelry. But the Light Heart Inn — it is his father’s, and it may become his.

Frank, the Host’s son, entered the room.

“Here he comes,” the Host said.

He then said, “Frank, salute and greet my lady.”

Frank said to Lady Frampul, “Madam, I do what I am designed to by my birthright as heir of the Light Heart Inn: I bid you most welcome.”

“And I believe your ‘most,’ my pretty boy,” Lady Frampul said, “being so emphasized by you.”

Frank said, “If you believe my ‘most welcome’ to be true, Your Ladyship is sure to make it most welcome.”

“Prettily answered!” Lady Frampul said. “Is your name Francis?”

“Yes,” Frank said.

Lady Frampul, whose first name was Frances, responded, “I love my own name all the better.”

“If I knew your name, I should make haste to do so, too, good madam,” Frank said.

“My name is the same name as yours,” Lady Frances Frampul said.

Frank said, “My name then acknowledges the luster it receives by being named after you.”

“You will excel me in compliment, and you will gain influence over me with flattery,” Lady Frampul replied.

“By silence,” Francis said.

He would not admit to excelling over her, and he would not admit to flattering her.

“A modest and a fair well-spoken child,” Lady Frampul said.

The Host said, “Her Ladyship shall have him, sovereign Pru, and whatever else I have besides; divide my heart and Heart — my heart and my Light Heart Inn — between you and your lady. Make your use of it. My house is yours, and my son is yours. Behold, I tender him to your service.”

The Host then said to his son, “Frank, become what these brave ladies would have you become.”

Somehow, the Host knew already that these ladies wanted to dress his son up as a lady. He may have been eavesdropping at the door. That would explain how he knew that Prudence was now Lady Frampul’s “sovereign.” (Earlier, when he had kissed Prudence, he said that he had always wished to kiss a queen.) Good hosts and good servants often know more about the people they serve than those people think they know.

The Host then said to Lady Frampul, “Only remember this: There is a charwoman in the house, and she is Frank’s nurse.”

A nurse’s job was to take care of children.

The Host continued, “She is an Irish woman I took in who was a beggar, and she waits upon him. She is a poor defenseless simpleton, but she is as insolent, meddlesome, persistent, and stubborn as ever one was. She will vex you on all occasions, never be off, or away from you, except in her sleep, or in her drink, which makes her sleep. She does so much love him, or rather she dotes on him.

“Now, we need for the Nurse a shape — a stage costume or disguise — in which we may dress her. I’ll help provide the clothing. We need to outfit her with a rich taffeta cloak, an old French hood, and other pieces heterogeneous enough to go with these items.”

Prudence said, “We have brought a suit of apparel down because this tailor failed us in the main.”

The extra suit of apparel would be for the Nurse. She needed to be better dressed because she was now playing the role of the servant to a lady.

The Host said, “She — the Nurse — shall advance the game.”

“Set about it, then, and send Trundle, the coachman, here to me,” Prudence said.

“I shall,” the Host said.

He then whispered to Prudence, “But Pru, let Lovel have fair treatment.”

“He shall have the best,” Prudence replied.

“Our Host, I think, is very playful!” Lady Frampul said.

Prudence asked her, “How do you like the boy?”

“He is a miracle!” Lady Frampul answered.

“Good madam, take him in and select a suit of clothing for him,” Prudence said. “I’ll give our Trundle his instructions, and wait upon Your Ladyship in the instant.”

“But, Pru, what shall we call him when we have dressed him?” Lady Frampul asked.

“Call him My Lady Nobody, or anything else — whatever you want to call him,” Prudence answered.

“We’ll call him by my sister’s name, Laetitia,” Lady Frampul said, “and so it will contribute to our mirth, too, that we have in hand.”

In Latin, “Laetitia” means “Gladness.” The name would remind them of the mirth they had in mind.

Lady Frampul and Frank exited from the room as Trundle the coachman entered it.

Prudence said, “Good Trundle, you must immediately make ready the coach and lead the horses out just half a mile into the fields, wherever you will, and then drive in again, with the coach-window blinds put down so no one can see in. Go to the back gate and so on to the backstairs, as if you brought in somebody to my lady — a kinswoman whom she sent for.

“Make that your answer if you are asked, and spread that gossip in the house.”

Trundle replied, “What trick is this, good Mistress Secretary, that you’d put upon us?”

“Us?” Prudence said. “Do you speak plural?”

She was asking if he, a coachman, was using the majestic plural.

Trundle had meant by “us” himself and the people in the house, but he replied, “Me and my mares are ‘us.’”

“If you so join them, elegant Trundle,” Prudence said, “you may use your figures of speech.”

She was punning. The word “join” can mean 1) “harness together,” and 2) “construe.”

Prudence continued, “I can but tell you plainly that it is my lady’s service.”

“Good Mistress Prudence, you can speak plainly enough,” Trundle said. “I know you are secretary to my lady, and I know that you are Mistress Steward.”

A steward takes care of the finances of a household — the steward does not do the cleaning and other work, but the steward hires (and fires) and pays the people who clean and who do other work. The steward also oversees their work and judges its quality.

Prudence said, “You’ll still be trundling, and have your wages stopped now at the audit.”

“Trundling” means going on. Prudence meant that Trundle would be still be talking and not working. As Mistress Steward, Prudence would be his boss. She was saying that if she wanted, she could hold an audit — an examination — of expenses, and she could fire him.

Trundle said, “It is true, for you are Gentlewoman of the Horse, too. Or whatever else you want to be, besides, Pru.”

The Gentleman of the Horse is in charge of the horses. As a carriage driver, Trundle would work for the Gentlewoman of the Horse as well as for Mistress Steward. Of course, Prudence would hold both jobs.

Trundle continued, “I think it is in my best interest to obey you.”

Prudence replied, “And I think so, too, Trundle.”

They exited.

— 2.4 —

Lord Beaufort and Lord Latimer talked together. They were a pair of young lords, servants and guests to the Lady Frampul.

Lord Beaufort said, “Why, here’s return enough of both our ventures, even if we make no more exploration.”

“Ventures” can mean 1) financial undertakings, or 2) adventures. They had been spending money to travel in search of interesting people and sights.

“What, than of this parasite?” Lord Latimer asked.

“Oh, he’s a dainty one,” Lord Beaufort said. “The parasite of the house.”

They were talking about a man named Fly. A parasite is a person who lives on the work of other people.

The Host entered the room.

Lord Latimer said to Lord Beaufort, “Here comes my Host.”

“My lords, you both are welcome to the Heart,” the Host said.

“To the Light Heart, we hope,” Lord Beaufort said.

“And the merry Heart, I swear,” Lord Latimer said. “We never yet felt such a fit of laughter as your glad Heart has offered us since we entered.”

“How did you come by this property?” Lord Beaufort asked the Host.

By “property,” he did not mean the Light Heart Inn, but the parasite within it. A property is a tool. Fly lived off the work of the Host, but he did help out in some ways.

“Who?” the Host asked. “My Fly?”

“Your Fly, if you call him that,” Lord Beaufort said.

“Nay, he is that,” the Host said. “And he will always be that.”

Fly would continue to be a parasite; he would continue to be a fly.

“In every dish and pot?” Lord Beaufort asked.

“In every cup and company, my lords,” the Host answered. “He is a creature of all liquors, all complexions. Be the drink what it will, he’ll have his sip.”

Fly was a drinker as well as a parasite.

“He’s fitted with a name,” Lord Latimer said.

“And he takes joy in it,” the Host said. “I had him, when I came to take the inn here, assigned to me over in the inventory as an old implement, a piece of furniture, and so he does remain.”

The Host was saying that when he acquired the inn, Fly came with it.

Lord Beaufort said, “We thought he was just such a thing.”

“Is he a scholar?” Lord Latimer asked.

“Nothing can be less a scholar,” the Host said. “But he colors for it: He attempts to act the part. As you can see, he wears a scholar’s black clothing, and he speaks a little tainted, fly-blown Latin after the Schoolmen.”

The Schoolmen were medieval theologians and philosophers.

Lord Beaufort said, “He speaks the Latin of Stratford of the Bow, for Lily’s Latin is to him unknown.”

William Lily was the author of a well-respected Latin grammar.

“What calling has he?” Lord Latimer asked.

The Host replied, “Only to call in, inflame the reckoning, be bold to charge a bill, and to bring up the shot in the rear, as his own word is.”

The Host was punning and using words and phrases that had both a military meaning and an inn-employee meaning.

“To call in” means 1) “to call soldiers to withdraw,” and 2) “to shout out an order.”

“To inflame” means 1) “to set [e.g., a town] on fire” and “to [unethically] increase” a customer’s bill.

“To charge a bill” means 1) “to charge a bill-man” (a bill is a kind of weapon), and 2) “to charge a customer’s bill.”

“To bring up the shot in the rear” means “to bring up in the rear the soldiers armed with firearms,” and 2) “to bring up an account in a rear room,” or possibly, “to bring up an account in arrears.”

Lord Beaufort asked, “And he does it in the discipline of the house, as corporal of the field, maestro del campo?”

A corporal of the field is a superior officer.

A maestro del campo is a quartermaster, but “campo” was a slang word for “privy.”

Lord Beaufort was saying that in a way, Fly was a superior officer: He was the quartermaster of the chamber pots. (Actually, a servant named Jordan took care of those, but Fly had a superior position to that of Jordan.) In military terms, a quartermaster is in charge of the pitching and maintaining of an army camp.

The Host said, “Yes, and he is the visitor-general of all the rooms. He has formed a fine militia for the inn, too.”

A visitor-general is an inspector.

The “militia” was the other employees of the inn.

“And he means to bring it to public notice?” Lord Beaufort asked.

The Host replied, “Yes, along with all his other titles. Some call him Deacon Fly, some call him Doctor Fly, some call him Captain Fly, and some call him Lieutenant Fly; but my folks call him Quartermaster Fly, which he is.”

Tiptoe and Fly entered the room. Tiptoe was a braggart knight and colonel who bore himself proudly, and Fly, as we have just learned, was a parasite.

They did not see the Host, Lord Beaufort, and Lord Latimer, who were off to the side.

Tiptoe said, “Come, Quartermaster Fly.”

The Host said quietly to Lord Beaufort and Lord Latimer, “Here’s one who has already gotten his titles.”

Tiptoe was a knight: Sir Glorious Tiptoe.

“Doctor!” Tiptoe said to Fly.

“Noble colonel!” Fly said to Tiptoe.

He then said, “I am no doctor, but yet I am a poor professor of ceremony here in the inn, and I am a retainer to the Host. I discipline the house.”

“Poor” can mean 1) impoverished, and 2) of low quality.

“Retainer” can mean “parasite.”

Tiptoe said, “You read — give — a lecture to the family here; when is the day?”

“This is the day,” Fly said.

He and Tiptoe would discuss such topics as fencing on this day.

“I’ll hear you, and I’ll regard you as a doctor,” Tiptoe said. “You shall be one — you have a doctor’s look! You have a disputative face, as if you were of Salamanca.”

Salamanca had a famous university: The University of Salamanca was the oldest university in Spain.

Because he did not know who Tiptoe was, the Host asked Lord Beaufort and Lord Latimer, “Who’s this?”

“He is the glorious Colonel Tiptoe, Host,” Lord Latimer said.

“He is one who talks upon his tiptoes, if you’ll hear him,” Lord Beaufort said.

“To walk upon tiptoes” means “to bear oneself with pride.”

Tiptoe said, “You have good learning in you, macte Fly.”

Macte is Latin for “honored.”

Fly responded, “And I say macte to my colonel.”

Tiptoe and Fly were members of a mutual admiration society.

The Host said quietly to Lord Beaufort and Lord Latimer, “Well macte-d of them both.”

“They are matched, truly,” Lord Beaufort said.

They were well matched as fools. Well, at least Tiptoe was a fool. Fly sometimes pretended to be a fool.

Tiptoe asked, “But, Fly, why macte?”

Fly answered, “Quasi magis aucte, my honorable colonel.”

In other words, Fly was saying, “I say macte as if macte, aka m acte, meant magis aucte, aka ‘more great.’”

Quasi magis aucte means “as it were, more great (that is, greater).”

Auctus, actua, auctum is a Latin adjective meaning “large, abundant, ample, enriched, enlarged.” Fly had used aucte to go with macte. The -e ending of aucte is used to indicate the masculine vocative.

Tiptoe said, “What, are you a critic?”

The Host said to himself, “There’s another title to your profession, Critic Fly.”

It was another title for Fly to use to refer to himself.

Lord Latimer said, “I fear a taint here in the mathematics. They say parallel lines never meet, but he has met his parallel in wit and school craft.”

Lord Latimer meant that Fly had met his parallel — Tiptoe — in wit (intelligence) and school craft (education). They were alike in lack of intellect.

Lord Beaufort said, “They run side by side, not meet, man; mend your metaphor, and save the credit of your mathematics.”

If Fly and Tiptoe were equals, they ran side by side without colliding. They did not meet.

“But, Fly, how did you come to be here, imprisoned in this inn?” Tiptoe asked.

“Upon suspicion of drink, sir,” Fly answered, “I was taken late one night, here, with the tapster and the under-officers, and so deposited here.”

“I will redeem you, Fly, and get you a better place,” Tiptoe said. “I will get you a job with a fair lady.”

“A lady, sweet Sir Glorious?” Fly said.

“A sovereign lady,” Sir Glorious Tiptoe answered. “You shall be the bird to sovereign Pru, Queen of our sports. You shall be her Fly, the Fly in household, and in ordinary; you shall be the bird of her ear, and she shall wear you there! You shall be a Fly of gold, enameled like a brooch, and a school-Fly.”

Fly would be Prudence's bird, or confidant. "A bird of one's own brain" meant "a secret." Fly would know Prudence's secrets.

An ordinary is an inn, and "in ordinary" meant "a member of the regular staff."

A school-Fly is Fly as a student.

The Host said quietly to Lord Latimer and Lord Beaufort, "The schools, then, are my stables or the cellar, where Fly studies deeply, at his hours, cases of cups — I do not know how spiced with conscience."

The word "case" means "pair," and the phrase "cases of conscience" means "cases that concern morality."

The Host continued, "I do not know how spiced with conscience for the tapster and the ostler. As whose horses may be cozened with buttered hay, or what jugs filled up with froth? That is his way of learning."

Horses will not eat buttered hay. A dishonest ostler could give buttered hay to horses, and sell the same buttered hay over and over.

One way for a tapster to cheat customers was to serve them more froth than beer.

These were the tricks that Fly was learning at "school."

The Host had spoken loudly enough to be noticed by Tiptoe, who asked Fly, "What antiquated feather's that, who talks?"

"A man of the first feather" was a showy man — a show-off.

The Host was wearing a velvet hat with a large feather as a decoration.

Fly replied, “He is the worshipful Host: my patron. His name is Master Goodstock, and he is a merry Greek and cants in comely Latin, and spins like the parish top.”

Every village had a large top that served as entertainment during cold weather when peasants could not work. Whipping the top kept them warm — and out of mischief.

A story-teller can spin tales.

A merry Greek is a roisterer.

“I’ll set him up like a top, then,” Tiptoe said.

He asked the Host, “Are you the dominus? Are you the master?”

“I am the factotum here, sir,” the Host said.

A factotum is someone who does many kinds of work — or all the work.

Tiptoe asked, “Are you the Host real — royal — of the house, and the cap of maintenance?”

A cap of maintenance is a symbol of authority.

The Host answered, “I am the lord of the Light Heart, sir, cap-à-pie — from head to toe — whereof the feather is the emblem, colonel, put up with the ace of hearts!”

The Host’s rebus for the Light Heart Inn included a feather.

In other words: I am the best card in a pack of playing cards.

“But why are you in cuervo?” Tiptoe asked. “I hate to see a host, and someone who is old, in cuervo.”

“Cuervo?” the Host said. “What’s that?”

Cuervo means “without a cloak.”

Tiptoe said, “It’s wearing light, skipping hose and doublet — the horse-boy’s garb!”

“Skipping” is an insulting word meaning “slight” or “vain.” A doublet is a jacket.

Tiptoe believed that the Host ought to be better dressed than he was.

He continued, “Poor white and parti-colored cuervo — they don’t partake of the gravity of a host, who should be king-at-arms — the chief herald — and master of ceremonies in his own house. Hosts should know all to the goldweights. They should know the exact amount that can be charged.”

Lord Beaufort said, “Why, that his Fly does for him here, your bird.”

Fly knew how much he could overcharge the Host’s guests.

“But I would do it myself, if I were my Host,” Tiptoe said. “I would not speak to a cook of quality, your Lordship’s footman, or my lady’s Trundle, in cuervo! If a dog but stayed below the second floor and required service, that would be a dog of fashion, and well-nosed.”

A dog can be 1) an animal, or 2) a gallant.

“Well-nosed” can mean 1) keen-scented, or 2) of distinguished appearance.

Tiptoe then talked about how he would dress as a Host serving customers:

“If such a dog could present himself, I would put on the Savoy chain about my neck, the ruff and cuffs of Flanders, then the Naples hat, with the Rome hatband, and the Florentine agate, the Milan sword, the cloak of Genoa set with Brabant buttons, all my given pieces — except my gloves, the natives of Madrid — to entertain him in.”

Tiptoe's fashion sense was international.

Tiptoe continued, "And I would compliment a tame coney as I would a prince who sent it!"

That is, he would compliment a tame, timid person serving as the prince's messenger the same way that he would compliment a prince: To both he would behave courteously.

One meaning of "a coney" is a rabbit, which is known as a timid creature.

The Host said, "The same deeds, though, do not become every man. What is suitable for a colonel will not be suitable for a host."

Tiptoe said, "A Spanish host is never seen in cuero; he is never seen without his paramentos, cloak, and sword."

Paramentos are ornaments.

Fly said to Tiptoe, "Sir, he has the father of swords within. It is a two-handed longsword, with a Cornish blade, styled of Sir Rud Hudibras."

Sir Rud Hudibras was the son of a mythical king. At this time, a two-handed longsword was old-fashioned.

"And why a longsword, bully bird?" Tiptoe said. "What is your reason?"

In this society, the word "bully" was a positive word meaning "jolly."

Fly said, "To note him as a tall — valiant — man and a master of fence."

"But does he teach the Spanish way of Don Luis?" Tiptoe asked.

Don Luis was a Spanish fencer.

Fly replied, “No, he teaches the Greek master, he does.”

Actually, the two systems of fencing were identical: They were the same system. Fly’s words revealed his ignorance because Fly thought that Euclid was a Greek master of fencing. Actually, Euclid was an ancient Greek mathematician known for geometry. The Euclidean system of fencing — which was the Spanish system of fencing — was so called because the fencers took up their stances and made movements with geometrical precision.

“What do you call him?” Tiptoe asked. “What’s the Greek master’s name?”

“Euclid,” Fly replied.

“Fart upon Euclid!” Tiptoe said. “He is stale and antique. Give me the moderns.”

“Sir, he minds no moderns,” Fly said.

He then quoted an expression of impatience that appeared in Thomas Kyd’s The Spanish Tragedy: “Go by, Hieronimo!”

“Who was Hieronimo?” Tiptoe asked.

Fly answered, “The Italian who fenced with Abbot Antony in the Blackfriars, and with Blinkinsops the bold.”

“Aye, by the Virgin Mary, those are the names of famous fencers,” Tiptoe said. “What has become of them?”

The Host answered, “They had their times, and we can say they were. So had Carranza his, so has Don Luis.”

Carranza wrote a treatise titled The Philosophy of Arms on the topic of fencing.

“Don Luis of Madrid is the sole master now of the world!” Tiptoe said.

The Host said, “But Euclid demonstrates mastery of this in the other world! He — he’s for all; he’s the only fencer of name now in Elysium.”

“He’s for all” meant that he was willing to face anyone in a fencing match.

As an ancient Greek, Euclid was long deceased, and so he was in Hades: the Land of the Dead. The place in Hades where good souls went was Elysium, aka the Elysian Fields.

Fly said, “Euclid does it all by lines and angles, colonel, by parallels and sections. He has his diagrams.”

“Will you be flying, Fly?” Lord Beaumont asked.

“He will be flying at all game,” Lord Latimer said. “And why not? The air’s as free for a fly as for an eagle.”

Lord Beaumont said quietly to Lord Latimer and the Host about Fly, “A buzzard he is in his contemplation and ‘deep’ thought!”

Buzzards were useless for hawking.

Incredulous, Tiptoe said, “Euclid is a fencer, and he is in the Elysium!”

The Host joked, “He fenced a prize-fight last week with Archimedes, and beat him, I assure you.”

By “assure,” he meant “promise.”

Archimedes was an ancient mathematician and inventor.

Tiptoe said, “Do you assure me? For what?”

The word “assure” can mean 1) promise, or 2) insure.

The Host deliberately misunderstood him to be willing to make a bet on who had won the fencing match.

“For four in the hundred — that is, four percent,” the Host joked. “Give me five, and I assure you again.”

Tiptoe said, “Peremptory — obstinate — Host, you may be taken — beaten — in the wager. But where, whence had you this information?”

“Upon the road,” the Host joked. “A post-messenger who came from thence — Elysium — three days ago, here, left the information with the tapster.”

Fly said, “The tapster is indeed a thoroughfare of news. He is Jack Jug with the great belly, a witty fellow!”

“Your bird here heard him,” the Host said.

Tiptoe asked Fly, “Did you hear him, bird?”

The Host said quietly to Fly, “Speak in the faith of a fly.”

The Host was telling Fly to go along with the joke.

The Host then exited.

“Yes,” Fly said, “and he told us about one who was the Prince of Orange’s fencer —”

“Stevinus?” Tiptoe asked.

The late Simon Stevinus was a mathematician and inventor, but he was not known for fencing.

Fly replied, “Sir, the same. He had challenged Euclid at thirty weapons, more than Archimedes ever saw, and he used machines mostly of his own invention.”

Normal fencing bouts lasted six rounds, not thirty; in each round, a different weapon was used.

“This may have credit and chimes — rings out — reason, this!” Tiptoe said.

He believed what he had heard about events in Elysium.

Tiptoe continued, “If any man endanger Euclid, bird, observe (he had the honor to quit Europe this forty year) that it is Stevinus. He put down Scaliger.”

“And Scaliger was a great master,” Fly said.

“Not of fencing, Fly,” Lord Beaufort said.

This was true. Scaliger was a master of Greek and Latin — he was a Greek and Latin scholar.

“Excuse Fly, lord,” Tiptoe said. “Scaliger went on the same grounds.”

Tiptoe was saying that Joseph Scaliger did a kind of fencing in his controversial discussions of mathematics.

Lord Beaufort said, “On the same earth, I think, as other mortals?”

“I mean, sweet lord, the mathematics,” Tiptoe said. “Basta!”

Basta! means “Enough!”

Tiptoe continued, “When you know more, you will take less green honor — you will be less naïve, and you will praise him more. He had his circles, semicircles, quadrants —”

Fly said, “He wrote a book on the quadrature of the circle.”

Tiptoe said, “Cyclometria, I read —”

The title was actually Cyclometrica Elementa.

As Tiptoe and Fly talked loudly together, Lord Beaufort and Lord Latimer talked quietly together.

Lord Beaufort said quietly to Lord Latimer, “He read the title only.”

Lord Latimer quietly replied, “And the indice.”

He meant the index or table of contents, or both.

Lord Beaufort said quietly, “If it had one, yes, but whether it had one, quaere — it is a question.”

Cyclometrica Elementa did have a table of contents.

He then said, “What insolent, half-witted things these two are!”

Lord Latimer said, “It is true that all smatterers and dabblers are insolent and impudent.”

Lord Beaufort said, “They lightly and commonly go together.”

True: Insolence and impudence go together.

Lord Latimer said, “It is my wonder that two animals should hawk at — fly at — all discourse thus. They fly every subject to the mark or retrieve —”

Tiptoe had attempted to discourse learnedly on many subjects, but he had failed in every attempt. Fly may have simply been leading Tiptoe on to make him reveal his foolishness.

A hawk would retrieve felled game when the hunters had hit their mark — the animal or bird they had aimed at.

Lord Beaufort quietly said, “And never have the luck to be in the right.”

Lord Latimer quietly said, “It is some folk’s fortune.”

Lord Beaufort said, “Fortune’s a bawd and a blind beggar; their fortune is their vanity, and it shows most vilely!”

Tiptoe said, “I could take the heart now to write to Don Luis in Spain, to ask him to make a progress — a journey — to the Elysian Fields next summer —”

Lord Beaumont said quietly, “And persuade him to die for the fame of fencing with a shadow!”

The way to journey to the Elysian Fields is to die. Shadows are ghosts in Hades: the Land of the Dead.

Lord Beaumont then said, “Where’s my Host? I wish he had heard this bubble break, indeed.”

— 2.6 —

The Host entered, accompanied by the richly dressed Prudence, the Nurse, Lady Frampul, and Frank, the Host’s son, who was dressed and disguised as a woman.

“Make way!” the Host said. “Stand by for the Queen Regent, gentlemen.”

Lady Frampul’s entertainment was going to start. Part of the entertainment was play-acting. Everyone was supposed to treat Prudence the chambermaid as if she were a queen. As Queen of the Festivities, Prudence could rule on petitions presented to her. For example, Tiptoe had said that he would get Fly a better job — a job working for Prudence. Others could present petitions concerning love.

Tiptoe said to Fly, “This is your queen who shall be, bird, our sovereign.”

“Transformed Prudence!” Lord Beaumont said.

He reached out to touch her.

Playing her role, Queen Prudence said, “My sweet lord, hands off. It is not now as when plain Prudence lived and handed Her Ladyship —”

Joking, the Host finished her sentence “— the chamber pot.”

Not amused, Queen Prudence said, “The looking-glass, my Host; lose your house metaphor and tavern jest! Play your role properly.”

They were acting. Prudence was pretending to be a Queen, and the others had to act as if she were a Queen. The Host was not playing his role when he made rude jokes about her.

Queen Prudence continued, “You have a negligent memory indeed; speak a host’s proper language. Here’s a young lord — Beaufort — who will make your rude joking a precedent, otherwise. He will copy you and make rude jokes.”

“Well acted, Pru!” Lord Latimer said.

“This is the first minute of her reign!” the Host said. “What will she do forty years from now? God bless her!”

Queen Elizabeth I had reigned for forty-four years.

Queen Prudence said to Lord Beaufort, “If you will kiss or compliment, my lord, behold a lady.”

She pointed to the disguised Frank and continued, “She is a stranger, and my lady’s kinswoman.”

Lord Beaufort said, “I do confess my rudeness that I had need to have my eye directed to this beauty.”

He seemed taken by the disguised Frank at first sight of him as a woman. Of course, he did not know that Frank was the Host’s son.

The disguised Frank said, “My beauty was so little that it needed a perspicil — a telescope.”

He was displaying modesty.

Lord Beaumont asked the disguised Frank, “Lady, what is your name?”

The disguised Frank answered, “My lord, my name is Laetitia.”

“Laetitia!” Lord Beaumont said. “That is a fair omen, and I take it as such!”

“Laetitia” is a fair omen because the name means “gladness.”

Lord Beaumont kissed the disguised Frank and said, “Let me have always such lettuce for my lips.”

A nickname for Laetitia is Lettice.

Lord Beaumont then asked, “But what is the name of your family, lady?”

“Sylly, sir,” the disguised Frank said.

Lord Beaumont asked, “You are my lady’s kinswoman?”

“My lady” is Lady Frampul.

“I am so honored to be,” the disguised Frank said.

The Host said quietly to Lady Frampul, “Already it takes! Your practical joke is working!”

Lady Frampul replied quietly to the Host, “Your son is an excellent fine boy.”

The Nurse said to the Host, “He is descended of a right good stock, sir.”

Of course, Frank was. He was the son of Goodstock, the Host.

Lord Beaufort quietly asked the Host, “Who’s this? An antiquary?”

Antiquaries study old things. Lord Beaufort was joking about the Nurse’s age.

The Host replied, “By the old-fashioned dress she wears, you’d swear she is an antiquity! She’s an old Welsh herald’s widow, and she’s a wild Irish born, sir.”

She was not from the English settlement at Ulster.

The Host continued, “And she’s a hybrid — a mongrel of Welsh by marriage and Irish by birth — who lives with this young lady — Laetitia — a mile off here, and studies Vincent against York.”

Augustine Vincent, herald of Windsor, and Ralph Brook, herald of York, were authors and rivals. Brook published a catalogue of nobility, and Vincent corrected his errors.

Lord Beaufort said, “She’ll conquer, if she reads Vincent.”

The Latin word vinco means “I conquer.”

He continued, “Let me study her.”

He closely observed the Nurse.

The Host said, “She’s perfect in most pedigrees, most descents.”

The Nurse had studied Vincent, and so knew much about nobility.

Lord Beaufort thought, She is a bawd, I hope, and knows how to blazon a coat.

Bawds were go-betweens who helped men and women to have sex.

Lord Beaufort wanted to sleep with “Laetitia.”

The Nurse knew how to blazon a coat: how to paint a heraldic device such as a coat of arms.

By “blazon [blaze on] a coat,” Lord Beaufort also meant “set on sexual fire a petticoat.”

The Host said, “And she judges all things with a single eye.”

The Nurse had a single eye; she was wearing an eye patch. “To judge with a single eye” is an idiom for “to judge fairly.”

The Host then said, “Fly, come here.”

He said quietly to Fly, “Do not reveal anything of what you see to your Colonel Toe, or Tip, here, but keep all secret, even if it stands in the way of your preferment and promotion. Seek social advancement off from the road — not in a direct manner — discretely, no flattery for it, no lick-foot and no servility, on pain of losing your proboscis, my lickerish Fly.”

Fly wanted to get what he could from Tiptoe; he wanted to be Tiptoe’s parasite, at least for a while. Doing favors for Tiptoe could get him in Tiptoe’s favor.

“Lickerish” can mean 1) “fond of good food,” and 2) “lustful.”

The Host was telling Fly not to reveal to Tiptoe the trick of dressing Frank as a woman. Doing so could get Fly fired from the inn. Flies fed from their proboscis. If Fly got fired, he could no longer eat at the inn.

Tiptoe had seen but not heard Fly and the Host conferring.

He asked Fly, “What does old velvet-head say?”

The velvet-head was the Host, who was wearing a velvet cap decorated with a feather.

Fly said, “He will present me himself, sir, if you will not.”

Fly was saying that either the Host or Tiptoe would present him to Queen Prudence. Fly wanted to be presented to Queen Prudence because his sponsor could ask her for some boon to benefit Fly, such as a better job.

Actually the Host had not said he would present Fly to Queen Prudence. Fly was hoping that Tiptoe would do the presenting.

Tiptoe said, “Who, he present? What? Whom? A host, a groom, divide the thanks with me? Share in my glories! Lay up — nonsense! I say no more.”

A “groom” is a servant.

“Lay up” meant “go and lie down” — it is an idiom for “nonsense.”

Tiptoe wanted to have the “honor” of presenting Fly to Queen Prudence by himself — no sharing the “honor” with the Host.

The Host said, “Then be silent, sir, and hear the sovereign: Queen Pru.”

Tiptoe was unwilling to be silent, especially when asked to be silent by someone whom he considered to be his inferior.

He said, “Ostlers to usurp upon my Sparta or province, as they say? No broom but mine! I am the only one to sweep away a challenge!”

Sparta was located in Laconia. The Spartans were ferocious warriors on land.

The word spartos means “broom.”

The Host said to Tiptoe, “Still, colonel, you mutter!”

Tiptoe said, “I dare to speak out, just as one in cuervo can speak out.”

Tiptoe believed that he could speak out just as much as the Host could speak out, but the Host wanted to hear Queen Prudence speak.

Fly began, “Noble colonel —”

Tiptoe interrupted, “And carry what I ask —”

If he asked for something, he expected to get what he asked for.

The Host interrupted, “Ask what you can, sir, so long as it is in the house.”

The Host was in the business of satisfying guests’ requests. If Tiptoe asked for a certain kind of food and drink, the Host would sell it to him as long as it was available to sell.

Tiptoe said, “I ask for my rights and privileges, and although for form I please to call it a suit or request, I have not been accustomed to be repulsed.”

He was not used to hearing the word “no.”

Queen Prudence, who with the others had been listening to Tiptoe and the Host quarrel, said, “No, sweet Sir Glorious, you may still command —”

Yes, he could still ask for what he wanted.

The Host quietly commented on Queen Prudence’s sentence, “Yes, Tiptoe, you can ask and go without.”

Queen Prudence said, “But yet, sir, being the first, and having called it a suit, you’ll see it shall be such as we may grant.”

She would grant what she could.

Lady Frampul said, “Otherwise, if the request is not such as she may grant, the request will deny itself.”

Queen Prudence said, “You hear the opinion of the court.”

Tiptoe said, “I pay no mind to court opinions.”

Queen Prudence said, “But the court opinion is my lady’s, though.”

Of course, Queen Prudence was not a real Queen; the real lady with authority here was Lady Frampul.

Tiptoe said, “My lady is a spinster at the law, and my petition is of right.”

A spinster is an unmarried woman. Although Lady Frampul had the title “Lady,” she was entitled to no special treatment by the judge. Unmarried women had few rights, unless they were the daughters of a viscount or higher social rank.

Tiptoe’s petition was of right — he thought — because of his insistence on his rights and privileges.

Tiptoe wanted people such as the Host to show subservience to him. He also wanted them to show a degree of respect to his friend the Fly.

Queen Prudence asked, “What is your petition of right?”

Tiptoe said, “It is for this poor learned bird.”

“The Fly?” the Host asked.

Tiptoe replied, “This professor in the inn, here. This professor of small matters.”

Of course, “small matters” can mean “matters of little importance,” but it can also mean “narrowly focused matters.” Many modern professors become experts in narrowly focused matters, aka narrowly focused topics.

The others began to comment quietly, out of Tiptoe’s hearing.

Lord Latimer quietly said, “How Tiptoe commends the Fly!”

He had called Fly a professor.

The Host said quietly, “As to save himself in him.”

By praising one’s friends, one praises oneself for having such good people as friends.

Lay Frampul said quietly, “So do all politicians in their commendations.”

The Host said quietly, “This is a state-bird — a politician — and the verier — truer — fly!”

In other words, Tiptoe was more of a fly than Fly was.

Talking about Fly, Tiptoe said, “Hear him propound problems —”

He meant: Hear Fly put forward problems for discussion.

Queen Prudence said, “Bless us, what’s that? What do you mean?”

Tiptoe said, “Or argue by syllogisms, elenchize.”

A syllogism is an argument with two premises and a conclusion.

“To elenchize” is “to use a syllogism to refute a syllogism that has been defended.”

Lady Frampul said, “To be sure, petards to blow us up.”

Petards are bombs used to attack defensive strongholds. The petards she meant were words.

Lord Latimer said, “These are some ingenious strong words!”

“Ingenious” means “ingenious engines.”

The “engines” are the petards.

The Host said, “Tiptoe intends to erect a castle in the air and make his fly an elephant to carry it.”

To erect a castle in the air and have an elephant carry it means to make too much fuss over something trifling.

Tiptoe said, “He is a bird of the arts, and his name is Fly.”

Queen Prudence said, “Buzz! Nonsense!”

The Host said, “Blow him off, good Pru. His interjections will mar everything if you don’t.”

Tiptoe said, “The sovereign’s honor is to cherish learning.”

Queen Prudence said, “What, in a fly?”

“In anything industrious,” Tiptoe replied.

Queen Prudence said, “But flies are busy — they are meddlesome!”

“There’s nothing more troublesome, or importune, than a fly,” Lady Frampul said.

“There’s nothing more domestic, tame, or familiar than your fly in cuerpo,” Tiptoe said.

The Host said, “That is, when his wings are cut, he is tame indeed, but when his wings are not cut, there is nothing more impudent and greedy, licking —”

Lady Frampul interrupted, “— or saucy, good Sir Glorious.”

Queen Prudence said to Tiptoe, “Stop your advocateship.”

She then looked at Fly and said, “Except that we shall call you Orator Fly, and send you down to the sideboard and the dishes.”

“A good flap, that!” the Host said.

A fly-flap is an instrument used to swat flies. In this context, a “good flap” is a “good put-down.”

Queen Prudence said, “Commit yourself to the steam of the kitchen!”

Lady Frampul said, “Or else condemn yourself to the bottles.”

Queen Prudence said, “And pots. There is his quarry — his prey.”

The Host said, “Your bird — Fly — will chirp far better below.”

“And make you finer music,” Lady Frampul said.

“His buzz will there become him,” Queen Prudence said.

Tiptoe said to Fly, “Come away. Leave with me. Buzz in their faces. Give them all the buzz, dor in their ears and eyes; hum, dor, and buzz!”

“To give someone the dor” meant “to insult them.”

Tiptoe continued, “I will statuminate — prop up — and underprop — support — you. If they scorn us, let us scorn them — we’ll find the Thoroughfare below, and quaere — query — him.”

The Thoroughfare was Jug, the tapster who acquired news and gossip.

Tiptoe continued, “Leave these relicts — these forsaken people. Buzz; they shall see that I, in spite of their jeers, dare to drink, and with a fly.”

Tiptoe and Fly exited.

Lord Latimer said, “This is a fair removal at once of two impertinent, presumptuous persons!

“Excellent Pru, I love you for your wit and intelligence, no less than your state, position, and dignity.”

“One must preserve the other,” Queen Prudence said.

Lovel entered the room. The others did not address him at first.

Lady Frampul asked, “Who is this man here?”

“Oh, he is Lovel, madam,” Queen Prudence said. “He is your sad, grave, serious servant.”

“Sad?” Lady Frampul said. “He is sullen still, and wears a cloud about his brows. I don’t know how to approach him.”

“I will instruct you, madam, if that is all,” Queen Prudence said. “Go to him and kiss him.”

“What, Pru?” Lady Frampul said.

“Go and kiss him,” Queen Prudence said. “I command you to kiss him.”

“You are not wild, licentious, and demented, are you, wench?” Lady Frampul said.

“No,” Queen Prudence said. “I am tame and exceedingly tame, but I am still your sovereign.”

“Has too much splendid clothing made you mad?” Lady Frampul said.

“No, nor has it made me proud,” Queen Prudence said. “Do what I enjoin you to do. Do not dispute my prerogative with a look or a frown. Do not detract and decline. You know that the authority is mine, and I will exercise it swiftly if you provoke me.”

Lady Frampul said, “I have woven a net to ensnare myself!”

She then said to Lovel, “Sir, I am enjoined to tender you a kiss, but I do not know why or wherefore. I know only that the royal pleasure will have it so and urges it. Don't triumph over and be elated by my obedience, seeing it forced thus."

She kissed him and said, "There it is."

"And it is welcome," Lovel said.

He said to himself, "Was there ever a kiss that was so relished thus, or had such a sting like this — a kiss of so much sweet nectar, but mixed with bitter aloes?"

Queen Prudence said, "No murmuring nor repining; I am fixed in my judgment and firmly resolved."

Lovel continued his reverie:

"It had, I think, a quintessence — the highest essence — of both nectar and aloes, but that which was the better drowned the bitter.

"How soon it passed away! How unrecovered!

"The distillation — the refined essence — of another soul was not as sweet as this kiss! And until I meet again that kiss, those lips, like relish, and this taste, let me fall into a consumption, be consumed by ardor, and here waste! Let me waste away from love-sickness!"

Queen Prudence said, "The royal assent is passed and cannot alter."

"You'll turn into a tyrant," Lady Frampul said.

"Don't be a rebel," Queen Prudence said. "The name of rebel is odious."

"Will you hear me out?" Lady Frampul asked.

"No, not on this topic," Queen Prudence said. "Would you make laws and be the first who breaks them?"

Lady Frampul had made Prudence Queen, and as such Prudence could make laws — orders — and expect them to be obeyed. But now Lady Frampul disliked some of those laws and wished to break them.

Queen Prudence continued, “The example is pernicious in a subject, and in a person of your quality, most pernicious.”

A subject ought to obey a Queen, and a subject who is a person of quality especially ought to obey a Queen.

“Excellent Princess!” Lord Latimer said.

“Just Queen!” the Host said.

“Brave sovereign!” Lord Latimer said.

“A she-Trajan, this Prudence is!” the Host said.

The Roman Emperors who have gone down in history as the Five Good Emperors are 1) Nerva (reigned 96–98 CE), 2) Trajan (98–117), 3) Hadrian (117–138), 4) Antoninus Pius (138–161), and 5) Marcus Aurelius (161–180), who presided over the most majestic days of the Roman Empire.

The Host and Lord Latimer were giving Queen Prudence high praise.

Lord Beaufort, who was and had been preoccupied with the disguised, dressed-as-a-woman Frank, said, “What is it?

“Proceed, incomparable Pru! I am glad I am scarcely at leisure to applaud you.”

He was happy to be preoccupied with Frank.

Lord Latimer said to Lord Beaufort, “It’s well for you that you have so happy expressions.”

Lord Beaufort was able to come up with expressions such as “incomparable Pru.” He was also able to express his affection for Frank through such actions as ignoring everyone except Frank.

Lady Frampul said, “Yes, cry her up with acclamations, do, and cry me down, run all with sovereignty! Prince Power will never lack her parasites.”

The title “Prince” could refer to people of either sex. Prince Power is Queen Prudence.

Queen Prudence said, “Nor will Lady Murmur lack her false complaints and grumbles.”

Lady Murmur is Lady Frampul.

Using the royal plural, Queen Prudence then said, “Master Lovel, for so your document here — your bill of complaint — exhibited in our high court of sovereignty at this first hour of our reign, declares against this genteel and noble lady a disrespect you have conceived, if not received, from her —”

Lady Frampul seemed to dislike Lovel — that was his complaint against her.

The Host said, “Received, not conceived; so the charge lies in our bill.”

“We see it, Lovel’s learned counsel,” Queen Prudence said. “Stop your complaining.”

The Host was Lovel’s learned counsel. Lovel was Lady Frampul’s servant: He loved and served her.

Queen Prudence continued conversing about Lovel, “We who love our justice above all our other attributes, and have the nearness and intimacy to the situation to know your extraordinary merit, as also to discern this lady’s goodness, and find how loath she’d be to lose the honor and reputation she has had in having so worthy a servant, although only for a few minutes, do here enjoin —”

“Good!” the Host said.

Queen Prudence continued, “— charge, will, and command her Ladyship, on pain of our high displeasure and the committing of an extreme contempt to the court, our crown and dignity —”

“Excellent sovereign, and remarkable Pru!” the Host said.

Queen Prudence continued, “— to entertain you for a pair of hours. Choose the hours for when you please, on this day — with all respects and valuation of a principal servant, to give you all the titles, all the privileges, the freedoms, favors, rights, she can bestow —”

“Large, ample words, of a splendid extent!” the Host said.

Queen Prudence continued, “— or can be expected from a lady of honor or quality, in discourse, access, courtship to a lady —”

“Good,” the Host said.

Queen Prudence continued, “— not to give ear or admit conference with any person but yourself; nor when you are there, of any other topic but love, and the companion of it, noble courtship, and for your two hours’ service, you shall take two kisses —”

“Noble!” the Host said.

Queen Prudence continued, “— for each hour, a kiss, to be taken freely, fully, and legally, before us, in the court here and in our presence —” “Splendid!” the Host said.

Queen Prudence continued, “— but those hours passed, and the two kisses paid, the binding contract is never to hope for the renewing of the time or of the suit on any circumstance.”

Yes, Lovel could talk about love to Lady Frampul for two hours and be kissed by her twice, but afterward he must never do those things again.

“A hard condition!” the Host said.

“Had it been easier, I would have suspected the sovereign’s justice,” Lord Latimer said.

The Host said, “Oh, you are servant — suitor — my lord, to the lady and you are a rival to Lovel. In point of law, my lord, you may be challenged and objected to.”

The Host believed that Lord Latimer loved Lady Frampul.

“I am not jealous!” Lord Latimer said.

Perhaps he loved someone else.

The Host said, “Of so short a time your Lordship need not be jealous, especially with it being done in foro — in open court.”

“What is Lovel’s answer?” Queen Prudence asked.

Would Lovel agree to spend two hours with and receive two kisses from Lady Frampul with the condition that afterward he must never do those things again?

The Host said, “Lovel craves time, madam, to consult with his learned counsel.”

Queen Prudence said, “You be his learned counsel, and go consult together quickly.”

Lovel and Host walked aside to talk together quietly.

“You are no tyrant?” Lady Frampul said to Queen Prudence.
“You don’t think you are being a tyrant here?”

“If I am, madam, it would be best for you to impeach me!”
Queen Prudence replied.

Lord Latimer said, “Beaufort —”

Preoccupied with Frank, Lord Beaufort said, “I am busy. Please let me alone. I have a cause in hearing, too.”

“In what court?” Lord Latimer asked.

“In Love’s Court of Requests!” Lord Beaufort replied.

“Bring it to the sovereignty,” Lord Latimer said. “It is the nobler court, before Judge Pru, who is the only learned mother of the law and lady of conscience, too!”

Queen Prudence was judging the appeals and petitions of the inn customers.

Lord Beaufort said, “It is well enough before this Mistress of Requests where it is.”

He was referring to Frank’s Nurse, with whom he now talked quietly.

Meanwhile, the Host and Lovel were also talking quietly together at a side of the room.

The Host said to Lovel, “Let them not scorn you. Bear up, Master Lovel, and take your hours and kisses. They are a fortune.”

“Which I cannot approve and put to the test, and much less make use of,” Lovel said.

“Still in this cloud of melancholy!” the Host said. “Why cannot you make use of them?”

“Who would be rich to be so soon undone?” Lovel said. “The beggar’s best is wealth he does not know, and just to show it to him inflames his want.”

Lovel did not want two hours of happiness with Lady Frampul if they would be followed by an unhappy remaining lifetime without Lady Frampul.

“Two hours of the height of love does not tempt you?” the Host asked.

Lovel replied, “That joy is too, too narrow if it would attempt to contain a love as infinite as mine, and once the two hours have passed they would leave an eternal loss.

“Who so prodigiously desires a feast that they would forfeit health and appetite to see it?

“Or who just to taste a spoonful would forgo all taste of delicacy and delight forever afterward?”

The Host said, “These yet are hours of hope.”

“But all hours following are years of despair, ages of misery!” Lovel said. “Nor can so short a happiness but spring — start — a world of fear with the thought of losing it. It is better to be never happy than to feel a little happiness, and then lose it forever.”

“I confess that Queen Prudence made it a strict injunction,” the Host said, “but then the hope is it may not be kept. A thousand things may intervene. We see the wind shift often, thrice a day sometimes. Decrees may alter upon better legal application and riper legal hearing. The best bow may warp — the strongest bow may bend — and the hand may vary and apply a greater or lesser pressure on the bow. Pru may be a sage in law, and yet not be bitter.”

A sage is a wise person; the herb sage is bitter. The Host was hoping that Prudence might change her mind and revoke her strict injunction.

The Host continued, “Sweet Pru, smooth Pru, soft, debonair, and amiable Pru may do as well as rough and rigid Pru, and yet maintain her venerable and respected Pru, majestic Pru, and serenissimus — most famous and most splendid and most serene — Pru.

“Try but one hour first, and as you like the loose of that, draw home and try the other.”

“Loose” means 1) upshot, and 2) shooting of an arrow. To draw a bow home is to draw back the string as far as it will go.

“If one hour could make the other hour happy,” Lovel said, “I would attempt it —”

The Host interrupted, “— put it on, and do. Advance, and exert yourself.”

Lovel said, “Or in the blest attempt that I might die!”

He meant literally “die” in an attempt to get the love of Lady Frampul, but the Host deliberately misinterpreted this intended meaning of “die.” His misinterpretation gave the word “die” a bawdy meaning. In this society, one meaning of “die” is “ejaculate.”

The Host said, “Aye, by the Virgin Mary, there would be happiness indeed — happiness transcendent to the melancholy that you intended.”

The melancholy that Lovel intended was literally dying in an attempt to win Lady Frampul’s love.

The Host continued, “It — the dying that is ejaculation — would be a fate above a monument and all inscription to die so. It would be a death for emperors to enjoy, and the kings of the rich East to pawn their regions for, to show their treasure, open all their mines, spend all their spices to embalm their corpses, and wrap the inches up in sheets of gold that fell by such a noble destiny!”

The “inches” were 1) those of the height of an emperor, and 2) those of Lovel’s penis.

“Fell” referred to 1) the death of the emperor, and 2) the falling of Lovel’s penis after ejaculation.

The Host continued, “And as for the wrong to your friend Beaufort, that fear’s away. He rather wrongs himself, following fresh light — a new love — and new eyes to swear by.”

Lovel had vowed to stay away from Lady Frampul because Lady Frampul was in love with Lord Beaufort, the son of Lovel’s friend and patron. But Lord Beaufort’s actions now showed that he was enamored of the disguised-as-a-woman Frank.

The Host continued, “If Lord Beaufort changes, it is no crime in you to remain constant and to keep loving the same person: Lady Frampul. And upon these conditions, at a game so urged upon you.”

Lord Beaufort had once cast his affection upon Lady Frampul, but clearly Lord Beaufort had now cast his affection at first sight upon the disguised-as-a-woman Frank. So why shouldn’t Lovel pursue Lady Frampul?

Queen Prudence interrupted their conversation: “Sir, your resolution —”

She wanted to know what Lovel had decided after conferring with the Host.

The Host asked, “How is the lady — Lady Frampul — inclined toward spending two hours with Lovel?”

Queen Prudence replied, Sovereigns are not accustomed to ask their subjects’ consent and approval where it is due, but only where it is conditional.”

In other words, Lady Frampul had to do what her Queen — Prudence — had told her to do: Spend two hours with Lovel and give him two kisses. Lady Frampul’s feelings about the matter were of no concern to Queen Prudence.

Lord Latimer and the Host talked aside.

“A royal sovereign!” the Host said.

“And a rare stateswoman,” Lord Latimer said. “I admire her bearing in her new rule.”

The Host said to Lovel, “Come, choose your hours. It is better to be happy for a part of time than not to be happy for the whole, and it is better to be happy for a short part of your life than never.

“Shall I appoint the hours and pronounce them for you?”

“At your pleasure,” Lovel said. “As you please.”

The Host said to Queen Prudence, “Lovel designates his first hour after dinner, and his second hour after supper. What do you say? Are you content with these hours?”

“I am content,” Queen Prudence said.

“I am content,” Lady Frampul said.

“I am content,” Lord Latimer said.

“I am content,” the disguised-as-a-woman Frank said.

“What’s that?” said Lord Beaufort, who had not been paying attention to anyone other than the disguised-as-a-woman Frank. “I am content, too.”

“You have reason to be content,” Lord Latimer said. “You have taken the opportunity to do some wooing, and we have observed it.”

The Nurse, who was protective of Frank and who had an Irish accent, said, “Trot’, I am not content; in fait’ I am not.”

[The Nurse, who was protective of Frank and who had an Irish accent, said, “Truly, I am not content; in faith I am not.”]

The Host asked the Nurse, “Why aren’t you content, good Shelee-nien?”

“Shelee-nien” means “Sile-daughter.” “Sile” is a form of Celia. The Nurse’s full name is Shelee-nien Thomas. This means: Celia, daughter of Thomas.

The Nurse, who was possibly drunk, said about Lord Beaufort, “He tauk so desperate, and so debausht, so bawdy like a courtier and a lord, God bless him, one who tak’th tobacco.”

[The Nurse, who was possibly drunk, said about Lord Beaufort, “He talk so desperate, and so debauched, so bawdy like a courtier and a lord, God bless him, one who takes — uses — tobacco.”]

The Nurse was not happy about Lord Beaufort’s being attracted to the disguised Frank.

“Very well mixed,” the Host said.

In this society, the noun “mix” meant “dung and filth,” and it meant “fool or a vile person.” As an adjective, it meant “filthy and foul.”

Lord Beaufort was a mix: He was a courtier and a lord, but the Nurse believed that he displayed some not-so-good traits.

The Host asked, “What did Beaumont say?”

“Nay, nothing to the purposh, or very little, nothing at all to purposh,” the Nurse replied.

[“Nay, nothing to the purpose, or very little, nothing at all to purpose,” the Nurse replied.]

“Let him alone, Nurse,” the Host advised.

“I did tell him of Serly, which is a great family come out of Ireland, descended of O’Neill, MacCon, MacDermot, MacMurrough, but he paid no attention,” the Nurse said.

“Nor do I,” the Host said. “Good queen of heralds, ply the bottle and go to sleep.”

— 3.1 —

Tiptoe, Fly, and Jug talked together.

Tiptoe said to Fly, “I like the design of your militia well! It is a fine militia, and it is well ordered, and the division is neat! It will be desired only that the expressions were a little more Spanish, for there’s the best militia of the world!”

Tiptoe greatly valued anything Spanish.

He continued, “To call them tertias — the tertia of the kitchen, the tertia of the cellar, the tertia of the chamber, and the tertia of the stables.”

Tertia is a Latinization of a Spanish word: tercio.

A tertia is a division of infantry. It also means “a third.”

Fly replied, “That I can, sir, and I can find very able, fit commanders in every tertia.”

“Now you are in the right!” Tiptoe said. “As in the tertia of the kitchen, you yourself being a person elegant and delicate of taste in sauces, there you will command as prime maestro del campo [quartermaster], chief master of the palate, for that tertia. Or the cook under you will command that tertia because you have a more important position: You are the marshal, and the officer in the field next to the Host.”

Tiptoe named the next — the second — commander of a tertia: “Then for the cellar, you have young Anon, who is a rare fellow — what’s his other name?”

“Pierce, sir,” Fly answered.

“Sir Pierce,” Tiptoe said. “I’ll have him be a cavalier.”

A cavalier is 1) a horseman (knight), or 2) a roisterer.

As a knight, Pierce would be Sir Pierce.

Tiptoe continued, “Sir Pierce Anon will pierce us a new hogshead!”

Tiptoe then named a subordinate officer for Sir Pierce: “And then your thoroughfare, Jug here, his alferez [Spanish word for an ensign], an able officer. Give me your beard, round Jug, I take you by this handle.”

Tiptoe pulled Jug’s beard.

Drinking jugs had depictions of a bearded face.

Tiptoe continued, “And I do love one of your inches!”

His inches were probably his height. Tiptoe liked people who were as tall as Jug. Or perhaps Tiptoe loved other kinds of inches.

Tiptoe named the third commander of a tertia, “In the chambers, Jordan, here. He is the don del campo [gentleman of the field] of the beds.”

A jordan is a chamber pot, another kind of jug.

Tiptoe moved on to the next and final commander of a tertia: “And for the stables, what’s his name?”

“Old Peck,” Fly answered.

“Maestro del campo Peck!” Tiptoe said. “His name is curt, a monosyllable, but he commands the horse well.”

A curtal is a horse with a cropped tail.

In this society, the word “horse” could be plural.

Fly said, “Oh, in an inn, sir, we have other horse.”

He was playing with language. The words “horse” and “whores” sound alike, and often whores could be found at the inns of the time.

Fly continued, “Let those troops rest a while. Wine is the horse that we must charge with here.”

The bartenders charged customers for the wine they drank.

Tiptoe said, “Bring up the troops — bring wine, or call for wine, sweet Fly; it is an exact, accomplished militia, and you are an exact professor and practitioner. Lipsius Fly you shall be called, and Jouse.”

Justus Lipsius was a respected scholar of the time.

“Jowse” is the juice of the grape — wine. It is also a variant of the non-Latinized form of the name Justus: Joest.

Ferret and Trundle entered the room.

Tiptoe began to joke about Ferret’s name.

“Jack Ferret!” Tiptoe said. “He’s welcome, the old trenchmaster, and colonel of the pioneers.”

Trenchers are wooden plates. As Lovel’s servant, Ferret served him at meals.

Pioneers are ditch-diggers; ferrets dig burrows.

Tiptoe continued, “What can you make bolt for us now? A coney or two out of Tom Trundle’s burrow here, the coach?”

A “coney” is 1) a rabbit, or 2) a prostitute.

Ferrets were used in hunting to go into an animal’s burrow and make the animal bolt out of its safe haven into the sight of the hunters.

A carriage or coach could bring prostitutes to an inn.

Tiptoe said about Trundle the carriage driver, “This is the master of the carriages! How is your driving, Tom? Good as it was?”

“It serves my lady, and our officer Pru,” Trundle said. “Twelve miles an hour! Tom has the old trundle still.”

Twelve miles an hour was an exaggeration; it was very fast for the time.

Tiptoe said, “I am taken with the family here, fine fellows, viewing the muster roll of the men.”

The family was the servants of the inn.

“They are splendid men,” Trundle said.

Ferret said, “And of the Fly-blown discipline all, the quartermaster!”

Fly was the figurative quartermaster.

A bad quartermaster might bring the troops fly-blown meat to eat. Fly-blown meat had fly eggs deposited in it.

“The Fly’s a rare bird in his profession,” Tiptoe said. “Let’s sip a private pint with him. I would have him quit this light sign of the Light Heart, my bird, and this lighter — even more frivolous — house — it is not for his tall and growing gravity, so cedar-like, to be the second to a host in cuervo who knows no elegancies.

“Let Fly use his own dictamen — order or pronouncement — and his genius; I would have him fly high and strike at all.”

Falcons darted at and struck their prey.

Pierce Anon entered the room.

Tiptoe said, “Here’s young Anon, too.”

“What wine is it you want, gentlemen: white or claret?”
Pierce Anon asked.

“White, my brisk Anon,” Tiptoe said.

“I’ll draw you Juno’s milk that dyed the lilies, colonel,”
Pierce Anon said.

In mythology, milk dripped from the goddess Juno’s breasts, fell to the ground, and created lilies.

“Do so, Pierce,” Tiptoe said.

As Pierce Anon exited the room, Peck entered it.

“A plague on all jades!” Peck complained. “What a clap he has given me!”

Jades are 1) poor horses, and 2) whores.

A clap is 1) a blow, or 2) a case of gonorrhoea.

“Why, what is it now, cousin?” Fly asked.

In this society, the word “cousin” often simply “friend.”

Fly took Peck aside.

Tiptoe asked, “Who’s that?”

Ferret answered, “Peck the ostler.”

Fly and Peck talked quietly and privately.

“What ails you, cousin Peck?” Fly asked.

“Oh, me! My haunches!” Peck complained. “As sure as you live, sir, he — the horse — knew perfectly I meant to cheat him. He did leer so on me, and then he sneered, as if he were one who would say, ‘Take heed, sirrah.’ And when he saw our half-peck, which you know was only an old court-dish
— a bunch of bad scraps left over from the meals of other horses — lord, how he stamped!”

“I thought it had been for joy, when suddenly he cuts me a back caper with his heels and takes me just on the crupper — right on my butt. Down come I and my whole ounce of oats! “

An ounce of oats is short rations for both human beings and horses.

Peck continued, “Then he neighed out as if he had a mare by the tail.”

Fly said, “Truly, cousin, you are to blame when you treat the poor dumb Christians — the horses — so cruelly. You defraud them of their dimensum — their fixed allowance. Yonder’s Colonel Tiptoe’s horse — I looked in on him — keeping our Lady’s Eve!”

The Eve of the Annunciation was a fast day.

Fly continued, “The devil a bit of food he has got yet, since he came in! There he stands, and looks and looks, but it is your pleasure, coz, that he should look lean enough.”

“Coz” means cousin. Often it simply means friend.

Tiptoe’s horse was starving: It had not been fed edible food since Tiptoe arrived at the inn.

“He has hay in front of him,” Peck said.

“Yes,” Fly said, “but the hay is as gross as hemp, and the hay will choke as soon as a hemp rope would choke him unless he eats it buttered.”

Horses won’t eat buttered hay, and so the hay would not choke the horse.

Fly continued, “He had four shoes, and good ones, when he came in; it is a wonder that just by standing still he should have cast three.”

Peck had removed three of the horse's shoes in order to sell them or to charge Colonel Tiptoe for replacing them.

"Truly, Quartermaster," Peck said, "this trade is a kind of mystery that corrupts our standing manners quickly."

Trades are skilled labor; they are mysteries to those who don't know the skills involved.

"Standing" means "customary," but also refers to horses standing in stalls.

Peck continued, "Once a week I meet with such a brush — a setback — to mollify me. Sometimes a pair of setbacks, to awaken my conscience, yet still I sleep securely."

Cheaters grow used to cheating, and despite a setback now and then, they are accustomed to sleep soundly.

"Cousin Peck," Fly said, "you must use better dealing, indeed, you must."

"Truly," Peck said, "to give good example to my successors, I could be well content to steal but two girths and now and then a saddle-cloth, change a bridle for exercise, and stay there — leave it at that."

In order to be a good example to other ostlers, Peck might be willing to steal a little, not a lot.

To "change a bridle for exercise" means to "steal a bridle to exercise the action of stealing so that I don't forget how to do it."

"If you could, there would be some hope for you, coz," Fly said. "But the fate is you're drunk so early you mistake — steal — whole saddles, and sometimes a horse."

Peck began, "Aye, there's —"

He was interrupted by Pierce Anon's arrival. Pierce was carrying wine.

"— the wine," Fly said, finishing Peck's sentence. "Come, coz, I'll talk with you soon."

"Do," Peck said. "Lose no time, good Quartermaster."

The two men returned to the others.

Tiptoe said, "There are the horse come, Fly."

"Charge!" Fly said. "In, boys, in."

Jordan entered the room.

Fly said about Jordan, "Lieutenant of the ordnance, tobacco, and pipes."

The ordnance was fire to light the pipes.

"Who's that?" Tiptoe said. "Old Jordan, good! A suitable and necessary vessel."

Jordans are chamber pots; they are necessary vessels.

Tiptoe continued, "New-scoured he is. Here's to you, Marshal Fly. In milk, my young Anon says."

Tiptoe drank the toast to Fly.

Pierce Anon said, "Cream of the grape that dropped from Juno's breasts and sprung the lily!"

The cream of the grape is white wine.

Pierce Anon continued, "I can recite your fables, Fly. Here is also the blood of Venus, mother of the rose!"

He was referring to red wine.

In mythology, Venus' feet were scratched by rose thorns as she ran to her lover, whose name was Adonis. Her blood splashed a white rose, turning it red.

Music was heard coming from further within the inn.

Jordan said, "The dinner has gone up from the kitchens."

A whistle sounded within.

Jug said, "I hear the whistle calling the servants to wait on the tables."

"Aye, and the fiddlers," Jordan said. "We must all go wait on the diners."

Pierce Anon said, "A pox on this waiting, Quartermaster Fly."

It was a job he disliked.

Fly replied, "When chambermaids are sovereigns, their ladies wait on them. Fly scorns to breathe —"

Peck interrupted, "— or blow upon them."

One meaning of the adjective "fly-blown" was "dirty from the depositing of flies' eggs."

Peck was making a joke about Fly scorning to make the ladies pregnant.

Pierce Anon asked, "Old parcel Peck, are you there? How are you now? Are you lame?"

A parcel peck is a small amount; Peck gave small amounts of feed to the horses.

Peck had been kicked in the butt by a horse. He could very well be lame.

“Yes, indeed,” Peck said. “It is ill halting — limping — before cripples.”

Beggars faked being cripples in order to arouse sympathy in people so they would give the beggars money. To halt — limp — before cripples is ill because they are wise to the trick and cannot be fooled. Peck is a cheat, but he is among other cheats at the inn who know his tricks.

Peck continued, “I have got a dash — a blow — from a jade here that will stick by me.”

Pierce Anon said, “Oh, you have had some fantasy, fellow Peck. You have had some revelation —”

“What?” Peck said.

Pierce Anon said, “To steal the hay out of the racks again —”

By stealing the hay out of the horses’ feeding trough, Peck could sell it again.

“I told him so,” Fly said. “He could steal it when the guests’ backs were turned.”

Pierce Anon said, “Or bring his peck of feed the bottom upwards, heaped with oats, and cry, ‘Here’s the best measure upon all the road!’”

Peck could hold the feed container upside down, with oats piled on top of the container and inside the bottom rim to make the container look as if it were completely filled with oats.

Pierce Anon continued, “When, you know, the guest put in his hand to feel and smell the oats, the guest grated all his fingers upon the wood —”

At least one guest had discovered that trick.

“Mum!” Peck said. “Quiet!”

Pierce Anon continued, “— and found out your cheat.”

Peck said, “I have been in the cellar, Pierce.”

He meant that he knew about Pierce Anon’s tricks as a bartender.

“You were then there, upon your knees,” Pierce Anon said. “I remember it. You were begging to have the fact of your cheating concealed. I could tell more about the soaping of saddles, cutting of horses’ tails, and cropping — pranks of ale and hostelry —”

Peck adulterated the saddle-soap to save money; he also cut and cropped horses’ tails to sell the horsehair for use in brushes.

Of course, Pierce Anon had his own tricks of ale and hostelry.

Fly interrupted Pierce Anon, whom Tiptoe had said that he would make a cavalier, “— those tricks of yours Peck cannot forget, he says, young knight, no more than you can forget other deeds of darkness done in the cellar.”

“Well said, bold professor,” Tiptoe said to Fly.

“We shall have some truth explained,” Ferret said.

The truth would be about other tricks.

“We are all mortal, and we have our visions,” Pierce Anon said.

The visions can be faulty, and cheaters can help visions to be faulty, as Peck now pointed out: “Truly, it seems to me that every horse has his whole peck of feed, and tumbles up to the ears in litter.”

The horses may have seemed to be well fed and well cared-for to Peck (or so he pretended), and he went to lengths to make them seem well fed and well cared-for to other people, but the horses knew that they were not well fed and well cared-for.

Litter is straw that serves as bedding for animals.

Hay is nutritious; straw is not. Straw is the bare stalk. Hay is the stalk plus the rest of the plant, including the nutritious seeds. Hay is a nutritious crop grown for animals. Straw is a byproduct of a grain crop; it is what is left after the nutritious parts have been removed.

Fly said, “When, indeed, there’s no such matter, not a smell of provender.”

Ferret said, “There’s not as much straw as would tie up a horse-tail!”

Tying up a horse’s tail kept it clean and out of the harness. But in Peck’s stable there was not enough straw to do even that.

Fly said, “Nor is there anything in the rack but two old cobwebs, and as much rotten hay as had been a hen’s nest!”

Trundle said, “And yet Peck is always eager to sweep the mangers.”

Peck would sweep the mangers — the horses’ feeding troughs — to find uneaten hay to reuse.

“But he puts in nothing,” Ferret said.

Peck doesn’t put enough — or any — hay in the mangers.

Pierce Anon said, “These are fits and fancies that you must leave, good Peck.”

The inn employees all cheated their customers, but Peck was taking it too far.

Fly said to Peck, “And you must pray that it may be revealed to you at some times whose horse you ought to cozen and cheat, with what conscience, the how, and the when.”

According to Fly, there is a time and a place for cheating, but you must find that time and place. Overdoing it can result in getting caught and punished.

Fly added, “A parson’s horse may suffer —”

Pierce Anon interrupted, “— a horse whose master is double benefited. Put in that.”

A parson was supposed to have one and only one benefice: a permanent Church appointment in which pastors are allotted money and property in return for their pastoral services.

Fly and Pierce Anon agreed that it’s OK to cheat some kinds of people, such as rich, corrupt parsons.

Fly said, “A little greasing in the teeth — it is wholesome and keeps him in a sober shuffle — a slow gait.”

Greasing a horse’s teeth kept the horse from eating. Not eating resulted in a lack of energy.

Pierce Anon said, “His saddle, too, may lack a stirrup.”

The stirrup could be stolen and sold.

Fly said, “And, it may be sworn that his learning lay on one side and so broke it.”

The parson’s books were in a pack on one side of the saddle and so broke the stirrup on that side — at least, that’s the excuse that Peck could use to explain the loss of the stirrup.

Peck said, “They always have oats in their cloak-bags — clothes-bags — to affront us.”

Some parsons brought their own oats for their horses so that they wouldn’t have to pay the ostlers for oats.

Fly said, “And therefore it is a meritorious duty to tithe such soundly.”

In other words, it’s OK to tithe rich parsons — to take a tenth of the parson’s money — because rich parsons cheat by having two benefices and because they are miserly.

Pierce Anon said, “And a grazier’s horse may —”

Graziers grazed cattle to get them ready for sale. They were proverbially greedy.

Ferret said, “Oh, they are pinching puckfists!”

A puckfist is literally a puffball fungus. Figuratively, it is a braggart or a miser. Here, it is a pinching — tightly gripped — puckfist, and so the primary meaning is miser. (Misers have tightly closed fists; the hands of generous people are open.)

In other words, graziers are miserly.

Trundle said, “And they are suspicious.”

Pierce Anon finished the sentence he had started, “— suffer before the master’s face, sometimes.”

Fly said, “The grazier shall think he sees his horse eat half a bushel —”

Pierce Anon said, “When the sleight is, after the horse’s gums are rubbed with salt until all the skin comes off, the horse shall only mumble — chew as if with toothless gums — like an old woman who is chewing tough meat — and drop the food out again.”

“Well argued, cavalier,” Tiptoe said to Pierce Anon.

Fly said, “It may do well, and go for an example. But, cousin, have care of understanding horses — horses that understand they are being cheated — horses with angry heels, nobility horses with aristocratic owners, and horses that know the world.

“Let them have food until their teeth ache, and rub their coats until their ribs shine like a wench’s forehead.

“These horses’ owners are devils if you don’t do these things, and they will look into your dealings and discover that you are cheating.”

He was saying that in part so that Tiptoe would hear it and think that his horse was being well taken care of.

Peck said, “For my own part, I wish that the next horse of the pampered breed I cheat may be foundered.”

Founder is a disease that makes horses lame.

Fly said, “Say, ‘Foun-de-red.’ Prolate it right.”

Fly wanted Peck to lengthen the pronunciation of “foundered” by making it three syllables: found de (the) red. The disease called “founder” is inflammation of the hoof, and red is the color of inflammation.

Peck said, “And of all four hooves, I wish it. I love no crupper compliments.”

“Crupper” refers to a horse’s hindquarters. “Crupper compliments” are kicks.

Pierce Anon asked, “Whose horse was it?”

Peck answered, “Why, Master Burst’s.”

“Has Bat Burst come?” Pierce Anon asked.

“He has been here an hour,” Peck answered.

“Who is Burst?” Tiptoe asked.

“Master Bartholomew Burst,” Pierce Anon answered. “He is one who has been a citizen, and then a courtier, and is now a gambler. He has had all his whirls and bouts of fortune, and as a man would say, ‘Once a bat, and always a bat!’ He is a rermouse, aka bat, and he is a bird of twilight.”

Pierce Anon was saying of Bartholomew Burst: ‘Once a thief, always a thief.’” “Bat” is 1) a shortened form of Bartholomew, and 2) a creature of the night, which is literally a nocturnal animal or bird and figuratively a thief.

Pierce Anon continued, “He has broken — gone bankrupt — thrice.”

Tiptoe said, “Then he is your better man, as the Geno’way proverb says. Men are not made of steel.”

A proverb stated, “In Genoa there are mountains without wood, sea without fish, women without shame, and men without conscience.”

This infers that the Genoese know the value of a well-timed bankruptcy.

Pierce Anon said, “Nor are they bound always to keep their promises or their principles.”

“Thrice honorable colonel!” Fly said to Tiptoe. “Hinges will crack —”

Tiptoe finished Fly’s sentence: “— although they are made of Spanish iron.”

Pierce Anon said about Bat Burst, “He is a merchant still, he is an adventurer at in-and-in, and he is our thoroughfare’s friend.”

In-and-in is a dicing game.

Jug was the thoroughfare: the man whom travelers confided in and told their news and gossip to.

Tiptoe asked, “Who? Jug’s friend?”

“The same,” Pierce Anon said, “and a fine gentleman was with him.”

Peck said, “He was Master Huffle.”

“Who? Hodge Huffle?” Pierce Anon asked.

“Who’s he?” Tiptoe asked.

Pierce Anon said, “He is a cheater, and another fine gentleman, a friend of the chamberlain’s — that is, a friend of Jordan’s. He is Master Huffle, and he is Burst’s Protection.”

Master Huffle is Burst’s friend, and when necessary, his bodyguard.

Fly said, “He fights and vapors — blusters — for Bat Burst.”

Pierce Anon said, “He will be drunk so civilly —”

Fly interrupted, “So discreetly —”

Pierce Anon continued, “— and punctually! Just at his hour.”

Fly said, “And then he will call for his jordan with that hum and state as if he pissed Aristotle’s Politics!”

Master Huffle could be pretentious.

Pierce Anon said, “And he will sup with his taffeta night-gear here so silently!”

“Taffeta night-gear” literally means “taffeta dressing gown,” but “taffeta night-gear” here may figuratively mean a wench.

Fly said, “No talk! Nothing but music!”

Pierce Anon said, “A dozen bawdy songs.”

Tiptoe asked, “And does the general — the Host — know this?”

Fly said, “Oh no, sir, dormit — dormit patronus, still. The master sleeps.

“Bat Burst and Master Huffle will steal in to bed —”

Pierce Anon interrupted, “— in private, sir, and pay the fiddlers with such modesty next morning.”

Fly said, “They will take a disjune — a breakfast — of muscadel and eggs!”

This breakfast was regarded as an aphrodisiac.

Pierce Anon said, “And pack away in their trundling cheats — coaches — like gypsies!”

To pack away meant to leave with all their possessions. Bat Burst and Master Huffle will pack up and leave in the morning — they hope without paying.

Trundle said, “Mysteries, mysteries, Ferret.”

“Aye, we see, Trundle, what the great officers in an inn may do,” Ferret said.

Some people — “great officers” — at an inn may sleep, dine, and dash — sleep, eat, and run away without paying.

Ferret continued, “I do not say the officers of the Crown, but the Light Heart.”

Ben Jonson was careful not to insult the officers of the royal monarchy. He also was making an in-joke: At this time there was an inn named the Crown Inn.

“I’ll see the Bat and Huffle,” Tiptoe said.

Ferret opted out of the visit: “I have some business, sir, I crave your pardon —”

“What is your business?” Tiptoe said.

Ferret answered, “To be sober.”

Such visits as Tiptoe intended involved drinking.

He exited.

Tiptoe said, “A pox on you, go, get you gone then. Trundle shall stay.”

Trundle said, “No, I beseech you, colonel. Your Lordship has a mind to be drunk in private with these brave gallants; I will step aside into the stables and salute — visit — my mares.”

He exited.

Pierce Anon said, “Yes, do, and sleep with them. Let him go, the base whipstock.”

A whipstock is the handle of a whip.

Pierce Anon added, “He’s as drunk as a fish now, and almost as dead.”

To be as drunk as a fish is to be very drunk.

Ferret and Trundle had left because of class differences. Colonel Tiptoe was of a higher social class than Ferret and Trundle were — they were servants. Bat Burst and Master Huffle were also of a higher social class than they were. Sometimes servants could joke with those of a higher class, but socially drinking in private with those of a higher class would make most servants uncomfortable.

Pierce Anon was the bartender; he would serve the wine, so he stayed with Tiptoe.

Fly stayed because he had become friendly with Tiptoe, and he was hoping that Tiptoe could be advantageous to him. Fly was a parasite, after all.

Tiptoe said, “Come, I will see the flickermouse, my Fly.”

A flickermouse is a bat.

They all exited.

— 3.2 —

Musicians entered the room and played.

Queen Prudence, ushered by the Host, entered the room and took her seat of judicature. The Nurse, the disguised Frank, Lord Beaufort, and Lord Latimer followed them. Also entering the room were Ferret, Trundle, Jug, and Jordan, who waited on the others. The Nurse, the disguised Frank, Lord Beaufort, and Lord Latimer would assist Queen Prudence by acting as judges.

This was a Court of Love. Lovel had a complaint against Lady Frampul: He loved her, and she did not return his love. Lovel was the appellant, and Lady Frampul was the defendant. Queen Prudence and the other judges would hear the cases each made and then judge them.

This was the first of two hours that Lovel was allowed to be with Lady Frampul and talk about love. At the end of each hour, Lady Frampul would give Lovel a kiss.

Queen Prudence said, “Here is the first hour set in advance; but first produce the parties, and clear the court. The time is now of price — the time is now valuable.”

The Host ordered, “Jug, get you down, and Trundle, get you up.”

The Host was telling Jug to leave and go to the cellar and telling Trundle to get up on the bench with the judges.

The Host continued, “You, Trundle, shall be the crier. Ferret here shall be the clerk.”

The crier made court announcements and called on people to testify.

The clerk kept a record of the trial. To be a clerk, Ferret had to know how to read and write. Not everyone in this society could do those things.

The Host ordered, “Jordan, you smell without — outside — until the ladies call you.”

The Host was punning. “Smell about” meant 1) sniff about, and 2) stink. As readers will remember, a jordan is a chamber pot.

The Host continued, “Take down the fiddlers, too. Silence that noise deep in the cellar, safe.”

In this society, a noise is a band of musicians.

Jug, Jordan, and the musicians exited.

“Who keeps the watch?” Prudence asked.

Someone had to keep track of the time: Lovel was allowed to spend one hour with Lady Frampul.

The Host answered, “Old Shelee-nien here is the Madam Tell-clock.”

The Host continued to play with language. A “tell-clock” is an idler, but here he used it to mean a time-keeper.

The Nurse said, “No, fait’ and trot’, sweet maister, I shall sleep; i’ fait’, I shall.”

[The Nurse said, “No, by my faith and truth, sweet master, I shall sleep; in faith, I shall.”]

Lord Beaufort said, “I pray that you do sleep then, screech-owl.”

A screech-owl is a bird of ill omen.

Lord Beaufort continued, “She brings to mind the fable of the dragon that kept the Hesperian fruit. I wish I could charm her asleep!”

Ladon was the dragon that entwined itself around the tree of golden apples and guarded them in the garden of the Hesperides.

If the Nurse were to go to sleep, Lord Beaufort hoped that he and the disguised-as-a-woman Frank, whom Lord Beaufort did not know was disguised as a woman, could have fun.

The Host said, “Trundle will do it with his hum.”

Again, the Host was punning, this time on the word “hum.” Trundle will make the Nurse fall asleep with his hum, meaning low murmur, or with his hum, meaning strong ale.

The Host then said, “Come, Trundle. Precede him, Ferret, in the form and due process of the court.”

Ferret would read out loud the necessary words, and Trundle would repeat them in a loud voice.

Ferret said, “Oyez, oyez, oyez.”

Trundle repeated, “Oyez, oyez, oyez.”

“Oyez” means “Be quiet and pay attention.”

Ferret said, “Whereas there has been awarded ...”

Trundle repeated, “Whereas there has been awarded ...”

Ferret said, “By the Queen Regent of Love ...”

Trundle repeated, “By the Queen Regent of Love ...”

Ferret said, “In this high court of sovereignty ...”

Trundle repeated, “In this high court of sovereignty ...”

Ferret said, “Two special hours of address ...”

Trundle repeated, “Two special hours of address ...”

Ferret said, “To Herbert Lovel, appellant ...”

Trundle repeated, “To Herbert Lovel, appellant ...”

Ferret said, “Against the Lady Frampul, defendant ...”

Trundle repeated, “Against the Lady Frampul, defendant ...”

Ferret said, “Herbert Lovel, come into the court ...”

Trundle repeated, “Herbert Lovel, come into the court ...”

Ferret said, “Make challenge in your first hour ...”

Trundle repeated, “Make challenge in your first hour ...”

“Make challenge” means “Make your case.”

Ferret said, “And save yourself and your bail.”

Trundle repeated, “And save yourself and your bail.”

Bail was meant to be a guarantee that the appellant and the defendant came to the place of trial.

Lovel entered the room, bowed, and sat at one side.

The Host said, “Look at where he, bowing, comes into the court!

“Clerk of the sovereignty, note down his appearance and how accoutered — how clothed and equipped — he comes as designated to the court!”

Queen Prudence’s Court of Love parodied a trial by combat.

In a trial by combat, first the two combatants enter, and then they must swear an oath that they are not bringing into the arena of combat any weapons other than those allowed. Also, they must swear that they have not brought any enchantments or charms with them.

Ferret wrote and said, “It is done. Now, crier, call the Lady Frampul, and by the name of:

“Frances, Lady Frampul, defendant ...”

Trundle repeated, “Frances, Lady Frampul, defendant ...”

Ferret said, “Come into the court ...”

Trundle repeated, “Come into the court ...”

Ferret said, “Make answer to the award ...”

Trundle repeated, “Make answer to the award ...”

Ferret said, “And save yourself and your bail.”

Trundle repeated, “And save yourself and your bail.”

Lady Frampul would make an answer to the award given by the court to Lovel. He had been awarded two hours of love-conversation with her and two kisses from her.

She entered the room and sat on the opposite side of the room, confronting Lovel.

The Host said about her, “She makes a noble and a just appearance. Set it down likewise, and set down how armed — furnished and ready — she comes.”

Ferret wrote.

Queen Prudence said, “Usher of Love’s court, give them their oath according to the form, upon Love’s missal.”

The Host, who was serving as the court usher, said, “Arise, and lay your hands upon the book.”

The book was not a Bible.

The Host continued, “Herbert Lovel, appellant, and Lady Frances Frampul, defendant, you shall swear upon the liturgy of love, Ovid’s De Arte Amandi, that you neither have, nor will have, nor in any wise do bear about you, anything or any things, pointed or blunt, within these lists, other than what are natural and allowed by the court: no enchanted arms or weapons, stones of virtue, herb of grace, charm, character or sign of the occult, spell, philter, or other power than Love’s only, and the justness of your cause. So help you Love, his mother, and the contents of this book.”

The lists are fields of combat at a tournament. The contestants joust in enclosed spaces.

“Stones of virtue” are stones with magical properties, but the word “stones” can mean “testicles” and so the phrase can mean “powerful testicles.”

“Herbs of grace” means “herb-grace”; that is, it is the herb rue, which is associated with regret.

A philter is an aphrodisiac or a love-potion.

Ovid’s book Ars Amatoria — The Art of Love — is a book about sexual seduction.

De Arte Amandi — Concerning the Art of Loving — is the Host's version of the title of Ovid's book.

Love is Cupid, and Love's mother is Venus.

The Host said, "Kiss it."

Kissing the book meant that they were swearing the oath that the Host had asked them to swear: They had not brought any banned articles or occult spells to the place of combat.

Lovel and Lady Frampul kissed the book.

The Host ordered them, "Return to your seats."

They returned to their seats.

The Host then said, "Crier, bid all to be silent."

Trundle cried, "Oyez, Oyez, Oyez."

As before, Ferret read the necessary words for the trial, and Trundle the crier repeated them loudly.

Ferret said, "In the name of the sovereign of Love ..."

Trundle repeated, "In the name of the sovereign of Love ..."

Ferret said, "Notice is given by the court ..."

Trundle repeated, "Notice is given by the court ..."

Ferret said, "To the appellant and defendant ..."

Trundle repeated, "To the appellant and defendant ..."

Ferret said, "That the first hour of address proceeds ..."

Trundle repeated, "That the first hour of address proceeds ..."

Ferret said, "And Love save the sovereign!"

Trundle repeated, "And Love save the sovereign!"

Then Trundle cried loudly, “Every man or woman keep silence, on pain of imprisonment.”

Any man or woman who interrupted the proceedings unnecessarily would be imprisoned.

Ferret would take written notes during the trial. He would capitalize the word “Love” when it meant Cupid, the god of love.

Queen Prudence told Lovel and Lady Frampul, “Do your endeavors — that is, do all you can do — in the name of Love.”

Lovel said, “I am ready to make my first approaches, then, in love.”

Lady Frampul requested, “Tell us what love is, so that we may be sure there’s such a thing, and that it is in nature.”

“Is in nature” means “really exists.” Lord Beaufort supposedly loved, or had loved Lady Frampul, and she had noticed his attentions to the disguised Frank.

“Excellent lady,” Lovel said, “I did not expect to meet an infidel — an unbeliever — much less an atheist here in Love’s lists! An atheist of so much unbelief to raise a question of Love’s existence —”

The Host said, “Well charged!”

The Host was punning. Jousts charge at each other in tournaments, and accusers make charges and arguments in trials.

Referring to love as masculine, Lovel continued, “I rather thought, and with religion — piously — think, that if all the character of love had been lost, his lines, dimensions, and whole signature (particularity of form) razed and defaced with dull humanity — ordinary people — that both his nature and his essence might have found their mighty instauration — restoration — here, here where the confluence of fair and good meets to make up all beauty.

“For what else is love, but the most noble, pure affection of what is truly beautiful and fair?”

“What else is love but the desire of union with the thing beloved?”

Lovel had a spiritual view of love.

Lord Beaufort’s view of love, as would soon become apparent, was different.

Lord Beaufort asked Queen Prudence, “Have the assistants of the court their votes and the writ of privilege to speak them freely?”

A vote was an expression of opinion. A writ of privilege was a note that exempted a person from a crime.

Lord Beaufort wanted to speak freely and without negative consequences. He wanted to give his view of love.

Queen Prudence answered, “Yes, to assist, but not to interrupt.”

She meant to assist in achieving an understanding of love.

Lord Beaufort said, “Then I have read somewhere that man and woman were in the first creation both one piece, and being cleft asunder, ever since then love had been an appetite — a desire — for the two halves to be rejoined. As for example —”

He kissed the disguised Frank.

Lord Beaufort’s view of love was physical in nature.

In Plato's Symposium, in which the characters discuss love, the comic playwright Aristophanes tells a tale about human beings having four hands, four legs, two heads, two sets of genitals, and so on. Basically, they were two humans joined together. They threatened the gods, and so Zeus, king of the gods, cut each of the beings in half. Of course, the two beings who had been cut from the original singular being want to be reunited. The original sexes of these beings were both-male, both-female, and androgynous (half-male and half-female), and so today we find two men wanting to unite, two women wanting to unite, and a man and a woman wanting to unite. This is Aristophanes' explanation of sexual love and why people feel "whole" when they meet their mate.

The Nurse said, "Cra-mo-cree! What meansh 'tou?"

[The Nurse said, "Love of my heart! What do you mean by that?"]

Lord Beaufort said, "Only to kiss and part."

He may have meant: Just to take a kiss and then separate himself from the disguised Frank.

The Host said, "So much is lawful."

Lord Latimer said, "And it accords with the prerogative — the right and privilege — of Love's court."

Lord Beaufort, however, may have meant: Just to seduce and 'part — seduce and then depart and run away.

Lovel recognized the source from which Lord Beaufort had gotten his story: "It is a fable of Plato's in his Banquet, and uttered there by Aristophanes."

Plato's Symposium or Banquet is a dialogue in which at the end of a banquet the characters discuss love.

The Host said, “It was well remembered here, and put to good use. But go on with your description of what love is: the desire of union with the thing beloved.”

Lovel said, “I meant that as a definition. For I make the efficient cause, what’s beautiful and fair; the formal cause, the appetite of union; and the final cause, the union itself.”

Lovel was using Aristotelian terms. In other words:

What’s beautiful and fair, whether spiritually or physically, or both, is the means that causes and promotes love. (This is the efficient cause.)

The appetite of — desire for — union is the ideal essence of love. (This is the formal cause.)

The union itself, whether spiritual or physical, or both, is the end and outcome for which love is produced. (This is the final cause.)

Lovel continued, “But more fully, if you’ll have it, by description, it is a flame and ardor of the mind. It is dead in the proper corpse — that is, the body of the subject or lover — but it is quick and alive in another’s body. Love transfers the lover into the loved.”

In other words, the lover “dies” in his or her own body, but “lives” in the body of the beloved. The lover does not think of him- or herself, but instead is always thinking of the beloved.

Lovel continued, “The he or she who loves does engrave or stamp the idea — that is, the form or archetype — of what they love, first in themselves; and, similar to mirrors, their minds take in the forms of their beloved, and reflect them.”

By implication, the beloved will be attracted to that reflection.
