In this retelling, as in all my retellings, I have tried to make the work of literature accessible to modern readers who may lack the knowledge about mythology, religion, and history that the literary work's contemporary audience had.

Do you know a language other than English? If you do, I give you permission to translate this book, copyright your translation, publish or self-publish it, and keep all the royalties for yourself. (Do give me credit, of course, for the original retelling.)

I would like to see my retellings of classic literature used in schools, so I give permission to the country of Finland (and all other countries) to give copies of any or all of my retellings to all students forever. I also give permission to the state of Texas (and all other states) to give copies of any or all of my retellings to all students forever. I also give permission to all teachers to give copies of any or all of my retellings to all students forever. Of course, libraries are welcome to use my eBooks for free.

Teachers need not actually teach my retellings. Teachers are welcome to give students copies of my eBooks as background material. For example, if they are teaching Homer's Iliad and Odyssey, teachers are welcome to give students copies of my Virgil's Aeneid: A Retelling in Prose and tell them, "Here's another ancient epic you may want to read in your spare time."

CHAPTER 1: Ben Jonson's The Alchemist

CAST OF CHARACTERS (The Alchemist)

THE CON ARTISTS

Subtle: The alchemist. The word “subtle” used to mean cunning in a crafty and/or deceitful way. It also meant devious and underhand. Subtle is an older man.

Face: The housekeeper, Lovewit's Jeremy the butler. The housekeeper is the person in charge of taking care of the house. While the owner of the house is away, Face takes care of it; he is a house-sitter. During part of the play, he is known as Captain Face because he often wears a Captain's uniform in order to con people. He is also known as Lungs because he supposedly manages the bellows in the alchemical laboratory. As you can tell, he wears many faces; he is also double-faced. Face is bearded for most of the play.

Doll Common: The co-conspirator of Subtle and Face. She is a prostitute, a doll who is common to all and who will sleep with men for money or other materialistic advantage. “Doll” is a nickname for “Dorothy.”

THE MASTER

Lovewit: The owner of the house in which Subtle sets up his work. He appreciates the wit, aka intelligence, of his servant Jeremy the butler, who is intelligent enough to get himself out of trouble by enriching his employer. In this society, bosses are called “Master.” Lovewit is an older man.

THE VICTIMS

Dapper: A lawyer's clerk. He wants Subtle to help him win in gambling by giving him a familiar spirit. (Witches have familiar spirits; usually, they take the form of an animal or a fly.) Apparently, Dapper wears dapper clothing and is a clean, neat person.

Abel Drugger: A tobacco merchant. He wants Subtle to assist him through magic in setting up a new, successful tobacco shop. “Nab” is a nickname for Abel.

Sir Epicure Mammon: A Knight. He wants Subtle’s help to become very wealthy. “Mammon” is a negative word for money and wealth, which can have an evil influence on human beings and can be an object of worship — the word “worship” means “adoration.” An Epicurean is a person who devotes himself to sensual pleasure. The ancient Greek philosopher Epicurus was an atheist and a materialist.

Tribulation Wholesome: A pastor of Amsterdam. Both Tribulation Wholesome and Ananias, who are called the brethren in the play, are Anabaptists. Anabaptists were commonly regarded as members of an extremist sect of Puritanism.

Ananias: A deacon, colleague of Tribulation Wholesome. These religious brothers want Subtle’s help in getting money to help establish Anabaptism in Britain.

Kastril: The angry boy, recently come into an inheritance. He wants Subtle to teach him the protocol for quarreling. A kestrel is a small falcon. While hunting, it hovers in the air with rapidly beating wings. Kastril wants to be a roaring boy, a well-born boy who quarrels with other well-born boys. “Coistrel” is an archaic word for a troublemaker.

Dame Pliant: A widow, sister of Kastril. She wants to know her fortune in marriage. Dame Pliant is compliant.

A CLEAR-SIGHTED MAN

Pertinax Surly: A gamester, aka gambler. He sees through the deceptions. The Latin word pertinax means stubborn, obstinate, resisting, unyielding, firm. By the way, Pertinax (1 August 126 – 28 March 193) was a Roman Emperor who unsuccessfully tried to implement many reforms.

MINOR CHARACTERS

Neighbors, Police Officers, Attendants.

SCENE

The action takes place in Lovewit's house in London and on the street outside. Lovewit is mostly away in the country to escape the plague.

UNITY OF ACTION, TIME, AND PLACE

Ben Jonson's play has one main plot, with no subplots.

Ben Jonson's play takes place within one day.

Ben Jonson's play takes place in one location.

FIRST PERFORMED

Ben Jonson's play was first performed in 1610. The years 1609 and 1610 were plague years in London.

A NOTE ON SUBTLE

The serpent of the Garden of Eden was subtle.

Genesis 3:1 — King James Version (KJV)

Now the serpent was more subtil than any beast of the field which the LORD God had made. And he said unto the woman, Yea, hath God said, Ye shall not eat of every tree of the garden?

Relevant Bible Quotations

1 Timothy 6:10 — King James Version (KJV)

10 For the love of money is the root of all evil: which while some coveted after, they have erred from the faith, and pierced themselves through with many sorrows.

Matthew 6:21 — King James Version (KJV)

21 For where your treasure is, there will your heart be also.

Ecclesiastes 5:10 — King James Version (KJV)

10 He that loveth silver shall not be satisfied with silver; nor he that loveth abundance with increase: this is also vanity.

Matthew 6:41 — King James Version (KJV)

41 No man can serve two masters: for either he will hate the one, and love the other; or else he will hold to the one, and despise the other. Ye cannot serve God and mammon.

ARGUMENT (The Alchemist)

The sickness hot, a master quit, for fear,
His house in town, and left one servant there;
Ease him corrupted, and gave means to know

A cheater, and his punk; who now brought low,
Leaving their narrow practice, were become<sup>[SEP]</sup>
Cozeners at large; and only wanting some<sup>[SEP]</sup>
House to set up, with him they here contract,
Each for a share, and all begin to act.
Much company they draw, and much abuse,
In casting figures, telling fortunes, news,
Selling of flies [familiar spirits], flat bawdry with the stone,
Till it, and they, and all in fume are gone.

“In fume” is Latin for “in smoke.”

The “argument” is the plot in brief of a play or other work of art. Ben Jonson, clever man whom he was, made the argument of his play The Alchemist an acrostic: The first letter of each line spells out “THE ALCHEMIST.”

In modern English, this is the “argument” of The Alchemist:

When the plague was raging in London, the master of a house left London out of fear of catching the plague. He left behind one servant; this servant, left on his own, became corrupted through lack of an overseer, and he became acquainted with a con man and his prostitute. These two were at a low position on the Wheel of Fortune, and so they were branching away from their small-scale illegal activities and were becoming swindlers on a greater scale. To help them engage in their illegal activities, they needed a house to set up shop in, and so they made an agreement with the servant: They would act in concert to cheat suckers and then share equally in the spoils — one third to each of the three. They were able to draw many suckers to the house, and they were able to cheat and abuse them by doing such things as making and selling horoscopes, telling fortunes and gossip, selling familiar spirits of the kind that are aides to witches, and selling immorality such as prostitution, along with pretending to create a philosopher's stone, which believers supposed to be able to turn base metals such as iron and lead into silver and gold. The three con artists engaged in such swindling until their supposed philosopher's stone, and they themselves, and everything else went up in smoke.

PROLOGUE (The Alchemist)

For the few short hours it takes to read this book, the authors — Ben Jonson and David Bruce — wish away Lady Fortune, who favors fools, both for the sakes of you judging readers and for our sakes. We desire, in the place of the dumb luck of non-deserving celebrities who are rich and famous simply because they are rich and famous without having done anything (other than perhaps a sex tape) to deserve such wealth and fame, to find that you believe that the authors deserve the justice of a careful reading of this book and to find that you will show grace to this book.

The scene of our book is London because we would make known to all of you that no country causes mirth and is laughed at more than our own — Ben Jonson was born, lived, and died in London, while David Bruce is an Anglophile.

No region breeds better material for writing. London provides whores, bawds, pimps, impostors, and many more types of persons, whose chief characteristics, which were once called humors, feed the actors on the stage and the ink on the pages between book covers and the electrons on computer screens and eBook readers, and which have always been subject to the rage or the spite of comic writers.

We, the wielders of a pen and of a computer keyboard, have never aimed to afflict men, both those with and without wombs, but instead we have always aimed to better and improve men and womb-men.

However, the ages we lived or live in endure the vices that those ages — and all ages — breed, rather than to endure their cure.

But when the wholesome remedies are sweet, and in their working gain and profit meet, we authors hope to find no spirit so much diseased, but that it will with such fair corrective medicine be pleased. In other words, satire is funny medicine that can make a belly laugh and a brain think and a character reform.

We authors are not afraid that you will get to know our characters and think, Hey, I know people just like that! In fact, that's what we want to happen. It would be even better if you were to think, Hey, I'm just like that!

Are any of you readers willing to sit so near to the stream that you can see what's in it? (These days, sewage no longer runs in the streets, but how many sewage treatment plants dump sewage into a river near you?)

If you are willing to look carefully, you shall find things that you would think or wish were finished and over and done. Those things are very natural follies, but we will show them to you in the pages of this book, which is a safe place where even if you recognize that you do the same foolish things, yet you need not admit that to anyone else — or to yourself.

People may no longer believe in the philosopher's stone or the Queen of Fairy, but the love of money is still very much with us.

By the way, although it is true that no region other than London and England breeds better material for writing, it has at least two close runners-up: Ireland and the United States of America.

When Jonathan Swift died, he left £10,000 to be used for the founding of an Irish Hospital for Idiots and Lunatics. That was his final joke. As he had written earlier:

“He gave the little wealth he had

“To build a house for fools and mad [insane],

“And shew'd [showed] by one satiric touch,

“No nation wanted [needed] it so much.”

And as everyone knows, the United States of America is so arrogant that it ignores the existence of Canada, Mexico, Central America, and South America and calls itself “America” instead of “USAmerica.”

But let us be fair to USAmericans: Many of them don’t know that such places as Central America and South America exist.

ACT 1 (The Alchemist)

— 1.1 —

In the year 1610, Face and Subtle were in the midst of an argument in a room in Lovewit's house. Subtle was arguing that he deserved a bigger share of the profits, and Face was strenuously objecting. Face, who had a notable beard, was wearing a Captain's uniform, and he had drawn his sword. Subtle was carrying a vial of liquid. A worried Doll Common was also in the room.

Face threatened, "Believe it, I will."

Subtle responded, "Do your worst. I fart at you."

He turned around, bent over, and farted.

Doll, worried that passersby would hear the argument, said, "Have you lost your wits? Why, gentlemen! For the love of ___"

Ignoring Doll, Face said to Subtle, "Sirrah, I'll strip you —"

He was using "Sirrah" as an insult. It was a term used by a person of high social rank to address a man of low social rank.

Subtle said, "So you can do what? Lick the figs sticking out of my —"

Face interrupted before Subtle could end his question with the word "ass." Figs are hemorrhoids.

Face said, "Rogue, rogue, I want you to get out and stop all of your cons."

Doll said, "No. Look, Sovereign. Look, General. Are you madmen?"

Wanting the two men to stop quarreling, she had given them high and mighty titles.

Subtle said to Face, “Oh, let the wild sheep loose.”

“Mutton” is a slang word for a prostitute. Face had grabbed hold of Doll, who was standing in between the two men in an attempt to keep them from physically fighting. “Wild” means “licentious.”

Subtle continued talking to Face, “I’ll gum your silks with good strong water, if you come near me.”

The silks were fancy clothing, and the strong water was the acid in the vial that Subtle was carrying. He was threatening to throw acid on Face’s clothing and ruin it.

Doll said, “Will you have the neighbors hear you? Will you ruin everything? Do you want everyone to know what we are up to?”

“Listen! I hear somebody.”

Face began, “Sirrah —”

Subtle interrupted, “I shall mar all that the tailor has made, if you approach me.”

A tailor-made man is quite different from a self-made man. The clothing of a tailor-made man is worth more than the man wearing the clothing.

Face said, “You most notorious whelp — you pup! You insolent slave! Do you dare to do that?”

“Yes, indeed. Indeed, yes.”

Face said, “Why, who do you think I am, my mongrel! Don’t you know who I am?”

“I’ll tell you who you are,” Subtle said, “since you yourself don’t know who you are.”

Face said, “Speak lower, rogue. Don’t yell.” He did not like what he was hearing.

Subtle said, “Yes, you were once (the time is not long past) the good, honest, plain, livery-three-pound-thrum, who kept your master’s house here in the Blackfriars district during the vacations — the periods of time when the law courts are not active, and fashionable people leave London.”

He was calling Face a lowly and low-paid servant. Livery is the distinctive clothing a servant wears. Three pounds was Face’s annual salary. Thrum is poor-quality cloth — which Face’s livery was made of.

Face said, “Must you be so loud?” He did not like what he was hearing.

Subtle said, “Since then, by my means, you have been transformed into a suburb-Captain.”

Subtle had gotten a Captain’s uniform for Face to assist him in playing his part in the cons they were attempting to pull off. Face, of course, could not pass as a Captain in the army, but in the suburbs — the disreputable places outside the city — he could very well pass as a Captain.

Face said, “By your means, Doctor Dog!”

Alchemists would combine sulphur (thought of as male) and quicksilver (thought of as female). The combining was sometimes referred to as the copulation of dog and bitch.

Subtle said, “Within man’s memory, I have done all this I speak of.”

“Within man’s memory” means “You ought not to have forgotten this.”

Face said, “Why, I ask you: Have I been countenanced by you, or you by me?”

The word “countenance” is a verb meaning “support,” but Face was also punning on its meaning as a noun meaning “face.” Both Face and Subtle had helped each other to put on false “faces” that would help them to con people. Both were helping the other to put on a front.

Face added, “Do but recollect, sir, where I first met you.”

“I do not hear well,” Subtle said. He did not like what he was hearing.

Possibly, Face was trying to keep his voice low in an attempt to keep anyone outside the house from hearing the argument. (People came to the house and waited outside until they were admitted.) But if Subtle had previously been convicted of crimes, his ears could have been cut off and the loss of the shells of his ears could interfere with his hearing whispers. Subtle could possibly be wearing a headpiece that would hide his mutilation.

“Not when you hear what I have to say, I think,” Face said. “But I shall remind you, sir, of where I first met you — at Pie Corner, taking your meal of steam in from cooks’ stalls.”

Pie Corner is near Smithfield. It gets its name from the Magpie Inn, but many shops there sold meat pies. Subtle then had no money to buy food, so he was dining on the smell of the food.

Face continued, “In Pie Corner, as you were the father of hunger, you walked piteously, suffering from constipation. You had no money to buy food, and the result was that your body produced nothing that would relieve constipation. Your nose was long and thin and pinched with hunger — or syphilis — as if it were a shoehorn. Your complexion was sallow and unhealthy, and on your face were black and melancholic marks, blackheads that looked like the smuts left by grains of gunpowder on the faces of people practicing their aim with firearms on the targets in the Artillery Garden.”

Subtle said sarcastically, “I wish you could raise your voice a little.” He did not like what he was hearing.

Face continued, “Your clothing consisted of several rags pinned together that you had raked and picked from dunghills before daybreak. You wore moldy slippers on your feet because of the chilblains on your heels. You wore a hat of cheap wool and your cloak was threadbare and was scarcely long enough to cover the meager buns that you call your buttocks —”

“Sir!” an outraged Subtle objected.

Face said, “When all your alchemy and your algebra, and your minerals, plants, and animals, your conjuring, your cheating, and your dozen of trades could not relieve the corpse you call your body with as much underwear as would give you enough tinder to start a fire” — scraps of linen were used to start fires — “I gave you countenance. I gave you support, and I gave you enough credit to get your coal, your stills for distilling liquids, your vials, and your materials. I built you an oven for your alchemy. I drew in customers for you. I advanced all your black arts. I lent you, in addition, a house to pull your cons in —”

“It is your master’s house!” Subtle said.

“And there you have studied the more thriving skill of bawdry since,” Face said. “You have made my house a brothel.”

“Yes, I have been a pimp in your master’s house,” Subtle said. “I have done that in a house where you and the rats live. Don’t pretend not to know about the rats.

“I know you were a man who would keep the pantry always locked and keep the scraps of leftover food that ought to have been given to the poor. I know that you would keep the leftover beer that ought to have been given to the poor and instead sell it to the aqua-vita men who would distill it and sell the result as better liquid than it was. By pulling such cons, and by making Christmas tips by providing gambling chips for post-and-pair card games, you made yourself a ‘pretty’ stock of money, some twenty marks or approximately thirteen pounds sterling. This made you wealthy enough to converse with the cobwebs that are here in this house since your master’s wife’s death has broken up the house.”

“You might talk softer, rascal,” Face said. He did not like what he was hearing.

“No, you dung beetle,” Subtle said. “I’ll use my voice to thunder you into pieces. I will teach you how to beware to enrage a Fury again, a Fury who carries a tempest in his hand and voice.”

A Fury is an avenging spirit that rises from Hell to take vengeance on criminals such as people who murder their parent. The tempest in Subtle’s hand was the acid in the vial.

“The place has made you valiant,” Face said.

He meant the place — position, and place to live — that he, Face, had given Subtle.

“No, your clothes,” Subtle replied. He meant that Face’s undeserved Captain’s uniform had made him, Subtle, valiant. He was facing a spurious, not a real, Captain, and so he was not afraid.

Face can be forgiven if he thought that Subtle was referring to the good-quality clothing that Face had provided for him.

Face had talked about the way that he had supported and helped Subtle, but Subtle had then begun talking about the way that he had supported and helped Face.

According to Subtle, he had transformed Face — for example, from a lowly servant to a high-ranking Captain. This transformation was similar to the transformation wrought in alchemy, which was thought to be able to produce a philosopher's stone that would transform base metals such as iron and lead into valuable metals such as silver and gold.

Subtle said, "I have taken you, vermin, out of dung. You were so poor, so wretched, that no living thing would keep you company except a spider or worse. I have raised you from brooms, and dust, and watering pots. I have sublimed you, and exalted you, and fixed you in the third region, which is called our state of grace. I have wrought you to spirit, to quintessence, by taking pains that would twice have won me the philosopher's work. I have worked so hard at bettering you that if I had applied that work to alchemy, I could have created two philosopher's stones."

Subtle was using many alchemical terms. According to Subtle, he had metaphorically vaporized (sublimed) Face, concentrated (exalted) him, and stabilized (fixed) his volatility. All of this results in a state of purification. By doing so, he had brought Face to the third region, which is the highest and purest of the three regions of air. According to alchemy, when matter is heated and purified, the result is spirit — essence, which rises into the air. Quintessence is a fifth essence. The first four essences are the four elements — earth, air, fire, and water — which, according to alchemy, make up all material things. Quintessence is incorruptible and pure and is able to transform the first four essences into a harmonious whole. Quintessence is the purest form and is what alchemists think celestial bodies are made of.

Subtle believed that he had raised Face from a humble servant to a man who was on the verge of becoming rich through successful cons.

Subtle continued, “I taught you how to speak properly and how to dress fashionably. I made you fit for more than fellowships in taverns and common eating places.

“I taught you the rules for how to properly swear oaths and the rules for how to properly quarrel. I taught you the rules for how to cheat at horseraces, cockfights, card games, games of dice, and whatever other gallant tinctures that exist.”

In alchemy, a tincture can make a substance seem golden. Subtle was saying that he had taught Face how to appear to be more than a common servant.

Subtle said, “I made you a second in my own great art. I have taught you the tricks of alchemy.

“And this is what I have for thanks!

“Do you rebel now? Do you fly out in the projection! Would you be gone now?”

To fly out is to explode. The projection is the final stage of the production of the philosopher’s stone. If the projection is unsuccessful, the result is an explosion that would destroy the alchemist’s laboratory.

Subtle was saying that he had been working hard to turn Face into a philosopher’s stone that would create a lot of silver and gold, but if Face chose to rebel now the result would be a failure of all their efforts. In other words, very soon they would make a lot of money from their cons, but if Face chose to rebel now the result would be the loss of all the money they could have made.

Doll said, “Gentlemen, what do you mean to accomplish by arguing? Will you mar all? Will you ruin everything?”

The two men continued to argue.

Subtle said to Face, “Slave, you had no name, no reputation, no nothing —”

Doll said, “Will you ruin yourselves with civil war?”

Subtle continued, “You would never have been known, past equi clibanum, the heat of horse dung, underground, in cellars, or in an ale house darker than that of Deaf John’s. You would have been lost to all Mankind, except laundresses and tapsters, had I not come and raised you up.”

Again, Subtle was using alchemical language. “Equi clibanum” is Latin for “Horses’ Oven.” Horse dung produces heat as a result of decomposition. This mild heat was used in the earliest stages of trying to produce the philosopher’s stone. Subtle was saying that Face was previously in the lowest parts of society, but that he, Subtle, had taught him how to rise to much higher parts of society.

Doll said to Subtle, “Do you know who hears you, Sovereign?”

Doll was hearing Subtle. Although she knew and had known Subtle, she was still a prostitute. She had not risen in society.

Face began to say to Subtle, “Sirrah —”

Doll interrupted and said to Face, “No, General, I thought you were civil.”

She still wanted the two men to stop quarreling and not use the word “Sirrah.”

Face ignored Doll and said to Subtle, “I shall turn desperate, if you speak so loud.”

A desperate man can be a violently angry man.

Subtle said, “Go hang yourself! I don’t care if you grow desperate and out of desperation hang yourself.”

A desperate man can be a suicidal man.

Face said, “Hang yourself, collier.”

A collier is a dealer in coal and charcoal. They often had dirty faces and a reputation for cheating customers by giving incorrect weights for coal purchased. As an alchemist, Subtle used lots of coal and sometimes had a sooty face.

Face continued, “And you can go hang all your pots and pans. In a picture, I will hang you since you have angered me —”

The picture would be a publicly posted notice to alert the general public that Subtle is a con man. It would have Subtle’s picture on it.

Doll said, “Oh, this will overthrow and ruin all our work.”

Face said to Subtle, “I will write a bill and post it publicly at Saint Paul’s Cathedral. In it, I will tell everyone that you are a pimp. I will reveal all your tricks of cheating.

“I will tell how you hollow out a piece of coal, fill it with silver shavings, plug the hole with a piece of wax, burn the coal, and then show your sucker the silver in the pan — the supposed result of your alchemy.

“I will tell how you pretend to find things by using a witching device made of a sieve and scissors.

“I will tell how you use your imagination to make up horoscopes and tables of the houses — divisions — of the zodiac.

“I will tell how you use your imagination to look for the shadows — the ‘spirits’ — that appear in a crystal ball.

“I will tell all of these things in a large bill with the words written in red ink and with a woodcut of your face, which is worse than the hideous mask worn by the highwayman Gamaliel Ratsey while he committed his robberies.”

According to a pamphlet titled “Ratseis Ghost,” Gamaliel Ratsey once paid some actors to perform for him. The next day he robbed the actors of the money he had paid them.

“Are you of sound mind?” Doll asked. “Are you still in your right senses, masters, or have you lost your minds?”

Face continued, “I will create a book, one that barely covers your many, many cons, but which will still prove to be a true philosopher’s stone to printers. So many people will buy such a scandalous book that it will be very, very profitable.”

Subtle said, “Go away, you trencher-rascal! You are good for nothing except to eat other people’s food!”

A trencher is a wooden plate.

Face said, “Get out, you dog-doctor! Get out, you quack! You are the vomit of all prisons —”

Doll asked, “Will you be your own destructions, gentlemen?”

Face continued, “— always spewed out as a result of eating more than your share of the scraps of food provided for the prisoners!”

Subtle said, “Cheater!”

Face said, “Bawd!”

“Cowherd!”

“Conjurer!”

“Cutpurse! Pickpocket!”

“Male witch!”

Doll said, “Oh! We are ruined. We are lost! Have you no more regard for your reputations? Where’s your judgment? By God’s light, have yet some concern about me, who am of your republic —”

Doll made a part of the group of swindlers along with Subtle and Face, and so she was a part of their republic. In addition, the Latin respublica means “common thing.” In this society, one meaning of “thing” was genitals. As a prostitute who had sexual relations with members of the general public, Doll had a public thing. In fact, you could say that she worked in public relations. Both Subtle and Face may have slept with Doll.

Face said, “Take away this bitch! I’ll bring you, rogue, to court on account of the statute against sorcery, passed into law in tricesimo tertio — the thirty-third year — of the reign of King Henry VIII.”

In 1604, under King James I, the statute against sorcery was passed again.

Face continued, “Yes, and perhaps I’ll bring your neck within a noose, for laundering gold and barbing it.”

Gold coins were laundered by being washed in acid, which would remove some of the gold, which would be recovered and sold later. Barbing gold coins meant shaving off some of the edges of the coins. Both laundering and barbing — barbering — gold coins were punishable by death or by having one’s ears cut off.

Doll snatched Face’s sword and said, “You’ll bring your head within a cockscomb, will you?”

Many professional Fools wore hats that looked like a cockscomb — the comb, aka crest, of a rooster. Doll meant that Face was behaving like a fool.

Doll knocked Subtle's vial out of his hand and said, "And you, sir, with your menstrue — gather it up."

A menstrue is a strong solvent.

Doll said, "Damn, you abominable pair of stinkards, leave off your barking and become one team again, or by the light that shines, I'll cut your throats. I'll not be made a prey for the Marshal, for never a snarling dog-bolt of you both."

As a prostitute, Doll wanted to stay away from the Marshal, who would punish prostitutes by whipping them.

A dog-bolt is a blunt arrow. Doll was saying that the two men were doing a lot of barking but no biting.

Doll continued, "Have you two been swindling all this while, and swindling all the world, and shall it now be said that you've made the most 'courteous' decision to swindle yourselves?"

She said to Face, "You will accuse him! You will bring him into the court on account of the statute against sorcery! Who shall believe your words? You are a whorson, upstart, apocryphal — fake — Captain, whom not a Puritan in Blackfriars will trust so much as for a feather."

Feathers were used for personal adornments. Surprisingly, Puritan shopkeepers in the Blackfriars area sold feathers.

Doll said to Subtle, "And you, too, you will argue your case for a bigger share of the profits — ha! You will insult Face and me, and you will claim a primacy in the division of profits! You want the biggest portion! You must be chief! As if only you had the powder to project with!"

The powder was pulverized philosopher's stone that was sprinkled on the base metal that was to be transformed into silver or gold. This was part of the alchemical procedure called projection. Doll meant, As if only you were pulling this con!

She continued, "As if the work were not begun out of equality! As if the venture and the risk were not tripartite? As if all things were not in common! As if we three were not equal partners and no one has priority!"

She paused and then said to both men, "By God's death! You perpetual curs, make up and become a team together. Cozen kindly, and heartily, and lovingly, as you should, and don't lose the beginning of a term."

"To cozen" means "to cheat" and "to deceive" and "to con." Doll wanted the two men to cheat other men; she also wanted them to be on as good terms as if they were closely related cousins.

The beginning of the term was the beginning of one of the periods of the years when the law courts were in session. During those periods, London was filled with people and with opportunities for swindlers.

Doll continued, "If you don't make up and become friends, I shall grow factious, too, and take my own part, and quit you. I will form a faction of one, leave you two, and strike out on my own."

Face said, "It is his fault; he always moans, and he makes a fuss about the pains he is suffering and is taking, and he says that the heavy lifting of all our cons lies upon him."

Subtle said, "Why, so it does."

Doll replied, "How does it? Don't Face and I do our parts?"

Subtle said, "Yes, but they are not equal to mine."

Doll said, “Why, if your part exceeds our parts today, I hope that ours may, tomorrow, match it.”

Subtle said, “Yes, they may.”

Doll said, “May, murmuring mastiff! Yes, and they do. Death on me!”

By “Death on me!” Doll may have meant that she would be happy to be responsible for Subtle’s death and even to be hung for causing that death.

She grabbed Subtle by the throat and said to Face, “Help me throttle him.”

Subtle cried, “Dorothy! Mistress Dorothy! By God’s precious blood, I’ll do anything. What do you want?”

Doll said, “I’m doing this because of your fermentation and cibation —”

These were two of the stages of creating the philosopher’s stone. Cibation is the process of adding new materials while heating the mixture that was supposed to result in the philosopher’s stone, something necessary because of evaporation.

Doll was saying that Subtle’s brain had been fermenting with ideas to add more of the profits of the group cons to his pile of profits than were due to him.

Subtle said, “I’m not guilty of that, I swear by Heaven —”

Doll interrupted, “— and by your Sol and Luna.”

Sol, aka Sun, is an alchemical term for gold, and Luna, aka Moon, is an alchemical term for silver.

Subtle was silent.

Doll said to Face, “Help me strangle him.”

Subtle said, “If I were guilty of that, I wish that I would be hanged! I’ll behave. I’ll conform myself to your wishes.”

“Will you, sir?” Doll said. “Do so then, and quickly. Swear.”

Subtle asked, “What should I swear?”

Doll replied, “To leave your faction of one, sir, and labor kindly in the common work. Become a member of a team of three equal partners again.”

Subtle said, “Let me not breathe if I meant anything besides that. I used those speeches only as a spur to him.”

Doll said to Face, “I hope we need no spurs, sir. Do we?”

Face said, “By God’s eyelid, we’ll have a competition today to see who shall shark — swindle — best.”

“Agreed,” Subtle said.

Doll said, “Yes, and work together in a close and friendly fashion.”

Subtle said, “By God’s light, the knot among us shall grow all the stronger as a result of this quarrel, as far as I’m concerned.”

Subtle and Face shook hands.

Doll said, “Why, so it ought to be, my good baboons! Shall we go make a group of sober, scurvy, puritanical neighbors, who scarcely have smiled twice since James I became King, a feast of laughter? They will be happy to laugh at our follies.”

King James I had made some decisions that made Puritans unhappy. In 1603 at the Hampton Court Conference, he had rejected Puritan requests for ecclesiastical reforms. However, Puritans wanted people to know the Bible without intermediaries, and King James had commissioned the translation of the Bible that became known as the King James Version. The translation began in 1604 and was completed in 1611.

Doll continued, “These rascals would run themselves out of breath in order to come and to see me ride in a cart, or to see you two thrust your heads into a hole and have your ears cropped as rent for the time you spend in the pillory.”

Whores such as Doll could be shamed by being stripped to the waist and whipped as they walked behind a cart. Or whores could be made to ride in a cart to the place of punishment where they would be publicly whipped.

The alchemist Edward Kelley (1555-1597), an assistant of the astrologer Dr. John Dee, was punished for coining, aka forging, by being put in a pillory and having his ears cut off. Afterwards, he always wore a cap that hid his mutilation.

Doll continued, “Shall we be a feast of laughter for such people? No. Let’s agree that we shall not.

“My noble Sovereign and my worthy General, let’s agree that we hope Don Provost may provide a feast of laughter while wearing his old velvet jacket and stained scarves for a very long time before we contribute a new crewel garter to his most worsted worship the hangman.”

“Don” is an undeserved title for a Provost like “Sovereign” and “General” are when applied to Subtle and Face. Criminals convicted of serious crimes would ride in a cart to the place where they would be hung.

Doll was saying that it would be much better to be publicly whipped and provide laughter to onlookers than it would be to be hanged. Of course, she and the others were hoping to avoid being whipped.

The man who hanged criminals was entitled to the clothing of the people he hanged. The word “crewel” meant “worsted,” which is a kind of fabric. Doll also was punning on the word “cruel” when she said “crewel garter” — a cruel “garter” is a hangman’s rope and noose.

“Worsted” also meant “defeated” or “baffled.” Doll and her associates were hoping to continue to defeat the hangman by continuing to be not hanged by him.

The two men appreciated the jokes.

Subtle said, “Royal Doll! Spoken like Claridiana, and yourself.”

Claridiana is a character in the romance Mirror of Princely Deeds and Knighthood (1578). She was a daughter of Penthesilea, Queen of the Amazons, and she inherited Penthesilea’s armor. As a female Knight, she encroached upon social roles usually performed only by men.

By forcibly making Subtle agree to play his part in the cons without demanding a greater share of the profits, Doll Common had encroached upon a social role usually performed only by men.

Face said, “For which at supper, you shall sit in triumph, and not be stiled Doll Common, but Doll Proper, Doll Singular. Whoever draws the longest straw, this night, shall win you as his Doll Particular.”

Face was saying that he and Subtle would draw straws to see who would sleep with Doll Common that night.

A bell rang.

“Who’s that?” Subtle said. “Someone is ringing. Go to the window, Doll, and see who it is.”

Doll went to the window.

Subtle said, “Pray to Heaven, Face, that your master does not trouble us for this quarter. We don’t want him to show up unexpectedly.”

“Oh, don’t worry about that,” Face said. “As long as someone dies each week from the plague, he won’t even think about returning to London. Besides, he’s busy at his hop yards now; I have received a letter from him. If he does decide to return, he’ll send me orders to air out the house in advance, and you shall have sufficient time to leave it. Even if we have to break up within a fortnight, it doesn’t matter. We’ll have plenty of time.”

A fortnight is two weeks. “Fortnight” is short for “fourteen nights.”

Subtle asked, “Who is it, Doll?”

Doll Common replied, “A fine young quodling.”

A quodling is an unripe apple. A raw youth was at the door.

Face said, “Oh, he’s a lawyer’s clerk. I lighted on him last night, in Holborn, at the Dagger Inn. He wants to have — I told you about him — a familiar spirit to help him gamble on horse races and pick the horse that wins. He also wants the familiar spirit to help him win at cups and ball.”

Familiar spirits often take the form of an animal or fly; they assist witches or other people.

Cups and ball is a scam in which the con man has three cups and one ball, and the sucker has to guess under which cup the ball is. Actually, the ball is secreted in the con man’s hand and so the sucker will lose except for the times, which are infrequent, when the con man wants the sucker to win. (It’s not good business to have the suckers always lose.)

Doll Common said, “Oh, let him in.”

“Wait,” Subtle said. “Who shall con him?”

Face said, “Get your alchemist’s robes on. I will pretend that I am just leaving and meet him at the door.”

Doll Common asked, “And what shall I do?”

“Not be seen,” Face said. “Leave!”

Doll Common exited.

Face said to Subtle, “Seem to be very reserved. Seem reluctant to take his money.”

“Agreed,” Subtle said.

He exited to put on his robes.

Face said loudly so that the young man outside would hear, “God be with you, sir. Please let him know that I was here. His name is Dapper. I would gladly have stayed, but —”

— 1.2 —

Dapper — the young man outside — said, “Captain, I am here.”

Face said loudly so that the young man outside would hear, “Who’s that? He’s come, I think, Doctor.”

He opened the door and allowed Dapper to enter the room.

Face, still dressed in his Captain’s uniform, said, “Truly, sir, I was going away. I was just leaving.”

Dapper said, “Truly, I am very sorry to hear that, Captain Face.”

Face said, “But I thought that for sure I should meet you.”

Dapper said, “Yes, I am very glad. I had a scurvy legal document or two to make, and I had lent my watch last night to one who dines today with the Sheriff, and so I was robbed of my pass-time.”

In this society, watches were rare and expensive. If the person Dapper had lent his watch to was dining in the Sheriff’s jail, Dapper was literally robbed. But if the person really was dining with the Sheriff, Dapper was “robbed” of his watch for only a short time. Possibly, however, Dapper owned no watch but wanted to appear as if he did.

A watch is a “pass-time” because it shows time passing.

Subtle entered the room, wearing a learned man’s velvet cap and gown.

Dapper asked, “Is this the cunning-man?”

A cunning-man is a man who is knowledgeable in such things as astrology and alchemy and other occult matters.

“This is his worship,” Face replied.

“Is he a Doctor?”

“Yes.”

“And have you broached with him the matter I wish to talk to him about, Captain Face?”

That matter was a request for a familiar spirit to help him win at gambling. Such requests occurred in this society. In the 1570s, Adam Squire sold gambling flies — spirits supposedly sometimes took the form of flies. This nearly got him expelled as Master of Balliol College, Oxford.

“Yes.”

“And how did he respond?”

“He is making a lot of objections to the matter, sir, so I don’t know what to say.”

“Say it isn’t so, Captain Face.”

“I wish that I were fairly rid of this business, believe me.”

“Now you make me grieve, sir. Why should you wish that? I dare to assure you that I’ll not be ungrateful.”

“I cannot think you will be ungrateful, sir,” Face said. “But the law is a thing that demands consideration — and then he points out that Read’s matter has been in the news recently.”

“Read!” Dapper said scornfully. “He was an ass, and he dealt, sir, with a fool.”

In November 1607, Simon Read, a Doctor, had invoked three spirits to help him recover money that had been stolen from one of his clients. Presumably, the client — Toby Matthews — was the “ass” to whom Dapper was referring. In February 1608, Simon Read was pardoned.

“He was a clerk, sir,” Face said.

Dapper, who was a clerk, said, “A clerk!”

Face said, “Listen to me, sir, you know the law better, I think ___”

“I should, sir, and the danger, too,” Dapper said. “You know, I showed the statute to you.”

“So you did,” Face said.

“And will I tell then!” Dapper said.

He meant that since he knew the consequences of breaking the law against occult practices that he would not inform on Subtle and Face because he, himself, would also be guilty of breaking that law.

Dapper continued, “By this hand of flesh, I swear that I wish it might never write good court-hand any more if I reveal what the cunning-man does for me. What do you think of me? Do you think that I am a chiaus?”

“What’s that?” Face asked.

“The Turk who was here,” Dapper replied.

In 1607, a Turk arrived in London and falsely said that he was the ambassador of the Turkish Sultan. While in England, he was lavishly entertained and all his expenses were paid. As a result, chiaus — related to the Turkish word for “messenger” — became an English synonym for “cheat.”

Dapper continued, “As one would say, do you think that I am a Turk?”

“I’ll tell the Doctor,” Face said.

He would tell Subtle that Dapper was no Turk — for one thing, Dapper wasn’t intelligent enough to be very successful as a con man.

“Do, good sweet Captain Face.”

Face said to Subtle, “Come, noble Doctor, I request that you will let us prevail and help us. This is the gentleman, and he is no chiaus.”

“Captain Face, I have already told you my answer,” Subtle said.

He then said to Dapper, “I would do much, sir, for your friendship — but this I neither may, nor can, do.”

“Tut, do not say so,” Face said. “You deal now with a noble fellow, Doctor. He is a man who will thank you richly, and he is no chiaus. Let that, sir, persuade you to help him.”

Subtle said, “Please, stop —”

Face said, “He has four angels here.”

Angels are gold coins depicting the archangel Michael combating a dragon.

“You do me wrong, good sir,” Subtle said, declining to take the money.

“Doctor, how do I do you wrong?” Face said. “By tempting you with these spirits?”

“You tempt my art and love, sir, to my peril,” Subtle said. “Before Heaven, I scarcely can think you are my friend, not when you would draw me to manifest danger by tempting me to disobey the law.”

Raising spirits was a crime with severe penalties.

“I draw you!” Face said. “May a horse draw you, and to a halter. You, and your familiar spirits together —”

He was pretending to be angry and to wish that Subtle would be drawn by a horse and cart to the gallows.

Dapper said, “No, good Captain Face.”

Face said to Subtle, “You are unable to distinguish between men — men who blab, and men who can keep a secret.”

“Use good words, sir,” Subtle said. “Don’t say angry words.”

“Good deeds, sir, Doctor Dogs’ Meat,” Face said, still pretending to be angry. “By God’s light, I bring you no cheating Clim o’ the Cloughs, or Claribells, who look as big as five-and-fifty and flush, and who spit out secrets like hot custard —”

Clim o’ the Clough was an outlaw in a ballad, and Claribell was a Knight who constantly loved excessively in Edmund Spenser’s Faerie Queen. “Claribell” may be related to Latin clarus bellum — “famous [in] war.” Or Edmund Spenser may have used the name to suggest that Claribell is so fond of the ladies that he has a lady's name. However, Face may have meant that Claribell was a deceiver because he bore a deceiving name. He was a male Knight with a lady's name.

Five-and-fifty and flush is an unbeatable hand in the card game primero.

Mark Twain once put a spoonful of soup in his mouth, but it was so hot that he spit it out, shocking his fellow diners. But he was unperturbed and said, "Some darn fools would have swallowed that!"

"Captain Face!" Dagger said.

Face continued, "I did not bring him any melancholic under-scribe who would tell the vicar-general about our secret doings; instead, I brought him a special gentleman who is the heir to forty marks a year, who consorts with the small poets of the time, who is the sole hope of his old grandmother, who knows the law, and who can write for you six fair hands, who is a fine clerk and has his bookkeeping perfect, who will take his oath on the Greek Xenophon, if need be, in his pocket, and who can court his girl out of his reading of Ovid."

Consorting with small poets is the best society that Dapper can muster.

Dapper does have skills: He can write six kinds of handwriting: court-hand, secretary (both English and French), Italic, Roman, and chancery.

If Dapper needs to, he can take his oath on the Greek Xenophon he keeps in his pocket. Xenophon was an ancient Greek historian. People of the time swore on Greek Bibles, and at times Dapper might try to fool an uneducated person by swearing on a Greek Xenophon in order to avoid making a religious oath. Similarly and for the same reason, according to malicious gossip, Irish men of the time would kiss their thumbnail rather than the Bible when swearing oaths they did not want to keep.

Ovid wrote a manual of love poetry, or seduction poetry: Ars Amatoria — The Art of Love. This is the first line: “Siquis in hoc artem populo non novit amandi, / Hoc legat et lecto carmine doctus amet.” J. Lewis May translated it in 1930: “If there be anyone among you who is ignorant of the art of loving, let him read this poem and, having read it and acquired the knowledge it contains, let him address himself to Love.”

Dapper said, “No, dear Captain Face —”

“Did you not tell me so?” Face asked.

“Yes, but I want you to treat the Master Doctor with some more respect.”

“Hang him, the proud stag, with his broad velvet head!” Face said.

He was punning on “velvet,” which referred both to the Doctor’s velvet cap and to the velvet of a stag’s antlers.

Face said to Dapper, “But for your sake, I’d choke before I would exchange an article of breath with such a puck-fist.”

“Puck-fist” is the puffball fungus; it does not have an open cap like many mushrooms, and its spores are produced inside the closed cap. Face was referring to Subtle’s fist, which was empty of everything except air because he refused to accept Dapper’s money.

Face said to Dapper, “Come on, let’s go.”

He pretended to be leaving.

Subtle said, “Please let me speak with you.”

Dapper called after Face, “His worship is calling you, Captain Face.”

Face complained, “I am sorry that I ever embarked in such a business.”

Dapper said, “Good sir, he did call you.”

Face asked, “Will he take then?”

“Take” referred to “take on this business” and “take your money.”

Subtle said, “First, hear me —”

“Not a syllable, unless you take,” Face interrupted.

“Please, sir,” Subtle said.

Face said, “Upon no terms, but an assumpsit.”

An assumpsit is a verbal legal agreement. In practice, it is made binding by the payment of money.

“Your preference must be law,” Subtle said.

He took the four angels from Dapper.

Face said to Subtle, “Why now, sir, talk. Now I dare hear you with my honor. Speak. This gentleman — Dapper — may speak, too.”

“Why, sir —” Subtle said.

He began to whisper to Face, who said, “No whispering.”

This was sure to make Dapper listen carefully.

Subtle said, “Before Heaven, you do not apprehend the loss you do to yourself in this matter.”

“Loss?” Face said. “What loss?”

“By the Virgin Mary, I say that you do yourself loss by demanding that I help this man who, when he has a familiar spirit to help him gamble, will ruin you all. He’ll win all the money in the town.”

“What!” Face said.

“Yes, and he will blow up — bankrupt — gamester after gamester, just as people blow up firecrackers in a puppet-play. If I give him a familiar spirit, you may as well just give him all the money you are gambling for and with; never bet against him for he will win it all.”

“You are mistaken, Doctor,” Face said. “Why, he is asking for a small familiar spirit to help him win only at cups and horses. We aren’t talking about one of your great familiar spirits.”

Dapper said, “Actually, Captain Face, I want a familiar spirit to help me win at all games.”

“I told you so,” Subtle said to Face.

Face said to Dapper, “By God, that is a new business! I understood that you would be a tame bird and fly twice in a term, or so, on Friday nights, after you had left the office, for a nag worth forty or fifty shillings. I thought that we were talking about small stuff.”

“Yes, it is true that we did talk about small stuff, sir,” Dapper said, “but I think now that I shall quit my job and leave the law, and make my living as a gambler, and therefore —”

“Why, this changes everything,” Face said. “Do you think that I dare persuade him to give you a great familiar spirit?”

Great familiar spirits are powerful demons.

“If you please, sir,” Dapper said, “do it. All’s one to him, I see. Great familiar spirit? Small familiar spirit? All’s one to him, I’m sure.”

“What!” Face said. “By my conscience I cannot persuade him for that money, nor should you make the request, I think.”

“No, I won’t, sir,” Dapper said. “I mean to pay more money for a great familiar spirit.”

“Why, then, sir, I’ll try,” Face said.

Face whispered to Subtle, “Let’s say that the familiar spirit were for all games, Doctor. What then?”

Face and Subtle whispered, but they made sure to whisper loud enough for Dapper to overhear them.

Subtle whispered, “I say then that not a mouth shall eat at any inn except on credit because of him winning all the money. He has the mouth of a gambler, believe me.”

“Indeed!” Face whispered.

“He’ll win all the treasure of the realm, if it is staked against him.”

“Do you know this because of your occult knowledge?”

“Yes, sir,” Subtle whispered, “and I know it from my use of reason, too, which is the foundation of knowledge. He is the type of man the Queen of Fairy loves.”

“What!” Face said. “Is he?”

“Shh!” Subtle said. “He’ll overhear you. Sir, should she but see him —”

“What would happen?”

“Don’t you tell him!”

“Will he win at cards, too?” Face asked.

“You’d swear that the spirits of the dead Dutch alchemist John Holland and the living Dutch alchemist John Isaac Holland were in him because he would have such a vigorous luck that it cannot be resisted. Indeed, he’ll win all the expensive clothing of six of your gallants and leave each of them only a cloak to conceal their nakedness.”

Face said, “This is a strange and rare success that some man shall be born to!”

“He overhears you, man —” Subtle said.

Dapper said, “Sir, I’ll not be ingrateful.”

He meant that he would not be an ingrate and he would not be ungrateful.

Face said, “By my faith, I swear that I have confidence in his good nature. You heard him — he says he will not be ingrateful.”

“Why, do as you please,” Subtle said to Face. “I will go along with whatever you decide.”

“Truly, I think you should do it, Doctor. You should give him a great and powerful familiar spirit. Think that he is trustworthy, and make him.”

Dapper thought that Face was saying, Make him (Dapper) rich, but Face was actually saying, Make him (Dapper) a mark — dupe him.

Face continued, “He may make us both happy and rich in an hour. He may win some five thousand pounds, and send us two of it.”

“Believe it, and I will, sir,” Dapper said.

He was promising to send them two thousand — or just two — pounds.

“And you shall, sir,” Face said to Dapper. “Did you overhear everything we said?”

“No, what was it you said?” Dapper lied. “I overheard nothing, not I, sir.”

“Nothing!” Face said.

“I overheard a little, sir.”

“Well, a rare star reigned at your birth,” Face said.

“At mine, sir!” Dapper said. “No.”

“The Doctor swears that you are —”

“No, Captain Face, you’ll tell all now,” Subtle said.

Face continued, “— related to the Queen of Fairy.”

“To whom? Am I?” Dapper said. “Believe it, there’s no way that —”

“Yes,” Face said, “and the Doctor says that you were born with a caul on your head.”

A caul is the amniotic membrane that encloses a fetus. In this society, being born with the caul or part of the caul on top of the baby’s head was regarded as a sign of good luck for the baby.

“Who says so?” Dapper asked.

“Come on,” Face said. “You know well enough that this is true, although you are pretending not to know it.”

“I’fac, I do not,” Dapper said. “You are mistaken.”

“I’fac” was a weak version of “in faith.” It was a very weak oath, so weak in fact that Dapper would soon say that it is not a real oath.

“What!” Face said. “Swear by your ‘i’fac,’ and in a thing so well known to the Doctor? How shall we, sir, trust you in the other matter — the matter of the great familiar spirit? Can we ever think that when you have won five or six thousand pounds, you’ll send us shares in it, if you won’t tell the truth about this?”

“By Jove, sir, I’ll win ten thousand pounds, and send you half,” Dapper said. “‘I’fac’ is not a real oath.”

Subtle said, “He was only jesting when he said that.”

“Hmm,” Face said. Then he said to Dapper, “Go thank the Doctor. He’s your friend; he must be if he interprets in this way what you said.”

“I thank his worship,” Dapper said.

“So!” Face said. “Pay another angel.”

“Must I?” Dapper asked.

“Must you!” Face said. “By God’s light, what else are thanks! Will you be petty?”

He then said, “Doctor?”

Subtle held out his hand, and Dapper gave him the money.

Face asked Subtle, “When must he come for his familiar?”

“Shall I not take it with me when I leave?” Dapper asked.

“Oh, good sir!” Subtle said. “A world of ceremonies must be performed first. You must be bathed and fumigated first. Besides, the Queen of Fairy does not rise until noon.”

“Definitely not before noon, if she danced last night,” Face said.

“And she must bless the familiar spirit,” Subtle said.

“Have you ever seen her royal grace?” Face asked Dapper.

“Whom?” Dapper asked.

“Your aunt of Fairy,” Face replied.

An aunt is an older female relative; in the slang of the time, an aunt is also a bawd or a prostitute.

Subtle said, “Not since she kissed him in the cradle, Captain Face. I can answer your question.”

Face said to Dapper, “Well, see her grace, whatever it costs you, because of a thing that I know. Seeing her will be somewhat hard to do, but nevertheless see her. You are a made man, believe it, if you can see her. Her grace is an unmarried woman, and very rich; and if she takes a fancy to you, she will do exceptional things.”

The exceptional things could be done for — or to — Dapper. Face, however, wanted Dapper to think that the Queen of Fairy would remember him in her fairy will.

Face continued, “See her, in any case. By God’s eyelid, she may happen to leave you all she has — it is the Doctor’s fear.”

Subtle “feared” that the Queen of Fairy would make Dapper so lucky that he would win and own everything and then inherit even more from the Queen of Fairy.

Of course, fairies, if they existed, were supposed to be very long-lived, so the Queen of Fairy, if she existed, would be likely to long out-live Dapper, but greed often short-circuits anything resembling logical thinking.

“How will it be done, then?” Dapper asked.

“Leave it to me,” Face said. “Don’t you worry about it. Just say to me, ‘Captain Face, I’ll see her grace.’”

Dapper said, “Captain Face, I’ll see her grace.”

“Good enough,” Face said.

Knocking sounded at the door.

Subtle shouted at the door, “Who’s there? I’m coming.”

He said to Face, “Take Dapper out by the back way.”

He then said to Dapper, “Sir, before one o’clock prepare yourself. Until then you must fast. Put three drops of vinegar up your nose, two in your mouth, and one in each ear. Then bathe your fingers’ ends and wash your eyes, to sharpen your five senses, and cry ‘hum’ thrice and ‘buzz’ thrice, and then come here.”

He went to answer the door.

Face asked Dapper, “Can you remember what he said?”

“Yes, I promise you,” Dapper said.

“Well, then, go,” Face said. “All that is left is for you to bestow some twenty nobles among her grace’s servants.”

Twenty nobles was a considerable amount of money.

Face continued, “And put on a clean shirt. You do not know what grace her grace the Queen of Fairy may do for you if you wear clean linen.”

Fairies love cleanliness.

Face and Dapper exited.

Subtle opened the door and said to the man waiting there, “Come in!”

To the women waiting outside to consult him, he said, “Good wives, I ask that you wait. Truly, I can do nothing for you until the afternoon.”

He shut the door, and said to the man, “What is your name? Are you Abel Drugger?”

Face gathered information about the suckers and gave the information to Subtle.

“Yes, sir.”

“Are you a seller of tobacco?”

“Yes, sir.”

“Umph,” Subtle said. “Are you a Freeman of the Grocers’ Company?”

The Grocers’ Company was a guild that regulated trade in tobacco.

“Yes, if it pleases you, sir,” Abel Drugger said. He was a Freeman of the guild — a junior member who was said to have the freedom of the company.

“Well,” Subtle said, “what is your business with me, Abel?”

“This, if it pleases your worship,” Drugger said. “I am a young beginner, and I am building a business, a new shop, if it pleases your worship, just at a corner of a street.”

He showed Subtle a diagram and said, “Here is the building layout.”

He continued, “I would like to learn from your magical art, sir, from your worship, where I should put my door, from your magical necromancy, and where I should put my shelves, and which shelves should be for boxes, and which should be for pots. I would be glad to thrive, sir, and I was recommended to your worship by a gentleman, one Captain Face, who says you know astrology and men's planets, and men's good angels, and their bad."

Today, we might say that Subtle claimed to have a knowledge of feng shui, which <oxforddictionaries.com> defines as "(in Chinese thought) a system of laws considered to govern spatial arrangement and orientation in relation to the flow of energy (qi), and whose favorable or unfavorable effects are taken into account when siting and designing buildings."

Subtle said, "I do know men's good and bad angels, if I see them —"

Face returned and said, "What! My honest Abel! You are well met here."

"Truly, sir, I was speaking, just as your worship came here, about your worship. I ask you to speak for me and give me a good recommendation to Master Doctor."

Face said to Subtle, "He shall do anything. — Doctor, do you hear me? — This is my friend, Abel. He is an honest fellow. He lets me have good tobacco, and he does not adulterate it with sack-lees or oil, nor washes it in muscadel and grains, nor buries it in gravel, underground."

Tobacco was imported, and this society had not yet discovered how to cure — preserve — it, and so the tobacco often arrived either dried out or moldy. Dried-out tobacco could be moistened with sack-lees (wine dregs) or oil or muscadel wine or grains of cardamom spice. It could also be buried in gravel, underground, so that ground water could moisten it.

Face continued, “He keeps his tobacco in fine ornamental lily pots, that, opened, smell like the perfume made from roses, or like the sweet-smelling flowers of French — broad — beans.”

Dapper’s tobacco store was a place where people could smoke, as well as buy tobacco, and so he had the necessary equipment for doing that.

Face continued, “He has his maple block, his silver tongs, Winchester pipes, and fire of juniper.”

Tobacco was shredded on a maple block, silver tongs were used to hold a burning juniper-wood coal that would light the fine pipes that came from Winchester. Juniper wood was used because it burned slowly.

Face continued, “Drugger is a neat, spruce, honest fellow, and he is no goldsmith.”

Goldsmiths engaged in banking and were usurers. Face was saying that Drugger did not overcharge for his tobacco.

By the way, saying that Drugger was no goldsmith was an in-joke. Robert Armin, who first played the role on stage, was a goldsmith’s apprentice before he became an actor.

Subtle said, “He is a fortunate fellow, that I am sure of.”

Face said, “Sir, have you found his future already? Listen, Abel!”

Subtle said, “And he is headed in the right way toward riches —”

“Sir!” Face said.

Subtle said, “This summer he will be wearing the livery of the Grocers’ Company; he will be a Liveryman, a higher rank than his current rank of Freeman.”

A Liveryman is a full member of the guild or company, and he wears special clothing to indicate that.

Subtle continued, “And next spring he will be called to wear the scarlet clothing of a Sheriff. My advice to him is this: Spend what he can.”

“Spend” can refer to spending money or time or effort. An old-fashioned definition of “spend” is to leap or spring. Subtle’s advice seems to be for Drugger to be ambitious and to expend what money and time and effort he can to leap to higher positions — positions that will lead him to his fortune. He will have to spend money and time and effort to be successful. Of course, Subtle wanted Drugger to spend much money — all he can — in tips to Subtle.

Face said, “What, and he has so little beard! He is so young!”

Subtle said, “Sir, you must be aware that he may have a recipe to make hair grow on his face, but he’ll be wise, preserve his youth, and be fine for it. He’ll also pay a fine to get out of being Sheriff. His fortune looks for him another way.”

People who were chosen to be Sheriff could get out of filling the position by paying a fine.

“Doctor, how can you know his future so quickly? I am astonished by that!”

Subtle replied, “By a rule, Captain Face, in metoposcopy — the art of reading character by looking at the forehead — which I do work by.

“Drugger has a certain star on the forehead, which you don’t see. A chestnut or olive-colored face, which Drugger has, never fails, and his long ears show he has promise.”

Star on the forehead, chestnut or olive-colored face, long ears — this sounds like a description of an ass. Some donkeys have marks resembling a star on their forehead.

Subtle continued, “I knew his future, by certain spots, too, in his teeth, and on the nail of his mercurial finger.”

“Which finger is that?” Face asked.

“His little finger,” Subtle said. “Look.”

He asked Drugger, “You were born on a Wednesday?”

“Yes, indeed, sir.”

“The thumb, in chiromancy, aka palm reading, we give to Venus,” Subtle said. “The forefinger, to Jove; the middle finger, to Saturn; the ring finger, to Sol; the little finger, to Mercury, who was the lord, sir, of his horoscope, his house of life being Libra. This foreshowed that Drugger should be a merchant, and should trade with balance.”

In astrology, the first house is the house of life. The sign of the zodiac ascending the horizon when one is born governs the first house. Whatever planet rules the sign of the zodiac is the lord of the horoscope. Drugger was a Libra, whose symbol is a pair of scales. According to Subtle, this showed that Drugger would be a businessman, since merchants weigh some things that are for sale.

Subtle said that the planet Mercury is the lord of Drugger’s horoscope; actually, the planet Venus is the lord of Drugger’s horoscope. Subtle had made the change because Mercury is the Roman god of business. (Fittingly in this case, Mercury is also the Roman god of thieves.)

“Why, this is exceptional!” Face said. “Isn’t it, honest Nab?”

“Nab” is a nickname for Abel.

Subtle said, “There is a ship now, coming from Hormus, an island in the Persian Gulf, that shall yield him such a commodity of drugs!”

He looked at the layout of Drugger’s shop. Pointing, Subtle asked him, “This is the west, and this the south?”

“Yes, sir,” Drugger replied.

“And those are your two sides?”

“Yes, sir.”

“Make your door, then, in the south; make your broad side, west. On the east side of your shop, aloft, write the names of these spirits: Mathlai, Tarmiel, and Baraborat. Upon the north side, write the names of these spirits: Rael, Velel, and Thiel. They are the names of those Mercurial spirits that will frighten away flies and keep them from getting into your boxes of tobacco.”

“Yes, sir.”

“And beneath your threshold, bury a magnet to draw in gallants who wear metal spurs. The rest of your customers will be seen to follow them.”

“Keep that a secret, Nab!” Face said. “This is your special way of gaining customers.”

Subtle said, “And, on your stall — the display-table in front of your shop — have a mechanical puppet that can be made to move by wires or levers. Also, have some makeup that is worn by the ladies at the royal court. That will draw in the city ladies; they will want to imitate the court ladies. You shall deal much with minerals.”

Drugger said, “Sir, I have at home, already —”

Subtle interrupted, “Yes, I know you have arsenic, vitriol (aka sulphuric acid), sal-tartar (aka carbonite of potash), argol (aka tartar), alkali (aka caustic soda), and cinnabar (aka red mercuric sulphide). I know all.”

He said to Face, “This fellow, Captain, will come, in time, to be a great distiller, and he will attempt to make — I will not say he will definitely succeed, but he has a fair chance of succeeding — the philosopher’s stone.”

“Why, what you do you think about that, Abel?” Face said.

Face then asked Subtle, “Is this true?”

Subtle nodded yes.

Drugger asked, “Good Captain Face, what must I give to the cunning-man?”

“No, I’ll not advise you,” Face said. “You have heard what wealth — he advises you to spend what you can — you are likely to come to.”

Drugger said, “I would give him a crown.”

Face said, “Only a crown! And toward such a fortune? My friend, you should rather give him your shop than just a crown. Haven’t you any gold on you?”

“Yes, I have a portague, a Portuguese gold coin, that I have kept this half year,” Drugger said.

“Out with it, Nab. That’s a proper gratuity. You shall keep it no longer — I’ll give it to him for you.”

He took the coin from Drugger and said, “Doctor, Nab asks your worship to take this and buy drinks with it, and he swears that he will demonstrate more gratitude as your skill raises him in the world.”

“I would entreat another favor of his worship,” Drugger said.

“What is it, Nab?” Face asked.

“Only to look over, sir, my almanac, and cross out my unlucky days, so that I may neither bargain nor give credit on those days.”

“That he shall, Nab,” Face said. “Leave your almanac; it shall be done by this afternoon.”

Subtle said, “And I will write instructions for how to organize and stock his shelves.”

“Now, Nab,” Face said. “Are you well pleased, Nab?”

“Sir, I thank both your worships,” Druggier said.

“You may leave now,” Face said.

Druggier exited.

Face said to Subtle, “Why, now, you smoky persecutor of nature!”

As an alchemist, Subtle made a lot of fires. Alchemists are persecutors of nature because they torture base metals with fire and chemicals in their attempts to turn the base metals into silver and gold.

Face continued, “Now do you see that something’s to be done, beside your beech-coal, and your corrosive waters, your crosslets, crucibles, and cucurbites!”

All of these things were used in alchemy. Charcoal made of beech wood was very good charcoal. Corrosive waters are acids. Crosslets and crucibles are melting pots. Cucurbites are retorts, which are containers with a long downward-curving neck and a bulb at the end.

Face continued, “You must have stuff brought home to you, to work on.”

Here the “stuff” was suckers, whom it was Face’s job to find and bring to Subtle.

Face continued, “And yet you think that I am at no expense in searching out these veins, then following them, and then trying them out. Before God, I swear that my intelligence — the information I find out about suckers — costs me more money than my share of our profits often comes to in these rare works.”

Subtle said, “You are pleasant, sir.”

This meant, I’m sure you are exaggerating.

— 1.4 —

Doll Common entered the room.

Subtle asked, “What is it? What says my dainty Dollkin?”

Doll said, “The fishwife outside will not go away. And also waiting is your giantess, the bawd of Lambeth.”

Many criminals and prostitutes lived in Lambeth, which is south of the Thames River.

Subtle said, “Sweetheart, I cannot speak with them.”

Doll said, “Not before night, I have told them in a voice, through the speaking-tube, like one of your familiars.”

One of the tricks they engaged in was to use a speaking-tube to communicate with spirits and familiars. To the suckers, it seemed as if a disembodied voice were speaking.

Doll continued, “But I have spied Sir Epicure Mammon —”

“Where?” Subtle asked.

“Coming along, at the far end of the lane,” Doll said. “His feet were moving slowly, but his tongue was wagging quickly as he talked with a companion.”

Subtle ordered, “Face, go and change your clothes. Get out of the Captain’s uniform.”

Face exited.

Subtle said, “Doll, you must immediately get ready, too.”

“Why, what’s the matter?” Doll asked.

“Oh, I looked for Sir Epicure Mammon to show up here at dawn,” Subtle said. “I marvel that he could sleep. This is the day I am to perfect for him the magisterium, our great work, the philosopher’s stone, and yield it, once it is made, into his hands. About this stone he has, all this month, talked as if he were possessed.”

“Possessed” meant both “in possession of something” and “possessed by spirits, aka insane.”

Subtle continued, “He keeps thinking about what he will do with it once he has it. In his imagination he’s dealing pieces of the philosopher’s stone away.”

Some people believed that powdered philosopher’s stone could be mixed into a drink that would cure diseases and make old people young. This was known as the elixir of life. Some people even thought that drinking it made one immortal.

Of course, the philosopher’s stone doesn’t exist, and so ideas about it varied. Some people thought that the philosopher’s stone and the elixir of life were two separate things and that powdered philosopher’s stone was not part of the elixir of life.

Subtle continued, “I think I see him entering inns and dispensing the cure for venereal diseases, and entering houses infected with the plague and handing out his cure, walking Moorfields to find the lepers there, and offering citizens’ wives pomander bracelets.”

Pomander bracelets are bracelets with balls containing aromatic substances, or bracelets made of aromatic paste, and they were thought to ward off the plague. The pomander bracelets would contain some of the elixir — Sir Epicure Mammon believed that smelling it would offer immunity to the plague.

Subtle continued, “He will search the charity houses for the indigent and the diseased in order to make bawds young again, and he will search the highways for beggars to make rich.

“I see no end of his labors. He will make Nature ashamed of her long sleep when Art, who’s only a stepmother, shall do more than Nature, in her best love to Humankind, ever could.”

Art includes alchemy. If alchemy can produce the philosopher’s stone and the elixir of life, then Art can cure Humankind of diseases that come from Nature.

Stepmothers had the reputation of being less kind to children than mothers are.

Subtle continued, “If his dream lasts, he’ll turn the age to gold. This will be a Golden Age.”

Sir Epicure Mammon had done a lot of talking to Subtle about what he would do with the philosopher’s stone. That talk was all about philanthropy.

We shall see if all his desires are philanthropic.

— 2.1 —

Sir Epicure Mammon and Pertinax Surly were talking together in a room in Lovewit's house.

Sir Epicure Mammon said, "Come on, sir. Now, you set your foot on shore in Novo Orbe, the rich New World. This room is the rich Peru. And there within, sir, are the golden mines, Great Solomon's Ophir! He was sailing to it, three years, but we have reached it in ten months."

To Sir Epicure Mammon, Lovewit's house was the New World, source of riches. He believed that he would soon have the philosopher's stone and he would be very rich. He believed, along with many others, that Solomon, son of King David, got his vast wealth from possession of the philosopher's stone. The gold was made in Ophir, and every three years a fleet of ships brought gold to him.

1 Kings 10:22 states, "For the king had at sea a navy of Tharshish with the navy of Hiram: once in three years came the navy of Tharshish, bringing gold, and silver, ivory, and apes, and peacocks" (King James Bible).

Apparently, for ten months, Sir Epicure Mammon had been giving money to Subtle the alchemist to create a philosopher's stone for him.

Sir Epicure Mammon continued, "This is the day, wherein, to all my friends, I will pronounce these happy words: BE RICH; THIS DAY YOU SHALL BE SPECTATISSIMI."

The Latin word "SPECTATISSIMI" means "regarded as very special, very much looked up to."

Sir Epicure Mammon continued, as if he were speaking to all his friends, "You shall no more deal with the hollow die, or the frail card."

A hollow die is a loaded die; “die” is the singular of dice. The die would be hollowed out and then filled with lead so that a certain number would be more likely to come up. A frail card is a card that is easily broken. Here it is a playing card that can be easily marked. Sir Epicure Mammon was saying that his friends would no longer have to cheat at gambling in order to make money.

Sir Epicure Mammon continued, “You shall no more be in charge of keeping the livery-punk for the young heir, who must sign and seal a contract, at all hours, in his shirt. No more, if he denies having signed and sealed the contract, will you have to have him beaten until he admits having signed and sealed the contract — just as the young heir shall be sure to beat the person who brings him the commodity.”

This was another unethical way to make money. A livery-punk is a prostitute kept under contract. The prostitute would find a young heir to sleep with, the couple would be interrupted in their lovemaking, and the young heir would be induced to sign a contract before he could go back to his lovemaking. The contract could be a form of blackmail so that his indiscretion would not be revealed. The contract would be for a loan, but only part of the loan was given to the young heir in cash money. The rest was given to the young heir in much-overvalued commodities. For example, the contract might be for a loan of one hundred pounds: thirty pounds in money and seventy pounds in a commodity such as lute-strings, but the lute-strings would be worth much less than seventy pounds. Such a scam was highly profitable.

Sir Epicure Mammon continued, “No more shall the thirst for satin or the covetous hunger for a velvet lining for a rude-spun cloak, which would be displayed at Madam Augusta’s brothel, either make the sons of sword and hazard fall before the golden calf, and on their knees, whole nights, commit idolatry with wine and trumpets, or go a-feasting after drum and ensign.”

In other words, no more shall greed for fancy clothing and visits to brothels make gambling soldiers (“the sons of sword and hazard”) worship the golden calf, aka commit the idolatry of worshipping money. They won’t be tempted to drink and carouse and gamble — perhaps by playing craps while kneeling — in gambling places all night, and they won’t have to get their feasts by following the drum and battle flag. Instead, they will already have the money for prostitutes and feasts.

Sir Epicure Mammon continued, “There shall be no more of this. You shall beget young viceroys, and have your punks, and punketees, my Surly.”

A viceroy rules a province on behalf of a King. Punks are prostitutes, and punketees are young prostitutes.

Sir Epicure Mammon continued, “And unto you I speak it first, BE RICH.”

He then said, “Where is my Subtle, there! Within, ho!”

Face, from inside the door, said, “Sir, he’ll come to you soon.”

Recognizing Face’s voice, Sir Epicure Mammon said, “That is Subtle’s fire-drake, his Lungs, his Zephyrus, his servant who puffs his coals until he firk nature up, in her own center.”

A fire-drake is literally a fiery dragon, which was thought to be able to live in fire; metaphorically, it is the alchemist’s assistant who uses bellows to make fires burn. “Lungs” is a nickname for an alchemist’s assistant. Zephyrus is the west wind. To “firk” is to stir up.

Sir Epicure Mammon said to Surly, “You have no belief in alchemy, sir. But tonight, I’ll change all that is metal in my house to gold, and early in the morning, I will send people to all the plumbers and the pewterers and buy up their tin and lead, and I will send people to Lothbury to buy up all the copper there.”

Surly said, “What, and turn that into gold, too?”

“Yes, and I’ll purchase the tin and copper mines in Devonshire and Cornwall and make them perfect Indies! I will make them gold mines!”

The Indies were thought to be rich in gold.

Sir Epicure Mammon asked Surly, “Do you marvel now?”

“No, truly I do not.”

Sir Epicure Mammon continued, “But when you see the effects of the great medicine, aka philosopher’s stone, of which one part projected on a hundred parts of Mercury (aka quicksilver), or Venus (aka copper), or the Moon (aka silver), shall turn them to as many of the Sun (aka gold). Nay, to a thousand, and so on ad infinitum (aka to infinity), then you will believe me.”

A small amount of the philosopher’s stone was believed to change much base metal into gold.

Surly said, “Yes, when I see it, I will believe it. But if my eyes con me into seeing that without me giving them a good reason to do so — such as drinking way too much — I will be sure to have a whore piss on them the following day and put them out.”

Urine is usually acidic and can irritate the eyes. By the way, piss is one kind of golden shower.

Sir Epicure Mammon said, “Do you think I am telling fables to you? I assure you that a man who has once the flower of the Sun, the perfect ruby, which we call elixir — all of these are synonyms for the philosopher’s stone — not only can do that, but by the stone’s virtue and strength, can confer honor, love, respect, and long life and can give safety, valor, yes, and victory, to whomever he will. In just twenty-eight days, I’ll make an old man of eighty a child again.”

“No doubt; he’s that already,” Surly said. “A man of that age is in his second childhood.”

Sir Epicure Mammon said, “No, I don’t mean senility. I mean that I will restore his years and renew him, like an eagle, to the fifth age.”

This is part of Psalms 103:5: “thy youth is renewed like the eagle’s” (King James Version).

Some people believed that eagles renewed their youth by flying high up into the fiery region, plunging into the ocean, and then molting their feathers.

The fifth age is mature manhood.

Sir Epicure Mammon continued, “Drinking the elixir of life will make the once-old man beget sons and daughters — young giants — as our philosophers the ancient patriarchs have done before the great flood.”

Many of the patriarchs were long-lived, according to the Bible. This is Genesis 5:1-8 (King James Bible)

1 This is the book of the generations of Adam. In the day that God created man, in the likeness of God made he him;

2 Male and female created he them; and blessed them, and called their name Adam, in the day when they were created.

3 And Adam lived an hundred and thirty years, and begat a son in his own likeness, and after his image; and called his name Seth:

4 And the days of Adam after he had begotten Seth were eight hundred years: and he begat sons and daughters:

5 And all the days that Adam lived were nine hundred and thirty years: and he died.

6 And Seth lived an hundred and five years, and begat Enos:

7 And Seth lived after he begat Enos eight hundred and seven years, and begat sons and daughters:

8 And all the days of Seth were nine hundred and twelve years: and he died.

According to the alchemists, Adam and the other patriarchs had possession of the philosopher's stone.

Sir Epicure Mammon continued, "Just by taking, once a week, on a knife's point, the quantity of a grain of mustard of the philosopher's stone, they became as magnificent as Mars, god of war, and like Mars, they begot young Cupids."

Cupid was the result of an adulterous affair between Mars and Venus.

Surly said, "The decayed vestals of Pict Hatch would thank you. They keep the fire alive, there."

Pict Hatch was a neighborhood of thieves and prostitutes. In classical antiquity, vestal virgins would tend the fire of a temple. The "decayed vestals of Pict Hatch" are shagged-out prostitutes who tend the fire of syphilis and keep it alive. Syphilis causes a burning sensation during urination.

Sir Epicure Mammon continued, "The elixir of life is the secret of nature naturized against all infections. It cures all diseases that come from all causes. It can cure a month's suffering in a day, a year's suffering in twelve days, and an even longer suffering, no matter how much longer, in a month. It surpasses all the medicinal doses of your drugging doctors. Once I have possession of the philosopher's stone, I'll undertake, moreover, to frighten the plague out of the Kingdom of England in three months."

Surly said, "And I'll be bound that the players shall sing your praises, then, without their poets."

The players are theatrical actors. Whenever deaths from the plague exceeded forty per week, the theaters were forced to shut down. The actors would praise Sir Epicure Mammon for making it possible for them to keep the theaters open, and they would do it ex tempore without the need for playwrights to write the words for them.

Sir Epicure Mammon said, "Sir, I'll do it. In the meantime, I'll give so much preservative to my servant that it shall serve the whole city. Each week, each house shall receive a dose, and at the rate —"

Surly interrupted, "As he who built the waterworks does with water!"

In 1582, Peter Moris built a pump-house to deliver, for a fee, water from the Thames River to private houses, and in 1594, Bevis Bulmer built a second pump-house for the same purpose. In 1610, a new aqueduct was under construction.

Sir Epicure Mammon said, "You are incredulous. You don't believe me."

Surly said, "Indeed, my character is such that I would not willingly be gulled, aka cheated. Your stone cannot transmute me. It cannot change my character."

Sir Epicure Mammon said, "Pertinax Surly, will you believe antiquity? Will you believe records? I'll show you a book where Moses and his sister and Solomon have written of the alchemical art. Yes, and I will show you a treatise penned by Adam.”

“Pertinax” means “stubborn.”

Some people believed that Adam, the first man, was also the first alchemist. Some people mistakenly conflated Miriam, the sister of the Biblical Moses, with Mary the Jewess, an alchemist who lived in the third century C.E. Some people thought that the Song of Solomon was a coded alchemical text.

“What!” Surly said.

“Adam wrote a treatise on the philosopher’s stone, and in High Dutch.”

Today, we call High Dutch High German.

Surly asked, “Did Adam write, sir, in High Dutch?”

“He did, which proves it was the primitive tongue.”

In 1569, Johannes Goropius Becanus wrote Origines Antwerpianae. In it, he stated that Adam and Eve spoke High Dutch in the Garden of Eden.

Surly asked, “What paper did Adam write on?”

“He wrote on cedar board.”

Surly asked, “Oh, that, indeed, they say, will last against worms.”

Cedar is a long-lasting wood that is resistant to rotting.

Sir Epicure Mammon said, “It is like your Irish wood is against cobwebs.”

Saint Patrick was said to have blessed Irish wood by giving it protection against spiders.

Sir Epicure Mammon said, “I have a piece of Jason’s fleece, too, which was no other than a book of alchemy, written on a large sheepskin, a good fat ram-vellum.”

Jason and the Argonauts sailed to acquire the Golden Fleece, which alchemists believed to have a book of alchemy written on the skin side.

Sir Epicure Mammon said, “Such was Pythagoras’ thigh and Pandora’s tub, or box.”

Some people thought that Pythagoras, best known today for his Pythagorean theorem (the square of the hypotenuse — which is the side opposite the right angle — is equal to the sum of the squares of the other two sides), had a thigh made of gold.

Some people thought that Pandora’s box, in which were the evils that afflict Humankind, was either made of gold or contained the secret of creating the philosopher’s stone.

The alchemists believed that much ancient history contained references to alchemy. For example, Sir Epicure Mammon will now tell Surly that Jason’s quest for the golden fleece is an allegory for an alchemist’s quest for the philosopher’s stone.

Sir Epicure Mammon said, “Such was all that fable of Medea’s charms; it explained the manner of our work.”

Jason and the Argonauts sailed to Colchis, which was on the shore of the Black Sea. There, the young witch Medea fell in love with Jason and helped him acquire the golden fleece. Jason first used fire-breathing oxen to plow a field, and then he sowed it with dragon’s teeth. Armed warriors grew from the dragon’s teeth. Medea had told Jason to throw a stone into the midst of the warriors. Not knowing where the stone had come from, the warriors fought and killed each other. Jason then went to the tree on which hung the golden fleece.

A dragon guarded the golden fleece, but Medea gave Jason a potion that put the dragon to sleep.

Sir Epicure Mammon continued, “In the allegorical fable the fire-breathing bulls represent the alchemical furnace, which continually breathes fire.

“The dragon represents the alchemical argent vive, which is quicksilver and which is symbolized by a dragon in alchemical texts.”

Argent vive is Latin for “living silver.”

He continued, “The dragon’s teeth represent mercury sublimate, aka chloride of mercury, that keeps the whiteness, hardness, and the biting.

“And the dragon’s teeth are gathered into Jason’s helm, aka helmet, which represents the alchemical piece of equipment known as the alembic (the upper part of the distilling apparatus), and then sowed in Mars’ field (another piece of alchemical equipment: an iron vessel; Mars was the god of iron) and thence sublimed (refined) so often until they’re fixed (solid and stabilized).

“The story of Jason’s quest for the golden fleece, the Hesperian garden, Cadmus’ story, Jove’s shower, the boon of Midas, Argus’ eyes, Giovanni Boccaccio’s Demogorgon, and thousands more stories are all abstract allegories about the philosopher’s stone.”

The Hesperides, who are nymphs of the evening, had a garden in which golden apples, guarded by a dragon, grew. One of Hercules’ famous labors was to get possession of these golden apples.

Cadmus sowed a field with dragon’s teeth. Armed warriors grew from the teeth, and then Cadmus fought them until only five were left alive. Cadmus and those five warriors founded the city of Thebes.

King Midas of Phrygia asked for and received a gift from the god Bacchus: Anything he touched would turn to gold.

Jove appeared before the mortal Danaë in a shower of gold in order to have sex with her.

Argus was a giant with one hundred eyes.

The Italian writer Giovanni Boccaccio wrote in his De Genealogia Deorum (On the Genealogy of the Gods) that Demogorgon was the origin of all things.

Face, wearing the clothing of an alchemist's assistant, entered the room. His face was bearded and sooty.

“What is it?” Sir Epicure Mammon asked. “Do we succeed? Has our day come? How is it going?”

Face said, “The evening will set red upon you, sir. You have color for it: crimson. The red ferment has done its work. Three hours from now you will see projection — the final part of the process. You will see the philosopher's stone.”

People believed that the philosopher's stone was red.

Sir Epicure Mammon said, “Pertinax, my Surly, again I say to you, out loud, BE RICH. This day, you shall have ingots of precious metal, and, tomorrow, you shall insult proud lords by looking them directly in the face rather than being obsequious to them.”

He said to Face, “Is it, my Zephyrus, right? Does the bolt's-head flask blush red?”

Zephyrus is the west wind; Sir Epicure Mammon used the word as a new nickname for Face, aka Lungs, who used bellows to keep the fire at the right temperature.

Face replied, “It blushes like a wench, sir, whose pregnancy was just now revealed to her master.”

Sir Epicure Mammon said, “Excellent, witty Lungs!”

He added, “My only care is where to get enough base metal now to project on and turn to gold. This town will not half serve me.”

“It won’t, sir?” Face said. “Then buy the covering off of churches. Their roofs are made of lead.”

Sir Epicure Mammon said, “That’s true.”

“Yes,” Face said. “Let the churches stand bare-headed, as do their congregations, or cap them — give them a new roof — with wooden shingles.”

“No, good thatch,” Sir Epicure Mammon said. “Thatch will lie light upon the rafters, Lungs.”

With all his wealth, he wanted to re-roof the church with inexpensive thatch — a fire hazard. In 1613, the Globe Theater burned down after its thatch roof caught on fire.

Sir Epicure Mammon said, “Lungs, I will free you from the furnace, I will restore your complexion to you, Puff — your complexion that you lost in the embers — and I will repair this brain of yours that has been hurt by the fumes of the metals.”

Alchemists’ assistants tended to have wan complexions.

Face said, “I have blown the bellows, sir, hard for your worship. I have thrown to the side many a coal when it was not beech wood, which is needed to create a steady temperature. I have exactly weighed those I put in, in order to keep the heat of the fire always even.

“These bleared eyes of mine have waked to read the several colors, sir, of the creation of the philosopher’s stone.

“These bleared eyes of mine have seen the pale citron: yellow.

“These bleared eyes of mine have seen the green lion: green.

“These bleared eyes of mine have seen the crow: black.

“These bleared eyes of mine have seen the peacock’s tail: multi-colored.

“These bleared eyes of mine have seen the plumed swan: white.”

Sir Epicure Mammon asked, “And, finally, you have descried the flower, the sanguis agni: red?”

“Sanguis agni” is Latin for “blood of the lamb.” Red is the color seen in the last stage of creating the philosopher’s stone.

“Yes, sir,” Face said.

“Where’s your master?” Sir Epicure Mammon asked.

“He’s at his prayers, sir,” Face replied. “Good man that he is, he’s doing his devotions for the success of this project.”

Sir Epicure Mammon said, “Lungs, I will set an end to all your current labors. You shall be the master of my seraglio — my harem.”

“Good, sir,” Face said.

“But do you hear? I’ll geld you, Lungs,” Sir Epicure Mammon said.

In order to prevent Face, aka Lungs, from having sex with any of the women in Sir Epicure Mammon's harem, Sir Epicure Mammon would castrate him.

He added, "For I intend to have a list of wives and concubines equal with those of Solomon, who had the philosopher's stone as will I."

1 Kings 11:1-3 states this:

1 But king Solomon loved many strange women, together with the daughter of Pharaoh, women of the Moabites, Ammonites, Edomites, Zidonians, and Hittites:

2 Of the nations concerning which the Lord said unto the children of Israel, Ye shall not go in to them, neither shall they come in unto you: for surely they will turn away your heart after their gods: Solomon clave unto these in love.

3 And he had seven hundred wives, Princesses, and three hundred concubines: and his wives turned away his heart.

Sir Epicure Mammon continued, "And with the use of the elixir of life, I will make my back as tough as the back of Hercules, in order to sleep with fifty women a night."

According to mythology, Hercules had sex with and impregnated the fifty daughters of King Thespius in a single night. (Some sources say only forty-nine of the fifty daughters.)

Sir Epicure Mammon then asked, "You are sure you saw the color of blood?"

"Both blood and spirit, sir," Face said. "I saw both the correct color and the correct quality."

Sir Epicure Mammon said, "I will have all my beds blown up with air, not stuffed. Down is too hard. And I will then have my room filled with such pictures as Tiberius took from Elephantis, and dull Aretine only coldly imitated.”

The Roman Emperor Tiberius had paintings illustrating passages from Elephantis’ pornographic books, and Aretine wrote erotic poems imitating such passages and pictures. Sir Epicure Mammon believed that Aretine’s erotic poetry was dull; it could not compete with his own erotic daydreams.

Sir Epicure Mammon continued, “Then I will have my mirrors cut in more subtle angles to disperse and multiply the figures, as I walk naked between my succubae.”

Succubae are demons who take the form of women and have sex with men. The word is also used for sluts and prostitutes, but Sir Epicure Mammon may very well have wanted to have sex with female demons.

Sir Epicure Mammon continued, “I’ll have built a mechanism that will spray perfume into the air of the room so that we can lose ourselves in it, and my baths will be big like pits to fall into. From these my succubae and I will come forth and roll ourselves dry in gossamer and roses.”

He asked Face, “Is it arrived at ruby-red?”

Without waiting for a reply, he continued, “Where I spy a wealthy citizen, or a rich lawyer who has a sublime, pure wife, to that fellow I’ll send a thousand pounds for him to be my cuckold.”

Face, who was interested in money, asked, “And shall I carry it to him?”

Sir Epicure Mammon replied, “No. I’ll have no bawds except fathers and mothers. They will do it best, better than all others.”

He wanted fathers and mothers to be bawds and sell their daughters to satisfy his lust.

Sir Epicure Mammon continued, “And my flatterers shall be the purest and gravest of divines that I can get for money. My mere Fools shall be eloquent Members of Parliament, and then my poets will be the same who wrote so subtly of the fart — I will employ them to write about that subject.”

In 1607, Sir Henry Ludlow, Member of Parliament, loudly and famously farted during a session of the House of Commons: It was his commentary on a message from the House of Lords.

Sir Epicure Mammon continued, “There are a few men who would give out themselves to be studs at court and in town and everywhere. These men tell lies about ladies who are known to be very innocent of any sexual contact with these braggarts. These men I will hire and I will make them eunuchs. And they shall fan me with ten ostrich tails apiece — tails gathered in a plume to create wind when waved.”

Using another nickname for Face, he continued, “We will be brave, Puff, once we have the medicine, the Philosopher’s Stone.

“My food shall all come in, in Indian shells, dishes of agate set in gold, and studded with emeralds, sapphires, the precious stones known as hyacinths, and rubies.

“I will eat the tongues of carps, dormice, and camels’ heels, boiled in a distillate of gold, and dissolved pearl — Apicius’ diet, against the epilepsy.”

Apicius was a Roman glutton who spent his fortune on food and then committed suicide. As protection against the plague (not epilepsy, as Sir Epicure Mammon had stated), he ate such foods as camels’ heels.

Sir Epicure Mammon continued, “And I will eat these broths with spoons of amber that are decorated with diamond and carbuncle.

“My footboy shall eat pheasants, calvered salmons, knots, godwits, and lamprey eels.”

Calvered salmons are salmon that have been sliced up while still alive. Sir Epicure Mammon was willing for this to happen if it would make a good dish for his footboy to eat.

Knots and godwits are species of birds.

Sir Epicure Mammon continued, “I myself will eat the beards of barbels served, instead of salads.”

The “beards of barbels” are fleshy filaments of a species of fish. They hang from the fish’s mouth and look like beards.

He continued, “I will eat oiled mushrooms, and I will eat the swelling unctuous paps of a fat pregnant sow, newly cut off and dressed with an exquisite and poignant sauce.”

According to the Roman historian Pliny, a sow’s paps tasted best when cooked after the sow had given birth but before it had suckled its piglets. Sir Epicure Mammon was willing for this to happen if it would make a good dish for him to eat.

He continued, “For which, I’ll say to my cook, ‘There’s gold for you; go forth, and be a Knight.’”

In the reign of King James I, people could purchase Knighthoods.

Face said, “Sir, I’ll go look a little, and see how the alchemical process is going and how the color heightens.”

Sir Epicure Mammon said, “Do.”

Face exited.

Sir Epicure Mammon said, “My shirts I’ll have made of the fine silk cloth known as taffeta-sarsnet, which is as soft and light as cobwebs, and as for all my other raiment, it shall be such as might provoke the Persian, if he were to teach the world about riotous and dissipated behavior again.”

The Persian is Sardanapalus, a King of Ninevah who was renowned for luxurious living.

Sir Epicure Mammon continued, “My gloves will be made of fishes’ and birds’ skins, perfumed with gums of paradise, and eastern air —”

“Gums of paradise” are perfumes from the Middle East, where people believed the Garden of Eden was located.

Surly asked, “And do you think to have the philosopher’s stone with all this?”

Sir Epicure Mammon replied, “No, but I do think to have all this with the philosopher’s stone.”

Surly said, “Why, I have heard, the man who gets the philosopher’s stone must be homo frugi — a frugal man, an honest and temperate man, a pious and holy and religious man, a man free from mortal sin, and a man who is a complete virgin.”

Sir Epicure Mammon replied, “The man who makes the philosopher’s stone must be such a man, sir, but I am buying, not making, it. My investment brings it to me. Subtle the alchemist is an honest wretch; he is a notable, superstitious-in-the-sense-of-believing-religion, good soul. He has worn his knees bare and his slippers bald by praying and fasting for the philosopher’s stone, and, sir, let him do it alone, for me, always.”

Seeing Subtle entering the room, Sir Epicure Mammon said, “Here he comes. Don’t say a profane word in front of him; it is poison.”

This was the day the philosopher's stone was supposed to be completed. Of course, it would not be completed because no such thing as a philosopher's stone exists or ever will exist. Therefore, Subtle and Face and Doll Common needed to prepare Sir Epicure Mammon for the inevitable failure that would become apparent later. They already knew the excuse they would use, but they had to prepare Sir Epicure Mammon to accept that excuse.

Subtle and Face also needed to keep Sir Epicure Mammon believing in alchemy. They did that by using many alchemical terms as they talked about “creating” the philosopher's stone. Basically, this was to appear knowledgeable about alchemy and to baffle Sir Epicure Mammon with bullshit.

Much alchemy was about uniting materials, materials often referred to as male and female. In fact, one piece of alchemical equipment — the bolt's-head flask — was often decorated with illustrations of copulating couples. The alchemist, however, was supposed to be pure and neither greedy nor immorally horny. Purity was important in the production of the philosopher's stone.

Sir Epicure Mammon said to Subtle the alchemist, “Good morning, father.”

He was addressing Subtle as if he were a priest — a religious father.

Picking up on that, Subtle said, “Gentle son, good morning, and good morning to your friend there. Who is this man who is with you?”

“He is a heretic, whom I brought along with me in hopes, sir, to convert him,” Sir Epicure Mammon said.

Subtle said, “Son, I fear that you are covetous because thus you meet your time in the just point — you are punctual, or actually, more than punctual. This is the day the philosopher’s stone will be completed, but you have some hours before its completion. You anticipate the success that will occur late in the day by appearing here in the morning. This is evidence that makes me fear that you have a burdensome, unrelenting, and carnal appetite.

“Be careful so that you do not cause the blessing of the philosopher’s stone to leave you on account of your ungoverned haste.”

Earlier, Pertinax Surly had stated that the person who got the philosopher’s stone was supposed to be a man of temperance. Such things as greed and lust could cause failure in the attempt to make a philosopher’s stone. Greed could appear in haste to complete the making of the philosopher’s stone.

Subtle continued, “I would be sorry to see my labors, which are now at the point of perfection, got by staying awake and watching long hours during the night and by much patience, not prosper where my love and zeal has placed them.

“My labors in all aims — I call on Heaven along with yourself, to whom I have poured my thoughts, to witness that what I say is true — have looked no way but to the public good, to pious uses, and to dear charity, which men these days regard as an abnormality.

“Regarding my labors in creating the philosopher’s stone, I say that if you, my son, should now prevaricate and wander from the straight and narrow path of virtue, and to your own particular and personal lusts employ so great and catholic, aka universal, a bliss, be sure that a curse will follow, yes, and overtake and strike a blow against your subtle and most secret ways.”

“I know that, sir,” Sir Epicure Mammon said. “You shall not need to fear me. I have come so early only to have you prove this gentleman wrong in his opinion that alchemy is worthless.”

Surly said, “I am, indeed, sir, somewhat constipative when it comes to producing belief in your philosopher’s stone. I am a man who does not want to be gulled.”

Given his choice of words, Surly regarded belief in the philosopher’s stone as shit.

Subtle said to Sir Epicure Mammon, “Well, son, all that I can convince your friend in is this: THE WORK IS DONE. Bright sol is in his robe — the essence of gold is ready to do its work, just as a judge is who has put on his robe. We have a medicine of the triple soul, the glorified spirit. Thanks be to Heaven, and may Heaven make us worthy of it!”

By “triple soul,” Subtle may have meant the three spirits (vital, a spirit produced in the heart; natural, a spirit produced in the liver; and animal, a spirit produced in the brain) that linked soul to body.

Subtle called for Face, “Ulen Spiegel!”

Till Eulenspiegel is a German trickster figure. By calling Face Ulen Spiegel, Subtle was subtly acknowledging Face as a con man.

Face entered the room and said, “At once, sir!”

Now Subtle and Face began to pile on the alchemical jargon to baffle their visitors with bullshit.

Subtle ordered, “Look well to the register, and let your heat still lessen by degrees, to the aludels.”

Face said, “Yes, sir.”

Subtle and Face began to make it appear that they were running simultaneous operations by using letters to refer to different apparatus.

“Did you look at the bolt’s-head yet?”

“On which apparatus? On D, sir?”

Subtle replied, “Yes. What’s the complexion?”

Face said, “Whitish.”

“Infuse vinegar, to draw the volatile substance and the tincture, and let the water in glass E be filtered, and put into the gripe’s egg. Lute it well, and leave it closed in balneo.”

“I will, sir.”

Surly said to himself, “What a brave, splendid language is being used here! It’s next to canting.”

“Canting” is using jargon used by thieves; “cant” is thieves’ jargon. Surly meant that the alchemical terms were at least close to being thieves’ terms.

Subtle said to Sir Epicure Mammon, “I have another work going on, son, that you have never seen. Three days since past the philosopher’s wheel, in the lent heat of Athanor this work has become the Sulphur of Nature.”

The Sulphur of Nature is purified sulphur.

“Is it for me?” Sir Epicure Mammon asked.

“What do you need it for?” Subtle asked. “You have enough in that philosopher’s stone, which is perfect.”

“Oh, but —”

Subtle said, “Why, this is covetousness!”

Sir Epicure Mammon said, “No, I assure you that I shall employ it all in pious uses. I will found colleges and grammar schools. I will marry young virgins. I will build hospitals, and now and then a church.”

He probably meant for Subtle to think that he — Sir Epicure Mammon — would get young virgins married by providing dowries for them, but readers can be forgiven if they thought that Sir Epicure Mammon would “marry” young virgins for one night and discard them the following morning.

Face returned.

“What is it?” Subtle asked.

Face said, “Sir, if it pleases you, shall I not change the filter?”

“By the Virgin Mary, yes. And bring me the complexion of glass B.”

Face exited.

“Have you another?” Sir Epicure Mammon asked.

He was asking if they were making a second philosopher’s stone.

Subtle replied, “Yes, son. If I were sure that your piety is firm, we would not lack the means to glorify it, but I hope the best. I mean to tinct C in a bath of sand to diffuse the heat tomorrow, and give it imbibition.”

Sir Epicure Mammon, who had been around Subtle the alchemist long enough to recognize some of the alchemical terms, asked, “Of white oil?”

“No, sir, of red,” Subtle said. “F is come over the helm, too, I thank my maker, in Saint Mary’s bath, and shows lac virginis. Blessed be Heaven!”

“Lac virginis is Latin for “milk of the virgin.” Alchemists used it to refer to mercury.

Subtle continued, “I sent you of his sediment there calcined. Out of that calx, I have won the salt of mercury.”

“By pouring on your rectified water?” Sir Epicure Mammon asked.

“Yes,” Subtle replied, “and reverberating in Athanor.”

Face returned.

“What’s the news?” Subtle asked. “What color is it?”

“The ground is black, sir,” Face said.

Sir Epicure Mammon asked, “That’s your crow’s head?”

Surly said to himself, “Your cockscomb, is it not?”

Some professional Fools wore a hat resembling a cockscomb.

Subtle said to Sir Epicure Mammon, “No, it is not perfect. I wish it were the crow! That work lacks something.”

Surly said to himself, “Oh, I looked for this.”

He knew that Subtle and Face were con men and would not be able to produce the philosopher’s stone. He figured that they would say that something had gone wrong in their attempt to make the philosopher’s stone.

Surly said to himself, “The hay’s a pitching.”

A rabbit’s burrow has two holes, two ways to enter and exit. Trappers would pitch (throw) a hay (net) over one of burrow holes and send a ferret down the other hole. To escape the ferret, the rabbit would come out of the hole and be caught in the net. Surly believed that Subtle and Face were preparing a trap for Sir Epicure Mammon.

Subtle asked Face, “Are you sure you loosed them in their own menstrue!”

Face replied, “Yes, sir, and then married them, and put them in a bolt’s-head nipped to digestion, according as you bade me, when I set the liquor of Mars to circulation in the same heat.”

Bolt’s-head flasks can be connected to other pieces of equipment. Marriage was an important concept in alchemy and referred to union of pieces of equipment or to union of materials in a flask.

Subtle said, “The process then was right.”

Face replied, “Yes, by the token, sir, the retort broke, and what was saved was put into the pelican, and signed with Hermes’ seal.”

The pelican is a distilling flask with a neck that curves down and joins to itself. It is called a pelican because people thought it resembled a pelican biting itself. People at this time thought that pelicans bit themselves to draw blood to feed their young.

Instead of saying “Hermes’ seal,” we now say “hermetically sealed.”

Subtle said, “I think it was right. We should have a new amalgama.”

Surly said to himself, “Oh, this ferret is as rank and stinky as any polecat.”

Subtle added, “But I don’t care. Let it even die; we have enough besides in embrion. H has its white shirt on?”

“In embrion” means “in the early stages.”

“Has its white shirt on” means “has turned white.”

“Yes, sir,” Face said. “It’s ripe for inceration; it stands warm in its ash-fire. I wish that you wouldn’t let any die now, if I might counsel you, sir, for luck’s sake to the rest. Letting some die is not good.”

“He says the right thing,” Sir Epicure Mammon said.

Surly said to himself, “Have you — Sir Epicure Mammon — bolted from your burrow and been caught in the net?”

Face said, “I know it, sir. I have seen the ill fortune that comes from letting some of it die. What we need is some three ounces of fresh materials.”

“No more than that?” Sir Epicure Mammon asked.

“No more, sir,” Face said. “We need three more ounces of gold to amalgame with some six ounces of mercury.”

“Go and get the materials,” Sir Epicure Mammon said. “How much money do you need?”

“Ask him, sir,” Face said.

Sir Epicure Mammon asked Subtle, “How much?”

“Give him nine pounds,” Subtle said. “No, you better give him ten.”

Surly said to himself, “Yes, give him twenty pounds, and you’ll be cheated, if you do.”

“There it is,” Sir Epicure Mammon said, giving Face the money.

“This is not necessary,” Subtle said, “except that you will have it so, so that you can see the conclusions of all of it: You don’t want to see any of it die.”

He paused and then added, “Two of our inferior works are at fixation, but a third is in ascension.”

As Face knew, he was referring to Dapper and Drugger as the inferior works; they were small fish — and suckers — in comparison to Sir Epicure Mammon, who was the man they were making the most money from.

Subtle then said to Face, “Go,” but he added, “Have you set the oil of luna in kemia?”

“Yes, sir.”

“And the philosopher’s vinegar?”

“Yes,” Face said, and then he exited.

Hearing the references to oil and vinegar, Surly said to himself, “We shall have a salad!”

He was punning. He knew something about alchemy, which is why he knew it is a scam, and he knew that “salad” was a real alchemical term referring to a mixture of certain materials.

Sir Epicure Mammon asked, “When do you make projection?”

Subtle replied, “Son, don’t be hasty. I exalt our medicine, by hanging him in balneo vaporoso, and giving him solution, and then congeal him, and then dissolve him, and then again congeal him.”

Balneo vaporoso is a steam bath in which Subtle would suspend a glass flask.

Subtle continued, “For look, as often as I iterate the work, so many times I add to the philosopher stone’s virtue and strength.”

He was referring to multiplication, which is refining the philosopher’s stone to increase its potency so that a little of the philosopher’s stone will turn a vast quantity of base metal into gold. Multiplication involved, in part, what alchemists referred to “solution.”

Subtle continued, “As, if after one solution one ounce of the philosopher’s stone will convert a hundred ounces of base metal into gold or silver, after its second solution one ounce of the philosopher’s stone will convert a thousand ounces of base metal into gold or silver.

“After its third solution, one ounce of the philosopher’s stone will convert ten thousand ounces of base metal into gold or silver.

“After its fourth solution, one ounce of the philosopher’s stone will convert a hundred thousand ounces of base metal into gold or silver.

“After its fifth solution, one ounce of the philosopher’s stone will convert a thousand thousand ounces of base metal into gold or silver.

“This will be pure gold or silver, as will be shown by all examinations; it will be as good as the gold or silver that comes out of a natural mine.

“Bring your metal stuff here in preparation for this afternoon so that it can be turned into precious metals. Bring here your brass, your pewter, and your andirons.”

Andirons hold the burning logs in a fireplace.

Sir Epicure Mammon asked, “Not those of iron?”

“Yes, you may bring them, too,” Subtle said. “We’ll change all kinds of base metals.”

Sir Epicure Mammon thought that Subtle would change all kinds of base metals into gold or silver.

Surly said to himself, “I believe you when you say that.”

Surly believed that Subtle would change possession of all kinds of base metals from Sir Epicure Mammon to Subtle.

Sir Epicure Mammon said, “Then may I send my spits?”

Subtle replied, “Yes, and your racks.”

Racks support the spits when they are used for roasting meat.

Surly asked, “And shall he bring dripping-pans, and pot-hangers, and hooks?”

Subtle replied, “If he pleases —”

Surly interrupted, “— to be an ass.”

“What do you mean, sir?” Subtle asked.

Sir Epicure Mammon said to Subtle, “You must bear with this gentleman. I told you he had no faith.”

“And little hope, sir,” Surly said. “But much less charity, if I should gull and deceive myself.”

1 Corinthians 13:13 states, “And now abideth faith, hope, charity, these three; but the greatest of these is charity” (King James Bible).

Subtle asked Surly, “Why, what have you observed, sir, in our art of alchemy, that seems so impossible?”

Surly replied, “Only your whole work of alchemy, no more. That you should hatch gold in a furnace, sir, just like they hatch eggs in a furnace in Egypt!”

According to the Roman historian Pliny, eggs were incubated in Egypt.

Subtle asked Surly, “Sir, do you believe that eggs are hatched so?”

“What if I do?” Surly asked.

Subtle replied, “Why, I think that the greater miracle is a chicken being produced from — hatching out of — an egg. The lesser miracle is gold being produced from a base metal. An egg is much more different from a chicken than lead is from gold.”

“That cannot be,” Surly said. “The egg’s ordained by nature to that end; the egg is a chicken in potentia.”

“In potentia” is Latin for “potentially.”

Subtle said, “We alchemists say the same thing about lead and other metals: They would become gold, if they had enough time.”

Sir Epicure Mammon said, “The art of alchemy is to speed that process up; alchemists change lead into gold much more quickly than it happens naturally.”

Subtle said, “That is true. It would be absurd to think that nature bred perfect gold in the earth in an instant. Gold did not come from nothing. Something existed before gold. Remote matter must have existed.”

According to alchemy, remote matter is what came before gold and everything else. Remote matter is the original indeterminate matter and/or essence from which everything else developed.

Surly asked, “What is that?”

Subtle began, “Indeed, we alchemists say —”

Sir Epicure Mammon interrupted, “— now it heats. Stand, father, pound him to dust.”

Subtle continued, using much alchemical jargon, “It is, of the one part, a humid exhalation, which we call materia liquida, or the unctuous water.”

“Materia liquida” is Latin for “liquid matter.”

Subtle continued, “On the other part, a certain crass and viscous portion of earth; both which, concorporate, do make the elementary matter of gold, which is not yet propria materia, but is common to all metals and all stones.”

“Concorporate” means “united in one body.”

“Propria material” is Latin for “a particular substance.”

Subtle continued, “For, where it is forsaken of that moisture, and has more dryness, it becomes a stone.

“Where it retains more of the humid fatness, it turns to sulphur, or to quicksilver, which are the parents of all other metals.

“Nor can this remote matter suddenly progress so from extreme to extreme as to grow gold immediately and leap over all the intermediate steps.

“Nature first begets the imperfect, and then she proceeds to the perfect.

“From that airy and oily water, mercury is engendered. From the fat and earthy part, sulphur is engendered.

“The latter, sulphur, supplies the place of male, while mercury supplies the place of female, in all metals. The male is active and acts, while the female is passive and suffers.

“Some alchemists believe in hermaphrodeity — that both do act and suffer.

“But these two make the rest ductile, malleable, extensive.

“And they are even in gold, for we alchemists find seeds of them, by our fire, and gold in them. And we alchemists can produce the species of each metal more perfect, by our fire, than nature does in earth.”

Alchemists thought that it was possible to produce the essence of each metal. This included the essence of gold, which would produce more gold. The philosopher's stone is the essence of gold, and throwing powdered philosopher's stone on a base metal would turn the base metal to gold.

Subtle continued, "Besides, who does not see in daily practice that art can beget bees, hornets, beetles, and wasps out of the carcasses and dung of creatures."

This society believed that carcasses and dung could produce living insects. It was unaware that insects lay eggs on carcasses and dung.

We would say that nature begets bees, hornets, beetles, and wasps out of the carcasses and dung of creatures, but Subtle claimed that art — human intervention — "can beget bees, hornets, beetles, and wasps out of the carcasses and dung of creatures." In fact, some people believed that the carcasses of cattle could be used to produce bees, while the carcasses of horses and donkeys were good only to produce wasps and hornets.

Subtle continued, "Yes, and scorpions can be produced from the herb basil, being ritely and rightly placed.

"And these are living creatures, which are far more perfect and excellent than metals."

Sir Epicure Mammon said, "Well said, father!"

He then said to Surly, "If he take you in hand, sir, with an argument, he'll bray — pound and crush — you to powder in a mortar."

Proverbs 27:22 states, "Though thou shouldest bray a fool in a mortar among wheat with a pestle, yet will not his foolishness depart from him" (King James Version).

Surly said, “Please, sir, wait a moment. Rather than I’ll be brayed, sir, I’ll believe that alchemy is a pretty kind of game, somewhat like tricks of the cards, to cheat a man with magic.”

“Sir?” Subtle said.

Surly said, “What else are all your terms, whose meaning no one of your writers agrees with another!”

Often, what an alchemist calls mercury is not what we call mercury. We are likely to refer to the element mercury, which is found in nature, but an alchemist may or may not be referring to philosophic or philosophical mercury. Many alchemical terms have more than one meaning or are used differently by different alchemists. Many alchemists don’t even agree on the steps needed to produce the philosopher’s stone. After all, alchemy is false science.

Surly continued, “What else are your elixir, your lac virginis, your philosopher’s stone, your great medicine, and your chrysosperme?”

“What else are your sal, your sulphur, and your mercury?”

“What else are your oil of height, your tree of life, your blood, your marchesite, your tutie, your magnesia, your toad, your crow, your dragon, and your panther?”

“What else are your Sun, your Moon, your firmament, your adrop?”

“What else are your lato, azoch, zernich, chibrit, heautarit?”

“And then what else are your red man, and your white woman, with all your broths, your menstrues, and materials of piss and eggshells, women’s terms (menses), man’s blood, hair of the head, burnt rags, chalk, merds (turds, aka shit), and clay, powder of bones, scalings of iron, glass, and worlds of other strange ingredients that would burst a man to name?”

All these things Surly had named were used in the production of the philosopher’s stone, which is the essence of gold and is used to produce more gold. Therefore, we can say that if alchemy were true, then gold is literally made of such things as piss, menstrual discharge, and shit. (All of these things are natural and the result of valuable and necessary human biological functions, but they are not the sorts of things we value for themselves.)

Of course, alchemy cannot produce a philosopher’s stone. Instead, con men deal in the greed for gold. The con men are greedy for the gold, aka wealth, of other people, and the people the con men cheat are greedy for the gold that they think possession of the philosopher’s stone will give them. We may want to say that the greed for gold is like piss, menstrual discharge, and shit.

1 Timothy 6:10 (the first of Saint Paul’s letters to Timothy) states, “For the love of money is the root of all evil: which while some coveted after, they have erred from the faith, and pierced themselves through with many sorrows” (King James Version).

Subtle replied, “All these names and terms were created with one intention: Our alchemical writers used them to obscure their art. They wrote about secret things, and they wrote in such a secret way so that the uninitiated would not understand the alchemical writings.”

Sir Epicure Mammon said to Subtle, “Sir, I told him that. The alchemists wrote that way because the simple idiot should not learn the art of alchemy and make it vulgar and commonplace.”

Subtle asked Surly, “Wasn’t all the knowledge of the Egyptians written in the mystic symbols of the hieroglyphs?”

Don't the scriptures often speak in parables? Aren't the choicest fables of the poets, fables that are the fountains and first springs of wisdom, wrapped in perplexing allegories?"

Sir Epicure Mammon said to Subtle, "I made that argument to him, and I explained to him that Sisyphus was damned to roll the ceaseless stone only because he would have made our stone — the philosopher's stone — common."

Sisyphus was condemned in the Land of the Dead to roll a stone eternally up a hill, only to have the stone roll down again before it reached the top. According to Sir Epicure Mammon, this was Sisyphus' punishment for attempting to reveal the secret of how to make the philosopher's stone.

Just as Sir Epicure Mammon said the word "common," a well-dressed Doll Common appeared at the door.

Seeing her, Sir Epicure Mammon asked, "Who is this?"

Pretending to be upset, Subtle cursed, "By God's precious blood!"

He then said to Doll Common, "What do you mean by coming here? Go inside the other room, good lady — please!"

She exited.

Still pretending to be upset, Subtle then shouted, "Where's that varlet?"

Face entered the room and said, "Sir."

Subtle said, "You complete knave! Is this how you treat me!"

"What do you mean, sir?" Face asked.

Pointing at the door where Doll had appeared, Subtle said, "Go in that room and see, you traitor. Go!"

Face exited.

Sir Epicure Mammon asked, “Who is she, sir?”

“No one, sir; no one,” Subtle replied.

“What’s the matter, good sir?” Sir Epicure Mammon asked.
“I have not seen you this upset. Who is she?”

Subtle attempted to resume the argument about alchemy:
“All arts have always had, sir, their adversaries, but ours are the most ignorant —”

Face returned.

“What now?” Subtle said.

“It was not my fault, sir,” Face said. “She wants to speak with you.”

“She wants to, does she, sir!” Subtle said. “Follow me.”

He exited through the door through which Doll had exited.

Face started to follow him, but Sir Epicure Mammon said to him, “Stay, Lungs.”

“I dare not stay, sir,” Face replied.

“Stay, man,” Sir Epicure Mammon repeated. “Who is she?”

“She is a lord’s sister, sir,” Face said.

“She is!” Sir Epicure Mammon said.

Face attempted to exit, but Sir Epicure Mammon said,
“Please, stay.”

Face said, “She’s mad, insane, sir, and she was sent here — but I need to leave or Subtle will be mad, too.”

“I will protect you from his anger,” Sir Epicure Mammon said, and then he asked, “Why was she sent here?”

“Sir, to be cured,” Face said.

Subtle called from the other room, “Why, where are you, you rascal?”

“Look, you. I said this would happen,” Face said to Sir Epicure Mammon.

He then called, “Coming, sir!”

He exited.

Sir Epicure Mammon said, “Before God, I say that she is a Bradamante, a splendid piece.”

Bradamante was a female Christian Knight in Ariosto’s Orlando Furioso, a popular epic. She possessed a spear that made her invincible.

Knowing Sir Epicure Mammon, he meant that Doll Common was both a splendid masterpiece and a splendid piece of ass.

Surly said, “By God’s heart, this is a bawdy house! I am willing to be burnt as a heretic if that is not the case.”

Sir Epicure Mammon said, “Oh, by this light, no — this is not a bawdy house. Do not wrong Subtle the alchemist by saying that. He’s too scrupulous to avoid such things: It is his vice.

“No, he’s a splendid physician, so do him right. He is an excellent Paracelsian, and he has done remarkable cures with mineral medicine. He deals all with spirits, he; he will not hear a word of Galen, or his tedious recipes.”

A Paracelsian is a follower of Paracelsus, who rejected the teachings of the Greek physician Galen. This was a good thing because many physicians blindly followed Galen, who lived many centuries earlier. Paracelsus advocated finding new knowledge about how to cure patients. He was right to do this, but many of his ideas were incorrect and not scientific. The spirits dealt with could be either distilled spirits or supernatural spirits or both.

Face entered the room.

Seeing him, Sir Epicure Mammon asked, "What's going on, Lungs?"

Face replied, "Quietly, sir. Speak quietly. I meant to have told your worship everything you want to know about the woman."

He indicated Surly and said, "This man must not hear."

Sir Epicure Mammon said, "No, he can listen. He will not be 'gulled.' Let him alone. He can listen."

"You are very right, sir," Face said. "The woman is a most splendid scholar, and she has gone mad by studying the works of Hugh Broughton, one of whose challenging and controversial works is about Hebrew genealogy. If you but name a word touching the Hebrew, she falls into her fit, and she will discourse so learnedly of genealogies that you would run mad, too, to hear her, sir."

Sir Epicure Mammon asked, "What might one do to have conference with her, Lungs?"

"Conference" meant a conversation, but knowing Sir Epicure Mammon, we have to think that he wanted to have "conference" with her in bed.

Face replied, "Oh, many men have run mad upon the conference. I do not know, sir. I have been sent to quickly fetch a vial."

Surly said, "Don't be gulled, Sir Mammon. Don't be a fool."

"Gulled in what?" Sir Epicure Mammon said. "Please, be calm."

“Yes, as you are,” Surly said. “Be calm and trust confederate knaves and bawds and whores.”

Sir Epicure Mammon said to Surly, “You are too foul, believe it.”

He added, “Come here, Ulen. One word.”

Face said, “I dare not stay, in good faith.”

He attempted to leave, but Sir Epicure Mammon said, “Stay, knave.”

A knave is a servant who ranks well below a knight. Sir Epicure was a knight.

Face said, “Subtle the alchemist is extremely angry that you saw her, sir.”

Mammon gave him some money and said, “Drink that.”

He then asked Face, “What is she like when she’s out of her fit — when she’s sane?”

Face replied, “Oh, she is the most affable woman, sir! So merry! So pleasant! She’ll mount you up, like quicksilver, over the helm, and she will circulate like oil, a true stimulant.”

Face’s words had a double meaning. He was using alchemical terms that stated that Doll Common was a volatile substance. His words also had a bawdy interpretation. Doll would mount a man and be on top over the helmet-shaped tip of his penis, and she would be slippery like oil and circulate and move and be a stimulant to the man.

Face added, “She will discourse about politics, about mathematics, about bawdry, about anything.”

This interested Sir Epicure Mammon: She was willing to talk about bawdry and to perform it.

He asked Face, “Is she in any way accessible? Can I meet her? Is there any means, any trick to give a man a taste of her ... intelligence ... or so?”

Subtle called from the other room, “Ulen!”

Face said to Sir Epicure Mammon, “I’ll come back to you again, sir.”

Face exited.

Sir Epicure Mammon said, “Surly, I did not think one of your breeding would speak badly about personages of worth.”

Surly replied, “Sir Epicure, I am your friend and I am at your service, yet always I am loath to be gulled: I do not want to be cheated. I do not like your philosophical bawds. Their philosopher’s stone is lechery enough to pay for without this bait.”

At this time, “lechery” meant “luxurious pleasure” in addition to “lewd indulgence.” The philosopher’s stone would give many people luxurious pleasure. The bait — sexual, of course — was Doll Common.

Sir Epicure Mammon said, “You abuse yourself; you are wrong.”

He then lied, “I know the lady, and her friends, and her means. I know the origin of this disaster. Her brother has told me everything.”

Surly, who knew that Sir Epicure Mammon had not recognized Doll Common, said, “And yet you never saw her until just now!”

Sir Epicure Mammon lied, “Oh, yes, I have seen her before, but I forgot. I have, believe it, one of the most treacherous memories, I think, of all Mankind.”

Surly asked, “What is her brother’s name?”

“My lord —” Sir Epicure Mammon began.

He thought for a moment and then said, “He will not have his name known, now I think about it.”

Surly said, “You certainly do have a very treacherous memory!”

Sir Epicure Mammon began, “By my faith —”

Surly interrupted, “Tut, if you have it not about you, forget it, until we next meet.”

The “it” could mean “faith” or “the brother’s name.”

Sir Epicure Mammon said, “I swear by this hand of mine that it is true. Her brother is a man whom I honor, and he is my noble friend, and I respect his family.”

Surly said, “Can it be that a grave sir, a rich man, who has no need, a wise sir, too, at other times, should thus with his own oaths and arguments work so hard to gull himself? I am talking about you.

“If this is your elixir, your lapis mineralis, and your lunary, give me your honest trick yet at primero, or gleek — and you can have your lutum sapiensis, your menstruum simplex! I’ll have gold before you, and with less danger of the quicksilver or the hot sulphur.”

Surly used many alchemical terms, but his meaning was that if this is alchemy, then he would prefer to take his chances gambling at the card games primero or gleek. A trick is a hand of cards, but Surly’s use of it included the meaning of cheating. Card sharpening, to Surly, was a more honest way of being cheated than paying money for the creation of the philosopher’s stone. In a card game with a card sharp, there is still a chance of being lucky with cards and walking away a winner. Therefore, Surly would have gold before Sir Epicure Mammon would. (And Surly himself might be the card sharp.) Also, considering the absence of Doll Common, Surly would have less chance of contracting a venereal disease that would need to be treated with quicksilver or a contagious skin disease that would need to be treated with hot sulphur.

Face returned.

Face said to Surly, “A messenger has come from Captain Face, sir, to tell you that Captain Face wants you to meet him in the Temple Church, approximately a half hour from now, upon earnest business.”

Currently, Face was acting as Lungs, assistant to Subtle the alchemist; he was not disguised as Captain Face.

Face handed Surly a note, and as Surly read it, Face whispered to Sir Epicure Mammon, “If you please to leave us for now, and come back again in approximately two hours, my master Subtle will be busy examining the alchemical works, and I will steal you in, in private, to the woman, so that you may see her converse.”

He then said out loud to Surly, “Sir, shall I say that you’ll meet Captain Face?”

“Yes, sir, I will meet him,” Surly replied.

Surly thought to himself, I will meet him, but by attorney, and for a second, different purpose than his.

“By attorney” meant “not in his own person.” Surly was already forming a plan to expose the con men.

Surly thought to himself, Now I am sure it is a bawdy house. I’d swear to it if the Marshal were here to thank me. The naming of this commander confirms it. Don Face! Captain Face! Why, he’s the most authentic dealer in these commodities, the superintendent to all the quainter traffickers in town!

In this society, the word “quaint” also meant “cunt.” The “commodities” Captain Face was known to deal in were prostitutes. “Quainter traffickers” are bawds and pimps.

Surly thought to himself, Captain Face is the Visitor, and he appoints who lies with whom, and at what hour, at what price, and which gown and smock and other clothing.

A Visitor in this context is an inspector or superintendent who makes sure that everything is running smoothly.

Surly thought to himself, I will test him, by a third person — myself in disguise — in order to find the subtleties, by which I mean tricks and deceits, of this dark labyrinth.

Alchemists often described the search for the philosopher’s stone as a kind of labyrinth.

Surly thought to himself, If I do discover these subtleties, dear Sir Mammon, you’ll give me, your poor friend, permission, although I am no philosopher, to laugh, for you who are a philosopher, it is thought, shall weep.

Democritus was known as the laughing philosopher, and Heraclitus was known as the crying philosopher. Democritus laughed at human follies, while Heraclitus cried over human follies.

Face said to Surly, “Sir, he asks you to please not forget to meet him.”

Surly replied, “I will not forget, sir.”

He then said, “Sir Epicure, I shall leave you.”

As Surly exited, Sir Epicure Mammon said, “I will follow you quickly.”

“Do so, good sir, to avoid suspicion that you will meet with the woman later,” Face said. “This gentleman Surly has a parlous head.”

Surly’s mind was dangerous because it was sharp.

Sir Epicure Mammon asked, “But will you, Ulen, keep your promise?”

“I will be as careful to keep my promise as I am careful to keep my life, sir.”

“And will you insinuate what I am, and praise me, and say that I am a noble fellow?”

“Oh, what else, sir?” Face said. “And I’ll tell her that you’ll make her royal, an Empress, with the philosopher’s stone, and that you’ll make yourself the King of Bantam, capital of the very wealthy island Java.”

“Stone” meant the philosopher’s stone, but the word was also slang for “testicle.” Sir Epicure Mammon would use the wealth that he got from the philosopher’s stone to make her royal, and he would use his stones to treat her another way.

Sir Epicure Mammon asked, “Will you do that?”

“I will, sir,” Face replied.

“Lungs, my Lungs! I love and respect you.”

Face said, “Send your metal items, sir, so that my master may busy himself about projection and turning them into gold.”

Sir Epicure Mammon said affectionately, “You have bewitched me, rogue. Take this money, and go.”

He gave Face some money.

Face said, “Bring your jack, and all your other metal, sir.”

A jack was an iron mechanism using metal weights on chains to turn the spit in a fireplace.

Sir Epicure Mammon said, “You are a villain. I will send my jack, and the weights, too. Slave, I could affectionately bite your ear. Go away, you do not care for me.”

“Don’t I, sir?” Face asked.

Sir Epicure Mammon said, “Come, I was born to make you, my good weasel, sit on a bench, and have you twirl a chain with the best lord’s vermin of them all.”

The chain was an insignia of office; the steward of a wealthy household had a chain. Lords wore ermine trimming on their robes; the ermine trimming was jokingly called vermin. Sir Epicure Mammon was saying that he was born to make Face rise in the world. (Earlier he had said that he would castrate Face and put him in charge of Sir Epicure’s harem.)

“Leave now, sir,” Face said.

Sir Epicure Mammon began, “A Count — no, a Count Palatine —”

A Count Palatine had more power and status than a mere Count.

Face interrupted, “Good sir, go.”

Sir Epicure Mammon finished, “— shall not advance you in life better, nor faster, than I will.”

He exited.

— 2.4 —

Subtle and Doll Common entered the room.

Using a fishing metaphor, Subtle asked about Sir Epicure Mammon, “Did he bite? Did he bite?”

Face replied, “Yes, and he has swallowed the bait, too, my Subtle. I have given him line, and now he plays, indeed.”

“And shall we twitch the pole and hook him?” Subtle asked.

“Yes, and through both gills,” Face said. “A wench is a rare bait with which a man no sooner’s taken, but he immediately moves briskly and madly — he firks madly.”

Such movements can be made during sex.

Subtle said, “Doll, you who will be my Lord What’t’s’hum’s sister, you must now bear yourself statelych.”

Statelych is Dutch for “stately and aristocratically.”

“Oh, leave it to me,” Doll said. “I’ll not forget my race, I promise you.”

She meant both that she would not forget her background and that she would not forget who she was going to pretend to be.

She added, “I’ll keep my distance, laugh, and talk aloud, have all the tricks of a proud scurvy lady, and be as rude as her woman servant.”

A proud scurvy lady’s woman servant would be rude to someone such as Doll Common.

Face said, “Well said, Sanguine!”

A sanguine person is thought to be amorous, optimistic, and brave.

Subtle asked, “But will he send his andirons?”

“Yes,” Face replied. “He will send his jack, too, and his iron shoeing-horn. I have spoken to him.”

Referring to Surly, Face added, “Well, I must not lose my wary gamester yonder.”

Subtle said, “He is Monsieur Caution, who will not be gulled.”

Face said, “Yes. If only I can strike a fine hook into him, now! I have cast my hook at the Temple Church. Well, pray for me. I’ll go about it.”

Knocking sounded at the door.

Subtle said, “What, more gudgeons!”

Gudgeons were small fish that were thought to swallow anything.

Subtle said, “Doll, scout, scout!”

Doll Common went to the window to see who was knocking.

Subtle said, “Wait, Face, you must go to the door. I pray to God that the knocker is my Anabaptist.”

Anabaptists were members of what was thought to be an extreme Protestant sect. They believed in adult baptism, common ownership of property, and theocracy. Some Anabaptists wanted to ban all books except the Bible.

Subtle asked, “Who is it, Doll?”

“I don’t know him,” Doll answered. “He looks like a gold-end man.”

A gold-end man would buy bits and pieces of gold and silver.

“Good,” Subtle said. “It is the man the Anabaptist said he would send. He said he would send . . . what do you call him? Ah, the sanctified elder, who would bargain to buy Sir Epicure Mammon’s jack and andirons.

“Let him in.”

Face exited.

Subtle said to Doll, “Wait, first help me take off my gown.”

A gown is a loose, flowing upper garment.

Doll helped him take it off, and then Subtle said to her, “Go, Madam, to your withdrawing chamber.”

Doll exited, carrying the gown.

Subtle said to himself, “Now, in a new tune, with a new gesture, but using old language. This fellow is sent from one who is negotiating with me about the philosopher’s stone, too. He is negotiating on behalf of the holy brethren of Amsterdam, the exiled saints, who hope to raise their discipline and increase its power and influence by it.”

The holy brethren of Amsterdam and the exiled saints were the Anabaptists.

In 1534, the Anabaptist John of Leiden seized control of Münster, Germany, and called himself King of Münster. The Anabaptists also tried but failed to take control of some Dutch towns, including Amsterdam. After a long siege, the city was taken back and John of Leiden was tortured and executed. This event made people believe that Anabaptists were dangerous radicals. Many Anabaptists left Amsterdam and resided in England.

In 1604, many Anabaptists left England and went into exile in Amsterdam because they refused to accept the 39 Articles that spelled out the beliefs and doctrines of the Church of England.

Ben Jonson’s play The Alchemist was first performed in 1610.

Subtle said to himself, “I must treat him in some strange fashion, now, to make him wonder at me.”

Ananias entered the room.

Subtle said loudly, “Where is my drudge?”

Face entered the room and said, “Sir!”

It was time to baffle Ananias with alchemical bullshit.

Subtle ordered, “Take away the recipient, and rectify your menstrue from the phlegma. Then pour it on the Sol, in the cucurbite, and let them macerate together.”

The recipient is the vessel in which distilled matter collects.

“Yes, sir,” Face said. “Should I save the ground?”

The ground is the residue left over after sublimation. Another name for it is terra damnata, which is Latin for “damned ground.”

“No,” Subtle replied. “Terra damnata must not have entrance in the work.”

Pretending to see Ananias for the first time, Subtle asked him, “Who are you?”

“A faithful brother, if it pleases you,” Ananias replied.

By “faithful brother,” Ananias meant “Anabaptist,” but Subtle deliberately misunderstood him to say that he was a fellow alchemist — the Faithful Brothers were a group of Arabian alchemists in the tenth century C.E.

“What’s that?” Subtle asked. “Are you a Lullianist — a follower of the alchemist Raymond Lully! Are you a follower of the alchemist George Ripley? Are you a filius artis?”

Filius artis is Latin for “son of the art,” aka alchemist.

Subtle asked, “Can you sublime and dulcify? Can you calcine? Do you know the sapor pontic? Sapor stiptic? Or what is homogene, or heterogene?”

Sapor is Latin for “savor,” or “taste.” Some people at this time believed that there were nine tastes; five were caused by heat, and four were caused by cold.

“I understand no heathen language, truly,” Ananias said.

The Anabaptists believed that Latin was a heathen language. The only non-heathen language was Hebrew because Adam spoke it in the Garden of Eden, Anabaptists believed.

“Heathen!” Subtle said. “You Knipperdolling!”

Bernt Knipperdolling was one of the Anabaptists who had taken over the city of Münster. He was tortured and executed after the city was retaken.

Subtle asked, “Is ars sacra, or chrysopoeia, or spagyrica, or the pamphysic, or panarchic knowledge, a heathen language!”

Ars sacra is Latin for “the sacred art.” Subtle used this Latin phrase to mean alchemy.

“It is heathen Greek, I take it,” Ananias said.

“What!” Subtle said. “Heathen Greek!”

“All languages are heathen except the Hebrew,” Ananias said.

Subtle said to Face, “Sirrah, my varlet, stand forth and speak to him like a philosopher.”

Face was supposed to be Subtle’s assistant. The word “varlet” meant “assistant.”

Subtle was going to question Face as if Subtle were a university professor and Face were a student.

Subtle then said to Face, “Answer my questions in the alchemical language. Name the vexations, and the martyrizations of metals in the work.”

Subtle used alchemical terms, but he used a few alchemical terms that were similar, at least in sound, to religious terms. He wanted Ananias to think that alchemical language was not a heathen language.

Face answered, “Sir, putrefaction, solution, ablution, sublimation, cohobation, calcination, ceration, and fixation.”

Subtle said to Ananias, “This is heathen Greek, to you, is it!”

He then asked Face, “And when does vivification come?”

Face answered, “After mortification.”

Subtle asked, “What’s cohobation?”

Face answered, “It is the pouring on your aqua regis, and then drawing him off, to the trine circle of the seven spheres.”

Alchemists often referred to materials as “him” or “her” and as “masculine” or “feminine.” They also often referred to “your” materials.

Aqua regis is Latin for “King’s water.” It was a mixture of acids that could dissolve gold.

Subtle asked, “What’s the proper passion of metals?”

Face answered, “Malleation.”

Subtle asked, “What’s your ultimum supplicium auri?”

Ultimum supplicium auri is Latin for “the ultimate punishment of gold.”

Face answered, “Antimonium.”

This is a substance that keeps gold from being malleable; to alchemists, not being malleable is the ultimate punishment of gold.

Subtle said to Ananias, “This is heathen Greek to you!”

He then asked Face, “And what’s your mercury?”

Face answered, “A very fugitive, he will be gone, sir.”

Mercury is a liquid at room temperature and is difficult or impossible to pick up using only your fingers.

Subtle asked, “How do you know him?”

“Him” referred to mercury.

Face answered, “By his viscosity, his oleosity, and his suscitability.”

Subtle asked, “How do you sublime him?”

Face answered, “With the calce of eggshells, white marble, talc.”

Subtle asked, “Your magisterium, now, what’s that?”

The “magisterium” is the “mastery of alchemy.” The person who has mastered alchemy can create the philosopher’s stone. Some people equated the magisterium with the philosopher’s stone.

Face answered, “Shifting, sir, your elements — dry into cold, cold into moist, moist into hot, hot into dry.”

According to alchemy, subjecting a primary material to this sequence of shifting would drive away everything that was not the essence of the primary element. Do this to the primary element gold and you will be left with the essence of gold, aka the philosopher’s stone.

Subtle said to Ananias, “This is heathen Greek to you still!”

Subtle asked Face, “What is your lapis philosophicus?”

Lapis philosophicus is Latin for “philosopher’s stone.”

Face answered, “It is a stone, and not a stone. It is a spirit, a soul, and a body. If you dissolve it, it is dissolved. If you coagulate it, it is coagulated. If you make it fly, it flies.”

Subtle said, “Enough.”

Face exited.

Subtle said to Ananias, “This is heathen Greek to you! Who are you, sir?”

Ananias answered, “If it should please you, I am a servant of the exiled brethren, who deal with widows and with orphans’ goods, and make a just account unto the saints. I am a deacon.”

The saints were Anabaptists; they were not Catholic saints. Anabaptists regarded themselves as the elect — the elect were chosen by God to receive eternal life.

Subtle said, “Oh, were you sent from Master Wholesome, your teacher?”

Ananias said, “Yes, from Tribulation Wholesome, our very zealous pastor.”

Many Puritans had names such as Tribulation Wholesome because they believed that common names such as William or Ben were too worldly. Ananias’ name came from the Bible.

“Good!” Subtle said. “I have some orphans’ goods coming here.”

Ananias asked, “Of what kind, sir?”

Subtle answered, "Pewter and brass, andirons and kitchenware, and metals that we must use our medicine on. The brethren may have these for a good price, as long as it is ready money."

Ananias asked, "Were the orphans' parents sincere professors of the Anabaptists' faith?"

"Why do you ask?"

"Because if they were, we are then to deal justly, and pay money, in truth, to the items' utmost value."

Subtle said, "By God's eyelid, if the orphans' parents were not of the faithful, you'd cheat them! I will not trust you, now I think about it, until I have talked with your pastor. Have you brought money to buy more coals?"

"No, indeed."

"No! Why not?"

Ananias answered, "The brethren told me to say to you, sir, that indeed they will not venture any more money until they may see projection."

"What!" Subtle said, pretending to be angry.

Ananias said, "You have had, for the instruments, such as bricks, and loam, and glasses, already thirty pounds. And for materials, they say, some ninety pounds more. And they have heard since that an alchemist at Heidelberg made the philosopher's stone from an egg and a small paper of pin-dust."

Heidelberg was a center of alchemy. Pin-dust is metal dust that is left over from the manufacture of metal pins.

Subtle asked, "What's your name?"

"My name is Ananias."

In Acts 5:1-10, we read that Ananias cheated his fellow Christians by selling a piece of property and keeping part of the money obtained.

Pretending to be angry, Subtle said, “Get out, you varlet who cheated the apostles! Leave! Go away! Flee, mischief! Didn’t your holy consistory have no name to send me, of another sound, than wicked Ananias? Send your elders here to make atonement for you, quickly, and to give me satisfaction, or out goes the fire; and down go the alembecs, and the furnace Piger Henricus, and what not.”

Piger Henricus is Latin for “Lazy Henry.” It is a type of furnace that has one fire providing the heat for many side chambers.

Subtle continued, “You wretch! Both sericon and bufo shall be lost; tell them that. All hope of rooting out the bishops, or the anti-Christian hierarchy, shall perish, if they stay away threescore minutes: one hour.”

The Anabaptists wanted to establish a theocracy with themselves as rulers. They definitely did not want Catholics to be the heads of the theocracy.

Subtle continued, “The aqueity, terreity, and sulphureity shall run together again, and all shall be annulled, you wicked Ananias!”

In other words, unless Ananias’ superiors came to Subtle within one hour, all the alchemical work he had done so far would be ruined.

Ananias exited.

Subtle said to himself, “This will fetch them, and make them hasten towards their gulling more. A man must deal like a rough nurse, and frighten those who are obstinate and give them an appetite.”

Face, who was now wearing his Captain's uniform, entered the room. Abel Drugger followed him.

Captain Face said to Drugger, "The alchemist is busy with his spirits, but we'll see him."

Subtle said, "What is it? What mates and what Bayards have we here?"

"Mates" are "low fellows." "Bayard" is a common name for a horse. The proverb "as bold as blind Bayard" referred to blundering into places where the blunderer did not belong.

Captain Face said to Drugger, "I told you that he would be furious."

He then said to Subtle, "Sir, here's Nab. He has brought you another piece of gold to look on."

"Nab" is a nickname for Abel.

He said to Drugger, "We must appease him. Give the gold piece to me."

Drugger gave the gold coin to Face, who gave it to Subtle, saying, "He asks that you would devise for him — what is it, Nab?"

"A sign, sir."

"Yes," Face said. "A good lucky one, a thriving sign, doctor."

"I was devising now," Subtle said.

He meant that he had been creating Drugger's horoscope.

Face whispered to him, "By God's light, do not say so. Drugger will repent he gave you any more gold."

He then said out loud, “What say you to his constellation — Libra — Doctor? Should the balance be his sign?”

Subtle decided to do something different from that. He did not want Drugger to repent giving more gold.

“No, that way is stale, and common,” Subtle said. “A townsman born in Taurus gives the bull, or the bull’s-head, as his sign. A townsman born in Aries gives the ram as his sign. It’s a poor device!

“No, I will have Drugger’s name formed in some mystic characters whose emanations, striking the senses of the passersby, shall, by a powerful influence, breed inclinations, such as a powerful desire for tobacco, that may benefit the party who owns the sign. Let me think.”

Subtle was going to create a rebus for Abel Drugger. A rebus is a cryptic representation of a name, word, phrase, or sentence, using pictures and letters.

Face said excitedly, “Nab!”

Subtle said, “He shall have a bell, that’s Abel. And by it standing a man whose name is Dee, wearing a rug gown, aka an academic’s coarse wool gown.”

Dee is Dr. John Dee (1527-1608), an English alchemist and astrologer.

Subtle continued, “There’s D, and Rug, that’s drug. And right against him a dog snarling grr. There’s Drugger, Abel Drugger. That’s his sign. And here’s now mystery and hieroglyphic!”

Face said, “Abel, you are made.”

Drugger replied, bowing, “Sir, I do thank his worship.”

Face said, “Six more of your bows will not do it, Nab. They won’t be enough to thank the doctor properly.”

Face said to Subtle, “He has brought you a pipe of tobacco, doctor.”

Perhaps Drugger had been carrying the pipe of tobacco for his own use.

“Yes, sir,” Drugger said.

He gave the tobacco to Face, who gave it to Subtle.

Drugger added, “I have another thing I would like to say —”

“Out with it, Nab,” Face said.

Drugger said, “Sir, there is lodged, very near to me, a rich young widow.”

“Good,” Face said. “A bona roba?”

A bona roba is a fashionably dressed woman; in slang, the phrase means a prostitute.

Drugger said, “She is only nineteen, at the most.”

“Very good, Abel,” Face said.

“She’s not in fashion yet,” Drugger said. “She wears a French hood, but it stands acop.”

French hoods were not in fashion; hats were. But the young widow did wear it on top of her head instead of at the back. “Acop” meant “on top.”

“That doesn’t matter, Abel,” Face said.

Drugger said, “And I do now and then give her a fucus —”

A fucus is a kind of cosmetic.

Face said, “What! Do you deal, Nab?”

He meant deal in products other than tobacco.

Subtle said, "I did tell you, Captain Face."

He wanted Drugger to believe that he — Subtle — had said that he had told Captain Face that Drugger would be successful. One sign of success is branching out and selling more and different products.

Drugger continued, "— and medicine, too, sometimes, sir, for which she trusts me with all her mind. She's come up here for the purpose of learning the latest fashions."

Face said, "Good."

He whispered to Subtle, "If she goes to Drugger for advice about fashion, she's as foolish as he is."

He said out loud, "Go on, Nab."

Drugger said, "And she very greatly longs to know her fortune."

"By God's eyelid, Nab," Captain Face said, "send her to Doctor Subtle here."

"Yes, I have spoken to her about his worship already," Drugger said, "but she's afraid that gossip about it will be blown abroad, and hurt her prospects for marriage."

"Hurt her prospects for marriage!" Captain Face said. "Why, it is the way to heal her prospects, if they were hurt. It is the way to make marriage with her more pursued and sought. Nab, you shall tell her this: If she comes here, she'll be more known, more talked about — and your widows are never of any good price until they are famous. The honor of widows lies in their multitude of suitors. Send her; it may be your good fortune."

Drugger shook his head no.

Captain Face said, "What! You do not know."

Drugger said, “No, sir, it won’t be my good fortune. She’ll never marry anyone of less social status than a Knight: Her brother has made a vow.”

“What!” Captain Face said, “and do you despair, my little Nab, knowing what Doctor Subtle has predicted for your future, and seeing so many wealthy tradesmen of the city dubbed a Knight by King James I in return for money?”

“One glass of your water, with a madam — a witch — I know will make her fall in love with you, Nab. The witch can turn your urine into a love potion.

“Who is her brother? Is he a Knight?”

“No, sir,” Drugger said. “He is a gentleman newly warm in his land, sir. He has just inherited it. He is scarcely twenty-one years old, and he governs his sister here, and he is a man himself of some three thousand pounds a year, and he has come up to London to learn to quarrel and to live by his wits, and he will go down again and die in the country.”

Like his sister, the gentleman wanted to be fashionable. Some young men of the time were known as roaring boys. They enjoyed picking quarrels, and they followed rules for doing so.

“What?” Face said. “How to quarrel?”

“Yes, sir,” Drugger said, “to carry quarrels, as gallants do; to manage them by line.”

“By line” meant “according to the rules.”

Face said, “By God’s eyelid, Nab, Doctor Subtle is the only man in Christendom for him. He has made a diagram, with mathematical demonstrations, concerning the art of quarrels: He will give the widow’s brother written instructions for quarreling.

“Go, bring them both: him and his sister the widow. And, as for you, the doctor perhaps may persuade her to love you.

“Go on. You shall give his worship a new damask suit on the basis of what I just said.”

Fine clothing was expensive.

Subtle said, “Oh, good Captain Face!”

“He shall,” Face said to Subtle. “He is the honestest fellow, Doctor.”

Face then said to Drugger, “Don’t wait for the proposal of marriage. Bring the damask and the parties here.”

“I’ll try my power, sir,” Drugger said. “I’ll do my best.”

“And try your will, too, Nab,” Face said. The word “will” meant both “inclination to do something” and “sexual desire” for the widow.

Smoking the pipe Drugger had brought, Subtle said, “This is good tobacco! What does it cost per ounce?”

“He’ll send you a pound, Doctor Subtle,” Face said.

“Oh, no,” Subtle said, pretending that he did not want such an expensive gift.

“He will do it,” Face said. “He is the goodest soul!”

He then said, “Abel, go about it. You shall know more soon. Go away, be gone.”

Abel Drugger exited.

Face said to Subtle, “Drugger is a miserable rogue, and lives on cheese, and has the worms. That was the reason, indeed, why he came here just now. He dealt with me in private to get a medicine for the worms.”

“And he shall get it, sir,” Subtle said. “This is working out well.”

“A wife, a wife for one of us, my dear Subtle!” Face said. “We’ll draw lots on equal terms, and he who fails shall have the more in goods because the other will have more in tail.”

Face was punning. “Entail” was a legal term about one kind of inheritance. “In tail” was slang for “in pussy.”

Subtle replied, “Rather the less in goods, for the widow may be so light that she may lack grains.”

In addition to meaning “light in weight,” “light” was slang for “promiscuous.” A light woman’s heels were light and were easily raised in the air with her knees apart. If the widow were light (and promiscuity would lower her value because no man wants to be a cuckold), her husband would need more in goods (a grain = a unit of weight) in order to have a share equal with that of the con man who did not marry her.

Face said, “Yes, or she may be such a burden that a man would scarcely endure her for the whole.”

“Whole” was another pun. If the widow were a bad wife, her husband might scarcely endure her for the whole take of the cons. Face’s use of “whole” also meant “hole,” and so if the widow were a bad wife, her husband might scarcely endure her although she has a vagina.

Subtle said, “Indeed, it’s best we see her first, and then determine what to do.”

“That’s fine by me,” Face said, “but Doll must hear no words about this.”

“I will be mum,” Subtle said. “Go now, and meet your Surly yonder; catch him.”

Face said, "I pray to God that I have not stayed too long."

"I fear that you may have," Subtle said.

— 3.1 —

Tribulation Wholesome and Ananias talked together outside the house where the cons were taking place. Ananias was complaining about Subtle.

Tribulation Wholesome said, “These chastisements are common to the saints, and such rebukes we of the separation must bear with willing shoulders as they are trials sent forth to tempt our frailties.”

“Separation” meant “exile.” In times of persecution, Anabaptists would go from one country to another country to escape that persecution. At the then-current time, many Anabaptists were in the Netherlands.

Saints often face tribulations, and these Anabaptists regarded themselves as saints — people destined for eternal life — separated from ordinary men.

Ananias said, “In pure zeal and from a purely Christian point of view, I do not like the man. He is a heathen, and he speaks the language of Canaan, truly.”

Tribulation Wholesome said, “I think him a profane person indeed.”

“He bears the visible mark of the beast on his forehead,” Ananias said.

Anyone who bears the mark of the beast is irrevocably damned.

Ananias continued, “And as for his philosopher’s stone, it is a work of darkness, and with philosophy it blinds the eyes of man.”

Tribulation Wholesome said, “Good brother, we must yield to all means that may give furtherance to the holy cause.”

“Which his cannot,” Ananias said. “The sanctified cause should have a sanctified course. A sanctified course of action will lead to the sanctified result we want.”

“A sanctified means or course of action is not always necessary,” Tribulation Wholesome said. “The children of perdition are often made instruments even of the greatest works.

“Beside, we should concede somewhat to this man Subtle’s nature and the place he lives in. He is always near the fire and the fumes of metals that intoxicate the brain of man and make him prone to feel violent emotions.

“Being around fire is dangerous.

“Where do you have greater atheists than your cooks?”

Anabaptists preferred plainness in all things, including clothing, hairstyles, and food.

Tribulation Wholesome continued, “Who is more profane or choleric and prone to anger than your glass-blowers?”

Glass-blowers make items used in alchemy and in Catholic churches.

Tribulation Wholesome continued, “Who is more anti-Christian than your bell-founders, who cast bells out of molten metal?”

Bells are often used in the Catholic Mass and in Catholic churches.

Tribulation Wholesome continued, “I ask you, what makes the devil Satan, our common enemy, so devilish except his being perpetually around the fire and boiling brimstone and arsenic?”

“We must yield, I say, to the stimulations and the stirrers up of strong feelings in the blood. It may be so, when the work is done and the philosopher's stone is made, that this heat of his may turn into a religious zeal, and stand up for the beauteous discipline of Anabaptism against the menstruous cloth and rag of Rome.”

The Anabaptists detested the Pope and Catholics. What they called “the menstruous cloth and rag of Rome” was the surplice worn by Catholic priests. The Anabaptists compared the surplice to a rag used to soak up menstrual blood.

Tribulation Wholesome continued, “We must await his calling and the coming of the good Holy Spirit to him. You did wrong when you upbraided him with the brethren's blessing of creating the philosopher's stone in Heidelberg. You will realize that when you consider what need we have to hasten on the work for the restoring of the silenced saints, which will never happen unless we get the philosopher's stone.”

The silenced saints were the Puritans who were not allowed to preach because they did not accept the 39 Articles that spelled out the beliefs and doctrines of the Church of England.

Tribulation Wholesome continued, “A learned elder, one of Scotland, assured me that we need the philosopher's stone. For one thing, aurum potabile is the only medicine for the civil magistrate to incline him to a feeling of our religious cause and must be daily used in the disease.”

Aurum potabile is Latin for “drinkable gold.” It was supposed to be an alchemist's elixir, but Tribulation Wholesome was using the term to mean bribes. The Anabaptists would use the gold created by the philosopher's stone to bribe civil officials to treat their religion kindly — and to give the Anabaptists political power.

Ananias replied, “I have not been edified more, truly, by any man than by you here and now — not since the beautiful light of Anabaptism first shone on me, and I am sad that my religious zeal has so offended.”

“Let us call on Subtle the alchemist then,” Tribulation Wholesome said.

“The impulse to knock is good, and it is of the spirit,” Ananias said. “I will knock first.”

He knocked and shouted, “Peace be within!”

The door was opened, and they entered.

— 3.2 —

Subtle said to Tribulation Wholesome, “Oh, have you come?”

He pointed to an hourglass and said, “It was time. Your threescore minutes were at the last thread, you see, and down had gone furnus acediae, turris circulatorius: Alembec, bolt’s-head, retort, and pelican had all been cinders.”

The word “thread” referred to the thread of life. A few minutes longer, and Subtle — he said — would have killed the process of making the philosopher’s stone. He would have destroyed everything, including the furnus acediae (Latin for “furnace of sloth”; it is another term for “lazy Henry”) and the turris circulatorius (circulating tower).

Seeing Ananias, Subtle said, “Wicked Ananias! Have you returned? Well, then, I will still destroy the apparatus making the philosopher’s stone.”

Tribulation Wholesome said, “Sir, be appeased. Ananias has come to humble himself in spirit, and to ask your patience if too much religious zeal has carried him aside from the due path.”

“Why, this does qualify!” Subtle said.

“Qualify” is an alchemical term meaning “dilute.” Subtle was saying that his rage was becoming diluted and weaker.

Tribulation Wholesome said, “The brethren had no intention, truly, to give you the least grievance. Instead, they are ready to lend their willing hands to any project the Holy Spirit and you direct them to.”

“This qualifies more!” Subtle said.

Tribulation Wholesome said, “And as for the orphans’ goods, let them be valued. And whatever else is needed for the holy work of making the philosopher’s stone, it shall be paid in ready money. Here, in my person, the saints throw down their purse before you.”

Revelation 4:10 begins, “The four and twenty elders fall down before him that sat on the throne, and worship him that liveth for ever and ever, and cast their crowns before the throne” (King James Version).

“This qualifies most!” Subtle said, “Why, this is how it should be — now you understand.

“I have talked to you about our philosopher’s stone and about the good that it shall bring your cause.

“I have shown you other benefits in addition to the main point of hiring forces abroad and drawing the Hollanders, your friends, from the Indies, to serve you, with all their fleet.”

With the gold made with the philosopher’s stone, the Anabaptists could hire mercenaries and the Netherlands’ mighty fleet of ships that protected their trade interests in the Indies. Subtle was hinting that the Anabaptists could be traitors to England; they could use the mercenaries to attack and take control of England.

Subtle continued, “I have said that even the medicinal use of the philosopher’s stone — the elixir of life — shall make you a faction and party in the realm. You shall have political power. For example, let’s say that some great man in government has the gout. Why, if you send him three drops of your elixir of life, you will help him immediately, and you will have made him a friend of Anabaptism. Let’s say that another has the palsy, aka tremors, or the dropsy, aka edema; he takes some of your incombustible stuff — your elixir — and he’s young again. Here again you have made a friend of Anabaptism.”

Literally, people with dropsy retain water and their body swells up. Two salt-related symptoms of adrenal fatigue are the swelling of edema and a craving for salt. Subtle’s clients also suffer from cravings — for money and/or power.

“Let’s take a lady who has aged and is no longer able to physically have sex, although she still thinks about it. Her face has aged so much that the use of makeup will no longer help her look beautiful. With the alchemical medicine known as the oil of talc, you restore her youth, her beauty, and her ability to have sex. There you have made a friend — and you have made all her friends your friends.”

By “her friends,” Subtle meant “her lovers.”

Subtle continued, “Take a lord who has leprosy, a Knight who has the bone-ache, or a squire who has both of these medical problems. You make them smooth and sound with a mere rubbing on of your alchemical medicine, and again you increase the number of your friends.”

The bone-ache is syphilis.

Tribulation Wholesome said, “What you say is very pregnant of promise and a convincing argument.”

Subtle said, “And then the turning of this lawyer’s pewter to plate at Christmas —”

Ananias interrupted, “At Christ-tide, please.”

Some Anabaptists did not want to say the syllable “mas” or the word “mass” because of the Catholic Mass.

“Yet, Ananias!” Subtle said. “Do you still bother me?”

“I have finished talking,” Ananias said.

Subtle continued, “— turning of this lawyer’s pewter to plate at Christmas or changing his parcel gilt — partially gilded silver — to massy, aka solid, gold.”

He had deliberately used the word “massy.”

Subtle continued, “You cannot but increase the number of your friends. Indeed, you will have the power to pay an army on the battlefield, to buy the King of France out of his realms, or to buy the Indies from the King of Spain.”

King Henri IV of France had been assassinated on 14 May 1610, a little earlier than the present time. His son who succeeded him was only eight years old. In 1607, King Philip III of Spain had gone bankrupt because of a lack of silver shipments from the Indies.

The Anabaptists were businessmen as well as religious men, and they had a reputation for driving hard bargains. Subtle was saying that they were very capable of taking advantage of a child and of a man down on his luck.

Subtle continued, “What can you not do against lords, whether spiritual or temporal, who shall oppose you?”

“Verily, what you say is true,” Tribulation Wholesome said. “We may be temporal lords ourselves, I take it.”

Temporal lords are not members of the clergy.

Temporal lords need not say prayers or preach sermons or sing in church, which are things Anabaptists presumably want to do.

Subtle replied, “You may be anything you want, and you may leave off to make — stop or take time off from doing something in order to make — long-winded exercises.”

The Anabaptists had reputations for making very long sermons and prayers.

Subtle continued, “Or you may suck up your ha! and hum! in a tune.”

They could also make singing ha! and hum! a part of the church service.

The ha! and hum! referred to an Anabaptist practice of making these sounds during prayers and sermons.

Subtle continued, “I do not deny that people who are powerless in a state, may, for their own ends, be adverse and contrary to the state in their religion, and get a tune to call the flock together. You can gain followers in your religion and use them to gain political power; one way to gain religious followers is through religious music. For, to say the truth, a tune does much with women and other phlegmatic — unemotional and calm — people; it is your bell. Like a church bell, tunes will call people to worship.”

Ananias objected, “Bells are profane; a tune may be religious.”

Subtle said to Ananias, “You don’t listen to warnings! So then I say ‘farewell’ to my patience. By God’s light, I shall destroy the apparatus for making the philosopher’s stone. I will not be thus tortured.”

“Please, sir—” Tribulation Wholesome began.

Subtle interrupted, “Everything shall perish. I have spoken it.”

“Let me find grace and mercy, sir, in your eyes,” Tribulation Wholesome said. “The man Ananias stands corrected. His religious zeal did not allow a tune somewhere except as you yourself had said a tune could be used. You agreed on that point. But now, since the philosopher’s stone is nearly completed, we shall not need tunes.”

Since the Anabaptists would have gold to make friends, they wouldn’t need to have tunes to make friends, and so there was no need to worry about whether or not tunes are comparable to church bells.

Subtle replied, “No, you shall not need tunes, nor your holy vizard, aka holy mask, to win widows to give you legacies or make zealous wives rob their husbands for the common cause, nor shall you need to take advantage of bonds whose terms have been broken only one day and say that their collateral is forfeited by providence. Nor shall you need all night to eat huge meals so that you can better celebrate your next day’s fast while the brethren and the sisters, humbled, abate the stiffness of the flesh.”

“Abate” means “cause to become smaller.” “Stiffness” has two meanings. It means “pride”; however, “the stiffness of the flesh” also means “erection.”

Subtle continued, “Nor shall you need to cast before your hungry hearers scrupulous bones.”

If the Anabaptists became temporal lords, they need not concern themselves with much that they concerned themselves with.

“Scrupulous bones” are petty points of religious contention. Here the points of contention are about the proper behavior of an Anabaptist.

Subtle continued, “For example, whether a Christian may hawk or hunt, or whether matrons of the holy assembly may lay their hair out to create fashionable and elaborate hairstyles, or wear doublets, which are properly worn by men only, or have that idol starch about their linen.”

The Anabaptists opposed hunting with hawks and hunting in general. They also opposed elaborate hairstyles for women, women wearing men’s clothing, and the use of starch on clothing. The Anabaptists opposed many things on the grounds that they were worldly and/or vain and/or opposed to Biblical strictures.

Deuteronomy 22:5 states, “The woman shall not wear that which pertaineth unto a man, neither shall a man put on a woman’s garment: for all that do so are abomination unto the Lord thy God” (King James Version).

Ananias said about starch, “It is indeed an idol.”

Tribulation Wholesome said to Subtle, “Don’t mind him, sir.”

He then said to the spirit that he believed — or pretended to believe — was within Ananias, “I do command you, spirit of religious zeal, but also trouble, to be silent and calm within him!”

He said to Subtle, “Please, sir, go on.”

Subtle said, “Nor shall you need to libel the prelates, and shorten your ears in preparation for the hearing of the next wire-drawn grace.”

The Puritans sometimes severely criticized the officials of the Church of England. Punishment for doing this could include being placed in a pillory and having one’s ears cut off. This was the punishment for seditious libel.

People created wire by drawing or pulling and stretching metal. Puritan prayers before a meal — grace — were long and drawn out, and Subtle was saying that having one's ears cut off was good preparation for experiencing a Puritan grace.

Subtle continued, "Nor shall you of necessity rail against plays, to please the alderman whose daily custard you devour."

Many aldermen were hostile to the theater because they felt that play-going spread the plague. Since all actors at this time were male, boys or young men playing women would wear women's clothing, which violated the stricture against wearing women's clothing found in Deuteronomy 22:5. Also, many aldermen felt that going to plays encouraged workers to waste time.

Subtle continued, "Nor shall you lie with zealous rage until you are hoarse. Not one of these so singular arts will you need to perform. Nor shall you need to call yourselves by names such as Tribulation, Persecution, Restraint, Long-patience, and so on, which are affected by the whole family or collection of you only for glory and to catch the ear of the disciple."

With the wealth created by the philosopher's stone, Anabaptists would no longer need to act like Anabaptists. Great wealth does things like that.

Tribulation Wholesome said, "Truly, sir, they are ways that the godly brethren have invented for propagation of the glorious cause as very notable means, and whereby also the godly brethren themselves grow quickly and profitably famous."

Subtle replied, "Oh, but all's idle to the philosopher's stone! Nothing compares to it! It is the art of angels, nature's miracle, the divine secret that flies in clouds from east to west, and whose tradition is not from men, but spirits.”

The Catholic Church followed and respected religious traditions. The Anabaptists rejected religious tradition and followed only what they found in the Bible.

Ananias said, “I hate traditions; I do not trust them.”

Tribulation Wholesome said, “Peace! Silence!”

“Traditions are all Popish,” Ananias said. “I will not be silent! I will not!”

Tribulation Wholesome warned, “Ananias!”

Ananias responded, “To please the profane, and to grieve the godly — I may not.”

Subtle said, “Well, Ananias, you shall overcome.”

Tribulation Wholesome said to Subtle, “It is an ignorant zeal that haunts him, sir. But truly, other than that, he is a very faithful brother, a tailor who repairs garments and so is an example of frugality, and a man who has by revelation a competent knowledge of the truth.”

Subtle asked, “Has he a competent sum there in his money bag to buy the goods inside? I have been made the guardian of these orphans and must for the sake of charity, and conscience, now see the most is made for my poor orphans although I also want the brethren to be gainers: In this situation, I am trying to make a win-win bargain. The orphans’ goods are inside. When you have viewed and bought them and taken the inventory of what they are, they will be ready for projection. There will be nothing more to do than cast on the alchemical medicine and transmute the metal. As much silver as there is tin inside, and as much gold as there is brass inside, I will give to you. I will transmute it for you, weight for weight. The weight of tin now will be the weight of silver later, and the weight of brass now will be the weight of gold later.”

Tribulation Wholesome asked, “But how long a time, sir, must the saints wait yet?”

Subtle replied, “Let me see, how’s the Moon now? Eight, nine, ten days hence, he will be silver potato, then three days must pass before he citronise. In some fifteen days, the magisterium — the philosopher’s stone — will be perfected.”

Ananias said, “About the second day of the third week, in the ninth month!”

He avoided the names of days and months because so many were based on the names of pagan gods or pagans. For example, August is named after Caesar Augustus, and Thursday is “Thor’s day.” Thor is a Nordic god.

Ananias was using an old-fashioned calendar that began with March — Anabaptists believed that God created the world in March. Today was November 1, and the philosopher’s stone would be ready on November 16.

“Yes, my good Ananias,” Subtle said.

Tribulation Wholesome asked Subtle, “What will the price of the orphans’ goods come to, do you think?”

Subtle said, “Approximately a hundred marks; the metal goods are as much as three filled carts, which are unladed now. You’ll make six millions from them — but I must have more coals purchased and brought in.”

“What!” Tribulation Wholesome said.

“Another load,” Subtle said, “and then we have finished. We must now increase our fire to ignis ardens, we are past fimus equinus, balnei, cineris, and all those lesser heats.”

Ignis ardens is the hottest fire; fimur equinus is the fire of horse dung, the least hot fire. In “creating” the philosopher’s stone, alchemists went from the least hot fire to the hottest fire.

Subtle said, “If the holy purse should with this draught fall low and the saints need a ready sum of money, I have a trick to melt the pewter you shall buy now, immediately, and with a tincture to color the pewter you shall make as good Dutch dollars as any are in Holland.”

Subtle was advising the Anabaptists to counterfeit Dutch currency. Dutch dollars were silver coins.

“Can you do that?” Tribulation Wholesome asked.

“Yes, and they shall pass the third examination,” Subtle replied.

The counterfeit coins would be so good that they could pass repeated close inspections.

Ananias said, “This will be joyful tidings to the brethren.”

“But you must keep this secret,” Subtle said.

One punishment for counterfeiters in the Middle Ages was being boiled alive; another was being pilloried and having their ears cut off.

Tribulation Wholesome said, “Yes, but wait. This act of coining, is it lawful?”

Ananias was eager to be a counterfeiter: “Lawful? We know no magistrate, or if we did, this is foreign coin.”

Anabaptists believed in no civil magistrate when it came to religious matters. When it came to religious matters, the only lawgiver was God.

Contrary to what Ananias thought, whether the money being counterfeited was foreign or not didn't matter; in England, it was illegal to counterfeit foreign money as well as domestic money.

Subtle said, "It is no coining, sir. It is only casting metal."

"Ha! You distinguish the two well," Tribulation Wholesome said. "Casting of money may be lawful."

Coining money and casting money in this case were the same action; both were counterfeiting money. If a government casts money, it is lawful. If alchemists or Anabaptists cast money, it is NOT lawful. Subtle was parodying Anabaptist casuistry.

"It is, sir," Ananias said.

"Truly, I take it to be so," Tribulation Wholesome said.

"There is no scruple, sir, to be made about it," Subtle said. "Believe Ananias: This case of conscience he is studied in. He knows the right thing for an Anabaptist to do."

Tribulation Wholesome said, "I'll bring this matter to the attention of the brethren."

"The brethren shall approve it as lawful," Ananias said. "Don't doubt that. Where shall it be done?"

Knocking sounded at the door.

"We'll talk about that soon," Subtle said. "There's someone who has come to speak with me. Go inside, please, and view the portions of metal. Inside is the whole inventory. I'll come to you soon."

Tribulation Wholesome and Ananias went inside.

Subtle asked, "Who is it?"

He opened the door and said, “Face! Come inside.”

— 3.3 —

Face, wearing the Captain’s uniform, came inside.

Subtle asked him, “How are you now? Did you get a good prize? Did you get a good profit?”

“Good pox!” Face complained. “Yonder costive cheater — Surly — never showed up.”

“Costive” means “constipated.” Face was using the word as an insult.

Subtle asked, “What happened?”

“I walked around the rotunda at the Temple Church until now, and no Surly showed up.”

“And have you quit him?” Subtle asked. “Have you given up on him?”

“Quit him!” Face said, “If Hell would quit — and acquit — him, too, he would be happy. By God’s light! Would you have me stalk like a mill-jade — a horse walking around and around in a circle to grind grain — all day, for one who will not yield us grains of profit? I know him of old — I know his type.”

“Oh, if we had gulled and cheated him,” Subtle said, “it would have shown our mastery — it would be something to boast about!”

“Let him go, black boy!” Face said. “Don’t think about him.”

Subtle’s face was black with soot. Although a philosopher’s stone could never be created, he kept a laboratory stocked with at least a few chemicals and he kept a fire going at least sometimes. A sooty face helped show that he was an alchemist.

Face continued, “Instead, turn your attention to this — here’s some fresh news that may possess and interest you. My dear delicious comrade and my fellow part-time pimp, I need to tell you that a noble count, a Don of Spain, who has come here to England because of his religious convictions as a Protestant, and who has brought munition — money and clothing — with him, six great Dutch slops, aka baggy trousers, bigger than three Dutch hoys, aka small coastal ships, besides round trunk-hose, aka another kind of odd clothing, furnished with pistolets, aka Spanish gold coins, and pieces of eight, aka Spanish dollars, will soon be here, my rogue, to enjoy a bath (that is the reason he gives for coming here) and to make his battery upon our Doll Common, our castle, our Cinque Port, our Dover pier, our what you will.”

Bathhouses were whorehouses, and the Spanish Don intended to sleep with Doll. Face humorously described this as a Spanish Armada making an assault upon England’s ports.

Face continued, “Where is she? She must prepare perfumes, delicate linen, the bath in chief, a banquet, and her wit, for she must milk his epididimas.”

At higher-class brothels, the john received a bath before having sex with a prostitute. An epididimas is a tube carrying sperm from the testicles. Doll was supposed to milk his balls; that is, cause him to ejaculate.

Face asked, “Where is the doxy?”

A doxy is a prostitute.

“I’ll send her to you,” Subtle said. “I need to dispatch my brace of little John Leidens, and come here again myself.”

A brace is a pair, and John Leiden was an Anabaptist. Subtle was referring to Tribulation Wholesome and Ananias.

“Are they inside then?” Face asked.

“Yes,” Subtle said. “They are numbering the sum they will pay for Sir Epicure Mammon’s metal goods.”

“How much?” Face asked.

“A hundred marks, boy,” Subtle said, and then he exited.

Face said, “Why, this is a lucky day. Ten pounds from Mammon! Three from my clerk! A Portuguese gold coin from my grocer/tobacconist! A hundred marks from the brethren! In addition, there will be reversions, aka future profits, and estates to come in with the widow, and additional profits from my Spanish Count! My share of the profits today will not be bought for forty —”

Doll Common entered the room.

“What do you want?” she asked.

“Pounds, dainty Dorothy!” Face said. “I want money! Are you so near?”

He meant, Do you want what I want?

“Yes,” Doll replied. “Say, lord General, how fares our camp?”

Face replied, “As with the few who had entrenched themselves safe, by their discipline, against a world, Doll, and laughed within those trenches, and grew fat with thinking on the booty and profit, Doll, brought in daily by their small raiding parties.”

To “laugh and grow fat” meant “hearty enjoyment” — they laughed until they grew sweaty because their cons were successful at bringing in booty and profit.

Face continued, “This dear hour, a doughty Don is taken with my Doll; and you may make his ransom what you will, my Dousabel.”

“Dousabel” comes from the French “douce et belle,” which means “sweet and pretty.”

Face continued, “He shall be brought here fettered with your fair looks, before he sees you; and he will be thrown on a down-bed, as dark as any dungeon, where you shall keep him awake with your drum — your drum, my Doll, your drum — until he is as tame as the poor blackbirds were in the great frost, or bees are with a basin, and so you throw him in the swan-skin coverlet, and cambric sheets, until he work honey and wax, my little God’s-gift.”

The Spanish Don would come here, and Doll would bed him. She would use her “drum” to keep him awake until he ejaculated and became tame. “To work honey” means “to use his penis to engage in sticky sexual caresses” and the “wax” he produced would be semen. Wax is a substance secreted by bees, but “to wax” means “to grow,” and the Spanish Don’s penis would grow.

During winters that were so cold that the Thames River was covered with ice, blackbirds became so hungry that they were “tame” — they would take food from the hands of a human. According to folklore, bees would return to the hive if a basin were drummed.

Doll’s “drum” was used in a rhythmic sexual pounding.

“Doll” is a nickname for “Dorothy,” which is derived from the Greek Dorothea, which means “God’s-gift.”

“Who is this man, General?” Doll asked.

Face replied, “He is an adalantado, a grandee, girl.”

An adalantado is a Spanish grandee; a grandee is a Spanish nobleman of the highest rank.

Face asked, "Hasn't my Dapper been here yet?"

"No," Doll replied.

"Nor my Drugger?"

"He has not, either," Doll replied.

"A pox on them!" Face said. "They are taking so long to collect money to give to us! Such stinkards should not be seen upon these festival days."

Subtle entered the room.

Face asked, "How is everything? Have you finished with the Anabaptists?"

"All is done," Subtle said. "They are gone. The sum of money they paid is put away safe and sound, my Face. I wish we knew another businessman now who would buy Mammon's metal objects outright. I have sold them once, but if I sold them twice we would have twice the profit."

Face said, "By God's eyelid, Nab shall buy them in the expectation that he will marry the widow. He will buy the metal items in order to furnish his household."

"Excellent idea," Subtle said. "Good thinking. I pray to God he comes here soon."

Face said, "I pray that he keeps away until our new business with the Spanish Don is over and done."

Subtle asked, "But, Face, how did you come to learn about this secret Don?"

Another meaning of "secret" is "pertaining to mystical, occult matters."

Face replied, "A spirit brought me the intelligence in a paper here, as I was conjuring yonder in my circle for Surly; I have my personal spiritual attendants abroad. Your bath is famous, Subtle, by my means."

He was referring to the rotunda of Temple Church as a magician's circle, but all that had happened was that while he was walking in the rotunda looking for Surly, someone handed him a note. The note was about finding a whore to have sex with.

Face continued, "Sweet Doll, you must go tune your virginals without losing any time. Listen. Give good action. Firk like a flounder. Kiss like a scallop, close. And tickle him with your mother tongue."

Virginals was a musical instrument like the harpsichord, but Face was using the word in a sexual sense: He wanted Doll to get ready to have sex with the Spanish Don.

"Firk" is to "fuck" as "dern" is to "damn." Flounders undulate when they swim. A scallop is a shellfish; the two pieces of the shell are close together. "Tickle him with your mother tongue" is fellatio.

Face continued, "His great Verdugoship has not a jot of the English language; this will make him so much the easier to be cheated, my Dolly."

The Spanish word "verdugo" means either "hangman" or "a young shoot of a tree." The second meaning may mean that Face thinks the Spanish Don is young and naïve and so will be easy to cheat. The first meaning is simply an insult.

Face continued, "He will come here in a hired coach, in secret, accompanied by our own coachman, whom I have sent as guide, and no one else."

Knocking sounded at the door.

Face asked, “Who’s that?”

Doll exited to find out.

Subtle asked, “Isn’t that the Spanish Don?”

Face replied, “Oh, no. It’s too early for it to be him.”

Doll returned.

“Who is it?” Subtle asked.

“Dapper, your clerk,” Doll replied.

“This is God’s will then,” Face said.

He said to Doll, “Queen of Fairy, put your costume on.”

Doll exited.

Face said to Subtle, “And, Doctor, put on your academic robes. Let’s get this business over and done with, for God’s sake.

“It will take some time,” Subtle said.

“That’s true,” Face said. “Take the cues I give you, and the time shall be brief enough.”

Face went to the window, looked out, and said, “By God’s light, here are two more! I see Abel Drugger, and I think he has with him the angry boy, the heir, who wants to learn how to quarrel.”

“Is the widow with them?” Subtle asked.

“No, not that I see,” Face said. “Leave and get dressed.”

Subtle exited.

— 3.4 —

Dapper entered the room.

Face, who was dressed like a Captain, said to him, “Oh, sir, you are welcome. The Doctor is inside working for you. I have had to take many pains to persuade him to do it!

“He swears you’ll be the darling of the dice. He says that he never heard her highness the Queen of Fairy dote until now. Your aunt has spoken about you the most gracious words that can be thought on.”

“Shall I see her grace?” Dapper asked.

“You shall see her, and kiss her, too,” Face replied.

Abel Drugger entered the room, followed by Kastril.

Face said, “What, honest Nab! Have you brought the damask?”

“No, sir,” Drugger said. “Here’s the tobacco.”

Face said, “That is well done, Nab. Will you bring the damask, too?”

“Yes,” Drugger said. “Captain Face, here’s the gentleman, Master Kastril, whom I have brought to see the Doctor.”

“Where’s the widow?” Captain Face asked.

Drugger replied, “Sir, if Kastril likes what happens here, his sister, he says, shall come.”

“Is that so?” Captain Face said. “All in good time.”

He then asked, “Is your name Kastril, sir?”

Kastril replied, “Yes, and I’m the best of the Kastrils. I’d be sorry otherwise by fifteen hundred pounds a year.”

He was the oldest male son and so had inherited the bulk of his late father’s estate.

He asked, “Where is the Doctor? My mad tobacco-boy, here, tells me that the Doctor is a man who can do things. Has the Doctor any skill?”

“In what, sir?” Captain Face asked.

“To carry out the business of dueling — that is, to manage a quarrel fairly, upon fit terms and according to the rules,” Kastril said.

“It seems, sir, you are new to London,” Face said, “since you wonder about his ability to do that.”

Kastril, who was from the country, said, “Sir, I am not so young, but I have heard some speech of the angry boys, and seen them take tobacco in Drugger’s shop, and I can take tobacco, too, and I would like to be one of the angry boys, and go down and practice being angry in the country.”

The angry boys, aka roaring boys, were upper-class hooligans who smoked tobacco and who insulted and fought people. Dueling was illegal in England, but many people died in duels in France. The angry boys wanted to learn the rules for insulting and fighting people because the rules would let them know to what extent they could insult other people without having to fight a duel.

Face said, “Sir, as for the duello, the Doctor, I assure you, shall inform and educate you to the least shadow of a hair; and he will show you a document he has written. When you report to him a quarrel you are involved in, he can tell you how serious the quarrel is, and how safe or dangerous it is, and whether or not a duel to the death must be fought.

“He will let you know how the quarrel may be borne, whether in a right line, or a half circle, or else may be cast into an angle that is blunt, if not acute. All this he will demonstrate. And then, he will teach you rules for giving and receiving insults about being a liar.”

“What?” Kastril said. “To take the insult of being called a liar?”

Face replied, “Yes, in oblique he’ll show you how to take the insult, or in a circle he’ll show you how to take the insult, but never in diameter.”

To be directly accused of being a liar — for example, “You lie in your throat” — was an insult that required a duel to settle. Being accused indirectly of lying, however, need not result in a duel. There were other ways to handle the issue.

Face continued, “The whole town of London studies his theorems about quarreling, and disputes and discusses them ordinarily at the eating academies.”

The “eating academies” were ordinaries — places for eating and drinking and gambling. Face was playing with language.

Kastril asked, “Does he teach living by the wits, too?”

A person who lives by his wits is able to survive and advance himself with his intelligence. A person who lives by his wits lacks a regular source of income and often is forced to cheat others. Possibly, Kastril thought that living by one’s wits meant being witty and making puns.

Face replied, “He teaches anything whatsoever. You cannot think of any subtle subject but he reads and understands it.

“Can he teach living by one’s wits? Look at me. He made me a Captain. I was a stark pimp previously and was a novice to gambling like you, before I met with him. That was not even two months ago. I’ll tell you his method: First, he will introduce you at some ordinary eating and drinking place. He will enter you there as if you were a student.”

Apparently, Face wanted Kastril to think that Face had become a Captain as a result of winning at gambling — something he had learned from Doctor Subtle.

“No,” Kastril said. “I’ll not go there. You shall pardon me.”

“Why not, sir?” Captain Face asked.

“There’s gambling there, and tricks, and cheating.”

“What!” Face said. “Do you want to be a gallant and not gamble?”

“Yes, gambling will financially ruin a man. It will spend a man.”

“Spend a man” meant “waste a man’s wealth.”

“Spend you!” Face said. “It will repair you when you are spent. How do they live by their wits there, who have spent six times your fortunes?”

Kastril said, “What? Three thousand pounds a year!”

Apparently, this was his annual income. If he had been a younger son, he would have been poorer by fifteen hundred pounds per year. But possibly his real annual income was five hundred pounds a year, and he had been exaggerating his annual income earlier.

Face said, “Yes, forty thousand.”

Forty thousand pounds would produce a good annual income.

Face may have been stating that Kastril would definitely lose all his money gambling. Kastril wanted to learn how to live by his wits, and people with steady sources of income do not need to live by their wits.

Kastril asked, “Are there such men?”

“Yes, sir,” Captain Face replied. “And they are still gallants and dress well.”

He pointed to Dapper and said, “Here’s a young gentleman who was born to nothing. He has forty marks a year, which I count as nothing. He is to be initiated into the world of gallantry and receive a familiar spirit from the Doctor to help him win at gambling. Dapper will win, by irresistible luck, within this fortnight, enough to buy a Barony for himself. His Barony and the money he wins will cause people to treat him with great respect. They will set him at the head of the table, the position of honor, at the groom-porter’s all the Christmas season.”

A groom-porter was a court officer of the English Royal Household. He managed gambling and resolved disputes related to gambling.

Captain Face continued, “And for the whole year through, at every place, where there is gambling, they will present him with the chair of honor, the best service, the best drink and sometimes will present him with two glasses of Canary wine and pay nothing.”

Captain Face may have wanted Kastril to think that Dapper would pay nothing, but actually he had said that whoever presented Dapper with two glasses of Canary wine would pay nothing — and would possibly drink one of the glasses of wine.

Captain Face continued, “They will present him with the purest linen and the sharpest knife. The partridge will be next to his plate, and somewhere he will be presented with a dainty bed, in private, with the dainty.”

The dainty is a dainty woman — a prostitute.

All of this would be the result of the money that Dapper expected to win at gambling.

Captain Face continued, “You shall have your ordinaries bid for him, as playhouses bid for a poet.”

Poets such as William Shakespeare wrote plays. A good poet was highly valued, and Shakespeare did well financially.

Captain Face continued, “The master of the ordinary will ask him to say aloud what dish he wants, which must be buttered shrimps, and those who drink to no mouth else, will drink to his, as being the splendid president mouth of all the board. Yes, those who drink toasts to no one else will drink toasts to him.”

Kastril asked, “Do you not gull one? Are you deceiving me?”

“As God is my life, do you think that?” Captain Face said. “A cast-off commander — an unemployed military commander — who has little credit and can get only two pairs of gloves or two pairs of spurs without paying in advance, will, as swiftly as post-horses, by dealing with Doctor Subtle, arrive at competent means and money to keep himself, a woman for heterosexual sex, and a naked boy for homosexual sex in excellent fashion and be admired for it.”

Apparently, if you have enough money, you can be admired for unethical behavior. This is as true now as it was then. Quite a few highly respected rock stars have allegedly slept with underage girls. A rich USAmerican President has boasted about grabbing women “by the pussy.”

Kastril asked, “Will the Doctor teach this?”

Captain Face said, “He will do more, sir, when your land is gone, as men of spirit hate to keep earth long —”

He was saying clearly that Kastril would lose his land and so lose his income. Kastril would probably do this through gambling — Kastril had neglected to ask for a familiar spirit as Dapper had done to help him win at gambling. (Not that a familiar spirit would help him win at gambling.)

Kastril no doubt thought that being a man of spirit was a good thing.

Captain Face continued, “— in a vacation, when small money is stirring, and ordinaries are suspended until the term —”

London was much quieter during vacations between law terms.

Captain Face continued, “— he’ll show you a perspective, where on one side you shall see the faces and the persons of all sufficient young heirs in town, whose bonds are current for commodity. On the other side, you shall see the merchants’ forms, and others, who without the help of any second broker who would expect a share, will trust such parcels. In the third square, you shall see the exact street and sign where the commodity is, and does but wait to be delivered, be it pepper, soap, hops, or tobacco, oatmeal, woad (a plant used to make blue dye), or cheeses. All of these things you may so handle, to enjoy to your own use, and never stand obliged to pay for them.”

As a man who had lost his money and land and the rest of his inheritance through gambling, Kastril would have to live by his wits. The “perspective” — possibly a magic mirror — that Doctor Subtle would supposedly show him would let him know who are the young men who are being cheated in the commodities swindle — taking out a loan and getting part of the loan in much overvalued commodities. It would also show him the merchants and others who would profit from supplying the commodities. Finally, it would show him where the commodities were stored. The heirs would get the commodities, have little use for them, and store them. Kastril, who was living by his wits, would break in and steal the commodities.

“Really!” Kastril said. “Is he such a fellow?”

He thought that getting the commodities without paying for them would be wonderful.

Face replied, "Why, Nab here knows him. And then for making wedding matches for rich widows, young gentlewomen, heirs, he's the most fortunate man who can deliver the greatest amount of fortune when arranging a match. Doctor Subtle's sent to, from far and near, from all over England, by people who want to have his counsel, and to know their fortunes."

"By God's will, my suster shall see him," Kastril said.

He was a country boy, and he used the country-boy pronunciation of "sister."

"I'll tell you, sir, what he told me about Nab," Captain Face said. "It's a strange thing!"

He then said to Drugger, "By the way, you must eat no cheese, Nab. It breeds melancholy, and that same melancholy breeds worms, but forget it."

Captain Face said to Kastril, "He told me that honest Nab here was never in a tavern but once in his life."

Drugger said, "That's the truth, and no more than once."

Captain Face said, "And then he was so sick —"

With a hangover, no doubt.

Drugger said, "Could he tell you that, too?"

"How else would I know it?" Captain Face replied.

Drugger said, "In truth we had been out shooting and had a piece of fat ram-mutton for supper, and it lay so heavy on my stomach —"

Captain Face interrupted, “And he has no head to bear any wine; for what with the noise of the fiddlers, and care of his shop, for he dares to keep no servants —”

Drugger did not trust servants, and so he ran the shop by himself.

Drugger said, “My head did so ache —”

Captain Face said, “And he was eager to be brought home, Doctor Subtle told me, and then a good old woman —”

Drugger interrupted, “— yes, indeed, she dwells in Sea-coal Lane, and she did cure me with boiled ale and the plant known as pellitory of the wall. It cost me only two-pence.”

He hesitated and said, “I had another sickness that was worse than that.”

Captain Face said, “Yes, that was with the grief you suffered for being assessed at eighteen-pence for the water-work.”

Pump houses were being built in London to provide Thames River water to houses.

Drugger said, “That’s the truth, and it was likely to have cost me almost my life.”

“Your hair fell out?” Captain Face asked.

“Yes, sir,” Drugger said.

Baldness can be a sign of syphilis.

Drugger added, “The high assessment was done out of spite.”

Captain Face said, “That’s correct — so says Doctor Subtle.”

Kastril said, “Please, tobacco-boy, go fetch my suster. I’ll see this learned boy before I go, and so shall she.”

Captain Face said, “Sir, he is busy now, but if you have a sister to fetch hither, perhaps your own efforts may bring her here sooner, and he by that time will be free.”

Kastril said, “I am leaving.”

He exited.

Captain Face said, “Drugger, the widow is yours! You shall marry her! The damask!”

Abel Drugger exited.

Captain Face thought, Subtle and I must wrestle to decide who marries the widow.

Subtle was an older man, so Face would almost certainly win the wrestling match.

Face said out loud, “Come on, Master Dapper, you see how I turn clients here away so that we can give your cause swift dispatch. Have you performed the ceremonies we prescribed for you?”

Dapper replied, “Yes, I used the vinegar, and I put on a clean shirt.”

Captain Face said, “That’s good. That clean shirt may do you more good than you think. The Queen of Fairy, your aunt, is on fire, although she will not show it, to have a sight of you. Have you provided for her grace’s servants?”

Dapper was supposed to bring money for the servants of the Queen of Fairy.

Dapper replied, “Yes, here are six score Edward shillings.”

“Good!” Captain Face said.

These were shillings minted during the reign of King Edward VI.

“And an old Harry’s sovereign.”

This was a sovereign minted during the reign of King Henry VIII.

Coins were identified by whose reign they were minted in because the amount of precious metal in the coins varied from sovereign to sovereign.

“Very good!” Captain Face said.

“And three James shillings, and an Elizabeth groat. Altogether, they are exactly twenty nobles.”

The sovereigns were King James I and Queen Elizabeth I.

“Oh, you are too exact,” Captain Face said.

He would have preferred that Dapper bring more than exactly twenty nobles.

He added, “I wish you had had the other noble in Maries.”

Queen Mary I was the sovereign between King Edward VI and Queen Elizabeth I. After she married, both her portrait and her husband’s portrait appeared on coins.

Dapper said, “I have some Philip and Maries.”

These were coins bearing the faces of Queen Mary of England and her husband, the future King Philip II of Spain. Maries were rare because Bloody Mary reigned only one year before marrying Philip. She began her reign in July 1553 and married Philip of Spain on 25 July 1554. Philip of Spain became King Philip II of Spain on 16 January 1556, and Queen Mary died on 17 November 1558.

Captain Face said, “Yes, those are the best of all.”

Those coins were the best of all because they were in addition to the coins he had already received. Or Face may have been making a joke because those two sovereigns were NOT the best of all. Queen Mary I attempted to make England a Catholic nation again. Some Protestant bishops, including Archbishop Thomas Cranmer, were burnt at the stake, and other violence broke out, resulting in her being known as Bloody Mary. As King Philip II of Spain, Philip attempted to invade England with the Spanish Armada in 1588. Fortunately, England decisively defeated the Spanish Armada.

Captain Face asked, "Where are they?"

Dapper handed the coins to Captain Face, who said, "Listen, I hear the Doctor."

— 3.5 —

Subtle, disguised as and wearing the costume of a Priest of Fairy, entered the room. He was carrying a strip of cloth.

Using a feigned voice, Subtle asked, "Has her grace's cousin come yet?"

Captain Face said, "He has come."

"And is he fasting?" Subtle asked.

"Yes."

"And has he cried 'hum'?"

Face said to Dapper, "Thrice, you must answer."

Dapper said, "Thrice."

Subtle asked, "And as often has he said 'buzz'?"

Face said to Dapper, "If you have, say so."

Dapper said, "I have."

Subtle said, “Then, to her cuz, aka nephew, hoping that he has vinegared his senses as he was bid, the Fairy Queen dispenses by me this robe, the petticoat of Lady Fortune. This petticoat he immediately must put on, she importunes. And though to Lady Fortune near be her petticoat, yet nearer is her smock, the Queen does note.”

A smock is a ladies’ undergarment. Subtle was identifying Lady Fortune and the Queen of Fairy as the same person.

Subtle, disguised as a Priest of Fairy, continued, “And therefore, a piece of her smock the Queen of Fairy has sent. When Dapper was a child, a piece of her smock was rent to wrap him in, and she requests that for a scarf he now will wear it with as much love as then her grace did tear it, around his eyes to show he is fortunate.”

They used the piece of ladies’ underwear to blindfold Dapper’s eyes.

Subtle continued, still using a feigned voice, “And, trusting to her to make his fortune and estate, the Queen of Fairy wants him to throw away all worldly pelf — all money and valuables — that are on him. Once he has performed that, she will not doubt him.”

“She need not doubt him, sir,” Face said to the disguised Subtle. “Alas, he has nothing, except what he will part with as willingly, upon her grace’s word —”

He said to Dapper, “Throw away your wallet.”

He said to Subtle, “— as she would ask it.”

He said to Dapper, “Throw away handkerchiefs and all.”

He said to Subtle, “Whatever she orders, he’ll obey.”

Dapper threw away his wallet and handkerchiefs. In this society, handkerchiefs were expensive.

Face said to Dapper, “If you have a ring on you, cast it away, or if you have a silver seal at your wrist, throw it away, too. Her grace will send her fairies here to search you; therefore, deal directly with her highness. If they find that you conceal a mite, you are ruined.”

A mite is a small coin of little monetary value.

In Luke 20:45-47 and 21:1-4 we read:

45 Then in the audience of all the people he said unto his disciples,

46 Beware of the scribes, which desire to walk in long robes, and love greetings in the markets, and the highest seats in the synagogues, and the chief rooms at feasts;

47 Which devour widows’ houses, and for a shew make long prayers: the same shall receive greater damnation.

1 And he looked up, and saw the rich men casting their gifts into the treasury.

2 And he saw also a certain poor widow casting in thither two mites.

3 And he said, Of a truth I say unto you, that this poor widow hath cast in more than they all:

4 For all these have of their abundance cast in unto the offerings of God: but she of her penury hath cast in all the living that she had. (King James Version)

The same story is told in Mark 12:38-44.

Face and Subtle are much more like the scribes who devour widows’ houses than they are like the widow.

Dapper said, “Truly, that’s all.”

“All what?” Face asked.

“All my money,” Dapper said. “I am telling the truth.”

Face said, “Keep nothing that is transitory about you.”

“Transitory” means “belonging to this transitory world.” That includes money and other wealth.

Face whispered to Subtle, “Tell Doll to play music.”

He then said to the blindfolded Dapper, “Look, the elves have come—”

Doll played on a cittern in the next room.

Face continued, “— to pinch you, if you are not telling the truth. You have been warned.”

Face and Subtle pinched the blindfolded Dapper, who said, “Ow! I have a paper with a spur-royal in it.”

A spur-royal is a coin — a royal that has the design of a Sun and Sunbeams on it. The Sun and Sunbeams look like the rowel of a spur. A rowel is a small wheel with radiating spokes.

Face and Subtle began to speak in “Fairy,” using feigned voices. When Face translated the Fairy language, he used his normal voice. Subtle used two disguised voices: one for the Priest of Fairy, and one for the fairy.

Face said, “Ti, ti.”

“They knew it, they say.”

Subtle said, “Ti, ti, ti, ta.”

“He has more yet.”

Face said, “Ti, ti-ti-ti.”

“In the other pocket?”

Subtle said, “Titi, titi, titi, titi, titi.”

“The fairies must pinch him or he will never confess, they say.”

Face and Subtle pinched Dapper again.

Dapper said, “Ow! Ow!”

Face said, “No, please hold back — he is her grace’s nephew.

“Ti, ti, ti?”

“The fairies say this: What do you care? In good faith, you shall care.”

Face then said to Dapper, “Deal plainly, sir, and shame the fairies. Show that you are an innocent.”

The phrase “an innocent” means both “a not-guilty person” and “a fool.”

Dapper said, “I swear by this good light, I have nothing.”

Subtle said, “Ti, ti, ti, ti, to, ta.”

“He does equivocate, she says.”

“To equivocate” means “to conceal the truth by using deceptive language.”

Subtle continued, “Ti, ti do ti, ti ti do, ti da.”

“And he swears by the light when he is blinded.”

Dapper said, “I swear by this good dark, I have nothing but a half-crown of gold about my wrist, that my love gave me, and I have a leaden heart I have worn since she forsook me.”

Face said, “I thought it was something. And would you incur your aunt’s displeasure for these trifles? Come, I had rather you had thrown away twenty half-crowns.”

Indeed, he would. Twenty half-crowns are worth twenty times one half-crown.

Dapper took off the half-crown that he was wearing as a bracelet.

Face told him, “You may wear your leaden heart still.”

Lead is not a precious metal.

Doll entered the room hastily.

Face and Subtle went to Doll and talked to her quietly so that Dapper would not overhear them.

Face asked, “What is it?”

Subtle asked, “What is your news, Doll?”

Doll replied, “Yonder’s your Knight, Sir Mammon.”

Face said, “By God’s eyelid, we never thought of him until now! Where is he?”

Doll replied, “Here next to this room; he is at the door.”

Subtle said to Face, “And you are not ready to meet him! You are dressed as Captain Face, not as Lungs!”

He then ordered, “Doll, get Lungs’ suit of clothing.”

Doll exited.

Subtle said to Face, “He must not be sent back.”

Face said, “You are correct. We must keep him here. What shall we do with this puffin we have here, now he’s on the spit?”

The puffin was Dapper. Puffins were seabirds whose young puffed up their feathers and looked plump and were considered a delicacy. (By the way, in this culture, proud people were called puffins.)

Dapper was metaphorically on the spit, ready to be roasted. Face and Subtle were getting everything of value that they could get from him.

Subtle said, “Why, we’ll lay him back awhile, with some excuse. Let’s put him on the back burner. Sir Epicure Mammon is the big prize — the one we can get the most money from.”

Doll came back with the clothes Face wore when he was Lungs, the alchemist’s assistant.

Subtle said loudly, “Ti, ti, ti, ti, ti, ti.”

“Would her grace speak with me? I am coming.”

He then said quietly, “Help me dress Face quickly, Doll!”

They began to dress him.

Knocking sounded on the door.

Face asked, “Who’s there?”

Hearing the answer, he said, “Sir Epicure, my master’s in the way of my coming to you — he can’t know you’re here. Please walk three or four turns around the room, just until Subtle’s back is turned, and I’ll be able to serve you.”

He then whispered, “Quickly, Doll!”

Subtle went to Dapper and said out loud, “Her grace the Queen of Fairy commends her kindly to you, master Dapper.”

“I long to see her grace,” Dapper replied.

Subtle said, “She now is eating dinner in her bed, and she has sent you from her own private plate a dead mouse and a piece of gingerbread to be merry with and appease your hunger, lest you faint with fasting. Yet if you could hold out until she sees you, she says, it would be better for you.”

Face said, “Sir, he shall hold out, even if it were for two hours, for her highness, I can assure you of that. We will not lose all we have done.”

Subtle said, “He must neither see nor speak to anybody until then.”

Face said, “For that reason we’ll put, sir, a gag in his mouth.”

“A gag of what?” Subtle asked.

“Of gingerbread,” Face said. “You put it in. He who has pleased her grace thus far shall not now shrink back because of a little inconvenience.”

He said to Dapper, “Open your mouth, sir, and let him put the gag in.”

Subtle put the gingerbread in Dapper’s mouth.

Subtle and Doll spoke quietly together so that Dapper could not hear them.

Subtle asked, “Where shall we put him now?”

Doll replied, “In the privy.”

A privy is a latrine.

Subtle said to Dapper, “Come along, sir, I now must show you Lady Fortune’s privy lodgings.”

“Privy lodgings” are “private rooms.”

Face asked, “Are they perfumed, and is his bath ready?”

“All is ready,” Subtle said. “Only the fumigation’s somewhat strong.”

One meaning of “fumigating” is “perfuming with aromatic plants.” Another meaning is “generating odorous fumes.”

Yes, the fumigation of a privy can be somewhat strong.

Subtle led Dapper away, and Doll Common carried away Face’s Captain’s uniform.

Face said, “Sir Epicure, I am yours, sir, by and by.”

He finished dressing as Lungs while Subtle, Doll, and Dapper exited.

ACT 4 (The Alchemist)

— 4.1 —

Face, now dressed as Lungs, opened the door, let in Sir Epicure Mammon, and said, “Sir, you have come here at the absolute best time.”

“Where’s your master?” Sir Epicure Mammon asked.

“He is now preparing for projection, sir,” Face said. “Your metal stuff will all be changed into precious metals shortly.”

“Into gold?” Sir Epicure Mammon asked.

“Into gold and silver, sir.”

“I don’t care for silver.”

“Yes, sir,” Face said, “but there will be a little silver that you can give to beggars.”

“Where’s the lady?” Sir Epicure Mammon asked.

“She is at hand here,” Face said. “I have told her such brave and splendid things about you, especially about your generosity and your noble spirit.”

“Have you?” Sir Epicure Mammon asked.

“Yes, so much that she is almost in her fit because she is so eager to see you. But, good sir, speak about no theology in your conference with her for fear of putting her in a rage — a mad fit.”

“I promise you I won’t,” Sir Epicure Mammon said.

Face said, “If you do, six men will not hold her down, and then, if the old man — Doctor Subtle — should hear or see you —”

“Don’t worry about that,” Sir Epicure Mammon said.

Face continued, “— the whole house, sir, would run mad. You know it. You know how scrupulous he is, and violent, against the least act of sin.

“Medicine, or mathematics, poetry, affairs of state, or bawdry, as I told you, she will endure, and never be startled at hearing about them, but say to her no word of religious controversy.”

“You have schooled me well, good Ulen.”

“And you must praise her family, remember that,” Face said, “and her nobility.”

“Leave it to me,” Sir Epicure Mammon said. “No genealogist at the College of Heralds, no, nor antiquary, aka student of history, Lungs, shall do it better. Go.”

Face thought, Why, this is yet a kind of modern happiness, to have Doll Common thought to be a great lady.

In this society, “happiness” meant both “good fortune” and “fitness,” and “modern” meant “common,” “trivial,” and “current.”

In other words, this is one of the things that Face was thinking: In our modern society, how fitting it is that a prostitute such as Doll Common should be thought to be a great lady.

Face exited to get Doll.

Alone, Sir Epicure Mammon said to himself, “Now, Epicure, heighten yourself.”

By “heighten yourself,” he meant, “Raise your level of discourse, and talk like a courtier.” Readers may be forgiven if they thought he meant, “Heighten and raise a certain part of my body.”

He continued, “Talk to her all in gold. Rain on her as many showers as Jove did drops on his Danaë.”

Jupiter, the Roman King of the gods, had appeared to Danaë after taking the form of a shower of gold. He made her pregnant, and she gave birth to the hero Perseus.

Sir Epicure Mammon continued, “Show that the god is a miser, compared with me, Mammon. What! The philosopher’s stone will do it. She shall feel gold, taste gold, hear gold, sleep gold; indeed, we will concupere gold.”

Concupere is Latin for “to have sex.”

He continued, “I will be puissant and mighty in my talk to her.”

He heard a noise and said, “Here she comes.”

Face and Doll entered the room. Doll was richly dressed.

Face whispered to Doll, “Up and at him, Doll. Suckle him and nurse him along as if he were a baby.”

He then said out loud, “This is the noble Knight, I told your ladyship —”

Sir Epicure Mammon interrupted, “Madam, with your pardon, I kiss your vesture.”

“Vesture” is elevated language for “clothing” or “dress.”

Doll replied, “Sir, I would be uncivil if I were to endure that. My lip to you, sir.”

To kiss a lady’s dress is often not acceptable. When Doll replied, “My lip to you, sir,” she had her choice of two responses: 1) Doll could curl her lip at Sir Epicure Mammon to show that she was rejecting his uncivilized behavior, or 2) Doll could kiss him. Doll had to decide whether to play hard to get.

Sir Epicure Mammon said, “I hope my lord your brother is in health, lady.”

Doll replied, “My lord, my brother is, although I am no lady, sir.”

One meaning of “lady” is “the female equivalent of a lord.” It has another meaning that also did not pertain to Doll.

Face thought, Well said, my Guinea bird.

“Guinea bird” is slang for “prostitute.”

Sir Epicure Mammon said, “Right noble madam —”

Face thought, Oh, we shall have most fierce idolatry — make it iDOLLatry.

Sir Epicure Mammon continued, “— it is your prerogative; it is your right to be called ‘lady.’”

Doll replied, “Rather, it is your courtesy that makes you call me ‘lady.’”

Sir Epicure Mammon said, “Even if there were nothing else to make known your virtues to me, your answers reveal your breeding and your blood.”

Doll said, “Blood we boast none, sir. I am a poor Baron’s daughter.”

Sir Epicure Mammon said, “Poor! And he begat you? Don’t be profane. Had your father slept all the happy remnant of his life after that act of procreation, just lying there still and panting, he would have done enough to make himself, his issue, and his posterity noble.”

Doll said, “Sir, although we may be said to lack the gilt and trappings, the dress of honor, yet we strive to keep the seeds and the materials.”

She was using the language of alchemy. “The seeds and the materials” meant “the essential elements.”

Sir Epicure Mammon said, “I see that the old ingredient, virtue, was not lost, nor was lost the drug money used to make your compound.”

He also was using the language of alchemy.

He continued, “There is a strange — foreign — nobility in your eye, this lip, that chin! I think you resemble one of the Austrian Princes.”

The Austrian Princes were Hapsburgs; the Hapsburg lip was a prominent lower lip. Look up images of the Hapsburg lip, and you will see that his attempt to flatter Doll was an abject failure. Being of royal blood does not necessarily mean that one is good looking. Chances are, Sir Epicure Mammon knew little about what the Austrian Princes looked like.

Face thought, Very likely! Her father was an Irish costermonger. He sold fruit from a cart.

A “coster” is an apple, but costermongers sold other kinds of fruit, too.

Sir Epicure Mammon said, “The house of Valois had just such a nose, and such a forehead the Medici of Florence still boast.”

Doll said, “Truly, I have been likened to all these Princes.”

Face thought, I’ll be sworn that it is true because I heard it.

Some guys, such as Sir Epicure Mammon, will say anything to get laid. In Doll’s case, “How much?” and “OK” are usually all that need to be said.

Sir Epicure Mammon said, “I don’t see how! You don’t resemble any one Prince; rather, you have the very best of all their features.”

Face thought, I'll go into another room and laugh.

He exited.

Sir Epicure Mammon continued, “You have a certain touch, or air, that sparkles a divinity, beyond an earthly beauty!”

Doll said, “Oh, you are playing the role of a courtier.”

Sir Epicure Mammon said, “Good lady, give me permission —”

Doll interrupted, “Truly, I may not give you permission to mock me, sir.”

Sir Epicure Mammon finished, “— to burn in this sweet flame of love. The phoenix never knew a nobler death.”

The phoenix was a mythological Arabian bird that lived for five hundred years, burned itself up, and rose reborn from the ashes.

Doll said, “Now you court the courtier.”

She meant that he was out-doing the courtier — speaking more extravagant praise than even a courtier would speak.

She continued, “You destroy what you would build. This art, sir, that you put in your words calls your whole faith into question. By speaking such extravagant praise, you make me question your praise.”

Sir Epicure Mammon said, “By my soul —”

Doll interrupted, “Oaths are made of the same air, sir. You can swear exaggerated oaths just like you say exaggerated praise.”

Sir Epicure Mammon continued, “— Nature never bestowed upon mortality a more unblemished, a more harmonious physical appearance. She played the stepdame in all other faces.”

Stepmothers were thought to be less generous and caring than mothers.

He said, “Sweet madam, let me be particular —”

This society used “particular” to mean “familiar, intimate, close, friendly,” but Doll deliberately interpreted “particular” to mean sexually “familiar, intimate, close, friendly.”

She interrupted, “‘Particular,’ sir! I hope you know your distance!”

Sir Epicure Mammon said, “I don’t mean ‘particular’ in any ill sense, sweet lady, but merely to be friendly enough to you to ask how your fair graces pass the hours? I see you are lodged here in the house of a rare and splendid man, an excellent artist, but what’s that to you? Why are you here?”

Doll said, “Yes, he is a rare and splendid man, sir. I study mathematics and astrology, as well as distillation and alchemy, here.”

Sir Epicure Mammon said, “Oh, I see! I beg your pardon. He’s a divine instructor! He can extract the souls of all things by his art. He can call all the virtues and the miracles of the Sun into a temperate furnace. He can teach dull Nature what her own forces are. He is a man whom the Emperor has courted above Kelley and has sent him medals and chains — necklaces — to invite him to come to his court.”

Edward Kelley was an associate of John Dee; he was also an alchemist who claimed to have the philosopher’s stone. Because of this claim, Holy Roman Emperor Rudolph II of Germany invited him to his court. When Edward Kelley failed to make gold, Rudolph II had him imprisoned. In this society, chains can be necklaces, but Edward Kelley wore a different kind of chains in prison.

Doll said, “Yes, and for his medical art, sir —”

Sir Epicure Mammon said, “His medical art is above the medical art of Aesculapius, who drew the envy of the Thunderer! I know all this, and more.”

Aesculapius was an ancient Greek doctor who could revive the dead. Out of fear that Aesculapius would make humans immortal, Zeus — known as the Thunderer because of the thunderbolts he threw as weapons — killed him.

Doll said, “Indeed I am wholly taken, sir, with these studies that contemplate Nature.”

Sir Epicure Mammon said, “That is a noble quality to have, but this form of yours was not intended to so dark a use. Had you been crooked, foul, of some coarse mold, a cloister would have done well as a place for you, but for such a physical appearance as yours, which might stand up the glory of a Kingdom, to live as a recluse is a complete solecism, even if it were in a nunnery.”

A solecism is an error; Sir Epicure Mammon believed it would be an “error” for Doll to sleep alone. A woman like her ought not to be “sole” — alone.

He continued, “It must not be. I wonder that my lord your brother would permit it. You should spend half my land first, if I were he. Doesn’t this diamond look better on my finger than in the quarry?”

“Yes,” Doll said.

“Why, you are like this diamond,” Sir Epicure Mammon said. “You were created, lady, for the light. Here, you shall wear it; take it, this is the first pledge of what I will say now. This will bind you to believe me.”

Taking the diamond, Doll asked, “To bind me in chains of adamant?”

Sir Epicure Mammon said, “Yes, the strongest bands. And hear a secret, too: Here, by your side, stands at this time the happiest man in Europe.”

“Happiest” meant “most fortunate” and “with the most fortune.”

Doll asked, “You are contented, sir?”

“Yes, in truth I am the envy of Princes and the fear of states.”

Princes would envy him because of his large amount of gold, and states — governments — would fear him because such a surplus of gold could wreck the economy.

“Do you say so, Sir Epicure?”

“Yes, and you shall be the proof of it, daughter of honor. I have cast my eye upon your beautiful form, and I will raise this beauty above all titles of rank.”

“You mean no treason, sir?” Doll asked.

“No, I will take away that suspicion from you,” Sir Epicure Mammon said. “I am the lord of the philosopher’s stone, and you are the lady of it.”

“What, sir!” Doll said. “Do you really have that?”

“I am the master of the mastery,” he said.

He meant that he was the master of the alchemist who had mastered the art of making the philosopher’s stone.

He continued, “This day the good old wretch of the house here has made the philosopher’s stone for us. Now he’s busy at projection. Think therefore what is your first wish now. Let me hear it, and it shall rain into your lap. It will be no shower of gold, but instead it will be floods of gold, whole cataracts, a deluge, that will beget a nation's inhabitants with you."

Zeus had used one shower of gold to be able to sleep with Danaë, and they had had one son. Sir Epicure Mammon intended to use whole floods of gold to sleep many times with Doll and to have many children with her.

Doll said, "You are pleased, sir, to work on the ambition of our sex."

Apparently, according to Doll the ambition of women is to be very rich and to have many children.

Sir Epicure Mammon said, "I am pleased the glory of her sex should know that this nook, here, of the Blackfriars area is no climate for her to live obscurely in and learn medicine and surgery that would be fit for the constable's wife living in part of a county in Essex."

The constable's wife could learn medicine and surgery that she could use to help other people, or someone such as Doll could learn medicine and surgery in order to help people such as the constable's wife. Either way, people would be helping people — constables certainly also help other people by keeping law and order. This is in contrast to the life that Sir Epicure Mammon wanted Doll and himself to lead — life that is purely selfish.

He continued, "Instead, you should come forth, and taste the air of palaces. You should eat and drink the toils of empirical physicians, and their boasted practice. Their remedies include tincture of pearl, and coral, gold, and amber."

Tincture of pearl was supposed to help the heart. Coralline was a sea-moss that was supposed to increase strength. Aurum potabile, Latin for "drinkable gold," was an alchemical medicine. People wore amber bracelets in an attempt to find love.

He continued, “You should be seen at feasts and triumphs. You should have people ask about you, ‘What miracle is she?’ You should set all the eyes of people at court on fire, like a magnifying glass that is used to start fires, and you should burn their eyes to cinders because the jewels of twenty states adorn you, and the light emanating from the jewels and you strikes out the stars with the result that, when your name is mentioned, Queens look pale. You and I, just by showing our love, can cause Nero’s Poppaea to be lost in story! Thus will we have it.”

Poppaea was first the Roman Emperor Nero’s mistress and then his second wife. Odd stories were told about her and Nero, such as that Nero murdered his mother and divorced and later murdered his first wife so he could marry Poppaea. Supposedly, she bathed in the milk of asses. Nero is said to have killed her by kicking her in the abdomen while she was pregnant.

Sir Epicure Mammon, by saying that the romance of Doll and himself would make the romance of Nero and Poppaea become only a story when contrasted to their real romance, showed a lack of knowledge of ancient history.

Doll said, “I could well consent to living this kind of life, sir. But, in a monarchy, how will this be? The Prince will soon take notice, and seize both you and your philosopher’s stone, it being a wealth unfit for any private subject.”

Sir Epicure Mammon could very well end up in prison if word got out that he had a philosopher’s stone because flooding the economy with excessive amounts of gold could cause economic and political upheaval. Kings would prefer to have and control that gold themselves. Alchemists tried to work in secret because of the danger of imprisonment.

Sir Epicure Mammon said, “Yes, that could happen if the Prince knew of it.”

Doll said, “You yourself boast of having the philosopher’s stone, sir.”

If Sir Epicure Mammon boasted about having it, the Prince would sooner or later learn about it.

“I boast about it to you, my life,” Sir Epicure Mammon said.

Doll said, “Oh, but beware, sir! You may come to end the remnant of your days in a loathed prison if you speak about the philosopher’s stone.”

“That is no idle fear,” he replied. “We’ll therefore go with what we have, my girl, and live in a free state.”

A free state is a republic.

He continued, “There we will eat our mullets, soaked in high-country wines, sup on pheasants’ eggs, and have our cockles boiled in silver shells.”

Mullets are fish that were Roman delicacies. Cockles are mollusks. Sir Epicure Mammon greatly desired fancy foods.

He continued, “Our shrimps will swim again, as they did when they lived, but this time they will swim in a rare butter made of dolphins’ milk, whose cream looks like opals, and with these delicate meats we will set ourselves high for pleasure, and take us down again, and then renew our youth and strength with drinking the elixir of life, and so enjoy a perpetuity of life and lust!”

A certain part of his body would certainly rise high and then lower again.

Sir Epicure Mammon continued, “And you shall have a wardrobe that is richer than Nature’s, and will be able always to change your clothing, and vary it oftener, for your pride, than Nature, or than Art, her wise and almost-equal servant.”

Face entered the room and said, “Sir, you are too loud. I heard your every word in the laboratory. Go to some fitter place: the garden or the great chamber upstairs.”

He paused and then asked quietly, “How do you like her?”

Sir Epicure Mammon replied, “Excellent! Lungs, here’s something for you.”

He gave Face some money.

Face said quietly, “But listen to me. Good sir, beware, make no mention of the rabbis to her.”

Sir Epicure Mammon said, “We don’t even think about them.”

Face said, “Oh, that is well, sir.”

Sir Epicure Mammon and Doll exited.

Face’s complaint about the noise they were making was simply an excuse to have Sir Epicure Mammon and Doll move to a place where they could have sex. Having sex with Sir Epicure Mammon was part of Doll’s contribution to the con game.

Face called, “Subtle!”

— 4.2 —

Subtle entered the room.

Face asked, “Aren’t you laughing?”

“Yes, I am,” Subtle said. “Are they gone?”

“All’s clear.”

“The widow has come.”

“And your quarrelling disciple, Kastril?”

“Yes.”

Face said, “I must put on my Captain’s uniform again then.”

“Wait,” Subtle said. “In the character of Lungs, bring them in first.”

“I meant to,” Face said. “What is she? A bonnibel?”

A “bonnibel” is an attractive woman. The French bonne et belle means “good and beautiful.”

“I don’t know,” Subtle said.

“We’ll draw lots to see who marries her,” Face said. “You’ll agree to that?”

She was rich, so good looks weren’t essential.

Subtle replied, “What else?”

Face said, “Oh, for a Captain’s suit, to fall now like a curtain! Flap! Right into my lap!”

He needed to make a quick costume change.

“Go and answer the door, man,” Subtle said.

Face said, “You’ll be able to kiss her first because I am not ready. She won’t let Lungs kiss her, although she will let Captain Face kiss her.”

Subtle said, “Yes, I will kiss her first, and perhaps hit you through both the nostrils.”

The modern idiom for “hit you through both the nostrils” is “put your nose out of joint,” which means “irritate you.”

Face asked at the door, “Who do you want to speak with?”

Kastril, standing outside, asked, “Where’s Captain Face?”

Face replied, “Gone, sir. He went to see about some business.”

“Gone!”

Face said, “He’ll return quickly. But Master Doctor Subtle, his Lieutenant, is here.”

He opened the door, and Kastril, followed by Dame Pliant, came into the room.

Subtle said to Kastril, “Come near, my worshipful boy, my terrae fili — that is, my boy of land — make your approach.”

Terrae fili is Latin (vocative case). Literally, it means “son of the earth.” As an idiom, it means “bastard” — someone without property rights. If Kastril were to achieve his dream and live by his wits, he would have no land and no property rights.

Kastril and Dame Pliant walked over to him.

Subtle continued, “Welcome. I know your lusts, and your desires, and I will serve and satisfy them. Begin, charge me from thence, or thence, or in this line. Here is my center: ground your quarrel.”

His “center” was his stance. “Ground your quarrel” meant “State the reasons for your quarrel.”

Kastril wanted to learn to be an angry boy, and Subtle was starting the tutoring by asking Kastril to quarrel with him.

Kastril responded, “You lie.”

This was a great insult that could result in a duel to the death.

Subtle asked, “What, child of wrath and anger! The loud lie? For what reasons do you make that charge, my impulsive boy?”

Kastril said, “No, you look to the reasons. I am beforehand — I have made the first move.”

The art of quarreling and dueling had rules and protocol that Kastril did not know.

Normally, the accusation of lying was not made so abruptly. Also, the accuser was supposed to give reasons for making the accusation. If the accuser did not, his opponent would have the advantage of making the choice of weapons.

Subtle said, “Oh, this is no true grammar, and it is as ill logic!”

He was comparing the rules of quarreling to the rules of grammar and of logic. Earlier, Face had compared them to the rules of geometry.

Subtle continued, “You must render reasons, child, your first and second intentions, know your canons and your divisions, moods, degrees, and differences, your predicaments, substance, and accident, series extern and intern, with their causes — efficient, material, formal, and final — and have your elements perfect.”

“What is this!” Kastril said. “What is this angry tongue he talks in?”

Subtle said, “That false precept, of being beforehand, has deceived a number of people and made them enter quarrels, often, before they were aware, and afterward, against their wills.”

Many people enjoyed quarreling, but they disliked risking their lives in a duel. These drama queens wanted to make a scene, but they did not want to die. Not knowing the rules of quarreling sometimes meant that they ended up in a duel they did not want to fight.

“How must I do this then, sir?” Kastril asked.

“I ask this lady for mercy and forgiveness,” Subtle said. “I should have greeted her first.”

He kissed her and said, “I call you ‘lady,’ because you are to be one before long, my soft and buxom widow.”

In this society, the word “buxom” meant “pliant.”

“Is she going to be a lady, indeed?” Kastril said.

One way to be a lady — the female equivalent of a lord — is to be married to a wealthy and distinguished man who is a lord. The wife of a Knight or a Baron or a Count is a lady.

“Yes, or my art is an egregious liar,” Subtle replied.

“How do you know?”

“By inspection of her forehead, and subtlety of her lip, which must be tasted often in order to make a judgment.”

He kissed her again.

One meaning of the word “subtlety” is “a confection chiefly made of sugar.”

Subtle said, “By God’s light, she melts like a myrobolane — a plum-like fruit.”

Looking at her forehead, he said, “Here is yet a line, in rivo frontis, that tells me the man she will marry is no Knight.”

This could mean she will marry “no mere Knight.” If so, Dame Pliant’s new husband would have a higher rank. Or it could mean that Dame Pliant would marry someone of lower rank than a Knight.

“In rivo frontis” is Latin for “the vein of the forehead.”

Again, Subtle was baffling the mark — the intended victim — with bullshit. However, it should be pointed out that the terms he used, whether of alchemy or of the art of quarreling or of astrology or of phrenology or of the art of palm reading were real terms, used correctly. Subtle was a learned man when it came to bullshit.

Dame Pliant asked, “What is he then, sir?”

Subtle said, “Let me see your hand. Oh, your linea fortunae, aka line of fortune, makes it plain. So does the stella, aka star, here in monte Veneris, aka the hill of Venus at the bottom of your thumb. But, most of all, the junctura annularis, aka joint of the ring finger, makes it clear.”

Subtle continued, “The man you will marry is a soldier, or a man of art, lady, but he shall have some great honor shortly.”

The soldier was Captain Face; the man of art was Subtle. The great honor to come was marriage to Dame Pliant, and possibly, lots of money from successful cons.

Dame Pliant said to her brother about Subtle, “Brother, he’s a rare and splendid man, believe me!”

Face, wearing his Captain’s uniform, entered the room.

Kastril said to his sister, “Hold your peace. Be quiet. Here comes the other rare and splendid man.”

He then said, “May God save you, Captain Face.”

“Good master Kastril!” Captain Face said. “Is this your sister?”

“Yes, sir. Will it please you to kuss her, and be proud to know her?”

“Kuss” was his country way of saying “kiss.”

“I shall be proud to know you, lady,” Face said, and then he kissed her.

Dame Pliant said, “Brother, he calls me ‘lady,’ too.”

“Yes, be quiet,” Kastril replied. “I heard it.”

He took her aside and talked to her quietly.

Face said to Subtle, “The Spanish Count has come.”

“Where is he?”

“At the door.”

“Why, you must entertain him.”

“What will you do with Kastril and Dame Subtle in the meantime?”

“Why, have them up in another room, and show them some fustian book, or the dark glass.”

“Fustian” means “worthless” and “bogus.” Originally, fustian was a cloth that was worth much less than silk but was often substituted for silk.

A dark glass is a fortune-teller’s crystal ball.

Captain Face said, “Before God, I say that Dame Pliant is a delicate dabchick! I must have her.”

A dabchick is a small waterfowl. Of course, Face was using it to mean “cute woman.”

Captain Face exited to see to the Spanish Count.

“You must, must you!” Subtle said. “Yes, if your fortune will, you must.”

He then said to Kastril, “Come, sir, Captain Face will come to us soon. I’ll take you to my chamber of demonstrations, where I will show you both the grammar and logic of quarrelling and the rhetoric of quarrelling. I will show you my whole method drawn out in tables, and I will show you my written instructions that have the several scales and degrees of quarreling drawn upon it. These instructions shall make you able to quarrel about the breadth of a straw when seen by moonlight.”

In other words, he would teach him how to quarrel about inconsequential things, things that other people would not even notice.

He added, “And, lady, I’ll have you look in a crystal ball some half an hour so you can clear your eyesight in preparation for the time you see your fortune, which is greater than I may judge in so short a time, trust me.”

Subtle exited, followed by Kastril and Dame Pliant.

— 4.3 —

Captain Face entered the room and asked, “Where are you, Doctor Subtle?”

From another room, Subtle said, “I’ll come to you quickly.”

Captain Face said to himself, “I will have this widow, Dame Pliant, now I have seen her, on any terms.”

Subtle entered the room.

“What do you have to say?” Subtle asked.

“Have you disposed of them?” Captain Face asked. “Have you found a way to keep Kastril and his sister the widow busy?”

“I have sent them up to another room,” Subtle said.

Captain Face said, “Subtle, truly I must have this widow.”

“Is that the main thing you want to talk to me about?”

“No, but hear me out.”

“Bah,” Subtle said. “If you rebel once, Doll shall know it all. Therefore be quiet, and see how your future turns out.”

Captain Face said, “You are so violent now. Do but conceive that you are old, and you cannot service —”

A bull services and impregnates a cow; Captain Face was saying that Subtle was incapable of servicing and impregnating Dame Pliant.

“Who cannot? I?” Subtle said. “By God’s light, I will service her along with you, for a —”

Either Subtle was proposing a threesome in which both he and Face would service Dame Pliant, or he was saying that he was potent enough to service both Dame Pliant and Face.

Captain Face interrupted, “Please understand that I mean to give you monetary compensation if you let me have her.”

“I will not bargain with you,” Subtle said. “What! Sell my fortune? It is better than my birthright.”

Dame Pliant had money. Whoever married her would have access to her vagina and her money.

Subtle continued, “Do not murmur and complain. Win her, and carry her. If you grumble, Doll will know about this directly.”

Apparently, Doll was a jealous woman. Or perhaps she wanted all profits to be shared equally, and unfortunately for her, those profits would not include the rich widow’s estate. Or perhaps she simply wanted the three members of the gang — Subtle, Face, and Doll — to work together.

Subtle and Face would continue to compete for Dame Pliant, but if Face could win her consent to marry him, then he could carry her across a threshold.

Captain Face said, “Well, sir, I am silent. Will you go and help to fetch in the Spanish Don ceremoniously?”

He exited.

“I follow you, sir,” Subtle said to himself. “I know what kind of man you are. Doll and I must keep Face in awe, or he will look down on us like a tyrant.”

Captain Face returned with the Spanish Don, who was extravagantly dressed in fancy clothing, including a ruff around his neck. Neither Face nor Subtle thought that the Spanish Don could speak English, but the Spanish Don was actually Surly in disguise. Surly was hoping to get evidence to prove to Sir Epicure Mammon that Face and Subtle were con men.

Subtle, seeing the Spanish Don’s fancy clothing, said, “Brain of a tailor! Who comes here? Don John!”

Don John was the English version of Don Juan; Juan is a common Spanish name. Don Juan was a famous Spanish libertine.

The disguised Surly said, “Senores, beso las manos a vuestras mercedes. [Sirs, I kiss your honors’ hands.]”

Subtle said, “I wish that you had stooped a little and kissed our años.”

Neither Subtle nor Face knew much Spanish. In this encounter with the Spanish Don, they would sometimes speak garbled Spanish and sometimes speak a deliberate parody of Spanish.

Años is Spanish for “years,” but Subtle knew that Face would understand it as “anus.”

“Peace, Subtle,” Face said. “Be calm.”

“Stab me,” Subtle said. “I shall never be able to keep from laughing.”

He looked at the enormous ruff that the Spanish Don was wearing, and then he added, “He looks in that deep ruff like a head on a platter, served in by a short cloak upon two trestles.”

The trestles were legs.

Face joined in on the fun: “Or, what do you say to a collar of brawn, cut down beneath the souse, and wriggled with a knife?”

The head being served could be a pig’s head. A “collar of brawn” is the meat of a pig’s neck. A “souse” is a pig’s ear. “Wriggled with a knife” meant that the knife would be used to carve the lines of a ruff into the pig’s neck.

Subtle said, “By God’s blood, he looks too fat to be a Spaniard.”

Face said, “Perhaps some Fleming or some Hollander begot him during the time of Fernando Alvarez, Duke of Alva.”

During 1567-1573, Fernando Alvarez was the Governor-General of the Netherlands.

Face added, “This Spanish Don could be Count Egmont’s bastard.”

In 1568, Fernando Alvarez executed Netherlands patriot and rebel Count Egmont.

Subtle said, “Don, your scurvy, yellow, Madrid face is welcome.”

“Gratias [Thank you],” the disguised Surly said.

Subtle said, “He speaks out of a fortification. Pray God he have no squibs in those deep sets.”

“Squibs” are explosives. “Deep sets” were the deep folds of the ruff, which Subtle was likening to the crenels of a castle’s fortifications.

The disguised Surly said, “Por dios, senores, muy linda casa! [By God, sirs, a very nice house!]”

Subtle asked, “What is he saying?”

“He is praising the house, I think,” Face replied. “I know no more than what he communicates with his gestures.”

Subtle said, “Yes, the casa [house], my precious Diego, will prove fair enough to cheat you in. Are you paying attention? You shall be cheated, Diego.”

Like Juan, Diego is a common Spanish name. From it, we get the derogatory word “dago” that is used to refer to native speakers of Spanish, Italian, or Portuguese.

Face said, “Cheated, do you see, my worthy Donzel, cheated.”

“Donzel” was a word Face made up: a diminutive of “Don.”

The disguised Surly said, “Entiendo. [I understand.]”

He did.

Not knowing what “entiendo” meant, Subtle said, “Do you intend it! So do we, dear Don. Have you brought the coins called pistolets or portagues, my solemn Don?”

He asked Face, “Do you feel any?”

Face felt the disguised Surly’s pockets and said, “Full.”

Subtle said, “You shall be emptied, Don, pumped and drawn dry, as they say.”

They intended for him to be emptied financially and sexually. Doll would have sex with him for money.

“You will be milked, truly, sweet Don,” Face said.

Subtle said, “You will see all the monsters; you will see the great lion of all, Don.”

Metaphorically, this meant that he would see all the sights. Lions were kept at the Tower of London. Monsters were people with disabilities: sideshow attractions. Literally, the Spanish Don would see Doll — and Subtle and Face.

The disguised Surly said, “Con licencia, se puede ver a esta senora? [With your permission, may I see the lady?]”

“What is he saying now?” Subtle asked.

“He is talking about the senora [lady].” Face replied.

Subtle said, “Oh, Don, that is the lioness, which you shall see also, my Don.”

Face said, “By God’s eyelid, Subtle, what shall we do?”

“What do you mean?”

“Why, Doll’s employed, you know. She’s with Sir Epicure Mammon.”

“That’s true,” Subtle said. “Before heaven, I don’t know what to do. He must wait, that’s all.”

“Wait!” Face said. “By no means must he be made to wait.”

“No!” Subtle said. “Why not?”

“He can’t wait unless you want to ruin everything,” Face said. “By God’s light, he will suspect that he is getting sloppy seconds, and then he will not pay, not half as well. This is a travelled punk-master, and he knows all the delays. He is a notorious hot-and-horny rascal, and he looks already rampant.”

A rampant lion is a lion that is standing on its hind legs. Face meant that the Spanish Don was horny and ready to have sex — now.

Subtle swore, “God’s death!”

He added, “And Mammon must not be troubled. He can’t be interrupted.”

“No way can he be interrupted!” Face said.

“What shall we do then?” Subtle asked.

“Think,” Face said. “You must be quick.”

The disguised Surly said, “Entiendo que la senora es tan hermosa, pue codicio tan verla, coma la bien aventuranza de mi vida. [I understand that the lady is so beautiful that I desire to see her as greatly as the greatest good fortune of my life.]”

Face said, “Mi vida! [My life!]”

In his mouth, the words sounded similar to “my widda,” aka “my widow.”

He added, “By God’s eyelid, Subtle, he puts me in mind of the widow. What do you say to persuading her to do it? Ha! What do you say to convincing her to sleep with the Spanish Don, and telling her it is her fortune? All our venture now lies on this. It is only one more man she will sleep with, and that need not concern either you or me, whichever of us ends up with her. After all, she’s a widow, and no longer a virgin. There’s no maidenhood to be feared or lost. What do you think about it, Subtle?”

“Who, I? Why —”

“The reputation of our house, too, is engaged,” Face said. “We have a reputation as a bawdy house to live up to.”

“You made me an offer for my share in the widow a short while ago,” Subtle said. “What will you give me, in faith?”

“Oh, by the light of these new circumstances,” Face said. “I’ll not buy your share of the widow now. You can have her. You know what you said to me. Just take your lot, and take your chances, sir. I say to you, Win her, and wear her out, as for me.”

“Win her and wear her” was a phrase about courting and marrying a woman. “Wear her” meant “consummate the marriage.” Face was saying to Subtle, You can win her and wear her out in the marriage bed, as far as I’m concerned.

Subtle said, “By God’s light, I’ll not work her as a prostitute for this Spanish Don then.”

He did not want to marry a whore.

“It is for the common cause; therefore, think about it,” Face said. “Doll otherwise must know about it. As you threatened me then, so I threaten you now.”

Presumably, Doll would be in favor of Dame Pliant sleeping with the Spanish Don if it would increase their — including Doll’s — profits. At least Face thought so.

“I don’t care,” Subtle said to himself but loud enough for Face to hear him.

He meant that he had changed his mind and didn’t care if Dame Pliant slept with the Spanish Don.

The disguised Surly said, “Senores, porque se tarda tanto? [Sirs, why so much delay?]”

Subtle said to himself but loud enough for Face to hear him, “Indeed, I am not fit. I am old.”

Subtle was admitting that he, Subtle, was impotent. Earlier, Face had said that Subtle was impotent, but Subtle had denied it. But even earlier, Face had said that he and Subtle would draw straws to see who would sleep with Doll. Face believed even then that Subtle was impotent, and he was teasing him.

Subtle was admitting to himself that he was impotent and he was trying to convince himself that he did not care if Dame Pliant slept with the Spanish Don. Why should he care who had her if he could not? Still, the idea of marrying a whore bothered him. Even an impotent man does not want to be a cuckold.

Face said, "That's now no reason, sir."

He meant that Subtle's impotence was no reason not to persuade Dame Pliant to sleep with the Spanish Don. It might be a reason not to marry the widow, but that was not relevant now.

The disguised Surly asked, "Puede ser de hazer burla de mi amor? [Can it be that you are making fun of my love?]"

Face said, "You hear the Don, too! I swear by this air, I will call Doll, and I will loosen the hinges of our agreement to work together."

Doll, Face, and Subtle were supposed to work for the common good of each other and to share equally the profits.

Face called, "Doll!"

Subtle cursed, "A plague of hell —"

"Will you do it, then?" Face asked.

"You are a terrible rogue!" Subtle said. "I'll remember this."

What Face was doing was venal. Dame Pliant was a respectable woman who had probably slept with only one man: her late husband. Face was turning her into a whore.

He wanted to trick her into sleeping with the Spanish Don by saying that the Don would marry her.

Subtle then asked, “Will you, sir, call the widow here?”

Face said, “Yes, and I’ll take her, too, with all her faults, now I think on it better.”

“You are welcome to her with all my heart, sir,” Subtle said. “Am I discharged of the lot?”

If Face would marry the widow, Subtle was willing to persuade the widow to sleep with the Spanish Don. He did not like Face, and Face’s marrying a prostitute would be a form of revenge on him.

Face replied, “As you please.”

Subtle said, “Shake on it.”

They shook hands.

Face said, “Remember now, that upon any change of events, you will never claim the widow as yours.”

“Much good joy, and health to you, sir,” Subtle said. “Marry a whore! Fate, let me wed a witch first.”

If Dame Pliant could be persuaded to sleep with the Spanish Don, that would make her a whore in Subtle’s eyes.

The disguised Surly said, “Por estas honradas barbas— [By this honorable beard —]”

Subtle translated, “He swears by his beard. Go, and call the brother, too, as well as the widow.”

Face exited.

The disguised Surly said, “Tengo duda, senores, que no me hagan alguna traycion. [I think, sirs, that you are tricking me.]”

Hearing “traycion,” Subtle said, “What? Issue on?”

Using a mixture of mangled “Spanish” and English, he said, “Yes, praesto, sennor [quickly, señor?]. Please you enthraitha [enthrall?] the chambratha [bedchamber?], worthy Don, where if you please the Fates, in your bathada [bath?], you shall be soaked, and stroked and tubbed, and rubbed, and scrubbed, and fubbed, dear Don, before you go.”

As part of the Spanish Don’s sexual experience, he would be given a sensual bath — and he would be given a financial bath. The word “fubbed” meant “cheated.”

Subtle added, “You shall truly, my scurvy baboon Don, be curried, clawed and flayed, and tawed, indeed.”

He was using words that described the tanning of leather. “Curried” meant “rubbed and beaten.” “Clawed” meant “scraped.” “Flayed” meant “skinned.” “Tawed” meant “soaked in alum and salt to make it supple” or “beaten to make it flexible.”

Subtle added, “I will with greater heart go about it now, and make the widow a prostitute so much the sooner in order to be revenged on this impetuous Face. The quickly doing of it is the grace.”

— 4.4 —

In another room of the house, Face, Kastril, and Dame Pliant talked. Face wanted to convince Dame Pliant to sleep with the Spanish Don. One way to do that was to convince her — and her brother — that she would marry the Spanish Don. Face, however, still intended to marry the widow.

Captain Face said, “Come, lady. I knew that Doctor Subtle would not leave off until he had found the exact turning point of her fortune.”

Kastril said, “She will be a Countess, you say, a Spanish Countess, sir?”

Dame Pliant asked, “Is that better than an English Countess?”

“Better!” Face said. “By God’s light, how can you ask that question, lady?”

“She is a fool, Captain Face, you must pardon her,” Kastril said.

Captain Face said, “Ask anyone from your courtier, to your inns-of-court man, aka lawyer, to your mere milliner, and they all will tell you that your Spanish horse is the best horse, your Spanish bow is the best style of bow, your Spanish beard is the best cut of beard, your Spanish ruffs are the best ruffs to wear, your Spanish pavin is the best dance, your Spanish titillating perfume in a glove is the best perfume, and as for your Spanish pike and Spanish blade, let your poor Captain speak —”

Spanish pikes and Spanish sword blades from Toledo were of very high quality.

He heard a noise and said, “Here comes Doctor Subtle.”

Subtle, carrying a paper, entered the room.

Subtle said to Dame Pliant, “My most honored lady, for so I am now to style you, having found by this horoscope I made for you that you are to undergo an honorable fortune, very shortly.”

A now obsolete meaning of the word “undergo” is to “submit.” Face and Subtle wanted Dame Pliant to submit to the Spanish Don and have sex with him.

Subtle continued, “What will you say now, if some —”

Face interrupted, "I have told her all, sir, and I have told her right worshipful brother here that she shall be a Countess; do not delay them, sir. A Spanish Countess. Do not postpone that happiness for them."

Subtle said, "Always, my scarcely worshipful Captain Face, you can't keep a secret!"

He then said to Dame Pliant, "Well, since he has told you, madam, forgive him, and I will do the same."

"She shall do that, sir," Kastril said. "I'll look to it; it is my charge. I tell my suster what to do."

Subtle said, "Well, then. Nothing remains except to fit her love now to her fortune."

Dame Pliant said, "Truly I shall never endure a Spaniard."

"No!" Subtle said.

"Never since eighty-eight could I abide them," Dame Pliant said, "and that was some three years before I was born, in truth."

In 1588, the English Navy defeated the attacking Spanish Armada. Because of the attempted invasion of England, many English people hated Spanish people. King James I, however, wanted better international relations with Spain. Because of his efforts, Spanish things were growing fashionable at court.

Dame Pliant was born in 1591, and so she was nineteen years old.

Subtle said, "Come, you must love him, or be miserable. Choose which you will."

Captain Face picked up a rush and said, "By this good rush, persuade her, or she will cry 'strawberries' and become a seller of fruit before twelve months have passed."

In this culture, green rushes, a plant, were used as floor coverings instead of carpets.

A rush is an onslaught as well as a plant. Captain Face and Subtle would do their best to get Dame Pliant to sleep with the Spanish Don. Her brother unwittingly would help.

Face was saying that if Dame Pliant did not accept the Spanish Don, she would end up a poor fruit seller within a year.

Subtle said, “No, she will cry ‘herring and mackerel,’ which is worse. She will sell fish in the marketplace.”

“Indeed, sir!” Captain Face said.

Kastril said to his sister, “By God’s eyelid, you shall love him, or I’ll kick you.”

Dame Pliant replied, “Why, I’ll do what you want me to do, brother.”

Kastril said, “You better, or with this hand I’ll maul you.”

Face said, “Good sir, don’t be so fierce.”

“There is no need for you to be fierce, my enraged child,” Subtle said. “She will do what you tell her to do. Why, when she comes to taste the pleasures of a Countess! To be courted ___”

Face interrupted, “And kissed, and ruffled!”

To be “ruffled” is to be “fondled,” but Face was also thinking of the Spanish Don’s ruff.

Subtle said, “Yes, behind the wall hangings.”

Wall hangings in inns often hid an alcove in which sex could take place.

Face said, “And then come forth in pomp!”

Subtle said, “And know her state!”

Her state is her social rank, which would be higher than it is now if she were to marry a Spanish Count.

Face said, “She would keep all the idolaters of the chamber — the courtiers — barer to her than they are at their prayers!”

The chamber could be a reception chamber or a bedchamber. People wore hats inside, but took them off to show respect. To Dame Pliant, they would bare their head — and perhaps more.

Subtle said, “She would be serviced upon the knee!”

In other words, her servants would bend their knee to her, Or, perhaps, she would get on her knees and her servants would service her from behind the way a bull services a cow.

Face said, “And she would have her pages, ushers, footmen, and coaches —”

Subtle interrupted, “Her six mares —”

Face interrupted, “No, eight!”

Subtle continued, “— to hurry her through London, to the Exchange, Bedlam, the china-houses —”

These were places of interest in London. The New Exchanges had many dress shops and hat shops. Bedlam was a hospital for the insane; people could pay a fee to look at the patients. China-houses were shops that sold goods from the Orient.

Face said, “Yes, and have the citizens gape at her, and praise her clothing and my lord’s goose-turd bands of attendants who ride with her!”

The attendants would wear livery the color of goose-turds: dark green.

Kastril, who was impressed by social status, said, “Very splendid! By this hand of mine, you are not my suster, if you refuse to marry the Spanish Don.”

“I will not refuse, brother,” Dame Pliant said.

Disguised as the elaborately dressed Spanish Don, Surly entered the room and said, “Que es esto, senores, que no venga? Esta tardanza me mata! [What is this, gentlemen, that she does not come? This delay kills me!”

Face said, “The Spanish Count has come. By his art Doctor Subtle knew he would be here.”

In a poor attempt at Spanish, Subtle said, “En gallanta madama, Don! Gallantissima! [A gallant lady, Don! Very gallant!”]

The disguised Surly said, “Por todos los dioses, la mas acabada hermosura, que he visto en mi vida! [By all the gods, the most beautiful beauty whom I have seen in my life!”]

Face said, “Isn’t it a gallant language that they speak?”

“An admirable language!” Kastril said. “Is it French?”

“No, Spanish, sir,” Face replied.

Kastril said, “It goes like law French, and that, they say, is the courtliest language.”

Law French was a form of French used at the time in English courts of law, and so, yes, law French was a “courtly” language. Law French, however, was a bastard form of French that bore little resemblance to the French spoken in France.

“Listen, sir,” Face said.

The disguised Surly said, “El sol ha perdido su lumbre, con el esplendor que trae esta dama! Valgame dios! [The Sun has lost its light, on account of the splendor this lady brings! Oh, my God!]”

Face said to Kastril, “He admires your sister.”

“Shouldn’t she curtsy to him?” Kastril asked.

Subtle said, “By God’s will, she must go to him, man, and kiss him! It is the Spanish fashion for the women to make the first courting move.”

Face said to Kastril, “He is telling you the truth, sir. His art knows all.”

All, except for Spanish, among other things, such as ethics.

The disguised Surly asked, “Porque no se acude? [Why doesn’t she come to me?]”

Kastril said, “He speaks to her, I think.”

“That he does, sir,” Face replied.

The disguised Surly said, “Por el amor de dios, que es esto que se tarda? [For God’s sake, why is she waiting?]”

Kastril said, “She refuses to understand him!”

He then said to his sister, “Gull! Noddy! Fool!”

Dame Pliant asked him, “What did you say, brother?”

“Ass, my suster,” Kastril replied. “Go kuss him, as the cunning-man would have you. I’ll thrust a pin in your buttocks else.”

“Kuss” was his country way of pronouncing “kiss.”

Face said, “Oh, no, sir.”

The disguised Surly said, “Senora mia, mi persona esta muy indigna de allegar a tanta hermosura. [My lady, my person is very unworthy of attaining such beauty.]”

Dame Pliant kissed the disguised Surly, who returned her kiss.

Face said, “Does he not use her bravely?”

One meaning of “use” is “treat.”

“Bravely, indeed!” Kastril said.

Face said, “He will use her better.”

One meaning of “use” is “fuck.”

“Do you think so?” Kastril said, still thinking of “use” as “treat.”

The disguised Surly said, “Senora, si sera sererida, entremonos. [Lady, if it will please you, let’s go in.]”

Surly and Dame Pliant exited.

Kastril asked, “Where is he taking her?”

“Into the garden, sir,” Face said. “You have nothing to worry about. I must interpret for her.”

He was implying that he would chaperone them, although he had no intention of doing that.

Subtle whispered to Face, “Give Doll the word.”

He would give her the word that it was time for her to put on a mad act — to act as if she were suffering a fit of madness.

Face exited.

Subtle said to Kastril, “Come, my fierce child, come with me. We’ll go to our quarrelling lesson again.”

Subtle wanted to keep Kastril away from his sister and the Spanish Don.

“Agreed,” Kastril said. “I love a Spanish boy with all my heart.”

Subtle said, “Good, and by this means, sir, you shall be brother-in-law to a great Count.”

Kastril said, “Yes, I knew that right away. This match will advance the house, aka family, of the Kastrils.”

Subtle said, “I pray to God that your sister proves to be pliant!”

“Why, her name is ‘Pliant,’ by her other — first — husband,” Kastril said.

“What!” Subtle said.

“She is the Widow Pliant,” Kastril said. “Didn’t you know that?”

“No, indeed, sir,” Subtle said. “Yet, by erection of her figure, I guessed it.”

“Erection of her figure” meant “casting of her horoscope.” The phrase could also mean her posture or that her figure caused erections.

Subtle said, “Come, let’s go practice the art of arguing.”

Kastril said, “Yes, but do you think, doctor, I shall ever quarrel well?”

“I promise that you will,” Subtle said.

— 4.5 —

In another room of the house, Doll was acting as if she were suffering from a fit of madness. Sir Epicure Mammon was with her. Doll’s ravings were based on Hugh Broughton’s book A Concoct of Scripture (1590). Some religious people are insane, or at least their writings make them seem to be insane.

Doll said, “For after Alexander the Great’s death —”

Mammon attempted to calm her: “Good lady —”

Doll said, “Perdiccas and Antigonus were slain, and the two who stood, Selucus and Ptolemy —”

These four people were Alexander the Great’s generals. After Alexander the Great died, these four generals divided his Kingdom and then began jousting for additional power.

Sir Epicure Mammon tried again: “Madam —”

Doll continued, “— make up the two legs, and the fourth beast, that was Gog-north, and Egypt-south, which after was called Gog-iron-leg, and South-iron-leg —”

Sir Epicure Mammon tried again: “Lady —”

Doll continued, “— and then Gog-horned. So was Egypt, too. Then Egypt-clay-leg, and Gog-clay-leg —”

Sir Epicure Mammon tried again: “Sweet madam.”

Doll continued, “— and last Gog-dust, and Egypt-dust, which fall in the last link of the fourth chain. And these are stars in story, which none see, or look at —”

Sir Epicure Mammon said to himself, “What shall I do?”

Doll continued, “— for, as he says, unless we call the rabbis, and the heathen Greeks —”

Sir Epicure Mammon tried again: “Dear lady.”

Doll continued, “— to come from Jerusalem, and from Athens, and teach the people of Great Britain —”

Wearing the clothing of the alchemical assistant Lungs, Face entered the room hastily and asked Sir Epicure Mammon, “What’s the matter, sir?”

Doll continued, “— to speak the tongue of Eber, and Javan —”

Sir Epicure Mammon replied to Face, “Oh, she’s having a fit of madness.”

Doll continued, “— we shall know nothing —”

Face said, “Death, sir, we are undone!”

Doll continued, “— where then a learned linguist shall see the ancient used communion of vowels and consonants —”

Face said, “My master, Doctor Subtle, will hear her!”

Doll continued, “— a wisdom, which Pythagoras held most high —”

Sir Epicure Mammon said to her, “Sweet honorable lady!”

Doll said, “— to comprise all sounds of voices, in few marks of letters —”

Face said, “You must never hope to lay her now.”

“Lay her” meant 1) allay, aka calm, her, and 2) take her to bed.

Doll said, “— and so we may arrive by Talmud skill, and profane Greek, to raise the building up of Helen’s house against the Ismaelite, King of Thogarma, and his Habergions brimstony, blue, and fiery, and the force of King Abaddon, and the beast of Cittim, which rabbi David Kimchi, Onkelos, and Aben Ezra do interpret to be Rome.”

As Doll babbled, Face and Sir Epicure Mammon talked.

Face asked, “How did you put her into this fit of madness?”

Sir Epicure Mammon replied, “Unfortunately, by chance I talked about a fifth monarchy I would erect with the philosopher’s stone, and she immediately started blabbing about the other four monarchies.”

Some people who studied the end times believed that a fifth monarchy would destroy the four previous monarchies that were connected in some way to the four monarchies created by the four generals who divided Alexander the Great’s empire after Alexander died. During the thousand years of the fifth monarchy, Satan would be tied up and saints would rule in the name of Jesus. Sir Epicure Mammon’s fifth kingdom was quite different. With the elixir of life, he would live for a thousand years and have sex multiple times a day.

Face recognized the source of Doll’s ideas: “Straight out of Hugh Broughton’s works! I told you so! By God’s eyelid, stop her mouth! Make her be quiet!”

“Is that the best thing to do?”

“She’ll never leave otherwise. If the old man hears her, we are but feces, sediment after alchemical distillation, and ashes.”

From another room, Subtle shouted, “What’s going on in there?”

Face, “Oh, we are lost!”

Doll stopped babbling.

Face said, “Now that she hears him, she is quiet.”

Subtle entered the room, and Doll, Face, and Sir Epicure Mammon ran in different directions, looking for exits.

Doll exited, but Sir Epicure Mammon was slower to escape.

He said, “Where shall I hide myself!”

Subtle said, “What! What sight is here? Secret deeds of darkness, and deeds that shun the light!”

He said to Face about Sir Epicure Mammon, “Bring him back. Who is he? What, my son! Oh, I have lived too long!”

Sir Epicure Mammon lied, “No, good, dear father, there was no unchaste purpose.”

“There wasn’t! Ha! And yet you fled from me, when I came in this room!”

“That was my error.”

“Your error!” Subtle said. “That was your guilt — guilt, my son. Give it the right name. It’s no wonder that I have run into problems with our great work in the laboratory since such affairs as these were happening!”

Sir Epicure Mammon asked, “Have you run into problems?”

Subtle said, “It has stood still this past half hour. And all the rest of our works — the lesser works — have regressed. Where is the instrument of wickedness — Face, my lewd and false drudge?”

Face exited — quickly.

Sir Epicure Mammon said, “No, good sir, don’t blame him. Believe me, it was against his will or knowledge. I saw her by chance.”

Subtle said, “Will you commit more sin by making excuses for a varlet?”

Sir Epicure Mammon said, “I swear by my hope, it is true, sir.”

He could have been swearing by his hope for an afterlife in Heaven or by his hope for the philosopher’s stone.

Subtle said, “Then since you saw her by accident, I wonder less that you, for whom the blessing was prepared, would so tempt Heaven and lose your fortunes.”

“What do you mean, sir?” Sir Epicure Mammon asked.

Subtle replied, “This will retard the work for a month at least.”

Sir Epicure Mammon said, “Why, if it does, what is the remedy? But don’t think it will happen, good father.”

He lied about himself and Doll, “Our purposes were honest; they were pure and chaste.”

Subtle said, “As they were, so the reward will prove. If your purposes were pure and chaste, you have nothing to fear. If you had sex with her, you have much to fear — the philosopher’s stone will be ruined.”

A loud explosion sounded.

Subtle said, “What now! Ah, me! God and all saints, be good to us.”

Face entered the room.

Subtle asked him, “What was that explosion?”

Face replied, “Sir, we are defeated! Everything is ruined! All the alchemical works are blown in fumo — up in smoke. Every glass is burst. The furnace, and everything else is torn down! It is as if a thunderbolt had been driven through the house. Retorts, receivers of distilled liquids, pelicans, bolt-heads, and all the rest of our alchemical equipment has been struck into splinters and shards!”

Subtle pretended to faint.

Face said to Sir Epicure Mammon, “Help, good sir! Coldness and death are invading him. Now, Sir Mammon, do the fair offices of a man! You stand, shell-shocked, as if you were readier to depart this life than he.”

Knocking sounded. Doll was knocking hard on the door. She kept knocking.

Face asked, “Who’s there?”

He looked out the window and said, “My lord, the mad lady’s brother has come.”

Sir Epicure Mammon said, “What, Lungs!”

Face said, “His coach is at the door. Avoid his sight, for he’s as furious and hot-tempered as his sister is mad.”

“I’m in serious trouble!”

Face said, “My brain is quite undone with the fumes from the explosion, sir. I never can hope to fully recover and be myself again.”

“Is all lost, Lungs?” Sir Epicure Mammon asked. “Will nothing be preserved of all our cost?”

“Indeed, very little, sir,” Face said. “A peck of coals or so, which is cold comfort, sir.”

Sir Epicure Mammon mourned, “Oh, my horny mind! I am justly punished.”

“And so am I, sir.”

“I am cast from all my hopes —”

“Not hopes — certainties, sir.”

“— by my own base affections.”

Pretending to recover a little from fainting, Subtle said, “Oh, the curst fruits of vice and lust!”

Sir Epicure Mammon said, “Good father, it was my sin. Forgive it.”

Subtle said, “Why is my roof still hanging over us? Why hasn’t it fallen upon us and justly punished us because of this wicked man!”

Subtle hung his head.

Face said to Sir Epicure Mammon, “Look, sir, you grieve him now by staying in his sight. Good sir, the nobleman will come, too, and capture you, and that may breed a tragedy.”

“I’ll go,” Sir Epicure Mammon said.

“Yes,” Face said, “and repent at home, sir. It may be that for some good penance you may have it yet — say, a hundred pounds donated in the charity box at Bedlam —”

The box was for money to support the insane.

“Yes,” Sir Epicure Mammon said.

Face thought, — for the restoring of such people as ... have their wits.

“I’ll do it,” Sir Epicure Mammon said.

“I’ll send someone to you to receive it,” Face said.

That someone would collect the hundred pounds but would not put it in the charity box. The money would go to the restoring of Doll, Face, and Subtle, who have their wits.

“Do,” Sir Epicure Mammon said. “Is no projection left?”

“All is blown to bits, or stinks, sir,” Face said.

“Will anything be saved that’s good for medicine, do you think?” Sir Epicure Mammon asked.

He was hoping that even if he could not have enough of the philosopher's stone to turn base metal to gold, he might have at least a little of the elixir of life.

"I cannot tell, sir," Face said. "There will be perhaps something gotten from scraping the shards that will cure the itch."

Scraping the shards on itchy skin will relieve the itch.

Face thought, Though not your itch of mind, sir.

He meant the itch of greed for gold.

He continued, "It shall be saved for you, and sent to your home. Good sir, exit this way for fear the lord should meet you."

Mammon exited.

Subtle raised his head and said, "Face!"

"Yes."

"Is he gone?"

"Yes, and as heavily as if all the gold he hoped for were in his blood," Face said. "Let us be lighthearted, though."

Subtle got up from the floor and said, "Yes, let us be as light as balls and jump and hit our heads against the roof for joy. There's so much of our care now cast away. Now we don't need to worry about Sir Epicure Mammon expecting to possess the philosopher's stone."

Face said, "Now we need to turn our attention to our Spanish Don."

Subtle said, "Yes, your young widow by this time has been made a Countess, Face; she has been working hard with the Spanish Don to produce a young heir for you."

In this case, Subtle believed that the honeymoon had taken place before the wedding. He was happy that Face would marry a whore.

“Good, sir,” Face said.

Sometimes people are excessively polite when they very much dislike each other.

“Take off your alchemist’s assistant’s costume, and go and greet her kindly, as a bridegroom should, after these common hazards we have been through.”

“Very well, sir,” Face said. “Will you go fetch Don Diego away, while I take care of the widow?”

Diego was a common Spanish name that Face was using to refer to the Spanish Don.

“And I will get the better of him, too, if you’ll be pleased, sir,” Subtle said. “I wish that Doll were in the widow’s place so she could pick the Spanish Don’s pockets now!”

Face said, “Why, you can do it as well as she could, if you would set your mind to it. I hope that you will prove your skill at pickpocketing.”

“I will, for your sake, sir,” Subtle said.

— 4.6 —

Surly and Dame Pliant were talking together in another room of the house. Surly was still wearing the costume of the Spanish Don, but he had revealed his true identity to Dame Pliant. Surly was being honorable, and he had not had sex with Dame Pliant.

Surly said, “Lady, you see into what hands you have fallen! You see that you are among such a nest of villains! And you see how near your honor was to have certainly caught a clap, aka a misfortune, through your credulity, if I had only been as punctually forward as place, time, and other circumstances would have made most men. You're a beautiful woman; I wish that you were wise, too!"

Another meaning of "clap" was the venereal disease "gonorrhoea," and another meaning of "punctually forward" was "point forward." You can guess what was pointing.

Surly continued, "I am a gentleman who came here disguised only in order to find out the knaveries of this citadel, and because I might have wronged your honor and have not, I claim some interest in your love. You are, they say, a widow who is rich, and I'm a bachelor who is financially worth nothing. Your fortune in money may make me a man, as my fortune in life has preserved your reputation as a respectable woman. Think upon this, and decide whether I have deserved you or not."

"I will, sir," Dame Pliant replied.

Surly said, "And as for these household rogues, let me alone to deal with them."

Subtle entered the room, still thinking that the Spanish Don spoke no English.

He asked, "How does my noble Diego, and my dear madam Countess? Has the Count been courteous, lady? Has he been liberal and open?"

The word "liberal" at this time also meant "licentious."

Subtle continued, "Donzel, I think you look melancholic, after your coitum [Latin for 'sex'], and you look scurvy. Truly, I do not like the dullness of your eye. It has a heavy cast, it is upsee Dutch, and it says you are a lumpish whoremaster."

"Upsee Dutch" meant "in the manner of the Dutch," who were reputed to be heavy drinkers. In other words, Subtle was accusing the Spanish Don of looking as if he had a hangover.

Subtle said, “Be lighter, just as I will make your pockets lighter.”

He attempted to pick the Spanish Don’s pockets.

Surly said, “Will you, Don Bawd and Pickpocket?”

He hit Subtle hard and said, “What do you think now? Are you reeling! Stand up, sir, you shall find, since I am so heavy, I’ll give you equal weight.”

Subtle shouted, “Help! Murder!”

Surly said, “No, sir, there’s no such thing as murder intended. A good cart and a clean whip shall ease you of that fear.”

The punishment that Surly intended for Subtle was being tied behind a cart and whipped as the cart was driven through public places.

Surly continued, “I am the Spanish Don whom you wanted to cheat, do you see — cheat! Where’s your Captain Face, that part-time dealer in stolen items and that full-time bawd — that wholly rascal?”

Wearing his Captain’s uniform, Face entered the room. Seeing the commotion, he looked closely at the Spanish Don and said, “What! Surly!”

“Oh, make your approach, good Captain,” Surly said. “I have found from whence your copper rings and spoons come, now, with which you cheat abroad in taverns.”

The copper rings and spoons were treated so that they looked like gold and could be sold at high prices.

Surly continued, “It was here that you learned to anoint your boot with brimstone, then rub men’s gold on it for a kind of touchstone, and say the gold was worthless, when you had changed the color of the touch so that you might have the gold for nothing.”

People used touchstones to test the purity of gold. Gold would be rubbed on the touchstone and the color it left revealed the purity of gold. In Face’s con, real gold would appear to be base metal, and Face could pocket it or buy it for much less than it was worth.

Surly continued, “And this Doctor Subtle, your sooty, smoky-bearded peer, will enclose so much gold in a flask, and turn aside and substitute for it another flask containing sublimed mercury that shall burst in the heat and fly out all in fumo — in lots of smoke! The gold appears to be lost, but instead Doctor Subtle has it.”

Surly had probably heard the noise of the recent explosion, and he could guess — more or less — what had happened.

He added, “Then weeps Sir Epicure Mammon. Then faints his worship: Doctor Subtle.”

Face slipped out of the room as Surly looked at Subtle.

Surly continued, “Or, he is the Faustus, who casts horoscopes and can conjure, and who cures plagues, hemorrhoids, and syphilis by the astrological almanacs, and who exchanges information with all the bawds and midwives of three shires, while you — Captain! What! Has he gone? — send in pregnant women, barren wives, or waiting-maidens who suffer from the green sickness.”

Faustus used black magic — he received help from demons rather than from angels. Surly was accusing Subtle of using black magic to medically treat people, especially women suffering from sex-related problems. The green sickness was a form of anemia suffered by some women when they reached puberty, but people in this culture believed that it was caused by unrequited love.

Subtle may have been giving women abortions. One cure for the green sickness was thought to be sex, so he may also have been helping, or using Face to help, young women to need abortions.

Subtle attempted to leave, but Surly grabbed him and said, “No, sir, you must tarry, although Face has escaped, and you must answer by the ears, sir.”

He meant that Subtle would be placed in a pillory and have his ears cut off.

— 4.7 —

Face had gone to get help. He now returned with Kastril.

Face said to Kastril, “Why, now’s the time, if you will ever quarrel well, as they say, and be a true-born child. Both the doctor and your sister are being abused.”

“Where is the abuser?” Kastril asked. “Which is he? He is a slave, whatever he is, and the son of a whore.”

He asked Surly, “Are you the man, sir, I would know?”

Surly replied, “I am loath, sir, to confess so much.”

No one wants to confess to being an abuser, a slave, and the son of a whore.

Kastril replied, “Then you lie in your throat!”

In this culture, this insult was worse than the previous insults.

“What!” Surly said.

Face said to Kastril, "He is a very arrant rogue, sir, and a cheater. He was employed to come here by another conjurer who does not love Doctor Subtle, and would cross and thwart him, if he knew how."

Surly said to Kastril, "Sir, you are being abused and treated badly. You are being lied to."

Kastril replied, "You lie. And it is no matter."

Kastril was still bad at quarreling. He had made the strong insult of "Then you lie in your throat!" without providing evidence. And he ought not to have meant it when he said, "And it is no matter." It was an important matter indeed. People dueled to the death over insults such as being directly accused of lying. No one should say, "You lie in your throat," and then say, "And it is no matter."

"Well said, sir!" Face said. "He is the most impudent rascal ___"

Surly said to Face, "You are the most impudent rascal indeed."

Then he said to Kastril, "Will you hear me out, sir?"

Face said to Kastril, "By no means. Tell him to be gone."

Kastril said to Surly, "Be gone, sir, and quickly."

Surly said, "This is strange!"

He then said to Dame Pliant, "Lady, tell your brother what is going on."

Face said to Kastril, "There is not such a cheater as this man in all the town. The doctor knew immediately that this man is a cheater, and finds still that the real Spanish Count will come here."

Face whispered, "Bear up, Subtle. Go along with this."

Subtle said to Kastril, “Yes, sir, the real Spanish Count will appear within this hour.”

Face said, “And yet this rogue would come in a disguise, after being tempted by another spirit, to trouble our art, although he could not hurt it!”

Kastril said, “Yes, I know.”

His sister whispered in his ear, and Kastril said, “Go away, you talk like a foolish mauther.”

“Mauther” was country dialect for “girl or young woman.”

Dame Pliant exited.

Surly said to Kastril, “Sir, everything she says is the truth.”

Face said to Kastril, “Do not believe him, sir. He is the lyingest swabber! Keep on the path you are traveling, sir.”

A swabber is a low-ranking sailor who swabs (mops) the deck.

Surly said, “You are valiant when you are in the midst of people backing you up!”

“Yes, and so what, sir?” Kastril asked.

Carrying a roll of damask cloth, Drugger entered the room.

Face said, “Here’s an honest fellow, too, who knows Surly, and all his tricks.”

He whispered to Abel Drugger, “Make good what I say, Abel. Back me up. This cheater — Surly — would have cheated you out of the widow.”

Face then said out loud, “Surly owes this honest Drugger here seven pounds — a debt that he has acquired by buying from him many, many two-penny worths of tobacco.”

At the time, a pound was worth 240 old pence. Therefore, Face was accusing Surly of charging and never paying for 840 purchases of two-penny worths of tobacco.

“Yes, sir,” Drugger said, “And he has damned himself by swearing falsely for three terms to pay me.”

The terms were periods of times in which the law courts were in session.

Face asked Drugger, “And what does he owe for lotium?”

Lotium is stale urine; it was used as a hair tonic.

Drugger replied, “Thirty shillings, sir. And he owes for six syringes.”

Surly said, “Hydra of villainy!”

The Hydra was a mythological multi-headed monster that Hercules had killed. Each time he cut off one of its heads, two more grew in its place. Hercules killed the Hydra by cutting off a head and then immediately cauterizing it.

Surly’s naming of the Hydra was fitting; his enemies were multiplying.

Face said to Kastril, “Sir, you must quarrel him out of the house.”

“I will,” Kastril replied.

He said to Surly, “Sir, if you get not out of doors, you lie and you are a pimp.”

“Why, this is madness, sir,” Surly said. “It is not valor in you; I must laugh at this.”

Kastril said, “It is my disposition. You are a pimp and a trig, and an Amadis de Gaul or a Don Quixote.”

A “trig” is a “dandy.” Surly was dressed in fancy Spanish clothing. Amadis de Gaul is a hero in a Spanish romance; Don Quixote is the protagonist of a satire of Spanish romances.

Drugger said, “Or a Knight of the curious cockscomb, do you see?”

Surly was wearing a fancy Spanish hat.

Ananias the Anabaptist entered the room and said, “Peace to the household!”

To this common greeting, Kastril, the wanna-be angry boy, said, “I’ll keep my peace for no man.”

Ananias said to Subtle, “The casting of dollars is concluded to be lawful.”

Kastril asked, “Is he the constable?” He did not want to get in trouble for quarreling.

Subtle said, “Peace, Ananias. Be quiet.”

The casting of dollars is NOT lawful, and Subtle did not want too many people to associate him with the casting of dollars.

Face said to Kastril, “No, sir. He is not the constable.”

Kastril said to Surly, “Then you are an otter, and a shad, a whit. A very tim.”

Otters are difficult to classify. Are they fish or flesh? Kastril may have been saying that he found Surly’s sexual preference difficult to ascertain.

A “shad” is a herring. A “shotten herring” was an insult meaning “worthless.” Literally, a “shotten herring” is a herring that has spawned.

A “whit” is something small. As an insult for a man, it means the man has a small penis.

A “tim” is perhaps a timid man.

Surly asked, “You’ll listen to me, sir?”

“I will not,” Kastril said.

In this culture, the two quarreling men were supposed to talk to ascertain facts and to see if any extenuating circumstances existed.

Ananias asked Subtle, “What is the motive? Why are they quarreling?”

The word “motive” has a Puritan meaning: “supernatural prompting.”

Subtle replied, “Zeal in the young gentleman, against the other man’s Spanish breeches.”

Ananias said, “The Spanish breeches are profane, lewd, superstitious, and idolatrous.”

Spain was and is largely a Catholic country; Ananias, as an Anabaptist, hated Catholics.

Surly said, “Here are new rascals!”

Kastril said to Surly, “Will you be gone, sir?”

Ananias said, “Leave, Satan! You are not of the light! That ruff of pride about your neck betrays you; it is the same with that which the unclean birds, in the year fifteen seventy-seven, were seen to swagger on diverse coasts.”

Catholic priests were persecuted for a time in England, and so priests coming to England would wear disguises rather than clerical clothing. Some priests coming from Spain would wear Spanish ruffs. In 1577, large Spanish ruffs of the kind that Surly was wearing came into fashion. Around 1577, priests began wearing Spanish ruffs. In June 1577, some priests were arrested in Cornwall, and the English authorities began a crackdown on priests.

Puritans such as Ananias called Catholic priests “unclean birds” in part because of Revelation 18:2:

And he cried mightily with a strong voice, saying, Babylon the great is fallen, is fallen, and is become the habitation of devils, and the hold of every foul spirit, and a cage of every unclean and hateful bird. (King James Version)

In addition, they called priests “unclean birds” because of reaction to a book. In 1580, Robert Persons, a Jesuit in England, anonymously published a book titled A Brief Discours contayninge certayne Reasons Why Catholiques refuse to goe to Church that defended Catholics and argued that Catholics refused to go to the Anglican Church on religious grounds, not on treasonous grounds. He used the pseudonym “I. Howlet”: a howlet is an owl. People responding to and criticizing the book seized on “Howlet” and referred to Catholic priests as “unclean birds.”

Ananias added, “You look like the Antichrist, in that lewd hat.”

Surly’s Spanish hat reminded Ananias of the Pope’s hat; Ananias regarded the Catholic Pope as the Antichrist.

Surly said, “I must give way to my enemies.”

Kastril said, “Be gone, sir.”

Surly began, “But I’ll be revenged on you —”

Ananias said, “Depart, proud Spanish fiend!”

Surly ended, “— Captain Face and Doctor Subtle.”

Ananias said, “Child of perdition!”

Kastril said, “Go away from here, sir!”

Surly exited.

Kastril asked, “Didn’t I quarrel bravely and splendidly?”

“Yes, indeed, you did, sir,” Face said.

“Indeed, if I give my mind to it and try hard, I shall quarrel properly,” Kastril said.

“Oh, you must follow him, sir,” Face said, “and threaten him until he is tame; otherwise, he’ll turn and come back here.”

Kastril said, “I’ll re-turn him then and have him face the exiting direction.”

He exited.

Subtle took Ananias aside and talked to him quietly.

Face said, “Drugger, this rogue forestalled us from helping you. We had determined that you would have come here wearing a Spanish suit of clothing and courted the widow, but he — a pimping slave! — put the Spanish suit of clothing on himself.”

He then asked, “Have you brought the damask?”

“Yes, sir,” Drugger replied.

Face said, “You must borrow a Spanish suit of clothing. Do you have any credit with actors?”

Actors would have items of Spanish clothing in their collection of costumes.

Drugger said, “Yes, sir; didn’t you ever see me play the Fool?”

This was an in-joke. Acting troupes would have a lead comic actor to play the major comic roles such as professional Fools — and fools such as Drugger. Robert Armin, the comic actor who originated the part of Drugger, had played the Fool in William Shakespeare's King Lear.

Face replied, "I don't know if I have, Nab."

He thought, But you shall play the fool, if I have anything to do with it.

He continued, "Hieronimo's old cloak, ruff, and hat will serve. I'll tell you more when you bring me those items of clothing."

Hieronimo was the protagonist of Thomas Kyd's play The Spanish Tragedy.

Drugger exited.

Ananias said to Subtle, "Sir, I know the Spaniards hate the Puritan brethren and have spies to watch their actions, and I have no doubt that this Spanish Don was one of those spies.

"But the holy Synod — the ecclesiastical assembly — have been in prayer and meditation about the matter of coining, and it is revealed no less to them than to me that the casting of money is most lawful."

"That is true," Subtle said, "but I cannot do it here. If the house should happen to be suspected, all that Face and I are doing, including making the philosopher's stone, would be revealed and we would be locked up in the Tower of London forever, to make gold there for the state. We would never come out of the Tower of London, and then you would be defeated in your purpose of getting much money for your cause."

Ananias said, "I will tell this to the elders and the weaker brethren so that the whole company of the separation may join in humble prayer again."

“And so they may join in fasting,” Subtle said.

“Yes, for some fitter place in which to cast money,” Ananias said. “May peace of mind rest within these walls!”

“Thanks, courteous Ananias,” Subtle said.

Ananias exited.

Face and Subtle were alone.

“What did Ananias come here about?” Face asked.

“He came about the casting of dollars,” Subtle replied. “He wanted to start doing it immediately and without taking any more thought about it. And so I told him that a Spanish minister came here to spy against the faithful —”

“I understand,” Face said. “Come, Subtle, you are so downcast when you suffer the least disaster! What would you have done if I had not helped you out?”

“I thank you, Face, for the angry boy, indeed,” Subtle replied.

Face said, “Who would have expected that Surly would have been the Spanish Don? He had dyed his beard and done everything else needed to impersonate a Spaniard.”

He pointed to the cloth that Drugger had brought and said, “Well, sir, here’s damask to make you a suit of clothing.”

“Where’s Drugger?” Subtle asked.

“He has gone to borrow for me a Spanish suit of clothing,” Face said. “I’ll be the Spanish Count, now, and marry the widow.”

“But where’s the widow?” Subtle asked.

“Inside, with my lord’s sister,” Face said. “Madam Doll is entertaining her.”

Subtle said, "Pardon me, Face, but now that I know the widow is still honest and chaste, I will stand again."

He meant that he would compete again with Face for the widow's hand in marriage. The word "stand" also had the meaning of "erection."

"You will not attempt to compete for her hand in marriage!" Face said.

"Why not?"

"You must stand to your word," Face said. "You said that you would not marry her. Or — here comes Doll. I will tell ___"

"You are tyrannous still," Subtle said.

"I am strict when it comes to my rights," Face said.

Doll entered the room hastily.

Face said, "Hello, Doll! Have you told her that the Spanish Count will come?"

"Yes, but another person has come, a person you little looked for!"

"Who is that?"

"Your master," Doll answered. "The master of the house."

People in this society called the boss "master."

Subtle said, "What, Doll!"

Face said, "She lies. This is some trick. Come, put your tricks aside, Dorothy."

"Look out the window, and see for yourself," Doll said.

Face went to the window.

“Are you telling the truth?” Subtle asked.

“By God’s light, forty of the neighbors are about him, talking,” Doll said.

“It really is my master,” Face said. “I swear it by this good day.”

Doll said, “It will prove to be an ill day for some of us.”

Face said, “We are undone, we are ruined, and we will be caught in the act.”

“We are lost, I’m afraid,” Doll said.

Subtle complained to Face, “You said he would not come as long as one person died each week within the liberties.”

The liberties were the suburbs outside the city walls.

Face said, “No. I said within the city walls.”

That area was much smaller, but actually Face had not specified this.

“Is that so?” Subtle said. “Then I beg your pardon. I thought it was in the liberties. What shall we do now, Face?”

“Be silent,” Face said. “Don’t say a word if my master calls or knocks. I’ll shave my beard and put on my old clothes again and meet him as the person he thinks I am: Jeremy the butler.

“In the meantime, you two pack up all the goods and profits that we can carry in the two trunks. I’ll keep my master away from the house at least for today, if not longer, and then at night, I’ll ship you both away down the Thames River to Ratcliff, where we will meet tomorrow, and there we’ll share the goods and profits.

“Let Sir Epicure Mammon’s brass and pewter stay in the cellar. We’ll have another time to deal with that. But, Doll, please go and quickly heat a little water. Subtle must shave me: All my Captain’s beard must come off to make me appear again as smooth-faced and smooth-talking Jeremy the butler.”

He asked Subtle, “Will you do it? Will you shave me?”

“Yes, I’ll shave you as well as I can.”

“And not cut my throat, but trim me?”

“You shall see, sir.”

The words “shave” and “trim” also mean “cheat.”

ACT 5 (The Alchemist)

— 5.1 —

Outside the house, Lovewit — the master of the house — was talking with several neighbors.

Lovewit said, “Has there been such visiting, you say?”

Neighbor #1 said, “Daily, sir.”

Neighbor #2 said, “And nightly, too.”

Neighbor #3 said, “Yes, and some visitors were dressed as splendidly as lords.”

Neighbor #4 said, “There were ladies and gentlewomen.”

Neighbor #5 said, “Citizens’ wives.”

Neighbor #1 said, “And Knights.”

Neighbor #6 said, “In coaches.”

Neighbor #2 said, “Yes, and women who sell oysters.”

Neighbor #1 said, “Beside other gallants.”

Neighbor #3 said, “Sailors’ wives.”

Neighbor #4 said, “Tobacco men.”

Neighbor #5 said, “Another Pimlico!”

Pimlico was a crowded tavern in a resort area.

Lovewit asked, “What would my servant Jeremy the butler advertise to draw this large company of people? Did he hang out any banners advertising a strange calf with five legs to be seen, or a huge lobster with six claws?”

Neighbor #6 said, “No, sir.”

Neighbor #3 said, “We would have gone in the house if he had, sir.”

Lovewit said, “He has no gift of teaching in the nose that I ever knew of.”

Puritans were reputed to preach — a kind of teaching — with a nasal twang.

Lovewit asked the neighbors, “Did you see any bills set up that promised the cure of fevers or the toothache?”

Neighbor #2 said, “We saw no such thing, sir.”

Lovewit asked, “Did you ever hear a drum struck to advertise the chance to see baboons or puppets?”

Neighbor #5 said, “We never have, sir.”

Lovewit said, “What kind of a scheme did Jeremy the butler bring forth now? I love an abundant wit and intelligence as I love my nourishment. I pray to God that Jeremy the butler has not kept such open house that he has sold my hangings and my bedding! I left him nothing else that he could sell. If he has ‘eaten’ them, then I say, ‘A plague on the moth!’ Or surely he has gotten some bawdy pictures to call together all this gang of people. He has been showing a bawdy picture of the friar and the nun, or a bawdy picture of the Knight’s courser sexually covering the parson’s mare, or a bawdy picture of a six-year-old boy with an enormous penis. Or perhaps, he has a flea circus in which fleas run at full tilt upon a table, or he has a dancing dog.”

He then asked, “When did you last see him?”

Neighbor #1 asked, “Who, sir, Jeremy?”

Neighbor #2 said, “Jeremy the butler? We haven’t seen him at all this month.”

“What!” a shocked Lovewit said.

Neighbor #4 said, "Not for the past five weeks, sir."

Neighbor #6 said, "For the past six weeks at the least."

"You amaze me, neighbors!" Lovewit said.

Neighbor #5 said, "To be sure, if your worship doesn't know where he is, he's slipped away."

Neighbor #6 said, "Pray to God that he has not been made away. Pray to God that he has not been murdered."

Lovewit said, "In that case, it's not the time to ask questions."

He knocked on the door of his house.

Neighbor #6 said, "About three weeks ago, I heard a doleful cry as I sat up mending my wife's stockings."

"It is strange that no one will answer the door!" Lovewit said. "Did you hear a cry, did you say?"

Neighbor #6 said, "Yes, sir, it was like the cry of a man who had been strangled for an hour and could not speak."

Neighbor #2 said, "I heard it, too, exactly three weeks ago at two o'clock this coming morning."

Lovewit said, "These are miracles, or you make them seem like miracles! A man was strangled for an hour and could not speak, and yet both of you heard him cry out?"

Neighbor #3 said, "Yes, downward, sir."

Neighbor #3 may have meant that the cry came from the cellar.

Lovewit said, "You are a wise fellow. Give me your hand."

They shook hands, and Lovewit asked, "Please, what is your trade?"

Neighbor #3 said, “I am a blacksmith, if it pleases your worship.”

“A blacksmith!” Lovewit said. “Then lend me your help to get this door open.”

Neighbor #3 said, “That I will immediately, sir, but let me fetch my tools.”

He exited.

Neighbor #3 said, “Sir, it’s best to knock again, before you break down the door.”

— 5.2 —

Lovewit said, “I will.”

A freshly shaven Face appeared on the scene outside Lovewit’s house. Face was wearing his butler’s livery.

Face asked, “What are you doing, sir?”

Some of the neighbors recognized him and said, “Oh, here’s Jeremy the butler!”

Face said to Lovewit, “Good sir, go away from the door.”

“Why, what’s the matter?” Lovewit asked.

“Move away farther,” Face said. “You are still too close.”

Lovewit said, “In the name of wonder, what does the fellow mean?”

“The house, sir, has been visited,” Face said.

“What, with the plague? In that case, you stand further away from me.”

“Don’t worry, sir,” Face said. “I didn’t catch the plague.”

“Who had it then?” Lovewit asked. “I left no one other than you in the house.”

“Yes, sir, my fellow, the cat that kept the buttery, had it on her a week before I spied it, but I got her conveyed away in the night —”

Domestic cats can catch the three major kinds of plague: bubonic, septicemic, and pneumonic.

Face continued, “— and so I shut the house up for a month —”

“What!” Lovewit said. This contradicted what the neighbors had told him.

Face said, “I intended to fumigate the house by burning treacle, tar, and vinegar infused with rose petals, which would have made the house sweet, so that you would never have known that plague had visited here because I knew the news would only upset you, sir.”

“Breathe less toward me, and from farther away! Why, this is stranger: The neighbors here all tell me that the doors have always been open —”

“What, sir!” Face said, pretending to be shocked.

Lovewit said, “Gallants, men and women, and people of all sorts, rag-tag, have been seen to flock here in threaves, these ten weeks, as to a second Hogsden in the days of Pimlico and Eye-bright.”

By “threaves,” Lovewit meant “crowds.” A “threave” of corn is twenty-four sheaves of corn. Hogsden was a popular resort; now it is named Hoxton. Pimlico and Eye-bright were popular taverns.

“Sir, their wisdoms will not say so,” Face said.

Lovewit replied, “Today they speak of coaches and gallants. A woman in a French hood went in, they tell me, and another woman was seen in a velvet gown at the window.”

The woman in a French hood was Dame Pliant; the woman in a velvet gown was Doll.

Lovewit continued, “Many other people were seen to pass in and out.”

“They passed through the doors then, or the walls, I assure their eyesights and their spectacles,” Face said, “for here, sir, are the keys, and here they have been, in this my pocket, now more than twenty days, and as for before, I kept the fort alone there.

“Except that it is not yet late in the afternoon, I would believe that my neighbors had seen double through the black pot of beer, and created these apparitions in their minds! I swear on my Christian faith to your worship that for these three weeks and upwards, the door has not been opened.”

“This is strange!” Lovewit said.

Neighbor #1 said, “In good faith, I think I saw a coach outside here.”

Neighbor #2, “And so did I, I’d have been sworn.”

“Do you think it now?” Lovewit asked. “And was it only one coach?”

Neighbor #4 said, “We cannot tell, sir. Jeremy is a very honest fellow.”

Face asked, “Did you see me at all?”

Neighbor #1 said, “No; that we are sure of.”

Neighbor #2 said, “I’ll be sworn to that.”

Lovewit said, “You are fine rogues to have your testimonies built on!”

Neighbor #3, the blacksmith, returned with his tools.

Seeing Face, he asked, “Has Jeremy come!”

Neighbor #1 said, “Oh, yes; you don’t need your tools. We were deceived, he says.”

Neighbor #2 said, “He has had the keys, and the door has been shut these three weeks, he says.”

Neighbor #3 said, “That is likely enough.”

Lovewit said, “Peace, be silent, and go away from here, you changelings.”

Some of the neighbors exited.

Lovewit called the neighbors changelings because they had changed their testimony so quickly. Changelings were also idiots; according to folklore, fairies would sometimes steal an intelligent, healthy human child and leave a stupid child of their own in its place.

In the theater, “changeling” was a clever clue for some of the neighbors to leave. Some of the actors performing as neighbors doubled other roles and needed to leave to get into the costumes of Kastril, Ananias, and Tribulation Wholesome.

Surly and Sir Epicure Mammon entered the scene.

Face said to himself, “Surly has come! And he has acquainted Mammon with all the facts! They’ll tell everything to my master. How shall I beat them off? What shall I do? Nothing’s more wretched than a guilty conscience.”

Surly said sarcastically to Sir Epicure Mammon, “No, sir, he was a great physician. This, it was no bawdy house, but an absolute church! You knew the lord and his sister.”

Sir Epicure Mammon said, “Good Surly —”

Surly continued, “The happy word, BE RICH —”

Sir Epicure Mammon continued, “Don’t play the tyrant.”

Surly continued, “— should be today pronounced to all your friends. And where are your andirons now? And your brass pots that should have been golden flagons and great wedges of precious metals — large ingots of gold and silver?”

Sir Epicure Mammon said, “Let me just say something. What! They have shut their doors, I think!”

“Yes, now it is holiday with them,” Surly said.

Sir Epicure Mammon and Surly began to knock on the doors.

“Rogues, cheaters, impostors, bawds!” Sir Epicure Mammon shouted.

Face asked, “What do you mean by knocking at this house, sir?”

Face was freshly shaven and he was wearing a servant’s livery, and so Sir Epicure Mammon and Surly did not recognize him.

Sir Epicure Mammon replied, “To enter it if we can.”

“Another man’s house!” Face said. “Here is the owner, sir: turn to him, and state your business.”

“Are you, sir, the owner?” Sir Epicure Mammon asked Lovewit.

“Yes, sir,” Lovewit replied.

“And are those knaves within your cheaters?”

“What knaves? What cheaters?”

“Subtle and his Lungs,” Sir Epicure Mammon replied.

“The gentleman is distracted, sir!” Face said. “No lungs nor lights have been seen here for the past three weeks, sir, within these doors, upon my word.”

The word “lights” was a pun. In this society, it meant “lungs.”

Surly said, “Do you swear to that, arrogant groom!”

“Yes, sir, I am the housekeeper,” Face said, “and I know the keys have not been out of my hands.”

“This is a new Face,” Surly said.

He did not recognize Face; he meant that here was a new person who was as arrogant as Face.

“You have mistaken this house for another, sir,” Face said. “What sign was the one you are seeking?”

Brothels and taverns and ordinaries had signs hanging outside.

“You rascal!” Surly said.

He said to Sir Epicure Mammon, “This is one of the confederacy of villains. Come, let’s get police officers and force open the doors.”

Lovewit said, “I ask you to wait, gentlemen.”

“No, sir,” Surly said. “We’ll come back with a warrant.”

Sir Epicure Mammon said, “Yes, and then we shall have your doors opened.”

Sir Epicure Mammon and Surly exited.

Lovewit asked Face, "What is the meaning of this?"

"I cannot tell, sir," Face replied.

Neighbor #1 said, "These are two of the gallants whom we think we saw."

"Two of the fools!" Face said. "You talk as idly as they do."

He said to Lovewit, "Truly, sir, I think the Moon has crazed them all."

Seeing Kastril coming, he said to himself, "Oh, me, the angry boy has come, too! He'll make a noise, and never go away until he has betrayed us all."

Kastril knocked on the doors and shouted, "Rogues, bawds, slaves! You'll open the door, immediately! Punk, cockatrice, my suster! By this light I'll fetch the marshal to you. You are a whore to keep your castle —"

"Cockatrice" is a slang word for a whore, perhaps because the word contains the words "cock" and "trice." The word "trice" means "very quickly," so the word "cockatrice" can be understood as meaning "cock in a very short time."

Kastril was afraid that his sister had slept with the Spanish Don — or with someone else.

The freshly shaven Face asked, "Who would you speak with, sir?"

Kastril said, "The bawdy Doctor, and the cheating Captain, and puss my suster."

Lovewit said, "There's something to this, surely."

Face said, "Upon my trust, the doors were never open, sir."

Kastril said, “I have heard all their tricks told me twice over by the fat Knight and the lean gentleman. They have told me the cons going on here.”

Sir Epicure Mammon and Surly were the fat Knight and the lean gentleman.

Lovewit said, “Here comes another group.”

Ananias and Tribulation Wholesome walked over to the group.

Face said to himself, “Ananias, too! And his pastor!”

Tribulation Wholesome knocked loudly on the doors and said, “The doors are shut against us.”

“Come forth, you seed of sulphur, sons of fire!” Ananias shouted. “Your stench of evil has broken forth; abomination is in the house.”

“Yes, my suster’s there,” Kastril said.

Ananias said, “The place, it has become a cage of unclean birds.”

Kastril said, “Yes, I will fetch the scavenger and the constable.”

The scavenger was a public official who hired people to clean the streets.

Tribulation Wholesome said to Kastril, “You shall do well if you do that.”

Ananias said, “We’ll join together in order to weed them out.”

Kastril shouted, “You will not come then, punk-device, my sister?”

“Punk” means “whore.” “Point-device” means “perfect attention to detail.” By calling his sister a punk-device, Kastril was calling her a “whore in every detail.”

Ananias said, “Don’t call her ‘sister’; she’s a harlot verily.”

To Ananias, a “sister” was a “female Puritan.”

Kastril said, “I’ll raise the street — I’ll call people here to help us.”

Lovewit said, “Good gentleman, a word.”

Ananias said, “Satan, leave us, and do not hinder our religious zeal!”

Ananias, Tribulation Wholesome, and Kastril exited.

“The world’s turned Bedlam,” Lovewit said. “Everyone’s gone crazy.”

Face said, “These people have all broken loose out of St. Katherine’s Hospital, where they are accustomed to keep the better sort of mad-folks.”

Neighbor #1 said, “All these persons we have seen going in and out of here.”

Neighbor #2 said, “Yes, indeed, sir.”

Neighbor #3 said, “These were the parties.”

“Silence, you drunkards!” Face said.

Then he said to Lovewit, “Sir, I wonder at this. If it would please you to give me permission to touch the door, I’ll test it to see if the lock has been changed.”

“This amazes me!” Lovewit said.

Face went to the door and said, “Truly, sir, I believe there’s no such thing. This is all deceptio visus — a hallucination.”

Deceptio visus is Latin for “the deception of sight.”

Face thought, I wish could get my master away from here.

From inside the house, Dapper shouted, “Master Captain! Master Doctor!”

Lovewit asked Face, “Who’s that?”

Face thought, He’s Dapper, our clerk within, whom I forgot about!

He replied, “I don’t know, sir.”

From inside the house, Dapper shouted, “For God’s sake, when will her grace be at leisure?”

He was referring to the Queen of Fairy.

Face said, “Ha! Illusions! Some spirit of the air!”

He thought, Dapper’s gag of gingerbread has melted, and now he is displaying his throat by shouting.

From inside the house, Dapper shouted, “I am almost stifled ___”

Face thought, I wish you were entirely stifled.

Lovewit said, “The shouting is from inside the house. Ha! Listen.”

Face said, “Believe me, sir. The shouting is in the air. It’s spirits.”

“Be silent, you,” Lovewit said.

From inside the house, Dapper shouted, “My aunt’s grace is not treating me well.”

From inside the house, Subtle said, “You fool, be quiet. You’ll ruin everything.”

Face spoke to Subtle through the keyhole, “If he doesn’t, you will.”

Unfortunately, Lovewit had moved closer to the door and Face had spoken loudly enough for Lovewit to overhear him.

“Oh, is that so?” Lovewit said. “Then you converse with spirits! Come, sir. No more of your tricks, good Jeremy. Tell me the truth, the shortest way — quickly and directly.”

Face requested, “Dismiss this rabble, sir.”

He was referring to the remaining neighbors.

Face thought, What shall I do? I have been caught!

Lovewit said, “Good neighbors, I thank you all. You may depart.”

The remaining neighbors exited.

Lovewit then said to Face, “Come, sir, you know that I am an indulgent master, and so therefore conceal nothing. What’s your medicine that can draw so many several sorts of wild fowl here?”

The medicine was a quack remedy that could be sold to “wild fowl” such as geese, aka fools. Without intending or knowing it, Lovewit was also referring to the alchemical medicine known as the elixir of life.

Face said, “Sir, you have been accustomed to appreciate mirth and wit — but in the street is no place to talk. Just give me permission to make the best of my fortune, and only pardon me the abuse of your house: It’s all I beg. In recompense for your forgiveness, I’ll help you to a widow, whom you shall give me thanks for. She will make you seven years younger, and she will make you a rich man. All that you will have to do is put on a Spanish cloak. I have the widow inside the house. You need not fear entering the house; it was not visited by the plague.”

Lovewit replied, “But it was visited by me, who came sooner than you expected.”

Face said, “That is true, sir. I ask that you forgive me.”

Lovewit said, “Well, let’s see your widow.”

They went inside the house.

— 5.4 —

Subtle was with Dapper in a room in the house. Dapper was no longer blindfolded.

Subtle said, “What! Have you eaten your gag?”

“Yes, indeed. It crumbled away in my mouth,” Dapper replied.

“You have spoiled everything then.”

“No! I hope my aunt of Fairy will forgive me.”

“Your aunt’s a gracious lady,” Subtle said, “but indeed you are to blame.”

“The fumes overcame me, and I ate the gingerbread gag to calm my stomach,” Dapper said. “Please explain that to her grace.”

Face entered the room. He was wearing his Captain’s uniform and a fake beard.

Dapper said, “Here comes Captain Face.”

Face said to Subtle, “What is this! Is Dapper’s mouth open?”

Subtle replied, “Yes, he has spoken!”

Face said quietly to Subtle, “Damn! I heard him when I was outside, and I heard you, too.”

He said loudly so Dapper could hear him, “He’s ruined then.”

He said quietly to Subtle, “I have been obliged to say that the house is haunted with spirits in order to keep the churl back.”

A “churl” is a country fellow. Face was referring to Lovewit, who had been in the country inspecting his hop yards.

“And have you succeeded in keeping him away?” Subtle asked quietly.

“Yes, for this night,” Face replied.

He was lying.

“Why, then triumph and sing of Face so famous, the precious King of present wits,” Subtle said, praising Face for his supposed success.

Face asked, “Didn’t you hear the disturbance at the door?”

“Yes, I did, and I dwindled with fear because of it,” Subtle said.

“Let’s show Dapper his aunt the Queen of Fairy, and then let’s get rid of him,” Face said. “I’ll send her in to you.”

Face exited.

Subtle said loudly to Dapper, “Well, sir, your aunt her grace will see you quickly, at my request and the Captain’s word that you did not eat your gingerbread gag in any contempt of her highness.”

“I certainly did not do it in any contempt of her highness, sir,” Dapper said.

Doll, dressed like the Queen of Fairy, entered the room.

Subtle said to Dapper, “Here she is. Get down on your knees and grovel. She has a stately presence.”

Dapper knelt, and then he groveled towards her.

Subtle said, “Good! Go nearer, and tell her, ‘God save you’!”

Dapper said, “Madam!”

“And your aunt,” Subtle prompted.

“And my most gracious aunt,” Dapper said. “May God save your grace.”

The disguised Doll said, “Nephew, we thought to have been angry with you, but that sweet face of yours has turned the tide, and made it flow with joy, although it recently ebbed of love.

“Arise, and touch our velvet gown.”

Subtle said, “Kiss her skirts.”

Dapper did.

Subtle said, “Good!”

The disguised Doll said, “Let me now stroke that head. Nephew, much shall you win, and much shall you spend. Much shall you give away, and much shall you lend.”

“Yes, much indeed,” Subtle said.

He then said to Dapper, “Why do you not thank her grace?”

Dapper said, “I cannot speak for joy.”

Subtle said to the disguised Doll, “See, the kind wretch! He is filled with love for his relative — you, his aunt. He is your grace’s true kinsman.”

The disguised Doll said to the air, "Give me the bird."

She was pretending that the familiar spirit she was giving to Dapper was a bird in the fairy world.

In modern times, this can be a funny line because to "give someone the bird" means to boo them. On the New York opening night of Bitter Sweet, Noël Coward walked into Evelyn Laye's dressing room and presented her with a silver box. When she opened the box, a mechanical bird emerged, flapped its wings, and sang. Mr. Coward said, "I wanted to be the first to give you the bird."

The disguised Doll then gave an item to Dapper and said, "Here is your fly in a purse, which you will hang about your neck, nephew."

The fly was the familiar spirit in the human world. In this society, many people believed that demons assumed the form of flies.

She added, "Wear it, and feed it in about a week from this day on your right wrist."

Subtle said, "Open a vein with a pin and let it suck blood just once a week; until then, you must not look at it."

The disguised Doll said, "That is correct, and nephew, be sure to bear yourself worthy of the blood you come from."

Subtle said, "Her grace would have you eat no more Woolsack pies, nor Dagger frumety."

"Frumety" was wheat cakes boiled in milk and then seasoned. Woolsack and Dagger were taverns.

The disguised Doll said, "And he should not break his fast in Heaven and Hell."

Heaven and Hell were also taverns.

Subtle said, “She’s with you everywhere!”

He added, “Nor should you play with costermongers — sellers of fruit — at the game of mum-chance, the game of tray-trip, and the game of God-make-you-rich, which your aunt has done.”

The game of God-make-you-rich was a variant of backgammon.

Subtle added, “Instead, you must keep the gallantest company, and play the best games —”

“Yes, sir,” Dapper interrupted.

Subtle continued, “— such as gleek and primero, and be true to us and give us a share of what you win.”

Dapper said, “I swear by this my hand that I will.”

Subtle said, “You may bring us a thousand pounds before tomorrow night, even if only three thousand pounds are being gambled over — if you are willing.”

“I swear I will,” Dapper said.

“Your fly will teach you all games,” Subtle said.

Face whispered to Subtle from another room, “Have you done there?”

Subtle asked the disguised Doll, “Does your grace have any other duties to command him to do?”

“No,” the disguised Doll said, “except to come and see me often. I may chance to leave him three or four hundred chests of treasure and some twelve thousand acres of fairy land, if he gambles well and decorously with good gamesters.”

Fairies are thought to be long-lived, so even if fairies existed, Dapper would be unlikely to inherit these things.

Subtle said to Dapper, “There’s a kind aunt! Kiss her departing part.”

Dapper kissed the train of her gown — although her “departing part” could have been interpreted as her butt.

Subtle added, “But you must now sell your assets that earn you forty marks a year.”

“Yes, sir, I mean to,” Dapper said.

“Or, give those assets away,” Subtle said. “A pox on them!”

“I’ll give them to my aunt,” Dapper said. “I’ll go and fetch the legal papers.”

“That’s a good idea,” Subtle said. “Go now.”

Subtle knew, because Face had told him, that Dapper was “the sole hope of his old grandmother,” but Subtle was willing to con Dapper out of his inheritance.

Dapper exited.

Face entered the room and asked Doll, “Where’s Subtle?”

“Here I am,” Subtle said. “What’s the news?”

Face said, “Drugger is at the door. Go take from him his Spanish suit of clothing, and tell him to fetch a parson immediately. Tell him that he shall marry the widow. You shall earn and then spend a hundred pounds by doing this service!”

Subtle exited.

Face said, “Now, Queen Doll, have you packed up everything?”

“Yes.”

“And how do you like the Lady Pliant?”

“She is a good dull innocent.”

An “innocent” is a fool, someone innocent of the evil in the world.

Subtle returned, carrying a bundle, and said, “Here’s your Hieronimo’s Spanish cloak and hat.”

Face said, “Give them to me.”

“And the ruff, too?” Subtle asked.

“Yes,” Face said. “I’ll come back to you quickly.”

He took the clothing and exited.

Subtle said, “Doll, now he is gone about his project, the one I told you about, for the widow.”

Doll said, “It is directly against our agreement. We are supposed to share everything equally, and no one is supposed to have precedence.”

By marrying Dame Pliant, Face would gain Dame Pliant’s fortune.

Subtle said, “Well, we will fix him, wench.”

The word “wench” was often used affectionately.

He asked, “Have you gotten Dame Pliant’s jewels or bracelets from her?”

“No, but I will do it,” Doll replied.

Subtle said, “Soon at night, my Dolly, when we are shipped, and all our goods are aboard, eastward for Ratcliff, we will turn our course and instead go westward to Brainford, if you say the word, and take our leaves of this overweening, conceited, cocksure rascal — this peremptory Face.”

“Good idea. I’m weary of him,” Doll said.

Subtle said, “You have reason to be since the slave will run and get a wife, Doll, against the agreement that was drawn among us three.”

Doll said, “I’ll pluck his bird — Dame Pliant — as bare as I can.”

Subtle said, “Yes, tell her that she must by any means address and give some present to the cunning-man — me — to make him amends for wronging his art with her suspicion; she must send him a ring or a pearl necklace. If she does not, tell her that she will be tortured extremely in her sleep and have strange things — nightmares — come to her. Will you do this?”

“Yes.”

Subtle said, “My fine flitter-mouse, my bat, my bird of the night!”

A bird is a young woman. As a prostitute, Doll was a lady of the night.

Subtle added, “We’ll tickle it at the Pigeons, when we have everything and may unlock the trunks, and say that this is mine, and this is thine; and this is thine, and this is mine.”

They kissed.

“Tickle” meant “celebrate,” including “celebrate sexually.” They would tickle their throats with alcohol, and they would tickle other things. Subtle might be impotent, but there are multiple ways to have fun in bed.

Face returned and said, “What now! Busy a-billing?”

When doves caress each other, they are billing.

“Billing” also means “making a list,” something that Subtle and Doll had been doing with the profits before they kissed.

Subtle said, "Yes, we are a little high-spirited with the good passage of our work here."

Face said, "Nab Drugger has brought his parson; take the parson inside, Subtle, and send Nab back again to wash his face."

"I will," Subtle said, "and shall I have him shave himself?"

"If you can get him to do it," Face said.

"You are hot upon something, Face, whatever it is!" Doll said. "You are up to something!"

Face said, "I am up to a trick that shall allow Doll to spend ten pounds a month."

He was lying.

Subtle returned.

Face asked, "Is Drugger gone?"

Subtle said, "The chaplain is waiting for you in the hall, sir."

"I'll go and take him where he needs to be," Face said.

He exited.

Doll said, "He'll now marry her, immediately."

"He cannot yet," Subtle said. "He is not ready."

Face was not wearing the Spanish clothing.

Subtle added, "Dear Doll, cheat Dame Pliant of everything you can. To deceive Face is no deceit; instead, it is only justice because Face is willing to break such an inextricable tie as ours was."

"Leave it to me to fix him," Doll said.

Face returned and said, "Come, my partners. You have packed up everything? Where are the trunks? Bring them forth."

"Here they are," Subtle said, pointing.

"Let's see them," Face said. "Where's the money?"

Subtle pointed to a trunk and said, "Here, in this one."

Face opened the trunk and said, "Sir Epicure Mammon's ten pounds. Eight score pounds from previously. Here is the brethren's money. Here is Druggier's money, and here is Dapper's money."

He pointed and asked, "What paper's that?"

Doll said, "It contains the jewel of the waiting maid's, who stole it from her lady, in order to know for certain —"

Face interrupted, "— if she should rise in social status and have precedence over her mistress?"

Doll replied, "Yes."

Face asked, "What box is that?"

Subtle said, "It contains the fish-wives' rings, I think, and the ale-wives' small coins."

He asked, "Is that right, Doll?"

She replied, "Yes, and it contains the silver boatswain's whistle that the sailor's wife brought to you in order to learn whether her husband was with Captain Ward, the famous pirate."

Face said, "We'll wet it tomorrow, along with our silver beakers and tavern cups."

He meant that they would sell the whistle and use the money obtained to buy drinks to wet their whistles.

He then asked, “Where are the French petticoats and girdles and hangers?”

The hangers were ornamental loops that could be put on a belt and used to hold swords.

Subtle said, “Here, in this trunk, and so are the bolts of fine linen.”

Face asked, “Is Drugger’s damask there, and the tobacco?”

Subtle replied, “Yes.”

“Give me the keys,” Face said.

“Why should you have the keys?” Doll asked.

“It doesn’t matter, Doll,” Subtle said, “because we shall not open the trunks before he comes.”

Of course, he intended to open them before Face arrived because he thought that Face would never arrive.

Face said to Subtle, “That is true: You shall not open them, indeed. Nor shall you take them forth, do you see?”

He looked at Doll and said, “Doll, you shall not take them away from here.”

“No!” an angry Doll said.

“No, my smock-rampant,” Face said.

On coats of arms, an animal could be shown rampant — on its rear legs and ready to attack.

As a prostitute, Doll did much of her work in a smock — ladies’ underwear. Right now, she looked very much ready to attack.

Face said, “The truth is, my master knows all, he has pardoned me, and he will keep the trunks. Doctor, this is true — you look dumbfounded — despite all the horoscopes you cast.”

Face then lied, “I sent for my master to come here, indeed.”

He then said, “Therefore, good partners, both of you — both he and she — must be satisfied, for here ends our agreement: the indenture tripartite made among Subtle, Doll, and Face. All I can do for you now is to help you over the wall in the back of the house or lend you a sheet to save your velvet gown, Doll.”

Subtle and Doll could either escape by climbing over the back wall, or stay and be arrested. If they were arrested, Doll could be forced to make a walk of penitence wearing nothing but a sheet.

Face added, “Here will be police officers very quickly, so you need to think of some course of action immediately if you intend to escape the prisoners’ dock, for there you will end up if you don’t escape.”

Loud knocking sounded on the doors.

Face said, “Listen to the sound of thunder.”

Subtle said, “You are a precious and ‘precious’ fiend!”

One meaning of “precious” is expensive. Face had cost Subtle and Doll much wealth, so Subtle’s use of the word with that meaning was not sarcastic. Another meaning is “of great moral and spiritual value.” Face was not of great moral and spiritual value, so Subtle’s use of the word with that meaning was sarcastic.

A police officer shouted, “Open the door!”

Face said, “Doll, I am sorry indeed for you, but listen to me. It shall go hard with me, it shall be unpleasant for me, but I will place you somewhere. You shall have my letter of recommendation to Mistress Amo —”

Doll said, “Go get hanged!”

Face continued, “— or Madam Caesarean.”

Mistress Amo and Madam Caesarean were typical nicknames for women who ran brothels.

Amo is Latin for “I love you.”

Doll said, “A pox upon you, rogue. I wish I had time to beat you!”

Face said, “Subtle, let me know where you set up shop next. I will send you a customer now and then, for old acquaintance’s sake. What new course of action are you considering?”

Subtle replied, “Rogue, I’ll hang myself, so that I may walk as a greater devil than you, and haunt you in the flock-bed and the buttery.”

A flock-bed was stuffed with wool; the buttery was the pantry where food and drink were stored. As a butler, Face was in charge of the pantry.

Subtle was saying that he would kill himself so that he could haunt the places Face spent a lot of time.

Doll Common and Subtle exited.

—5.5—

Lovewit, wearing Spanish clothing, stood talking with the parson.

Loud knocking sounded at the door.

At the door, Lovewit asked, “What do you want, my masters?”

Sir Epicure Mammon replied, "Open your door, cheaters, bawds, conjurers."

A police officer with him threatened, "Or we will break it open."

"What warrant do you have?" Lovewit asked.

"Warrant enough, sir," the police officer replied. "Don't doubt that, if you'll not open it."

"Is there an officer out there?" Lovewit asked.

The police officer replied, "Yes, two or three in case they are needed."

Lovewit said, "Have a little patience, and I will open it in a moment."

Face entered the room; he was beardless and dressed as a butler.

Face asked Lovewit, "Sir, have you finished the ceremony? Is it a marriage? Is it duly and legally performed?"

"Yes, my brain," Lovewit said, complimenting Face, aka Jeremy the butler.

"Then take off your ruff and cloak," Face said. "Be yourself, sir."

Lovewit removed the Spanish clothing.

Surly shouted from outside, "Knock down the door!"

Kastril shouted, "By God's light, beat it open."

Opening the door, Lovewit said, "Wait, wait, gentlemen, what is the meaning of this violence?"

Sir Epicure Mammon, Surly, Kastril, Ananias, Tribulation Wholesome, and the police officers rushed in.

“Where is this collier?” Sir Epicure Mammon shouted.

A collier is a man who deals in coal. Sir Epicure Mammon was referring to Subtle, who used much coal in his trade of alchemy.

Surly shouted, “And where is Captain Face?”

Sir Epicure Mammon began, “These day owls —”

“— that are birding in men’s wallets,” Surly finished.

Owls hunt at night, but Subtle and Face went birding — hunting — by day in other men’s wallets. Subtle and Face were thieves.

Sir Epicure Mammon mentioned another person who had conned him and whose whereabouts he wanted to know: “Madam Suppository.”

A suppository is a plug used to give medicine vaginally or rectally. Doll had pretended to Sir Epicure Mammon that she was studying medicine. Unknown to but possibly suspected by Sir Epicure Mammon, Doll was a prostitute who very well might be called Madame Suppository. She was also a supposed lady who was not really a lady.

Kastril mentioned someone he wanted to see: “Doxy, my suster.”

A doxy is a whore.

“Locusts of the foul pit,” Ananias said.

“Profane as Bel and the dragon,” Tribulation Wholesome said.

“Bel and the Dragon” is a section of the extended Book of Daniel. These stories are part of the biblical apocrypha. Bel (a statue) and the dragon were both falsely worshipped; Daniel convinced the people not to worship them.

The people who worshipped Bel and the dragon were worshipping idols. Such things occurred in Ben Jonson's day and in our day, but modern idols tend to be money and the bad things that money can buy.

"Worse than the grasshoppers, or the lice of Egypt," Ananias said.

Lovewit said, "Good gentlemen, listen to me."

The commotion continued.

He asked, "Are you police officers, and you cannot stop this violence?"

The first police officer ordered, "Keep the peace."

"Gentlemen, what is the matter?" Lovewit asked. "Who do you seek?"

"The chemical cozener," Sir Epicure Mammon said.

"And the Captain pander," Surly said.

"The nun who is my suster," Kastril said.

"Nun" was an ironic way of saying "whore."

"Madam Rabbi," Sir Epicure Mammon said.

Doll had pretended to have religious knowledge while she was deceiving him.

"Scorpions and caterpillars," Ananias said.

Lovewit said, "Fewer speak at once, please."

The second police officer ordered, "Speak one person at a time, gentlemen. Take turns speaking. So I order you, by virtue of my staff."

His staff was a symbol of his authority as a police officer.

Ananias said, “They are the vessels of pride, lust, and the cart.”

The cart was used in punishing criminals. A criminal could be placed on the cart and driven to the place of punishment, or the criminal could be bound and walk behind the cart while being whipped.

Lovewit said to Ananias, “Good zeal, lie still for a little while.”

“Peace, Deacon Ananias,” Tribulation Wholesome said. “Be quiet.”

Lovewit said, “The house here is mine, and the doors are open. If there are any such persons as you seek, use your authority and search the house in God’s name.”

He was hinting that perhaps the people they were seeking did not really exist.

He added, “I have only recently come to town, and to tell you truly, finding this tumult about my doors somewhat bewildered me until my butler here, fearing my greater displeasure, told me he had done something somewhat insolent — he had rented my house (probably he was presuming on my known aversion to any air of the town while there was present the sickness of plague) to a Doctor and a Captain. Who they are, what they are, and where they may be, he doesn’t know.”

Sir Epicure Mammon asked, “Are they gone?”

“You may go in and search, sir,” Lovewit invited.

Sir Epicure Mammon, Ananias and Tribulation went into the interior rooms of the house.

Lovewit said, “Here, I find the empty walls worse than I left them; they are smoked, with a few cracked pots and glasses and a furnace, and the ceiling filled with graffiti made from the candle smoke and a drawing of 'Madam with a Dildo' written on the walls. I have met only one gentlewoman here. She is within, and she said that she was a widow —”

Kastril said, “Yes, that’s my suster. I’ll go thump her. Where is she?”

He went inside.

Lovewit continued, “— and she should have married a Spanish Count, but he, when he came to it, neglected her so grossly, that I, a widower, am gone through with her.”

He had gone through the wedding ceremony with her.

Surly said, “What! Have I lost her then!”

“Were you the Spanish Don, sir?” Lovewit asked. “Truly, now, she does blame you extremely, and she says that you swore and told her you had taken the pains to dye your beard and darken your face with umber and had borrowed a suit of Spanish clothing and a ruff, all for her love — and then you did nothing. What an oversight and lack of putting forward an effort, sir, was this!

“An old musketeer can still fare well; he could prime his powder, and give fire, and hit, all in the twinkling of an eye!”

Lovewit, an older man, was hinting that he had consummated the marriage.

Sir Epicure Mammon returned and said, “The whole nest has fled!”

“What sort of birds were they?” Lovewit asked.

“A kind of choughs, or thievish daws, sir, who have picked my purse of eight score and ten pounds within these five weeks.”

Choughs are a kind of crow, and daws are jackdaws. These are birds that sometimes steal shiny items.

He continued, “In addition, I paid for the first materials — coals and chemicals — and my goods are lying in the cellar, which I am glad they have been left because I may still take them home.”

“Do you think so, sir?” Lovewit said.

“Yes.”

“You may have them by order of law, sir, but not otherwise,” Lovewit said. “A court must rule that these are your goods.”

“I can’t have my own goods!” Sir Epicure Mammon said.

“Sir, I can have no knowledge that they are yours, except by public laws,” Lovewit said. “If you can bring a legal certificate that you were gulled of them, or out of a court law any formal writ that you did cheat yourself, I will not hold them.”

Lovewit knew what had happened. Sir Epicure Mammon had cheated himself by trusting con men. And, of course, he had been cheated. As a later con man, W.C. Fields, would say, “You can’t cheat an honest man.”

“I’d rather lose them,” Sir Epicure Mammon said.

If he were to testify in a court of law, everyone would know what a fool he had been.

Lovewit said, “You shall not lose your goods because of me, sir. Upon these terms I have given, they are yours. Were they all to have been, sir, turned into gold?”

Sir Epicure Mammon said, “No, I cannot tell — it may be they would have been — what then?”

He was unwilling to admit that an alchemist had cheated him.

Lovewit said, "What a great loss in hope you have sustained!"

"Not I," Sir Epicure Mammon said. "The commonwealth has."

He was thinking of all the good he could have done with the alchemical gold, and he was not mentioning the decadent lifestyle he would have lived.

Face said, "Yes, he would have built the city anew and made around it a silver ditch, which would have run with cream from Hogsden so that, every Sunday, in Moorfields, the youngers and tits and tomboys would have drunk the cream, gratis."

Youngers are young men, tits are young women, and tomboys are boisterous girls. "Gratis" means "free of charge."

Sir Epicure Mammon said, "I will go and mount a turnip cart, and preach the end of the world, within these two months."

Itinerant preachers often stood on a farm cart to preach.

He looked at Surly and said, "Surly, wake up! Are you in a dream?"

Surly had been thinking about his own losses: Dame Pliant and her fortune. If he had married her without revealing that he was not a Spanish Don, she would be his. Instead, he had been honest and had revealed to her who he really was. Also, he had left her to reveal to his friend Sir Epicure Mammon that Sir Epicure was being cheated.

Surly said, “Must I necessarily cheat myself with that same foolish vice of honesty! Come, let us go and search for the rogues. That Face I’ll mark for mine, if ever I meet him.”

He meant that he would single Face out for punishment and that he would mark Face’s face with his fists.

Face said, “If I ever hear of him, sir, I’ll bring word to your lodging, for indeed they were strangers to me. I thought they were as honest as myself, sir.”

Lovewit appreciated the wit.

Sir Epicure Mammon and Surly exited. So did the police officers.

Ananias and Tribulation Wholesome returned.

Tribulation Wholesome said to Ananias, “It is well; the saints shall not lose all yet. Go, and get some carts —”

“For what, my zealous friends?” Lovewit asked.

Ananias said, “To bear away the portion of the righteous out of this den of thieves.”

“What is that portion?” Lovewit asked.

“The goods that used to be the orphans’, that the brethren bought with their silver pence,” Ananias replied.

“What, those in the cellar that the Knight Sir Epicure Mammon claims?” Lovewit asked.

Ananias said, “I do defy the wicked Mammon, as do all the brethren, you profane man! I ask you with what conscience you can advance that idol against us, who have the seal of God?”

He was referring to Revelation 9:4: “And it was commanded them that they should not hurt the grass of the earth, neither any green thing, neither any tree; but only those men which have not the seal of God in their foreheads” (King James Version).

Ananias continued, “Were not the shillings numbered that made the pounds? Were not the pounds counted out, upon the second day of the fourth week, in the eighth month, upon the table, the year of the last patience of the saints, six hundred and ten?”

By “the second day of the fourth week, in the eighth month,” he meant 23 October. In the calendar Anabaptists used, the first month was March.

By the “last patience of the saints,” he meant the thousand years before the Second Coming.

By “six hundred and ten,” he meant the year 1610. According to Ananias, the Second Coming would occur in the year 2000 C.E.

Lovewit said to Ananias, “My earnest vehement botcher and deacon also, I cannot dispute religion with you verbally, but unless you get yourselves away from here very soon, I shall confute you with a cudgel.”

A botcher can be 1) someone who performs a task poorly, and/or 2) a tailor who repairs clothing rather than making new items of clothing.

“Sir!” Ananias said.

“Be calm, Ananias,” Tribulation Wholesome said.

“I am strong, and I will stand up, well girt, against a host of enemies who threaten Gad in exile,” Ananias said.

Genesis 49:19 predicted eventual victory for Gad: “Gad, a troop shall overcome him: but he shall overcome at the last” (King James Version).

Lovewit said, "I shall send you to Amsterdam, to your cellar."

"I will pray there against your house," Ananias said. "May dogs defile and pee on your walls, and wasps and hornets breed beneath your roof, this seat of falsehood, and this cave of cheating!"

Ananias and Tribulation Wholesome exited.

Drugger arrived.

Lovewit asked, "Another one, too?"

Drugger replied, "Not I, sir, I am no brother."

He meant that he was not a Puritan brother.

Lovewit beat him and said, "Go away, you Harry Nicholas! Dare you talk?"

By "Harry Nicholas," Lovewit meant Harry Niclaes, an Anabaptist mystic whose sect Queen Elizabeth I suppressed and banned in 1580.

Drugger exited.

Face said to Lovewit, "No, he was no Anabaptist. This man was Abel Drugger."

He then said to the parson, "Good sir, go and give him information. Tell him all is over: The widow has been married. He stayed at home too long, washing his face. He shall hear of the Doctor Subtle at Chester and of Captain Face at Yarmouth or some other good port town, waiting for a good wind so he can sail away."

Drugger would either go on a wild goose chase or simply not try to find the Doctor and the Captain and instead stay at home.

The parson exited.

Face said to Lovewit, “If you can get rid of the angry child, now, sir —”

Kastril entered the room, dragging in his sister.

Kastril said to her, “Come on, you ewe, you have matched most sweetly, haven’t you? Didn’t I say that I would never have you tuppéd except by a dubbed boy so that you would be made a lady-tom?”

When a ram has sex with an ewe, the ram is said to have tuppéd the ewe, according to Kastril’s country language. “A dubbed boy” is a Knight, and Kastril had wanted his sister to marry a Knight so that she could be a lady. “Tom” is short for “tomboy,” but Dame Pliant was hardly a boisterous girl.

Kastril added, “By God’s light, you are a mammet! Oh, I could touse you, now.”

A mammet is a doll or puppet. By “touse,” Kastril meant “beat.”

He added, “Death, must you marry a pox!”

Lovewit said, “You lie, boy. I am as sound — as healthy and as free of the pox, aka syphilis — as you, and I’m aforehand with you.”

Lovewit knew the rules of arguing. He drew his sword.

Kastril asked, “Do you want to duel at once?”

“Come, will you quarrel?” Lovewit said. “I will frighten you away, Sirrah. Why don’t you draw your weapon?”

Kastril was ok with beating his sister; he was not ok with being killed by Lovewit. Therefore, Kastril said, “By God’s light, this is as fine an old boy as ever I saw!”

“Do you change your tune now?” Lovewit said. “Proceed.”

He waved his sword and said, “Here stands my dove. Swoop at her, if you dare.”

Kastril said, “By God’s light, I must love and respect him! I cannot choose not to, indeed, even if I should be hanged for it!”

He then said, “Suster, I protest that I honor you for this wedding match.”

“Oh, you do, do you, sir?” Lovewit said.

“Yes,” Kastril said, “and if you can take tobacco and drink, old boy, I’ll give her five hundred pounds in dowry for her marriage — five hundred pounds in addition to her own estate.”

“Fill a pipe full, Jeremy,” Lovewit ordered.

“Yes, but go in and smoke it there, sir,” Face, aka Jeremy, replied.

“We will,” Lovewit said. “I will be ruled by you in anything, Jeremy.”

Lovewit really did love wit — intelligence and quick thinking.

Kastril said, “By God’s light, you are not hidebound — you are a jovy boy!” Come, let us go in, please, and take our whiffs of tobacco.”

A “jovy” boy is a jovial boy.

Lovewit replied, “Whiff in with your sister, brother boy.”

Kastril and his sister went inside.

Lovewit now said directly to you, the audience, “Any master who has received such happiness by means of a servant, in being provided with such a widow and so much wealth, would be very ungrateful if he would not be a little indulgent to that servant's wit and help that servant's fortune, though with some small strain of his own honor and reputation."

Lovewit had kept property that he knew belonged to other people.

He continued, "Therefore, gentlemen and kind spectators, if I have outstripped an old man's gravity or strict standard of conduct for an actor playing an old man, think what a young wife and a good brain may do."

The brain belonged to Face, aka Jeremy.

Lovewit added, "They may stretch age's truth sometimes, and crack it, too. I have behaved perhaps more vigorously than you would think an old man could, but so what?"

Lovewit then said to Face, aka Jeremy, "Speak for yourself, knave."

"So I will, sir," Face, aka Jeremy, replied.

Lovewit exited.

Face, aka Jeremy, then said directly to you, the audience, "Gentlemen, my part a little fell in this last scene, yet it was within the limits of what a character like mine can plausibly do. I started out doing good for myself only, but then I did good for my master. Please note that I did good only so that I could get out of trouble. I am as much of a scoundrel now as I was at the beginning. And although I have cleanly got away from Subtle, Surly, Sir Epicure Mammon, Doll, hot-tempered Ananias, Dapper, Drugger, and all with whom I traded and conned, yet I wish to avoid being punished by you. Therefore, I put my fate to you, who are my jury. Please know that if you acquit me, then this loot that I have gotten remains here, and I will feast you often, and I will invite new guests.”

Face, aka Jeremy, may have thought this: You don't think I'm going to let Lovewit have the loot, do you? No, I have promised these readers that I will use the loot to feast them if they find me innocent. (There's a name for that. What is it? Oh, yeah, a bribe.) And, of course, I will then treat the members of the audience the way I treat everyone else: I will cheat them, and I will find new people to cheat.

But the actor playing Face, aka Jeremy, may have thought this: Yes, the character I was playing cleanly got away from Subtle, Surly, Sir Epicure Mammon, Doll, hot-tempered Ananias, Dapper, Drugger, and all with whom my character traded and conned, yet I the actor playing him wish to avoid being punished by you, the audience. Therefore, I put my fate to you, who are my jury. Please know that if you acquit me, then this loot — the cause of your laughter that I have gotten — remains here, and I will feast you often, and I will invite new guests. You can either see this play in the theater, or re-read this retelling in this book. Either way, the cause of much laughter still remains here, and I hope that new audience members and new readers will enjoy it.

NOTES (The Alchemist)

Steps of Creating the Philosopher's Stone

Probably some alchemists really believed that the philosopher's stone could be created, while others were merely con men. Since alchemy is not a science, we ought not to be surprised that different numbers of steps are said by different authors to be needed to create the philosopher's stone. And we ought not to be surprised that alchemists sometimes give alchemical terms different definitions in their writings.

When in the presence of Sir Epicure Mammon and other people they wish to con, Subtle and Face use many alchemical terms. These are real terms, but they are used to confuse the hearers and make Subtle and Face seem intelligent and knowledgeable. You readers of this book ought not to be worried about understanding the terms used by Subtle and Face because they are trying to confuse you, too.

In case you are interested, here are the twelve gates (steps) of creating the philosopher's according to English alchemist George Ripley (c. 1415-1490):

1. Calcination: "The breaking down of a substance by fierce heating and burning usually in an open crucible."

Source: <http://www.alchemywebsite.com/alch-pro.html>

2. Solution (or Dissolution): Dissolution is "[t]he dissolving or transforming of a substance into a liquid."

Source: <http://www.alchemywebsite.com/alch-pro.html>

3. Separation: "The making of two opposite components separate from each other. Often alternated with the conjunction process."

Source: <http://www.alchemywebsite.com/alch-pro.html>

4. Conjunction: “The joining of two opposite components, often seen as the union of the male and female, the subtle and gross, or even the elements.”

Source: <http://www.alchemywebsite.com/alch-pro.html>

5. Putrefaction: “The rotting of a substance, often under a prolonged gentle moist heat. Usually the matter becomes black.”

Source: <http://www.alchemywebsite.com/alch-pro.html>

6. Congelation: “Congelation is the process by which something congeals, or thickens.”

Source: <https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Congelation>

7. Cibation: “The feeding of the substance being acted upon in a flask, with some reagent, usually a liquid.”

Source: <http://www.alchemywebsite.com/alch-pro.html>

8. Sublimation: “This occurs when a solid is heated and gives off a vapour which condenses on the cool upper parts of the vessel as a solid, not going through a liquid phase. An example is sal ammoniac.”

Source: <http://www.alchemywebsite.com/alch-pro.html>

9. Fermentation: “The rotting of a substance, usually of an organic nature, often accompanied by the release of gas bubbles.”

Source: <http://www.alchemywebsite.com/alch-pro.html>

10. Exaltation: “An operation by which a substance is raised into a purer and more perfect nature.”

Source: <http://www.alchemywebsite.com/alch-pro.html>

11. Multiplication: This is refining the philosopher's stone to increase its potency so that a little of the philosopher's stone will turn a vast quantity of base metal into gold.

12. Projection: After the philosopher's stone was created, a small part of it would be cast onto molten base metal; the philosopher's stone would then turn the base metal to gold.

Equi clibanum* (Act 1, Scene 1)

This is a quote from John French — The Art of Distillation — Book I:

If you would make a heat with horse dung, the manner is this, viz., make a hole in the ground. Then lay one course of horse dung a foot thick, then a course of unslaked lime a foot thick, and then another of dung, as before. Then set in your vessel, and lay around it lime and horse dung mixed together. Press it down very hard. You must sprinkle it every other day with water. When it ceases to be hot, then take it out and put in more.

Cart and Horse (Act 1, Scene 1)

The long quotation below comes from William Andrews (1848-1908), Medieval Punishments: An Illustrated History of Torture. Skyhorse Publishing; 1st edition (August 1, 2013). P. 227. I ran across it while researching the punishment of cart and whip and found it interesting, so I wanted to share it with you.

A fire occurred at Olney in 1783, and during the confusion a man stole some ironwork. The crime was detected, and the man was tried and sentenced to be whipped at the cart's tail. [William] Cowper [1731-1800], the poet, was an eyewitness to the carrying out of the sentence, and in a letter to the Rev. John Newton gives an amusing account of it.

“The fellow,” wrote Cowper, “seemed to show great fortitude; but it was all an imposition. The beadle [parish constable, who was usually unpaid and part-time, according to Wikipedia] who whipped him had his left hand filled with red ochre [earthy pigment, aka color, in this case red], through which, after every stroke, he drew the lash of the whip, leaving the appearance of a wound upon the skin, but in reality not hurting him at all. This being perceived by the constable, who followed the beadle to see that he did his duty, he (the constable) applied the cane, without any such management or precaution, to the shoulders of the beadle.

“The scene now became interesting and exciting. The beadle could by no means be induced to strike the thief hard, which provoked the constable to strike harder; and so the double flogging continued, until a lass of Silver End, pitying the pitiful [full of pity] beadle, thus suffering under the hands of the pitiless [without pity] constable, joined the procession, and placing herself immediately behind the constable, seized him by his capillary club, and pulling him backward by the same, slapped his face with Amazonian fury.

“This concentration of events has taken up more of my paper than I intended, but I could not forbear to inform you how the beadle thrashed the thief, the constable the beadle, and the lady the constable, and how the thief was the only person who suffered nothing.”

The Seven Ages of Man (Act 2, Scene 1)

The long quotation below is from The Treasury of ancient and modern Times (1613). It is the seven ages of man, supposedly as according to the Greek author Proclus.

The FIRST AGE is called Infancy, containing the space of foure years. [Birth-4 years old)

The SECOND AGE containeth ten years, until he attain to the yeares of fourteen: this age is called Childhood. [4-14 years old]

The THIRD AGE consisteth of eight yeares, being named by our auncients Adolescencie or Youthhood; and it lasteth from fourteen, till two and twenty yeares be fully compleate. [14-22 years old]

The FOURTH AGE paceth on, till a man have accomplished two and fortie yeares, and is termed Young Manhood. [22-42 years old]

The FIFTH AGE, named Mature Manhood, hath (according to the said author) fifteen yeares of continuance, and therefore makes his progress so far as six and fifty yeares. [42-56 years old]

Afterwards, in adding twelve to fifty-six, you shall make up sixty-eight yeares, which reach to the end of the SIXT AGE, and is called Old Age. [56-68 years old]

The SEAVENTH and last of these seven ages is limited from sixty-eight yeares, so far as four-score and eight, being called weak, declining, and Decrepite Age. [68-88 years old]

If any man chance to goe beyond this age, (which is more admired than noted in many) you shall evidently perceive that he will returne to his first condition of Infancy againe. [88 years old and over]

I divided the quotation into paragraphs.

The source is a footnote to this book:

As you like it. All's well that ends well

By William Shakespeare, Joseph Dennie, Isaac Reed, Samuel Johnson, George Steevens, William Richardson, Edmond Malone, Edward Capell.

<http://tinyurl.com/m4qbw3t>

Here is Jacques speaking about the seven ages of man in William Shakespeare's As You Like It:

All the world's a stage,

And all the men and women merely players;

They have their exits and their entrances;

And one man in his time plays many parts,

His acts being seven ages. [First Age] At first the infant,

Mewling and puking in the nurse's arms;

[Second Age] And then the whining school-boy, with his satchel

And shining morning face, creeping like snail

Unwillingly to school. [Third Age] And then the lover,

Sighing like furnace, with a woeful ballad

Made to his mistress' eyebrow. [Fourth Age] Then a soldier,

Full of strange oaths, and bearded like the pard,

Jealous in honour, sudden and quick in quarrel,

Seeking the bubble reputation

Even in the cannon's mouth. [Fifth Age] And then the justice,

In fair round belly with good capon lin'd,

With eyes severe and beard of formal cut,

Full of wise saws and modern instances;

*And so he plays his part. [Sixth Age] The sixth age shifts
Into the lean and slipper'd pantaloon,
With spectacles on nose and pouch on side;
His youthful hose, well sav'd, a world too wide
For his shrunk shank; and his big manly voice,
Turning again toward childish treble, pipes
And whistles in his sound. [Seventh Age] Last scene of all,
That ends this strange eventful history,
Is second childishness and mere oblivion;
Sans teeth, sans eyes, sans taste, sans everything.*

Note: The above poem appeared in the Musarum Deliciae (1656). The Latin means The Muses' Delight.

Note: The fart emitted from Sir Henry Ludlow's butt in 1607: It was his commentary on a message from the House of Lords. Sir Henry Ludlow was a Member of Parliament. Ben Jonson mentions the fart in his Epigram 133.

Note: The lines “I (quoth another) it once soe chanced / That a great Man farted as hee danced” alludes to Edward de Vere, Earl of Oxford, who had the misfortune of farting in front of Queen Elizabeth I.

This is a short quotation from John Aubrey’s Brief Lives:

This Earle of Oxford, making of his low obeisance to Queen Elizabeth, happened to let a Fart, at which he was so abashed and ashamed that he went to Travell, 7 yeares. On his returne the Queen welcomed him home, and sayd, My Lord, I had forgott the Fart.

Succubae* versus Succubi (Act 2, Scene 2)

Late Latin succuba means “paramour,” “whore,” or “strumpet.” The plural is succubae. By 1587 (Oxford English Dictionary), it had come to mean “demon in female form.”

The plural is succubi.

Sir Epicure Mammon’s succubae may be whores with demonic overtones; however, it is likely that Sir Epicure Mammon would enjoy sleeping with female demons.

An incubus is a male demon who has sex with sleeping women. Succuba may have become succubus in imitation of incubus.

*In contrast to Aristotle, late antique and early medieval authorities (such as Virgil, Ovid, Pliny, and Isidor of Sevilla), rather than performing their own investigations, collected the available folk knowledge and myths to build a growing standard set of views on how to make living beings. Such sets typically recommended the carcasses of cows for creating the useful bees, an art called bougonia that greatly flourished, whereas those of horses and donkeys were only able to produce wasps and beetles, respectively. Late medieval Christian authorities, such as Albertus Magnus and Thomas Aquinas, basically repeated the received views but emphasized the importance of astrological influence. When some Renaissance authors tried to incorporate folk myths about goose and lambs growing on trees, criticism arose, but views on the spontaneous generation of simple animals and plants remained, with few exceptions (see Section 4), largely intact through the 18th century. Francis Bacon, in his utopia New Atlantis (1628), even devised an entire research program. Starting from freshly made simple organisms, higher species should be bred that perfectly meet human needs.*

Bougonia is also known as bugonia. Bugonia gets many more hits on computer searches.

Wikipedia's article on "Bugonia" states this:

In the ancient Mediterranean region, bugonia or bougonia was a ritual based on the belief that bees were spontaneously (equivocally) generated from a cow's carcass, although it is possible that the ritual had more currency as a poetic and learned trope than as an actual practice.

<https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Bugonia>

Part of Book 4 of Virgil's Georgics is about the autogenesis of bees in a carcass of a bull prepared by human beings for this purpose. John Dryden translated the below lines:

First, in a place, by Nature closs, they build

A narrow Flooring, gutter'd, wall'd, and til'd.

In this, four Windows are contriv'd, that strike

To the four Winds oppos'd, their Beams oblique. (420)

A Steer of two Years old they take, whose Head

Now first with burnish'd Horns begins to spread:

They stop his Nostrils, while he strives in vain

To breath free Air, and struggles with his Pain.

Knock'd down, he dyes: his Bowels bruis'd within, (425)

Betray no Wound on his unbroken Skin.

Extended thus, in this obscene Abode,

They leave the Beast; but first sweet Flow'rs are strow'd

A Note on Ananias (Act 2, Scene 5)

Ananias appears in Acts 5:1-10; he is a man who withholds money that belonged to the community.

Acts 5:1-10 — King James Version (KJV)

I But a certain man named Ananias, with Sapphira his wife, sold a possession,

2 And kept back part of the price, his wife also being privy to it, and brought a certain part, and laid it at the apostles' feet.

3 But Peter said, Ananias, why hath Satan filled thine heart to lie to the Holy Ghost, and to keep back part of the price of the land?

4 Whiles it remained, was it not thine own? and after it was sold, was it not in thine own power? why hast thou conceived this thing in thine heart? thou hast not lied unto men, but unto God.

5 And Ananias hearing these words fell down, and gave up the ghost: and great fear came on all them that heard these things.

6 And the young men arose, wound him up, and carried him out, and buried him.

7 And it was about the space of three hours after, when his wife, not knowing what was done, came in.

8 And Peter answered unto her, Tell me whether ye sold the land for so much? And she said, Yea, for so much.

9 Then Peter said unto her, How is it that ye have agreed together to tempt the Spirit of the Lord? behold, the feet of them which have buried thy husband are at the door, and shall carry thee out.

10 Then fell she down straightway at his feet, and yielded up the ghost: and the young men came in, and found her dead, and, carrying her forth, buried her by her husband.

A different, better Ananias — a man who baptized Saul of Tarsus, who became Saint Paul — appears in Acts 9:10-18:

Acts 9:10-18 — King James Version (KJV)

10 And there was a certain disciple at Damascus, named Ananias; and to him said the Lord in a vision, Ananias. And he said, Behold, I am here, Lord.

11 And the Lord said unto him, Arise, and go into the street which is called Straight, and enquire in the house of Judas for one called Saul, of Tarsus: for, behold, he prayeth,

12 And hath seen in a vision a man named Ananias coming in, and putting his hand on him, that he might receive his sight.

13 Then Ananias answered, Lord, I have heard by many of this man, how much evil he hath done to thy saints at Jerusalem:

14 And here he hath authority from the chief priests to bind all that call on thy name.

15 But the Lord said unto him, Go thy way: for he is a chosen vessel unto me, to bear my name before the Gentiles, and kings, and the children of Israel:

16 For I will shew him how great things he must suffer for my name's sake.

17 And Ananias went his way, and entered into the house; and putting his hands on him said, Brother Saul, the Lord, even Jesus, that appeared unto thee in the way as thou camest, hath sent me, that thou mightest receive thy sight, and be filled with the Holy Ghost.

18 And immediately there fell from his eyes as it had been scales: and he received sight forthwith, and arose, and was baptized.

The Ananias of this play is perhaps named after the good Ananias of Acts 9:10-18, but Subtle pretends to believe that he was named after the bad Ananias of Acts 5:1-10.

Rebus (Act 2, Scene 6)

A rebus is a cryptic representation of a name, word, phrase, or even sentence, using pictures and letters. Subtle creates a rebus for Abel Drugger in Act 2, Scene 6.

In his memoir of W. Camden, Thomas Moule wrote this:

Did not that amorous youth mystically express his love to Rose Hill, whom he courted, when in the border of his painted cloth, he caused to be painted, as rudely as he devised grossly, a Rose, an Hill, an Eye, a Loaf, and a Well? That is, if you will spell it:

“Rose Hill I love well.”

I can't say I understand the use of the picture of a loaf. It seems to me that the sentence should be this:

“Rose Hill I bred well.”

Or, if the picture of the loaf is supposed to represent a word that sounds like “loaf,” it seems to me that the sentence should be this:

“Rose Hill I loath well.”

“Loaf” as a verb means “to form a loaf” (the Oxford English Dictionary has a citation from 1578). Perhaps the sentence should be this:

“Rose Hill I put a bun in her oven well.”

But “loaf” as “love” may be correct. Today's online Urban Dictionary has an entry for “I loaf you,” which it defines in this way:

meaning “I love you” but in a friendly yet mocking way. Noting [Nothing?] about love and relationship. All about nonsense and real friendship.

By the way, a footnote tells this joke:

This reminds us of a Down-South in the days of our grandfathers, who replied to an offer of marriage with a stroke produced by the end of a burnt stick and a lock of wool pinned to the paper, "I wull!" ["I wool!" aka "I will!"]

Urine and Love Potion (Act 2, Scene 6)

Captain Face knows a witch who can make a love potion from a glass of Druggers' water, aka urine.

As shown in William Shakespeare's Macbeth, disgusting ingredients are used in magic.

Here is an example of a love potion, one of whose ingredients is urine from the woman the man wishes would love him:

"When a young man is trying to win the love of a reluctant girl he consults the medicine-man, who then tries to find some of the urine and saliva which the girl has voided, as well as the sand upon which it has fallen. He mixes these with a few twigs of certain woods, and places them in a gourd, and gives them to the young man, who takes them home, and adds a portion of tobacco. In about an hour he takes out the tobacco and gives it to the girl to smoke; this effects a complete transformation in her feelings." — ("Conversation with Muhongo," an African boy from Angola, translated by Rev. Mr. Chatelain.)

Quarrels (Act 2, Scene 6)

In William Shakespeare's As You Like It, Touchstone, a Professional Fool, aka Jester, explained the rules for quarreling. This is a retelling of that conversation in modern English:

“Let me explain, sir. I disliked the cut of a certain courtier’s beard. He sent me word that if I said his beard was not cut well, he was of the opinion that it was cut well. This is called the Retort Courteous.

“If I sent him word again that it was not well cut, he would send me word that he cut it to please himself. This is called the Quip Modest.

“If I sent him word again that it was not well cut, he would send me word that he did not value my judgment. This is called the Reply Churlish.

“If I sent him word again that it was not well cut, he would answer that I did not speak the truth. This is called the Reproof Valiant.

“If I sent him word again that it was not well cut, he would say that I lied. This is called the Counter-cheque Quarrelsome.

“The two that are left are the Lie Circumstantial and the Lie Direct.”

“How often did you say that his beard was not well cut?” Jaques asked.

“I dared go no further than the Lie Circumstantial, and he dared not give me the Lie Direct, and so we measured swords, said that they were uneven in length and therefore fighting a duel would not be fair combat, and we parted.”

The above is an excerpt from my book William Shakespeare's As You Like It: A Retelling in Prose.

Pillory and Ears Cut Off (Act 3, scene 2)

The below is a quotation from an article titled “Anglicans and Puritans”:

When James died in 1625 he was replaced by his son Charles I. The Puritans became very angry when Charles married Henrietta Maria, a Catholic Princess. They also became worried when Catholic lords began to be given important posts in Charles' court.

In 1633 Charles appointed William Laud as Archbishop of Canterbury. Laud soon began to introduce changes. For example, he ordered that the wooden communion table should be replaced by a stone altar. This area was also separated from the congregation by wooden railings. He also insisted that ministers should display candles and ornaments.

The Puritans claimed that Laud was trying to make English churches look like those in Catholic countries. When Puritans complained about these reforms. Laud had them arrested. In 1637 John Bastwick, Henry Burton and William Prynne had their ears cut off for writing pamphlets attacking Laud's views.

<http://spartacus-educational.com/TUDanglicans.htm>

John Bastwick, Henry Burton and William Prynne were all Puritans.

The quote below is from the Wikipedia article on Alexander Leighton:

Leighton published his controversial pamphlet Zion's plea against Prelacy: An Appeal to Parliament in 1628 in Holland. In this publication, he criticised the church, and in particular the Bishops who then ruled the Church of Scotland, condemning them as "anti-Christian and satanic". He was sentenced by Archbishop William Laud's High Commission Court to public whipping, to having the letters 'SS' branded on him (for 'Sower of Sedition'), and having his ears cut off. Medical records say that, "since he had been censured by the Star Chamber on religious grounds (& had had his ears cropped)", that he should now be 'infamis' in his profession, and he was permanently banned from further practice. John Taylor Brown, writing in Encyclopædia Britannica, expressed the opinion that Leighton's persecution and punishment "form one of the most disgraceful incidents of the reign of King Charles I".

Once the warrant for his arrest was issued by the High Commission Court, Leighton was taken to William Laud's house and then to Newgate prison without any trial. He was put in irons in solitary confinement in an unheated and uncovered cell for fifteen weeks, in which the rain and snow could beat in upon him. None of his friends nor even his wife were permitted to see him during this time. According to four doctors, Leighton was so sick that he was unable to attend his supposed sentencing. Durant notes that Leighton also “was tied to a stake and received thirty-six stripes with a heavy cord upon his naked back; he was placed in the pillory for two hours in November’s frost and snow; he was branded in the face, had his nose split and his ears cut off, and was condemned to life imprisonment”. He was only released from jail when his son Robert was ordained as a Minister at Newbattle.

In the end, the Star Chamber’s sentence was not carried out in full. The Long Parliament released him from prison in 1640, when they cancelled his fine, and paid him 6000 pounds for his suffering. In 1642, Leighton was appointed Keeper of Lambeth House, which had been converted into a prison.

Queen of the Fairies Con (Act 3, Scene 5)

Such cons as this really did happen in the time of Ben Jonson.

In 1595, Judith Philips, known as the Bankside cunning-woman, was whipped because she conned people into paying her money to meet the Queen of Fairy.

In 1609, Thomas Rogers, who believed that he was engaged to marry the Queen of Fairy, sued the conmen Sir Anthony Ashley and his brother in Chancery.

In 1613 (The Alchemist was first performed in 1610), Alice and John West were convicted of posing as the Queen and King of Fairy in order to get money from suckers who wanted fairy gold.

Subtle's Knowledge (Act 4, Scene 2)

In this act and scene, Subtle shows a great knowledge of quarreling, palmistry, phrenology, and fortune telling. Of course, throughout The Alchemist, he shows a great knowledge of alchemy.

Jonson scholar F.H. Mares writes, "Subtle's palmistry, like his alchemy, is learned and can be documented. Jonson does not invent what he ridicules" (134).

Jonson, Ben. The Alchemist. Ed. F.H. Mares. Cambridge, Massachusetts: Harvard University Press, 1867.

"He owes this honest Druggier here, seven pound, He has had on him, in two-penny'orths of tobacco." (Act 4, Scene 7)

Christopher M. Burlinson wrote this in "Ben Jonson's Money":

[...] coins of higher denomination are worth considerable sums in modern money: an angel would be the equivalent of several hundred early twenty-first-century pounds, and every pound mentioned by Jonson would be worth thousands of pounds. Other indexes of purchasing power (see 'How Much is that Worth Today?' website), though, suggest that a pound from c. 1600 is worth closer to a hundred pounds from c. 2000. The truth may be not just that the difficulty of comparing costs of living and ways of life over hundreds of years will always make these comparisons rather arbitrary, but that many of the sums mentioned in Jonson's plays are so large that it is their very magnitude, rather than their exact value, that we are meant to appreciate.

Green Sickness (Act 4, Scene 6)

According to this anonymous folk song, a cure for the green sickness is sex.

A REMEDY FOR THE GREEN SICKNESS

I

A handsome buxom lass lay panting on her bed,
She looked as green as grass, and mournfully she said:
Except I have some lusty lad to ease me of my pain,
I cannot live, I sigh and grieve,
My life I now disdain.

But if some bonny lad would be so kind to me,
Before I am quite mad, to end my misery,
And cool these burning flames of fire
Which rage in this my breast,
Then I should be from torments free and be forever blest.

I am both young and fair, yet 'tis my fortune hard,
I'm ready to despair, my pleasures are debarred:
And I, poor soul, cannot enjoy nor taste of lover's bliss,
Whilst others meet, those joys so sweet,
Oh! what a life is this.

Were but my passion known, sure some would pity me,
That lie so long alone, for want of company.
Had I some young man in my arms
That would be brisk and brave,

My pains would end,
He'd prove my friend,
And keep me from my grave.

From this tormenting pain I cannot long endure,
My hopes are all in vain if I expect a cure,
Without some thund'ring lad comes in
And with a courage bold,
Grant me delight,
I'd him requite,
With silver and with gold.

II

A gallant lively lad that in the next room lay,
It made his heart full glad to hear what she did say.
Into the room immediately this youngster he did rush,
Some words he spoke,
Love to provoke,
But she straight cried out, Hush!

My father he will hear and then we're both undone,
Quoth he, love do not fear, I'll venture for a son.
The coverlet he then threw off and jumped into the bed,
And in a trice,
He kissed her twice,
Then to his chamber fled.

And blushing all alone this damsel sweating lay,
Her troubles they were gone, thus softly did she say:
Had I but known that lover's bliss
Had been so sweet a taste,
I'd ne'er have stayed,
Nor begged nor prayed,
That so much time did waste.

This lusty youthful boy, that banished all my pain,
I must his love enjoy ere it be long again.
For gold and silver I'll not spare
Can that his courage prove,
He has an art, without all smart,
Green sickness to remove.

A sigh she gave and said, Oh! come again to me,
For I am half afraid I shall not cured be
At this first bout, then prithee try
To help me once again;
Count me not bold, I'll give thee gold
Enough for all thy pain.

THE SCENE: ROME

NOTES:

An arraignment is a calling to account, such as calling an accused person into a courtroom to defend him- or herself. Or it can mean a denunciation.

In Ben Jonson's society, a person of higher rank would use "thou," "thee," "thine," and "thy" when referring to a person of lower rank. (These terms were also used affectionately and between equals.) A person of lower rank would use "you" and "your" when referring to a person of higher rank.

"Sirrah" was a title used to address someone of a social rank inferior to the speaker. Friends, however, could use it to refer to each other.

The word "wench" in Ben Jonson's time was not necessarily negative. It was often used affectionately.

The poetaster, Crispinus, is a parody of the playwright John Marston, with whom Ben Jonson had a feud. The two men were sometimes frienemies.

Ben Jonson's play conflates Julia the Elder (Augustus Caesar's daughter), and Julie the Younger (Augustus Caesar's granddaughter, the daughter of Julia the Elder).

Roman Offices

Consuls: The office of Consul was the highest political office of the Roman Republic. Two Consuls were elected each year and served for one year.

Praetors: A Praetor can be 1) the commander of an army, or 2) a magistrate. The office of Praetor (magistrate) was the second highest political office of the Roman Republic. They were subject only to the veto of the Consuls. Praetors could take the auspices, the performance of which was a religious rite. Taking the auspices was a way of (supposedly) foretelling the future.

Lictors: Lictors served the Consuls and carried rods and axes as symbols of the Senators' authority. Rods were symbols of the Consuls' power to inflict corporal punishment, and axes were symbols of their power to inflict capital punishment. Lictors executed punishments on people who had been convicted of serious crimes.

Tribunes: Tribunes were administrative officers. Some were judicial Tribunes, and some were military Tribunes.

Aediles: An Aedile was a Roman magistrate who was in charge of maintaining public buildings. They also organized public festivals and were in charge of weights and measures.

Censors: They supervised public morality and maintained the census.

Prefects: They had civil or military power, but that power was delegated to them from others.

Praecons: Heralds. Criers in meetings of the Senate. They cried loudly things during a trial, such as "Silence!"

THE INDUCTION (The Arraignment, or Poetaster)

The induction — introduction — of this play began with the second sounding of a trumpet. The first sounding was a warning for the audience to begin taking their seats. The third sounding would be a notice that the play was starting. Envy arrived at the second sounding in order to speak before the real Prologue arrived.

Like other denizens of hell in plays, Envy arose from a trapdoor in the stage floor. Several snakes were entwined around her arms and hung from her neck.

Envy said to herself, “Light, I salute thee, but with wounded nerves, wishing that thy golden splendor were pitchy darkness.”

Some plays at this time had the title of the play written on a title board on stage.

Envy looked at the title board and said, “What’s here? The Arraignment? Aye: this, this is it that our sunken eyes have stayed awake and waited for all this while. Here will be the subject matter for my snakes and me.

“Cling to my neck and wrists, my loving worms — my loving snakes — and cast yourselves round in soft and amorous folds until I bid thee to uncurl. Then break your knots and shoot out yourselves at length, as if your forced stings would hide themselves within the regarded-with-malice sides of him to whom I shall apply you.”

Envy was hostile to Ben Jonson, the playwright. She wanted her snakes of envy to bite his sides, which she hated, and she would force them to do that.

Envy looked at the audience and the stage candles and said, “Wait! The shine of this assembly here offends my sight. I’ll darken that first and outface — confront and disconcert — their grace.”

Envy blew out some candles that provided light for the stage.

She then said to the audience:

“Don’t marvel if I stare and glare at you. These past fifteen weeks — as long as it took Ben Jonson to turn the embryo of the plot into a finished play — have I with burning lights — my eyes — mixed vigilant thoughts in expectation of this hated play, which will criticize envious slanderers. But now at last I have arrived as its Prologue.

“Nor would I desire that you should look for other looks, gestures, or expressions of compliment and courtesy from me than what the infected bulk — breast — of Envy can furnish.

“For I have arisen here with a covetous hope to blast your pleasures and destroy your sports with wrong-headed wrestings of meanings, wrong-headed comments and explanations, wrong-headed applications of supposed allusions to real people and real events, spy-like suggestions, private whisperings, and a thousand such promoting sleights and sly tricks as these.

Envy was planning on traducing the play with her lies and false interpretations.

She said, “Closely notice how I will begin: the scene is —”

She then looked at the location signs on stage.

Envy said, “Ha! ‘Rome’? ‘Rome’? And ‘Rome’?”

She then said to herself:

“Crack, eye-strings, and let your eyeballs drop onto the earth! Let me be forever blind!

“I am forestalled; all my hopes are crossed, checked, and abated. Bah, a freezing sweat flows forth at all my pores; my entrails burn!

“What should I do? ‘Rome’? ‘Rome’?”

“O my vexed soul, how might I force an application of this play to the present state?”

In other words: If this play is set in Rome, how could it apply to England and its government and society?

Obviously, it could apply to England and its government and society and to many other countries and their governments and societies. And it could apply to many different times, not just the present time. Satire is like that.

Obviously, Ben Jonson knew that, but he was afraid of being sued for libel.

If you want to satirize an Englishman, the safe thing to do is to pretend that the Englishman is a Roman.

Envy peered into the audience and said:

“Are there no actors here? No poet-apes — poor poets who try to imitate real poets — who come with basilisks’ eyes, whose forked tongues are steeped in venom, as their hearts are steeped in gall?”

A basilisk was a mythological monster that could kill with a glance.

Envy continued:

“Either of these would help me; they could wrest, pervert, and poison all they hear or see with senseless glosses, interpretations, explanatory notes, and allusions.”

Envy began to address the “good” devils she hoped were in the audience:

“Now, if you are good devils, don’t flee from me.

“You know what dear, precious, and ample faculties I have endowed you good devils with; I’ll lend you more.

“Here, take my snakes among you, come, and eat, and while the squeezed juice flows in your black jaws, help me to damn the author.”

Black jaws are those that spew forth slander and malicious envy.

In art, Envy was often depicted as eating a snake.

Envy continued:

“Spit the juice forth upon his lines, and show your rusty — discolored and rotten — teeth at every word or accent.

“Or else each of you choose one of my longest vipers, to stick down in your deep throats, and let the heads come forth at your rank — gross and stinky — mouths so that he may see you armed with triple malice, to hiss, sting, and tear his work and him.

“The snake heads and their forked tongues may forge lies, and then declaim, traduce, corrupt, apply, spy and inform the authorities, suggest —

“Oh, these are gifts wherein your souls are blest.”

No “good devils” spoke up. No one was willing to defame Ben Jonson.

Envy said:

“What! Do you hide yourselves? Will none appear? None answer? What! Does his calm troop of audience members frighten you?

“Nay, then I do despair.”

She said to herself:

“Down, sink again. This travail is all lost with my dead hopes.”

Envy had traveled and labored — travailed — to say the prologue.

She continued:

“If in such bosoms spite have left to dwell,

“Envy is not on earth, nor scarcely in hell.”

Envy partially descended back into hell.

The trumpet sounded for the third time and the real Prologue, who was wearing armor, appeared on stage.

The Prologue said to Envy:

“Wait, monster, before thou sink beneath the stage.”

The Prologue placed a foot on Envy’s head and said:

“Thus on thy head we set our bolder, stronger foot, with which we tread thy malice into earth.”

As Envy descended into hell, the Prologue said, “So spite should die, despised and scorned by noble industry such as the industry spent in writing this play.”

Envy disappeared, and the Prologue said:

“If anyone should muse why I greet the stage in the guise of an armed Prologue, know that it is a dangerous age, wherein who writes had better present his scenes forty-fold proof against the conjuring, secretly-working-together means of base detractors and illiterate apes that fill up theater seats in fair and well-formed shapes.

“Against these we have put on this defense we are forced to wear, whereof the allegory and hidden sense is that a well-erected confidence can frighten their pride and laugh their folly away from here.

“Here now, suppose that our author should once more swear that his play were good — he implores you to not accuse him of arrogance, however much that common spawn of ignorance, our small-fry writers, may slime his fame and give his action that adulterated, corrupt name and title of arrogance.

“Such full-blown vanity he loathes more than base dejection; there’s a mean between both. With a constant firmness he pursues that mean, as one who knows the strength of his own muse. And this he hopes all free souls will allow.

“Others, who take with a rugged brow and frown of displeasure his assertion that this play is good,

“Their moods he rather pities than maliciously envies.

“His mind is above their injuries.”

ACT 1 (The Arraignment, or Poetaster)

— 1.1 —

Publius Ovid read out loud from the new poem he was working on:

“Then, when this body falls in funeral fire,

“My name shall live, and my best part aspire.”

He then said, “It shall go so: My poem will end with these lines.”

Luscus, his servant and the servant of Ovid’s father, Marcus Ovid, aka Ovid Senior, entered the room and said, “Young master, Master Ovid, do you hear me? God save me! Away with your songs and sonnets and on with your gown and cap, quickly — here, here —”

He handed Ovid the garments.

Law students in Ben Jonson’s England wore distinctive caps and gowns.

Luscus continued, “Your father will be a man of this room quickly. Come — nay, nay, nay, nay, be quick.”

He took Ovid’s poem from him and said, “These verses, too, a poison on them, I cannot abide them, they make me ready to vomit, by the banks of Helicon. Look what a rascally untoward — improper and foolish — thing this poetry is; I could tear them — your poems — now.”

Helicon was a mountain sacred to the Muses. Its springs were also sometimes called Helicon.

As he took back his poem, Ovid said, “Give it to me.”

He then asked, “How near is my father?”

Luscus answered, “By the heart of man! Get a law book in your hand; I will not answer you otherwise.”

Ovid picked up a law book.

Luscus continued, “Why, good; now there’s some formality in you. By Jove and three or four of the gods more, I am right of my old master’s humor and opinion about that — we have the same opinion about your poems: This villainous poetry will undo you, by the welkin, aka heavens.”

“What! Have thou buskins on, Luscus, that thou swear so tragically and high?” Ovid asked.

Buskins are thick-soled boots worn by actors in tragedies to give them added height and gravitas.

Luscus replied, “No, but I have boots on and I am prepared and ready for anything, sir, and your father also has boots on, too, by this time, for he called for them before I came from the lodging where he is staying in the city.”

“Why, was he no more dressed than that?” Ovid asked.

Luscus said, “Oh, no; and there was the mad skeldering — begging — captain with the velvet arms — weapons carried in velvet scabbards — ready to lay hold on him as he comes down from his room — he who presses every man he meets, with an oath, to lend him money, and cries, ‘Thou must do it, old boy, as thou are a man, a man of worship and worthiness.’”

“Who, Pantilius Tucca?” Ovid asked.

“Aye, he,” Luscus answered, “and I met little Master Lupus, the Tribune, going thither, too.”

Ovid said, “If my father is under their arrest — if Tucca and Lupus are detaining him — I may with safety enough read over my elegy before he comes here.”

He put down the law book and picked up his poem.

“God save me!” Luscus said. “What’ll you do? Why, young master, you are not Castalian-mad, lunatic, frantic, desperate? Huh? Are you?”

A Castalian-mad man is a poet made mad by poetic inspiration. The nymph Castalia turned herself into a spring at Delphi to escape the god Apollo. People who drank its waters became poetically inspired.

“What ails thou, Luscus?” Ovid said. “What is wrong with you?”

“God be with you, sir, and goodbye,” Luscus said. “I’ll leave you to your poetical fancies and furies. I’ll not be guilty of encouraging you in such pursuits, I.”

Luscus exited.

“Don’t be guilty of that, good Ignorance,” Ovid said.

“Good Ignorance” referred to Luscus.

Ovid continued:

“I’m glad thou are gone, for thus alone, our ear shall better judge the hasty errors of our morning muse.”

He began to read his new poem out loud:

“Envy, why twitt’st thou me [by saying] my time’s spent ill

“And call’st my verse fruits of an idle quill?”

“Or that, unlike the [family] line from whence I sprung, “War’s dusty honors I pursue not young?

“Or that I study not the tedious laws

“And prostitute my voice in every cause?”

“Thy scope is mortal, mine [is] immortal, fame,

“Which through the world shall ever chant my name.

“Homer will live whilst Tenedos stands, and Ide [Ida],

“Or to the sea fleet Simois doth [does] slide;”

Ovid wished to pursue immortal fame as a poet rather than be a soldier or a lawyer. Homer and other poets had achieved immortal fame for their poetry.

Homer is the author of the Iliad and the Odyssey. These works will last as long as Tenedos (an island), Ida (a mountain), and the Simois (a river), all of which are mentioned in Homer’s epic poems, last.

To end the Trojan War, Odysseus came up with the idea of the Trojan Horse. The Trojan War had been fought for 10 years, and the forces of Agamemnon and the other Greeks had not been able to conquer Troy by might, and so Odysseus had the idea of using trickery to conquer Troy. The Greeks built a huge wooden horse and left it outside Troy, and then they seemed to sail away in their ships and return home. However, the Trojan Horse was hollow and filled with Greek soldiers, including Odysseus, and the ships sailed behind an island called Tenedos so that the Trojans could not see them. A lying Greek named Sinon stayed behind and pretended that he had escaped from Odysseus, who had wanted to kill him. Sinon told the Trojans that if they were to take the Trojan Horse inside the walls of Troy, then Troy would never fall. Amid great rejoicing, the Trojans took the Trojan Horse inside the walls of Troy. That night, the Greek warriors came out of the Trojan Horse, went to the gates of Troy, killed the Trojan guards, and opened the gates of Troy. Agamemnon and his troops were outside the gates, after returning from hiding behind the island. The Greeks then conquered Troy.

Ovid continued to read his poem out loud:

“And so shall Hesiod, too, while vines do bear

“Or crooked sickles crop the ripened ear.”

Hesiod is the author of Works and Days, which praises labor and describes the five ages of Humankind, with the Age of Gold being the best.

Ovid continued to read his poem out loud:

“Callimachus, though in invention low,

“Shall still be sung, since he in art doth [does] flow.”

Callimachus is a Greek poet whom some critics such as Ben Jonson thought was skillful but not inspired.

Ovid continued to read his poem out loud:

“No loss shall come to Sophocles’ proud vein;”

Sophocles is the great Greek tragedian who wrote Oedipus the King, aka Oedipus Rex. In this tragedy, the Sphinx asks Oedipus this riddle: What goes on four legs in the morning, two legs at noon, and three legs in the evening? If Oedipus cannot answer this riddle correctly, the Sphinx will kill him. Fortunately, Oedipus does answer the riddle correctly: Man, who goes on hands and knees as a crawling baby, two legs as a healthy adult, and two legs and a cane as an old person.

Ovid continued to read his poem out loud:

“With sun and moon, Aratus shall remain.”

Aratus is a Greek poet who wrote about the constellations.

Ovid continued to read his poem out loud:

“Whilst slaves be false, fathers hard, and bawds be whorish,

“Whilst harlots flatter shall Menander flourish.”

Menander is a Greek comic playwright who wrote Dyskolos, aka The Misanthrope.

Ovid continued to read his poem out loud:

“Ennius, though rude [uneducated], and Accius’ high-reared strain

“A fresh applause in every age shall gain.”

Ennius, who used Greek literary models, is considered by some critics the father of Roman poetry.

Accius was a Roman tragedian who made free translations of plays by Greek tragedians, especially Aeschylus, who wrote the Oresteia, a trilogy of three tragedies: Agamemnon, The Libation Bearers, and The Eumenides. In the trilogy, Agamemnon returns home after he and the Greeks defeat Troy. His wife, Clytemnestra, who has taken a lover, murders him, and in turn, is murdered by their son, Orestes. The avenging spirits known as the Furies pursue him until finally the goddess Athena arranges a new function for them, transforming them into the Eumenides, aka the Kindly Ones.

Ovid continued to read his poem out loud:

“Of Varro’s name what ear shall not be told?

“Of Jason’s Argo, and the fleece of gold?”

The Roman writer Varro wrote about the Latin language.

Jason and his Argonauts built a ship named the Argo and sailed to Colchis to get the Golden Fleece. With the help of the witch Medea, they got the Golden Fleece and sailed home with it.

Ovid continued to read his poem out loud:

“Then shall Lucretius’ lofty numbers [verses] die

“When earth and seas in fire and flames shall fry.”

The Roman Lucretius wrote a book of philosophy titled De Rerum Natura, aka Concerning the Nature of Things.

Ovid continued to read his poem out loud:

“Tityrus, Tillage, Aenee [Aeneid] shall be read

“Whilst Rome of all the conquered world is head.”

These were three major works by Virgil. Tityrus is a narrator in Virgil’s Eclogues, aka Bucolics, about pastoral life. The Georgics is about farming, or tillage. The Aeneid is Virgil’s masterpiece. It tells the story of the Fall of Troy and how the Trojan prince Aeneas journeyed to Italy by way of Carthage to become an important ancestor of the Romans.

Ovid continued to read his poem out loud:

“Till Cupid’s fires be out and his bow broken

“Thy verses, neat [elegant] Tibullus, shall be spoken.

“Our Gallus shall be known from east to west;

“So shall Lycoris, whom he now loves best.”

Tibullus and Gallus were two of Ovid’s poet friends. Lycoris was the name Gallus gave to his lover in his poems.

Ovid continued to read out loud:

“The suffering plowshare or the flint may wear,

“But heavenly poesy [poetry] no death can fear.

“Kings shall give place to it, and kingly shows,

“The banks over which gold-bearing Tagus flows.”

The Tagus River divides Spain and Portugal.

Ovid continued to read his poem out loud:

“Kneel hinds [Boors kneel] to trash; me let bright Phoebus swell

“With cups full flowing from the Muses’ well.”

In other words: “Boors kneel to trash; let bright Phoebus Apollo, god of poetry, fill me with inspiration.”

Ovid continued to read his poem out loud:

“Frost-fearing myrtle [an evergreen shrub that symbolizes immortality] shall impale [encircle] my head,

“And by sad lovers I’ll be often read.

“Envy the living, not the dead, doth [does] bite,”

In other words: Envy bites the living, not the dead.

Ovid continued to read out loud:

“For after death all men receive their right.

“Then, when this body falls in funeral fire,

“My name shall live, and my best part aspire.”

As an evergreen, myrtle does not fear literal frost; however, it does fear frost-brained poetasters who cannot write good poetry.

— 1.2 —

Ovid Senior, Luscus, Tucca, and Lupus entered the room.

Tucca was a military man, sort of. He was also a conman, definitely. Lupus was an official: a Tribune.

Ovid Senior, Ovid’s father, who had heard the end of his son’s poem, said:

“Your name shall live indeed, sir; you say true; but you don’t think about how infamously, how scorned and contemned in the eyes and ears of the best and gravest Romans; you never so much as dream about that.

“Are these the fruits of all my travail and expenses? Is this the scope and aim of thy studies? Are these the hopeful courses wherewith I have so long flattered my expectation from thee?

“Verses? Poetry? Ovid, whom I thought to see the pleader in cases of law, has become Ovid the play-maker?”

“No, sir,” Ovid, his son, said.

Ovid Senior said:

“Yes, sir. I hear that a tragedy of yours is coming forth for the common actors there, called Medea.

“By my household gods, I swear that if I come to the acting of it, I’ll add one tragic part more than is yet expected to it; believe me when I promise it.”

The Roman household gods are the Lares and the Penates, the ancestral gods and the gods of the pantry. When Aeneas fled from fallen Troy, he carried his father on his back, and his father held the household gods.

Ovid Senior continued, “What! Shall I have my son a stager now? An ingle for actors? A gull? A rook? A shot-clog?”

A “stager” is a contemptuous term for a theater-man.

An “ingle” is a young boy who is used for homosexual sex, but the term can also refer to a friend.

Gulls and rooks are fools.

A shot-clog is a fool who is tolerated because he pays the bills.

Ovid Senior continued, “To make suppers and be laughed at? Publius, I will set thee on the funeral pile first.”

Publius Ovid, his son, said, “Sir, I beg you to have patience.”

Luscus said to Ovid:

“Nay, this it is to have your ears dammed up to good counsel.”

Luscus then said to the others:

“I did augur — predict — all this to him beforehand, without poring into an ox’s paunch for the matter, and yet he would not be scrupulous — that is, he would not be wary.”

Augurs are fortune-tellers who would examine the entrails of a sacrificed ox and then predict whether the future would be good or bad.

Tucca the military man said to Luscus:

“How is this now, goodman slave? What, roly poly? We are all rivals, rascal?”

A roly poly is a worthless person.

Tucca thought that Luscus, a servant, was trying to make himself the equal of Tucca and the others present.

Tucca was basically a beggar, and he was protective of what he regarded as his prerogatives. One way to build up yourself is to tear down others.

He then said to Ovid Senior:

“Why, my Master of Worship, do thou hear? Are these thy best projects?”

“Is this thy designs and thy discipline, to allow knaves to be competitors with commanders and gentlemen?”

Tucca then said to Luscus:

“Are we parallels, rascal? Are we equals?”

Tucca, a beggar of sorts, considered himself to be better than Luscus, who was a servant and worked for a living.

Ovid Senior said to Luscus, “Sirrah, go and get my horses ready. You’ll always be prating.”

Tucca said to Luscus, “Do, you perpetual stinkard, do — go, talk to tapsters and ostlers, you slave; they are in your element — go; here are the Emperor’s captains, you ragamuffin rascal, and not your comrades.”

Tapsters are bartenders, and ostlers take care of horses.

Luscus exited.

Lupus the Tribune (a magistrate) said to Ovid Senior:

“Indeed, Marcus Ovid, these actors are an idle generation — that is, an idle breed — and do much harm in a state. They corrupt young gentry very much. I know it. I have not been a Tribune thus long and observed nothing.

“Besides, they will rob us, us who are magistrates, of our respect, bring us upon their stages by representing us and make us ridiculous to the plebeians; they will play you, or me, the wisest men they can come by, always — me! — only to bring us in contempt with the vulgar people and make us cheap.”

The plebeians and the vulgar people were the common people. Patricians were the elite.

Lupus objected to being satirized in plays on stage.

Tucca said:

“Thee are in the right, my venerable cropshin — they will indeed.”

A cropshin is an inferior herring.

Tucca continued:

“The tongue of the oracle never twanged truer.”

Oracles prophesized; they did not twang.

Tucca continued:

“Your courtier cannot kiss his mistress’ slippers in quiet because of them, nor can your white — that is, pure — innocent gallant pawn his reveling suit — his party outfit — to buy his punk a supper.”

A punk is a prostitute.

Tucca, who was decayed (down on his luck) and whose honesty was questionable, continued:

“An honest decayed commander cannot skelder and con people, cheat, nor be seen in a bawdy house, but he shall immediately appear in one of their wormwood — bitter — comedies.

“They — the actors — are grown licentious, the rogues: They are libertines, complete libertines. They forget they are in the statute, the rascals.”

By statute, actors could be charged with being rogues or vagabonds unless their acting troupe had a high-ranking member of society as its patron.

Tucca continued:

“They are blazoned there; there they are tricked, they and their pedigrees; they need no other heralds, to be sure.

A blazon is a detailed heraldic description of a coat of arms or other heraldic device. A tricked coat of arms is an outline of a coat of arms. The Herald's College was authorized to issue coats of arms.

According to Tuca, the only kind of heralds that actors need is those who proclaim that the actors are scoundrels.

Ovid Senior said to his son the poet, "I think if nothing else, yet this alone, the reading of the public edicts against actors, should frighten thee away from commerce — contact — with them and give thee distaste enough of their actions. But this betrays what a student you are; this argues your 'proficiency' in the law."

He was arguing that his son in fact had contact with actors, so therefore his son was ignorant of or dismissive of the public edicts and so was a poor law student.

Ovid replied:

"They wrong me, sir, and do abuse you more, those who blow these untrue reports into your ears. I am not known to the open stage, nor do I traffic in their theaters."

An open stage is open for business, and/or it is a stage that is open to the elements — no roof.

Ovid continued:

"Indeed, I do acknowledge, at the request of some close friends and honorable Romans, I have begun a poem of that nature."

Ovid's poem was a play.

Ben Jonson considered himself a poet. He wrote poetry, and his plays contained verse as well as prose.

"You have, sir?" Ovid Senior said. "A poem? And where is it? Poetry is the 'law' you study."

“Cornelius Gallus borrowed it to read,” Ovid replied.

Ovid Senior said:

“Cornelius Gallus? There’s another gallant, fashionable gentleman, too, who has drunk of the same poison as you; and so have Tibullus, and Propertius.

“But these are gentlemen of means and revenue, now.

“In contrast, thou art a younger brother, and have nothing but thy bare exhibition, aka allowance or maintenance — which I protest shall be bare indeed if thou don’t forsake these unprofitable by-courses, and that timely, too.”

Under the principle of primogeniture, the oldest son inherited the bulk of the father’s wealth. Younger sons inherited little or nothing.

Ovid Senior was threatening to cut down or cut off Ovid’s allowance unless he stopped writing poetry.

Ovid Senior continued:

“Name me a professed poet whose poetry has ever afforded him so much as a competency: an adequate income.

“Aye, your god of poets there, whom all of you admire and reverence so much, Homer, he whose worm-eaten statue must not be spewed against — spit at — except with hallowed lips and groveling adoration, what was he? What was he?”

Tucca said to Ovid Senior, “By the Virgin Mary, I’ll tell thee, old swaggerer and quarreler: He was a poor, blind, rhyming rascal, who lived obscurely up and down in booths — temporary dwellings — and taphouses, and scarcely ever got a good meal even in his dreams, the whoreson hungry beggar.”

Actually, in Homer's Odyssey, the blind reciter of poetry, Demodocus, is well respected. After listening to him, Odysseus rewards him with the best cut of meat.

Homer's epic poems have poetic meter, but they do not rhyme.

Ovid Senior said to his son, Ovid:

"He says well.

"I know this nettles you, now, but answer me: Isn't it true? You'll tell me his name shall live, and that (now being dead) his works have eternalized him and made him divine. But could this divinity feed him while he lived? Could his name feast him?"

"Or purchase him a Senator's revenue?" Tucca asked. "Could it?"

Qualifying to be a Senator required much wealth.

The same was true of Knights in the Middle Ages.

Ovid Senior said, "Aye, or give him place — status — in the commonwealth? Respect or attendants? Make him be carried in his litter?"

Senators and other high-ranking people could be carried in litters.

Tucca said to Ovid Senior, "Thou speak sentences, old Bias."

Bias of Priene was a Greek sage; he was one of the Seven Sages.

"Sentences" are maxims. They can be wise.

Lupus said to Ovid, "All this the law will do, young sir, if you'll follow it."

In other words: To be successful, be a lawyer; to be a failure, be a poet.

Ovid Senior said, "If he is my son, he shall follow and observe what I will make him fit for, or I profess here openly and utterly to disown him."

Ovid replied:

"Sir, let me ask that you will forgo these moods.

"I will be anything, or study anything; I'll show that the unfashioned body of the law is pure elegance, and make her ruggedest strains run as smoothly as Propertius' elegies."

"Propertius' elegies?" Ovid Senior said sarcastically. "Good!"

"Nay, you take — judge — your son too quickly, Marcus," Lupus said to Ovid Senior.

"Why, he cannot speak, he cannot think, out of poetry," Ovid Senior said. "He is bewitched with it."

"Come, do not misprize him," Lupus responded.

"Misprize" means "undervalue." As a legal term, it means to commit a wrongful act or a wrongful omission.

Ovid Senior said, "'Misprize'? Aye, by the Virgin Mary, I would have him use some such words, now; they have some touch, some taste, of the law. He should make himself a style out of these, and let his Propertius' elegies go by."

Lupus said:

"Indeed, young Publius, he who will now hit the mark must shoot through the law; we have no other planet that reigns, and in that sphere you may sit and sing with angels."

Young Publius is young Ovid the poet, son of Ovid Senior.

In the medieval view of the cosmos, the Sun, planets and stars were encased in Spheres that revolved around the Earth. The outermost Sphere was the Primum Mobile, which moved and imparted movement to the other Spheres of the cosmos, and that movement caused the Music of the Spheres, something that living human beings normally do not hear.

Angels are also English coins. A person with many angels may very well sing.

Lupus continued:

“Why, the law makes a man happy without respecting and paying heed to any other merit; a simple, undistinguished scholar, or none at all, may be a lawyer.”

Tucca said to Ovid:

“He tells thee true, my noble neophyte; my little grammaticaster, he does.”

A grammaticaster is a pedantic grammarian.

Tucca continued:

“Law shall never put thee to and make thee work at thy mathematics, metaphysics, philosophy, and I don’t know what other supposed sufficiencies and accomplishments. If thou can but have the patience to plod enough, talk enough, and make noise enough, then be impudent enough, and it is enough.”

“Three books will furnish you,” Lupus said.

Tucca said:

“And the less art, the better.

“Besides, when it shall be in the power of thy cheverel — flexible — conscience to do right or wrong at thy pleasure, my pretty Alcibiades —”

Alcibiades was a gifted Athenian, but he sometimes fought for and sometimes fought against Athens during the Peloponnesian War that pitted Sparta against Athens. Ovid preferred poetry, but he was considering turning to law to please his father.

Lupus interrupted, “Aye, and to have better men than himself, by many thousand degrees, to observe him and stand bare —”

Tucca interrupted, “True, and he to carry himself proud and stately, and have the law on his side for it, old boy.”

Ovid Senior said to his friends:

“Well, the day grows old, gentlemen, and I must leave you.”

He then said to his son the poet:

“Publius, if thou will hold my favor, abandon these idle, fruitless studies that so bewitch thee. Send Janus home his back-face again and look only forward to the law: Focus on that. I will allow thee what allowance shall suit thee in the rank of gentlemen and shall maintain thy society with the best; and under these conditions I leave thee.”

Janus is a two-faced god who looks both forwards and backwards. Ovid Senior wanted his son, Ovid, to stop looking at poetry and instead look only at law.

“My blessings will light upon thee if thou respect these conditions; if not, my eyes may drop tears for thee, but thine own heart will ache for itself; and so farewell.”

Luscus returned.

Ovid Senior asked him, "Are my horses ready?"

"Yes, sir, they are at the gate outside," Luscus answered.

"That's well," Ovid Senior said.

He then said, "Asinius Lupus, let me have a word with you."

He then said to Tucca, "Captain, shall I take my leave of you?"

"No, my little old boy," Tucca said.

He motioned toward Lupus and said to Ovid Senior, "Dispatch your business with Cothurnus there."

A cothurnus is a thick-soled boot that was worn by actors, such as those playing important men of state. Lupus considered himself an important man of state.

Tucca continued, "I'll wait on thee, I will."

Luscus said to himself, "To borrow some ten drachmas; I know his project."

Tucca's project was to get money from Ovid Senior and then spend it.

Ovid Senior said to Lupus, "Sir, you shall make me beholden to you."

He then asked, "Now, Captain Tucca, what do you have to say?"

Tucca answered:

"Why, what should I say? Or what can I say, my flower of the Equestrian order?"

The Equestrian order was Knights, who were just below the highest order: the Nobles.

Tucca continued:

“Should I say thou are rich? Or that thou are honorable? Or wise? Or valiant? Or learned? Or liberal?”

“Why, thou are all these, and thou know it, my noble Lucullus, thou know it; come, don’t be ashamed of thy virtues, old stump.”

Lucullus was a retired general and a wealthy patron of soldiers.

The word “stump” can refer to a short man or a blockhead.

Tucca continued:

“Honor’s a good brooch — metaphorical ornament — to wear in a man’s hat at all times. Thou are the man of war’s Maecenas, old boy.”

Maecenas was a friend to Augustus Caesar, and he was an important patron of the arts.

Tucca wanted Ovid Senior to be a patron of military men.

Tucca continued:

“Why shouldn’t thou be graced then by the men of war as well as he is by his poets?”

A Pyrgus entered the room. An assistant in Tucca’s cons, he had been waiting in the anteroom and listening for his cue to enter and assist in a con.

A Pyrgus is literally a tall, moveable structure used in sieges. Here, it is a joke name for Tucca’s short boy-pages.

Tucca said to the Pyrgus, “What is it now, my carrier? What is the news?”

The Pyrgus whispered to Tucca.

Luscus said to himself, “The boy has stayed within for his cue this half hour.”

Tucca said out loud to the Pyrgus, “Come, do not whisper to me, but speak it out. What? It is no treason against the state, I hope, is it?”

“Yes, against the state of my master’s purse,” Luscus said to himself.

“Sir, Agrippa desires you to be patient with him until the next week,” the Pyrgus said. “His moils are not yet come up.”

Agrippa is Augustus Caesar’s son-in-law and a wealthy military commander. Tucca will say that Agrippa owes him nearly a talent, which is thousands of British pounds or USAmerican dollars.

The Pyrgus was using the word “moils” to mean mules. The verb “moil” means “work hard.”

Tucca said:

“His moils?

“Now the bots, the spavin, and the glanders, and some dozen more diseases alight on him and his moils! What! Have they the yellow jaundice, his moils, that they come no faster? Or are they foundered and lame, huh? His moils have the staggers, likely, haven’t they?”

Tucca had named several diseases Agrippa’s mules might be suffering from.

The Pyrgus replied, “Oh, no, sir.”

He then said to himself, “Then your tongue might be suspected for one of his moils.”

Tucca stuttered and sputtered when angry — or when he pretended to be angry.

Tucca said out loud so that Ovid Senior could hear him:

“He owes me almost a talent, and he thinks to bear it away — a victory for him — with his moils, does he?”

He then said to the Pyrgus:

“Sirrah, you nutcracker, go on your way to him again, and tell him I must have money, I.”

“Nutcrackers” are apprentices who like to crack nuts while attending a play.

Tucca continued:

“I cannot eat stones and turfs, tell him.

“What! Will he clem — starve — me and my followers? Ask him if he will clem me; do, go. He would have me fry my jacket and eat it, would he?”

“Away, setter, away.

“Yet stay, my little tumbler.”

Setters and tumblers are hunting dogs. The Pyrgus was supposed to hunt for Agrippa.

The words are also slang words for assistants to conmen. A setter finds people who can be conned. A tumbler leads the victims to the conman.

Tucca motioned to Ovid Senior and said quietly to the Pyrgus, “This old boy shall supply money now.”

He said out loud, “I will not trouble Agrippa, I cannot be importunate, I; I cannot be impudent to him.”

“Alas, sir, no,” the Pyrgus said. “You are the most maidenly, blushing creature upon the earth.”

Tucca said to Ovid Senior, “Do thou hear, my little six-and-fifty or thereabouts? Thou are not to learn the humors and tricks of that old bald cheater, Time; thou had not this chain for nothing.”

A chain can be worn as a necklace or as a symbol of authority.

Tucca was flattering Ovid Senior by telling him that he was a mature and knowledgeable man.

Time is bald. Once a moment is past, it cannot be possessed again. Time has no long hair that you can grab as Time passes by you.

Tucca continued: “Men of worth have their chimeras as well as other creatures; and they see monsters sometimes; they do, they do, brave boy.”

Chimeras were mythological monsters that were made of parts of various animals. The parts vary in different descriptions, but often the chimera is described as having a lion’s head, a goat’s body, and a serpent’s tail.

The Pyrgus said to himself, “At cheaper cost than if he — Tucca — shall see you, I warrant him.”

It’s better to have a chimera see you than to have Tucca see you.

Tucca said quietly to Ovid Senior, “Thou must let me have six, six — drachmas, I mean, old boy; thou shall do it; I tell thee, old boy, thou shall, and in private, too, do thou see? Go, walk off.”

Whenever Tucca mentioned a number, he had to think about what was the greatest amount of money he could get from a person. Should he ask for shillings, or for drachmas, or for sesterces?

He pointed and said, “There, there. Six is the sum. Thy son’s a gallant spark and must not be put out suddenly.”

Ovid Senior went to the side to search his pockets for money to give to Tucca.

Tucca then said to young Ovid, “Come here, Callimachus.”

Callimachus was a poet who inspired Ovid.

Tucca continued:

“Thy father tells me thou art too poetical, boy; thou must not be so, thou must leave them — leave the poets — young novice, thou must.

“They are a sort of poor, starved rascals, who are always wrapped up in foul linen — dirty clothing — and can boast of nothing but a lean visage peering out of a seam-rent — torn at the seams — suit: the very emblems and signs of beggary.

“No, do thou hear? Turn lawyer, thou shalt be my solicitor —”

Tucca was providing a kind of service for his six drachmas. He had given young Ovid the same advice that Ovid Senior had given. He had also advised Ovid Senior to go a little easy on his son: Don’t put out his son — and his son’s spark — suddenly.

Ovid Senior returned with money for Tucca.

Tucca asked Ovid Senior, “It is the right amount, old boy, isn’t it?”

“You had best tell — count — it, Captain,” Ovid Senior said.

“No,” Tucca said. “Fare thou well, my honest horseman.”

A horseman is 1) a person who rides a horse, or 2) a member of the Equestrian social rank — a Knight.

Tucca then said to Lupus, “And fare thou well, beaver.”

Beaver hats were expensive hats worn by gentlemen.

Tucca said to Ovid Senior:

“I ask thee, Roman, when thou come to town, see me at my lodging and visit me sometimes. Thou shall be welcome, old boy. Do not balk — avoid and disappoint — me, good swaggerer. May Jove keep thy chain from having to be pawned.

“Go thy ways; if thou lack money, I’ll lend thee some; I’ll leave thee to thy horse, now. Adieu.”

“Farewell, good Captain,” Ovid Senior said.

Tucca said quietly to the Pyrgus, “Boy, you can have but half a share now, boy.”

He meant half of the Pyrgus’ share in the profits of the con. Tucca owed everybody, including his pages.

Tucca and the Pyrgus exited.

Ovid Senior said, “It is a strange boldness that accompanies this fellow.”

Did Ovid Senior know he had been conned? Possibly. He could afford the loss of the “loan.”

“Come,” Ovid Senior said to Luscus.

Ovid said, “I’ll give attendance on you to your horse, sir, if it pleases you —”

His father replied, “No; stay in your chamber and fall to your studies. Do so; may the gods of Rome bless thee!”

Ovid Senior, Lupus, and Luscus exited, leaving Ovid the poet alone.

Ovid the poet said to himself:

“And may the gods give me stomach to digest this law — those are the words that should have surely followed his words, had I been he.

“O sacred poesy, thou spirit of arts, the soul of science and the queen of souls, what profane violence, almost sacrilege, has here been offered to thy divinities!

“That thine own guiltless poverty should arm Prodigious Ignorance to wound thee thus!

“For from poets’ poverty is all the force of argument drawn forth against poesy, or from the abuse of thy great powers in adulterated and corrupted brain.”

In other words: The major complaint many people make against poetry is that poets tend to be poor in wealth.

Ovid the poet continued:

“But if men would only learn to distinguish spirits, and to set and acknowledge a true difference between those jaded wits who run a broken pace of poetic meter for common hire, and the high raptures of a happy muse borne on the wings of her immortal thought that kicks at earth with a disdainful heel and beats at the gates of heaven with her bright hooves, they would not then with such distorted faces and desperate censures stab at poesy.”

Bad poets are like jades: inferior horses. Good poets are like Pegasus: a winged horse that ascends the heavens.

Ovid the poet continued:

“Men would then admire bright knowledge, and their minds should never descend on so unworthy objects as gold or titles; they would dread far more to be thought ignorant than to be known poor.

“The time was once, when wit drowned wealth; but now your only barbarism is to have wit, and want.

“No matter now who excels in virtue, he who has coin has all perfection else.”

In other words: Many men think that it is better to be wealthy and stupid than to be intelligent and impoverished.

—1.3 —

Tibullus, a poet and one of Ovid’s friends, entered the scene and said, “Ovid?”

“Who’s there?” Ovid asked.

Seeing Tibullus, he said, “Come in.”

“Good morning, lawyer,” Tibullus said.

“Good morning, dear Tibullus,” Ovid said. “Welcome. Sit down.”

“Not I,” Tibullus said. “What, so hard at it?”

He approached Ovid, who attempted to withhold his work.

Tibullus said, “Let’s see, what’s here? Nay, I will see it —”

“Please, stay away,” Ovid said.

They struggled, but Tibullus got hold of the paper.

Tibullus read Ovid’s writing out loud:

“If thrice in field a man vanquish his foe,

“’Tis after in his choice to serve, or no.”

The man is a soldier, and if he vanquishes three enemies on the battlefield, it is his decision whether he continues to serve as a soldier or goes home.

“What is this now, Ovid!” Tibullus said. “Law-cases in verse?”

“In truth, I don’t know,” Ovid said. “They run from my pen unwittingly, if they are verse.”

Ovid wrote verse whether he intended to or not. He couldn’t help it.

He then asked, “What’s the news in the outside world?”

“Off with this lawyer gown you are wearing!” Tibullus said. “I have come to have thee walk with me.”

Tibullus wanted Ovid to cease his study of law and do something different and, no doubt, more fun.

Ovid replied, “No, good Tibullus, I’m not now in case — I’m not now in a position to do that. Please leave me alone.”

“What! Not in case?” Tibullus said. “By God’s light, thou are in too much case, judging by all this law.”

Ovid’s room contained law books and his notes about the law.

“Truly, if I live, I will new-dress the law in sprightly poesy’s habiliments,” Ovid said.

“The hell thou will!” Tibullus said. “What, turn law into verse? Thy father has schooled thee, I see.”

He took out a letter, which he handed to Ovid.

Tibullus then said, “Here, read that. There’s subject for you — and, if I mistake not, a supersedeas to your melancholy.”

A supersedeas is a writ for a stay in proceedings.

In other words, the letter would cheer Ovid up.

Ovid opened the letter and said, “What! Signed ‘Julia’! O my life, my heaven!”

He read the letter silently to himself.

“Has your mood changed?” Tibullus asked.

Ovid said about the letter’s contents, “Music of wit! Note for the harmonious spheres!”

The note was 1) a musical note, and 2) Julia’s letter to Ovid.

He added, “Celestial accents, how you ravish me!”

“Accents” can be 1) utterances, and 2) marks on musical notes.

“What is it, Ovid?” Tibullus asked.

“That I must meet my Julia, the Princess Julia,” Ovid said.

“Where?” Tibullus asked.

“Why, at — by the Heart of God, I have forgotten,” Ovid said. “My passion — my strong emotion — so transports me.”

“I’ll save your trouble of trying to remember,” Tibullus said. “It is at Albius’ house, the jeweler’s, where the fair Lycoris lies.”

“Who? Cytheris, Cornelius Gallus’ love?” Ovid asked.

“Aye, he’ll be there, too, and my Plautia,” Tibullus said.

“And why not your Delia?” Ovid asked.

“Yes, and your Corinna,” Tibullus said.

Both Ovid and Tibullus wrote poetry about the women they loved; in their poetry they used pseudonyms for their loved ones.

Ovid loved Julia, and he wrote about her in his poetry, using the name Corinna.

Tibullus loved Plautia, and he wrote about her in his poetry, using the name Delia.

Ovid said:

“True, but my sweet Tibullus, keep that secret.

“I would not for all Rome have it thought that I veil bright Julia underneath that name: Julia, the gem and jewel — the Jule — of my soul, who takes her honors from the golden sky, as beauty takes all its luster from her eye.

“The air respire and breathes out again the pure Elysian — heavenly — sweets in which she breathes, and from her looks descend the glories of the summer. Heaven she is, praised in herself above all praise — Julia is more praiseworthy than any words that could be used to praise her — and he who hears her speak would swear the tuneful orbs — the musical Spheres — turned in his zenith only.”

In other words: Anyone who hears Julia speak thinks that he is hearing the Music of the Spheres.

“Publius, thou shall lose thyself,” Tibullus said.

Publius Ovid replied:

“Oh, in no labyrinth can I safelier err than when I lose myself in praising her.

“Go away from here, law, and welcome, Muses! Though you Muses are not rich, yet you are pleasing; let’s be reconciled and now made one.

“Henceforth I promise you my faith, and I promise all my serious hours to spend with you — with you, whose music strikes on my heart and with bewitching tones steals forth my spirit in Julia’s name. Fair Julia!

“Julia’s love shall be a law, and that sweet law I’ll study: the law and art of sacred Julia’s love.

“All other objects will prove to be only objects — object objects.”

“Come, we shall have thee as passionate as Propertius soon,” Tibullus said.

“Oh, how does my Sextus?” Ovid asked about Sextus Propertius.

“Truly, he is full of sorrow for his Cynthia’s death,” Tibullus answered.

“What, still?” Ovid asked.

“Still, and still more,” Tibullus said. “His griefs grow upon him as do his hours. Never did I know an understanding spirit so take to heart the common — universal — work of fate.”

Ovid said:

“O my Tibullus, let us not blame him, for against such occurrences the heartiest strife of virtue is not proof.

“We may preach constancy and fortitude to other souls, but had we ourselves been struck with the like planet, one with malign influences — had our loves, like his, been ravished from us by injurious death, and in the height and heat of our best days — it would have cracked our sinews, shrunk our veins, and made our very heartstrings jar and go out of tune, like his.”

Ben Jonson’s society believed that planets could influence our lives, and it believed that strings brace the heart, and that those strings could break. The figurative sense of “heartstrings” is one’s deepest feelings, such as passionate love.

Ovid continued:

“Come, let’s go and take him forth, and see if mirth or company will but abate — lessen — his passion.”

“I am happy to do so,” Tibullus said, “and I implore the gods that it may.”

They exited.

ACT 2 (The Arraignment, or Poetaster)

— 2.1 —

Albius and Crispinus talked together.

Albius was a tradesman, primarily a jeweler, who was married to Chloe.

Crispinus was a poetaster — a bad poet — who was carrying a folded sheet of paper.

Albius said:

“Master Crispinus, you are welcome. Please use a stool, sir.”

Stools were used to sit on in polite company. They were also used in to sit on in privies.

Albius continued:

“Your cousin Cytheris will come down soon. We are so busy for the receiving of these courtiers here that I can scarcely be a minute alone with myself because of thinking about them.

“Please sit, sir; please sit, sir.”

“I am very well, sir,” Crispinus said. “Never trust me but you are most delicately seated here, full of sweet delight and blandishment! An excellent air, an excellent air!”

By “blandishment,” Crispinus meant “allurement.”

Albius had a nice house in a nice location.

“Aye, sir, it is a pretty air,” Albius said.

He then said to himself, “These courtiers run in my mind still; I must look out —”

He then said to Crispinus, “For Jupiter’s sake, sit, sir. Or will it please you to walk into the garden? There’s a garden at the back side of the house — in the backyard.”

Jupiter is the King of the gods.

“I am most strenuously well, I thank you, sir,” Crispinus said.

“May it do you much good, sir,” Albius said.

He exited.

Chloe, Albius’ wife, entered with some maids who were carrying perfume and dried herbs to sweeten the air of the house.

Chloe, who did not notice Crispinus, said to her maids, “Come, bring those perfumes forward a little, and strew some roses and violets here.”

Albius entered the room.

Chloe noticed Albius.

Chloe said, “Bah, here are rooms that savor — stink — the most pitifully rank that ever I felt!”

Of course, she meant “smelled.”

She then said, “I cry the gods mercy, my husband’s in the wind of us.”

In other words, her husband stank.

Albius said to his wife, “Why, this is good, excellent, excellent. Well done, my sweet Chloe. Trim up your house most obsequiously — dutifully, and eager to please.”

“For Vulcan’s sake, breathe somewhere else!” Chloe said. “In truth, you overcome our perfumes exceedingly; you are too predominant.”

Vulcan, the gifted blacksmith god, was, like Albius, married; in fact, he was married to Venus, goddess of beauty and sexual passion, who was not faithful to him. Venus had an affair with Mars, the god of war. Vulcan learned of the affair, so he set a trap for the illicit lovers. He created a fine net that bound tightly, he placed the net above his bed, and then he pretended to leave his mansion to journey abroad. Mars ran to Venus, and together they ran to bed. Mars and Venus lay down in bed together, and then the fine net snared them, locked in lust.

“Just hear my opinion, sweet wife,” Albius said.

He tried to hug her and pin her in his arms, but she fended him off and hit him on the head.

Chloe said:

“A pin for your ’pinion.”

A pin is an almost worthless small item used in sewing.

Chloe continued:

“In sincerity, if you are thus fulsome — offensive — to me in everything, I’ll be divorced. God save my body! You know what you were before I married you. I was a gentlewoman born, I. I lost all my friends to be a citizen’s wife, because I heard, indeed, that they kept their wives as fine as ladies, and that we might rule our husbands like ladies, and do whatever we wanted.

“Do you think I would have married you otherwise?”

Albius said, “I acknowledge, sweet wife —”

He then whispered to Crispinus, “She speaks the best of any woman in Italy, and moves as mightily, which makes me prefer that she should make bumps on my head as big as my two fingers than I would offend her.”

“Moves ... mightily” can mean “persuades well in speech” or “strikes hard with her fist.”

When Albius mentioned “two fingers,” he held up two fingers.

In this society, cuckolds — men with unfaithful wives — were said to have invisible horns growing on their heads. Readers may be forgiven for thinking of those horns when Albius held up two fingers.

He then said to Chloe, “But, sweet wife —”

“Yet again?” his wife said. “Isn’t it grace enough for you that I call you husband and you call me wife, but you must still be poking me against my will to things?”

One kind of poking is sexual poking. One meaning of “thing” is “penis.”

Albius replied, “But you know, wife: Here are the greatest ladies and most gallant gentlemen of Rome to be entertained in our house now; and I would like to advise thee to entertain them in the best sort, indeed, wife.”

Chloe said:

“In sincerity, did you ever hear a man talk so idly? You would seem to be the master of me? You would have your spoke in my cart?”

Hmm. There’s a sexual meaning there.

Chloe continued:

“You would advise me to entertain ladies and gentlemen? Because you can marshal your pack needles, horse combs, hobbyhorses, and wall candlesticks in your warehouse better than I, therefore you can tell how to entertain ladies and gentlefolks better than I?”

Albius said:

“O my sweet wife, don’t upbraid me with that!

“Gain savors sweetly from anything.”

“Gain” is profit.

Albius continued:

“He who respects” — he meant “expects” — “to get a profit must relish all commodities alike, and admit no difference between woad [a plant used to make blue dye] and frankincense, or the most precious balsamum and a tar barrel.”

Albius was a tradesman who dealt in jewelry, but he also dealt in other less prestigious items that made a profit.

Chloe said:

“By the Virgin Mary, bah!

“You sell candle-snuffers, too, if you remember, but I ask you to let me buy them out of your hand, for I tell you true, I take it highly in snuff — I highly resent — to learn how to entertain gentlefolks by your instruction at these years of mine, indeed.

“Alas, man, there was not a gentleman who came to your house in your other wife’s time, I think? Nor a lady? Nor one or more musicians? Nor masques?”

Masques were entertainments at which people wore masks.

Chloe continued:

“Neither you, nor your house were so much as spoken of before I disbased myself from my hood and my fartingale to these bum-rolls and your whalebone bodice.”

By “disbased,” she meant “debased.”

Before becoming a tradesman’s wife, she had worn a French hood and a farthingale (not a “fartingale”).

After becoming a tradesman's wife, she wore the items of clothing usually worn by a tradesman's wife: Bum-rolls were rolls of cloth around the hips; a skirt was draped over them. A whalebone bodice was a bodice stiffened with whalebone.

Albius said:

“Look here, my sweet wife.”

He lay his finger on his lips and said:

“I am mum, my dear mummia, my balsamum, my spermaceti, and my very city of —”

Hmm. My very city of ... sperm? Yes. He was still referring to his wife. A city is a site.

Mummia, balsamum, and spermaceti are expensive items.

Mummia is a medicinal preparation made from the preserved flesh of a mummy.

Balsamum is aromatic resin used as an ointment.

Spermaceti is a waxy substance produced in sperm whales; it was used as an ointment.

Albius then said quietly to Crispinus, “She has the most best, true, feminine wit in Rome!”

Crispinus replied, “I have heard so, sir, and do most vehemently desire to participate” — he meant “partake of” — “the knowledge of her fair features.”

“Ah, peace,” Albius said. “You shall hear more soon; be not seen yet, please — not yet. Observe.”

He exited.

Chloe said, “By God's body, give husbands the head a little more, and they'll be nothing but head shortly.”

To give a horse the head means to loosen the reins and give it freedom. If Chloe gives her husband the head, soon he will be her head — her boss.

Ephesians 5:23 states, “For the husband is the head of the wife, even as Christ is the head of the church: and he is the saviour of the body” (King James Bible).

Chloe, who had noticed her husband talking to Crispinus, motioned toward him and asked her maids, “Who’s he there?”

“I don’t know, forsooth,” the first maid said.

“Forsooth” means “indeed” or “in truth.”

The second maid asked Crispinus, “Who would you speak with, sir?”

He answered, “I would speak with my cousin Cytheris.”

The second maid said to Chloe, “He is one, forsooth, who would speak with his cousin Cytheris.”

“Is she your cousin, sir?” Chloe asked.

“Yes, in truth, forsooth, for lack of a better,” Crispinus said.

For lack of a better cousin.

“Is she a gentlewoman?” Chloe asked.

“Or else she should not be my cousin, I assure you,” Crispinus said.

“Are you a gentleman born?” Chloe asked.

“That I am, lady,” Crispinus said. “You shall see my arms, if it will please you.”

“No, your legs do sufficiently show you are a gentleman born, sir; for a man borne upon little legs is always a gentleman borne,” Chloe said.

“Yet I ask you, permit me to show you the sight of my arms, mistress,” Crispinus said, “for I bear them about me, to have them seen.”

Yes, bare arms can be seen.

He pulled out a design of a coat of arms and held it up.

He then said:

“My name is Crispinus, or Cry-spinas, indeed, which is well expressed in my arms: a face crying, in chief; and beneath it a bloody toe between three thorns pungent.”

Spina is Latin for “thorn.”

“In chief” means the top part of the shield.

“Pungent” means “sharp-pointed” (the thorns) and “stinky” (the toe).

“Then you are welcome, sir,” Chloe said. “Now that I know you are a gentleman born, I can find in my heart to welcome you; for I am a gentlewoman born, too, and I will bear my head high enough, although it were my fortune to marry a tradesman.”

Crispinus replied, “No doubt of that, sweet feature” — he may have meant “creature” — “your carriage shows it in any man’s eye that is carried upon you with judgment.”

“Carriage “ can mean bodily deportment as well as a kind of wheeled vehicle.

By “carried,” he meant “cast.”

Albius returned. In the next few minutes, he would be continually going in and out of the room. He really, really wanted to make a good impression on the VIPs coming to his home.

“Dear wife, don’t be angry,” he said.

“God’s my passion!” Chloe said.

“Listen to me about one thing,” Albius said. “Don’t let your maids set cushions in the parlor windows, nor in the dining-chamber windows, nor upon stools in either of them, in any case, for it is tavern-like; but lay them one upon another in some outer-room or corner of the dining chamber.”

“Go, go,” Chloe said. “Meddle with your bedchamber only, or rather with your bed in your chamber only, or rather with your wife in your bed only; or, on my faith, I’ll not be pleased with you only.”

Hmm. Sounds as if someone will shortly be a cuckold.

Albius said, “Look here, my dear wife, entertain that gentleman kindly, I ask you —”

Chloe made a gesture as if she were going to hit him.

Albius lay his finger on his lips and said, “Mum.”

That meant, he would stay quiet.

“Go! I need your instruction, indeed!” Chloe said sarcastically.

She added, without sarcasm, “Anger me no more, I advise you.”

Albius exited.

Chloe said to herself, “City-sin, did he say! She’s a wise gentlewoman, indeed, who will marry herself to the sin of the city.”

“City-sin” is a citizen. The “sin of the city” is something different.

Albius entered the room and said, “Just this one time and no more, by heaven, wife. Hang no pictures in the hall nor in the dining chamber, in any case, but in the gallery only, for it is not courtly else, on my word, wife.”

Chloe replied, “By God’s precious, are you never done!”

Albius said, “Wife —”

She raised her fist and threatened to hit him.

He exited.

Chloe asked, “Don’t I bear a reasonable corrigible hand over him, Crispinus?”

“Corrigible” means “corrective.”

Crispinus replied, “By this hand, lady, you hold a most sweet hand over him.”

Albius entered the room and said, “And then for the great gilt andirons —”

“Again!” Chloe said. “I wish that the andirons were in your great guts, as far as I’m concerned.”

“I vanish, wife,” Albius said.

He exited.

Chloe asked:

“What shall I do, Master Crispinus?”

“Here will be all the most splendid ladies in court soon, to see your cousin Cytheris. O the gods! How might I behave myself now so as to entertain them most courtly?”

Crispinus answered, “By the Virgin Mary, lady, if you will entertain them most courtly, you must do thus:

“As soon as ever your maid or your man brings you word they have come, you must say, ‘A pox on them! What are they doing here?’

“And yet when they come, speak to them as fair words as can be and give them the kindest welcome in words that can be.”

“Is that the fashion of courtiers, Crispinus?” Chloe asked.

“I assure you it is, lady,” Crispinus said. “I have observed it.”

Chloe said, “As for your ‘pox,’ sir, it is easily hit on; but it is not so easy to speak fair after, I think?”

The pox is syphilis, which is easily hit on, or acquired. Once one learns that it has been acquired, one is unlikely to say fair words.

Albius entered the room and said, “Oh, wife, the coaches have come, on my word, a number of coaches, and courtiers.”

“A pox on them!” Chloe said. “What are they doing here?”

“What is this now, wife!” Albius said. “Would thou not have them come?”

“Come?” Chloe replied. “Come, you are a fool, you.”

She then said to Crispinus, “He doesn’t know the trick of it.”

In other words, he doesn’t understand courtly etiquette.

Chloe then ordered her maids, "Call Cytheris, please."

A maid exited.

Chloe then said, "And good Master Crispinus, you can observe, you say; let me entreat you for all the ladies' behaviors, jewels, jests, and attires, that you marking as well as I, we may put both our marks together when they are gone, and confer about them."

A mark is a close observation, or an object. Chloe was unintentionally talking about putting two sexual objects together.

"I assure you, sweet lady, that I do so," Crispinus said. "Let me alone to observe until I turn myself to nothing but observation."

Cytheris entered the room.

Crispinus said, "Good morning, cousin Cytheris."

"Welcome, kind cousin," Cytheris said. "What! Have they come?"

"Aye, your friend Cornelius Gallus, Ovid, Tibullus, Propertius, with Julia the Emperor's daughter and the lady Plautia, have alighted at the door, and with them Hermogenes Tigellius, the excellent musician."

Julia was the daughter of Augustus Caesar, the Roman Emperor.

"Come, let us go meet them, Chloe," Cytheris said.

"Observe them, Crispinus," Chloe said.

"At a hair's breadth, lady, I assure you," Crispinus said. "I will very closely observe them."

Gallus, Ovid, Tibullus, Propertius, Hermogenes the musician, Julia, and Plautia entered the scene.

Ovid loved Julia, and Tibullus loved Plautia.

Gallus kissed Chloe and said, “Health to the lovely Chloe!”

He then said to Cytheris, “You must pardon me, mistress, that I give preference to this fair gentlewoman.”

A mistress is a woman to whom a man is devoted. The word “mistress” need not imply a sexual liaison.

Gallus and the other guests do and will show much courtesy to Chloe, who is much concerned about social rank.

“I pardon and praise you for it, sir —” Cytheris said.

She then said to Julia, “— and I beseech Your Excellence, receive her beauties into your knowledge and favor.”

Julia replied, “Cytheris, she has favor — good looks — and behavior that commands as much of me; and, sweet Chloe, know that I do exceedingly love you, and that I will approve of and second any grace that my father the Emperor may show you.”

She motioned toward Albius and asked, “Is this your husband?”

“For lack of a better, if it pleases Your Highness,” Albius said.

Chloe said to Cytheris, “God’s my life! How he shames me!”

Cytheris replied, “Not a whit, Chloe; they all think you politic and witty; wise women don’t choose husbands for the eye, merit, or birth, but for wealth and sovereignty.”

“Sovereignty” in this context means “rule.” Wise women choose husbands who are wealthy and whom they can rule over — or in some cases, when they prefer it, who will rule over them.

Ovid said to Albius, “Sir, we all come to congratulate you for the good report of you.”

Tibullus said to Albius, “And we would be glad to deserve your love, sir.”

Albius replied, “My wife will answer you all, gentlemen. I’ll come to you again soon.”

He exited.

Plautia motioned toward Chloe and said, “You have chosen for yourself a very fair companion here, Cytheris, and a very fair house.”

“To both of which you and all my friends are very welcome, Plautia,” Cytheris said.

These were words that should be spoken by the hostess, who was Chloe. Cytheris was a lodger.

Chloe, the real hostess, said, “With all my heart, I assure Your Ladyship.”

“Thanks, sweet Mistress Chloe,” Plautia said.

“You must come to court, lady, indeed, and there be sure your welcome shall be as great to us,” Julia said to Chloe. “You will be as welcome to us as we are to you.”

Ovid said to Julia, “She will well deserve it, madam. I see even in her looks gentry and general worthiness.”

“I have not seen a more certain token of an excellent disposition,” Tibullus said.

Albius returned and said, "Wife."

Chloe said to her husband, "Oh, they do so commend me here, the courtiers! What's the matter now?"

"For the banquet, sweet wife," Albius answered.

The banquet consisted of light refreshments: fruit, sweets, and wine.

"Yes," Chloe said. "And I must come to court, and be welcome, the princess says."

She and her husband exited.

Now that the respectable host and hostess were gone, Gallus said, "Ovid and Tibullus, you may be bold to welcome your mistresses here."

The couples embraced.

"We find it so, sir," Ovid said.

"And we thank Cornelius Gallus," Tibullus said.

Ovid said to Propertius, "Nay, my sweet Sextus, in faith, thou are not sociable."

"In faith, I am not, Publius, nor can I be," Sextus Propertius replied. "Sick minds are like sick men who burn with fevers, who, when they drink, are pleased with the taste for a moment, but afterward endure a more impatient fit."

He then said to all present, "Please, let me leave you; I offend you all, and myself most."

"Wait, sweet Propertius!" Gallus said.

"You yield too much to your griefs and fate, which never hurts except when we say it hurts us," Tibullus said.

The Stoic philosophers believed that suffering could be avoided by not acknowledging it.

Propertius said:

“Oh, peace, Tibullus!

“Your philosophy lends you too rough a hand to probe my wounds. Let they who know how to sigh and grieve speak about griefs. The free and unconstrained spirit does not feel the weight of my oppression.”

Propertius exited.

“Worthy Roman!” Ovid said. “I think I taste his misery, and I could sit down and chide at his malignant stars.”

“I think I love him because he loves so truly,” Julia said.

Cytheris said, “This is the most perfect love — one that lives after death.”

“Such is the constant ground of virtue always,” Gallus said.

“It puts on an inseparable face,” Plautia said.

Chloe returned, and she and Crispinus talked together apart from the others.

“Have you closely observed everything, Crispinus?” Chloe asked.

“Everything, I promise you,” Crispinus said.

“What gentlemen are these?” Chloe asked. “Do you know them?”

“Aye, they are poets, lady,” Crispinus said.

“Poets?” Chloe said. “They did not talk about me since I left, did they?”

“Oh, yes, and extolled your perfections to the heavens,” Crispinus said.

“Now, in sincerity, they are the finest kind of men whomever I knew,” Chloe said. “Poets! Couldn’t one get the Emperor to make my husband a poet, do you think?”

“No, lady, it is love and beauty that make poets,” Crispinus said, “and since you like poets so well, your love and beauties shall make me a poet.”

“What! Shall they?” Chloe said. “And such a one as these?”

“Aye, and a better one than these,” Crispinus said. “I would be sorry else.”

“And shall your looks change? And your hair change? And all, like these?” Chloe asked.

“Why, a man may be a poet and yet not change his hair, lady,” Crispinus said.

“Well, we shall see your cunning; yet if you can change your hair, please do,” Chloe said.

Girls changed hairstyles when they became women, so why shouldn’t men change hairstyles when they became poets?

Really, a haircut can help make a person look like the popular image of a poet, but of course, a good poet can look different from the popular image of a poet.

Albius returned and said, “Ladies and lordings, there’s a slight banquet that awaits within for you; please draw near and accost it.”

“We thank you, good Albius,” Julia said. “But when shall we see those excellent jewels you are praised for having?”

One meaning of the word “jewels” is “testicles.”

Albius said, “At Your Ladyship’s service.”

He then said to himself, “I got that speech by seeing a play yesterday, and it did me some grace now. I see it is good to collect such quotations sometimes. I’ll frequent these plays more than I have done, now that I come to be familiar with courtiers.”

Gallus approached Hermogenes and asked, “Why, how are you now, Hermogenes? What? Do thou ail, I wonder?”

“I am a little melancholy,” Hermogenes said. “Let me alone, I ask thee.”

“Melancholy!” Gallus said. “Why so?”

“With riding,” Hermogenes said. “A plague on all coaches for me!”

Chloe pointed to Hermogenes and asked, “Is that hard-favored — scowling — gentleman a poet, too, Cytheris?”

“No; this is Hermogenes — he is as humorous as a poet, though; he is a musician,” Cytheris said.

“Humorous” can refer to moods.

“A musician?” Chloe said. “Then he can sing.”

“That he can excellently,” Cytheris said. “Have you never heard him?”

“Oh, no,” Chloe said. “Will he be persuaded to sing, do you think?”

“I don’t know,” Cytheris said.

She then said to Gallus, “Friend, Mistress Chloe would like to hear Hermogenes sing. Do you have any influence over him?”

Gallus answered, "No doubt his own humanity and courtesy will command him so far, to the satisfaction of so fair a beauty; but rather than fail, we'll all be suitors to him."

"I cannot sing," Hermogenes said.

"Please, Hermogenes," Gallus said.

"I cannot sing," Hermogenes said.

Gallus pointed to Chloe and said, "For honor of this gentlewoman, to whose house I know thou may be ever welcome."

"That he shall in truth, sir, if he can sing," Chloe said.

Ovid, Julia, Tibullus, and Plautia joined the group around Hermogenes.

"Who's that?" Ovid asked.

"This gentlewoman is wooing Hermogenes for a song," Gallus said.

Ovid said:

"A song? Come, he shall not deny her.

"Hermogenes?"

"I cannot sing," Hermogenes said.

Gallus said to the others, "No, the ladies must persuade him; he waits just to have their thanks acknowledged as a debt to his skill."

"That shall not be lacking," Julia said. "We ourself will be the first who shall promise to pay him more than thanks upon a favor so worthily granted."

She was using the majestic plural.

"Thank you, madam, but I will not sing," Hermogenes said.

Tibullus said, "Tut, the only way to win him is to abstain from entreating him."

Crispinus said quietly to Chloe, "Do you love singing, lady?"

"Oh, surpassingly," Chloe said.

"Entreat the ladies to entreat me to sing, then, I beseech you," Crispinus said.

Chloe pointed to Crispinus and said to Julia, "I beg Your Grace, entreat this gentleman to sing."

"That we will, Chloe," Julia said. "Can he sing excellently?"

Chloe answered, "I think so, madam, for he entreated me to entreat you to entreat him to sing."

Crispinus said quietly to Chloe, "Heaven and earth! Why would you tell her that?"

Julia said to Crispinus, "Good sir, let's entreat you to use your voice."

"Alas, madam, I cannot, in truth," Crispinus said.

"The gentleman is modest," Plautia said. "I guarantee you that he sings excellently."

"Hermogenes, clear your throat," Ovid said. "I see by the look of him that here's a gentleman who will worthily challenge you."

"Not I, sir. I'll challenge no man," Crispinus said.

"That's your modesty, sir," Tibullus said, "but we, out of an assurance of your excellency, challenge him on your behalf."

"I thank you, gentlemen," Crispinus said. "I'll do my best."

Hermogenes said to Crispinus, “Let that best be good, sir. It will be best for you to be good.”

“Oh, this contention is excellent,” Gallus said.

He then said to Crispinus, “What is it you will sing, sir?”

Crispinus replied, “‘If I freely may discover,’ etc. Sir, I’ll sing that.”

Ovid said to Hermogenes, “It’s one of your own compositions, Hermogenes. He offers you advantage enough.”

Crispinus said, “Nay, truly, gentlemen, I’ll challenge no man — I can sing but one stanza of the ditty, and no more.”

“All the better,” Gallus said. “Hermogenes himself will be entreated to sing the other.”

Crispinus sang:

“If I freely may discover [reveal]

“What would please me in my lover,

“I would have her fair and witty,

“Savoring more of court than city;

“A little proud, but full of pity;

“Light and humorous [full of fancies] in her toying,

“Oft [Often] building hopes, and soon destroying,

“Long, but sweet, in the enjoying [in having sex];

“Neither too easy nor too hard:

“All extremes I would have barred.”

Gallus said to Crispinus, “Believe me, sir, you sing most excellently.”

“If there were a praise above excellence, the gentleman highly deserves it,” Ovid said.

Hermogenes said to Crispinus, “Sir, all this does not yet make me envy you, for I know I sing better than you.”

Tibullus said to all the others, “Listen to Hermogenes now.”

Hermogenes sang:

“She should be allowed her passions,

“So [So long as] they were [would be] but used as fashions:

“Sometimes froward [hard to please], and then frowning,

“Sometimes sickish, and then swooning [swooning],

“Every fit with change still crowning.

“[Crowning every fit with change always.]

“Purely jealous I would have her,

“Then only constant when I crave her;

“’Tis a virtue should not save her.

“Thus, nor her delicacies [delights] would cloy me

“Neither her peevishness annoy me.”

This was an anti-love song. The final five lines can be paraphrased like this:

“I would have her be completely jealous,

“But then when I desire her I would have her be completely chaste.

“Her virtue of chasteness would not save her from my dislike.

“Thus, her sexual delights would not cloy me,

“And neither would her peevishness annoy me.”

Julia said, “Nay, Hermogenes, your merit has long since been both known and admired by us.”

“You shall hear me sing another song,” Hermogenes said. “Now will I begin.”

Gallus motioned toward Albius and said, “We shall do this gentleman’s banquet that waits for us, ladies, too much wrong.”

To ignore the banquet would wrong it.

Julia said, “That is true; and well thought on, Cornelius Gallus.”

The company began to move towards the dining chamber.

Hermogenes said, “Why, it is but a short air; it will be done quickly; please stay.”

He said to the musicians in the gallery, “Strike, music!”

Ovid said, “No, good Hermogenes; we’ll end this difference — this dispute about who is the better singer — inside.”

Julia said to Ovid, “It is the common disease of all your musicians, that they know no mean to be entreated either to begin or end.”

Musicians are difficult to convince to begin and difficult to convince to stop.

Albius said to the others, “Will it please you to lead the way, gentles?”

Because the gentles were of a higher social rank, they would lead the way to the banquet.

The gentles replied, “Thanks, good Albius.”

Everybody except Albius and Crispinus exited.

Albius said to himself:

“Oh, what a charm — a chorus — of thanks was here put upon me! O Jove, what a setting forth of social status it is to a man to have many courtiers come to his house! Sweetly was it said by a good old housekeeper, ‘I had rather lack meat — food — than lack guests’ — especially if they are courtly guests.”

Good guests are better than good food.

Albius continued:

“For never trust me if one of their good legs — that is, bows — made in a house is not worth all the good food and drink a man can make them. He who would have fine guests, let him have a fine wife; he who would have a fine wife, let him come to me.”

“By your kind leave, Master Albius,” Crispinus said.

Crispinus was interested in Albius’ fine wife.

“What! You have not gone in to the banquet, Master Crispinus?” Albius said.

“Indeed, I have a project that draws me away from here,” Crispinus said. “Please, sir, make an excuse for me to the ladies.”

“Will you not stay and see the jewels, sir?” Albius asked. “I ask you, stay.”

“Not for a million, sir, now,” Crispinus said. “Let it suffice, I must relinquish; and so, in a word, please expiate this compliment.”

By “relinquish,” he meant “leave.”

By “expiate,” he meant “expedite.”

By “compliment,” he meant “excuse.”

Albius said, “Mum.”

“Mum” meant “Silent.”

If Crispinus could misuse words, so could Albius.

Albius exited.

Alone, Crispinus said to himself, “I’ll presently go and ingle some pawnbroker for a poet’s gown and bespeak a garland; and then, jeweler, look to your best jewel, indeed.”

By “ingle,” he meant “wheedle.”

Pawnbrokers dealt in second-hand goods.

Poets tend to be impoverished, and any good clothing they own must eventually end up in a pawnbroker’s shop.

By “bespeak a garland,” Crispinus meant that he was going to order a poet’s wreath.

Albius’ best jewel was his wife: Chloe.

Crispinus exited.

ACT 3 (The Arraignment, or Poetaster)

— 3.1 —

Alone on Holy Street, aka Via Sacra, Horace, a fine poet, said to himself, “Hmm? Yes. I will begin an ode so; and it shall be to Maecenas.”

Crispinus entered the scene and said, “By God’s eyelid, yonder’s Horace! They say he’s an excellent poet; Maecenas loves him. I’ll fall into his acquaintance if I can. I think he is composing as he goes in the street. Hmm? It is a good humor — poetic characteristic — if he is; I’ll compose, too.”

Horace recited to himself:

“Swell me a bowl with lusty wine

“Till I may see the plump Lyaeus [the god Bacchus] swim

“Above the brim;

“I drink as I would write,

“In flowing measure filled with flame and sprightly spirit.”

Crispinus said:

“Sweet Horace, may Minerva and the Muses stand auspicious to thy projects!”

Minerva is the goddess of wisdom, and the Muses are goddesses of the arts.

Crispinus continued:

“How do thou fare, sweet man? Frolicsome? Rich? Gallant? Huh?”

“Not greatly gallant, sir,” Horace said. “Like my fortunes, I am well. I’m bold to take my leave, sir. You’d want nothing else with me, sir, would you?”

Horace wanted to leave Crispinus' presence.

Crispinus said, "Indeed, no, but I could wish thou did know us, Horace. We are a scholar, I assure thee."

"A scholar, sir?" Horace said. "I shall be covetous of your fair knowledge."

"Gramercy, good Horace," Crispinus said. "Thank you. We are newly turned poet, too, which is more; and a satirist, too, which is more than that. I write just in thy vein, I. I am for your odes or your sermons, or anything, indeed. We are a gentleman, besides: our name is Rufus Laberius Crispinus. We are a pretty Stoic, too."

Horace wrote books titled Odes and Satires. The Satires were sometimes called Sermones, which means Conversations.

"To the proportion — the length — of your beard, I think it, sir," Horace said.

Long beards are sometimes regarded as signs of wisdom. The actor playing Crispinus would have little or no beard, or a false beard.

Crispinus said, "By Phoebus, here's a most neat fine street, isn't it? I protest to thee I am enamored of this street, now, more than I am of half the streets of Rome, again; it is so polite and terse! There's the front of a building, now. I study architecture, too; if ever I should build, I'd have a house just of that prospective."

The word "terse" means "not using many words."

"Polite and terse" is a compliment when applied to people.

A prospective is a place that provides a good view. Or it may be simply the attractive front of a building.

Horace said to himself, “Doubtless this gallant’s tongue has a good turn when he sleeps.”

How about a good turn when the gallant is awake? Not so much.

Crispinus said, “I make verses when I come in such a street as this. Oh, the city ladies, they sit in every shop like the Muses — offering the Castalian dew and the Thespian liquors to as many as have just the sweet grace and audacity to sip of their lips.”

The wives of tradesmen would sit in the windows of shops and encourage customers to shop there.

Castalia was a spring sacred to the Muses.

Thespis was the father of Greek tragedy. From his name we get the word “thespian” — actor.

Crispinus asked, “Did you ever hear any of my verses?”

Horace answered, “No, sir.”

He said to himself, “But I am in some fear I must hear your verses now.”

Crispinus said, “I’ll tell thee some (if I can but recover them) that I composed just now about a hair dressing I saw a jeweler’s wife wear, who indeed was a jewel herself. I prefer that kind of headdress, now.”

He was talking about Chloe.

Crispinus then asked, “What’s thy opinion, Horace?”

“With your silver bodkin, it does well, sir,” Horace said.

A bodkin is a long pin used in hair dressings or as a cap decoration.

Horace was talking about Crispinus.

Crispinus said:

“I cannot tell why, but it stirs me more than all your court-curls or your spangles — sequins — or your tricks — knick-knacks. I don’t like these high gable ends, these Tuscan tops, nor your coronets, nor your arches, nor your pyramids.”

These were then-current styles in ladies’ hairdressings.

Crispinus continued:

“Give me a fine, sweet — little delicate dressing, with a bodkin, as you say, and I don’t give a mushroom for all your other ornatures — embellishments.”

“Isn’t it possible to make an escape from him?” Horace said to himself.

Crispinus was a bore.

“I have remitted my verses all this while,” Crispinus said. “I think I have forgotten them.”

“Remit” means “refrain from inflicting a punishment.” Crispinus had forgotten his poems and so he could not inflict them on Horace.

Crispinus had only recently decided to be a poet. In fact, he had written his first poem a couple of minutes ago. No wonder Horace had not heard any of Crispinus’ verses.

“Here’s a person — me — who could wish you had, if not,” Horace said to himself.

“I pray Jove that I can entreat them from my memory,” Crispinus said.

“You put your memory to too much trouble, sir,” Horace said.

“No, sweet Horace, we must not have thee think so,” Crispinus said.

“I beg your pardon,” Horace said.

He then said to himself, “Then they are my ears that must be tortured. Well, you must have patience, ears.”

“Please, Horace, observe,” Crispinus said.

By “observe,” he meant “listen.” Crispinus had remembered his poem.

Horace looked him over and said, “Yes, sir. Your satin sleeve begins to fret at the rug that is underneath it, I do observe; and your ample velvet bases are not without evident stains of a hot disposition naturally.”

Crispinus’ sleeve had two layers. The outer expensive satin layer was wearing away, revealing the rough “rug,” a kind of cloth, underneath. And his middle-lower men’s garment — velvet bases — showed sweat stains, or possibly, stains of sexual activity, revealing that he had a lustful temperament.

“Oh, I’ll dye them into another color at my pleasure,” Crispinus said. “How many yards of velvet do thou think they contain?”

Velvet was an expensive fabric. Clothing with lots of velvet would be expensive.

Horace said to himself, “By God’s heart! I have put him now in a fresh way to vex me more.”

He then said to Crispinus, “Indeed, sir, your mercer’s book will tell you with more patience than I can.”

He then said to himself, “For I am crossed, and your mercer’s book is not crossed, I think.”

A mercer is a dealer in fine fabrics such as velvet. Merchants gave credit to some customers. When a customer paid off the debt, the debt was crossed off in the tradesman's account book.

“By God's light, these verses have lost me again,” Crispinus said. “I shall not invite them to my mind now.”

“Rack not your thoughts, good sir,” Horace said. “Rather defer it to a new time. I'll meet you at your lodging or wherever you please. Until then, Jove keep you, sir.”

Horace started to leave.

“Nay, gentle Horace, stay,” Crispinus said. “I have it now. I remember my poem now.”

“Yes, sir,” Horace said.

He then prayed silently, “Apollo, Hermes, Jupiter, look down upon me.”

Crispinus recited his poem out loud:

“Rich was thy hap [fortune], sweet, dainty cap [a city fashion]

“There to be placed:

“Where thy smooth black, sleek white may smack [kiss loudly],

“And both be graced.”

The woman's cap was lucky because it could kiss — touch — the woman's forehead.

Crispinus then said:

“‘White’ is there usurped” — he meant “substituted” — “for her brow: her forehead; and then ‘sleek,’ as the parallel to ‘smooth’ that went before. A kind of paranomasy or agnomination; do you conceive, sir?”

Paranomasy and agnomination are names for the same figure of speech, one that involves using a word to allude to a different word, or using the same word but with two different meanings (a pun).

“Excellent,” Horace said. “Indeed, sir, I must be abrupt and leave you.”

“Why, what haste do thou have?” Crispinus said. “Please, stay a little. Thou shall not go yet, by Phoebus Apollo.”

“I shall not?” Horace said.

He then said to himself, “What remedy — plan — can I come up with to leave? Bah, how I sweat with suffering!”

Crispinus said, “And then —”

He was ready to recite another poem.

“Please, sir, give me leave to wipe my face a little,” Horace said.

Of course, he would have liked to have leave — permission — to leave.

“Yes, do, good Horace,” Crispinus said.

“Thank you, sir,” Horace said.

He then said to himself:

“By God’s death! I must beg his permission to piss, soon, or beg his permission to leave so that I may go away from here with half my teeth — before I am an old man. I am in some such fear.

“This tyranny is strange, to take my ears up by commission whether or not I am willing, and make them lay-stalls — repositories of worthless stuff — to his lewd solecisms and worded trash.”

Solecisms are irregularities in language. One meaning of “lewd” is “unlettered.”

Horace continued saying to himself:

“Happy are thou, bold Bolanus, now, I say, whose freedom and impatience of this fellow would long before this have called him ‘fool,’ and ‘fool,’ and ‘rank and tedious fool,’ and have slung jests as hard as stones until thou had pelted him out of the place, while my tame modesty suffers — allows — my wit to be made a solemn ass to bear his fopperies.”

Bolanus, a friend to Cicero, had a hot temper and would not put up with someone such as Crispinus but would be intentionally rude to him and so get rid of him.

Crispinus said, “Horace, thou are miserably desirous to be gone, I see. But — please, let’s prove — attempt — to enjoy thee awhile. Thou have no business, I assure myself. To where is thy journey directed, huh?”

“Sir, I am going to visit a friend who is sick,” Horace said.

“A friend? Who’s he? Do I know him?” Crispinus asked.

“No, sir, you do not know him,” Horace said.

He then said to himself, “And your not knowing him is not the worse for him.”

“What’s his name? Where’s he lodged?” Crispinus asked.

“Where I shall be fearful to draw you out of your way, sir: a great distance from here,” Horace said. “Please, sir, let’s part.”

“Nay, but where is it?” Crispinus said. “I ask thee, tell me.”

Horace answered, "On the far side of the Tiber River."

He pointed and said, "Yonder, by Caesar's gardens."

These were the gardens that Julius Caesar had left to the Roman people in his will.

"Oh, that's my course directly," Crispinus said. "I am ready to go with you. Come, go. Why do thou stand here?"

"Yes, sir," Horace said. "By the Virgin Mary, the plague is in that part of the city; I had almost forgotten to tell you, sir."

"Bah!" Crispinus said. "That doesn't matter; I fear no pestilence. I have not offended Phoebus."

Phoebus Apollo was the god of plague.

Horace said to himself, "I have offended Phoebus Apollo, it seems, or else this heavy scourge could never have alighted on me —"

"Come along," Crispinus said. "Let's go."

Horace pointed in a different direction from the one he had first pointed to, and he said, "I am to go down some half mile this way, sir, first, to speak with his physician; and from thence to his apothecary, where I shall stay during the mixing of many different drugs —"

"Why, it's all one," Crispinus said. "I have nothing to do, and I don't love to be idle; I'll bear thee company. What do thou call the apothecary?"

Horace said to himself, "Oh, I wish that I knew a name that would frighten him, now!"

He then said out loud, "Sir, his name is Rhadamanthus; Rhadamanthus, sir. There's one so called by the same name who is a just judge in hell and inflicts strange vengeance on all those who here on earth torment poor patient spirits."

Dante has no circle exclusively for boors in his Inferno. An oversight? Perhaps boors are punished where thieves are punished: Boors steal time.

“He dwells at the Three Furies, by Janus’ temple?” Crispinus asked.

“Your apothecary does, sir,” Horace said.

“By God’s heart, I owe him money for sweetmeats, and he has brought a legal action to arrest me, I hear,” Crispinus said, “but —”

Horace interrupted, “Sir, I have made a most solemn vow: I will never bail any man.”

Horace would not pay Crispinus’ debt to the apothecary.

“Well, then, I’ll swear and speak fair words to him, if the worst should come,” Crispinus said. “But his name is Minos, not Rhadamanthus, Horace.”

“That may be, sir,” Horace said. “I just guessed at his name by his sign. But your Minos is a judge, too, sir!”

Minos is another judge in the Underworld.

Crispinus said:

“I protest to thee, Horace, do but taste me — try me out — once. If I know myself and my own virtues truly, thou will not make that esteem of Varius, or Virgil, or Tibullus, or any of them indeed, as now in thy ignorance thou do, which I am content to forgive.”

In other words: If you, Horace, get to know me better, you will not hold in such high esteem Varius, or Virgil, or Tibullus, or your other poet-friends.

Lucius Varius Rufus, a poet-friend of Virgil, the author of the Aeneid, had introduced Horace to Maecenas.

Crispinus continued:

“I would like to see which of these could pen more verses in a day, or with more facility, than I; or see who could court his mistress, kiss her hand, make better sport with her fan or her dog —”

“I cannot bail you yet — for all that — sir,” Horace interrupted.

Crispinus continued:

“— or who could move his body more gracefully, or dance better. You should see me dance, if we were not in the street —”

“Nor yet,” Horace said.

He still would not pay Crispinus’ debt to the apothecary.

Crispinus said, “Why, I have been a reveler, and at my cloth of silver suit and my long stocking in my time, and will be again —”

“My cloth of silver suit and my long stocking” were party clothes. “Cloth of silver” was expensive fabric sewn with silver thread. Dancers wore long stockings.

Horace said, “If you may be trusted, sir.”

Crispinus will dance again if mercers will trust him and give him credit to buy fancy cloth and clothing.

“And then for my singing,” Crispinus said, “Hermogenes himself envies me. He is the only master of music that you have in Rome.”

“Is your mother living, sir?” Horace asked.

“Au!” Crispinus said. “Convert thy thoughts to something else, please.”

“Au” is an expression of woe.

“You have much of the mother in you, sir,” Horace said.
“Your father is dead?”

“The mother” means “hysteria.” But Horace may have meant that Crispinus was effeminate.

“Aye, I thank Jove, and my grandfather, too, and all my kinsfolks, and they are well composed in their urns,” Crispinus said.

“Well composed” means “at peace.”

“Well ’composed” means “well decomposed.”

Horace said to himself, “The more their happiness, who rest in peace, free from the abundant torture of thy tongue. I wish that I were with them, too.”

“What’s that, Horace?” Crispinus asked.

Horace said, “I now remember, sir, a sad fate a cunning woman, a fortune teller, one Sabella, sung when in her urn she cast — forecast by casting lots — my destiny, when I was just a child.”

“What sad fate was it, please?” Crispinus asked.

Horace answered:

“She told me I should surely never perish by famine, poison, or the enemy’s sword. The hectic fever, cough, or pleurisy should never hurt me, nor the movement-retarding and late-in-life-coming gout. But in my time I should be once surprised and taken unawares by a strong, tedious talker, who should vex me and almost bring me to consumption.

“Therefore, she warned me if I were wise to shun all such long-winded monsters as my bane. For if I could but escape that one discourser, I might, no doubt, prove to become an old, aged man.”

Ready to leave, he said, “By your leave, sir?”

Crispinus said:

“Tut, tut, abandon this idle humor; it is nothing but melancholy.

“Before Jove, now that I think of it, I am to appear in court here to answer to one who has a lawsuit against me.

“Sweet Horace, go with me. This is my hour; if I neglect it, the law will proceed against me. Thou are familiar with these things. Please, if thou respect me, go with me.”

Horace said:

“Now let me die, sir, if I know the laws or have the power to stand still half so long in the laws’ loud courts, while a case is argued.

“Besides, you know, sir, where I am to go, and the necessity —”

Crispinus interrupted, “That is true —”

Horace said to himself, “I hope that the hour of my release has come! He will upon this consideration discharge me, surely.”

“Indeed, I am doubtful what I may best do: whether to leave thee, or my affairs, Horace,” Crispinus said.

“O Jupiter!” Horace said. “Leave me, sir; leave me, by any means. I beseech you, leave me, sir.”

“No, in faith, I’ll risk ignoring my affairs for now,” Crispinus said. “Thou shall see I love and respect thee. Come, Horace.”

“Nay, then, I am desperate and out of hope,” Horace said. “I follow you, sir. It is hard contending with a man who overcomes resistance in this way.”

“And how deals Maecenas with thee?” Crispinus asked. “Liberally, huh? Is he open-handed? Bountiful?”

Maecenas was a patron to Roman poets such as Horace.

“He’s still himself, sir,” Horace answered.

Crispinus said:

“Truly, Horace, thou are exceedingly happy and fortunate in thy friends and acquaintances: They are all the most choice spirits and of the first rank of Romans.

“I don’t know any poet, I declare, who has used his good fortune more prosperously than thou have. If thou would make me known to Maecenas, I should second thy well-deserved good fortune well. Thou should find a good, sure assistant of me: one who would speak all good of thee in thy absence and be content with the place just under yours, not envying thy reputation with thy patron. Let me not live if I don’t think thou and I, in a small time, should lift them all out of favor, both Virgil, Varius, and the best of them, and enjoy him wholly to ourselves.”

Crispinus wanted to bring Horace’s friends — Virgil, Varius, and the best of the other poets — out of favor with Maecenas.

Horace said to himself, “Gods, you do know it, I can hold myself back no longer. This breeze — this horsefly — has pricked my patience.”

He said to Crispinus, “Sir, Your Silkness clearly mistakes Maecenas and his house, to think there breathes a spirit beneath his roof subject to those poor affections and emotions of undermining envy and detraction — moods proper only to base, groveling minds.”

Such as the mind of Crispinus.

Horace continued:

“There is no place in Rome, I dare affirm, that is purer or freer from such low, common evils than Maecenas’ house. In the house of Maecenas, no man is grieved that this man is thought richer or this other man is thought more learned. Each man has his place, and to each man’s merit Maecenas gives his reward of grace, which with a mutual love they all embrace.”

“You report a wonder!” Crispinus said. “It is scarcely credible, this.”

“I am no torturer to force you to believe it, but it is so,” Horace said.

“Why, this inflames me with a more ardent desire to be his than before,” Crispinus said. “But I fear I shall find the entrance to his familiarity — to himself and to his intimate circle — somewhat more than difficult, Horace.”

“Tut, you’ll conquer him as you have conquered me,” Horace said. “There’s no standing against and resisting you, sir; I see that. Either your importunity or the intimation of your good qualities, or —”

Crispinus was unwilling to rely on his “good” qualities, so he said:

“Nay, I’ll bribe his porter and the servants of his chamber, and make his doors open to me that way first; and then I’ll observe my times to see the best time to approach him.

“If he should extrude and expel me from his house today, shall I therefore desist, or abandon my suit tomorrow? No.

I'll attend him, follow him, meet him in the street, the highways, run by his coach, never leave him.

“What! Man has nothing given to him in this life without much labor.”

Horace said, under his breath:

“And impudence.

“Archer of heaven, Phoebus, take thy bow and with a full-drawn arrow-shaft nail to the earth this Python, so that I may yet run away from here and live.”

Phoebus Apollo killed a python that guarded Delphi. Afterward, Delphi became a site sacred to Apollo.

Horace continued saying to himself:

“Or, brawny Hercules, come down and — although thou make it thy thirteenth labor — rescue me from this Hydra of discourse here.”

Hercules' second labor of twelve was killing the Lernaean Hydra. In accomplishing this labor, Hercules had the help of a nephew named Iolaus. The Hydra of Lerna had nine heads, the middle of which was immortal. Hercules and Iolaus traveled to Lerna and found the Hydra's lair. Hercules forced the Hydra to leave its lair by shooting flaming arrows into the lair. Hercules fought the Hydra, but he discovered that each time a mortal head was cut off, two more heads grew in its place. Hera gave Hercules even more trouble by sending an enormous crab to fight him, but Hercules crushed the crab. Hercules then got help from Iolaus. Each time Hercules cut off one of the Hydra's mortal heads, Iolaus cauterized it with a torch, thus preventing more heads from growing. Hercules then cut off the immortal head and placed it under a boulder. The blood of the Hydra was poisonous, and before leaving, Hercules dipped the heads of his arrows into the Hydra's blood.

— 3.2 —

Fuscus Aristius, a scholar and writer, and one of Horace's friends, entered the scene.

"Horace, we are well met," Aristius said.

Horace said quietly to Aristius, "Oh, welcome, my reliever! Aristius, as thou love and respect me, ransom me."

"What ails thou, man?" Aristius asked.

Horace said quietly:

"By God's death, I am seized on here by a land-remora."

A remora was a kind of sucking fish that was thought to be able to attach itself to a ship and retard its progress.

He continued quietly:

"I cannot stir, cannot move, except as he please."

"Will thou go, Horace?" Crispinus asked.

Horace said quietly:

"By God's heart! He cleaves to me like Alcides' shirt, tearing my flesh and sinews."

"Alcides" means "Hercules, aka Heracles."

A Centaur named Nessus once tried to rape Deianira, Hercules' wife. Hercules and Deianeira had to cross a river. Nessus offered to carry Deianeira across the river, but then he attempted to rape her. Hercules shot him with an arrow whose head had been dipped into the poisonous blood of the Hydra. Before Nessus died, he told Deianeira that his blood had a magical quality; it was a love potion. He said that if Deianeira were to ever think that Hercules was in love with someone else, she could make him love her again by smearing Nessus' blood on the inside of a robe and then giving it to Hercules to wear. Deianeira believed him, but it was a trick. She thought that Hercules was falling in love with someone else, so she did what Nessus had told her to do, but Hercules' arrow had poisoned the blood of the Centaur. When Hercules put on the robe, Nessus' blood, which was infected by the poisonous blood of the Hydra, burned Hercules like acid, as Nessus had known it would. In agony, Hercules climbed on a funeral pyre, lit it, and burned himself to death. Once dead, he became a god and lived on Mount Olympus.

Horace continued quietly:

“Oh, I have been vexed and tortured with him beyond forty fevers.

“For Jove's sake, find some means to take me from him!”

Aristius said loudly, “Yes, I will, but I'll go first and tell Maecenas.”

Crispinus said to Horace, “Come, shall we go?”

Aristius said loudly, “The jest will make his eyes run with tears of laughter, indeed.”

He started to leave.

“Nay, Aristius?” Horace said.

“Farewell, Horace,” Aristius said, leaving.

“By God's death! Will he leave me?” Horace said.

He called after him, “Fuscus Aristius, do you hear me? Gods of Rome!”

Aristius returned, and Horace said, “You said you had something to say to me in private.”

“Aye, but I see that you are now employed with that gentleman,” Aristius said. “It would be an offence to trouble you. I’ll take some better opportunity; farewell.”

He exited.

Horace said, “Mischief and torment! O my soul and heart, how you are cramped with anguish! Death itself brings not the like convulsions. O this day! That ever I should view the day’s tedious face —”

“Horace, what passion, what humor is this?” Crispinus asked.

“Away, good monster,” Horace said. “Don’t afflict me.”

He said to himself, “Crispinus? A friend, and mock me thus! Never was a man so left under the axe.”

Was the axe used in sacrifice or in execution?

He then asked, “What is this now?”

— 3.3 —

Minos and two Lictors entered the scene. Lictors had the power to arrest people. Minos was the apothecary to whom Crispinus owed money.

A short distance from Crispinus, Minos pointed him out to the Lictors and said, “That’s he in the embroidered hat there, with the ash-colored feather: His name is Laberius Crispinus.”

The two Lictors came forward, and the First Lictor said, “Laberius Crispinus, I arrest you in the Emperor’s name.”

“Me, sir?” Crispinus asked. “Do you arrest me?”

“Aye, sir, at the suit of Master Minos the apothecary,” the First Lictor answered.

Horace said to himself, “Thanks, great Apollo! I will not let slip — will not overlook — thy favor offered me in my escape, for my fortunes.”

He definitely did not want to let slip his chance to escape.

Unobserved by Crispinus, Horace exited.

“Master Minos? I know no Master Minos,” Crispinus said.

He looked around and said, “Where’s Horace? Horace? Horace?”

Coming forward, Minos asked, “Sir, don’t you know me?”

Seeing him, Crispinus said, “Oh, yes, I know you, Master Minos, I beg your pardon. But Horace? God’s me, has he gone?”

“Aye, and so would you, too, if you knew how,” Minos said.

He then said to the First Lictor, “Officer, look to him.”

The Lictors approached Crispinus to arrest him and take him away.

“Listen, Master Minos,” Crispinus said. “Please let us be treated like a man of our own fashion. By Janus and Jupiter, I meant to have paid you next week every drachma I owe you. Don’t seek to eclipse and darken my reputation thus vulgarly and publicly.”

“Sir, your oaths cannot serve you,” Minos said. “You know I have forborne you a long time.”

He had waited a long time for the debt to be repaid, and the debt had not been repaid.

“I am conscious of it, sir,” Crispinus said.

The Lictors grabbed him and began to haul him away.

Crispinus said, “Nay, I beg you, gentlemen, do not exhale me thus; remember my debt is only for sweetmeats —”

By “exhale me,” he meant “haul me away.”

“Sweet meat must have sour sauce, sir,” the First Lictor said. “Come along.”

The Lictors began to drag Crispinus away.

“Sweet Master Minos!” Crispinus said. “I am forfeited to eternal disgrace if you do not commiserate.”

He wanted Minos to take pity on him.

He said to the First Lictor, “Good officer, be not so officious — so zealous in your work.”

— 3.4 —

Tucca entered the scene with two of his Pyrgi.

Tucca said to the Lictors, “Why, how are you now, my good pair of bloodhounds? Whither do you drag the gentleman? You mongrels, you curs, you bandogs, we are Captain Tucca who is talking to you, you inhumane — inhuman and uncivilized — pilchers.”

Bandogs are attack dogs that are kept chained up.

A pilcher is a worthless person.

Minos said to Tucca, “Sir, he is their prisoner.”

“Their pestilence!” Tucca said. “Who are you, sir?”

“A citizen of Rome, sir,” Minos said.

“Then you are not far distant from a fool, sir,” Tucca said.

“I am an apothecary, sir,” Minos said.

“I knew thou weren’t a physician,” Tucca said. “I can tell by the smell.”

He sniffed Minos and then said, “Bah! Get out of my nostrils! Thou stink of lotium and the syringe. Away, quacksalver!”

“Lotium” is stale urine, used as a hair dressing.

A quacksalver is a quack: a bad physician.

Tucca said to the first Pyrgus, “Follower, my sword!”

The first Pyrgus handed him his sword and said, “Here, noble leader.”

He then said to himself, “You’ll do no harm with it, I’ll trust you.”

Tucca said to the First Lictor:

“Do you hear, you, goodman slave? Hook, ram, rogue, catchpole!”

Arresting officers sometimes used a staff with a hook. Battering-rams were used to batter down doors. Catchpoles were officers who arrested debtors.

Tucca continued:

“Let loose the gent’man, or by my velvet arms —”

The First Lictor kicked Tucca’s heels and knocked him to the ground.

Catching Tucca’s sword, the First Lictor said, “What will you do, sir?”

“Kiss thy hand, my honorable active varlet, and embrace thee, like this,” Tucca said, attempting to perform the actions.

The First Pyrgus said to himself, “Oh, patient metamorphosis!”

Tucca had quickly metamorphosed into a patient man.

Tucca said to the First Lictor, “My sword, my tall — brave and valiant — rascal.”

“Nay, not so fast, sir,” the First Lictor said. “Some of us are wiser than some others.”

“What! And a wit, too!” Tucca said. “By Pluto, thou must be cherished, slave.”

He gave the First Lictor money and said, “Here’s three drachmas for thee; hold.”

He meant for the Lictor to hold off from arresting this man.

The First Pyrgus said to himself, “There’s half his lendings gone.”

Tucca’s “lendings” consisted of the six drachmas he had “borrowed” — that is, conned — from Ovid Senior.

Tucca said to the First Lictor, “Give me the sword.”

“No, sir, your first word shall stand,” the First Lictor said. “I’ll hold all.”

He would hold on to the sword and the money.

Tucca started to argue, “Nay, but, rogue —”

The First Lictor said, “You would make a forcible rescue of our prisoner, sir, would you?”

“I, a rescue?” Tucca said. “Go away, inhuman varlet! Come, come, I never relish above one jest at most; do not disgust me with your jests, sirrah, do not. Rogue, I tell thee, rogue, do not.”

“What, sir? ‘Rogue’?” the First Lictor said.

“Aye,” Tucca said. “Why, thou are not angry, rascal? Are thou angry?”

“I cannot tell, sir,” the First Lictor said. “I am little better than angry at these terms you are calling me.”

Tucca said:

“Ha! Gods and fiends! Why, do thou hear? Rogue, thou, give me thy hand. I say unto thee, give me thy hand, rogue.”

The First Lictor did not shake hands with him.

Tucca continued:

“What? Don’t thou know me? Not me, rogue? Not Captain Tucca, rogue?”

Minos said to the First Lictor, “Come, please surrender the gentleman’s sword to him, officer; we’ll have no fighting here.”

Tucca asked Minos, “What’s thy name?”

“Minos, if it pleases you.”

“Minos?” Tucca said. “Come here, Minos; thou are a wise fellow, it seems. Let me talk with thee.”

Crispinus said, “Was ever any wretch as wretched as unfortunate I?”

Tucca and Minos talked together quietly.

Tucca flattered Minos, “Thou are one of the Centumviri, old boy, aren’t thou?”

The Centumviri were a group of Romans who could be selected to serve as jurors in a civil court. The position was prestigious.

“No, indeed, Master Captain,” Minos said.

“Come, thou shall be, then,” Tucca said. “I’ll have thee made one, Minos. Take my sword from those rascals, do thou see? Go, do it; I cannot attempt the deed with patience.”

Tucca then said out loud, “What does this gent’man owe thee, little Minos?”

“Fourscore sesterces, sir,” Minos answered.

Tucca said, “What? No more? Come, thou shall release him, Minos. Tell you what, I’ll be his bail and put up security for his repayment of the debt; thou shall take my word, old boy, and cashier — dismiss — these Furies. Thou shall do it, I say, thou shall, little Minos, thou shall.”

Literally, Furies are female avenging spirits from hell. Figuratively, they are the two Lictors.

“Yes; and as I am a gentleman and a reveler, I’ll make a piece of poetry, and absolve — pay back — all within these five days,” Crispinus said.

He was planning to write a poem for which Maecenas, patron of poets, would reward him with money.

Tucca said to Crispinus, “Come, Minos is not to learn — he already knows — how to treat a gent’man of quality, I know.”

He then said to Minos, “Give me my sword. If he — Crispinus — does not repay thee, I will and I must, old boy. Thou shall be my apothecary, too. Have thou good eringoes, Minos?”

Eringoes are a kind of sweetmeat: candied sea holly root.

“The best in Rome, sir,” Minos said.

“Go to, then,” Tucca said.

“Go to” is commonly used in the phrase “Go to hell,” but Tucca wanted to go to Minos’ shop.

He said to his two Pyrgi, “Vermin, know the house.”

In other words: Case Minos’ shop for things that Tucca can con out of Minos.

“I promise you we will, Colonel,” the First Pyrgus said.

Indicating Crispinus, Tucca said to Minos, “What about this gent’man, Minos?”

“I’ll take your word, Captain,” Minos said.

He would take Tucca’s word that he would repay Crispinus’ debt if Crispinus did not.

“Thou have it,” Tucca said. “My sword —”

A military man needed a sword. It was a disgrace for him to be without one.

“Yes, sir,” Minos replied.

He then said to Crispinus, “But you must discharge the arrest, Master Crispinus. You must pay the Lictors for their service.”

In this society, police officers — Lictors — were paid to make an arrest.

“What, Minos!” Tucca said. “Look in the gent’man’s face and just read his silence.”

In other words: He is silent and distressed because he has no money.

Tucca then said, “Pay the Lictors, pay them; releasing a gent’man is the honorable thing to do, Minos.”

Minos paid the Lictors, who released Crispinus.

Ignoring Minos, who was of a lower social class than he, Crispinus said to Tucca, “By Jove, sweet Captain, you do most infinitely endear and oblige me to you.”

“Tut, I cannot compliment, by Mars; but may Jupiter love me as I love good words and good clothes, and there’s an end to this,” Tucca said. “Thou shall give my boy that girdle and hangers when thou have worn them a little more —”

Not being a true military man, Tucca could not compliment by Mars, god of war. “To compliment” means “to use ceremonious language.”

A girdle is a belt. This belt had hangers: loops that could be used to carry weapons.

“O Jupiter!” Crispinus said. “Captain, he shall have them now, immediately.”

He said to the First Pyrgus, “May it please you to be acceptive, young gentleman.”

“Yes, sir, fear not,” the First Pyrgus said. “I shall accept.”

He then said to himself, “I have a pretty, foolish humor of taking, aka stealing, if you — Crispinus — knew all.”

Tucca said to the First Pyrgus, “Not now. You shall not take, boy.”

“By my truth and earnest, but he shall, Captain, by your leave,” Crispinus said.

Tucca said to the First Pyrgus, “Well, if he swear by his truth and earnest, take it, boy. Do not make a gent’man forsworn.”

Crispinus took off and gave his belt and hangers to the First Pyrgus while Tucca talked to the Lictors.

The First Lictor gave Tucca the sword he had confiscated and said, “Well, sir, there is your sword; but thank Master Minos. You would not have carried it — the sword and the situation — off as you do now, otherwise.”

The Lictors started to leave.

Tucca said, “Minos is just, and you are knaves, and —”

The First Lictor turned back and said, “What did you say, sir?”

Tucca said:

“Pass on, my good scoundrel, pass on. I honor thee.”

The Lictors started to leave.

Tucca added:

“But except that I hate to have action with such base rogues as these, you should have seen me unrip their noses now, and have sent them to the closest barber’s for stitching; for, do you see —”

At this time, barbers also served as doctors.

The Lictors turned back.

Tucca hastily said:

“I am a man of humor, and I do love the varlets, the honest varlets; they have intelligence and valor, and are indeed good, profitable and useful —”

The Lictors exited.

Tucca concluded:

“— arrant rogues as any who live in an empire.”

Tucca then said quietly to Crispinus, “Listen, poetaster. Second me. Back me up.”

He said loudly, “Stand by me, Minos. Get close to me.”

He said to Crispinus and Minos, "Gather closer yet. Good."

He said, "Sir," and then whispered to Crispinus, "thou shall have a quarter share; be resolute."

Tucca wanted to con Minos, and he wanted Crispinus to help in the con. If Crispinus helped, he would get part of what was conned from Minos.

Tucca then said loudly to Crispinus, "You shall, at my request, take Minos by the hand here, little Minos. I will have it so: all friends, and a toast to good health. Be not inexorable."

He then said to Minos:

"And thou shall impart — provide — the wine, old boy; thou shall do it, little Minos, thou shall; make us pay for it in our bill for medicine.

"What! We must live and honor the gods sometimes: Now Bacchus, now Comus, now Priapus — every god a little."

Bacchus is the god of drinking, Comus is the god of partying, and Priapus is the god of sex.

Histrion, an actor, entered the scene.

Tucca said:

"Who's he who stalks by there?"

"Boy, Pyrgus, you were best to let him pass, sirrah. Do, ferret, let him pass, do."

"He is an actor, sir," the First Pyrgus said.

Learning that the man was only an actor, Tucca said:

"An actor? Call him; call the lousy slave hither.

“What! Will he sail by and not once strike or vail to a man-of-war, huh?”

A lesser ship would lower its flag as a sign of respect to a war ship. Tucca wanted the actor to take off his hat to honor him.

Tucca called to Histrio, “Do you hear me? You, actor, rogue, stalker! Come back here! No respect to men of worship, you slave?”

Histrio turned back and approached Tucca.

Tucca said:

“What! You are proud, you rascal? Are you proud, huh? You grow rich, do you? And purchase possessions, you twopenny tearmouth?”

Twopenny tearmouths were actors who ranted and raved and pleased audience members in the two-penny seats.

Tucca continued:

“You have Fortune and the good year on your side, you stinkard? Have you? Have you?”

“What the goodyear!” meant “What the Dickens!” The phrase “the goodyear” was used negatively in imprecations.

“Nay, sweet Captain, be confined to some reason,” Histrio said. “I protest — declare — I didn’t see you, sir.”

Tucca replied:

“You did not? Where was your sight, Oedipus?”

Oedipus blinded himself in Sophocles’ tragedy Oedipus Rex.

Tucca continued:

“You sleepwalk with hare’s eyes, do you?”

Hares were believed to sleep with their eyes open.

Tucca continued:

“I’ll have them glazed, rogue; if you say the word, they shall be glazed for you.”

“Glazed” means 1) wear eyeglasses, or 2) beat you so that your eyes are glazed with tears.

Tucca continued:

“Come, we must have you turn fiddler again, slave, get a bass — or base — violin at your back and march in a tawny coat with one sleeve — a minstrel’s costume with only one sleeve due to poverty — to Green Goose Fair.”

Many actors were also musicians.

Tucca continued:

“— and then you’ll know us; you’ll see us then. You will, you gulch — you drunk and glutton — you will.”

Mimicking a strolling musician, Tucca said, “Then you’ll say, ‘Will it please Your Worship to have any music, Captain?’”

Laughing, Histrio said, “Nay, good Captain.”

Tucca said:

“What! Do you laugh, Owlglass? Do you laugh, jester?”

Owlglass was the hero of a German jest book: Til Eulenspiegel. The German name Eulenspiegel means “Owl Mirror.” A glass is a mirror.

Tucca continued:

“By God’s death, you perstemptuous varlet, I am none of your fellows; I have commanded a hundred and fifty such rogues, I!”

“Perstemptuous” is Tucca-speak for “presumptuous.” And, possibly, it is a portmanteau word that includes the meanings of “contemptuous” and “preposterous.”

The First Pyrgus said to himself, “Aye, and most of that hundred and fifty have been leaders of a legion.”

That is, a legion of lice.

“A hundred and fifty” is a unit of infantry.

“If I have exhibited — presented and manifested — wrong, I’ll tender satisfaction, Captain,” Histrio said.

“Say thou so, honest vermin?” Tucca said. “Give me thy hand; thou shall make us a supper one of these nights.”

“Make us a supper” means “pay for a meal for us at a tavern.”

“When you please, by Jove, Captain, most willingly,” Histrio said.

Pleased by the answer, Tucca said:

“Do thou swear? Tomorrow, then. Say and hold, slave: Perform what you say you will perform. Some of you actors are honest gent’manlike scoundrels and suspected to have some wit as well as your poets, both at drinking and breaking of jests, and are companions for gallants. A man may skelder — con — ye now and then of half a dozen shillings or so.”

He pointed at Crispinus and asked:

“Don’t thou know that Pantolabus there?”

Pantolabus is a bankrupt parasite who lives at others' expense in William Fullonius' Acolastus, a Latin school play of the sixteenth century. John Palsgrave translated the play into English.

"No, I assure you, Captain," Histrio said.

Tucca said:

"Go and be acquainted with him, then. He is a gent'man, a parcel-poet, aka part-poet, you slave. His father was a man of worship, I tell thee. Go! He pens high, lofty, in a new stalking strain, bigger than half the rhymers in the town, again; he was born to fill thy mouth, Minotaurus, he was."

A Minotaurus is the Minotaur, a part-man, part-bull monster that bellows like a bull.

According to Tucca, Crispinus was born to fill Histrio's mouth with words to speak on the stage.

Tucca continued:

"He will teach thee, rascal, to tear and rand — rend and rant. Go to him; cherish his muse, go! Thou have forty, forty — shillings, I mean, stinkard. Give them to him in earnest — as an advance — do. He shall write for thee, slave."

Whenever Tucca mentioned a number, he had to think about what was the greatest amount of money he could get from a person. Should he ask for shillings, or for drachmas, or for sesterces?

Tucca continued:

"If he pen for thee once, thou shall not need to travel with thy pumps full of gravel any more after a blind jade — broken-down horse — pulling a cart with a hamper containing costumes, and stalk upon boards and barrel heads to the accompaniment of an old, cracked trumpet —"

Sometimes, barrels held up the boards forming the stage.

According to Tucca, if Crispinus writes a play for Histrio, Histrio won't need to be an impoverished actor any longer.

Apparently, either Histrio will become a rich actor or will be forced to find work different from acting.

"In truth, I think I have not so much money about me, Captain," Histrio said.

Tucca said:

"It doesn't matter; give him what thou have, Stiff toe."

Tragic actors wore stiff leather boots called buskins.

Tucca continued:

"I'll give my word for the rest. Though it lack a shilling or two, it skills not — it doesn't matter. Go, thou are an honest shifter; I'll have the statute repealed for thee."

An honest shifter is an honest haggler.

By statute, actors could be charged with being rogues or vagabonds unless their acting troupe had a high-ranking member of society as its patron.

Histrio went aside to take out his money from his purse so he could pay a down payment for Crispinus to write a play.

Tucca said, "Minos, I must tell thee, Minos" — he pointed to Crispinus — "thou have dejected yonder gent' man's spirit exceedingly by having him arrested. Do thou observe? Do thou note, little Minos?"

"Yes, sir," Minos said.

"Go to work, then," Tucca said. "Raise, recover his spirits, do. Don't allow him to droop in the sight of an actor, a rogue, a stager. Put twenty into his hand, twenty — sesterces, I mean, and let nobody see. Go, do it, the work shall commend itself: It is a good deed. Be Minos, a just person; I'll pay back the money."

"Yes, truly, Captain," Minos said.

He approached Crispinus.

The Second Pyrgus said to the First Pyrgus, "Don't we serve a notable sharker and con man?"

While Tucca and Histrio talked, Minos gave money to Crispinus.

Tucca said to Histrio, "And what new matters have you now afoot, sirrah, huh? I would eagerly come with my cockatrice" — a cockatrice is a prostitute — "one day and see a play, if I knew when there were a good bawdy one; but they say you have nothing but humors, revels, and satires that gird — sneer — and fart at the time, you slave."

Histrio said:

"No, I assure you, Captain, not we. Those plays are on the other side of the Tiber River."

Actually, the Thames River. Despite the play's setting of Rome, Ben Jonson's play is about London and Englishmen. No doubt Ben Jonson's satires were playing on the other side of the river.

Histrio continued:

"We have as much ribaldry in our plays as can be, as you would wish, Captain. All the sinners in the suburbs come and applaud our action daily."

Lots of people in the suburbs liked to see a play with the accompaniment of a prostitute.

Tucca said:

“I hear you’ll bring me on the stage there: You’ll play me, they say. I shall be presented by a set of copper-laced scoundrels of you.”

Tucca thought he would be satirized in a play in which the actor portraying him would be wearing copper lace instead of expensive gold lace.

Tucca continued:

“By the life of Pluto, if you stage me, stinkard, your mansions shall sweat for it, your tabernacles [tents and pavilions], varlets, your Globes and your triumphs!”

If Tucca finds out that he has been satirized on stage, his anger will be so great that the buildings — such as the Globe Theatre — the plays are staged in will feel his wrath.

Histrion replied, “Not we, by Phoebus, Captain. Do not do us imputation without desert — don’t criticize us unless we deserve it.”

Tucca said, “I would not, my good twopenny rascal.”

Would not do what?

Would not “do us imputation without desert”?

Would not “not do us imputation without desert”?

Tucca continued:

“Reach me thy neuf.”

“Neuf” is Tucca-speak for “nieve,” aka fist, aka hand.

They shook hands.

Tucca continued:

“Do thou hear me? What will thou give me a week for my brace of beagles here, my little point-trussers?”

Points are laces that tie men's hose (tights) to their doublets (jackets).

Tucca wanted to hire out his two Pyrgi as boy-actors.

Tucca continued:

“You shall have them act among ye.”

“Ye” is the plural of “you.”

Tucca said to the First Pyrgus, “Sirrah, you, pronounce —”

He then said to Histrio, “Thou shall hear him speak in King Darius' doleful strain.”

The First Pyrgus recited:

“O doleful days! O direful deadly dump!

“O wicked world! and worldly wickedness!

“How can I hold [back] my fist from crying ‘thump’

“In rue of this right rascal wretchedness!”

Tucca then said to the First Pyrgus, “In an amorous vein — manner — now, sirrah.”

He then said to the others, “Peace. Quiet.”

The First Pyrgus recited:

“Oh, she is wilder and more hard withal

“Than beast or bird, or tree or stony wall.

“Yet might she love me to uprear her state;

“Aye, but perhaps she hopes some nobler mate.

“Yet might she love me to content her sire;

“Aye, but her reason masters her desire.

“Yet might she love me as her beauty’s thrall;

“Aye, but I fear she cannot love at all.”

Tucca said to the Second Pyrgus, “Now the horrible fierce soldier: you, sirrah.”

The Second Pyrgus recited:

“What? Will I brave [defy] thee? Aye, and beard thee [pull thy beard], too!

“A Roman spirit scorns to bear a brain

“So full of base pusillanimity.”

“Excellent!” Histrio said.

Tucca said to Histrio, “Nay, thou shall see that which shall ravish — enchant — thee soon; prick up thine ears, stinkard.”

He then said to his two Pyrgi, “The ghost, boys.”

The First Pyrgus recited, “Vindicta!”

The Second Pyrgus recited, Timoria!”

The First Pyrgus recited, “Vindicta!”

The Second Pyrgus recited, “Timoria!”

The First Pyrgus recited, “Veni!”

The Second Pyrgus recited, “Veni!”

“Timoria!” means “Retribution!”

“Vindicta!” means “Revenge!”

“Veni!” means “I come!”

Tucca said to the Second Pyrgus, “Now thunder, sirrah: you, the rumbling actor.”

Drums could be used to simulate thunder.

The Second Pyrgus said, “Aye, but somebody must cry ‘murder!’ then, in a small voice.”

A small voice is a female’s high voice.

“Your fellow sharer there shall do it,” Tucca said.

The two sharers have shares in the profits of Tucca’s cons.

Tucca said to the First Pyrgus, “Cry, sirrah, cry.”

The Second Pyrgus beat a drum roll.

In a high voice, the Second Pyrgus cried, “Murder! Murder!”

The Second Pyrgus cried, “Who calls out ‘murder’?”

He then said to the First Pyrgus, “Lady, was it you?”

“Oh, admirably good, I declare,” Histrio said.

Tucca said to the Second Pyrgus, “Sirrah boy, brace your drum a little straiter — stretch the drumskin tighter — and do the other fellow there, he in the — what do thou call him?”

He said to the First Pyrgus, “And ‘yet stay,’ too.”

In Thomas Kidd’s The Spanish Tragedy is a conversation between the villain Lorenzo and a servant. Tucca was trying to remember some of the character’s dialogue since he couldn’t remember the character’s name.

The Second Pyrgus beat another drum roll.

He recited:

“Nay, an [if] thou dalliest, then I am thy foe,

“And fear shall force what friendship cannot win.”

“Thy death shall bury what thy life conceals:

“Villain! Thou diest for more respecting her —”

The First Pyrgus recited, “Oh, stay, my lord!”

The Second Pyrgus continued reciting:

“— than me.

“Yet speak the truth, and I will guerdon [reward] thee;

“But if thou dally once again, thou diest.”

“Enough of this, boy,” Tucca said.

The Second Pyrgus continued reciting:

“Why then, lament therefore! Damned be thy guts

“Unto King Pluto’s hell and princely Erebus!

“For sparrows must have food.”

Histrion said, “Please, sweet Captain, let one of them do a little of a lady.”

“Oh, he will make thee eternally enamored of him there,” Tucca said.

He said to the First Pyrgus, “Do, sirrah, do; it will allay your fellow’s fury a little.”

The First Pyrgus said in a high voice:

“Master, mock on; the scorn thou givest me,

“Pray Jove, some lady may return on thee.”

The Second Pyrgus said, “No, you shall see me do the Moor.”

He said to Tucca, “Master, lend me your scarf for a little while.”

The scarf was an English officer's sash.

The Second Pyrgus was going to recite some dialogue from George Peele's The Battle of Alcazar; the sash would be used for the turban of the Moor Muly Mahamet.

"Here," Tucca said, handing over the scarf. "It is at thy service, boy."

The Second Pyrgus said, "You, Master Minos, hark hither a little. Come here and let's talk."

He drew Minos to the side and spoke to him.

Minos and the Second Pyrgus then withdrew to make themselves ready for the scene.

Tucca said to Histrio, "How do thou like him? Are thou not rapt? Are thou not tickled, now? Don't thou applaud, rascal? Don't thou applaud?"

"Yes," Histrio said. "What will you ask for them to act for a week, Captain?"

Tucca answered:

"No, you mangonizing slave, I will not part from them; you'll sell them for ingles, you will."

"Mangonizing" means "trafficking in slaves," and one meaning of "ingle" is a boy used for homosexual purposes.

Tucca continued talking, this time about the guests for the upcoming supper to be hosted by Histrio:

"Let's have good cheer tomorrow night at supper, stalker, and then we'll talk. Good capon and plover, do you hear, sirrah? And do not bring your eating actor with you there; I cannot tolerate him; he will eat a leg of mutton while I am still eating my porridge, the lean Poluphagos; his belly is like Barathrum, he looks like a midwife in man's apparel, the slave."

Capons and plovers are kinds of fowl.

The words "Poluphagos" and "Barathrum" are related to eating excessively. "Polyphagous" means a voracious eater. "Barathrum" was a deep pit in Athens, Greece; the word is also applied to gluttons with a deep pit for a stomach.

Tucca continued:

"Nor bring with you the villainous out-of-tune fiddler Enobarbus; don't bring him."

"Enobarbus" means "Redbeard."

Tucca then asked:

"How much money have thou there? Six-and-thirty, huh?"

Histrion replied, "No, here's all I have, Captain: some five-and-twenty."

He gave Tucca the money and said:

"Please, sir, will you present and accommodate — give it in a way appropriate to him — to the gentleman?"

"For my own part, I am a mere stranger to his humor — I have no idea how to appropriately give him the money.

"Besides, I have some business that invites me away from here, with Master Asinius Lupus, the Tribune."

Tucca said:

"Well, go thy ways, pursue thy projects; let me alone with this design."

A design is 1) a plan, or 2) a trick.

The trick might be to keep the money for himself and not give it to Crispinus.

Tucca continued:

“My poetaster shall make thee a play, and thou shall be a man of good parts in it.”

“A man of good parts” can mean 1) a character with good qualities, or 2) an actor with many good parts. Actors sometimes performed more than one role in plays.

Tucca again considered the guest list:

“But wait, let me see: Do not bring your Aesop, your ‘politician’ who deals with officials, unless you can ram up his mouth with sweet-smelling cloves; the slave smells ranker than some sixteen dunghills and is seventeen times more rotten.

“By the Virgin Mary, you may bring Frisker, a zany clown; he’s a good skipping swaggerer; and your fat fool there, my Mango, bring him, too —”

“Mango” means “Pimp” in this context.

Tucca continued:

“— but don’t let him beg rapiers or scarves from the audience in his over-familiar playing face to use in his comic sketches, nor roar out his barren bold jests with a tormenting laughter, between drunk and dry, aka sober.

“Do you hear, Stifftoe? Give him warning, admonition, to forsake his saucy insolence and glavering — deceitful flattering — grace and his goggle eye; it does not become him, sirrah; tell him so.

“I have stood up and defended you, I, to gent’men, when you have been said to prey upon puisnes — naïve youths — and honest citizens for socks or boots to use in a play, or when they have called you usurers or brokers, or said you were able to help someone to a piece of flesh — a prostitute; I have sworn to these accusers that I did not think so.

“Nor that you were the common retreats for punks — prostitutes — decayed in the practice of their trade. I cannot believe it of you —”

Actually, Captain Tucca was one of many who brought prostitutes to see plays.

Histrion said, “Thank you, Captain. May Jupiter and the rest of the gods confine your modern delights without disgust!”

Histrion was wishing that the gods would show favor to Tucca: to let him continue indulging in his delights without him becoming sated — bored — with them.

Histrion started to leave.

Tucca said:

“Wait, thou shalt see one of my Pyrgi play the Moor before thou go.”

Demetrius entered the scene.

Tucca asked:

“Who’s he with the half arms there, who salutes us out of his cloak like a motion, huh?”

“Half arms” may mean that the elbows of his clothes were torn and covered up by his cloak. His efforts to keep the holes covered meant that he kept the upper half of his arms inside his cloak.

A “motion” is a puppet.

Histrion said:

“Oh, sir, his doublet’s a little decayed, a little worn out; he is otherwise a very simple, honest fellow, sir, one Demetrius, a dresser of plays about the town here.”

A doublet is a man’s upper garment: a jacket.

Dressers wrote, adapted, and modified plays. They worked often with collaborators.

Histrion continued:

“We have hired him to abuse Horace and make him a character in a play with all his gallants, such as Tibullus, Maecenas, Cornelius Gallus, and the rest.”

“And why so, stinkard?” Tucca said.

“Oh, it will get us a huge deal of money, Captain, and we have need of it, for this winter has made us all poorer than so many starved snakes,” Histrion said. “Nobody comes to attend our plays: not a gentleman, nor a —”

Possibly, he was going to say “prostitute.”

Tucca interrupted, “— but you know nothing about Horace, do you, to make a play about him?”

“Indeed, not much, Captain,” Histrion said, “but our author — Demetrius — will devise something that shall serve in some fashion.”

Tucca said:

“Why, my Parnassus here shall help him if thou want.”

Parnassus is a mountain sacred to the Muses. Tucca was using the word as a name for Crispinus.

Tucca then asked:

“Can thy author do it impudently enough?”

“Oh, I promise you, Captain, he can, and spitefully enough, too,” Histrio said. “He has one of the most overflowing rank wits in Rome. He will slander any man who breathes, if he is disgusted by him.”

Tucca said:

“I’ll know the poor, egregious, nitty rascal, if he has these commendable qualities.”

“Nitty” means “infested with nits” — the eggs of lice.

Tucca continued:

“I’ll cherish him — wait, here comes the Tartar — I’ll make a gathering for him, I will: a purse of money, and put the poor slave in fresh rags.”

A purse is a container for money.

In slang, a Tartar is a thief or beggar.

The “poor slave” was Demetrius.

The Tartar is a character whom the Second Pyrgus would perform.

Since the Tartar is a tall character, the Second Pyrgus was sitting on Minos’ shoulders.

Tucca said to Histrio, “Tell him — tell Demetrius — about the purse of money, to comfort him.”

He then said to the Second Pyrgus, “Well done, boy.”

The Second Pyrgus recited:

“Where art [are] thou, boy? Where is Calipolis [the Tartar’s wife]?”

“Fight, earthquakes, in the entrails of the earth,

“And eastern whirlwinds in the hellish shades!”

“Some foul contagion of the infected heavens

“Blast all the trees, and in their cursed tops

“The dismal night-raven and tragic owl

“Breed, and become forerunners of my fall!”

Tucca said to Histrio:

“Well, now fare thee well, my honest penny-biter.”

Tucca was saying that Histrio was an honest collector of the fees for seeing the play from audience members. He would bite a penny to make sure it was genuine.

Tucca continued:

“Commend me to Seven-shares-and-a-half — the majority share-holder — and remember tomorrow’s supper. If you lack a service, you shall play in my name, rascals, but you shall buy your own clothing, and I’ll have two shares for my countenance — my patronage.”

He would be the patron — the sponsor — of the company.

By statute, actors could be charged with being rogues or vagabonds unless their acting troupe had a high-ranking member of society as its patron.

Histrio and Demetrius started to exit, but Tucca said to Histrio, “Let thy author stay with me.”

Demetrius, the author, said to Tucca, “Yes, sir. “

Histrio exited.

Tucca said to Minos, “It was well done, little Minos, thou did stalk well. Forgive me that I said thou stunk, Minos; it was the savor of a poet I met sweating in the street, the stink hangs yet in my nostrils.”

Crispinus asked, “Who was it? Horace?”

“Aye, it was he,” Tucca said. “Do thou know him?”

“Oh, he forsook me most barbarously, I declare,” Crispinus said.

Tucca said, “Hang him, the fusty- and stale-smelling satyr, he smells all of goat; he carries a ram under his armholes, the slave. I am the worse when I see him.”

Tucca and Crispinus then spoke quietly together a little distance from Minos and Demetrius.

Tucca asked, “Did Minos impart money to you?”

Showing Tucca the money, Crispinus said, “Yes, here are twenty drachmas he did convey to me.”

Hmm. Drachmas? More likely, sesterces. Unless Minos was suddenly generous.

Tucca said, “Well said. Keep them; we’ll share soon.”

He then said loudly, “Come, little Minos.”

Crispinus said, “Indeed, Captain, I’ll be bold to show you a mistress of mine, a woman to whom I pay attention, a jeweler’s wife, a gallantly and fashionably dressed woman, as we go along.”

Tucca replied:

“There spoke my genius — my guardian spirit. Minos, some of thy eringoes, little Minos, send them to us.”

Eringoes were supposed to be aphrodisiacs. Tucca wanted to be prepared, just in case he needed to be prepared.

Tucca said to Crispinus:

“Come hither, Parnassus.”

He indicated Demetrius and said:

“I must have thee become familiar with my little locust —
Demetrius — here; it is a good vermin, they say.”

He looked around and said:

“Look, here’s Horace and old Trebatius, the great lawyer, in his company. Let’s avoid him now; he is too well seconded.”

In other words, Horace had too strong a supporter to be approached now.

— 3.5 —

Horace the poet and Trebatius the lawyer spoke together.
Their conversation consisted of a defense of poetry and satire, and it was rhymed.

Horace said:

“There are those to whom I seem excessively sour,

“And past a satire’s law seem to extend my power;

“[And seem to extend my power past a satire’s law;]

“Others, who think whatever I have writ [written]

“Wants pith and matter to eternise it,

“[Lacks force and content to make it eternal,]

“And that they could in one day’s light disclose [to the world]

“A thousand verses such as I compose.”

Horace, Virgil, and Ben Jonson were all criticized for writing slowly.

Horace then asked:

“What shall I do, Trebatius? Tell me.”

Trebatius answered:

“Surcease. [Stop.]”

Horace said:

“And shall my muse admit no more increase?

“[And shall my muse allow no more writing of satire?]”

Trebatius answered:

“So I advise.”

Horace said:

“An ill death let me die

“If it were not best;

“[Let me die a bad death if I don’t agree that your advice is best;]

“but sleep avoids my eye,

“And I use [the time to write] these [verses], lest nights should tedious seem.”

Trebatius said:

“Rather contend to sleep, and live like them

“Who, holding golden sleep in special price,

“Rubbed with sweet oils, swim silver Tiber thrice,

“And every evening with neat wine steeped be.”

Trebatius was advising Horace to court sleep by being rubbed with oil before engaging in the vigorous exercise of swimming back and forth across the Tiber River three times, and drinking wine.

Trebatius said:

“Or, if such love of writing ravish thee,

“Then dare to sing unconquered Caesar’s deeds,

“Who cheers such actions with abundant meeds [rewards].”

Trebatius was advising Horace that if he didn’t like the first advice he had been given, then he could instead praise Augustus Caesar in his poetry — Augustus Caesar rewarded such writing.

Horace said:

“That, father, I desire.”

Tiberius was older than Horace, and Horace used the word “father” as a title of respect.

Horace continued:

“But when I try,

“I feel defects in every faculty [capacity].

“Nor is it a labor fit for every pen

“To paint the horrid troops of armed men,

“The lances burst in Gallia’s slaughtered forces,

“Or wounded Parthians tumbled from their horses.

“Great Caesar’s wars cannot be fought with words.”

Gallia and Parthia are geographical locations.

Praise of Augustus Caesar would involve praise of his generalship and his military victories, something that Horace did not think his skills were suited to do.

Trebatius said:

“Yet what his virtue in his peace affords,

“His fortitude and justice, thou can show,

“As wise Lucilius honored Scipio.”

Gaius Lucilius, the father of Roman satire, was a poet who wrote about and honored Scipio Aemilianus, a general who oversaw the defeat and destruction of Carthage in the third and final Punic War.

Horace replied:

“Of that my powers shall suffer no neglect,

“When such slight labors may aspire [to] respect.”

In other words: I will endeavor to do so, since such slight works may hope to be recognized.

Horace continued:

“But if I watch not a most chosen time,

“The humble words of Flaccus cannot climb

“The attentive ear of Caesar.”

Horace’s name was Quintus Horatius Flaccus. He worried that even if he wrote poetry praising Augustus Caesar, the Roman Emperor might not become aware of it.

Horace continued:

“Nor must I

“With less observance shun gross flattery,

“For he, reposed safe in his own merit,

“Spurns back the glozes [smooth deceiving compliments] of a fawning [flattering] spirit.”

Horace was aware that if he wrote such praising poetry, he must be careful not to overdo the praise because Augustus Caesar disliked fawning flattery.

Trebatius said:

“But how much better would such accents sound

“Than with a sad and serious verse to wound

“Pantolabus, railing in his saucy jests?

“Or Nomentanus, spent [exhausted] in riotous feasts?

“In satires, each man (though untouched) complains

“As [if] he were hurt, and hates such biting strains.”

Pantolabus was a buffoon, and Nomentanus was a spendthrift. In real life, Horace satirized both.

Horace replied:

“What shall I do? Milonius shakes his heels

“In ceaseless dances when his brain once feels

“The stirring fervor of the wine ascend

“And that his eyes false number apprehend

“Castor his horse, Pollux loves handy fights;

“[Where there are] A thousand heads, [there are also] a thousand choice delights.

“My pleasure is in feet my words to close,

“As, both our better, old Lucilius does.”

In other words:

People follow their passions.

Milonius loves to get drunk and dance. Castor loves his horses. Pollux loves to fight hand to hand in boxing matches.

Horace loves to write satires like his inspiration, old Lucilius, who is superior to both Horace and Trabatius, and Horace loves to put his words in metrical feet.

Horace continued:

“He as his trusty friends his books did trust

“With all his secrets, nor in things unjust

“Or actions lawful ran to other men.”

Lucilius put his secrets, good or bad, in his books, treating them like trustworthy friends. Because he did that in books, he did not need to confide those things to other men.

Horace continued:

“So that the old man’s life described was seen

“As in a votive table, in his lines.”

A votive table is a panel with an image of a danger that has been survived. People would make vows in times of danger, such as illness or shipwreck. When they had survived the danger and fulfilled the vow, they would hang a votive table in a sacred place such as a church.

Horace continued:

“And to his [Lucilius’] steps my genius inclines, “Lucanian or Apulian, I not whether [I don’t know which],

“For the Venusian colony plows either,”

In other words: Horace’s guardian spirit has guided him and shaped his character to make him want to write satire. Of course, our environment helps shape our character. Horace came from Venusia, which was settled by farmers and other people from Lucania and Apulia.

Horace continued:

“Sent thither when the Sabines were forced thence

“(As old fame sings), to give the place defense

“’gainst such as, seeing it empty, might make road [inroads, aka raids]

“Upon the empire, or there fix abode —

“Whether the Apulian borderer it were

“Or the Lucanian violence they fear.”

The Romans captured Venusia from the Sabines, and then the Romans settled loyal-to-Rome people from Lucania and Apulia in Venusia lest people hostile to Rome settled there. This helped prevent raids by enemies into Roman territory.

Horace continued:

“But this my style no living man shall touch

“If first I am not forced by base reproach;

“But, like a sheathed sword, it [my style and my writing instrument] shall defend

“My innocent life.”

In other words:

Horace is a defender, not an attacker. He will defend himself in his satire if he is attacked, but he will not attack first. His pointed writing instrument is like a sheathed sword: When needed, it can become a dangerous weapon. Because people know that, chances are they will leave him alone.

The Latin word stylus can mean 1) style, 2) sword, and 3) pointed writing instrument.

Horace continued:

“For why should I contend [strive]

“To draw it out, when no malicious thief

“Robs my good name, the treasure of my life?

“O Jupiter, let it with rust be eaten

“Before it touch or insolently threaten

“The life of any with the least disease [disquiet];

“So much I love and woo a general peace.

“But he who wrongs me, better, I proclaim,

“He never had assayed to touch my fame [reputation].

“For he shall weep, and walk with every tongue

“Throughout the city infamously sung.”

In other words: If you attack me with libel and slander, I will attack you with satire.

Horace continued:

“Servius the Praetor threats [threatens] the laws and urn

“If any at his deeds repine or spurn;

“The witch Canidia, that Albucius got [begot], “Denounceth [Proclaims] witchcraft where she loves not;

“Thurius the judge does thunder worlds of ill

“To such as strive with his judicial will.

“All men affright [frighten] their foes in what they may;

“Nature commands it, and men must obey.”

In other words: People defend themselves with what weapons they have. A Praetor can threaten to defend himself with laws and urns — jurors would place votes of guilty or not guilty in an urn. A witch can threaten to defend herself with witchcraft. A judge can threaten to defend himself by giving a heaping helping of hurt to his enemies.

Horace continued:

“Observe with me: The wolf his tooth does use,

“The bull his horn[s]. And who does this infuse

“But Nature?”

In other words: Who but Nature inspires these threats against enemies?

Horace continued:

“There’s luxurious Scaeva; [en]trust

“His long-lived mother with him, his so just

“And scrupulous right hand no mischief will,

“No more than with his heel a wolf will kill,

“Or [an] ox with jaw. Marry [By the Virgin Mary], [if you] let him alone

“With tempered [mixed] poison to remove [he will kill] the crone.”

In other words: Scaeva likes luxuries and is waiting for his aged mother to die so he can get her inheritance. His right hand will do her no harm, just as a wolf will do no harm with a heel or an ox will do no harm with a jaw. But a wolf has jaws and an ox has horns, and Scaeva has a sinister — left — hand that will serve poison to her quickly if he has the opportunity.

Horace continued:

“But briefly: If to age I destined be,

“Or that quick death’s black wings environ [wrap around] me;

“If rich, or poor; at Rome, or fate command

“I shall be banished to some other land;

“What hue soever my whole state shall bear,

“I will write satires still, in spite of fear.”

In other words: Whether I live for a long time or I live for a short time, whether I live at Rome or I am exiled, whether I have a not-dark, fortunate life or a dark, unfortunate life, I will always write satires, even if I am afraid of the effects of doing so.

Trebatius replied:

“Horace, I fear thou draw’st no lasting breath,

“And that some great man’s friend will be thy death.”

In other words: I am afraid that you won’t live long, and that having Lucilius, the friend of Scipio Aemilianus, aka Scipio Africanus the Younger, as your satiric influence will result in your death.

Horace said:

“What? When the man who first did satirize

“Durst [dared] pull the skin over the ears of vice

“And make who stood in outward fashion clear

“Give place, as foul within, shall I forbear?”

In other words: My satiric influence, Lucilius, the father of Roman satire, did such things as metaphorically flay the ears of a man of vice and show that a man who appeared to be good was actually bad. If he was able to do such things, should I decide not to do them out of fear?

Horace continued:

“Did Laelius, or the man so great with fame

“That [Who] from sacked Carthage fetched his worthy name,

“Storm that Lucilius did Metellus pierce

“Or bury Lupus quick in famous verse?”

In other words: Gaius Laelius was a soldier and consul who was called Sapiens, aka “the Wise.” He was friends with Scipio Amelianus, aka Scipio Africanus Minor (the Younger), a Roman hero of the Third Punic War against Carthage in North Africa. Neither of them objected when Lucilius satirized Metellus or Lupus. Metellus was a Censor; he and Scipio disagreed about some things, but without animosity. Lucius Cornelius Lentulus Lupus, who was Consul in 156 BCE, was metaphorically buried quick — alive — by Lucilius’ satire.

Lucilius died in 103 BCE.

Horace’s life dates are 65 BCE to 8 CE.

Augustus Caesar reigned as Roman Emperor from 27 BCE. to 14 CE.

Horace continued:

“Rulers and subjects by whole tribes he checked,

“But virtue and her friends did still protect.”

In other words: Lucilius satirized both the high-born and the low-born, but he always protected virtuous people.

Horace continued:

“And when from sight or from the judgment seat

“The virtuous Scipio and wise Laelius met

“Unbraced with him, in all light sports [entertainments] they shared,

“Till their most frugal suppers were prepared.”

In other words: Scipio and Laelius often met with Lucilius in private, where they relaxed — unbraced themselves — and had a meal together.

Horace continued:

“Whatever I am, though both for wealth and wit

“Beneath Lucilius I am pleased to sit,

“Yet Envy, [in] spite of her empoisoned breast,

“Shall say I lived in grace [in favor] here with the best;

“And, seeking in weak trash [worthless people] to make her wound,

“Shall find me solid [impervious], and her teeth unsound —

“less learned Trebatius’ censure disagree.”

In other words:

Horace was OK with being honored less than Lucilius both for wealth and wit, and he was willing to sit lower at the supper table than him: Lucilius would have the seat of honor.

Horace would still have a very good life, and malicious Envy would be able to do him no harm.

Nevertheless, he wanted to hear his friend Trebatius' opinion and whether it opposed his view.

Trebatius replied:

“No, Horace, I of force [I by the force of your strong arguments] must yield to thee.

“Only take heed, as being advised by me,

“Lest thou incur some danger. Better pause

“Than rue thy ignorance of the sacred laws;

“There's justice, and great action may be sued

“'gainst such as wrong men's fames with verses lewd.”

Trebatius agreed that Horace must follow his Muse and write satire, but he advised Horace to be careful about libeling anyone in his writing. Writing libelous verses could result in great legal punishments.

“Lewd” meant 1) evil, and 2) bungling.

Horace said:

“Aye, with lewd verses such as libels be,

“And aimed at persons of good quality;

“I reverence and adore that just decree.

“But if they shall be sharp yet modest rhymes

“That spare men's persons and but just tax [attack only] their crimes,

“Such shall in open court find current pass

“Were Caesar judge, and with the Maker's grace.”

In other words: Yes, libelous satire ought to be punished, but good satire whose target is a crime or sin instead of a person is legal. This is true even if Augustus Caesar were the judge, and such attacks against crimes and sins meet with the Creator's — God's — favor.

Trebatius said:

“Nay, I'll add more: If thou thyself being clear

“Shall tax in person a man fit to bear

“Shame and reproach, his suit shall quickly be

“Dissolved in laughter, and thou thence set free.”

In other words: Let me add that if you satirize a man who is disreputable and notorious, the lawsuit will quickly be thrown out of court and you will be free.

In Horace's society, anyone who wanted to be cleared of imputations of criminal behavior first had to provide character witnesses and other evidence that he was a man of good character.

ACT 4 (The Arraignment, or Poetaster)

— 4.1 —

Chloe and Cytheris talked together in a room in Albius and Chloe's house. With them were one or two maids carrying a muff, a dog, a fan, and a mask.

"But, sweet lady, tell me, am I well enough attired for the court, seriously?" Chloe asked.

"Well enough?" Cytheris said. "Excellent well, sweet Mistress Chloe. This strait-bodied — tight-fitting — city attire, I can tell you, will stir a courtier's blood more than the finest loose sacks the ladies are accustomed to be put in."

"Loose sacks" are loosely fitting dresses.

Cytheris added, "And then you are as well jeweled as any of them; your ruff and linen about you is much more pure white than theirs; and as for your beauty, I can tell you, there's many of them who would defy the painter — the cosmetician — if they could exchange looks with you. By the Virgin Mary, the worst thing is, you must look to be envied and endure a few court frumps — jeers — for it."

"Oh, Jove, madam, I shall buy them too cheap!" Chloe said.

In other words: Enduring a few jeers is a small price to pay for triumphs in fashionable company.

Jove is Jupiter, King of the gods.

Chloe ordered a maid, "Give me my muff and my dog there."

Fashionable ladies carried a muff and a dog.

Chloe then said to Cytheris, "And will the ladies be at all friendly with me, do you think?"

"Oh, Juno!" Cytheris said.

Juno is the wife of Jupiter, King of the gods.

She continued, “Why, you shall see them flock about you with their puff wings and ask you where you bought your lawn, and what you paid for it, who starches you — and entreat you to help them to some pure laundresses out of the city.”

Puff wings are pieces of cloth that hide the join between a sleeve and the body of a garment. Sometimes fashionable people slashed the upper layer of material and pulled out some of the lower layer of material to create a puff.

Lawn was an expensive linen fabric.

Laundresses washed and starched clothing and kept white fabric white.

“Oh, Cupid!” Chloe said.

She ordered a maid, “Give me my fan, and my mask, too.”

Fashionable ladies also carried around a fan and a mask.

She then asked Cytheris, “And will the lords and the poets there treat one well, too, lady?”

Cytheris said:

“Don’t doubt that.

“You shall have kisses from them go pit-pat, pit-pat, pit-pat upon your lips as thick as stones out of slings at the assault of a city.

“And your ears will be so furred with the breath of their compliments that you cannot catch cold in your head even if you wanted to, for three winters afterward.”

In other words: Compliments whispered in her ears would keep her ears so warm that she would be unable to catch cold.

“Thank you, sweet lady,” Chloe replied. “Oh, heaven! And how must one behave herself among them? You know all.”

Cytheris answered:

“Indeed, one must behave impudently enough, Mistress Chloe, and well enough.

“Carry not too much underthought — deference — between yourself and them; nor your city-mannerly word ‘forsooth.’ Don’t use it too often in any case, but instead say plain ‘aye, madam’ and ‘no, madam.’ Nor never say ‘Your Lordship’ nor ‘Your Honor,’ but ‘you,’ and ‘you, my lord’ and ‘my lady’; the other they count too simple and minisitive — too mincing sensitive and too humble and affected.

“And although they desire to kiss heaven with their titles, yet they will account as fools those who give them too humbly and deferentially.”

“Oh, intolerable! Jupiter!” Chloe said. “By my truth, lady, I would not for a world have missed out on you staying in my house; and indeed you shall not pay a farthing for your board nor your chambers.”

“Oh, sweet Mistress Chloe!” Cytheris said.

“Indeed, you shall not, lady,” Chloe said.

Cytheris started to speak, but Chloe said, “Nay, good lady, do not offer it.”

— 4.2 —

Gallus and Tibullus entered the scene. They were elegiac poets.

“Come, where are these ladies?” Gallus said. “With your permission, bright stars, this gentleman and I have come to man you — escort you — to court, where your recent kind entertainment is now to be requited with a heavenly banquet.”

The recent kind entertainment was the buffet that Chloe and Albius had hosted.

“A heavenly banquet, Gallus?” Cytheris said.

“No less, my dear Cytheris,” Gallus said.

Tibullus said, “That would not be strange, lady, if the epithet of ‘heavenly’ were only given for the company invited thither: yourself and” — indicating Chloe — “this fair gentlewoman.”

“Are we invited to court, sir?” Chloe asked.

“You are, lady,” Tibullus said, “by the great princess Julia, who longs to greet you with any favors that may worthily make you an often — a frequent — courtier.”

“In sincerity, I thank her, sir,” Chloe said. “You have a coach, haven’t you?”

“The princess has sent her own, lady,” Tibullus said.

“Oh, Venus! That’s well,” Chloe said. “I do long to ride in a coach most vehemently.”

“But, sweet Gallus, please explain to me why you give that heavenly praise to this earthly banquet?” Cytheris asked.

“Because, Cytheris, it must be celebrated by the heavenly powers,” Gallus answered. “All the gods and goddesses will be there; to two of which you two must be exalted.”

“A pretty fiction, in truth,” Chloe said.

“A fiction indeed, Chloe, and fit for the fit of a poet,” Cytheris said.

“Fit” can mean 1) suitable, 2) a poetic episode of inspiration, and 3) a section of a poem or song.

Gallus said, “Why, Cytheris, may not poets, from whose divine spirits all the honors of the gods have been deduced, entreat so much honor of the gods to have their divine presence at a poetical banquet?”

Gallus was referring to the belief that poets were the first priests because they were the first to praise and honor the gods.

“Suppose that to be no fiction,” Cytheris said, “yet where are your abilities to make us two goddesses at your feast?”

“Who doesn’t know, Cytheris, that the sacred breath of a true poet can blow any virtuous humanity up to deity?” Gallus answered.

Tibullus said:

“To tell you the female truth (which is the simple, uncomplicated truth), ladies, and to show that poets, in spite of the world, are able to deify themselves, at this banquet to which you are invited, we intend to assume the figures of the gods, and to give our various loves the forms of goddesses.

“Ovid will be Jupiter; the Princess Julia will be Juno; Gallus here will be Apollo; you, Cytheris, will be Pallas Athena, goddess of wisdom; I will be Bacchus; and my love, Plautia, will be Ceres.”

Bacchus is the god of grapes, and Ceres is the goddess of grain. The god of wine and the goddess of food are appropriate deities for a banquet.

Tibullus continued:

“And to install you and your husband, fair Chloe, in honors equal with ours, you shall be a goddess and your husband shall be a god.”

“A god?” Chloe said. “O my god!”

“A god, but a lame god, lady,” Tibullus said, “for he shall be Vulcan, and you shall be Venus, and this will make our banquet no less than heavenly.”

Venus cuckolded Vulcan.

“In sincerity, it will be sugared — it will be a treat,” Chloe said. “Good Jove, what a pretty foolish thing it is to be a poet!”

She then said quietly to Cytheris, “But listen, sweet Cytheris: couldn’t they possibly leave out my husband? I think a body’s husband does not so well at court; a person’s friend or lover, or such, will do well — but a husband, it is like your clog to your marmoset, for all the world and the heavens.”

A marmoset is a monkey. Its leg or neck could be affixed to a clog — a block of wood — that would restrict its movement.

Chloe did not want her husband to restrict her movements at the party.

Cytheris replied, “Tut, never fear, Chloe; your husband will be left outside in the lobby or the great chamber, when you shall be put in in the closet — private room — by this lord and by that lady.”

This, of course, would provide an opportunity for Chloe’s husband, Albus, to be cuckolded.

“Then I am reassured,” Chloe said. “My husband shall go.”

Horace entered the scene.

“Horace! Welcome,” Gallus said.

“Gentlemen, did you hear the news?” Horace asked.

“What news, my Quintus?” Tibullus asked.

Horace’s name was Quintus Horatius Flaccus.

Horace answered, “Our melancholic friend, Propertius, has enclosed himself in his Cynthia’s tomb, and he will by no entreaties be drawn away from there.”

Albius arrived and ushered in Crispinus, Tucca, and Demetrius.

“Good Master Crispinus, please bring the gentleman near,” Albius said.

The gentleman was Tucca.

Horace said to his companions, “Crispinus? Hide me, good Gallus; Tibullus, shelter me!”

Crispinus said to Tucca, “Make your approach, sweet Captain.”

“What does this mean, Horace?” Tibullus asked.

Horace said to his companions, “I am surprised — ambushed — again; farewell.”

“Stay, Horace,” Gallus requested.

Horace replied, “What, and be tired on — that is, attacked and torn at — by yonder vulture? No, Phoebus defend me!”

Horace exited — quickly.

“By God’s light!” Tibullus said. “I hold my life this is the same man who met him in Holy Street.”

Of course, that man was Crispinus.

“Indeed, it is likely enough,” Gallus said.

He then said, “This act of Propertius seems very strange to me.”

Tucca said to Crispinus, “By thy leave, my neat scoundrel. What! Is this the mad boy you talked about?”

One kind of “mad boy” in Ben Jonson’s society was the “roaring boy.” They were fashionable men who liked to argue, bully, and fight. Of course, Albius was not a roaring boy.

Crispinus answered, “Aye, this is Master Albius, Captain.”

Tucca said to Albius, “Give me thy hand, Agamemnon; we hear abroad thou art the Hector of citizens. What do thou say? Are we welcome to thee, noble Neoptolemus?”

Agamemnon was the leader of the Greeks against the Trojans in the Trojan War. Neoptolemus was the son of Achilles, a Greek who was the greatest warrior in the Trojan War. Hector was the greatest Trojan warrior.

Albius said, “Welcome, Captain! By Jove and all the gods in the Capitol —”

“No more; we conceive thee,” Tucca said. “Which of these is thy wedlock, Menelaus? Thy Helen? Thy Lucrece? So that we may do her honor, mad boy?”

“Thy wedlock” means “your wife.”

Menelaus was the King of Sparta, whose wife, Helen, after being forcibly kidnapped by or voluntarily running away with Paris, Prince of Troy, became Helen of Troy.

Lucrece was an ancient Roman gentlewoman who committed suicide after being raped. The son of King Tarquin of Rome, who was also named Tarquin, raped her. After her suicide, King Tarquin was overthrown. Rome ceased to be a kingdom and instead became a republic.

Tucca was comparing Albius to Menelaus, a wronged husband, and he was comparing Albius' wife, Chloe, to Helen and Lucrece, two women connected with unethical sex.

Tucca wanted to seduce Chloe.

“She in the little fine dressing, sir, is my mistress,” Crispinus said.

By “mistress,” he meant a woman he served and was devoted to.

“For lack of a better, sir,” Albius said.

Tucca said, “A better, profane rascal?”

He then said, “I ask thee mercy, my good scroil, was it thou who said that?”

“Scroil” is Tucca-speak for “scoundrel.”

“No harm, Captain,” Albius said.

“She is a Venus, a Vesta, a Melpomene!” Tucca said.

Venus is the goddess of sexual passion. Vesta is the goddess of the hearth. Melpomene is the goddess of tragedy.

Tucca said to Chloe, “Come hither, Penelope.”

Penelope is the faithful wife of Odysseus, both of whom are in Homer's Odyssey. Odysseus' Roman name is Ulysses.

Tucca and Chloe talked together a short distance away from the others.

“What’s thy name, Iris?” Tucca asked.

Iris is the goddess of the rainbow; she is a messenger-goddess.

“My name is Chloe, sir. I am a gentlewoman.”

“Thou are in merit to be an Empress, Chloe, for an eye and a lip,” Tucca said. “Thou have an Emperor’s nose.”

The Roman Emperor was Augustus Caesar.

A Roman nose is large.

He kissed her and said, “Kiss me again.”

She kissed him.

He said, “It is a virtuous punk.”

One meaning of “punk” is “prostitute.” Now that Chloe, a married woman, has kissed him, he will call her that often.

Tucca said, “Good. Before Jove, the gods were a sort of goslings when they suffered so sweet a breath to perfume the bed of a stinkard. Thou had ill fortune, Thisbe; the Fates were infatuate; they were, punk, they were.”

He was already criticizing her husband to her.

Thisbe and Pyramus were lovers. Thisbe ran away from home to marry Pyramus. She saw a lion with blood on its mouth from hunting, and she ran away from it, leaving her cloak behind. The lion tore the cloak, getting blood on it. A little later, seeing the bloody cloak, Pyramus thought that Thisbe had been killed by the lion, and he committed suicide. She found his body, and she committed suicide.

“Infatuate” means “infatuated” as an adjective.

“Infatuated” can mean “utterly foolish.”

As a verb, “infatuate” can mean “make people foolish.”

Possibly, Tucca meant that the fates of Thisbe and Pyramus were foolish. In other words: It is foolish to commit suicide because of love. In addition, according to Tucca, the Fates, who are usually portrayed as old women, were being utterly foolish in giving Pyramus and Thisbe this fate. “Foolish” is the opposite of what the Fates usually are.

Meanwhile, Propertius was in the tomb of his lover. We shall hear no more about him. His friends were getting ready to party.

“That’s sure, sir,” Chloe said. “Let me crave — have — your name, I ask you, sir.”

“I am known by the name of Captain Tucca, punk; the noble Roman, punk; a gent’man and a commander, punk,” Tucca said.

“In good time!” Chloe said.

She thought that she was fortunate to meet him.

She continued, “A gentleman and a commander? That’s as good as a poet, I think.”

She walked aside.

Crispinus picked up a viol and said, “A pretty instrument!”

A viol is a kind of stringed musical instrument.

He asked Albius, “It’s my cousin Cytheris’ viol, this is, isn’t it?”

Cytheris said to Crispinus, “Play, cousin, play it. It lacks only such a voice and hand to grace it as yours is.”

“Alas, cousin, you are merrily inspired,” Crispinus said.

“Please play, if you love me,” Cytheris said.

“Yes, cousin,” Crispinus replied. “You know I do not hate you.”

Tibullus said to Gallus, “A most subtle, cunning wench! How she has baited him with a viol yonder, for a song!”

Crispinus said to Cytheris, “Cousin, please call Mistress Chloe; she shall hear an essay — an example — of my poetry.”

“I’ll call her,” Tucca said.

He approached Chloe and said, “Come hither, cockatrice; here’s one who will set thee up, my sweet punk — set thee up.”

In other words, he will praise you in song.

“Cockatrice,” like “punk,” can mean “prostitute.”

Chloe said to Crispinus, “Are you a peewit so soon, sir?”

A peewit is a lapwing: its cry is similar to “peewit.”

Chloe may have thought the word meant “poet.” Or she may have meant that he was a metaphorical songbird.

Albius said, “Wife, be mum.”

Crispinus sang:

“Love is blind and a wanton;

“In the whole world, there is scant

“One such another;

“No, not his mother.

“He has plucked her doves and sparrows

“To feather his sharp arrows,

“And alone prevaieth

“Whilst sick Venus wai leth.

“But if Cypris once recover

“The wag, it shall behoove her

“To look better to him,

“Or she will undo [ruin] him.”

“Cypris” is a name for Venus, who had a cult center at Cyprus.

Doves were symbols of love; sparrows were symbols of lust.

Both were birds sacred to Venus.

The song said that Cupid has much power and that Venus may ruin him by giving him too much freedom.

At the soon-to-occur masked party, Ovid (Jupiter) would give the guests much freedom.

Albius said, “Oh, most odoriferous — pleasing — music!”

Tucca said to Albius, “Aha, stinkard! Another Orpheus, you slave, another Orpheus! An Arion riding on the back of a dolphin, rascal!”

Orpheus was a mythical poet and musician. Arion was another mythical poet and musician. According to one story, when pirates threw Arion overboard, a dolphin rescued him and carried him on its back to shore.

Gallus asked Crispinus, “Have you a copy of this ditty, sir?”

“Master Albius has,” Crispinus replied.

“Aye, but in truth, they are my wife’s verses,” Albius said. “I must not show them.”

They were the verses of Crispinus, handed to Albius to give to his wife, Chloe.

“Show them, bankrupt, show them,” Tucca said. “They have salt in them and will brook the air, stinkard.”

The verses have salt — 1) a preservative, and 2) wittiness — in them, and so they can endure the air without being harmed.

Gallus took the verses and read them: “What! ‘To his bright mistress, Canidia’?”

Crispinus, supposed author of the words, said, “Aye, sir, that’s just a borrowed name; such as Ovid’s Corinna, or Propertius’ Cynthia, or your Nemesis or Delia, Tibullus.”

Tibullus wrote poems about women whom he named Nemesis and Delia. Delia was his first love, and Nemesis was his last love.

“It’s the name of Horace’s witch, as I remember,” Gallus said.

Canidia is a sorceress in one of Horace’s Satires.

Tibullus took the verses from Gallus and examined them: “Why, the ditty’s all borrowed; it is Horace’s! Hang him, the plagiary! He’s a plagiarist!”

Crispinus was the plagiarist: He had stolen lines from Horace.

The historical Horace did not write the words. The Horace in Ben Jonson’s play is a fictional character somewhat based on the real poet and did not write the words. Ben Jonson wrote this play and so the words are his, and he was called “Horace,” a poet whom he loved and respected, in satires about him such as Thomas Dekker’s Satiromastix.

Tucca said:

“What! He borrow from Horace? He shall pawn himself to ten brokers first.”

Tucca was taking Crispinus' side. Either he did not believe that Crispinus was a plagiarist, or he was pretending not to believe that Crispinus was a plagiarist.

Tucca continued:

“Do you hear me, poetasters? I know you to be men of worship.”

“Men of worship” are men who are respected.

Tucca then said to the others, “He shall write with Horace for a talent, and let Maecenas and his whole college of critics take his part.”

Tucca wanted Horace and Crispinus to compete in a writing contest for a considerable amount of money. Maecenas and his colleagues would be the judges.

Tucca then said to Crispinus, “Thou shall do it, young Phoebus; thou shall, Phaeton; thou shall.”

Phaeton went to his father, the god Apollo, and asked to be allowed to drive the Sun-chariot across the sky and bring light to the world. But Phaeton, doomed youth, was unable to control the stallions, and they ran wildly away with the Sun-chariot, wreaking havoc and destruction upon Humankind and the world. The King of the gods, Jupiter, saved Humankind and the world by throwing a thunderbolt at Phaeton and killing him.

Crispinus was being set up for a fall, perhaps unintentionally.

Demetrius, taking Crispinus' side, said to Tucca, “Alas, sir, Horace! He is a mere sponge, nothing but humors and observation; he goes up and down sucking from every society, and when he comes home, he squeezes himself dry again. I know him, I do.”

Tucca replied:

“Thou say the truth, my poor poetical fury.

“Horace will pen all he knows. He is a sharp, thorny-toothed, satirical rascal — flee from him. He carries hay in his horn; he will sooner lose his best friend than his least jest.”

Farmers tied hay to the horns of dangerous bulls as a warning to people to avoid them.

Tucca continued:

“What Horace once drops on paper against a man lives eternally to upbraid him in the mouth of every slave tankard-bearer or waterman.

“There is not a bawd or a boy who comes from the bakehouse but shall point at him.”

The places where people got water and baked goods were also places where they gossiped. According to Tucca, they gossiped about Horace.

Tanker-bearers carried water. Watermen were boatmen.

Tucca continued:

“It is all dog and scorpion; Horace carries poison in his teeth and a sting in his tail.

“Bah, body of Jove! I’ll have the slave whipped one of these days for his satires and his humors by one cashiered — discharged — clerk or another.”

“We’ll undertake — rebuke — him, Captain,” Crispinus said.

Demetrius said:

“Aye, and tickle him — beat him — indeed, for his arrogancy and his impudence in commending his own things, and for his translating; I can trace him — trace his sources — indeed.”

Ben Jonson used the writing of ancient writers in his own writing, changing things as needed. He did not regard that as plagiarism but as emulation.

The Oxford English Dictionary defines the verb “emulate” as “To strive to equal or rival (a person, his achievements or qualities); to copy or imitate with the object of equaling or excelling.”

Ben Jonson will emulate Lucian’s Lexiphanes later in his play when he has a character vomit words.

Demetrius continued:

“Oh, he is the most open fellow living. I had as lief as a new suit I were at it.”

In other words, he was as eager to get started as if he were to get a new suit of clothing.

“Open” can mean 1) obvious, and 2) frank and generous.

Tucca said:

“Say no more, then, but do it; it is the only way to get thee a new suit. Sting him, my little newts; I’ll give you instructions; I’ll be your intelligencer: your informant and spy.

“We’ll all join and hang upon him like so many horse-leeches, the actors and all.”

Horse-leeches are large leeches; metaphorically, they are parasites.

Tucca continued:

“We shall sup together soon; and then we’ll conspire, indeed.”

Tucca, Crispinus, Demetrius, and Albius — all conspirators against Horace — walked apart from the others.

Gallus and Tibullus were supporters of Horace.

Gallus said to Tibullus, “Oh, I wish that Horace had stayed and were still here!”

Tibullus replied, “I do not wish that” — he pointed to Crispinus and Demetrius — “because both of these men would have turned Pythagoreans then.”

“What, mute?” Gallus asked.

“Aye, as mute as fishes, indeed,” Tibullus said.

Pythagorean novices observed a rule of silence.

If Horace were present, Tucca and the others would not be criticizing him.

Tibullus then said to Cytheris and Chloe, “Come, ladies, shall we go?”

“We await you, sir,” Cytheris said. “But Mistress Chloe asks if you have not a god to spare” — she pointed to Tucca — “for this gentleman?”

“Who, Captain Tucca?” Gallus asked.

“Aye; he,” Cytheris answered.

“Yes, if we can invite him along, he shall be Mars,” Gallus said.

“Has Mars anything to do with Venus?” Chloe asked.

Mars had cuckolded Vulcan by sleeping with Vulcan’s wife: Venus.

Chloe would be Venus at Julia's entertainment.

"Oh, most of all, lady," Tibullus said.

Chloe said, "Then, I ask to let him be invited. And who shall Crispinus be?"

"Mercury, Mistress Chloe," Tibullus said.

According to one myth, Mercury and Venus were the parents of Cupid. In another myth, Mars was Cupid's father.

"Mercury? That's a poet, isn't it?" Chloe asked.

"No, lady; but somewhat inclining that way," Gallus said.

Mercury was the god of thieves. A plagiarist is a kind of thief.

But Mercury also invented the lyre, and so he invented the musical instrument that poets used to accompany the lyrics they had written.

"He is a herald at arms," Gallus said.

Mercury was a messenger god; medieval heralds carried messages to and from the commanding officers of enemy armies.

"A herald at arms?" Chloe said. "Good. And Mercury? Pretty. He has to do with Venus, too?"

"A little," Tibullus said. "With her face, lady, or so."

Mercury, aka quicksilver, was often used in cosmetic preparations.

"It is very well," Chloe said. "Please, let's go. I long to be at it."

Cytheris said to Crispinus and Tucca, "Gentlemen, shall we ask your companies to come along?"

Crispinus replied, "You shall not only pray, but prevail, lady."

He then said to Tucca, "Come, sweet Captain."

"Yes, I follow," Tucca said.

Tucca then said to Albius, "But thou must not talk of this now, my little bankrupt."

He was referring to the conspiracy against Horace.

Albius said, "Captain, look here."

He put his finger to his lips and said, "Mum."

Demetrius said to Tucca, "I'll go write, sir."

Tucca said:

"Do, do.

"Wait."

He gave Demetrius a coin and said, "Here's a drachma to purchase gingerbread for thy muse."

Everyone exited.

— 4.4 —

Lupus and Histrio were in a room in Lupus' house, accompanied by a Lictor. Histrio was holding a letter.

Lupus the Tribune said, "Come, let us talk here; here we may be private. Shut the door, Lictor."

He then said to Histrio, "You are an actor, you say."

"Aye, if it pleases Your Worship," Histrio said.

"Good; and how are you able to give this intelligence — this news?" Lupus asked.

“By the Virgin Mary, sir, they directed a letter to me and my fellow sharers in my acting company,” Histrio answered.

“Speak lower; you are not now in your theater, stager,” Lupus said.

He then said to the First Lictor, “My sword, knave.”

The First Lictor fetched Lupus’ sword.

Lupus said to Histrio, “They directed a letter to you and your fellow sharers; go forward. Continue.”

“Yes, sir,” Histrio said. “The purpose of the letter was to hire some of our properties, such as a scepter and a crown for Jove, and a caduceus for Mercury, and a petasus —”

A caduceus is a herald’s wand. Mercury carried one that was entwined with two snakes. He also wore a petasus: a hat with a low crown and a wide brim. Mercury often wore a winged hat and/or winged sandals.

Lupus said, “‘Caduceus’? And ‘petasus’? Let me see your letter.”

He took the letter from Histrio and scanned it.

He said, “This is a conjuration — a conspiracy, this is.”

Actually, of course, the items were for a costume party.

Lupus then said to the Lictor, “Quickly, on with my buskins!”

The First Lictor fetched Lupus’ buskins. Such buskins — boots — were worn by Tribunes and by tragic actors.

The First Lictor helped Lupus put his boots on.

Lupus said to Histrio, “I’ll act a tragedy, indeed. Will nothing but our gods serve these poets to profane?”

He said to the First Lictor, "Dispatch! Hurry!"

He then said to Histrio, "Actor, I thank thee. The Emperor shall take knowledge of thy good service. He will be informed."

A knock sounded at the door.

"Who's there now?" Histrio asked.

He then said to the First Lictor, "Look and see who it is, knave."

The First Lictor went to the door.

Lupus re-examined the letter and said, "A crown and a scepter?"

He then said sarcastically, "This is good! Rebellion now?"

The First Lictor returned and said, "It is your apothecary, sir: Master Minos."

Lupus said:

"Why do thou tell me about apothecaries, knave? Tell him I have affairs of state in hand; I can talk to no apothecaries now.

"By the heart of me!

"Stay the apothecary there! Keep him there!"

The First Lictor went to the door.

Lupus said to Histrio:

"You shall see, I have fished out a cunning piece of plot now: They have had some intelligence that their project has been discovered, and now they have arranged with my apothecary to poison me — it is so — knowing that I meant to take medicine today; as sure as death, it is there!

“Jupiter, I thank thee that thou have yet made me so much of a politician.”

A politician can be a politic — shrewd — person, in addition to the usual meaning.

Two or more Lictors entered with Minos the apothecary.

Lupus said to Minos, sarcastically, “You are welcome, sir!”

He then said to the Lictors, “Take the potion from him there.”

He said to Minos, “I have an antidote more than you know of, sir. “

He said to the Lictors, “Throw it on the ground there.”

A Lictor poured the potion onto the floor.

“Good! Now fetch in the dog,” Lupus said. “And yet we cannot tarry to try experiments now.”

The experiment would have been to have the dog taste the potion. If the dog got sick or died, the potion would be proven to be poisonous. But Lupus was too busy to try the experiment.

Lupus said to the Lictors about Minos, “Arrest him.”

The Lictors placed Minos under guard.

Lupus said to Minos, “You shall go with me, sir. I’ll tickle you, apothecary; I’ll give you a glister, indeed.”

A glister is a clyster: an enema or suppository.

He said to himself, “Have I the letter? Aye; it is here.”

He then said to the Lictors, “Come, your fasces, Lictors! The half-pikes and the halberds, take them down from the Lares there!”

The fasces were bundles of rods, each bundle containing an axe. Lictors carried them before magistrates as a symbol of the magistrates' power. Half-pikes and halberds are weapons. The Lares were in a lararium: a household shrine devoted to the household gods.

“Actor, assist me!” Lupus said to Histrio.

They armed themselves.

Maecenas and Horace entered the scene.

“Whither now, Asinius Lupus, with this armory?” Maecenas asked.

“I cannot talk now,” Lupus said. “I order you, assist me. Treason! Treason!”

“What!” Horace said. “Treason?”

Lupus replied, “Aye; if you love the Emperor and the state, follow me!”

They exited with Minos, who was under guard.

— 4.5 —

Twelve people in costumes entered a large reception room for Julia's entertainment:

- 1) Ovid was costumed as Jupiter, King of the gods.
- 2) Julia was costumed as Juno, Jupiter's wife.
- 3) Gallus was costumed as Phoebus Apollo, the Sun-god and god of archery.
- 4) Cytheris was costumed as Pallas Athena, a warrior goddess who was also the goddess of wisdom.
- 5) Tibullus was costumed as Bacchus, god of grapes and wine.

- 6) Plautia was costumed as Ceres, goddess of grain and agriculture.
- 7) Albius was costumed as Vulcan, the blacksmith god.
- 8) Chloe was costumed as Venus, the goddess of sexual passion.
- 9) Tucca was costumed as Mars, the god of war.
- 10) Crispinus was costumed as Mercury, the messenger-god.
- 11) Hermogenes (the singer) was costumed as Momus, god of ridicule. Momus is a critical fault-finder.
- 12) A Pyrgus was costumed as Ganymede, a pretty boy who was Jupiter's cupbearer.

The room contained bottles of wine, wine glasses, a table, and chairs to sit on.

Ovid, costumed as Jupiter, and Julia, costumed as Juno, sat at the head of the table.

Ovid (Jupiter) said to the guests:

“Gods and goddesses, take your various seats.”

Ovid (Jupiter) then said to Crispinus (Mercury):

“Now, Mercury, move your caduceus and in Jupiter's name command silence.”

Crispinus (Mercury) said, “In the name of Jupiter, silence!”

“The crier of the court has too clarified a voice,” Hermogenes (Momus) said.

“Clarified” means “pretentious.”

The crier of the court was Crispinus (Mercury), who would make announcements as directed by Ovid and Julia.

Hermogenes (Momus) disliked Crispinus (Mercury) because they had recently been rivals in song.

“Peace, Momus,” Gallus (Phoebus Apollo) said. “Silence.”

“Oh, he is the god of reprehension; let him alone,” Ovid (Jupiter) said to Gallus (Phoebus Apollo) about Hermogenes (Momus). “It is his office and his duty.”

Momus is the god of ridicule.

Ovid (Jupiter) said to Crispinus (Mercury), “Mercury, go forward and proclaim after Phoebus our high pleasure to all the deities who shall partake of this high banquet.”

“Yes, sir,” Crispinus (Mercury) replied.

He would repeat the words of Gallus (Phoebus Apollo).

Gallus (Phoebus Apollo) said:

“The great god Jupiter ...”

Crispinus (Mercury) repeated:

“The great god Jupiter ...”

Gallus (Phoebus Apollo) said:

“Of his licentious goodness ...”

Crispinus (Mercury) repeated:

“Of his licentious goodness ...”

Crispinus continued repeating every line after Gallus had spoken it.

Gallus (Phoebus Apollo) said:

“Willing to make this feast no fast from any manner of pleasure, nor to bind any god or goddess to be anything the more god or goddess because of their names, the great god

Jupiter gives them all free license to speak no wiser than persons of baser titles and to be nothing better than common men or women.

“And therefore no god shall need to keep himself more strictly to his goddess than any man does to his wife, nor any goddess shall need to keep herself more strictly to her god than any woman does to her husband.

“But since it is no part of wisdom, in these days, to come into bonds, it shall be lawful for every lover to break loving oaths, to change their lovers, and make love to others, as the heat of everyone’s blood and the spirit of our nectar shall inspire, and Jupiter save Jupiter!”

Although these banqueters were dressed as gods, they need not act like dignified gods at this banquet.

Nectar is the drink of the gods.

“Heat of blood” can mean “heat of sexual desire.”

This was the kind of drinking party at which adultery and cuckolding could take place.

Tibullus (Bacchus) said, “So; now we may play the fools by authority.”

Jupiter, King of the gods, had given them permission to be foolish and immoral. Or at least Ovid had.

The company ate and drank.

“To play the fool by authority is wisdom,” Hermogenes (Momus) said.

Julia (Juno) said to Hermogenes (Momus), “Away with your mattery sentences, Momus; they are too grave and wise for this meeting.”

“Mattery sentences” are maxims with serious matter.

Serious matter was not welcome in this drinking party.

Ovid (Jupiter) pointed to Hermogenes (Momus) and said to Crispinus (Mercury), “Mercury, give our jester a stool; let him sit by, and hand to him some of our delicacies.”

Crispinus (Mercury) gave Hermogenes a stool, food, and a cup and made sure he was within reach of good food.

Tucca (Mars) said, “Do thou hear me, mad Jupiter? We’ll have it enacted: He who speaks the first wise word shall be made cuckold. What say thou? Isn’t it a good motion — a good proposal?”

“Deities, are you all agreed?” Ovid (Jupiter) asked.

All replied, “We are agreed, great Jupiter.”

Albius (Vulcan) said, “I have read in a book that to play the fool wisely is high wisdom.”

He had said something that could be regarded as wise.

Gallus (Phoebus Apollo) said, “What is this now, Vulcan! Will you be the first wizard?”

A wizard is a wise man.

Ovid (Jupiter) said to Tucca (Mars), “Take his wife, Mars, and make him a cuckold, quickly.”

Tucca (Mars) said to Albius’ wife, Chloe (Venus), “Come, cockatrice.”

Chloe (Venus) said to Ovid (Jupiter) about her husband, “No, let me alone with him, Jupiter — leave him to me.”

She then said to Albius (Vulcan), “I’ll make you take heed, sir, while you live. I say, if there should be twelve in a company, that you would not be the wisest of them.”

There were twelve in this particular company.

Albius (Vulcan) replied, “Say no more; I will not, indeed, wife, hereafter; I’ll be here” — he touched his lips — “mum.”

Using the royal plural, Ovid (Jupiter) said to the Pyrgus (Ganymede), “Fill for us a bowl of nectar, Ganymede; we will drink to our daughter Venus.”

The Pyrgus (Ganymede) poured wine.

Gallus (Phoebus Apollo) said to Albius (Vulcan), “Look after your wife, Vulcan. Pay attention to her. Jupiter begins to court her.”

Tibullus (Bacchus) said, “Nay, let Mars look to it; Vulcan must do as Venus does: bear.”

Mars was Tucca, who was paying attention to Chloe (Venus), who was ignoring him so she could pay attention to Ovid (Jupiter).

Venus would bear — carry — the weight of a lover in bed; Vulcan would bear — endure — the ignominy of being a cuckold.

Tucca (Phoebus Apollo) said to the Pyrgus (Ganymede), “Sirrah boy; catamite! Look you play Ganymede well now, you slave.”

A “catamite” is a boy used for homosexual purposes. The mythological Ganymede was sometimes thought to be a catamite.

Tucca (Phoebus Apollo) continued, “Do not spill your nectar. Carry your cup even; good. You should have rubbed your face with whites of eggs, you rascal, until your brows had shone like our sooty brother’s here” — he pointed to Albius (Vulcan, the sooty blacksmith god) — “as sleek as a hornbook, or have steeped your lips in wine until you made them so plump that Juno might have been jealous of them.”

The whites of eggs were used as a cosmetic.

Vulcan and Mars are brothers because they are sons of Jupiter and Juno.

Hornbooks were children's primers that were covered with transparent horn, allowing the characters underneath the horn to be read.

"Punk, kiss me, punk," Tucca (Mars) said to Chloe (Venus).

Ovid (Jupiter) took his cup, and to forestall a kiss between Tucca and Chloe, said, "Here, daughter Venus, I drink to thee."

"Thank you, good father Jupiter," Chloe (Venus) said.

Tucca (Mars) said to Julia (Juno), "Why, mother Juno! Gods and fiends! What, will thou endure this ocular temptation?"

Ovid was ogling Chloe.

Juno was a jealous wife.

Tibullus (Bacchus) said, "Mars is enraged; he looks big and begins to sputter for anger."

"Well played, Captain Mars," Hermogenes (Momus) said, happy that Tucca's kiss had been forestalled.

Tucca (Mars) said, "Well said, minstrel Momus; I must put you in, must I? When will you be in good fooling of yourself, fiddler? Never?"

Tucca was asking Hermogenes whether Tucca needed to be the butt of his jokes. Couldn't Hermogenes make better jokes without needing Tucca to be the butt?

This particular drinking party was turning into a burlesque of the gods' banquet at the end of the first book of Homer's Iliad. In it, Zeus and Hera (the Roman names are Jupiter and Juno) quarreled, Hephaestus (the Roman name is Vulcan) made jokes to calm the situation, and then they all enjoyed a banquet, followed by listening to music.

Hermogenes (Momus) replied, “Oh, it is our fashion to be silent when there is a better fool in place, always.”

“Thank you, rascal,” Tucca (Mars) said.

Ovid (Jupiter) said to the Pyrgus (Ganymede), “Fill our cup to honor our daughter Venus, Ganymede. She fills her father with affection.”

The Pyrgus continued to serve wine.

“Will thou be ranging, Jupiter, before my face?” Julia (Juno) asked.

“Why not, Juno? Why should Jupiter stand in awe of thy face, Juno?” Ovid (Jupiter) replied.

“Because it is thy wife’s face, Jupiter,” Julia (Juno) answered.

Ovid (Jupiter) said, “What! Shall a husband be afraid of his wife’s face? Will she paint it with makeup so horribly? We are a King, you cotquean — you scolding woman — and we will reign in our pleasures; and we will cudgel thee to death if thou find fault with us.”

Jupiter sometimes threatened his wife with violence.

Julia (Juno) said:

“I will find fault with thee, King cuckold-maker.”

A horny god, Jupiter made many husbands cuckolds.

Julia (Juno) continued:

“What! Shall the King of gods turn into the King of good fellows, and have no fellow in wickedness? This makes our poets, who know our profaneness, live as profane as we. By my godhead, Jupiter, I will join with all the other gods here, bind thee hand and foot, throw thee down into earth, and make a poor poet of thee, if thou abuse me thus.”

Juno and some other gods and goddesses once attempted to bind Jupiter, but the sea-nymph Thetis rescued him.

A right Juno is a true Juno. Juno was known for her jealousy, and Julia was being jealous.

“Juno, we will cudgel thee, Juno,” Ovid (Jupiter) said. “We told thee so yesterday, when thou were jealous of us because of Thetis.”

Thetis was a sea-nymph and the mother of Achilles, the greatest warrior of the Trojan War. Jupiter desired Thetis, but when he learned of a prophecy that she would give birth to a son who would be greater than his father, he decided to have her marry a mortal.

The Pyrgus (Ganymede) said to Ovid (Jupiter), “Today she had me in inquisition, too.”

Apparently, Julia, like Juno, was jealous and had questioned the Pyrgus about any other women Ovid showed interest in.

Tucca (Mars) said to the Pyrgus (Ganymede), “Well said, my fine Phrygian fry; inform, inform.”

Ganymede’s father was the King of Phrygia in Asia Minor (roughly, modern Turkey).

Tucca was OK with the Pyrgus informing Ovid about the questioning.

Tucca (Mars) said to Crispinus (Mercury), “Give me some wine, King of heralds, so I may drink to my cockatrice.”

Refusing wine from the Pryrus (Ganymede), Ovid (Jupiter) said, “No more, Ganymede.”

He then said to Julia (Juno), “We will cudgel thee, Juno; by Styx, we will.”

When a god swore by the Styx River, he was making an inviolable oath.

Julia (Juno) replied, “Aye, it is well; gods may grow impudent in iniquity, and they must not be told of it —”

Ovid (Jupiter) said, “Yea, we will knock our chin against our breast and shake thee out of Olympus into an oyster boat for thy scolding.”

Oyster wives — women who sold oysters — were known for having loud voices.

Gods sometimes nodded the head while making a vow.

When Jupiter made an inviolable vow to Thetis to make the Trojans victorious for a while in Homer’s Iliad, he nodded his head.

Julia (Juno) said:

“Your nose is not long enough to do it, Jupiter, even if all thy strumpets thou have among the stars took thy part.”

Ovid’s name is Publius Ovidius Naso. “Naso” means “large-nosed.”

“Nose” sometimes meant “penis.”

She continued:

“And there is never a star in thy forehead but shall be a horn, if thou persist in abusing me.”

The horns would be the invisible horns of a cuckold.

To get revenge on Jupiter's sleeping with other women, Juno would sleep with other men.

Some of the women Jupiter slept with became stars, such as Maia, the leader of the Pleiades. Jupiter and Maia were the parents of Mercury.

Some of Jupiter's children by women other than Juno also became stars or constellations. For example, Castor and Pollux, sons of Jupiter and Leda; and Hercules, son of Jupiter and Alcmena.

"A good jest, indeed," Crispinus (Mercury) said.

Ovid (Jupiter) said, "We tell thee thou anger us, cotquean; and we will thunder thee in pieces for thy cotqueanity."

"Another good jest," Crispinus (Mercury) said.

Julia (Juno) may have held up two fingers, symbolizing the horns of a cuckold.

Albius (Vulcan) said, "O my hammers and my Cyclops! This boy Ganymede does not fill cups with enough wine to make us kind to one another."

Cyclops are one-eyed giants who help Vulcan forge thunderbolts for Jupiter.

Tucca (Mars) said to Albius (Vulcan), "Nor have thou collied — blackened — thy face enough, stinkard."

Taking a wine container, Albius (Vulcan) said, "I'll ply the table with nectar, and make them friends."

"Heaven is likely to have only a lame skinker, then," Hermogenes (Momus) said.

A skinker is a person who serves drinks.

Vulcan was born lame.

Albius (Vulcan) said:

“Wine and good livers make true lovers.”

The liver was thought to be the seat of passion.

“Good livers” can also mean people who live well.

He continued:

“I’ll sentence them together.”

Pouring wine for Ovid and Julia, he said:

“Here, father; here, mother; for shame, drink yourselves drunk and forget this dissension. You two should cling together before our faces and give us an example of unity.”

Albius (Vulcan) went around the table pouring wine.

“Oh, excellently spoken, Vulcan, suddenly!” Gallus (Phoebus Apollo) said.

“Jupiter may do well to prefer — promote — his tongue to some official position for his eloquence,” Tibullus (Bacchus) said about Albius (Vulcan).

“His tongue shall be gent’man usher to his wit, and always go before it,” Tucca (Mars) said.

In other words: Albius (Vulcan) will always speak before he thinks.

“An excellent fit office!” Albius (Vulcan) said.

“Aye, and an excellent good jest, besides,” Crispinus (Mercury) said.

Hermogenes (Momus) said to Tucca (Mars), “What, have you hired Mercury to cry and proclaim your jests you make?”

“Momus, you are envious,” Ovid (Vulcan) said.

Tucca (Mars) said to Hermogenes (Momus), “Why, you whoreson blockhead, it is your only block of wit in fashion, nowadays, to applaud other folks’ jests.”

A blockhead was a piece of wood used to shape hats.

Hermogenes (Momus) said to Tucca (Mars), “True — with those who are not artificers — creators — of jests themselves.”

Hermogenes (Momus) said to Albius (Vulcan), “Vulcan, you nod; and the mirth of the feast droops.”

“He has filled nectar so long that his brain swims in it,” the Pyrgus (Ganymede) said.

Albius (Vulcan) was drunk from breathing in the fumes of the wine.

“What, do we nod, fellow gods?” Gallus (Phoebus Apollo) said. “Let music sound, and let us startle — rouse — our spirits with a song.”

“Do, Apollo; thou are a good musician,” Tucca (Mars) said to Gallus (Phoebus Apollo).

“What does Jupiter say?” Gallus (Phoebus Apollo) asked.

“Huh? Huh?” Ovid (Jupiter) said.

He was one of the ones who were nodding off and so had not been paying attention.

“Shall we have a song?” Gallus (Phoebus Apollo) asked.

“Why, do, do, sing,” Ovid (Jupiter) said.

“Bacchus, what do you say?” Plautia (Ceres) asked.

“Ceres?” Tibullus (Bacchus) said to Plautia (Ceres).

Tibullus (Bacchus) had also been nodding off and not paying attention.

“But what do you say to this song?” Plautia (Ceres) asked.

“Sing, as far as I’m concerned,” Tibullus (Bacchus) answered.

“Your belly weighs down your head, Bacchus,” Julia (Juno) said. “Here’s a song toward — imminent.”

Tibullus (Bacchus) said, “Begin, Vulcan —”

“What else? What else?” Albius (Vulcan) replied.

Tucca (Mars) said, “Say, Jupiter —”

Ovid (Jupiter) said, “Mercury —”

Crispinus (Mercury) said, “Aye, say, say —”

Albius (Vulcan) began the song, and others joined in:

“Wake, our mirth begins to die.

“Quicken [Enliven] it with tunes and wine;

“Raise your notes; you’re out. Fie, fie, [Bah, bah,]

“This drowsiness is an ill sign.

“We banish him [from] the choir [company] of gods

“That [Who] droops [and nods] again;

“Then all are men,

“For here’s not one but nods.”

No one present could be gods, for all were drowsy and nodding.

Ovid (Jupiter) said:

“I don’t like this sudden and general heaviness — sleepiness — among our godheads; it is somewhat ominous.

“Apollo, command for us louder music, and let Mercury and Momus contend to please and revive our senses.”

Hermogenes (Momus) sang:

“Then in a free and lofty strain

“Our broken tunes we thus repair;”

Crispinus (Mercury) sang:

“And we answer them again,

“Running division [Singing musical embellishments] on the panting air;”

Both Hermogenes and Crispinus sang:

“To celebrate this feast of sense

“As free from scandal as offence.”

Hermogenes (Momus) sang:

“Here is beauty for the eye;”

Crispinus (Mercury) sang:

“For the ear, sweet melody;”

Hermogenes (Momus) sang:

“Ambrosiac odors for the smell;”

Crispinus (Mercury) sang:

“Delicious nectar for the taste;”

Both Hermogenes and Crispinus sang:

“For the touch, a lady’s waist,

“Which doth [does] all the rest excel!”

Ovid (Jupiter) said:

“Aye; this has awakened us.”

He then said to Crispinus (Mercury), “Mercury, our herald, go from ourself, the great god Jupiter, to the great emperor, Augustus Caesar; and command him from us (of whose bounty he has received his surname, Augustus) that for a thank-offering to our beneficence he presently sacrifice as a dish to this banquet his beautiful and wanton daughter Julia. She’s a curst quean — a shrewish strumpet — tell him, and plays the scold behind his back; therefore, let her be sacrificed.”

The sacrifice could be a sexual sacrifice.

He continued:

“Command him this, Mercury, in our high name of Jupiter Altitonans: Jupiter who thunders from on high.”

Julia (Juno) said:

“Wait, feather-footed Mercury, and tell Augustus from us, the great Juno Saturnia: daughter of Saturn —”

Mercury’s sandals had feathered wings.

She continued:

“— that if he thinks it hard to do as Jupiter has commanded him and sacrifice his daughter, that he had better to do so ten times than suffer her to love the well-nosed poet Ovid — whom he shall do well to whip, or cause to be whipped, about the Capitol, for soothing — encouraging — her in her follies.”

The Capitol is the Capitoline Hill.

Augustus Caesar, Maecenas, Horace, Lupus, Histrio, and Minos entered the scene. Minos was guarded by some Lictors.

Looking at the revelers, his daughter Julia among them, Augustus Caesar said:

“What sight is this? Maecenas! Horace!”

Using the majestic plural, he said:

“Tell me, do we have our senses? Do we hear and see? Or are these just imaginary objects drawn by our imagination?”

He said to Maecenas and Horace:

“Why don’t you speak?”

He had heard some of the revelers’ conversation and now repeated:

“Let us do sacrifice?”

He continued:

“Are they the gods?”

“Reverence, amazement, and fury fight in me.”

The banqueters knelt before him.

Augustus Caesar continued:

“What? Do they kneel? Nay, then I see that what I thought impossible is true. Oh, impious sight!”

He turned his face away and said:

“Let me divert my eyes; the very thought everts — sets upside down — my soul with passion. Don’t look, man.

There is a panther, whose unnatural eye will strike thee dead.”

The man was Augustus himself, and the panther was Julia.

Turning towards his daughter Julia, he said to himself:

“Turn, then, and die on her with her own death!”

He moved as if he would kill his daughter, fighting her as if she were an enemy whom he would kill even if it meant his own death.

Maecenas and Horace put themselves between Augustus Caesar and Julia and said, “What does imperial Caesar intend to do?”

Augustus Caesar said to Maecenas and Horace:

“What, would you have me let the strumpet live who for this pageant earns so many deaths?”

Tucca said quietly to the Pyrgus, “Boy, slink, boy.”

He wanted to make an escape.

The Pyrgus said quietly to Tucca, “I pray to Jupiter that we are not followed by the scent, Master.”

They smelled strongly of wine.

Tucca and the Pyrgus exited without calling attention to themselves.

Augustus Caesar asked Albius, “Tell me, sir, who are you?”

“I play Vulcan, sir,” Albius said.

“But who are you, sir?” Augustus Caesar asked.

“Your citizen and jeweler, sir,” Albius said.

Augustus Caesar said to Chloe, “And who are you, dame?”

The word “dame” was not used for upper-class women.

“I play Venus, forsooth,” Chloe said.

The word “forsooth” was not used by upper-class women.

Augustus Caesar said, “I ask not who you play, but who you are?”

“Your citizen and a jeweler’s wife, sir,” Chloe answered.

Augustus Caesar asked Crispinus, “And you, good sir?”

“Your gentleman parcel-poet, sir,” Crispinus answered.

A parcel-poet is a part-poet: a sort of poet.

“Oh, that profaned name!” Augustus Caesar said.

The name of “poet” was profaned by parcel-poets such as Crispinus.

Augustus Caesar said to Julia:

“And are these seemly — fit — company for thee, thou degenerate monster?”

He said to Horace and Maecenas:

“All the rest I know, and I hate all my knowledge of them because of their hateful sakes.”

He hated the drunken poets before him whom he had caught in the presence of his daughter Julia.

Augustus Caesar said to Ovid, Gallus, and Tibullus:

“Are you, who first the deities inspired with skill of their high natures and their powers, the first abusers of their useful light, profaning thus their dignities in their forms, and making them like you, only counterfeits?”

Augustus Caesar distrusted theater, regarding it as only counterfeit and not real. He also regarded these poets as not real poets and not capable of writing correctly about the gods, whom they profane instead of praise, although the gods had given them poetic inspiration.

He continued:

“Oh, who shall follow virtue and embrace her, when her false bosom is found to be nothing but air? And yet from those embraces Centaurs spring who war with human peace and poison men.”

Embracing false virtue creates bad things, as did Ixion, who embraced a counterfeit Juno.

Ixion, the King of the Lapiths, tried to rape Juno. Jupiter made a cloud in the shape of Juno. Ixion coupled with it, and from this union came Imbros, aka Centaurus, who mated with mares and created the Centaurs, most of whom were wild.

The Centaurs did such things as try to rape Hippodamia and the female guests at her wedding to King Pirithous of the Lapiths. Theseus (Pirithous' best friend) and other men were able to defeat the Centaurs in a battle that came to be known as the Centauromachy.

Augustus Caesar continued:

“Who shall with greater comforts — solace — comprehend virtue's unseen being and her excellence, when you, who teach and should eternize her, live as if she were no law to your lives, nor lived herself except with your idle breaths?”

In other words: Virtue is real, and the poets should teach others about her, but you counterfeit poets treat virtue as if she exists only in your idle words: You live as if virtue isn't real. How then can anyone take comfort in understanding virtue?

Using the majestic plural, Augustus Caesar continued:

“If you think gods but feigned, and virtue painted, know that we sustain an actual residence.”

In other words: Maybe you counterfeit poets don’t believe in gods and virtue, but let me tell you that I have a real residence.

Augustus Caesar continued:

“And with the title of an Emperor I retain an Emperor’s spirit and imperial power, by which —”

He turned to Ovid and continued:

“— in imposition too remiss, licentious and lascivious Naso, for thy violent wrong in soothing the declined affections — the degraded and perverse inclinations — of our base daughter — we exile thy feet from all approach to our imperial court, on pain of death.

“Thy misbegotten love — Julia — we commit to the patronage of iron doors, since her soft-hearted sire cannot contain — control — her.”

In other words: Julia will be guarded behind closed doors.

“Oh, my good lord, forgive her,” Maecenas said. “Be like the gods.”

“Let royal bounty, Caesar, mediate,” Horace said.

Augustus Caesar said:

“There is no bounty to be shown to such people who have no real or royal goodness.

“Bounty is a spice — a species — of virtue; and what virtuous act can take effect on them who have no power of equal habitude — moral disposition — to apprehend and understand it, but live in worship of that idol, vice, as if there were no virtue except shape — something unreal — that is imposed by strong imagination?”

“This shows that their knowledge is mere ignorance.

“This shows that their far-fetched dignity of soul is a fancy.

“And this shows that all their solemn pretension to gravity is a mere vainglory.”

He said to the Lictors:

“Hence, away with them. Take them away from here.”

The Lictors placed Ovid and Julia under separate guard and began to clear the room of banqueters.

Augustus Caesar then said:

“I will prefer to know no one but such as rule their lives by knowledge, including knowledge of virtue, and can be calm all the sea of humors — whims and fancies — with the marble trident of their strong spirits.

“Others fight below

“With gnats and shadows; others nothing know.”

In the Land of the Dead, some souls — shadows — of soldiers exist. When Aeneas visited the Land of the Dead in the Aeneid, the shadows of Greek soldiers tried to utter war cries, but they could manage only feeble whispers. When Odysseus visited the Land of the Dead in the Odyssey, the shadows, except for the prophet Tiresias, knew nothing — not even who they are — until they drank some of the blood from the sacrifice that Odysseus made for them.

Tucca, Crispinus, and the Pyrgus talked together.

Tucca said to Crispinus, “What’s become of my little punk: Venus? And the poltfoot stinkard, her husband, huh?”

“Poltfoot” means club-footed and refers to the lame blacksmith god, Vulcan, whom Albius played in the masquerade. Venus, of course, is Chloe.

“Oh, they have ridden home in the coach as fast as the wheels can run,” the Pyrgus said.

Tucca said:

“God Jupiter is banished, I hear, and his cockatrice, Juno, locked up. By God’s heart, if all the poetry in Parnassus should get me to be an actor again, I’ll sell the other actors my share for a sesterce — a very small amount.

“But this is Humors, Horace, that goat-footed envious slave!”

“Goat-footed” refers to satyrs and satirists. A satyr is a half-human, half-goat nature spirit who loves wine, women, and song.

Ben Jonson wrote plays about humors, and Tucca gave Horace (and Ben Jonson) that name now.

Humors can be defining personal characteristics. Horace’s main humor is being a poet.

Tucca continued:

“He’s turned into a fawner now, a toady, an informer, the rogue; it is he who has betrayed us all. Didn’t you see him with the Emperor, crouching?”

According to Tucca, Horace toadies up to Augustus Caesar.

“Yes,” Crispinus said.

Tucca said:

“Well, follow me. Thou shall libel and I’ll cudgel the rascal.”

He said to the Pyrgus:

“Boy, provide me a truncheon — a club.”

Tucca then said to both the Pyrgus and Crispinus:

“Revenge shall ‘gratulate’ him, tam Marti, quam Mercurio.”

“Gratulate him” means 1) welcome him, and 2) thank him.

The Latin means “as much for Mars as for Mercury.”

Tucca played Mars in the masquerade, and Crispinus played Mercury. Tucca had been threatening to beat Horace, and Crispinus intended to slander Horace, thereby stealing his good name. Mars is the god of war, and Mercury is the god of thieves.

The Pyrgus said, “Aye, but master, take heed how you let this be known; Horace is a man of the sword.”

Ben Jonson once killed a fellow actor in a duel.

“That is true, indeed; they say he’s valiant,” Crispinus said.

“Valiant?” Tucca said. “So is my arse. Gods and fiends! I’ll blow him into air when I meet him next. He dares not fight with a puckfist: a puffball mushroom.”

“Master, here he comes,” the Pyrgus said.

Horace walked near them.

Tucca asked:

“Where?”

Seeing Horace, he said politely to him:

“Jupiter save thee, my good poet, my noble prophet.”

Then he added under his beath:

“My little fat Horace!”

Tucca then said quietly to Crispinus and the Pyrgus:

“I scorn to beat the rogue in the court, and I saluted him thus politely so that he would not suspect anything, the rascal.”

Fighting within the court was illegal.

He added:

“Come, we’ll go see how forward our journeyman is toward the untrussing of him.”

A journeyman craftsman can be hired by the day. Demetrius was the journeyman.

“Untrussing” meant undressing; the plotters were planning to “expose” Horace.

“Do you hear me, Captain?” Crispinus said. “I’ll write nothing in it but what is innocent and harmless, because I want to be able to swear that I am innocent.”

Tucca, Crispinus, and the Pyrgus exited. Horace was still present.

Maecenas entered the scene. From another door arrived Lupus, with the Lictors and Histrio.

Horace said to Lupus, “So, why don’t you pursue the Emperor for your reward now, Lupus?”

Lupus, suspecting treason, was the person who had brought Augustus Caesar to the masquerade at which Caesar banished Ovid and Julia.

Maecenas said to Asinius Lupus, who had started to leave:

“Wait, Asinius. Wait, you and your stager — actor —and your band of Lictors.

“I hope your service merits more respect than thus, without a thanks, to be sent away from here!”

“Well, well, jest on, jest on,” Histrio said.

Horace said to Histrio, “Thou base, unworthy groom —”

A groom is a serving-man.

“Aye, aye, it is good,” Lupus said sarcastically.

Horace said to Lupus:

“Was this the treason? Was this the dangerous plot thy clamorous tongue so bellowed through the court? Had thou no other project to increase thy grace with Caesar but this wolfish train, to prey upon the life of innocent mirth and harmless pleasures, bred of noble wit?”

The name “Lupus” means “wolf” in Latin.

The word “train” can mean 1) scheme, and/or 2) group of followers.

Horace continued:

“Go away! I loathe thy presence!

“Those who are such as thou are the moths and scarabs — dung beetles — of a state, the bane of empires, and the dregs of courts, who, to endear themselves to any employment, don’t care whose fame they blast, whose life they endanger.

“And under a disguised and cobweb — flimsy — mask of love for their sovereign, they vomit forth their own prodigious malice; and pretending to be the props and columns of his safety, the guard to his person and his peace, they disturb it most with their false lapwing cries.”

Lapwings are birds that nest on the ground, and they are loudest when away from their nest to keep enemies away from their nestlings. Sometimes they pretend to have an injured wing and cry while leading enemies away from the nest. When the enemy is a safe distance from the nest, the lapwing takes flight. A group of lapwings is called a deceit of lapwings.

“Good. Caesar shall know of this, believe it,” Lupus said.

Lupus, Histrio, and the Lictors exited.

Maecenas said:

“Caesar does know it, wolf, and in accordance with his knowledge he will, I hope, reward your base endeavors.

“Princes who will but hear or give access to such officious spies can never be safe:

“They take in poison with an open ear,

“And, free from danger, become slaves to fear.”

Some poisons, including poisonous words, are poured into the victim’s ear.

— 4.8 —

Alone, Ovid mourned being separated from Julia by her father. He said to himself:

“Banished from the court? Let me be banished from life, since the chief end of life is there concluded and confined.”

Ovid’s relationship with Julia was concluded — ended — with her confinement to her chamber.

Ovid continued:

“Within the court is all the kingdom bounded and contained, and as her sacred sphere does comprehend ten thousand times so much as so much place in any other part of all the empire, so everybody moving in her sphere contains ten thousand times as much in him as any other her choice orb excludes.”

According to Ptolemaic astronomy, the Sun and the planets were fixed in spheres that moved around the Earth, which was the center of the universe.

According to Ovid, the court was a sphere in which was that which was ten thousand times more valuable than any other sphere in the empire. Anyone moving within the court’s orbit had ten thousand times as much in him as any other man whom the court’s sphere excluded.

Julia, however, was in the court, and the pronoun “her” encompassed Julia in addition to the court.

Ovid continued:

“As in a circle a magician then is safe against the spirit he excites, but out of it the magician is subject to his rage and loses all the virtue of his art, so I, exiled from the circle of the court, lose all the good gifts that in it I enjoyed.”

Magicians would draw a circle in which they would stand to be safe from any evil demon they called up.

Some circles are vaginas, and some stands are erections.

Ovid continued:

“No virtue is current, except with her stamp, and no vice is vicious, but is blanched with her white hand.”

Current coinage is legal coinage with the sovereign’s — Queen Elizabeth I’s — stamp of approval.

Ovid continued:

“The court is the abstract — the epitome — of all Rome’s desert and merit, and my dear Julia is the abstract — the epitome — of the court.

“I think, now I come near her, I respire — breathe in — some air of that recent comfort I received, and while the evening with her modest veil — the dusk of evening — gives leave to such poor shadows — ghosts — as myself to steal abroad, I, like a heartless ghost, without the living body of my love will here walk and attend her.”

Ovid had received comfort from Julia: a note saying where she was imprisoned.

Ovid continued:

“For I know that she is imprisoned not far from here, and she hopes to bribe her strict guardian to allow her so much admittance as to speak to me and cheer my fainting spirits with her breath.”

In Julia’s note, she had written that she hoped to be able to bribe her guardian so that she could speak to him.

— 4.9 —

Julia appeared at the window of her chamber.

“Ovid? My love?” she said.

“Here, heavenly Julia,” Ovid said.

Julia said:

“Here and not here!”

Ovid was here, but he was banished. And he was here, but he was below and he was not standing by her.

Julia continued:

“Oh, how that word ‘here’ plays with both our fortunes, differing like our selves: Both one, and yet divided as if we were opposed to each other as enemies!

“I high, thou low! Oh, this our plight of place doubly presents the two lets — hindrances — of our love, local and ceremonial height and lowness; in both ways I am too high and thou are too low.”

The two hindrances of their love were height and lowness. Julia was high in her chamber, and Ovid was low on the ground; in addition, Julia’s social position was higher than Ovid’s.

“Local” referred to location, and “ceremonial” referred to society.

Julia continued:

“Our minds are even, yet; oh, why should our bodies, which are their slaves, be so without their rule?”

In other words: Our minds are equal, so why shouldn’t our bodies be ruled by the same principle of equality?

Julia continued:

“I’ll cast myself down to thee; if I die, I’ll forever live with thee. No height of birth, of social position, of duty, or of cruel power shall keep me from thee.

“Even if my father would lock this body up within a tomb of brass, yet I’ll be with thee.

“If the forms of love I hold now in my soul be made one substance with it, if that soul is immortal, and if it is the same as it is now, then death cannot raze the affects — the desire — she now retains — and then she may be anywhere she will.”

Plato believed in Forms. The Forms are the highest form of reality, and they are eternal and unchanging. Plato believed that there were many Forms. There is a Form for Tree, of which individual physical trees are only images. There is also a Form for Human Being and Forms for other physical objects. In addition, there are Forms for Beauty, Truth, Justice, Excellence, Piety, etc.

Julia was saying that in her soul was the Form for Love. Both the Form of Love and her soul were immortal, and if the two were united, then her death would not erase knowledge of that Form of Love.

The phrase “forms of love” with a lower-case ‘f’ means manifestations of the Form of Love. One such manifestation was her love for Ovid, which participated in the Form of Love.

In other words: She loved Ovid now, and since her soul was immortal and Love was immortal, she would continue to love him after death.

Julia continued:

“The souls of parents do not rule children’s souls when death sets both in their dissolved estates — when death separates the soul and body of the child and of each parent — then there is no child, nor father; and then eternity frees all from any temporal respect and obedience due to parents.

“I come, my Ovid; take me in thine arms and let me breathe my soul into thy breast!”

She made a movement as if to throw herself down.

Ovid said:

“Oh, stay, my love! The hopes thou conceive of thy quick — swift and living — death and of thy future life are not authentic and valid.

“Thou choose death so thou might enjoy thy love in the other life.

“But know, my princely love, when thou are dead thou only must survive in perfect and unalloyed soul; and in the soul are no affections.”

Affections are passions and desires, including sexual desires.

Ovid continued:

“We pour out our affections with our blood, and with our blood’s affections fade our loves.

“No life has love in such sweet state as this.

“No essence is so dear to moody sense as flesh and blood, whose quintessence — innermost nature — is sense.

“Beauty composed of blood and flesh moves more and is more plausible — acceptable, agreeable, pleasing — to blood and flesh than spiritual beauty can be to the spirit.

“Such apprehension — perception — as we have in dreams when sleep, the bond of senses, locks them up, such shall we have when death destroys them quite.

“If love is then thy object, exchange not life for death. Live high and happy still; I, still below, close with my fortunes, in thy height shall enjoy.”

Ovid will be “close” — that is, hidden away — because of his banishment. In addition he will be “close” — near to — his low fortune. But he will still rejoice that Julia is alive.

Julia said:

“Woe is me, that virtue, whose brave eagle’s wings with every stroke blow stars in burning heaven, should like a swallow preying toward storms fly close to earth, and with an eager plume — fierce flight — pursue those objects that none else can see, but seem to all the world the empty air.”

In other words: In our case, virtue is like an eagle that flies close to the earth (like a swallow flying into the winds of a storm as it hunts) and pursues sustenance that no one can see.

Because Ovid and Julia are separated, their love lacks sustenance. The two cannot fly high, as they would in a world in which her father did not oppose their love.

Julia continued:

“Thus thou, poor Ovid, and all virtuous men must prey like swallows on invisible food, pursuing flies, or nothing; and thus love and every worldly fancy is transposed and transformed by worldly tyranny into whatever plight — peril — it wishes.”

She then addressed her father, who was not present, in an apostrophe:

“O father, since thou did not give me my mind, don’t strive to rule it; take only what thou gave me — my body — into thy control. Thy affections and inclinations don’t rule me. I must bear all my griefs. Let me use and enjoy all my pleasures. Virtuous love was never scandal to a goddess’ state.”

Julia had acted the role of Juno, but her doing so was not scandalous.

Julia then said:

“But my father is inflexible! And, my dear love, Ovid, thy life may perhaps be shortened by the length of my unwilling speeches to depart.

“Farewell, sweet life. Even though thou, Ovid, are yet exiled from the officious — interfering — court, enjoy me amply still.

“My soul in this my breath enters thine ears, and on this turret’s floor I will lie dead until we may meet again.”

She knelt and said:

“In this proud height I kneel beneath thee in my prostrate love and kiss the happy sands that kiss thy feet.”

She kissed the literal floor of the turret and the metaphorical happy sands on which Ovid stood, and then she rose.

Julia continued:

“Great Jove submits — reduces — a scepter to a cell, and lovers, rather than part, will meet in hell.”

Julia’s high birth had turned into a prison cell for her. Nevertheless, Julia’s love for Ovid was stronger than her father’s power over her. She would not stop loving Ovid.

Ovid said:

“Farewell, all company, and if I could, all light, with thee! Hell’s shade should hide my brows until thy dear beauty’s beams redeemed my vows.”

He would commit suicide if he were capable of it.

Ovid started to leave.

Julia called him back:

“Ovid, my love! Alas, may we not stay a little longer, do thou think, undiscerned?”

Turning back, Ovid said:

“For thine own good, fair goddess, do not stay.

“Who would engage — put at risk — a firmament of fires shining in thee, for me, a fallen star?”

“Be gone, sweet life-blood. If I should discern thyself but touched for my sake, I should die.”

Julia could be touched in a way that would hurt her, and Ovid would literally die.

But “to die” can mean “to have an orgasm,” and if Ovid could touch Julia, he would figuratively die.

Julia said, “I will be gone, then, and not heaven itself shall draw me back.”

She started to leave.

Ovid said, “Yet, Julia, if thou will, a little longer stay.”

Julia returned and said, “I am content to stay a little longer.”

Ovid said, “O mighty Ovid! What the sway of heaven could not retire — draw back — my breath has turned back.”

“Who shall leave first, my love?” Julia said. “My passionate — sorrowful — eyes will not endure seeing thee turn from me.”

“If thou go first, my soul will follow thee,” Ovid said.

“Then we must stay,” Julia said.

Ovid said:

“Woe is me, there is no stay in amorous pleasures.”

The word “no stay” meant 1) no permanence, and 2) no stopping.

Ovid continued:

“If both stay, both die.”

If both stay and are caught by Julia's father, both will die.

But the word "die" in Elizabethan times also meant "have an orgasm," and so the words also mean, If both of us stay and have sex, both of us will have orgasms.

Ovid said:

"I hear thy father — hence, my deity!"

Julia exited.

Alone, Ovid said to himself:

"Fear forges sounds in my deluded ears. I did not hear thy father; I am mad with love.

"There is no spirit under heaven that works with such illusion; yet let such witchcraft kill me, before a sound mind without it save my life!"

He preferred to die while mad with love rather than live without love.

Ovid knelt and said:

"Here, on my knees, I worship the blest place that held my goddess, and the loving air that enclosed her body in its silken arms.

"Vain Ovid! Kneel not to the place nor air. She's in thy heart."

Ovid rose and said:

"Rise, then, and worship there.

The truest wisdom silly men can have is dotage on the follies of their flesh."

The word "silly" meant "deserving of sympathy and compassion."

ACT 5 (The Arraignment, or Poetaster)

— 5.1 —

Augustus Caesar was sitting on his throne. With him, standing, were Gallus, Tibullus, Maecenas, and Horace.

Using the majestic plural, Augustus Caesar pardoned Gallus and Tibullus:

“We who have conquered always to spare the conquered, and we who have loved to make inflictions feared, not felt, have grieved to reprove and was joyful to reward, and have been more proud of reconciliation than revenge, say this:

“Return again into the recent state of our love and respect, worthy Cornelius Gallus and Tibullus.

“You both are gentlemen.

“You, Cornelius, are a soldier of renown and the first Provost who ever let our Roman eagles fly on swarthy Egypt, quarried with her spoils.”

Elevated by Augustus Caesar from humble origins, Gallus had led the Roman army into Egypt and had become the country’s first Provost, or ruling overseer.

Hunting hawks were rewarded with part of the prey — quarry — after a successful hunt. Rome was rewarded with Egyptian riches.

Eagles were the insignia on Roman standards.

The people of Egypt were swarthy: of dark complexion.

Augustus Caesar continued:

“Yet, not to bear cold forms nor men’s outer conditions without the inward fires and lives of men, you both have virtues shining through your shapes to show your titles are not written on posts or hollow statues — the best men without Promethean stuffings reached from heaven are nothing but posts and hollow statues.”

Prometheus gave divine sparks to Humankind.

In mythology, Prometheus created Humankind from clay and breathed life into Humankind. He also stole fire from the gods and gave it to Humankind.

A man — even the best man (best in appearance and social status) — without those Promethean divine sparks is like a post or a hollow statue.

The Promethean divine sparks are virtues.

Augustus Caesar continued:

Gallus and Tibullus have inward virtues that shine outward so that Humankind can see them.

“Sweet poesy’s sacred garlands crown your gentry. Poesy is, of all the faculties — abilities — on Earth, the most abstract and perfect, if she is true born and nursed with all the sciences — branches of knowledge.

“She can so mold Rome and her monuments within the liquid marble of her lines that they shall stand fresh and miraculous even when they mix with innovating — changing — dust.”

The oxymoron “liquid marble” refers to flowing lines of eternal poetry. Even after the Roman Coliseum is a literal ruin, Rome’s poetry — such as Virgil’s Aeneid, in which Aeneas, a surviving Trojan, becomes an important ancestor of the Roman people — shall stand fresh and miraculous and keep Rome and the Roman Coliseum fresh and miraculous.

Augustus Caesar continued:

“In poetry’s sweet streams shall our brave Roman spirits chase and swim after death, with their choice deeds shining on their white shoulders; and therein shall Tiber and our famous rivers fall with such attraction that the ambitious — closely encircling — line of the round world shall to her center shrink to hear their music; and for these high qualities Caesar shall reverence the Pierian arts.”

In other words:

Poetry shall make Rome and the Roman people remembered, as indeed do Virgil’s Aeneid and the works of Horace.

The entire world shall come to its center — Rome — either literally or figuratively to hear the music of its poetry.

The Muses lived in Pieria and frolicked by its streams.

Maecenas said:

“Your Majesty’s high grace to poesy shall stand against all the dull detractions of leaden souls, who, for the vain assumings — pretensions — of some, quite worthless of her sovereign wreaths, contain — regard — her worthiest prophets in contempt.”

In other words: Augustus Caesar’s appreciation of true poetry will be a bulwark against bad poets who denigrate true poets.

Gallus said:

“Happy is Rome of all earth’s other states, to have so true and great a president — governor and precedent, aka model — for her inferior spirits to imitate as Caesar is, who adds to the Sun influence and luster, in increasing thus his inspirations, kindling fire in us.”

In other words: Augustus Caesar honors Phoebus Apollo, the Sun-god and the god of poetry, by praising poetry. Caesar is also a good model for Roman citizens to imitate.

Horace said:

“Phoebus Apollo himself shall kneel at Caesar’s shrine and deck it with bay garlands dewed with wine to reward the worship Caesar does to him.”

In other words: Apollo himself will reward Augustus Caesar with laurel wreaths for defending poetry.

Horace continued:

“Whereas other princes, hoisted to their thrones by Fortune’s passionate and disordered power, sit in their height like clouds before the sun, hindering his — the sun’s — comforts; and by their excess of cold in virtue and cross heat in vice, thunder and tempest on those learned heads whom Caesar with such honor does advance.”

In other words, other princes who have been elevated by luck, not merit, block Apollo’s gift of poetry to Humankind and storm against true poets such as those whom Augustus Caesar promotes and rewards. These bad princes are coldly indifferent to virtue and hotly in pursuit of sin.

Tibullus said:

“All human business Fortune does command without all order, and with her blind hand she, blind, bestows blind gifts that always have nursed they see not who nor how, but always the worst.”

In other words: Tibullus believes that Lady Fortune is blind and hands out her gifts blindly and without order to bad people.

Using the third person, Augustus Caesar said:

“Caesar, as regards his rule and as regards whatever resources Lady Fortune puts in his hand, shall dispose it as if his hand had eyes and soul in it: with worth and judgment.”

In other words: When Augustus Caesar gave gifts, he did so with open eyes: He would reward the deserving virtuous people, including poets.

Augustus Caesar continued:

“Hands that part with gifts either will restrain their use, without desert or with a misery — miserliness — numbed to virtue’s right, work as if they had no soul to govern them, and quite reject her, severing their estates — condition of life, and material wealth — from human order.

“Whosoever can and will not cherish virtue is no man.”

In other words: Hands that give gifts or withhold gifts without considering the virtue of those who receive or do not receive them are soulless and do not value virtue.

Some Roman equites — Knights — entered the scene.

The Knights were the social class immediately below the noble class.

“Virgil is now at hand, imperial Caesar,” a Knight said.

“Rome’s honor is at hand, then,” Augustus Caesar said.

Virgil was and is the greatest Roman poet.

Augustus Caesar said to the Knights:

“Fetch a chair and set it on our right hand, the place of honor, where it is fitting that Rome’s honor, and our own, should always sit.”

The Knights set the chair in place; then they exited.

Augustus Caesar said, “Now that Virgil has come out of Campania in west central Italy, I don’t doubt that he has finished all the books of his Aeneid, which like another soul I long to enjoy.”

The Aeneid consists of 12 books, but if the Aeneid were written today, we would call them chapters.

Augustus Caesar said to Maecenas, Gallus, and Tibullus:

“What do you three think of Virgil, gentlemen, you who are of his profession, though ranked higher?”

Virgil was ranked higher critically, but his birth in the social order was lower. His father was a farmer, but a farmer with much land.

Augustus Caesar then said:

“Or, Horace, what do thou say, thou who are the poorest and likeliest to envy or to detract?”

Ben Jonson’s father was a bricklayer.

The Roman Horace had inherited a small estate, but he had fought against Augustus Caesar and so had lost it. Augustus Caesar gave him amnesty.

In his reply, Horace pointed out that knowledge is more important than wealth:

“Caesar speaks in the manner of common men in this to make a difference of me for my poorness, as if the filth of poverty sunk as deep into a knowing spirit as the bane of riches does into an ignorant soul.

“No, Caesar, they are pathless, moorish — boggy — minds that, being once made rotten with the dung of damned riches, forever afterward sink beneath the steps of any villainy.”

In other words: Ignorant souls, when poisoned by wealth, become pathless and the only imprints they receive are from the metaphorical steps of villainy.

Horace continued:

“But knowledge is the nectar that keeps sweet a perfect soul even in this grave of sin: the body, and society.

“And as for my soul, it is as free — unfettered by poverty and generous — as Caesar’s, for what I know is due I’ll give to all.

“He who detracts or envies virtuous merit

“Is always the covetous and the ignorant spirit.”

Augustus Caesar replied:

“Thanks, Horace, for thy free and wholesome sharpness, which pleases Caesar more than servile fawnings.

“A flattered prince soon turns into the prince of fools, and for thy sake we’ll put no difference more between the great and good for being poor.

“Tell us then, beloved Horace, thy true thought and opinion about Virgil.”

Horace said:

“I judge him to be of a rectified — refined — spirit, by many revolutions of discourse in his bright reason’s influence, refined from all the tartarous — unrefined — moods of common men.

“He bears the nature and similitude of a right heavenly body; he is most severe in fashion and collection — shaping and composing — of himself, and then as clear and confident as Jove.”

Virgil's spirit is more refined than the spirits of common men. Virgil's spirit is in the heavens because of his bright reason, while the spirits of common men are tartarous.

Tartarus is the Underworld, especially the part where evil-doers are punished. The word "tartarous," however, is derived from tartarous acid, an early name for tartaric acid.

Gallus said, "And yet so chaste — pure — and tender is his ear in suffering any syllable to pass that he thinks may become the honored name of issue to his so examined self that all the lasting fruits of his full merit in his own poems he does still distaste, as if his mind's piece, which he strove to paint, could not with fleshly pencils have her right."

Virgil is very critical of his own work — even his best work.

In fact, the Aeneid was not quite completed at his death — a few lines are only half-lines. On his deathbed, Virgil requested that the manuscript be burned, but Augustus Caesar denied that request. The thought of the Aeneid being burned and not being passed down to us gives some classicists such as Elizabeth Vandiver nightmares.

Tibullus said:

"But to confirm that his works have sovereign worth, this observation, I think, more than serves, and is not common:

"That which he has written is with such judgment labored and distilled through all the necessary uses of our lives that, could a man remember but Virgil's lines, the man should not touch at any serious point but he might breathe Virgil's spirit out of him."

In other words: In his works, Virgil has written important passages about all serious subjects.

In the Middle Ages, people concerned about an important question or subject would open the Aeneid and point to a passage at random. Sometimes, the passage shed light on the answer to the question. Some people have done this with the Bible.

Augustus Caesar said, “You mean he might repeat part of his works, as fit for any conference — discussion and reasoning — he can use?”

In any conversation, a man could use quotations from Virgil’s works and they would be fitting for the conversation. They would contribute to the conversation, not be a distraction.

“True, royal Caesar,” Tibullus said.

“Worthily observed, and a most worthy virtue in his works,” Augustus Caesar said.

He then said, “What does material — full of good sense — Horace think of Virgil’s learning?”

Horace said:

“His learning does not labor the school-like gloss that most consists in echoing words and terms and soonest wins a man an empty name, nor does his learning labor any long or far-fetched circumstance wrapped in the curious generalities of arts.

“Instead, his learning has a direct and analytic sum of all the worth and first effects of arts.”

In other words: Virgil’s learning is not abstruse and overly difficult but instead it clearly reveals the worth and value of knowledge and skill.

Horace continued:

“And as for his poesy, it is so rammed — crammed — with life that it shall gather strength of life with being and live hereafter more admired than now.”

In other words: Virgil's poetry is so good that it will become more admired in the future than now: It will become a classic.

Augustus Caesar said, "This one consent in all your dooms — judgments — of him, and mutual loves of all your individual merits, argues a truth of merit in you all."

— 5.2 —

Virgil entered the scene. Some Roman Knights escorted him.

"Look, here comes Virgil," Augustus Caesar said. "We will rise and greet him."

He stood up.

Augustus Caesar then said:

"Welcome to Caesar, Virgil. Caesar and Virgil shall differ but in sound; to Caesar, Virgil, because of his expressed greatness, shall be made a second surname; and to Virgil, Caesar shall be made a second surname."

Romans were given an additional name as an honor. For example, Publius Cornelius Scipio was given the name "Africanus" in honor of his defeat of Hannibal and Carthage in North Africa in the Second Punic War.

Augustus Caesar then said:

"Where are thy famous books of the Aeneid? Do us the grace to let us see them, and surfeit on their sight."

Virgil replied:

"Worthless they are of Caesar's gracious eyes if they were perfect.

"Much more are they worthless with their faults, which yet are more than my time could supply the remedy.

“And if great Caesar’s expectation could be satisfied with any other service, I would not show them to him.”

Virgil was saying that even if his verses were perfect, they would still not be worthy enough for Augustus Caesar to see them.

“Virgil is too modest or seeks in vain to make our longings more,” Augustus Caesar said. “Show them, sweet Virgil.”

Virgil replied, “Then, in such due fear as befits presenters of great works to Caesar, I humbly show them.”

Augustus Caesar accepted the manuscript from Virgil and said:

“Let us now behold a human soul made visible in life, and more refulgent — radiant — in a senseless paper than in the sensual complement — ceremony — of Kings.”

In other words: A paper containing words of true poetry reveals a human soul and makes it more radiant than does the sensuous, luxurious ceremony of Kings.

He returned the manuscript and said:

“Read, read it thyself, dear Virgil. Let me not profane one accent with an untuned tongue. Best matter, badly shown, shows worse than bad.”

He indicated the chair on his right and said:

“See then this chair, on purpose set for thee to read thy poem in.”

Virgil made a motion as if to refuse the seat.

Augustus Caesar said:

“Don’t refuse it.

“Virtue without presumption place may take

“Above best kings, whom only she should make.”

Virgil said:

“It will be thought a thing ridiculous to present eyes, and to all future times a gross untruth, that any poet, void of birth or wealth or temporal dignity, should with fitness and decorum transcend and surpass Caesar’s chair.

“Poor virtue raised, high birth and wealth set under,

“Crosses heaven’s courses and makes worldlings wonder.”

Heaven’s courses are the orbits or spheres of planets. According to Virgil, even a virtuous poet ought not to ascend higher than those of high birth and wealth.

Augustus Caesar said, “The course of heaven and fate itself in this will Caesar cross; much more all worldly custom.”

He was willing to raise Virgil above high birth and wealth.

Horace said:

“Custom in course of honor ever errs,

“And they are best whom Fortune least prefers.”

“In course of honor” means either “in pursuit of honor” or “in bestowing honor.”

Augustus Caesar said:

“Horace has but more strictly spoken our thoughts. The vast, rude swinge — uneducated power — of general confluence — the common mob — is in particular ends exempt from sense, and therefore reason, which in right should be the special rector — ruler — of all harmony, shall show we are a man distinct by it from those whom custom enraptures in her press.”

Augustus Caesar will be different from common people who follow conventional thought because he will follow reason rather than custom.

Caesar took and opened the manuscript of the Aeneid at random and said, “Ascend, then, Virgil, and, where first by chance we here have turned thy book, do thou first read.”

Virgil said:

“Great Caesar has his will. I will do what he wishes and will ascend to the dais.

“It would be a simple injury to his free hand, which sweeps the cobwebs from unused virtue and makes her shine proportioned to her worth, to be more nice — more reluctant and unwilling — to entertain his grace than he is choice and liberal to afford it.”

Virgil mounted his chair on the dais and prepared to read.

Augustus Caesar said to the Knights, “Gentlemen of our chamber, guard the doors and let none enter. Peace and silence.”

He then said, “Begin, good Virgil.”

Virgil began to read a passage from Book 4 of the Aeneid, which is about the love affair of Aeneas and Dido, the Queen of Carthage. In this passage, Aeneas and Dido consummate their love in a cave. Quickly, rumors of their love affair spread throughout Carthage and the surrounding territory.

Virgil read:

“Meanwhile the skies began to thunder, and in tail

“Of that, fell pouring storms of sleet and hail.

“The Tyrian lords and Trojan youth each where [everywhere],

“With Venus’ Dardan nephew, now in fear

“Seek out for several [different, separate] shelter through the plain,

“Whilst floods come rolling from the hills amain [violently].”

The Tyrian lords are men from Tyre. Dido and the Carthaginians are from the Phoenician city of Tyre.

The Dardan — Trojan — nephew of Venus is Ascanius, Aeneas’ son and Venus’ grandson. The Latin word for “grandchild” is nepos. Elizabethan English gives a wide meaning to the word “nephew.”

Virgil continued reading:

“Dido a cave, the Trojan prince [Aeneas] the same

*“Lighted upon [Alighted upon, aka discovered]. There
Earth, and heaven’s great dame*

“That [Who] has the charge of marriage [Juno, goddess of marriage], first gave sign

“Unto this contract; fire and air did shine,

“As guilty of the match, and from the hill

“The nymphs with shriekings do the region fill.

“Here first began their bane. This day was ground

“Of all their ills. For now nor [neither] rumor’s sound

“Nor nice respect of state moves Dido aught [at all];

“Her love no longer now by stealth is sought;

“She calls this wedlock, and with that fair name

“Covers her fault. Forthwith the bruit and fame [gossip and rumor]

“Through all the greatest Libyan towns is gone;

“Fame, a fleet evil, than which is swifter none,

“That moving grows and flying gathers strength,

“Little at first, and fearful, but at length

“She dares attempt the skies, and stalking proud

“With feet on ground, her head doth [does] pierce a cloud!

“This child our parent Earth, stirred up with spite

“Of all the gods, brought forth; and, as some write,

“She was last sister of that giant race

“That thought to scale Jove’s court; right swift of pace

“And swifter far of wing; a monster vast

“And dreadful. Look how many plumes are placed

“On her huge corpse, so many waking eyes

“Stick underneath; and, which may stranger rise

“In the report, as many tongues she bears,

“As many mouths, as many list’ning ears.

“Nightly in midst of all the heaven she flies,

“And through the earth’s dark shadow shrieking cries;

“Nor do her eyes once bend to taste sweet sleep.

“By day on tops of houses she doth [does] keep,

*“Or on high towers, and doth [does] thence affright
[frighten]*

“Cities and towns of most conspicuous site.

“As covetous she is of tales and lies

“As prodigal of truth. This monster [Rumor] ....”

Below is an excerpt from David Bruce’s Virgil’s Aeneid: A Retelling in Prose that retells the above passage.

“[...] a storm hurled hail at them. All scattered and sought shelter. Dido and Aeneas found and entered the same cave. Here the goddesses Earth and Juno lit what resembled wedding torches. Here nymphs sang what resembled a wedding song. Here the sky witnessed what resembled a wedding. But although Juno provided the trappings of a wedding, this was not a legal wedding. Aeneas did not hold the torch that a groom holds in a real marriage. Aeneas did not make the vows that a groom makes in a real marriage.

“Dido called her relationship with Aeneas a marriage, but it was really an affair. Dido used the word ‘marriage’ to lessen her feeling of guilt.

“Rumors of the affair spread quickly to all the cities of Libya. Evil moves quickly, and of all evils, rumor moves the quickest. Rumor is the daughter of Mother Earth, who bore her after Jupiter had killed two of her sons: the Titan Coeus and the Giant Enceladus. Mother Earth gave birth to Rumor as a way to get revenge for the death of these sons.

“Rumor has wings and many feathers. Her many eyes never sleep, and she has many tongues and many ears. By night she flies, and by day she watches and listens. She values lies as much as she values truths.”

— 5.3 —

Virgil continued reading briefly as Lupus entered the scene, but Virgil’s words were drowned out by noise.

Holding a paper, Lupus came through the door, meeting the Knights on guard. He was attended by some Lictors.

Tucca, Crispinus, Demetrius, and Aesop attempted to crowd in after Lupus.

Aesop was an actor.

“Come, follow me, assist me, second me!” Lupus said to Tucca, Crispinus, Demetrius, and Aesop.

He then asked the Knights, “Where’s the Emperor?”

“Sir, you must pardon us,” the First Knight said.

“Caesar is private now,” the Second Knight said. “You may not enter.”

“Not enter?” Tucca said.

He then said to Lucca, “Charge them upon their allegiance, cropshin.”

A cropshin is an inferior herring.

“We have an order to the contrary, sir,” the First Knight said.

“I pronounce you all traitors, horrible traitors!” Lupus said. “What! Do you know my affairs? I have matter of danger and state to impart to Caesar!”

“What noise is there?” Augustus Caesar asked. “Who’s that who names Caesar?”

“A friend to Caesar!” Lupus said. “One who for Caesar’s good would speak with Caesar!”

“Who is it?” Augustus Caesar said. “Go and look, Cornelius.”

Cornelius Gallus started to go to the door, but the First Knight said, “Asinius Lupus is here.”

“Oh, tell the turbulent informer to leave,” Augustus Caesar said. “We have no vacant ear, now, to receive the unseasoned — unseasonable — fruits of his officious tongue.”

Maecenas said to the Knights, “You must get rid of him there. Dismiss him.”

The Knights forced Lupus and his companions back to the door.

“I conjure thee as thou art Caesar to respect either thine own safety or the safety of the state or both, Caesar!” Lupus said. “Hear me! Speak with me, Caesar! It is no common business I come about, but such as, being neglected, may concern the life of Caesar!”

“The life of Caesar? Let him enter,” Augustus Caesar said.

He then said, “Virgil, keep thy seat.”

Lupus and the Lictors approached the dais.

The Knights said to Tucca, Crispinus, Demetrius, and Aesop, “Bear back, there! Where are you going! Keep back!”

Crispinus, Demetrius, and Aesop were pushed back.

Tucca pushed past the Knights and said, “By your leave, goodman usher. Mend thy peruke; good.”

A peruke is a wig, then fashionable. In pushing past the Knight, Tucca had knocked it awry. The Knight pulled it back into the right place.

“Lay hold on Horace there, and on Maecenas, Lictors!” Lupus said.

The Lictors placed them under guard. Gallus and Tibullus started forward.

Lupus said, “Romans, offer no rescue, upon your allegiance.”

He gave Caesar the paper and said, “Read, royal Caesar.”

He then said to Horace, “I’ll tickle you, satyr!”

“He will, Humors, he will,” Tucca said. “He will squeeze you, poet puckfist.”

A puckfist is a puffball mushroom.

Tucca was calling Horace “Humors” as well as a mushroom — a social upstart.

Ben Jonson wrote plays about humors — personal characteristics and quirks.

Humors can also be bodily fluids. Thus Tucca’s “squeeze.”

Lupus said to Horace, “I’ll lop you off for an unprofitable branch, you satirical varlet!”

Tucca said, “Aye, and” — he pointed to Maecenas — “Epaminondas, your patron here, with his flagon chain.”

A chain is a necklace; sometimes, a small flagon of perfume hung from it.

Epaminondas was a Theban general.

Tucca then said to Maecenas, “Come, resign it. Give it up. Even if it were your great-grandfather’s, the law has made it mine now, sir.”

He took Maecenas’ chain.

Tucca then said to the Lictors, “Look to him, my particolored rascals; look to him.”

The “particolored rascals” were the Lictors, who wore multi-colored uniforms.

Pointing to the paper, Augustus Caesar said, “What is this, Asinius Lupus? I don’t understand it.”

“Not understand it?” Lupus said. “It is a libel, Caesar. A dangerous, seditious libel! A libel in picture.”

“A libel?” Augustus Caesar said.

“Aye, I found it in this Horace’s study, in Maecenas’ house, here,” Lupus said. “I call for the penalty of the laws against them!”

Tucca said to Lupus, “Aye, and remember to beg their land promptly, before some of these hungry, greedy court-hounds scent it out.”

In Elizabethan England, a person who turned in a traitor would be rewarded with all or part of that person’s land and wealth. This was called begging their land. Tucca had already claimed Maecenas’ flagon chain.

Handing the paper to a Lictor, Augustus Caesar said, “Show it to Horace. Ask him if he knows it.”

“Know it?” Lupus said. “His handwriting is on it, Caesar.”

“Then it is no libel,” Augustus Caesar said.

Augustus Caesar knew and trusted Horace enough to believe that he was not libelous or treasonous.

Horace glanced at the paper and said, “It is the imperfect — incomplete — body of an emblem, Caesar, that I began to create for Maecenas.”

An emblem is a symbolic picture, often accompanied by a maxim and sometimes by explanatory verses.

“An emblem?” Lupus said. “Right. That’s Greek for a libel. Do but notice how confident he is.”

Horace said:

“A just man cannot fear, thou foolish Tribune.

“Not though the malice of traducing tongues, the open vastness of a tyrant’s ear, the senseless rigor of the wrested laws, or the red eyes of strained authority should in a point meet all to take his life.

“His innocence is armor against all these.”

“Innocence? Oh, impudence!” Lupus said.

He took back the paper and said:

“Let me see, let me see.

“Isn’t here an eagle? And isn’t that eagle intended to mean Caesar? Huh? Doesn’t Caesar bear the eagle as insignia?”

He asked Horace, “Answer me; what do thou say?”

“Have thou any evasion, stinkard?” Tucca asked Horace.

“Now he’s turned dumb,” Lupus said.

He then said to Horace, “I’ll tickle you, satyr.”

Horace then said to express his contempt for Lupus, “Pish.”

He began to laugh: “Ha! Ha!”

“Do thou pish me?” Lupus said.

He said to the Lictor carrying his sword, “Give me my long-sword.”

Horace said:

“With reverence to great Caesar: worthy Romans” — he pointed to Lupus — “just observe this ridiculous commenter. The soul to my device was in this distich, aka couplet:

“Thus, oft [often] the base and ravenous multitude

“Survive to share the spoils of fortitude,”

“Which in this body I have figured here: A vulture —”

“A vulture?” Lupus interrupted. “Aye, now it is a vulture. Oh, abominable! Monstrous! Monstrous! Hasn’t your vulture a beak? Hasn’t it legs? And talons? And wings? And feathers?”

Tucca said to Lupus, “Touch him, old Buskins.”

Buskins are boots.

In fencing, a touch scores a hit. The fencer touches his opponent with his weapon.

“And therefore it must be an eagle?” Horace asked.

“Don’t pay him any attention, good Horace,” Maecenas said. “Describe your emblem.”

“A vulture and a wolf —”

“A wolf?” Lupus interrupted. “Good. That’s I; I am the wolf. My name’s Lupus; I am meant by the wolf. Go on, go on: a vulture and a wolf —”

Horace continued, “— preying upon the carcass of an ass —”

“An ass?” Lupus interrupted. “Good still: that’s I, too. I am the ass. You mean me by the ass —”

His name was Asinius Lupus. In Latin, asinus means “ass,” and lupus means “wolf.”

Maecenas said to Lupus, “Please, stop braying then.”

Horace said to Lupus, “If you will needs take it, I cannot with modesty give it from you.”

Lupus was claiming that he was the ass, and so Horace was claiming that he could not give the title of “ass” to anyone or anything else.

Maecenas pointed out that to the Egyptians, the ass was a noble beast: “But the old Egyptians were accustomed to use the ass as a figure in their hieroglyphics to represent patience, frugality, and fortitude. We can suspect you of having none of these qualities, Tribune.”

Augustus Caesar asked, “Who was it, Lupus, who informed you first that this should be meant by us? Or was it your comment — your own explanation?”

He was asking, Who told you that this figure represented us?

The figure was the eagle or vulture.

Lupus answered, “It’s not my own explanation, Caesar: An actor gave me the explanation at the first sight of it, indeed.”

“Aye, an honest sycophant-like slave, and a politician — a person of intrigue — besides,” Tucca said.

“Where is that actor?” Augustus Caesar asked.

“He is outside, but he is here,” Tucca said.

“Call him in,” Augustus Caesar said.

Tucca said to the Knights, “Call in the actor there: He is Master Aesop. Call him.”

The Knights called, “Actor! Where is the actor?”

Aesop the actor entered. Crispinus and Demetrius attempted to enter, but the Knights barred their way and said, “Keep back! None but the actor may enter.”

Tucca pointed to Crispinus and Demetrius and said, “Yes, this gent’man and his Achates must enter.”

Achates was one of Aeneas' subordinates in Virgil's Aeneid.
Tucca was using "Achates" to refer to Demetrius.

"This gent'man," aka Crispinus, would then be Aeneas.

Crispinus said to a Knight, "Please, master usher; we'll stand close by, here."

Aesop approached the dais; Crispinus and Demetrius went inside the room.

Indicating Crispinus, Tucca said, "He is a gent'man of quality, this, although he is somewhat out of clothes, I tell ye."

He then asked the actor, "Come, Aesop; have thou a bay leaf in thy mouth?"

Aesop nodded.

The bay leaf could be aromatic and cover the smell of alcohol or bad breath, or Aesop could hold it in his mouth in the hope that it would make him eloquent. Laurel — bay — wreaths were given as an honor to exceptional people.

Tucca said, "Well done; don't be at a loss for words, stinkard. Thou shall have a monopoly of acting confirmed to thee and thy covey — thy brood — under the Emperor's broad seal, for this service."

Augustus Caesar asked Lupus about Aesop, "Is he the actor?"

"Aye, Caesar, this is he," Lupus said.

Augustus Caesar said:

"Let him be whipped.

"Lictors, take him away from here."

Some Lictors exited with Aesop.

Augustus Caesar said:

“And, Lupus, for your fierce — zealous — credulity —

“One of you outfit him with a pair of larger ears — ass’ ears.

“It is Caesar’s sentence, and it must not be revoked. We hate to have our court and peace disturbed with these quotidian — mundane — clamors.

“See that it is done.”

“Caesar!” Lupus said.

“Gag him, so we may have his silence,” Augustus Caesar said.

Lupus was gagged.

Virgil said:

“Caesar has acted like Caesar. Fair and just is his award against these brainless creatures.

“It is not the wholesome, sharp morality or modest anger of a satiric spirit that hurts or wounds the body of a state, but the sinister application of the malicious, ignorant, and base interpreter who will distort and strain the general scope and purpose of an author to his particular and private spleen, aka resentment.”

Augustus Caesar said, “We know it, our dear Virgil, and esteem it a most dishonest practice in that man who will seem too witty in another’s work.”

Some critics will be witty at another’s expense even if the other person does not deserve it. Caustic critic John Simon once wrote this about a young, beautiful actress: “Diana Rigg is built like a brick mausoleum with insufficient flying buttresses.” (After a few weeks of embarrassment, Ms. Rigg began to think the quotation was funny.)

Gallus and Tibullus approached Caesar.

Augustus Caesar asked, “What do Cornelius Gallus and Tibullus want?”

While the three men quietly conferred, Tuca said to Maecenas:

“Nay, but as thou are a man — do thou hear? — a man of worship, and honorable —

“Wait, here, take thy chain again. Resume it, mad Maecenas. Reclaim it.

“What! Do thou think I meant to have kept it, bold boy? No; I did it just to frighten thee, I, to test how thou would take it.

“What! Will I turn shark — swindler — upon my friends? Or my friends’ friends? I scorn it with my three souls.”

Aristotle believed that human beings have a tripartite soul that consists of these three parts: 1) vegetative, 2) animal, and 3) rational.

Tuca continued saying to Maecenas:

“Come, I love bully Horace as well as thou do, I. It is an honest hieroglyphic.”

In Tuca’s culture, if you are called a bully, it means you are being called a jolly, fine fellow.

Tuca then said to Horace: “Give me thy wrist, Helicon.”

By “wrist,” he meant “hand.”

Mount Helicon was sacred to the Muses.

Tuca continued, “Do thou think I’ll second ever a rhinoceros — sneerer — of them all against thee? Huh?”

He pointed to Maecenas and said, “Or thy noble Hippocrene, here? I’ll turn stage actor first, and be whipped, too; do thou see, bully?”

Hippocrene is the spring of the Muses on Mount Helicon.

Maecenas is like the Hippocrene in that he keeps the patronage flowing to people such as Horace, who is like Mount Helicon in that he is a giant of literature.

Augustus Caesar said to Gallus and Tiberius:

“You have your will — what you want — from Caesar; use it, Romans.

“Virgil shall be your Praetor, and ourself will here sit by, spectator of your sports, and think it no impeach of — no discredit to — royalty.”

Praetors are basically second in command to Consuls, just as Executive Officers are second in command to Commanding Officers.

Gallus, Tibullus, and Maecenas conferred apart.

Augustus Caesar said to Virgil:

“Our ear is now too much profaned, grave Maro, with these distastes, to take thy sacred lines.”

The “distastes” were the annoyances of Lupus and Aesop.

Virgil’s name was Publius Virgilius Maro.

The sacred lines were lines of the Aeneid.

Augustus Caesar continued:

“Put up thy book, until both the time and we are fitted with more hallowed circumstance for the receiving of so divine a work.”

He then said to Gallus, Tibullus, and Maecenas, "Proceed with your plan."

They replied, "We give thanks to great Caesar."

Gallus said:

"Tibullus, draw up the indictment, then, while Horace arrests them on the statute of calumny. Maecenas and I will take our places here.

"Lictors, assist Horace in making the arrest."

"I am the worst accuser under heaven," Horace said.

"Tut, you must do it," Gallus said. "It will be noble mirth and entertainment."

"I take no knowledge that they do malign me," Horace said.

In other words, he ignores their insults.

"Aye, but the world takes knowledge — it takes notice," Tibullus said.

"I wish the world knew how heartily I wish a fool should hate me!" Horace said.

If a fool hates someone, that is a compliment.

Crispinus and Demetrius were brought to the bar. They would be put on trial.

Seeing this, Tuca became worried and said to himself:

"By the body of Jupiter!

"What! Will they arraign my brisk poetaster and his poor journeyman, huh?

"I wish that I were abroad skeldering — conning — for a drachma, so that I would be out of this labyrinth again; I do feel myself turn stinkard already.

“But I must set the best face I have upon it now.”

The best thing Tucca could do for himself now was to metaphorically throw his acquaintances under the bus.

He said out loud, “Well said, my divine, deft Horace, bring the whoreson detracting slaves to the bar, do. Make them hold up their spread golls; I’ll give in evidence for thee, if thou are willing.”

Golls are hands. They are held up when people take oaths. “Spread golls” are “open hands.”

Tucca and Crispinus quietly spoke apart from the others.

Tucca said, “Take courage, Crispinus. I wish that thy man had a clean band — a clean collar!”

“Thy man” was Demetrius.

“What must we do, Captain?” Crispinus asked.

“Thou shall see soon,” Tucca said. “Do not make division with thy legs so.”

Crispinus’ knees were shaking and knocking together because he was afraid. According to Tucca, the knocking sounded like a rapid passage — division — in a piece of music.

Pointing to Tucca, Augustus Caesar asked, “Who’s he, Horace?”

“I know him only for a motion, Caesar,” Horace answered.

A motion is literally a puppet, as in a puppet show. Figuratively, it is a human figure of fun.

Hearing them, Tucca said, “I am one of thy commanders, Caesar. I am a man of service and action. My name is Pantilius Tucca. I have served in thy wars against Mark Antony, I.”

“Do you know him, Cornelius?” Augustus Caesar asked Gallus, who had been a general.

Cornelius Gallus answered, “He’s one who has had the mustering or convoy — recruitment or escort — of a company now and then; I never noted him by any other employment.”

“We will observe him better,” Augustus Caesar said.

Having finished writing the indictment, Tibullus said, “Lictor, proclaim silence in the court.”

“In the name of Caesar, silence!” the Lictor said.

“Let the parties, the accuser and the accused, present themselves,” Tibullus said.

“The accuser and the accused: Present yourselves in court,” the Lictor said.

“Here,” Crispinus and Demetrius said.

“Read the indictment,” Virgil ordered.

Tibullus ordered, “Rufus Laberius Crispinus and Demetrius Fannius, hold up your hands.”

Tibullus then read out loud:

“You are before this time jointly and severally — individually — indicted, and here immediately to be arraigned upon the statute of calumny, or Lex Remmia, aka Roman defamation law, the one by the name of Rufus Laberius Crispinus, alias Crispinus, poetaster and plagiarist; the other by the name of Demetrius Fannius, play dresser and plagiarist; that you, not having the fear of Phoebus Apollo or his shafts before your eyes, contrary to the peace of our liege lord, Augustus Caesar, his crown and dignity, and against the form of a statute in that case made and provided, have most ignorantly, foolishly, and (more like yourselves) maliciously gone about to deprave — that is, defame — and calumniate the person and writings of Quintus Horatius Flaccus here present: poet, and priest to the Muses; and to that end have mutually conspired and plotted, at sundry times as by several means and in sundry places, for the better accomplishing your base and envious purpose; taxing him falsely of self-love, arrogancy, impudence, railing, filching by translation, etc.

“Of all which calumnies and every one of them, in manner and form aforesaid, what do you answer?”

“Are you guilty or not guilty?”

Tucca said to Crispinus and Demetrius, “Say, ‘Not guilty.’”

Crispinus and Demetrius pleaded, “Not guilty.”

“How will you be tried?” Tibullus asked.

Tucca said to Crispinus and Demetrius, “Say, ‘By the Roman gods and the noblest Romans.’”

Crispinus and Demetrius said, “By the Roman gods and the noblest Romans.”

Virgil said to Crispinus and Demetrius, “Here sit Maecenas and Cornelius Gallus. Are you content to be tried by these?”

Tucca said to Crispinus and Demetrius, “Say, ‘Aye, so long as the noble captain may be joined with them in commission.’”

Crispinus and Demetrius said, “Aye, so long as the noble captain may be joined with them in commission.”

Virgil said to Horace, “What says the plaintiff?”

“I am content,” Horace answered.

“Captain, then take your place,” Virgil said.

Tucca said to Virgil:

“Alas, my worshipful Praetor, it is more of thy gent’ness than of my deserving, iwis.”

Tucca’s “gent’ness” means “gentleness,” aka courtesy.

“Iwis” means “certainly.”

Tucca continued:

“But since it has pleased the court to make choice of my wisdom and gravity —”

He said to Crispinus and Demetrius:

“— come, my calumnious varlets: Let’s hear you talk for yourselves now an hour or two.

“What can you say? Make a noise. Act, act!”

Virgil said to the judges Gallus, Maecenas, and Tucca:

“Wait; turn and face Virgil and take an oath first.

“You shall swear by thunder-darting Jove, the King of gods, and by the genius of Augustus Caesar, by your own white and uncorrupted souls and the deep reverence of our Roman justice, to judge this case with truth and equity, as bound by your religion and your laws.”

When taking an oath, a person would swear by the genius — guardian spirit — of the person’s household. Augustus Caesar was the father of his country, and he wished to be regarded as its guardian spirit.

Rome, in fact, engaged in Emperor worship.

Virgil said to Tibullus, “Now read the evidence.”

Tibullus took out two papers.

Virgil added, "But first ask each prisoner if that writing is theirs."

Tibullus gave a Lictor one paper and ordered, "Show this to Crispinus."

He then asked, "Crispinus, is it yours?"

Tucca said to Crispinus, "Say, 'Aye.'"

Crispinus hesitated.

Tucca said to him, "What, do thou stand upon it, pimp? Do not deny thine own Minerva, thy Pallas, the issue of thy brain!"

Minerva is the Roman name of Pallas Athena, who, according to mythology, was born fully grown from her father Jupiter's head. She was the goddess of wisdom.

"Yes, it is mine," Crispinus said.

The Lictor returned the paper to Tibullus.

Giving the Lictor the other paper, Tibullus ordered, "Show that to Demetrius."

He then asked, "Is it yours?"

"It is," Demetrius answered.

The Lictor returned the paper to Tibullus.

"There's a father who will not deny his own bastard, now, I warrant thee," Tucca said.

"Read the papers out loud," Virgil ordered.

The papers were poems by Crispinus and Demetrius criticizing Horace.

Tibullus began to read out loud the first paper, which was by Crispinus:

“Ramp up, my genius! Be not retrograde [regressive],

“But boldly nominate [call] a spade, a spade.

“What! Shall thy lubrical [slippery] and glibbery [shifty] muse

“Live as if she were defunct [slackly], like [a] punk in stews?”

“Ramp up” means “rear up.” A ramping lion is a lion standing on its hind legs.

A punk in stews is a whore in a brothel.

Tucca said to himself, “Excellent!”

Tibullus continued to read Crispinus’ poem out loud:

“Alas! That were [would be] no modern [ordinary] consequence,

“To have cothurnal buskins [bootish boots] frightened [frightened] hence.

“No! Teach thy incubus to poetize,

“And throw abroad [scatter] thy spurious snotteries [snot, aka filth]

“Upon that puffed-up [vainglorious] lump of barmy froth —
”

An incubus is a male evil spirit that comes to and sleeps with women in the night.

“Barm” means the froth on fermenting malt liquor. The froth comes from yeast. “Barmy” can mean “frothing,” and “froth” can mean “bubblehead.”

Tucca said to himself, “Aha!”

Tibullus continued to read Crispinus’ poem out loud:

“Or clumsy [numbed with cold] chilblained judgment, which with oath

*“Magnificates [Magnifies] his merit, and bespawls
[splatters with spit]*

“The conscious time with humorous foam, and brawls

“As if his organons of sense [sensory organs] would crack

“The sinews of my patience. Break his back [Ruin him],

“O poets all and some, for now we list [wish]

“Of strenuous ven-ge-ance to clutch the fist!

“Subscri. Cris.”

The last line means “I have signed. Crispinus.”

Tucca said, “Aye, by the Virgin Mary, this was written like a Hercules in poetry, now!”

“Excellently well threatened!” Augustus Caesar said.

“Aye, and as strangely worded, Caesar,” Virgil said.

Crispinus had used the fanciest words at his disposal.

“We observe it,” Augustus Caesar said.

Virgil said to Tibullus, “Read the other poem out loud, now.”

Tucca pointed to Demetrius and said, “This is a fellow of a good prodigal tongue, too; this’ll do well.”

Tibullus began to read out loud the second paper, which was by Demetrius:

“Our muse is in mind for the untrussing [exposing] a poet;

“I slip by his name, for most men do know it.

“A critic whom all the world bescumbers [shits]

“With satirical humors and lyrical numbers.”

The poem describes a critic who shits on all the world by means of his satirical poetry.

Tucca said quietly to himself, “Are thou there, boy? Have you caught on that?”

Tibullus continued to read Demetrius’ poem out loud:

“And for the most part, himself does advance

“With much self-love and more arrogance.”

“Good again,” Tucca said to himself.

Tibullus continued to read Demetrius’ poem out loud:

“And, but that I would not be thought a prater,

“I could tell you he were a translator.

“I know the authors from whence he has stole,

“And could trace him, too, but that I understand them not full and whole.”

Tucca said to himself, “That line has broken loose from all his fellows; chain him up shorter, do.”

According to Demetrius, Horace is a plagiarist who steals from other authors who did not write in English.

Tibullus continued to read Demetrius’ poem out loud:

“The best note I can give you to know him by

“Is, that he keeps gallants company,

“Whom I would wish in time should him fear,

“Lest after [afterward] they buy repentance too dear [at too high a price].

“Subscri. Deme. Fan.”

The last line means “I have signed. Demetrius Fannius.”

“Well said,” Tucca said. “This carries palm with it.”

Palm leaves are signs of victory. Tucca was highly praising Demetrius’ poem.

Horace said to Demetrius:

“And why, thou motley gull?”

A gull is a fool. “Motley” is multi-colored clothing worn by a jester. Demetrius’ clothing consists of odds and ends of various colors.

Horace continued:

“Why should they fear? When have thou known us to wrong or tax a friend? I dare thy malice to betray it. Speak. Now thou curl up, thou poor and nasty snake, and shrink thy poisonous head into thy bosom.”

Demetrius was hanging his head in shame.

Horace continued:

“Out, viper, thou that eat thy parents, hence!”

In this society, people believed that vipers were born by biting their way out of the parent’s body. Vipers were symbols of ingratitude.

Horace continued:

“Rather such speckled creatures as thyself should be eschewed and shunned, such as will bite and gnaw their absent friends, not care for their friends’ reputation; catch at the loosest laughters, and affect to be thought jesters; such as can devise things never seen or heard, to impair men's names and gratify their credulous adversaries; will carry tales, do basest offices, cherish divided fires, and still increase new flames out of old embers; will reveal each secret that's committed to their trust."

"Divided fires" indicate hatred between people.

Eteocles and Polynices were two brothers who agreed to take turns ruling the city of Thebes. One brother was supposed to rule for a year, and then the other brother would rule for a year, and so on. Eteocles ruled for the first year, but then he refused to give up the throne so that his brother could rule for a year. Angry, Polynices gathered an army together and marched against Thebes, creating the story of the Seven [Champions] Against Thebes. The two brothers killed each other in combat, and when their corpses were cremated together, the flame split in two over their corpses because even in death they were still angry at each other.

In Dante's Inferno, Ulysses and Diomedes are encased in flame together because they are angry at each other; the tip of the flame is divided in two. Both of them mourn the fall of Troy, and Diomedes is angry at Ulysses because he thought up the trick of the Trojan Horse, which finally resulted in Troy's fall.

Horace continued:

"Such men as these are black — evil — slaves; Romans, take heed of these."

Tucca said, "Thou twang — sing — right, little Horace, they are indeed: a couple of chapfallen — slack-jawed — curs."

He then said to Gallus and Maecenas, "Come, we of the bench, let's rise and go to the urn and condemn them quickly."

Jurors cast their votes — guilty or not guilty — into an urn.

As Augustus Caesar's representative, Virgil used the majestic plural as he gave instructions to the jurors Gallus, Maecenas, and Tucca:

“Before you jurors withdraw and consult together, worthy Romans, we are to tender our opinion and give you those instructions that may add to your even, impartial judgment and verdict in the case —

“Which thus we do commence. First, you must know that where there is a true and perfect merit there can be no dejection and lowering of standards, and the scorn of humble baseness often so works in a high soul upon the grosser spirit that to the grosser spirit's bleared and offended sense there seems a hideous fault blazed in the object and published to the world, when only the disease is in his eyes.”

Often, a superior person's lack of false modesty appears to be a fault to a lesser person, but the fault is in the lesser person and not in the superior person.

Virgil continued:

“Because of that, it happens that our Horace now stands taxed of — charged with — impudence, self-love, and arrogance by these men, who share no merit in themselves, and therefore think his portion is as small as theirs.

“For they from their own guilt assure their souls that if they should confidently praise their works, in them it would appear inflation and self-conceit.

“But this in a full and well-digested — well-read and well-disposed and well-ordered — man cannot receive that foul abusive name of self-conceit, but instead will receive the fair title of erection — that is, advancement and elevation.

“And for his true use of translating the works of other men, it always has been a work of as much palm — success — in clearest judgments as to invent or make poetry.

“His satiric sharpness is most excusable, as being forced out of a suffering virtue oppressed with the license of the time.

“And howsoever fools or jerking — scourging — pedants, actors, or suchlike buffoonish, barking wits may with their beggarly and barren trash tickle and please base, vulgar ears with their despite and contumely,

“This maxim, like Jove’s thunder, shall their pride control:

“The honest satyr — truthful satirist — has the happiest soul.

“Now, Romans, you have heard our thoughts. Withdraw when you please.”

Tibullus said to the Lictors, “Remove the accused from the bar.”

Tucca asked, “Who holds the urn up to us so we can vote, huh?”

He then whispered to Crispinus and Demetrius, “Fear nothing. I’ll acquit you, my honest pitiful stinkards. I’ll do it.”

Crispinus said, “Captain, you shall eternally gird me to you, on my word as a generous, magnanimous man.”

“Go to,” Tucca said. “I’m blushing. Really, I am.”

Maecenas, Gallus, and Tucca withdrew and consulted among themselves.

Augustus Caesar said, “Tibullus, let there be a case of vizards — a pair of masks — privately provided; we have found a subject to bestow them on.”

“It shall be done, Caesar,” Tibullus said.

“Here are words, Horace, able to bastinado — beat — a man’s ears,” Augustus Caesar said.

Horace replied, “Aye. If it pleases great Caesar, I have pills about me mixed with the whitest kind of hellebore — the best medicine of this kind — that would give him a light vomit, which should purge his brain and stomach of those tumorous heats — those swollen inflammations — if I could have permission to administer these pills to him.”

“Oh, be his Aesculapius, gentle Horace!” Augustus Caesar said. “You shall have permission, and he shall be your patient.”

Aesculapius was the first physician. When he died, he became the god of medicine.

Augustus Caesar then said, “Virgil, use your authority; command him to come forth.”

Virgil said, “Caesar is concerned about your health, Crispinus, and he himself has chosen a physician to treat you; take his pills.”

Crispinus was brought to Horace and accepted the medicine. He swallowed a pill.

Horace said, “They are somewhat bitter, sir, but very wholesome. Take yet another. Good. Stand nearby, they’ll work good.”

Tibullus said:

“Romans, return to your individual seats.

“Lictors, bring forward the urn, and set the accused at the bar.”

The jurymen sat.

Tucca said to Crispinus and Demetrius, “Quickly, you whoreson egregious varlets! Come forward. What! Shall we sit in judgment all day upon you? You make no more haste now than a beggar upon pattens, or a physician to a patient who has no money, you pilchers.”

Pattens are thick-soled shoes. Pilchers are worthless people.

Some Lictors brought the accused to the bar and brought the urn to the jurymen, who marked and placed their ballots in it. The urn was brought to Tibullus.

Tibullus said, “Rufus Laberius Crispinus and Demetrius Fannius, hold up your hands. You have, according to the Roman custom, put yourselves upon trial to the urn, for diverse and sundry calumnies whereof you have before this time been indicted and are now presently arraigned. Prepare yourselves to hearken to the verdict of your triers.”

Tibullus took the ballots from the urn, looked at them and said:

“Caius Cilnius Maecenas pronounces you, by this handwriting, guilty.

“Cornelius Gallus, guilty.

“Pantilius Tucca —”

Tucca interrupted: “— parcel-guilty, I.”

This means “partly guilty.” Tucca was trying to have it both ways, but his vote was actually either guilty or not guilty, since those were the only verdicts allowed.

Demetrius said, “He means himself; for it was he, indeed, who suborned us to the calumny.”

Tucca said to Demetrius, “I, you whoreson cantharides? Was it I?”

A cantharides is a beetle that can cause human skin to blister. Tucca was accusing Demetrius of blistering his reputation.

“I appeal to your conscience, Captain,” Demetrius said to Tucca.

Tibullus said to Demetrius, “Then you confess it now.”

“I do, and I crave the mercy of the court,” Demetrius said.

“What does Crispinus say?” Tibullus asked.

Crispinus groaned and said, “Oh, the captain, the captain —”

“My medicine begins to work with my patient, I see,” Horace said.

“Captain, stand forth and answer,” Virgil said to Tucca.

Tucca replied, “Hold thy peace, poet Praetor; I appeal from thee to Caesar, I.”

“Poet Praetor” resembles “poet prater.”

Tucca then said to Augustus Caesar, “Do me right, royal Caesar.”

Augustus Caesar replied, “By the Virgin Mary, and I will, sir.”

He then ordered, “Lictors, gag him, do, and put a pair of masks over his head, so that he may look bifronted, just as he speaks.”

The masks on his head would face in opposite directions — forward and backward — because Tucca was duplicitous: two-faced.

Tucca said:

“Gods and fiends! Caesar! Thou will not, Caesar, will thou?”

The Lictors approached him with a gag and two masks.

Tucca said:

“Away, you whoreson vultures, away! You think I am a dead corpse now, because Caesar is disposed to jest with a man of mark and distinction, or so.”

The Lictors put their hands on him.

Tucca said:

“Hold your hooked talons out of my flesh, you inhuman harpies! Go to, do it!”

Harpies are half-bird, half-woman creatures.

Tucca continued:

“What! Will the royal Augustus cast away a gent’man of worship, a captain and a commander, for a couple of condemned caitiff calumnious cargoes?”

“Caitif” means “wretched,” or “captive.”

“Dispatch, Lictors,” Augustus Caesar ordered. “Do it.”

“Caesar!” Tucca appealed.

The Lictors gagged and masked Tucca, and then they moved him aside.

“Continue, Tibullus,” Augustus Caesar said.

Virgil said to Tibullus, “Demand what cause — what reason — they had to malign Horace.”

Demetrius said, “In truth, no great cause, not I, I must confess, but that he kept better company (for the most part) than I; and that better men loved him than loved me; and that his writings thrived better than mine, and were better liked, and graced; nothing else.”

“Thus envious souls repine at others’ good,” Virgil said.

Horace said to Demetrius:

“If this is all, truly, I forgive thee freely.

“Envy me always, as long as Virgil loves me, Gallus, Tibullus, and the best-best Caesar, my dear Maecenas. While these, with many more, whose names I wisely slip, shall think me worthy their honored and adored society, and read, and love, approve, and applaud my poems, I would not wish but such as you should regard my poems with spite and contempt.”

Crispinus groaned, “Oh —”

Tibullus asked, “How are thou now, Crispinus?”

He replied, “Oh, I am sick —”

Horace said, “A basin, a basin quickly! Our medicine is working.”

He then said to Crispinus, “Don’t faint, man. ”

A receptacle was brought and held up for Crispinus.

Crispinus retched and said, “Oh — retrograde — reciprocal — incubus —”

“What’s that, Horace?” Augustus Caesar asked.

Augustus Caesar was far enough away that he did not clearly hear Crispinus, and so Horace reported on the words that Crispinus was vomiting.

Horace said, “‘Retrograde’ and ‘reciprocal incubus’ have come up.”

“Thanks be to Jupiter,” Gallus said.

Crispinus retched and said, “Oh — glibbery — lubrical — defunct — oh! —”

“Well said; here’s some abundance of inflated, pretentious words,” Horace said.

“What are they?” Virgil asked.

Horace replied, “‘Glibbery,’ ‘lubrical,’ and ‘defunct.’”

“Oh, they came up easy,” Gallus said.

Crispinus retched and moaned, “Oh — oh! —”

“What’s that?” Tibullus asked.

“Nothing yet,” Horace answered.

Crispinus retched and said, “Magnificate!”

“‘Magnificate’?” Maecenas said. “That came up somewhat hard.”

Crispinus retched and said, “Oh, I shall cast up my — spurious — snotteries —”

Horace said to Crispinus, “Good. Again.”

Crispinus retched and said, “Chilblained — oh! — oh! — clumsy —”

“That ‘clumsy’ stuck terribly,” Horace said.

“What’s all that, Horace?” Maecenas asked.

Horace answered, “‘Spurious snotteries,’ ‘chilblained,’ ‘clumsy.’”

“Oh, Jupiter!” Tibullus said.

“Who would have thought there should have been such a deal of filth in a poet?” Gallus said.

Crispinus retched and said, “Oh — barmy froth —”

“What’s that?” Augustus Caesar asked.

Crispinus retched and said, “Puffy — inflate — turgidous — ventositous —”

“Turgidous” means “swollen.”

“Ventositous” means “flatulent” or “windy.”

Horace said, “‘Barmy froth,’ ‘puffy,’ ‘inflate,’ ‘turgidous,’ and ‘ventositous’ have come up.”

“Oh, terrible windy words!” Tibullus said.

“A sign of a windy brain,” Gallus said.

Crispinus retched and said, “Oh — oblatrant — furibund — fatuate — strenuous —”

“Oblatrant” means “railing.”

“Furibund” means “furious.”

“Fatuate” means “speak or act foolishly.”

Horace said, “Here’s a deal: ‘oblatrant,’ ‘furibund,’ ‘fatuate,’ ‘strenuous.’”

“Now all’s come up, I think,” Augustus Caesar said. “What a tumult he had in his belly!”

“No, not yet,” Horace said. “There’s the frequent ‘conscious damp’ behind, still.”

Crispinus retched and said, “Oh — conscious — damp.”

“It’s come up, thanks to Apollo and Aesculapius,” Horace said.

Observing Crispinus, he said, “Yet there’s another; you had best take another pill.”

Crispinus said, “Oh, no.”

Then he moaned, “Oh! — oh! — oh! — oh!”

“Force yourself, then, a little with your finger,” Horace said.

Putting his finger down his throat, Crispinus said, “Oh — oh! — prorumped!”

“Prorumped” means “burst forth.”

Tibullus said, “‘Prorumped’? What a noise it made! As if his spirit would have prorumped with it.”

Crispinus moaned, “Oh — oh! — oh!”

“Help him,” Virgil said. “It sticks strangely in his throat, whatever it is.”

Crispinus retched and said, “Oh — clutched.”

Horace said, “Now it’s come: ‘clutched.’”

“‘Clutched’?” Augustus Caesar said. “It’s well that’s come up! It had only a narrow passage.”

Crispinus retched and moaned, “Oh —”

“Again,” Virgil said. “Hold him; hold his head there.”

Horace supported Crispinus’ head over the receptacle.

Crispinus retched and said, “Snarling gusts — quaking custard.”

“Snarling gusts” can be “snarling outbursts of words.”

A “quaking custard” is a “trembling coward.”

“How are you now, Crispinus?” Horace asked.

Crispinus retched and said, “Oh — obstupefact!”

“Obstupefact” means “stupefied.”

“We are all that, I assure you,” Tibullus said.

“How do you feel?” Horace asked.

“Pretty well, I thank you,” Crispinus said.

Virgil said:

“These pills can but restore him for a time, not cure him quite of such a malady, caught by so many surfeits, which have filled his blood and brain thus full of crudities.

“It is necessary, therefore, that he observe a strict and wholesome diet.”

Virgil gave advice to Crispinus:

“Look that you take a good draught each morning of old Cato’s principles, next your heart (that is, on an empty stomach) and then walk until it is well digested.”

Some schools began teaching before breakfast, and so some learning began on an empty stomach.

Cato the Censor’s style of writing was simple and straightforward, a good remedy for Crispinus’ overly elaborate style.

Virgil continued giving advice to Crispinus:

“Then come home and taste a piece of Terence the comic playwright; suck his phrase instead of licorice.

“And at any hand — by all means — shun Plautus and old Ennius; they are meats too harsh for a weak stomach.

“Become accustomed to read (but not without a tutor) the best Greeks:

“These include Orpheus, Musaeus, Pindar, Hesiod, Callimachus, Theocritus, and high Homer.

“But beware of Lycophron: He is too dark and dangerous a dish.”

Orpheus and Musaeus were mythical singers. Orpheus was able to make trees, stones, and floods come to him when he played. He traveled to the Land of the Dead in an attempt to rescue his wife. To get past Cerberus, the three-headed guard dog of hell, he played his lute and sang. Cerberus, put under a spell by the music, fell asleep. Orpheus was allowed to take his wife back to the Land of the Living provided that he did not look at her until she was in the Land of the Living. He led her back, stepped into the Land of the Living, and turned around to face her. Just one step away from the Land of the Living, she said to him, “Farewell,” and went back down to the Land of the Dead.

Pindar was a Greek lyric poet. Theocritus was a Greek lyrical poet. Homer, of course, authored the Iliad and the Odyssey.

Lycophron used obscure words in his plays.

Virgil continued giving advice to Crispinus:

“You must not hunt for wild, outlandish terms to stuff out a peculiar — idiosyncratic — dialect, but instead let your matter — your content — run before your words.

“And if at any time you chance to meet some Gallo-Belgic phrase, you shall not immediately rack your poor verse to give it entertainment, but let it pass, and do not think yourself much damnified — damaged — if you do leave it out, when neither your understanding nor the sense could well receive it.”

A semi-annual news periodical called the Mercurius Gallobelgicus was written in Latin.

Some phrases are not good for communicating sense.

Virgil continued giving advice to Crispinus:

“This fair abstinence in time will render you more sound and clear.

“And this I have prescribed to you, in place of a strict sentence, which until he shall perform this prescription, attire him in that robe.”

Virgil pointed to it, and a Lictor dressed Crispinus in an undergraduate’s gown. Crispinus would begin an education in the arts.

Virgil continued giving advice to Crispinus:

“And henceforth learn to bear yourself more humbly: not to swell, or breathe your insolent and idle spite on him whose laughter can frighten your worst attempt to slander him.”

Tibullus said to the Lictors, “Take him away.”

“May Jupiter guard Caesar!” Crispinus said.

Virgil said, “And for a week or two, see that he is locked up in some dark place removed from company. He will talk idly otherwise after his medicine.”

People who were thought to be insane were treated by being kept alone in dark places.

Crispinus was led aside.

Virgil now said to Demetrius:

“Now to you, sir. The extremity of law awards you to be branded on the forehead for this your calumny; but since it pleases Horace, the party wronged, to entreat of Caesar a mitigation of that juster doom, with Caesar’s tongue thus we pronounce your sentence.

“Demetrius Fannius, thou shall here put on” — he pointed to a fool’s costume — “that coat and cap; and henceforth, think thyself no other than they make thee: a fool.

“Vow to wear them in every fair and generous assembly, until the best sort of minds shall take to knowledge as well thy satisfaction as thy wrongs.”

Demetrius will wear the fool’s outfit until the best minds know and acknowledge both his atonement and his offenses.

Demetrius put on the fool’s clothing.

Horace said to Virgil, “Only, grave and respected Praetor, here in open court I ask that the oath for good behavior may be administered to both Crispinus and Demetrius.

“Horace, it shall,” Virgil said.

He ordered, “Tibullus, give it to them.”

Tibullus began to administer the oath:

“Rufus Laberius Crispinus and Demetrius Fannius, lay your hands on your hearts.”

They did as asked.

Tibullus continued:

“You shall here solemnly attest and swear that never after this instant, either at booksellers’ stalls, in taverns, twopenny rooms at the theater for those who pay two pennies to see a play, attiring-houses and dressing rooms, noblemen’s butteries, puisnes’ chambers, aka chambers for junior law students (the best and farthest places where you are admitted to come), you shall once attempt or dare (thereby to endear yourself the more to any actor, fan or friend, or guilty fool in your company) to malign, traduce, or detract the person or the writings of Quintus Horatius Flaccus or any other eminent man transcending you in merit whom your envy shall find reason to work upon, either for that or for keeping himself — the envious man — in better acquaintance or enjoying better friends.”

Crispinus and Demetrius had to swear that wherever they went, they would not malign Horace or any other man better than they were, whether for the reason of tearing down the better man or for the reason of hoping to elevate themselves and to have better friends.

Tibullus continued:

“Or if — transported by any sudden and desperate resolution — you do, that then you shall not under the bastoun, or in the next presence, being an honorable assembly of his favorers, be brought as voluntary gent — a volunteer gentleman — to undertake the forswearing of it.”

In other words: If you do libel a good person, then you shall not deny it because you fear a beating under the bastoun — a beating with a stick — or because you are in the presence of the man you libeled and of many of his friends who will defend him.

Tibullus continued:

“Neither shall you at any time (ambitiously affecting the title of the untrussers or whippers of the age) allow the itch of writing to overrun your performance in libel, upon pain of being taken up for lepers in wit, and — losing both your time and your papers — be irrecoverably forfeited to the Hospital of Fools.”

In other words: If you succumb to the itch of libeling a better man than you are, you shall be forever sentenced to the Hospital for Fools.

Tibullus concluded:

“So help you our Roman gods and the genius of great Caesar.”

Crispinus and Demetrius swore to obey the oath.

“Good,” Virgil said. “Now dissolve the court.”

Horace, Tibullus, Gallus, Maecenas, and Virgil all said,
“And thanks to Caesar, who thus has exercised his patience.”

Augustus Caesar said:

“We have indeed, you worthiest friends of Caesar.

“It is the bane and torment of our ears to hear the discords of those jangling rhymers who, with their bad and scandalous practices, bring all true arts and learning in contempt.

“But don’t let your high thoughts descend so low as these despised objects: Crispinus and Demetrius. Let them decline, along with their flat, groveling souls.

“Be you yourselves.

“And as with our best favors you stand crowned, so let your mutual loves be always renowned.

“Envy will dwell where there is want [lack] of merit,

“Though the deserving man should crack his spirit.”

“Crack his spirit” is like “break his heart.”

All then sang this song:

“Blush, folly, blush! Here’s none who fears

“The wagging of an ass’ ears,

“Although a wolfish case — exterior — he wears.

“Detraction is but baseness’ varlet,

“And apes are apes, though clothed in scarlet.”

***

Rumpatur, quisquis rumpitur invidia.

The Latin quotation, which is from Martial 9.97, means, “Let him burst, whoever is bursting with envy!”

Here is an interesting excerpt from an article on mummia, which is part of a corpse used in preparing medicine:

The last line of a 17th century poem by John Donne prompted Louise Noble's quest. "Women," the line read, are not only "Sweetness and wit," but "mummy, possessed."

Sweetness and wit, sure. But mummy? In her search for an explanation, Noble, a lecturer of English at the University of New England in Australia, made a surprising discovery: That word recurs throughout the literature of early modern Europe, from Donne's "Love's Alchemy" to Shakespeare's "Othello" and Edmund Spenser's "The Faerie Queene," because mummies and other preserved and fresh human remains were a common ingredient in the medicine of that time. In short: Not long ago, Europeans were cannibals.

The following anecdote appears in David Bruce's book The Funniest People in Theater: 250 Anecdotes:

After seeing actress Diana Rigg in a brief nude scene in the play Abelard and Heloise, caustic critic John Simon wrote, "Diana Rigg is built like a brick mausoleum with insufficient flying buttresses." The next day, as Ms. Rigg went to the theater, she hoped that no one would recognize her. Fortunately, all of the cast members knew better than to mention the review. After a few weeks, however, she began to think the review funny and soon started quoting it. (By the way, Ms. Rigg knows an actress — not herself — who saw Mr. Simon in a New York restaurant and took the opportunity to dump a plate of potato salad on his head.)

Etc.

NOTES

The action of the play takes place in one day.

On this day, Quarlous meets Humphrey Wasp, Miss Grace Wellborn, and Troubleall for the first time.

THE PROLOGUE TO THE KING'S MAJESTY
(Bartholomew Fair)

*Your Majesty is welcome to a Fair;
Such place, such men, such language, and such ware
You must expect: with these, the zealous noise
Of your land's Puritan faction, scandalized by trifles,
Such as dolls, hobbyhorses, puppet-plays,
And such-like, rage at, whereof the petulant ways
Yourself have known, and have been vexed with long.
These for your entertainment, without particular wrong,
Or just ground of complaint of any private man,
Who of himself either shall think well or can,*

[Anyone who thinks well of himself or can think well of himself will not be hurt by satire; self-esteem will prevent that. In other words, if you think well of yourself, then 1) you will not think that you are being satirized, or 2) if you do think you are being satirized, you will think it is a fair and just satire, or 3) if you do think you are being satirized, the satire will not bother you even if it is not a fair and just satire.]

*The maker [playwright] does present: and hopes, tonight
To give you for a fairing, true delight.*

Notes:

Ben Jonson wrote the Prologue for a performance at the court of King James I on 1 November 1614.

Particular wrongs are satire of a particular individual rather than a particular class or group of people. Mr. Jonson is a satirist.

Hobbyhorses are figures of a horse that are fastened around the waist of a Morris dancer. Fake legs are part of the costume so that it looks like the comic dancer is on horseback. Also, hobbyhorses are toy horses in general.

A fairing is a gift bought at a fair.

Both King James I and Ben Jonson had trouble with the Puritans. Mr. Jonson objected to the Puritans because they wanted the playhouses closed because they regarded plays as immoral.

This Prologue took the place of the Induction when the play was presented to King James I of England. The previous day, 31 October 1614, the world premiere was played at the Hope Theatre.

THE INDUCTION ON THE STAGE (Bartholomew Fair)

The Stagekeeper speaks directly to you, the audience:

“Gentlemen, have a little patience, the characters are coming and will be here almost instantly. The character who should begin the play, Mr. John Littlewit, the proctor, has a stitch newly fallen in his black silk stocking; his stocking will have a run in it if it is not repaired right away. Fortunately, his stocking will be mended before you can count to twenty. The character plays one of the Arches and dwells near the hospital, and he has a very pretty part.”

John Littlewit is a proctor; that is, he is a lawyer. In particular, he is a lawyer in the Court of Arches, which is at Bow Church on Cheapside Street in London. This church had stone bows, aka arches.

The Stagekeeper continued, “But as for the whole play, will you hear the truth about it?”

He looked around him and said, “I am looking lest the poet/playwright Ben Jonson should hear me, and lest his man, aka servant, Mr. Brome, should be hiding behind the arras, the wall hanging at the back of this stage.”

Ben Jonson’s servant and protégé, Richard Brome, became a successful playwright like Mr. Jonson.

The Stagekeeper continued, “This play is likely to be a very conceited scurvy one, in plain English.

“When the play once comes to Bartholomew Fair, you might just as well go to Virginia, for anything there is of Smithfield in this play.”

Bartholomew Fair was held at Smithfield.

The Stagekeeper continued, “The playwright has not hit the humors; he does not know them.”

“Humors” are characteristic behaviors. The stagehand was saying that Ben Jonson was not rendering the characters’ personalities and actions correctly. However, the Stagekeeper had in mind a particular set of characters. He wanted to see an old-fashioned kind of play with certain stock characters, and Mr. Jonson, a noted satirist, was doing something different in his play.

The Stagekeeper continued, “The playwright has not conversed with the Bartholomew birds, as they say.”

Think of jailbirds. Bartholomew birds are people, many of whom do things that are against the law, who frequent Bartholomew Fair each year.

The Stagekeeper continued, “The playwright does not have a sword-and-buckler man in his Fair.”

Sword-and-buckler men were swashbucklers, aka swaggering men who fought with the old-fashioned sword and buckler, aka a small round shield. The modern weapons of the time were rapier and dagger. The Stagekeeper enjoyed old-fashioned plays with flamboyant characters such as Thomas Kyd’s The Spanish Tragedy.

The Stagekeeper continued, “Nor does the playwright have in his play a little Davy, to take toll of the bawds there, as in my time.”

Davy was a stereotype character who was a bully and would take a toll, aka payment, from the bawds who made their living selling female flesh.

The Stagekeeper continued, “Nor does the playwright have in his play a Kindheart, if anybody’s teeth should chance to ache in his play.”

Kindheart was an itinerant tooth puller; a stock character based on him appeared in some old-fashioned plays.

The Stagekeeper continued, “Nor does the playwright have in his play a juggler with a well-educated ape, to come over the chain for a King of England, and back again for the Prince, and sit still on his arse for the Pope and the King of Spain.”

The “well-educated ape” is a well-trained monkey or chimpanzee that obeys commands by people portraying English royalty but will not obey commands by people portraying the Pope or the King of Spain. At the time, many English Protestants were anti-Catholic, and many English were anti-Spanish.

The Stagekeeper complained, “This play has none of these fine sights!”

He continued, “Nor does the playwright have the canvas-cut in the night, for a hobbyhorse man to creep in to his she-neighbor and take his leap there. Nothing! No!”

A canvas-cut is a cut in a canvas tent for someone to enter for purposes that someone does not want to be made public. “Cut” is also slang for “cunt.” “Canvas” or “canvass” means “solicit,” so a canvas-cut is a prostitute. A “hobbyhorse” is either a child’s imitation horse or a prostitute, so called because of the riding movement of sex. When horses have sex, it is called leaping. “To leap upon” means to spring upon the female for sex.

The Stagekeeper continued, “If some writer whom I know had had the penning of this matter, he would have made you such a jig-a-jog in the booths, you would have thought an earthquake had been in the fair!”

The “jig-a-jog” is the jiggling and jogging of such things as female breasts during sex. The “jig-a-jog” would occur in the booths of Bartholomew Fair.

The Stagekeeper continued, “But these master poets, they will have their own absurd courses; they will be informed of nothing. Ben Jonson has (I beg your pardon, Sir Reverence) kicked me three or four times around the attiring-house — the place where the actors dress. I thank him for that (I am being sarcastic), but all I did was to advise him with the benefit of my experience.

“I’ll be judged by you, gentlemen, now, but I’ll be judged for only one idea of mine. Would not a fine pump upon the stage have done well for a stage property now? The play could have a prostitute’s head set under the pump, and her stern — her butt — upward, and she would be soused by my witty young masters of the Inns of Court.”

Prostitutes were publicly humiliated; being drenched with water was one such punishment. The Stagekeeper believed that such a sight would be fine public entertainment. The young masters of the Inns of Court were supposedly law students, but many of them simply wanted to party.

The Stagekeeper continued, “What do you think of this idea for a show, now? But the playwright will not hear of this! He says that I am an ass! I! And yet I kept the stage in master Tarlton’s time, I thank my stars.”

Tarlton was a quick-witted comic actor who died in 1588, but who was fondly remembered long afterward.

The Stagekeeper continued, “Ha! If Tarlton had lived to have played in Bartholomew Fair, you would have seen him come in and be cozened, aka cheated, in the cloth-quarter, so finely!”

The cloth-quarter was located along the north wall of Saint Bartholomew's Church. The fair had a commercial purpose: the buying and selling of cloth. In fact, one of Tarlton's jests was telling about the time a thief stole his clothes.

The Stagekeeper continued, "And you would have seen John Adams, the rogue who was Tarlton's fellow comic actor, leap and caper upon and around him, and have dealt his vermin about, as though they had cost him nothing!"

The vermin were fleas, which the Stagekeeper said would fall off John Adams' clothing as he leaped and capered around.

The Stagekeeper continued, "And then you would have seen a big, substantial watchman steal in upon them, and then take them away, with mistaking words, as the fashion is in the stage-practice."

"Mistaking words" are malapropisms. On the stage, watchmen were portrayed as constantly making mistakes in their choice of words.

The Bookholder and a Scrivener arrived. A Bookholder is a prompter, and a Scrivener is a clerk or scribe.

The Bookholder said to the Stagekeeper, "How are you? What splendid discourse are you speaking, hmm? Have you found any familiars here who make you so outspoken! What's happening?"

The Stagekeeper replied, "Nothing, but the understanding gentlemen of the ground here asked my judgment."

The "understanding gentlemen of the ground" were the spectators who stood in the pit, which was lower than stage level. These spectators were sometimes called groundlings.

The Bookholder said, “Your judgment, rascal! For what? Sweeping the stage, or gathering up the broken apples for the bears within?”

The play was being performed at the Hope Theatre, an outdoor theater in Bankside, Bear Garden. One day out of fourteen the Hope Theatre was used for bear-baitings. A bear would be tied to a stake, and dogs would bait — bite and attack — it.

The Bookholder continued, “Go away, rogue, it’s come to a fine degree in these spectacles when such a youth as you pretends to make a judgment.”

The Stagekeeper, who was not a youth, having worked with Tarlton many years ago, exited. Possibly, the Bookholder was referring to a second childhood.

The Bookholder continued, “And yet he may make a judgment concerning most of this matter, truly, for the author has written this play just to his meridian and the scale of the grounded judgments here, his playfellows in wit and intelligence.”

According to the Bookholder, Mr. Jonson had written Bartholomew Fair to the height of the Stagekeeper’s understanding, and on a scale that the groundlings would understand and enjoy. In other words, Mr. Jonson had written a play that most people could understand and enjoy.

The Bookholder came forward and said to the audience, “Gentlemen, not for lack of a prologue, but by way of a new one, I am sent out to you here, with a Scrivener and certain articles drawn out in haste between our author and you, which if you please to hear them, and if they appear reasonable to approve of, the play will follow immediately.”

Mr. Jonson had written a quasi-legal contract between himself as the playwright and the members of the audience.

The purpose of the contract and the entire induction was to give the audience some idea of what they were to witness on the stage and how to react to it.

The Bookholder said, “Read, Scribe. Give me a copy of the contract.”

The Scrivener read out loud:

“Articles of agreement, formal and legal, between the spectators or hearers, at the Hope Theatre on the Bankside in the county of Surry, on the one party; and the author of Bartholomew Fair, in the said place and county, on the other party: the one and thirtieth day of October, 1614, and in the twelfth year of the reign of our sovereign lord JAMES, by the grace of God, king of England, France, and Ireland, defender of the faith; and of Scotland the seven and fortieth.”

In 1614, the King of England still claimed to be the legal King of France. This claim would not be given up until 1802.

The Scrivener continued:

“Imprimis, aka first. It is covenanted and agreed, by and between the parties aforesaid, and the said spectators and hearers, the finicky and spiteful as well as the favoring and judicious, as also the grounded judgments and understandings, do for themselves individually covenant and agree to remain in the places their money or friends have put them in, with patience, for the space of two hours and an half, and somewhat more. In this time the author promiseth to present them by us, with a new and sufficiently likeable play, called Bartholomew Fair, which is merry and as full of noise as it is of entertainment, and which is made to delight all and to offend none, provided they have either the wit or the honesty to think well of themselves.”

Grounded judgments are those that are well grounded on good evidence and good principles; also, grounded judgments are the judgments of the groundlings.

Anyone who thinks well of himself or can think well of himself will not be hurt by satire; self-esteem will prevent that. In other words, if you think well of yourself, you will not think you are being satirized. Or, if you do think you are being satirized, then you will also think that the satire is fair and just. Or, if you do think you are being satirized, the satire will not bother you even if it is not a fair and just satire.

“It is further agreed that every person here have his or their free will of judgment to like or dislike at their own charge, the author having now put his play forth among the public. It shall be lawful for any man to judge his six-pence worth, his twelve-pence worth, and so on up to the worth of his eighteen pence, two shillings, half a crown — all the way up to the value of his place — provided always his place does not get above his wit and intelligence. And if he has paid for half a dozen guests, he may make the judgment of the play’s worth for all of them, too, as long as he will undertake that they shall be silent. He shall put in for critical judgments here as they do for lots at the lottery. For example, if he pays but six pence at the door, and will censure a crown’s worth, we must agree that there is no conscience or justice in that.”

The Scrivener was making a joke when he mentioned the prices paid for tickets — the prices he mentioned were higher than would normally be charged. Since the Hope Theatre stank on account of the bears and dogs used in bear-baitings, some audience members might even hope for a discount rather than pay a higher price.

“It is also agreed that every man here exercise his own judgment, and not form a judgment due to the contagious nature of other people’s opinions, or because he trusts the voice or face of another person who sits by him, even if that person is the most senior member of the Commission of Knowledgeable Theatre Critics.

*“It is also agreed that every man here be fixed and settled in his judgment so that what he approves or does not approve today, he will do the same tomorrow; and if tomorrow, the next day, and so on the next week, if need be, and not to be brought to change his opinion of the play by any who sits on the bench with him, even if they indite and arraign and judge plays daily. He who will swear that Thomas Kyd’s The Spanish Tragedy, or Hieronimo is Mad Again or William Shakespeare’s Titus Andronicus are the best plays yet shall pass unchallenged here as a man whose judgment shows that it is constant, and has stood still these twenty-five or thirty years. Though such constancy shows ignorance — these plays are old-fashioned, and much better plays are available now — it is a virtuous and staid, aka fixed, ignorance; and next to truth, a confirmed error does well; such a one the author knows where to find him.*

*“It is further covenanted, concluded, and agreed that how great soever the expectation be, no person here is to expect more than he knows, or better ware than a fair such as Bartholomew Fair will afford. Each spectator will not look back to the sword and buckler age of Smithfield, but instead content himself with the present.”*

Smithfield, the location of Bartholomew Fair, was known as a fighting ground back when people fought with the sword and buckler, aka a kind of small shield. The modern way of fighting was with a rapier and dagger.

The Scrivener continued:

“Instead of a little Davy — a bully — to take toll of the bawds, the author promises that you will see on stage a strutting horse-courser with a sly and underhand drunkard, and two or three people to serve him, in as good a retinue as you would wish.

“And instead of Kindheart the tooth-puller, the author promises that you will see on stage a fine oily pig-woman with her tapster, aka bartender, to bid you welcome, and he promises that you will see on stage a consort of roarers — loud swaggerers — to provide the ‘music.’ The author also promises that you will see a wise Justice of the Peace meditant, instead of a juggler with an ape.

“You will also see a civil cutpurse searchant, you will see a sweet singer of new ballads allurant, and you will see as fresh a hypocrite, as ever was broached, rampant.”

A civil cutpurse is a well-dressed pickpocket. Dressing and speaking like a gentleman helped a cutpurse to pick wealthier pockets.

A hypocrite is a Puritan, according to many people of the time.

The Scrivener continued:

“If there be never a servant-monster in the fair, who can help it, the author says. He says the same thing about a nest, aka gang, of antics, aka grotesque dancers. The author is loath to make nature afraid in his plays, like those that beget tales, tempests, and such-like drolleries to mix his head with other men’s heels.”

Bartholomew Fair will not have in it some things that appear in other plays such as William Shakespeare’s late romances. It will not have in it a servant-monster such as Caliban, the son of a witch, who appears in Shakespeare’s Tempest. It will not have in it grotesque dances such as the dance of the satyrs in The Tempest. In Shakespeare's late romances, nature does not act naturally. The magician Prospero commands storms in The Tempest, and what is supposed to be a statue comes to life in The Winter's Tale.

The Scrivener continued:

“Let the concupiscence of jigs and dances reign as strong as it will amongst you, yet if the puppets will please any body, they shall be entreated to come in.”

Bartholomew Fair will not have any jigs or dancers, as so many contemporary plays did, yet it will have a puppet-play. This may seem incongruous, but Mr. Jonson will use the puppet-play as part of his satire.

“In consideration of all of these things, it is finally agreed by the aforesaid hearers and spectators that they neither in themselves conceal, nor suffer by them to be concealed, any state-decipherer, or politic pick-lock of the scene so solemnly ridiculous, as to search out who was meant by the gingerbread-woman, who by the hobbyhorse man, who by the costardmonger, and whoever else by their wares.

“Or who will pretend to affirm on his own inspired ignorance, what Mirror of Magistrates is meant by the justice, what great lady by the pig-woman, what concealed statesman by the seller of mouse-traps, and so of the rest.”

Mr. Jonson was leery of being accused of satirizing particular individuals in Bartholomew Fair. He did not want anyone to look at the character of Justice Overdo, for example, and say, “Oh, that's the Lord Mayor of London.” According to Mr. Jonson, he satirized types of people, not individual people.

He was also leery of being accused of sedition, as had happened to him in the past. If an accuser would identify one of Mr. Jonson's characters with a VIP, Mr. Jonson could be in real trouble.

George Whetstone wrote A Mirror of Magistrates of Cities (1584). In it, he encouraged political leaders to go incognito to places where people congregated so they could find and eradicate vice. This is something Justice Overdo does in Bartholomew Fair.

The Scrivener continued:

“But it is agreed that such person or persons, so found, be left revealed to the mercy of the author, as a forfeiture to the stage, and your laughter aforesaid.”

If anyone were to insist that one of Mr. Jonson's characters is based on a real person, that anyone should know that Mr. Jonson reserves the right to make fun of that anyone in his next play.

“As also such as shall so desperately, or ambitiously play the fool by his place aforesaid, to challenge the author of scurrility, because the language somewhere savors of Smithfield, the booth, and the pigbroth, or of profaneness, because a madman cries, ‘God quit you, or bless you’!”

Yet another thing that Mr. Jonson was leery of was being accused of scurrility. A playwright could be fined if his play were found to be blasphemous. Mr. Jonson believed that since lower-class people and criminals were to be found at the real Bartholomew Fair, he needed to be able to use their language in his play. However, he did have his character Troubleall say, “Save you” rather than “May God save you.”

“In witness whereof, as you have preposterously used your seals already, which is your money, you will now add the other part of approval, your hands.”

According to the Scrivener, the playgoers had already agreed to the terms of the contract by paying the admission price, which he likened to the seal on the contract. Coming soon would be the hands, aka applause. The Scrivener likened this to handwriting — signing the contract. So the playgoers had used first the seal and then the signature. This is preposterous — what ought to be done last is done first, and vice versa.

The Scrivener continued:

“The play shall immediately begin. And though the fair is not kept in the same region that some here, perhaps, would have it; yet think that therein the author hath observed a special decorum, the place being as dirty as Smithfield, and every whit as stinking.”

Smithfield, the site of Bartholomew Fair, could get muddy, overcrowded, and stinky because of the fair. Hope Theatre, like the site of Bartholomew Fair, could also get stinky on account of the bears used in bear-baitings — and, no doubt, on account of at least some members of the audience.

“However, the author asks you to believe that his ware — this play — is still the same, else you will make him justly suspect that an audience member who is so loath to look on a baby or an hobbyhorse here would be glad to take up a commodity of them, at any laughter or loss in another place.”

In other words, the play is a good play like the author’s other good plays, despite its being presented at Hope Theatre. Anyone who objects to the play on account of the theater where it is being performed could very well go elsewhere and be swindled by paying for a lesser play.

The word “commodity” may bring to mind the commodity swindle. Someone who needed money would get a loan, but if that person were desperate or foolish, he could be induced to accept part of the loan in the form of shoddy goods of various kinds, such as dolls and hobbyhorses. These would be sold at a loss. The swindle was a way to get around laws limiting the amount of interest that could be demanded for a loan. Often, the man being swindled was a young gallant who consorted with prostitutes.

A “baby” is a child’s doll, and a “doll” is a prostitute. A “hobbyhorse” is also a child’s toy, or a prostitute. The entertainment being sought in preference to Bartholomew Fair need not be another play.

ACT 1 (Bartholomew Fair)

— 1.1 —

John Littlewit stood alone in a room in his house.

He said to himself, “This is a pretty turn of phrase, and it is well worth the finding! I have the good fortune to always spin out these fine things, and, like a silkworm, I spin them out of myself. They are original with me.”

He looked at a marriage license as he said, “Here’s Mr. Bartholomew Cokes, of Harrow o’ the Hill, in the county of Middlesex, esquire, taking out his license to marry Miss Grace Wellborn, of the said place and county.”

He then said, “And when does he take out the marriage license? Today! The four and twentieth of August! Bartholomew Day! Bartholomew upon Bartholomew! Bartholomew Cokes takes out his marriage license upon Bartholomew Day!

“There’s the clever turn of phrase! Who other than me would have noticed such a leapfrog chance now!”

The leapfrog chance, aka occurrence, was “Bartholomew upon Bartholomew.”

He continued, “This truly had a less chance of occurring than getting snake eyes on two dice!

“Well, keep on keeping on, John Littlewit, proctor John Littlewit: You are one of the pretty wits of St. Paul’s Cathedral. You are one of the gallants who meet other gallants at St. Paul’s Cathedral. You are the Littlewit of London, so you are called, and something beside.”

Being called a Littlewit — little wit? — is not necessarily a good thing. Same with being called “something beside.”

Referring to himself as “you,” he continued, “When a quip or a pun does escape you, and you do not see and apprehend it, and bring it before the constable of conceit (even now, I speak with verbal agility), then let them carry you out of the Archdeacon’s Court — the Court of Arches, where I work — into his kitchen, and make a Jack of you, instead of a John. There I go again!”

He was right; he was making a pun. “Jack” is a nickname for “John,” and a jack is a device for turning the spit on which meat is being roasted. A jack is also a rogue; punning is a roguish wit.

His wife, Mrs. Win Littlewit, entered the room. She was well dressed, especially for a Puritan.

He said, “Win, good morning, Win. Aye, marry, Win.”

Another pun, meaning both “I marry Win” and “Yes, indeed, Win.”

“Marry” was an oath meaning “By Saint Mary.” It was sometimes used to give emphasis to the words one spoke.

He continued, “Now you look finely indeed, Win! This hat is stunning! You would prefer not to have worn it, Win, nor to have had it made of velvet, for you would have preferred it to be made of a rough country beaver, with a copper band, like the hat worn by the woman of Budge Row who sells rabbit skins.”

His wife, Win, was a Puritan. She was wearing a small velvet hat. This hat was fashionable, but the wives of aldermen wore a larger version. Her husband was teasing her a little by saying that she would have preferred a hat made of beaver skin. Puritans preferred simplicity in dress, and beaver hats were expensive. Actually, Win would perhaps have preferred a hat less fine than the small velvet hat she was wearing. Or, possibly, she may have wanted a finer hat.

He said, “Sweet Win, let me kiss it!”

He may have been speaking baby talk to her. “Let me kiss it” could mean “Let me kiss you.” It could, however, mean that he wanted to kiss her hat.

Mr. John Littlewit continued, “And her fine high shoes, like the Spanish lady! Good Win, walk a little; I would like to see you pace, pretty Win. By this fine hat, I could never leave, aka stop, kissing on it.”

The Spanish lady was an English widow who had traveled to Spain and thereafter continued to wear Spanish clothing, even after returning to England.

“Kissing on it” may have been more baby talk. It could mean “kissing you.” It could, however, mean that he wanted to kiss her pace — one meaning of “pace” is “path,” and therefore he may have meant that he wanted to kiss the ground she walked on. And since the buttocks are used in pacing, he may have meant that he wanted to kiss her butt.

Mrs. Win Littlewit teased him, “Come off it; indeed, you are always such a fool!”

He replied, “No, I am only half a fool, Win, you are the other half: Man and wife make one fool, Win. That’s a good one!”

Yes, a man and a wife are needed to make one fool — a baby.

He continued, “Is there the proctor, or doctor indeed, in the diocese, who ever had the fortune to win him such a Win! There I go again! I feel witty turns of phrasing coming upon me, more than I am able to turn tongue to.”

He then began to criticize men whom he considered to have inferior wit: “A pox on these pretenders to wit! Your Three Cranes, Mitre, and Mermaid men!”

The Three Cranes, Mitre, and Mermaid are three inns. The Mermaid was located close to the theater district, and many actors and playwrights frequented it and engaged in battles of wit. Some of the “pretenders to wit” at the Mermaid whom Mr. John Littlewit was criticizing were Ben Jonson, William Shakespeare, Francis Beaumont (of Beaumont and Fletcher fame) and John Donne. Mr. Beaumont once wrote in a letter to Mr. Jonson, “... what things we have seen, / Done at the Mermaid! heard words that have been / So nimble, and so full of subtil flame, / As if that everyone from whence they came, / Had meant to put his whole wit in a jest, / And had resolved to live a fool the rest / Of his dull life.”

Mr. John Littlewit continued, “There is not a grain of true salt, not a grain of right mustard among them all. Their wit has no pungency. They may compete for places in anticipation of the next wit-fall, aka battle of wits, and pay two-pence in a quart more for their canary wine than other men. But give me the man who can start up a justice of wit out of six-shillings beer, and read the riot act to all the poets and poet-suckers in town.”

Beer was less expensive than wine.

A poet-sucker was a young poet. Many poets, however, were playwrights, and people paid money to attend plays, and so a poet-sucker was also a playwright who sucked money out of people’s pockets.

Thinking of the pride of the playwrights, Mr. John Littlewit said, “They are proud because they are the actors’ familiar friends! By God’s eyelid! Other men have wives as fine as the actors, and as well dressed.”

Actors frequently portrayed members of royalty, and acting companies sometimes bought used clothing from members of the upper class to use as costumes.

Mr. John Littlewit said, “Come here, Win!”

He kissed her.

— 1.2 —

Mr. Winwife entered the room. He was courting Dame Purecraft, Mrs. Win Littlewit's mother and Mr. John Littlewit's mother-in-law. Dame Purecraft was a widow.

Mr. Winwife said, "Why, what are you doing now, Mr. John Littlewit! Measuring of lips, or molding of kisses? Which is it?"

Mr. John Littlewit replied, "Truly, I am a little taken with my Win's clothing here. Doesn't she look fine, Mr. Winwife? What do you think, sir? She would not have worn this clothing."

As a Puritan, Mrs. Win Littlewit resisted — at least to some extent — wearing such fashionable clothing.

Mr. John Littlewit continued, "I challenge all Cheapside to show such another pretty sight as my wife in her outfit here. Can any woman in Moorfields, Pimlico-path, or the Exchange, in a summer evening, with a lace hemming on her clothing like my wife's clothing, match the pretty sight that is my wife in her outfit?"

He then said, "Dear Win, let Mr. Winwife kiss you. He comes a wooing our mother and mother-in-law, Win, and he may become our stepfather perhaps, Win. There's no harm in him, Win."

Mr. Winwife said, "None in the earth, Mr. John Littlewit."

He kissed Mrs. Win Littlewit.

Mr. John Littlewit said, "I grudge no man my delights and delicacies, sir."

Mr. Winwife said, "Alas, you always have the garden where they grow! A wife here with a strawberry breath, cherry lips, apricot cheeks, and a soft velvet head, like a peach grafted onto a quince tree.”

Mr. John Littlewit said, “That’s a good one, in faith! Now dullness must be upon me, that I had not thought of that before him, that I should not light on it as well as he! Velvet head!”

Peach velvet is peach fuzz.

Young male deer do not have true antlers; they have velvet antlers that have not yet calcified and grown hard.

In this society, cuckolds — men with unfaithful wives — were said to have invisible horns growing on their foreheads. Mrs. Win Littlewit was faithful to her husband, and so he was not a full cuckold, but he was allowing another man to kiss his wife. This can be innocent, but this can also be dangerous.

Mr. Winwife said, “But my taste, Mr. John Littlewit, tends to fruit of a later kind: the sober matron, your wife’s mother.”

Dame Purecraft was Mrs. Win Littlewit’s mother.

Mr. John Littlewit said, “Yes, we know you are a suitor, sir. Win and I both wish you well. By this marriage license here in my hand, I swear that I wish you had won her and that your two names were as securely written on this marriage license as are the names of another couple! Win would like to have a fine young father-in-law with a feather, so that her mother might hood it and chain it with Mrs. Overdo.”

Feathers, hoods, and chains were all status symbols. A fashionable gentleman such as Mr. Winwife would wear a hat with a large feather in it. A fashionable, well-to-do woman would wear a hood. Some careers required the wearing of a chain of office. Mrs. Overdo wore a hood and her husband possessed a chain of office. If Dame Purecraft were to marry Mr. Winwife, her social status would increase.

Mr. John Littlewit continued, “But you do not take the right course in wooing Dame Purecraft, Mr. Winwife.”

“I don’t, Mr. John Littlewit? What am I doing wrong?”

“You are not mad enough.”

“Mad” can mean insane, but it can also mean “madcap.” It can also mean a zealot, such as a Puritan.

“What!” Mr. Winwife said. “Is being mad the right way to woo her?”

Mr. John Littlewit said, “I say nothing, but I wink at Win. You have a friend, a certain Mr. Quarlous, who comes here sometimes.”

“Why, he doesn’t woo her, does he?”

“Not a tokenworth that ever I saw, I assure you, but —”

A tokenworth is a very small amount.

Mr. Winwife asked, “But what?”

“He is the more madcap of you two,” Mr. John Littlewit said.

He looked at Mr. Winwife and said, “You don’t understand me.”

Mrs. Win Littlewit said, “You have a hot coal in your mouth, now; you cannot hold back from telling.”

She was misremembering this proverb: It is as hard to keep a secret in the mouth as to hold a burning coal in the hand.

Mr. John Littlewit requested, “Let me out with it, dear Win.”

“I’ll tell him myself,” she replied.

“Do, and take all the thanks, and may it do much good to your pretty heart, Win,” he said.

Mrs. Win Littlewit said to Mr. Winwife, “Sir, my mother has had her nativity-water cast lately by the cunning-men in Cow Lane, and they have told her fortune to her, and they do assure her that she shall never have a happy hour, unless she marry within this sen’night; and when she marries, it must be to a madman, they say.”

Mrs. Win Littlewit was mixing up two kinds of casting. Astrologers would cast nativities, aka horoscopes. Doctors would cast water; that is, they would look at a patient’s urine in an attempt to determine the health of the patient. Very dark urine is a sign of bad health, as is blood in the urine.

Some cunning-men are male witches. Cunning-men are supposed to have occult knowledge.

A sen-night is a seven-night, or week.

Mr. John Littlewit added, “Yes, but it must be a gentleman madman.”

Mrs. Win Littlewit said, “Yes, so the other man of Moorfields says.”

“But does she believe them?” Mr. Winwife asked.

Mr. John Littlewit replied, “Yes, and she has been at Bedlam twice since every day to inquire if any mad gentleman are there, or will come there mad.”

Bedlam was a lunatic asylum.

“Why, this is a confederacy,” Mr. Winwife said. “It is a complete piece of trickery played upon her by these impostors.”

“I tell her that,” Mr. John Littlewit said, “or else I say that the cunning-men mean some young madcap gentleman, for the Devil can equivocate as well as a shopkeeper, and therefore I advise you, Mr. Winwife, to be a little madder than Mr. Quarlous hereafter.”

One meaning of “to equivocate” is “to deceive with equivocating language.” Equivocating language is language that can be interpreted in more than one way.

Mr. Winwife asked, “Where is Dame Purecraft? Is she up and about yet?”

It was still early in the morning.

“Up and about?” Mr. John Littlewit said. “She is stirring! Yes, and studying an old elder come from Banbury, a suitor who puts in here at meal-tide, to praise the painful, aka pains-taking, brethren, or pray that the sweet singers may be restored.”

One of Dame Purecraft’s suitors was Zeal-of-the-land Busy, a Puritan from Banbury. As an elder, he was high in the local Puritan hierarchy. As a Puritan, he avoided the syllable “-mas” as being too similar to the Catholic word “mass.” He referred to Christ-mas as Christ-tide; the word “tide” meant “time.” Mr. John Littlewit was gently mocking this Puritan use of language by saying “meal-tide.” Puritans referred to themselves as brethren and sweet singers. Some Puritans were not allowed to preach because they were opposed to the Church of England; Zeal-of-the-land Busy prayed that these Puritans would be restored to the pulpit.

Mr. John Littlewit continued, “He says a grace as long as his breath lasts him!”

Puritans were known for saying long prayers. Unfortunately, long prayers are often unwelcome right before meals.

Mr. John Littlewit continued, “Sometimes the spirit is so strong with him, it gets quite out of him, and then my mother, or Win, are fain to revive him again with malmsey or aqua caelestis.”

Puritans frowned on drunkenness, but Zeal-of-the-land Busy occasionally needed some medicinal malmsey or aqua caelestis. Malmsey is a strong sweet wine, and aqua caelestis is brandy or distilled wine. Puritans also frowned on gluttony, but Zeal-of-the-land Busy had a big belly and may occasionally have eaten himself into a stupor, thereby necessitating the malmsey or aqua caelestis.

Mrs. Win Littlewit said, “Yes, indeed, we have such a tedious life with him for his diet, and his clothes, too! He breaks his buttons and cracks his seams at every saying he sobs out.”

The breaking of the buttons may have been due to the spiritedness with which he talked about religion, or his buttons may have popped off his clothing and his seams may have split because of the spiritedness with which he wielded his fork.

Mr. John Littlewit said, “He cannot abide my vocation, he says.”

Mrs. Win Littlewit added, “No; he told my mother that a proctor was a claw of the beast, and that she had little less than committed abomination in marrying me the way she has done. Zeal-of-the-land Busy is totally against my being married to my husband.”

Puritans were totally against the Catholic Church, and they regarded the Church of England as being an English version of the Catholic Church. Mr. Littlefield, a proctor, practiced in the Bishop’s Court, an ecclesiastical court of the Church of England.

Mr. John Littlewit said, “Every line, Zeal-of-the-land Busy says, that a proctor writes, when it comes to be read in the Bishop's Court, is a long black hair combed out of the tail of the Antichrist.”

Revelation 13 describes the Beast of the Apocalypse. According to the Puritans, the Beast is the Antichrist.

“When did this proselyte come here?” Mr. Winwife asked.

A proselyte is a convert.

“Some three days ago,” Mr. John Littlewit answered.

— 1.3 —

Quarlous entered the room.

Seeing Mr. Winwife, he said, “Oh, sir, have you taken soil here?”

The phrase “take soil” is used when a closely hunted deer takes to water to escape hunting dogs. The word “soil” is also used to refer to mud and mire that a boar wallows in. “Night soil” is excrement deposited into a chamber pot at night.

Quarlous continued, “It’s well a man may yet reach you after three hours’ running! What an unmerciful companion you are, to leave your lodging at such ungentlemanly hours! None but a scattered covey of fiddlers, aka triflers and wasters of time, or one of these rag-rakers in dunghills, or some marrow-bone man at most, would have been up when you were gone abroad, by all description.”

Quarlous was complaining because Mr. Winwife had gotten up early and left his home at a time when, according to Quarlous, only people who were triflers or whose work required them to be up early would be awake and working. Such people included street cleaners who raked the streets. They also included rag-rakers and marrow-bone men, aka rag-and-bone men. Rag-rakers went through piles of rubbish and salvaged what they could. The bones of cattle were collected so that the marrow could be extracted from them and used in English meat pies and meat puddings.

Quarlous continued, "I ask you what is ailing you so that you cannot sleep? Do you have thorns in your eyelids, or thistles in your bed?"

"I cannot tell," Mr. Winwife said. "It seems that you had neither in your feet since you took this trouble to find me."

Quarlous said, "No, I have no thorns or thistles in my feet. If I had, instead of me coming after you, all the leased hunting hounds of the city would have come after you by following your scent."

He then said, "Mr. John Littlewit! May God save you, sir. It was a hot night with some of us last night, John. Shall we pluck a hair of the same wolf today, Proctor John?"

"Hair of the same wolf" is "hair of the same dog," which is short for "hair of the same dog that bit us." In other words, Quarulous was asking if they should have a drink in order to reduce some of the effects of a hangover.

Mr. John Littlewit asked, "Do you remember, Mr. Quarulous, what we talked about last night?"

"No, I don't, John," Quarulous said. "I remember nothing that I either talked about or did; at such times of drunkenness, I forfeit all to forgetfulness."

In other words, he was accustomed to getting blackout drunk.

"No!" Mr. John Littlewit said. "You don't remember what you said concerning Win, my wife? Look, there she is, and dressed as I told you she would be. Pay attention, sir."

He whispered to Quarulous, "Have you forgotten?"

Quarlous replied, "By this head of mine, I swear that I'll beware how I keep you company, John, when I drink, if you have this dangerous memory. That's for certain."

"Why, sir?" Mr. John Littlewit asked.

"Why!" Quarlous said.

He then said to the others, "We were all a little stained last night, sprinkled with a cup or two of alcoholic drinks, and I agreed with Proctor John here to come and do somewhat with Win (I don't know what it was) today; and he puts me in mind of it now; he says he was coming to fetch me."

Some of this language is close to having a risqué meaning: "To do someone" means "to have sex with that person." That is close to "do somewhat with Win."

He said to Mr. John Littlewit, "Before truth, I swear that if you have that fearful quality, John, to remember when you are sober, John, what you promise when you are drunk, John, I shall take heed of you, John. But for this once, I am content to wink at you and not notice your fault. Where's your wife?"

He then said, "Come here, Win."

He kissed her; she did not like his kissing her.

"Why, John!" Mrs. Win Littlewit said. "Do you see this, John? Look! Help me, John!"

Her husband replied, "Oh, Win, fiddlesticks! What do you mean, Win? Be womanly, Win. Will you like a little girl make an outcry to your mother, Win! Mr. Quarlous is an honest gentleman, and he is our worshipful good friend, Win, and he is Mr. Winwife's friend, too, and Mr. Winwife comes as a suitor to your mother, Win, as I told you before, Win, and he may perhaps be our stepfather, Win.

“Mr. Quarlous and Mr. Winwife will do you no harm, Win. They are both our worshipful good friends. Mr. Quarlous! You must know Mr. Quarlous, Win; you must not quarrel with Mr. Quarlous, Win.”

Quarlous said, “No, we’ll kiss again, and fall in.”

Quarlous kissed her again.

“Fall in” had two meanings: 1) be reconciled, and 2) have sex. Two people would fall in bed.

Mr. John Littlewit said, “Yes, do, good Win.”

One meaning of the word “do” is “f*k.”

“Truly, you are a fool, John,” she replied.

“A fool-John, she calls me,” Mr. John Littlewit said. “Did you hear that, gentlemen? Did you hear what the pretty Littlewit of velvet called me? A fool-John.”

He was taking the word “fool” as an endearment.

Quarlous thought, She may call you an apple-John, if you use this.

He was referring obliquely to the word “apple-squire,” which meant “pander.” The phrase “use this” meant “have sex with.” In this context, it meant “put your wife to work sexually.” Mr. John Littlewit was not protecting his wife.

“Use this” also meant “make a habit of this” — that is, make a habit of allowing other men to kiss your wife.

An “apple-john” is a type of apple that is eaten after it has been stored two years and is wrinkled and withered. Mr. John Littlewit was older than his wife.

Quarlous kissed Mrs. Win Littlewit again. This was his third kiss.

Mr. Winwife said, "Please stop this, for my sake, somewhat."

Quarlous and Mr. Winwife spoke quietly together while Mr. John Littlewit and his wife talked a short distance away. It's a good thing that Mrs. Win Littlewit could not hear them because Quarlous would say some negative things about old women such as Win's mother.

"Hey-day!" Quarlous, who was surprised, said. "How concerned about good etiquette you have become all of a sudden! I fear this family will make you 'reformed,' too. I hope that you come around to my opinions again."

"Are you concerned about respectability because Mrs. Win Littlewit may possibly become your stepdaughter, and she may ask you for a customary blessing hereafter, when she acts like a courtier and goes to Tottenham to eat cakes and cream!"

"Well, I will forbear, sir; but indeed, I wish thou would stop thy exercise of widow-hunting once and for all. Stop this drawing after an old reverend smock by the splay-foot!"

The words "thou" and "thy" and "thine" were informal and were used among friends, but they were also used when a superior spoke to an inferior.

A smock is a ladies' undergarment, and so it is a term meaning "woman." Quarlous was saying that Mr. Winwife continually chased reverend skirts. Actually, he was chasing old reverend, aka Puritan, skirts — old women who have splayed feet, which are feet turned outward. A cynical person might think that quite possibly, the feet are turned out because the old women's legs are spread with the feet raised in the air. Quarlous' cynicism took the opposite direction; he would say that the old women have lacked sex for forty years.

“By the splay-foot” was word-play on “hunting dry-foot,” which meant tracking by scent alone. “Drawing after” meant tracking by scent.

Quarlous continued, “There cannot be an ancient tripe or trillibub in the town, but thou are immediately nosing it.”

“Tripe” and “trillibub” are terms meaning “entrails” and are used to refer to fat people. The old women are fat bags of guts.

Quarlous continued, “And it is a fine occupation thou will confine thyself to, when thou have got one.”

The occupation was marriage to an old woman. By marrying an old woman, Mr. Winwife would gain control of her wealth. Such was the law in this sexist society.

Quarlous continued, “Thou will be scrubbing a piece of buff, as if thou had the perpetuity — tenure for life — of Pannier Ally to stink in, or perhaps worse, currying a carcass that thou have bound thyself to alive.”

Pannier Alley was a place where buff leather was sold. Treating leather can be a noisome — stinky — occupation.

According to Quarlous, Mr. Winwife would be rubbing the bare skin of an old woman for the rest of her life — bare skin that was like leather.

One meaning of “curry” is “to ride with haste.” A carcass is something from which the life or spirit has gone. As the old woman’s husband, Mr. Winwife would be currying her spiritless body in bed.

Quarlous continued, “I’ll be sworn, some of them whom thou are, or have been suitor to, are so old, as no chaste or married pleasure can ever come to them; the honest instrument of procreation has for forty years since ceased to belong to them.”

According to Quarlous, the women whom Mr. Winwife courted were so old that they hadn't had the services of "the honest instrument of procreation" — a penis — for the past forty years.

Quarlous continued, "Thou must visit them as thou would visit a tomb, with a torch or three handfuls of link, flaming hot, and so thou may happen to make them feel thee and after come to inherit a fortune according to thy inches."

The torch Quarlous was talking about had three handfuls of link — the tow and pitch that burned at the head of the torch. That is a very large head. To make the old woman feel anything in her vagina, Mr. Winwife would have to have a very large "flaming hot" penis. If he were fortunate enough to have a penis many inches long, he could very well acquire a sizeable fortune from the old woman.

Quarlous continued, "A sweet course for a man to waste the brand of life for, to be continually raking himself a fortune in an old woman's embers!"

According to Quarlous, Mr. Winwife would be wasting his "brand of life" — his penis — in the embers of an old woman's vagina.

One meaning of "rake" is to behave like a rake, aka morally dissolute man. Marrying an old woman just for her money is morally dissolute.

Quarlous continued, "We shall have thee, after thou have been but a month married to one of them, look like the quartan ague and the black jaundice met in a face, and walk as if thou had borrowed the legs of a spider and the voice of a cricket."

The quartan ague was a fever that visited every four days. The black jaundice was an illness that turned the skin black.

Quarlous continued, “I would prefer to endure to hear fifteen sermons a week before I would endure her, and such coarse and loud sermons, as some of them must be! I would even beg of Fate that I might dwell in a drum, and take in my sustenance with an old broken tobacco-pipe and a straw.”

Anyone who dwelled in a drum would hear very loud drumming.

Quarlous continued, “Do thou ever think to bring thine ears or stomach to the patience of a dry grace as long as thy tablecloth; and droned out by thy potential stepson, Mr. John Littlewit here (who is so old that he might be thy father), until all the food on thy plate has forgotten it was that day in the kitchen?”

He had been criticizing old women and their wooers. Now he began to focus more on criticizing Puritans, who were known for saying very long prayers before meals.

Quarlous continued, “Or to endure the noise made in a question of predestination by the good laborers and painful — pains-taking — eaters assembled together, put to them by the matron your possible spouse, Dame Purecraft, who acts as a moderator with a cup of wine, always and immediately, and a moral maxim out of the writings of John Knox between?”

If Mr. Winwife were to marry Dame Purecraft, who was a Puritan, he would have to put up with listening to long-winded religious conversations during mealtimes. Dame Purecraft sometimes had Puritans such as Zeal-of-the-land Busy over for meals.

Quarlous continued, “Or the perpetual spitting before and after a sober-drawn exhortation of six hours, whose better part was the hum-ha-hum? Or to hear prayers groaned out over thy iron chests containing valuables, as if they were charms to break them? And to endure all this for the hope of two apostle-spoons! And a cup to eat a caudle — a warm medicinal drink — in! For that will be thy monetary legacy. She'll have conveyed her state safe enough from thee, if she is a right widow.”

If Mr. Winwife were to marry Dame Purecraft, he would have to put up with listening to long-winded religious sermons and long-winded prayers in which the speaker frequently said “hum-ha-hum.” And what would he get for it? According to Quarlous, Mr. Winwife would get two apostle-spoons — two silver spoons with the figures of the apostles on the handles. That and a cup. Why wouldn't he get all Dame Purecraft's money? She would have conveyed her estate to a trustee — probably a Puritan — to keep it out of Mr. Winwife's hands.

Hearing about the possible transfer of Dame Purecraft's wealth to a trustee, Mr. Winwife said, “Alas, I am quite off that scent now. I have lost the scent of Dame Purecraft.”

“How so?” Quarlous asked.

“I have been put off her scent by a brother of Banbury, a Puritan, one who, they say, has come here and governs everything already,” Mr. Winwife said.

“What is his name?” Quarlous asked. “I knew many of those Banburians when I was in Oxford.”

“Mr. John Littlewit can tell us his name,” Mr. Winwife said loudly.

“Sir!” Mr. John Littlewit said to Mr. Winwife.

He then said, “Good Win, go in, and if Mr. Bartholomew Cokes' servant comes for the marriage license (I mean the little old fellow), let him speak with me.”

Mrs. Win Littlewit exited.

“What are you talking about, gentlemen?” Mr. John Littlewit asked.

Mr. Winwife asked him, “What is the name of the reverend elder you told me of, your Banbury man the Puritan?”

Mr. John Littlewit said, “Rabbi Busy, sir; he is more than an elder, he is a prophet, sir.”

Matthew 23:8 states, “But be not ye called Rabbi: for one is your Master, even Christ; and all ye are brethren” (King James Version).

Zeal-of-the-land Busy did not call himself a Rabbi.

“Oh, I know him!” Quarlous said. “He’s a baker, isn’t he?”

“He was a baker, sir, but he dreams now and see visions,” Mr. John Littlewit said. “He has given up his trade as a baker.”

Quarlous said, “I remember him giving up his business, too, out of a scruple he took in spiced conscience because those cakes he made were served at bride-ales, Maypole celebrations, Morris dances, and such profane feasts and meetings.”

An obsolete meaning of “spiced” is “over-scrupulous.”

Puritans felt that Maypole celebrations and Morris dances were based on pagan fertility rituals. At bride-ales, the bride served ale and people generously tipped her.

Quarlous continued, “His Christian name is Zeal-of-the-land.”

“Yes, sir,” Mr. John Little said. “Zeal-of-the-land Busy.”

Mr. Winwife said, “What! What kind of a name is that!”

“Oh, the Puritans all have such names, sir,” Mr. John Littlewit said. “He was witness for Win here — they will not be called godfathers and therefore call themselves witnesses — and named her Win-the-fight. You thought her name was Winifred, didn’t you?”

“Indeed, I did,” Mr. Winwife said.

“He would have thought himself a stark reprobate, if she had been named Winifred.”

“Yes, for there was a blue-starch woman of the name at the same time,” Quarlous said.

Many Puritans were against starch, considering it a sign of vanity. Blue starch was worse than regular starch because it was expensive — why pay lots of money to indulge the sin of vanity? — and because it was used on large ruffs, a vain fashion, according to the Puritans.

Quarlous continued, “He is a notable hypocritical vermin; I know him. He is one who stands upon his face, more than his faith, at all times.”

“Stands upon his face” means “relies on his effrontery.”

Quarlous continued, “He is always in seditious political agitation, and criticizing others as being guilty of vainglory; he is of a most lunatic conscience and spleen, and he practices the violence of singularity in everything he does.”

Puritans felt that King James I should be subordinate to the church when it came to religious matters. King James I objected, and some Puritans were accused of sedition.

“Singularity” means “deviating from the norm.” Here, it means deviating from the social norms concerning ethical behavior. Religious people who believe that they are divinely inspired may believe that they need not follow the standards of ethical conduct that other people obey.

Quarlous continued, “Zeal-of-the-land Busy has ruined a grocer here in Newgate Market, who did business with him and trusted him with currants, as arrant a zeal as he, that’s by the way.”

Apparently, Zeal-of-the-land Busy never paid the grocer for the currants, which were used in baking cakes.

According to Quarlous, Zeal-of-the-land Busy’s zeal is arrant. A religious person ought to be zealous in doing the work of God, but Zeal-of-the-land Busy’s zeal is arrant, which calls to mind the phrase “arrant thief,” aka an “out-and-out thief.”

The phrase “that’s by the way” meant either “this is a parenthetical anecdote” or “Zeal-of-the-land Busy put his religious zeal aside” when he ruined the trusting grocer, or both.

Quarlous continued, “By his profession he will always be in the state of innocence, though, and childhood.”

Some religious people can believe that by converting to a certain religion they will be cleansed of sin forever.

Quarlous continued, “He derides all the knowledge of antiquity because it is pagan, and he defies any other learning than inspiration; and what discretion his however many years of age should afford him, it is all forestalled by his original ignorance.”

Some religious people believe that all the knowledge they need is religious knowledge.

Quarlous continued, “Have nothing to do with him, for he is a fellow of a most arrogant and invincible dullness, I assure you.”

He saw someone coming into the room and asked, “Who is this?”

Mrs. Win Littlewit escorted Humphrey Wasp into the room. He was the servant of Bartholomew Cokes, and he had come to get the marriage license that Mr. John Littlewit had prepared.

Humphrey Wasp was a waspish — an irritable — man.

“By your leave, gentlemen, with all my heart to you,” Humphrey Wasp said, “and may God give you a good morning!”

He then said, “Mr. John Littlewit, my business is with you. Is this license ready?”

“I have it for you here in my hand, Mr. Humphrey,” Mr. John Littlewit replied.

Humphrey Wasp said, “That’s well. No, you don’t need to open it or read it to me — it’s labor in vain, you know. I am no clerk or scribe. I scorn to be saved by my book, indeed. I’ll hang first.”

At the time, people could avoid being hung for a crime if they could prove that they could read Latin. This was called “benefit of clergy” because when the law was first made, it was mainly clergy who could read Latin.

The verse that usually was translated was Psalm 51:1: “Have mercy upon me, O God, according to thy lovingkindness: according unto the multitude of thy tender mercies blot out my transgressions” (King James Version).

Humphrey Wasp continued, “Fold it up on your word, and give it to me. What amount of money must you have for it?”

“We’ll talk about that later, Mr. Humphrey,” Mr. John Littlewit said.

Humphrey Wasp said, “We’ll talk about it now, or not at all, good Mr. Proctor. I am for no later, I assure you.”

Mr. John Littlewit said to his wife, “Sweet Win, tell my clerk Solomon to send me the little black box in my study.”

Legal documents were carried in black boxes.

Humphrey Wasp said, “Yes, and do it quickly, Win, I ask you, for I have both eggs on the spit and iron in the fire.”

This meant that he was in a hurry to return home. Eggs on spits have to be carefully watched to ensure they are cooked correctly. Iron in a blacksmith’s fire must be carefully watched to ensure it is taken out at the right time and hammered.

Mrs. Win Littlewit exited.

Humphrey Wasp said, “Say what amount of money you must have, good Mr. Littlewit.”

“Why, you know the price, Mr. Numps,” Mr. John Littlewit replied.

“Numps” is a nickname for “Humphrey.”

Humphrey Wasp said, “I know! I know nothing, I.”

Someone could hear that last sentence as “I know nothing, aye,” aka “I know nothing, yes.”

He continued, “Why are you talking to me about knowing? Now I am in haste, sir, I do not know, and I will not know, and I scorn to know, and yet, now I think about it, I will and do know as well as another: You must have a mark, aka thirteen shillings and four pence, for your thing here, and eight-pence for the box. I could have saved two-pence on that, if I had bought a black box ahead of time and brought it, but here’s fourteen shillings for you.”

He gave Mr. John Littlewit the money and said, “Good Lord, how long your little wife stays! I hope to God that Solomon, your clerk, is not looking in the wrong box, Mr. Proctor.”

The wrong box would be Mrs. Win Littlewit’s box, aka vagina.

“In good faith, no, he isn’t,” Mr. John Littlewit said. “I assure you that Solomon is wiser than to do that, sir.”

He was not upset by the reference to his wife’s “box”; instead, he appreciated the opportunity to make a joke about Solomon.

Humphrey Wasp said, “Fie, fie, fie, by your leave, Mr. Littlewit, I say that this is scurvy, idle, foolish, and abominable. I do not like it.”

He walked aside.

Mr. Winwife, who had been listening, said to Quarlous, “Did you hear that!”

He then asked, “Jack Littlewit, what business does your pretty head think this fellow may have, that he is making such a fuss?”

Quarlous asked, “Is his business more than buying of gingerbread in the cloister here (for that we allow him) or a gilt pouch in the fair?”

During Bartholomew Fair, the cloister was used to house merchants’ stalls, so Humphrey Wasp could, if he wanted, buy gingerbread or a gilt pouch there.

Mr. John Littlewit said, “Mr. Quarlous, do not be mistaken about him; he is his master’s both-hands, I assure you.”

He meant that Humphrey Wasp was his master’s right-hand man and left-hand man.

Quarlous asked, “What does he do? Pulls on his master’s boots in the mornings, or his stockings, does he?”

Mr. John Littlewit said, “Sir, if you have a mind to mock him, mock him quietly, and look the other way, for if he once realizes that you are mocking him, he will fly at you immediately. He is a terrible, testy old fellow, and his name is Humphrey Wasp, too.”

“He is a pretty insect!” Quarlous said. “Pamper him as if he were a child.”

Humphrey Wasp said, “A plague on this box, and the pox, on it, too, and on him who made it, and her who went for it, and everyone who should have sought it, sent it, or brought it! Do you understand, sir?”

“No, good Mr. Humphrey Wasp,” Mr. John Littlewit said.

“Good Mr. Hornet, turd in your teeth, hold your tongue,” Humphrey Wasp said.

The word “hornet” hinted that Mr. John Littlewit had horns and was a cuckold.

The word “turd” meant then what it does now.

Humphrey Wasp continued, “Don’t I know you? Your father was an apothecary, and he sold enemas, more than he gave, indeed, and turd in your little wife’s teeth, too.”

He then said, “Here comes your wife.”

Mrs. Win Littlewit, carrying the black box, entered the room.

He continued, “The turd will make her spit, as fine as she is, for all her velvet custard on her head, sir.”

A “custard” is a kind of pie. “Velvet custard” referred to the pie-shaped velvet hat she was wearing.

Mr. John Littlewit requested, “Oh, be civil, Mr. Numps.”

“Why, let’s say I have an inclination not to be civil,” Humphrey Wasp said. “What then? Who shall compel me to be civil? You?”

“Here is the black box now,” Mr. John Littlewit said.

“Why, a pox on your box, once again! Let your little wife piss in it, if she will,” Humphrey Wasp said. “Sir, I would have you to understand, and these gentlemen, too, if they please —”

“With all our hearts, sir,” Mr. Winwife said.

“— that I have a charge, a responsibility, gentlemen,” Humphrey Wasp said.

“Sir, they apprehend — they understand,” Mr. John Littlewit said.

Humphrey Wasp replied, “Pardon me, sir, neither they nor you can apprehend me yet. You are an ass.

“I have a young master. He is now upon his making and marring, aka coming of age; the whole care of his well-doing is now mine. His foolish schoolmasters have done nothing but run up and down the country with him to beg sausages and cake from his tenants, and they have almost spoiled him; he has learned nothing but to sing catches and snatches of songs, and repeat ‘Rattle bladder rattle’ and ‘O Madge!’”

“Rattle bladder rattle” was a tongue-twister: “Three blue beans in a blue bladder, rattle bladder rattle.”

“O Madge” was a ballad.

Humphrey Wasp continued, “I dare not let him walk alone, for fear that he will learn vile tunes that he will sing at supper, and during sermons! If he should meet a cartman in the street, and if I don’t talk to him to keep him away from the cartman, he will whistle all the cartman's tunes at night in his sleep! He has a head full of bees! He has bees in his bonnet!

"I am obliged now, for this little time I am absent, to leave him in charge of a gentlewoman. It is true she is a Justice of the Peace's wife, and a gentlewoman who wears a fashionable hood, and his natural sister, but what may happen under a woman's government, there's the doubt and the worry.

"Gentlemen, you do not know him; he is a different kind of individual than you think him to be. He is only nineteen years old, and yet he is taller than either of you by a head, God bless him!"

"Well, I think this is a fine fellow," Quarlous said.

Mr. Winwife said, "Humphrey Wasp has made his master a finer man by this description, I should think."

"Indeed, they are about the same. It's a toss-up: either heads or tails. There's not a farthing's worth of difference between them."

Humphrey Wasp said, "I'll tell you, gentlemen —"

Mr. John Littlewit asked, "Will it please you to have a drink, Mr. Humphrey Wasp?"

It was customary to give a departing visitor a drink.

Humphrey Wasp replied, "Why, I have not talked so long as to be dry, sir. You see no dust or cobwebs come out of my mouth, do you? You'd have me gone, would you?"

"No, but you were in a hurry to leave just now, Mr. Numps."

"What if I were! I still am, and yet I will stay, too. Meddle with your match, your equal, your Win there; she has as little wit as her husband, it seems. I have others to talk to."

Mr. John Littlewit said, “She’s my match indeed, and as Littlewit as I, myself!”

It was hard to insult Mr. John Littlewit because he could turn insults into jokes.

Humphrey Wasp said, “We have been only a day and a half in town, gentlemen, it is true, and yesterday in the afternoon we walked around London to show the city to the gentlewoman he shall marry, Miss Grace Wellborn, but before I will endure such another half day with him, I’ll be drawn with a good tomcat through the great pond at home, as his uncle Hodge was.”

A rural practical joke was to bet someone that a cat could drag him across a pond. One end of a rope would be tied to the victim, and the other end taken across the pond and tied with a string to a cat. Some strong men would be appointed to guide the cat, but they and not the cat would drag the victim across the pond.

“Hodge” is a name for a rustic; it is related to the name “Roger.”

Humphrey Wasp continued, “Why, we could not meet any heathen thing all the day, but he would stop; he would look at the pictures on the signs everywhere, as he went, and describe them out loud, and wherever he spied a parrot or a monkey, there he was pitched with all the little longcoats male and female around him; there was no getting him away!”

Children, both males and females, wore longcoats, aka petticoats.

He continued, “I thought he would have run mad on account of the black boy in Bucklersbury who takes the scurvy, roguey tobacco there.”

Because of illiteracy, signs displayed pictures that advertised what was being sold in the shops. A store that sold tobacco could have a sign with a picture of a black youth smoking tobacco. At this time, many people regarded tobacco as being good for one's health.

Mr. John Littlewit said, "You say the truth, Mr. Numps; there's such a sign there indeed."

"It doesn't matter whether there is such a sign there or not," Humphrey Wasp said. "What's it to you?"

Quarlous said to Mr. Winwife, "He will not allow John Littlewit to make a comment on anything or on any account."

— 1.5 —

Bartholomew Cokes, Mrs. Overdo, and Miss Grace Wellborn entered the room.

The wedding license that Mr. John Littlewit had drawn up was for Bartholomew Cokes and Miss Grace Wellborn, who was the ward of Justice Overdo.

Bartholomew Cokes said, "Oh, Numps! Are you here, Numps? Look where I am, Numps, and Miss Grace Wellborn, too! No, do not look angrily, Numps. My sister — Mrs. Overdo — is here and all; I have not come without her."

Humphrey Wasp said, "Why the mischief have you come with her, or she with you?"

Bartholomew Cokes replied, "We all came to seek you, Numps."

"To seek me!" Humphrey Wasp said. "Why, did you all think I was lost, or run away with your fourteen shillings' worth of small items — the marriage contract and black box — here? Or that I had exchanged your fourteen shillings at the fair for hobbyhorses?”

A hobbyhorse is a toy horse, or a prostitute.

He continued, “By God’s precious blood — to seek me!”

Mrs. Overdo, the sister of Bartholomew Cokes, said, “Now, good Mr. Numps, show some discretion, even though my brother’s behavior is outrageous, as Mr. Overdo says. Show some discretion even if it is just for the preservation of the peace.”

Humphrey Wasp said, “By marry gip, goody She-justice, Mrs. French-hood! Turd in your teeth, and turd in your French hood’s teeth, too, to do you service, do you see!”

He was certainly in a bad mood. “By marry gip” was the oath “By Mary the Gypsy,” referring to St. Mary of Egypt. Gypsies tended to be dark-skinned, and this society valued light skin. “Goody” was short for “Goodwife,” a term used to refer to a wife in humbler circumstances than those of Mrs. Overdo. A French hood was an item of dress. Apparently, Humphrey Wasp disliked French hoods because he was putting Mrs. Overdo down in his address to her.

He continued, “Must you quote your Adam to me!”

“Adam” was her husband, Mr. Adam Overdo; he was a Justice of the Peace.

Humphrey Wasp continued, “You think you are Madam Regent still, Mrs. Overdo, when I am in place, but my being in place doesn’t matter to you. I assure you, your reign is out when I am in, Dame Overdo.”

A regent rules when the real ruler is unable to.

Mrs. Overdo said, “I am content to be out of power for a while, sir, and to be governed by you — so should young Bartholomew Cokes, too, if he did well, but it is also expected of you that you should govern your passions.”

Humphrey Wasp said, “You want me to be civil, forsooth!”

“Forsooth” was a trivial oath, often made by ladies. Humphrey Wasp was continuing to mock Mrs. Overdo.

He added, “Good Lord, how sharp you are from visiting Bedlam yesterday! Whetstone has set an edge upon you, has he?”

Bedlam was a hospital for the insane. Citizens sometimes visited it to be entertained by the antics of the inmates, one of whom was William Whetstone. In part, Humphrey Wasp was punning on Whetstone’s name. A proverb stated, “A whetstone, though it cannot itself cut, makes tools cut.” Another proverb stated, “The dullness of the fool is the whetstone of the wits.”

Mrs. Overdo said, “If you don’t know what belongs to your dignity, I still know what belongs to mine.”

“Very well then,” Humphrey Wasp said.

“Is this the marriage license, Numps?” Bartholomew Cokes said. “For love’s sake let me see it. I have never seen a marriage license.”

“Haven’t you?” Humphrey Wasp said. “Why, in that case you shall not see it.”

“If you respect me, good Numps, let me see it,” Bartholomew Cokes requested.

“Sir, I respect you, and yet I do not respect you when you engage in these fooleries of yours,” Humphrey Wasp said. “Set your heart at rest, there’s no reply forthcoming to your request except hard words — and for what reason would you see the marriage license?”

Bartholomew Cokes said, "I want to see the length and the breadth of it, that's all, and I will see it now, so I will."

"You shall not see it here," Humphrey Wasp said.

Bartholomew Cokes replied, "Then I'll see it at home, and I'll look upon the case — the black box — here."

"Why, do so," Humphrey Wasp said.

He then said to the others present, "A man must give way to him a little in trifles, gentlemen. These are errors, diseases of youth, which he will mend when he comes to judgment and knowledge of matters. I hope that you think so, and I thank you, and I ask you to pardon him, and I thank you again."

Referring to Humphrey Wasp, Quarlous said quietly and sarcastically to Mr. Winwife, "Well, this dry nurse, I still say, is a delicate man."

A wet nurse breastfeeds an infant. A dry nurse serves as a nanny for a child.

Mr. Winwife replied quietly, "And I am for the cosset who is his charge."

A "cosset" is a lamb that has been raised by hand; it is also a term for a spoiled child.

Quarlous and Mr. Winwife were trying to decide who was the greater fool: Humphrey Wasp or Bartholomew Cokes.

Mr. Winwife continued talking about Bartholomew Cokes, "Did you ever see a fellow's face more accuse him of being an ass?"

"Accuse him!" Quarlous said. "It confesses that he is one without his having been accused. What a pity it is that yonder wench — Miss Grace Wellborn — should marry such a Bartholomew Cokes!"

The word “wench” meant “young woman” and was often used affectionately; it was not always a negative term.

“That’s true,” Mr. Winwife said.

Quarulous said, “She seems to be discreet, and as sober as she is attractive.”

“Yes,” Mr. Winwife said, “and if you closely watch her, what a restrained scorn she casts upon all Bartholomew Cokes’ behavior and speeches!”

Bartholomew Cokes said, “Well, Numps, I am now for another piece of business more — the fair, Numps. And then —”

Humphrey Wasp interrupted, “Bless me! Deliver me from my pain and tribulation! Help me! Hold me up! The fair!”

Bartholomew Cokes said, “No, don’t pace nervously up and down, Numps, and vex yourself. I am resolute Bartholomew in this; I’ll make no request to you about going to the fair. It was the entire purpose of my journey indeed, to show Miss Grace Wellborn my fair. I call it my fair, because of Bartholomew: You know my name is Bartholomew, and the name of the fair is Bartholomew Fair.”

Mr. John Littlewit said, “That was a joke I invented previously, gentlemen — just this morning. I invented that joke, indeed, when I was working on his marriage license. Believe me, he is making this joke after I made it.”

Quarulous said, “Come on, John, this ambitious wit of yours, I am afraid, will do you no good in the end.”

“No!” Mr. John Littlewit said. “Why not, sir?”

Quarulous said, “You grow so insolent, so beyond the bounds of propriety, with it, and over-doing it, John, that if you look not to it, and tie it up, in time it will bring you to some obscure place, and there it will leave you.”

In other words, someday Mr. John Littlewit’s making of jokes would get him in trouble.

Mr. Winwife said, “Do not trust it too much, John. Be more sparing in your use of wit, and use it only now and then. A wit is a dangerous thing to have in this age; do not overbuy it.”

Mr. John Littlewit would pay for his wit by getting in trouble; he needed to be careful not to overpay for his wit, or to buy too much wit.

“Do you think so, gentlemen?” Mr. John Littlewit said. “I’ll take heed and be careful hereafter.”

“Yes, do, John,” Mrs. Win Littlewit said.

Bartholomew Cokes said, “She is a pretty little soul, this Mrs. Win Littlewit. I wish that I could marry her!”

Miss Grace Wellborn said to herself, “I also wish you could marry her, or anybody else, as long as I wouldn’t have to marry you!”

Bartholomew Cokes said, “Numps, I will see it, Numps. It is decreed, so don’t be melancholy about the matter.”

Humphrey Wasp said, “Why, see it, sir, see it, do, see it. Who is stopping you? Why don’t you go and see it? By God’s eyelid, see it.”

“The fair, Numps. The fair is what I want to see,” Bartholomew Cokes said.

Humphrey Wasp said, “I wish the fair, and all the drums and rattles in it, were in your belly, as far as I’m concerned! They are already in your brain. He who had the means to travel in your head now would see finer sights than any that are in the fair, and he would make a finer voyage of it. He would see your head all hung with cockle shells, pebbles, fine wheat straws, and here and there a chicken's feather, and a cobweb."

Yes, Bartholomew Cokes' head was filled with trivial things, including cobwebs.

Quarlous said quietly to Mr. Winwife, "Indeed, Bartholomew Cokes looks, I think, if you look closely at him, like someone who was made to catch flies, with his Sir-Cranion legs."

A cranion is a long-legged spider. Apparently, Sir-Cranion legs are very long legs, indeed. Cranion is Greek for "skull," and so apparently Bartholomew Cokes also had bony knees.

Mr. Winwife said quietly to Quarlous, "And his Numps was made to flap the flies away."

Humphrey Wasp said to Bartholomew Cokes, "May God be with you, sir, there's your bee in a box, and much good may it do you."

"May God be with you" meant "goodbye."

Humphrey Wasp handed Bartholomew Cokes the box containing the bee, aka trouble: the marriage license.

Bartholomew Cokes replied, "Why, 'Your friend,' and 'Bartholomew,' if you be so contumacious."

"'Your friend,' and 'Bartholomew'" was another way of saying "goodbye." It was a complimentary close of a letter.

The word "contumacious" means "willfully disobedient to an authority figure."

Quarlous asked, "What do you mean, Numps?"

He took Humphrey Wasp aside as Numps was going out. He wanted to know why Humphrey Wasp was going to let Bartholomew Cokes go to the fair without him.

Humphrey Wasp said, "I'll not be guilty, I, gentlemen."

Mrs. Overdo asked her brother, "You will not let him go, brother, and lose him?"

Bartholomew Cokes replied, "Who can hold back someone who is determined to go away? I had rather lose him than the fair, indeed."

Humphrey Wasp said, "You do not know the inconvenience, gentlemen, you are trying to persuade me to endure, nor what trouble I have with him when he is in this kind of mood. If he goes to the fair, he will buy everything up to and including a doll there, and he will buy household things for the doll, too. If a leg or an arm did not grow on him, he would lose it in the press of the crowd.

"Pray to Heaven that I bring him away from the fair with one stone! And then he is such a ravener after fruit! — you will not believe what a fuss I had the other day to compound, aka settle, a business between a Catherine-pear woman and him about snatching. It is intolerable, gentlemen."

Much of what he said had a bawdy meaning. "Stone" can mean "testicle." "Ravener after fruit" can mean "being hungry for doing the deed that can lead to the birth of a child." "Compound" can mean "beget." "Business" can mean the "act of sex." "Pear" can mean "vulva," or "penis and scrotum." "Snatching" can mean "shoplifting" or "fast f**king."

Mr. Winwife said, "Oh, but you must not leave him now to these hazards, Numps."

Humphrey Wasp replied, “No, he knows too well I will not leave him, and that makes him presume.”

He then said to Bartholomew Cokes, “Well, sir, will you go now? If you have such an itch in your feet to foot it to the fair, why do you stop — am I one of your tarriers? Am I stopping you? Go, will you go, sir? Why do you not go?”

Bartholomew Cokes said, “Oh, Numps, have I brought you round to my point of view? Come, Miss Grace, and sister, I am resolute Bat, indeed, still.”

Nicknames for Bartholomew include Bat.

Miss Grace Wellborn said, “Truly, I have no such desire as to go to the fair, nor any ambition to see it. No one who goes there is of any quality or fashion.”

By “quality,” she meant “high birth,” and by “fashion,” she meant “good breeding.”

Bartholomew Cokes said, “Oh, Lord, sir! You shall pardon me, Miss Grace, we ourselves are enough to make it a fashion, and as for qualities, leave it to Numps alone — he’ll find qualities.”

By “fashion,” he meant “trend,” and by “qualities,” he meant “aspects of character.”

Bartholomew Cokes, Humphrey Wasp, Mrs. Overdo, and Miss Grace Wellborn exited to go to Bartholomew Fair.

Quarlous said, “What a rogue in comprehension is this man who understands her language no better than that!”

Mr. Winwife said, “Yes, and he wants to marry her! Well, I will leave the chase of my widow for today, and go directly to the fair. These flies cannot, this hot season, but engender us excellent creeping entertainment.”

The flies were Humphrey Wasp and Bartholomew Cokes. In this society, flies were thought to generate spontaneously in hot weather without the need of such things as parents and eggs. These two particular “flies” would engender — create — entertainment for whoever would follow them and observe them.

“Any man who has even a spoonful of brain would agree with you,” Quarlous said.

He then said to Mr. John Littlewit, “Farewell, John.”

Quarlous and Mr. Winwife exited to go to Bartholomew Fair.

Alone with his wife, Mr. John Littlewit said, “Win, you see it is in fashion to go to the fair, Win; we must go to the fair, too, you and I, Win. I have an affair in the fair, Win, a puppet-play of my own creation — say nothing! — that I wrote for the puppet-show man, which you must see, Win.”

Mrs. Win Littlewit said, “I wish I could, John, but my mother will never consent to such a profane puppet-play and proposal, as she will call it.”

Mr. John Littlewit said, “Tut, we’ll have a device, a plot, a dainty one, to get you there. Now, Wit, help at a pinch, good Wit, come, come, good Wit, if it be thy will!

“I have it, Win, I have it indeed, and it is a fine plot. Win, fake a craving to eat the meat of a suckling pig, sweet Win, in the fair, do you see, in the heart of the fair, not at Pie Corner.”

Pie Corner, with its many food shops, was located near Bartholomew Fair, which was known for its suckling pig.

He continued, “Your mother will do anything, Win, to satisfy your craving for food, you know, because you are pregnant. Please fake a craving for suckling-pig meat immediately, and be sick all of a sudden, good Win. I'll go in and tell her; cut thy laces in the meantime, and play the hypocrite, sweet Win."

Women at this time wore bodices with laces. When the woman was faint, the laces would be loosened or untied to enable her to breathe more easily.

Mrs. Win Littlewit said, "No, I'll not make myself unready — undressed — for the fair. I can be hypocrite enough even though I were never so strait-laced."

She was punning. "Strait-laced" could refer to a bodice with tightly fastened laces, or to a person with strict morality.

The word "hypocrite" is interesting. It can mean "actor," as in a theatrical actor. A hypocrite pretends to be someone else. It can also refer to someone who only pretends to be morally strict.

Mr. John Littlewit said, "You say the truth, you have been bred in the family, and brought up to it. Your mother — mt mother-in-law — is a most elect hypocrite, and she has maintained us all these seven years with it, like gentlefolks."

In other words, Win was brought up in her family to be a hypocrite. That is a good thing for theatrical families, but maybe not so good for religious families.

The "elect" are those people who have been predestined to go to Heaven after they die. Some of the "elect" can be so sure that they will go to Heaven after they die that they feel they have no need to avoid committing sins in this life.

Mrs. Win Littlewit said, "Yes, she has supported us well, so let her alone, John. She is not a wise willful widow for nothing; nor is she a sanctified sister for a song."

The word "willful" means "obstinately determined to do what one wants to do."

She added, “And let me alone, too. I have somewhat of the mother in me, as you shall see.”

She was punning again. “I have somewhat of the mother in me” meant both 1) She had some of her mother in her; that is, in some ways, she took after her mother, and 2) She had some of the mother, which was a medical condition also known as hysteria. It was called the “mother” because it was believed to originate in the womb.

She then said, “Fetch her, fetch my mother.”

Her husband exited to get Dame Purecraft.

She then moaned and pretended to faint.

— 1.6 —

Her husband returned with her mother.

Dame Purecraft said, “Now may the blaze of the beauteous discipline frighten away this evil from our house!”

The “beauteous discipline” was Puritanism.

She then said, “How are you, Win-the-fight, child? How are you? Sweet child, speak to me!”

Mrs. Win Littlewit said, “Yes, indeed.”

Dame Purecraft said, “Look up, sweet Win-the-fight, and do not allow the enemy to enter you at this door.”

The “door” was the craving to eat the meat of a suckling pig, but there was a suggestion of the enemy entering her vagina. Witches sometimes testified at trials that an incubus or demon had seduced them.

She continued, “Remember that your education has been with the purest. Which polluted one was it that mentioned first the unclean beast to you, child?”

The unclean beast was the pig. The Puritans took the Old Testament seriously.

Leviticus 5:2 states, “Or if a soul touch any unclean thing, whether it be a carcase of an unclean beast, or a carcase of unclean cattle, or the carcase of unclean creeping things, and if it be hidden from him; he also shall be unclean, and guilty” (King James Version).

Deuteronomy 14:8 states, “And the swine, because it divideth the hoof, yet cheweth not the cud, it is unclean unto you: ye shall not eat of their flesh, nor touch their dead carcase” (King James Version).

Mrs. Win Littlewit moaned.

Mr. John Littlewit said, “I didn’t mention the unclean beast to her, not I, I swear on my sincerity, mother-in-law! She craved pig meat for over three hours before she would let me know it.”

He then asked, “Who was it, Win?”

She replied, “A profane black thing with a beard, John.”

This was a description of an incubus or a demon.

Dame Purecraft said, “Oh, resist it, Win-the-fight, it is the tempter, the wicked tempter, you may know it by the fleshly desire for pig; be strong against it, and its foul temptations, in these assaults, whereby it pierces flesh and blood, as it were on the weaker side. Pray against its carnal provocations. Good child, sweet child, pray.”

Mr. John Littlewit said, “Good mother-in-law, I beg you to allow her to eat some pig, and her bellyful, too. Do not cast away your own child, and perhaps one of mine, with your tale of the tempter.”

His wording was ambiguous: “perhaps one [a child] of mine” made it sound as if he were not the man responsible for his wife’s pregnancy. Possibly, he meant that his wife’s pregnancy was so far advanced that even if she died there was a chance the baby would live.

He then asked, “How do you do, Win? Are you very sick?”

“Yes, a great deal, John,” Mrs. Win Littlewit replied, and she moaned.

Dame Purecraft said, “What shall we do? Call our zealous brother Zeal-of-the-land Busy. He will be a faithful fortification against this charge of the adversary.”

“Brother” meant “brother in Christ,” not biological or legal brother.

Mr. John Littlewit exited to get Zeal-of-the-land Busy.

Dame Purecraft said, “Child, my dear child, you shall eat pig. Be comforted, my sweet child.”

“Yes, but in the fair, mother,” Mrs. Win Littlewit said.

Dame Purecraft said, “Yes, I mean in the fair, if it can be in any way made or found lawful.”

A religious person — such as Zeal-of-the-land Busy — was needed to make a ruling that the Puritan religion permitted Win to go to Bartholomew Fair and eat suckling pig.

Mr. John Littlewit returned.

Dame Purecraft asked, “Where is our brother Busy? Won’t he come?”

She then said to her daughter, “Look up, child.”

Mr. John Littlewit said, “He will come right away, mother-in-law, as soon as he has cleaned his beard. I found him fastened by the teeth to the cold turkey-pie in the cupboard, with a great white loaf of bread on his left, and a glass of malmsey wine on his right.”

Dame Purecraft said, “Don’t slander the brethren, wicked one.”

Mr. John Littlewit replied, “Here he is now, purified, mother-in-law.”

“Purified” meant “cleansed of sin” and “with his beard wiped.”

Zeal-of-the-land Busy entered the room.

Dame Purecraft said, “Oh, brother Busy! Your help is needed here to edify and raise us up in a scruple of conscience. My daughter, Win-the-fight, has been visited with a natural disease of women, called a longing to eat pig.”

“Yes, sir, a Bartholomew pig,” Mr. John Littlewit said, “and at Bartholomew Fair.”

Dame Purecraft said, “And I would be satisfied from you, religiously wise, whether a widow of the sanctified assembly, or a widow’s daughter, may commit the act of eating pig without offence to the weaker sisters.”

Jewish Rabbis would allow such things as eating during fast days if it were necessary to save the person’s life.

Someone could argue that if a pregnant woman — Mrs. Win Littlewit — had a craving for a certain food, it might be because that food had nutrients that the baby she was carrying needed and that therefore the pregnant woman ought to be allowed to eat that food. That reasoning applied to pregnant women, but Dame Purecraft was not pregnant. She just wanted to eat the meat of a suckling pig and so she wanted a ruling that it was OK for her, as well as her daughter, to eat pig.

Zeal-of-the-land Busy said, “Verily, for the disease of longing, it is a disease, a carnal disease, or appetite, incident to women; and as it is carnal and incident, it is natural, very natural. Now pig, it is a meat, and a meat that is nourishing and may be longed for, and so consequently eaten; it may be eaten; it may be very exceedingly well eaten. But in the fair, and as a Bartholomew pig, it cannot be eaten, for the very calling it a Bartholomew pig, and to eat it so, is a kind of idolatry, and you make the fair no better than one of the high places. This, I take it, is the state of the question: a high place.”

Zeal-of-the-land Busy believed that calling a roasted suckling pig a Bartholomew pig was idolatrous because Bartholomew was the name of a Catholic saint.

The Bible refers to high places that were the locations of idolatry. For example, Leviticus 26:30 states, “And I will destroy your high places, and cut down your images, and cast your carcasses upon the carcasses of your idols, and my soul shall abhor you” (King James Version).

“Yes, but in state of necessity,” Mr. John Littlewit said, “place should give place, Mr. Zeal-of-the-land Busy.”

He was punning on “place,” which can mean 1) a physical location, and 2) social standing.

He thought, I can still make a pun.

Dame Purecraft said, “Good brother Zeal-of-the-land, think to make it as lawful as you can.”

“Yes, do that, sir,” Mr. John Littlewit said, “and as soon as you can, for the eating of pig must be permitted, sir — you see the danger my little wife is in, sir.”

Dame Purecraft said, “Truly, I do love my child dearly, and I would not have her miscarry, or hazard her first-fruits, if it might be otherwise.”

The “first-fruits” were the firstborn children.

Zeal-of-the-land Busy said, “Surely, it may be otherwise, but it is subject to construction, subject, and has a face — an appearance — of offence with the weak, a great face, a foul face; but that face may have a veil put over it, and be shadowed as it were; it may be eaten, and in the fair, I take it, in a booth, the tents of the wicked: the place is not much, not very much, we may be religious in the midst of the profane, so long as the pig is eaten with a reformed mouth, with sobriety and humbleness, and not gorged in with gluttony or greediness — there’s the danger: For, should she go there, as taking pride in the place, or delight in the unclean dressing, to feed the vanity of the eye, or lust of the palate, it were not well, it were not fit, it were abominable, and not good.”

The Bible may say not to eat swine because it is an unclean animal, but according to Zeal-of-the-land Busy, swine can be eaten with a “reformed” mouth — that is, a Puritan mouth. In other words, he wanted to eat the meat of a suckling pig.

Mr. John Littlewit said, “I knew that before, and I told Win that — but take courage, Win, we’ll be humble enough, we’ll seek out the homeliest booth in the fair, that’s for certain; rather than fail to eat pig, we’ll eat it on the ground.”

Dame Purecraft said, “Yes, and I’ll go with you myself, Win-the-fight, and my brother Zeal-of-the-land shall go with us, too, for our better consolation.”

This was good consolation for Zeal-of-the-land Busy because he wanted to eat pig.

Mrs. Win Littlewit moaned.

Mr. John Littlewit said, “Yes, and Solomon shall go, too, Win — the more the merrier.”

He whispered to her, “Win, we’ll leave Rabbi Busy in a booth.”

He then said loudly, “Solomon! Bring me my cloak.”

Solomon entered the room, carrying Mr. John Littlewit’s cloak.

“Here it is, sir,” Solomon said.

Zeal-of-the-land Busy said, “In the way of comfort to the weak, I will go and eat. I will eat exceedingly, and prophesy; there may be a good use made of eating pig, too, now I think about it. By the public eating of swine’s flesh, I will profess the Puritans’ hatred and loathing of Judaism, whereof the brethren stand accused of favoring too much. I will therefore eat, yes, I will eat exceedingly.”

Casuistry is reasoning applied to solving religious and ethical problems. It can be done either well or badly. When done badly, it can be used to justify incorrect decisions and be used as a basis to do what one wants to do rather than what one ought to do.

Zeal-of-the-land Busy was saying that he would go to the fair and pig out on pig as a way to provide comfort to the weak and as a way to show that Puritans such as himself were not overly sympathetic to the Jews although both religious groups took the Old Testament seriously.

Mr. John Littlewit said, “Good, indeed, I will eat heartily, too, because I will be no Jew. I could never abide that stiff-necked generation that rejects Jesus as the Christ, and truly, I hope my little one will be like me, my little one who cries for pig so in the mother’s belly.”

“That is very likely, exceeding likely, very exceeding likely,” Zeal-of-the-land Busy said.

ACT 2 (Bartholomew Fair)

— 2.1 —

At Bartholomew Fair, a number of booths were set up. Lantern Leatherhead, Joan Trash, and others were sitting by the wares they had for sale. Lantern Leatherhead sold toys such as hobbyhorses, and Joan Trash sold gingerbread.

Justice Adam Overdo, disguised as mad Arthur of Bradley, talked to himself. He was dressed like a Fool, aka professional jester.

He said, “Well, in justice’s name, and King James I’s, and for the commonwealth, aka public welfare, defy all the world, Adam Overdo, to see you in this disguise, and to see you through your fictional backstory, for you have furnished yourself with an excellent disguise, I swear.

“I would like to meet a Linceus now, that eagle’s eye, that piercing Epidaurian serpent (as my Quintus Horace calls him) who could discover a Justice of the Peace (and lately of the quorum) under this covering.”

Linceus was one of the Argonauts of Jason and the Argonauts fame. He was reputed to have such excellent eyesight that he could see what lay beneath grass. The serpents of Aesculapius, the god of medicine who was worshipped at Epidaurus, also had excellent eyesight.

Horace had criticized in a satire those who search for the faults of their friends with eyesight like that of an Epidaurian serpent; of course, such people are not so vigilant when searching for their own faults.

This is C. Smart’s 1863 translation of the passage: “When you look over your own vices, winking at them, as it were, with sore eyes; why are you with regard to those of your friends as sharp-sighted as an eagle, or the Epidaurian serpent?”

Adam Overdo was a Justice of the Peace, and he had recently been one of those experienced justices who were needed to make up a quorum.

Justice Overdo continued, “They may have seen many a Fool in the clothing of a justice; but never until now, a justice in the clothing of a Fool. Thus must we do, though, who stay awake and are on guard for the public good; and thus has the wise magistrate done in all ages.

“There is a doing of right out of wrong, if the way be found. Never shall I enough commend a worthy worshipful man who was once a leading member of this city, London, for his high wisdom in this point, who would wear now the distinctive clothing of a porter, now of a cartman, now of the dog-killer in this month of August, and in the winter the distinctive clothing of a seller of tinderboxes.”

Dogs were killed during times of plague because people thought animals carried the plague. Many dogs were killed during the dog days — the hot days following the rise of the star Sirius, aka the Dog Star, in Europe — of August. Traditionally, August was associated with the spread of rabies.

Justice Overdo continued, “And what would he do in all these shapes? Indeed, go into every alehouse, and down into every cellar; measure the length of sausages; calculate the volume of black pots and cans, yes, and of custards, with a measuring stick; and measure their circumference with a thread; weigh the loaves of bread on his middle finger.”

One of the most common offenses at Bartholomew Fair was selling underweight foodstuffs. Many verses of the Old Testament are very much concerned with giving proper weights. Not giving proper weight is a form of stealing.

Justice Overdo continued, “And if he found that the foodstuffs were underweight, then he would directly collect them and give the sausages to the poor, the bread to the hungry, the custards to his children, and he would break the pots and burn the cans himself. He would not trust his corrupt officers; instead, he would do it himself.

“I wish that all men in authority would follow this worthy precedent! For unfortunately, as we are public persons, what do we know? Indeed, what can we know? We hear with other men’s ears, and we see with other men’s eyes. A foolish constable or a sleepy watchman is the source of all our information. If he slanders a gentleman by the authority of his place, as he calls his office, then we, by the vice of ours, must believe him.

“Just a while ago, they made me — yes, me! — incorrectly take an honest zealous pursuivant, aka an officer with the power to search and to make arrests, to be a seminary, aka a Catholic priest who was educated in a seminary abroad. A constable, because of his position, can feel that he is able to slander a person of high position. And they made me incorrectly take a proper young bachelor of music to be a bawd — a pimp!

“We who have a high place in society are subject to this. All of our information is worthless, and most of those who provide information to us are knaves; and, by your leave, we ourselves are thought to be little better than, if not complete, fools for believing them.

“I, Adam Overdo, am resolved therefore not to pay money to informers hereafter, and instead to make my own discoveries. Many are the yearly enormities of this fair, in whose Pie-Powders Courts I have had the honor, during the three days, sometimes to sit as judge.”

“Enormities” was his word for “crimes.”

When people are assembled in large numbers, almost certainly some of those people are going to break the law. The Pie-Powders Court assembled at Bartholomew Fair in order to quickly judge those accused of offenses. The name was a corruption of the French pied-poudreux, which means “dusty feet.” Many people walked long distances to get to the fair.

Justice Overdo continued, “But this is the special day for detection of those foresaid enormities. Here is my black book for the purpose; this is the cloud that hides me; under this covert disguise I shall see and not be seen.”

He intended to write the names of offenders in his black book. In ancient epics, a god or goddess would hide a hero in a cloud so that other people would not notice him.

Justice Overdo continued, “On, Junius Brutus. And as I began, so I’ll end: in justice’s name, and the King’s, and for the commonwealth!”

Lucius Junius Brutus pretended to be a fool in order to deceive Lucius Tarquinius Superbus, the last of the Roman Kings. He was able to banish King Lucius Tarquinius Superbus, thereby establishing the Roman Republic. He then became a judge and acquired a reputation for being a very strict judge after sentencing his own sons to death when they were discovered plotting to reestablish Tarquinius as King.

Justice Overdo went close to the booths and stood near enough to eavesdrop on Lantern Leatherhead and Joan Trash.

— 2.2 —

Lantern Leatherhead complained to Joan Trash, “The fair’s as dead as if the plague were abroad, I think. People are not coming abroad to the fair today, whatever the matter is.

“Do you hear me, sister Trash, lady of the basket? Sit farther away with your gingerbread progeny there, and don’t block the sightline of my shop, or I’ll have it proclaimed in the fair what ingredients your gingerbread men are made of.”

The gingerbread progeny consisted of gingerbread men.

Joan Trash said, “Why, what ingredients they are made of, brother Leatherhead? Nothing but what’s wholesome, I assure you.”

The word “brother” can mean simply “male fellow human being,” as it does here.

Lantern Leatherhead said, “Yes, stale bread, rotten eggs, musty ginger, and dead honey, you know.”

Honey has so much sugar that it won’t go bad, but it can crystalize, although that is not necessarily bad.

Justice Overdo wrote in his black book while saying quietly to himself, “Have I met with enormity so soon?”

“I shall mar your market, old Joan,” Lantern Leatherhead said.

Joan Trash said, “Mar my market, thou too-proud peddler! Do thy worst, I defy thee, I, and thy stable of hobbyhorses. I pay for my ground as well as thou do. If thou wrong me, for all thou are parcel-poet and an engineer, I’ll find a friend who shall right me, and make a ballad about thee, and thy cattle all over.”

Lantern Leatherhead was aggressive, but he had been using the respectful pronouns “you” and “your”; still, he had gotten Joan Trash angry, and she was using the pronouns “thou” and “thy” and “thee” when referring to him. A person of higher class would use these pronouns when talking to a person of lower class. Friends, however, could use the pronouns “thou” and “thy” and “thee” when talking to each other.

The word “cattle” referred to the hobbyhorses.

She called Lantern Leatherhead a parcel-poet, aka a part-poet, and an engineer, aka an inventor or devisor. In addition to selling toys, he did such things as devise puppet-plays.

The two had to pay money to rent land on which to place their booths.

One way to get revenge on someone was to write a scurrilous ballad about that person.

She added, “Are you puffed up with the pride of your wares? Your arsedine?”

Arsedine was imitation gold leaf used to decorate toys.

Lantern Leatherhead said, “Ha, old Joan, I’ll talk with you soon, and humble you and take you down, too, before Justice Overdo: He is the man who must charm — subdue — you. I’ll have you in the Pie-Powders Court.”

Joan Trash said, “Charm me! I’ll meet thee face to face, before his worship, when thou dare, and although I am a little crooked in my body, I shall be found as upright in my business dealings as any woman in Smithfield, I will — charm me!”

Justice Overdo said quietly to himself, “I am glad to hear my name is their terror yet; this is the doing of justice.”

A number of fairgoers showed up and walked by them.

Lantern Leatherhead shouted, “What do you lack? What is it you are buying? What do you lack? Rattles, drums, toy halberds, toy horses, the best dolls, the finest fiddles!”

A halberd is a weapon: a spear combined with a battleax.

Costardmonger, followed by Nightingale, arrived. Costardmonger sold fruit, and Nightingale sold and sang ballads.

Costardmonger shouted, “Buy pears, pears, fine, very fine pears!”

Joan Trash shouted, “Buy gingerbread, gilt gingerbread!”

Gingerbread was decorated with fake gold gilt made with copper and zinc.

Nightingale shouted, “Hey,” to draw attention to himself.

Then he sang this song:

“Now the fair’s a filling!

“Oh, for a tune to startle

“The birds o’ the booths here billing [courting],

“Yearly with old Saint Bartle [Bartholomew]!

“The drunkards they are wading [staggering, half seas over — aka half-drunk],

“The punks [prostitutes] and chapmen [merchants] trading;

“Who’d see the fair without his lading [without buying something]?”

“Buy any ballads, new ballads?”

Ursla the pig-woman came out from her booth. She was one of those who served pig at the fair.

“Damn it,” she said. “Who would wear out their youth and prime like this, in the roasting of pigs, who had any cooler vocation? Hell’s a kind of cold cellar to this, a very fine cool vault, I swear on my conscience!”

She shouted, “Mooncalf!”

A mooncalf is a born fool or a person with a deformed body. Mooncalf was also the name of her employee.

Mooncalf said, "Here I am, boss."

Nightingale asked, "How are you now, Ursla? In a heat, in a heat? In a temper?"

Ursla said to Mooncalf, "Bring me my chair, you false faucet, you; and my morning's draught, quickly, a bottle of ale, to quench me, rascal."

A faucet is used to drain beer from a barrel, but Ursla was using the word to refer to Mooncalf, who served her as a bartender and server.

She then said, "I am all fire and fat, Nightingale. I shall quite melt away to the first woman, and be only a rib again, I am afraid. I water the ground in knots, as I go, like a large garden watering pot; you may follow me by the S's I make."

"Knots" are intricate designs. When she talked about watering the ground, she could have meant with her sweat or with her urine.

Nightingale said, "That's a pity, good Urse!"

He then asked, "Was Ezekiel here this morning?"

"Ezekiel?" Ursla asked. "Who's Ezekiel?"

"Ezekiel Edgworth, the civil cutpurse, you know him well enough," Nightingale said. "He is the one who always talks bawdy to you. I call him my secretary, aka keeper of secrets."

A civil cutpurse is a well-dressed, seemingly gentlemanly pickpocket.

"He promised to be here this morning, I remember," Ursla said.

Nightingale said, “When he comes, ask him to stay here. I’ll be back again quickly.”

“Best take your morning’s dew and due in your belly, Nightingale,” Ursla said.

By “morning’s dew and due,” she meant the first drink of the day.

Mooncalf came back with a chair and a bottle of ale for Ursla.

“Come, sir, set it here,” Ursla said. “Didn’t I say you should get a chair let out on the sides for me so that my hips might have room to move? You’ll never think of anything until your boss — me — has a chafed rump. You think this is a good chair, changeling, because it can accommodate your skinny grasshopper’s thighs — you care for nothing more than your own comfort.”

A “changeling” is an ugly or foolish fairy baby the fairies have left in exchange for an attractive human baby.

Ursla continued, “Now, you look as if you had been in the corner of the booth, burning the fleas in your breeches with a candle’s end, and accidentally set fire to the fair.”

In other words, perhaps, he looked as if he had set his fart on fire and thereby accidentally set the fair on fire.

She continued, “Fill my glass, Stote, fill it.”

“Stote” is an obsolete form of “stoat,” the name of an animal of the weasel family. It is thin.

Mooncalf poured her some ale, which she drank.

The disguised Justice Overdo wrote and said quietly to himself, “I know this pig-woman, and I will put her name in my black book, for my second enormity. She has been before me, punk, pinnacle, and bawd, any time these two and twenty years upon record in the Pie-Powders.”

Ursla was an enormity because of both her great size and her criminality. A “punk” is a prostitute, and a “pinnacle” is a go-between — the pinnacle goes between the prostitute and the customer.

Ursla ordered Mooncalf, “Fill my glass again, you unlucky vermin!”

Mooncalf said, “Please don’t be angry, mistress. I’ll have the chair widened soon.”

Ursla said, “No, no, I shall steadily dwindle in weight until I fit in the chair. That will happen before the fair is over, as you may think, now you have heated me with anger. I am a poor vexed thing. I feel myself dropping in weight already as fast as I can; two stones of suet a day is my estimate of what I am losing.”

A “stone” is a measure of weight: fourteen pounds. “Suet” is fat.

She continued, “I can hold life and soul together only with this.”

She lifted her glass and said, “Here’s to you, Nightingale.”

She drank and then continued, “And with a whiff of tobacco at most. Where’s my tobacco pipe now? Not filled!”

She said to Mooncalf, “You arrant incubee.”

An “incubee” is the child of a woman and the night-demon known as the incubus.

Nightingale said, “Careful, Ursla, or you’ll chafe between the tongue and the teeth with fretting, now.”

Ursla complained about Mooncalf, “How can I hope that he’ll ever discharge his place of trust as a tapster, a man of reckoning under me, who remembers nothing I say to him?”

A “man of reckoning” is 1) “a VIP,” or 2) “a man who reckons.” Mooncalf reckoned up the bills of people at Ursla’s booth.

“Under me” meant “my employee,” but it could also mean “under me sexually.”

Nightingale exited.

Ursla said to Mooncalf, “But look to it, sirrah. It is best for you to look after doing your job right.”

She then thought out loud about money, “Three-pence a pipe-full, I will have made, of all my whole half-pound of tobacco, and a quarter of a pound of the weed known as colt’s-foot mixed with it, too, to adulterate and eke it out. I, who have dealt so long in the fire, will not be at a loss in smoke, now.

“Then six and twenty shillings a barrel I will raise from my beer, and fifty shillings a hundred on my bottle-ale.”

This was more than a barrel of beer was normally worth, but she had tricks to use to get more money from her beer and to sell more beer.

She continued talking to Mooncalf, ‘I have told you the ways how to raise the amount of money we get for our alcohol. Froth your mugs well in the filling, at length, rogue.’”

By holding the beer mugs well below the faucet while filling them, she and Mooncalf would be selling more froth and less beer.

She added, “And jog your bottles on the buttocks, sirrah.”

Hitting the bottles of ale on the buttocks would cause the ale to froth up. Some would be spilled, causing the drinker to buy more and thus increase Ursla's profits.

She continued, "Then always pour out the first glass, and drink with all companies, although you will be sure to be drunk; you'll misreckon the better, and be less ashamed of it."

Pouring out the first drink for a customer was good service and a chance to get friendly with the customer so the bartender could drink with him. When bills were misreckoned, they were always misreckoned in Ursla's favor and never in the customer's.

She continued, "But your true trick, rascal, must be, to be always busy, and mis-take away the bottles and mugs, in haste, before they are half drunk off, and never hear any body call (if they should chance to see you) until you have brought fresh drinks, and be able to forswear them. Give me a drink of ale."

Justice Overdo said quietly while writing, "This is the very womb and bed of enormity! It is as gross as she herself is! This must all be written down for enormity, all of it, every whit of it."

He then knocked on her booth.

Ursla said, "Look who's there, sirrah. Five shillings a pig is my price, at least. If it is a sow pig, sixpence more. If the customer is a great-bellied, pregnant wife, and she longs for it, then sixpence more for that."

Justice Overdo said to himself, "Oh, tempora! Oh, mores!"

He was quoting Cicero's First Oration Against Catiline. The Latin meant, "Oh, the times! Oh, the customs!" Cicero was saying that the age and society that would produce a rebel such as Catiline was bad.

Justice Overdo then said to himself, "I would not have lost my discovery of this one grievance, for my honorable position on the judicial bench. How the poor customer is abused here! Well, I will fall in with her, and with her Mooncalf, and seek out wonders of enormity."

He came forward so that Ursula could see him and said, "I walk in here by your leave, goodly woman, and the fatness of the fair, as oily as the King's constable's lamp, and as shining as his shoeing-horn!"

Horn, when sliced thinly, is transparent and is used in lanterns. Because of this, horn became associated with brightness, and proverbially a drunkard's nose was as bright as a shoeing-horn.

The disguised Justice Overdo asked, "Does your ale have virtue, or your beer strength, so that the tongue of man may be tickled, and his palate pleased in the morning? Let your pretty nephew here go search and see."

The pretty nephew was Mooncalf. At the time, "pretty" meant "clever" as well as its usual meaning.

Ursula and Mooncalf were not necessarily biologically related.

"What new roarer — roisterer — is this?" Ursula asked.

Mooncalf said, "Oh, Lord! Don't you know him, boss? He is mad Arthur of Bradley, who makes orations."

He then said, "Excellent mister, old Arthur of Bradley, how are you? Welcome to the fair! When shall we hear you again talk about your concerns with your back against a booth, hmm? I have been one of your little disciples, in my days. I have heard your orations before."

The disguised Justice Overdo said, “Let me drink, boy, with my love, your aunt, here, so that I may be eloquent. But let me drink of your best, lest it be bitter in my mouth, and my words fall foul on people attending the fair.”

Ursla asked Mooncalf, “Why don’t you fetch him something to drink, and ask him to sit?”

“Is it ale or beer you want, Mr. Arthur?” Mooncalf asked.

The disguised Justice Overdo said, “I want your best, pretty stripling, your best. I want the same that your turtledove drinks and that you pour on religious holy days.”

Ursla said, “Bring him a sixpenny bottle of ale. They say that a Fool’s handsel is lucky.”

A “handsel” is the first money taken in for the day.

The disguised Justice Overdo said, “Bring both, child.”

He sat down and said, “Ale for Arthur, and Beer for Bradley. And bring ale for your aunt, boy.”

Mooncalf exited.

The disguised Justice Overdo thought, My disguise is working to the full extent of my desires. I shall, by the benefit of this, discover enough, and more, evidence of wrongdoing, and yet get off with the reputation of what I am pretending to be: a certain middling thing in between a Fool and a madman.

— 2.3 —

Jordan Knockem arrived. He was a horse-courser who bought and sold horses.

He said to Ursla, “What! My little lean Ursla! My she-bear! Are you still alive with your litter of pigs to grunt out another Bartholomew Fair? Ha!”

Ursula is a feminine derivative from the Latin ursus, which means “bear.”

Jordan Knockem’s humor, like the humor of other Bartholomew Fair lowlifes, was low and vulgar. Pregnant women were said to grunt out a baby; here, he was saying that Ursula would grunt out another Bartholomew Fair. Grunting is also done in defecation.

Ursula said, “Yes, and to amble a foot, when the fair is done, to hear you groan out of a cart going up the heavy hill —”

A heavy hill is a sorrowful hill. Ursula was referring to Holborn Hill, which criminals would travel as they were taken from Newgate prison to Tyburn gallows to be hung.

Jordan Knockem said, “I suppose you mean Holborn, Ursula. For what, for what, pretty Urse, would I be hung?”

“For cutting halfpenny purses, or for stealing little pennyworth toy dogs out of the fair,” she replied.

A criminal could be hung for petty thief. At the time men carried what they called purses, although we would probably call them moneybags. They were bags of money tied to the person with a string. A cutpurse would cut the string and steal the purse and its contents.

Jordan Knockem said, “Oh! Say good words, not those words, Urse.”

Justice Overdo thought, Another special enormity. He is a cutpurse of the sword, the boot, and the feather! Those are his marks.

Gentlemen often wore a sword and boots, and they often wore a feather in their hat.

Mooncalf returned with the ale and beer.

Ursula said to Jordan Knockem, “Are you one of those horse-leeches who spread the rumor that I was dead, in Turnbull Street, of a surfeit of bottle-ale and tripes?”

A horse-leech is either a veterinarian or a bloodsucker.

Prostitutes populated Turnbull Street.

Jordan Knockem said, “No, it was better food, Urse. It was cow’s udders — cow’s udders!”

Ursula said, “Well, I shall get even with your mumbling mouth one day.”

Jordan Knockem said, “What! You’ll poison me with a newt in a bottle of ale, will you? Or with a spider in a tobacco-pipe, Urse? Come, there’s no malice in these fat folks. I shall never fear fat people like you, as long as I can escape your lean Mooncalf here. Let’s drink our quarrel away, good Urse, and no vapors!”

“Vapors” was a favorite word of his, and it meant basically whatever he wanted it to mean. Often, it referred to quarrels, and often it referred to a person’s mood, especially a bad mood (unless qualified by the adjective “good”).

Ursula exited. She had to keep an eye on the roasting meat.

The disguised Justice Overdo said quietly to Mooncalf so that Jordan Knockem could not hear him, “Did you hear that, boy?”

He gave Mooncalf some money and said, “There’s for your ale, and the remnant is a tip for you.”

He then said, “Speak in your faith as a faucet, aka a bartender, now. Is this goodly person before us here, this ‘vapors,’ a knight of the knife?”

Mooncalf asked, “What do you mean by that, Mr. Arthur?”

The disguised Justice Overdo replied, “I mean a child of the horn-thumb, a babe of booty, boy, a cutpurse.”

Cutpurses wore a thimble made of horn over their thumb so they would not cut themselves while cutting the string of a purse.

Mooncalf said, “Oh, Lord, sir! He is far from it. This is Mr. Daniel Knockem: Jordan the ranger of Turnbull. He is a horse-courser, sir.”

He ranged over Turnbull Street and bought and sold horses.

The disguised Justice Overdo said, “Your dainty dame, Ursla, though, called him a cutpurse.”

Mooncalf replied, “Likely enough, sir, she’ll say forty such things in an hour (if you listen to her and keep count) for her recreation, if the whim takes residence in the greasy kerchief she wears on her head. Such language makes her fat, you see; she battens and grows fat with it.”

The disguised Justice Overdo thought, Here I might have been deceived now and have put a fool’s blot upon myself, if I had not played an after-game of discretion!

An after-game is a second game played in an attempt to recover losses from the first game.

Ursla returned, dripping with sweat.

Jordan Knockem said, “Alas, poor Urse! This is an ill season for you.”

“Go and hang yourself, hackney-man!” Ursla said.

A hackney-man kept horses to rent out. Prostitutes were sometimes called hackneys because they were ridden, and so a hackney-man could be a pimp.

Jordan Knockem said, “What! What! Urse! Vapors? Has exertion bred vapors in you?”

Ursla said, “Vapors! Don’t tusk, nor twirl your dibble, good Jordan. Don’t sneer at me and show your fangs, nor twirl the end of your beard.”

The word “tusk” as a verb meant to beat the bushes to scare out game. By sneering at Ursla, Jordan Knockem was trying to bait her into a quarrel.

She continued, “I know what you’ll take to the drop.”

In other words, she knew what he was capable of to the smallest quantity.

She continued, “Although you are Captain of the roarers, and fight well at the case of piss-pots, you shall not frighten me with your lion-jaws, sir, nor your fangs. You think you are angry, but you are hungry. Come, a pig’s head will stop your mouth, and stay your hunger at all times.”

The roarers are roisterers, aka rowdies. A case of pistols is a pair of pistols, but Ursla punned on his name — a jordan is a chamber pot — by saying “case of piss-pots.”

Jordan Knockem replied, “You are such another mad, merry Urse, still! Truly I feel guilty for vexing you, now in the dog-days, in this hot weather, for fear of foundering you in the body, and melting down a pillar of the fair.”

As a dealer of horses, he frequently used the terms of his trade. A foundering horse was an ill horse.

He continued, “Please take your chair again, and keep state like a Queen on a throne, and let’s have a fresh bottle of ale, and a pipe of tobacco, and no vapors: I’ll have this belly of yours taken up, and your grass scoured, wench.”

A horse's belly could be taken up — reduced — through diet, including scouring — purging — its grass.

— 2.4 —

Ezekiel Edgworth, who was a gentleman-resembling cutpurse, walked toward them.

Jordan Knockem saw him and said, “Look, here's Ezekiel Edgworth; he is as fine a boy of his inches as any boy is in the fair! He always has money in his purse, and he will pay for everything with a kind heart and with good vapors.”

Ezekiel Edgworth was a young and small man, but a man who was willing to pick up the check. Of course, as a cutpurse, he paid the check with other people's money.

He said, “That I will indeed, willingly, Mr. Knockem.”

He then ordered, “Fetch some ale and tobacco.”

Mooncalf exited to fill the order.

Things were picking up at the fair. More customers were arriving.

Lantern Leatherhead shouted, “What do you lack, gentlemen? Maiden, look at this fine hobbyhorse for the young boy you look after; it will cost you only a token amount per week for his provender.”

This was a joke. Toy horses don't need provender, and of course, small boys don't eat much.

Nightingale, a singer and seller of ballads, came back. Arriving at the same time were Corncutter, a man who cut people's corns from their feet; and the mousetrap-man, who also sold tinderboxes.

Corncutter shouted, “Have you any corns on your feet and toes?”

The mousetrap-man shouted, “Buy a mousetrap, a mousetrap, or a trap for fleas?”

Joan Trash shouted, “Buy some gingerbread!”

Nightingale shouted, “Ballads, ballads! Fine new ballads!”

He then shouted, “Hear for your love, and buy for your money.”

In other words, “Hear ballads for your love, and buy ballads in exchange for your money.”

The ballads were here and could be heard — Nightingale sometimes sang the ballads he had for sale — and young gallants would, of course, want to buy ballads for the ladies they loved, and to do that took money.

Nightingale shouted, “I have a delicate ballad about the ferret and the coney.”

Literally, ferrets and coney are animals. A coney is a rabbit. In criminals’ language, however, a ferret is a criminal and a coney is a sucker, but many obscene ballads used “ferret” to mean “penis” and “coney” to mean “lady.” For example:

“I put it in again.

“It found her out at last.

“The coney then between her legs

“Held my ferret fast.”

Nightingale shouted, “I have ‘A Preservative Against the Punk’s Evil.’”

A punk is a prostitute, and the punk’s evil is venereal disease. “A Preservative Against the Punk’s Evil” is a strange name for a song. Perhaps Nightingale meant that his ballads were a preservative against the punk's evil. Singing instead of f**king is a way to avoid the punk's evil.

He added, "Another ballad is about goose-green starch and the Devil."

In this song, a vain woman was dissatisfied with the way her ruffs were starched and she vowed to go to the Devil before she wore one of those ruffs again. The Devil appeared to her in the guise of a handsome young man and starched her ruffs to perfection. She wore one of the ruffs, and he strangled her.

"Goose-green" is often called "goose-turd-green." It is a yellowish-green color.

Nightingale shouted more titles:

"A Dozen of Divine Points.'

"The Godly Garters."

"A Dozen of Divine Points" is a song containing twelve moral maxims.

"The Godly Garters" is a song about garters that religiously inclined young men could wear to keep their socks from falling down. Some items of clothing such as vestments are thought to be godly, so why not garters?

Nightingale shouted, "The fairing of good counsel, of an ell and three-quarters."

Possibly, this was the title of a song: "The Fairing of Good Counsel." A fairing is a gift bought at a fair.

Some of Nightingale's ballads were moral in nature and contained good counsel, and the paper on which they were printed was long. An ell is forty-five inches.

Nightingale shouted, "What is it you want to buy?"

“‘The Windmill Blown Down by the Witch’s Fart’?

“Or ‘Saint George, Who — Oh! — did Break the Dragon’s Heart’?”

One way to break a dragon’s heart is to pull it out of the dragon’s body, as St. George did in one song.

Mooncalf returned with ale and tobacco.

Ezekiel Edgworth said, “Mr. Nightingale, come here, leave your selling for a little while.”

Nightingale went over to him and said, “Oh, my secretary — my keeper of secrets! What does my secretary want to say to me?”

They began to talk quietly.

The disguised Justice Overdo asked, “Child of the bottles, who is he? Who is he?”

He pointed to Ezekiel Edgworth.

Mooncalf replied, “Mr. Arthur of Bradley, he is a civil young gentleman who keeps company with the roarers and always disburses money to all of them. He always has money in his purse; he pays for them, and they roar for him. One does good offices for the other. They call him the secretary, but he serves nobody. He is a great friend of the ballad-man’s; they are never asunder.”

The roarers assisted Ezekiel Edgworth. They created a distraction for him as he cut purses, and they served as bodyguards to him.

The disguised Justice Overdo said, “What a pity it is that so civil a young man should haunt this debauched company! Here’s the bane of the youth of our time apparent. He is a proper penman. I see it in his countenance that he has a good clerk’s look, and I warrant that he has a quick hand.”

The disguised Justice Overdo meant that Ezekiel Edgworth could write quickly.

Mooncalf said, "He has a very quick hand, sir."

He meant that Ezekiel Edgworth could cut purse strings quickly.

Mooncalf exited.

Ezekiel Edgworth, Nightingale, and Ursula were whispering together. Justice Overdo could not hear them.

Ezekiel Edgworth said, "All the purses, and purchase, aka profit and booty, I give you today by conveyance, bring here to Ursula's immediately. Here we will meet at night in her lodge, and share. Look that you choose good places for your standing in the fair, when you sing, Nightingale."

They would work together at stealing. Nightingale would draw a crowd with his singing. Ezekiel Edgworth would cut the purse strings and stealthily give the purses to Nightingale, who would immediately take them to Ursula, who would hide them until everybody met that night and divided up the booty.

Ursula said, "Yes, sing near the most crowded passageways; and often change where you sing."

Ezekiel Edgworth said, "And in your singing, you must use your hawk's eye nimbly, and always fly the purse to a mark, where it is worn, and on which side. That information you may give me by making a sign with your beak, or hang your head that way in the tune."

"Use your hawk's eye nimbly, and always fly the purse to a mark" meant "always watch where people put away their purse on their person and communicate that information to me." He was using the language of hunting. A trained hawk would indicate to a hunter where the quarry had gone; it would fly after the quarry and mark, aka notice and show, where the quarry was hidden.

Ursula said, “Enough, talk no more about it. Your friendship, masters, is not now to begin: You have worked together before. Drink your draught of indenture, your sup of covenant, and leave.”

The “draught of indenture” and the “sup of covenant” meant drinking a draught — draft beer — to an agreement, a business contract. “Covenant” is a religious term that many people would say ought not to be used in this particular context.

Ursula continued, “The fair fills quickly, customers begin to come in, and I haven’t a pig ready yet.”

“Well said!” Jordan Knockem exclaimed. “Fill the cups, and light the tobacco. Let’s give fire in the works, and noble vapors.”

Ezekiel Edgworth asked, “And shall we have smocks, Ursula, and good whimsies!”

“Whimsies” are found between the legs of prostitutes.

“Come, you are in your bawdy vein!” Ursula said. “You will have the best the fair will afford, Ezekiel, if Captain Whit the bawd keeps his word.”

Mooncalf returned.

“How are the pigs doing, Mooncalf?” Ursula asked.

“They are very passionate, boss,” Mooncalf replied. “One of them has wept out an eye.”

This indicated that the meat was close to being completely roasted.

“Master Arthur of Bradley is melancholy here,” Mooncalf said. “Nobody talks to him. Will you have some tobacco, Mr. Arthur?”

“No, boy,” the disguised Justice Overdo replied. “Let my meditations alone.”

Mooncalf said, “He’s preparing so he can make an oration, now.”

The disguised Justice Overdo said to himself, “If I can with this day’s travail, and all my policy, only rescue this youth here out of the hands of the lewd man and the strange woman, I will sit down at night, and say with my friend Ovid, ‘Iamque opus exegi, quod nec Iovis ira nec ignis / nec poterit ferrum nec edax abolere vetustas.’”

This is a public-domain translation by Frank Justus Miller of Ovid’s passage: “And now my work is done, which neither the wrath of Jove, nor fire, nor sword, nor the gnawing tooth of time shall ever be able to undo.” The work was Ovid’s Metamorphoses, which was first published in 8 C.E.

Justice Overdo wanted to rescue Ezekiel Edgworth, whose conversation with the others he had heard. A “strange woman” is a harlot.

Jordan Knockem, who was not in on the conversation, said, “Here, Ezekiel, here’s a health to Ursla, and a kind vapor; you always have money in your purse, and abundance! How do you come by it? I beg you to vapor your friends some in a courteous vapor.”

Ezekiel Edgworth said, “Half of what I have, Mr. Daniel Knockem, is always at your service.”

The disguised Justice Overdo said to himself, “He has a sweet nature! What hawk would prey upon such a lamb?”

Jordan Knockem said, "Let's see what half comes to, Ezekiel. Count it."

He said to Mooncalf, "Come, fill his glass so he can drink a toast with me."

— 2.5 —

Mr. Winwife and Quarlous arrived.

Mr. Winwife said, "We have gotten here before Bartholomew Cokes and the others, I think."

"That's all the better," Quarlous said. "We shall see them come into the fair, now."

Lantern Leatherhead shouted in order to sell his toys, "What do you lack, gentlemen? What is it you lack? A fine horse? A lion? A bull? A bear? A dog? Or a cat? An excellent fine Bartholomew-bird? Or a musical instrument? What is it you lack?"

He had toy birds and fiddles for sale.

Quarlous said, "By God's lid! Here's Orpheus among the beasts, with his fiddle and all!"

Orpheus was a famous musician from mythological times who was reputed to be able to charm people, beasts, and even stones with his musical ability. His wife died, and he made his way to the Land of the Dead in order to convince Hades, King of the Dead, to release her. His music charmed Hades, who agreed to let her return to the Land of the Living on one condition: Orpheus could not look at her until after she had stepped into the Land of the Living. If Orpheus looked at her before then, she would return to the Land of the Dead. Orpheus agreed, and they made their way back toward the Land of the Living. Orpheus stepped into the Land of the Living and turned to face his wife, but she had one more step to go to reach the Land of the Living. She said, “Farewell,” and returned to the Land of the Dead.

Joan Trash shouted, “Will you buy any comfortable bread, gentlemen?”

Gingerbread is a comfort food.

Quarlous said, “And here Ceres is selling her daughter’s picture in gingerwork.”

Ceres was the mother of Proserpina, who was kidnapped by Hades. Ceres mourned, and since she was the goddess of agriculture, when she mourned nothing would grow. She was able to make an arrangement in which her daughter would spend six months of the year with her and be Queen of the Land of the Dead the other six months.

Proserpina and Ceres are Roman names. Proserpina’s Greek name is Persephone, and Ceres’ Greek name is Demeter.

Bartholomew Fair was something like Hell, with Ursula’s hot fire for roasting pigs the center of Hell. People such as Orpheus and goddesses such as Ceres could grapple with Hades, but they could win at best only partial victories.

Mr. Winwife said, “I can’t believe that these people are so ignorant as to think us customers for them! Do we look as if we would buy gingerbread or hobbyhorses?”

Quarlous replied insightfully, “Why, they know no better wares than they have, nor better customers than come to the fair, and our very being here makes us fit to be asked to buy their wares, as well as others. I wish that Bartholomew Cokes would come! He would be a true customer for them.”

Jordan Knockem said to Ezekiel Edgworth, “How much is it? What’s half of what you have? Thirty shillings?”

He looked up and said, “Who’s yonder! Ned Winwife and Tom Quarlous, I think! Yes.”

He said to Ezekiel Edgworth, “Give it all to me! Give it all to me!”

Jordan Knockem shouted, “Mr. Winwife! Mr. Quarlous! Will you take a pipe of tobacco with us?”

He said to Ezekiel Edgworth, “Do not discredit me now, Ezekiel.”

Ezekiel Edgworth handed him the money.

Mr. Winwife said to Quarlous, “Pretend not to see him. He is the roaring horse-courser. I plead to you: Let’s avoid him. Let’s turn and go down this way.”

Quarlous said, “By God’s blood, I’ll see him, and roar with him, too, even if he should roar as loud as Neptune. Please go with me.”

Neptune, god of the ocean, roars loudly during hurricanes and other sea-storms.

Mr. Winwife said, “You may draw me to as likely an inconvenience, when you please, as this.”

In other words: If you want to inconvenience me as much as you can do now, you can do so at another time when you please. So don’t inconvenience me now, but do so at a later time.

Quarlous said, “Bah, come along; we have nothing to do, man, but to see the sights now.”

Mr. Winwife didn’t want to see Jordan Knockem, but he also didn’t want to lose Quarlous’ company. They had plans to enjoy watching Bartholomew Cokes make a fool of himself at the fair.

Mr. Winwife and Quarlous went to the booth where Jordan Knockem was sitting.

Jordan Knockem greeted them: “Welcome, Mr. Quarlous and Mr. Winwife. Will you take any froth and smoke with us?”

Quarlous said, “Yes, sir, but you’ll pardon us if we knew not of so much familiarity between us before.”

Quarlous and Mr. Winwife were higher up in society than Jordan Knockem.

Jordan Knockem asked, “So much familiarity as what, sir?”

Quarlous replied, “To be so lightly invited to smoke and froth.”

“A ‘good’ vapor!” Jordan Knockem said. “Will you sit down, sir? This is old Ursla’s ‘mansion’; how do you like her bower?”

It wasn’t a mansion, but tree boughs shaded it, so it was a bower.

Jordan Knockem continued, “Here you may have your punk and your pig in state, sir, both piping hot.”

A punk is a prostitute. He wanted a sexually hot prostitute.

Quarlous said, “I had rather have my punk cold, sir.”

He wanted a prostitute who was not feverish as a result of being infected with venereal disease.

The disguised Justice Overdo said to himself, “There’s information for me: Punk! And pig!”

From inside, where the pigs were roasting, Ursla called, “Mooncalf, you rogue!”

Mooncalf shouted back, “Coming! The bottle is almost empty, boss.”

He poured some ale and said, “Here, Mr. Arthur.”

Ursula shouted, “I’ll part you and your playfellow there in the braid-trimmed coat, if you don’t sunder yourself from him damn quickly.”

The disguised Justice Overdo was not wearing the Fool’s old-fashioned motley costume, but instead a newer fashion for Fools: a long coat with braid trimming and embroidery.

Jordan Knockem said, “Mr. Winwife, you are proud, I think. You are not talking, nor are you drinking. Are you proud?”

“Not of the company I am in, sir, nor of the place, I assure you,” Mr. Winwife replied.

“You do not take exception to the company, do you!” Jordan Knockem asked. “Are you in vapors, sir?”

Mooncalf said, “Now, good Mr. Daniel Knockem, respect my mistress’s bower, as you call it. For the honor of our booth, let’s have none of your vapors here.”

Ursula appeared, carrying a firebrand.

She said to Mooncalf, “Why, you thin, lean polecat you! If they have a mind to be in their vapors, must you hinder them? How would you know, vermin, if they would have lost a cloak, or such another ‘trifle’?”

Losing a cloak was not a trifling matter; fine clothing is and was expensive.

She continued, “Must you be breathing the air of pacification here, while I am tormented within by the fire, you weasel?”

Mooncalf said, “Good boss, it was in behalf of your booth’s credit and reputation that I spoke.”

Ursula said, “Why, would my booth have broken, if they had fallen out in it, sir? Or would their heat have set it on fire? Go in, you rogue, and baste the pigs, and tend the fire, so that the pigs won’t fail, or I’ll both baste and roast you until your eyes drop out like those of the pigs. Leave the bottle behind you, and be curst awhile!”

One then-current meaning of the word “baste” was “beat.”

Since Ursula’s fire was the center of the “Hell” of Bartholomew Fair, Mooncalf would be cursed for a while as he tended the fire.

Mooncalf exited.

Quarlous said, “Body of the fair! What’s this? Who is she? Mother of the bawds?”

Jordan Knockem said, “No, she’s mother of the pigs, sir, mother of the pigs.”

Mr. Winwife said, “Mother of the Furies, I think, judging by her firebrand.”

The Furies were avenging goddesses with snakes for hair. They punished wrongdoers in ancient Greece.

Quarlous said, “No, she is too fat to be a Fury.”

Fat people are supposed to be jolly. The Furies were thin.

He continued, “She is surely some walking sow made of tallow!”

Mr. Winwife said, “She is an inspired vessel of kitchen stuff!”

An “inspired vessel” is a religiously inspired person who is filled with religious spirit.

Quarlous said, “She’ll make excellent stuff for the coach-makers here in Smithfield; they can use her tallow to anoint wheels and axletrees.”

“To anoint” means “to rub with oil as part of a religious ritual.”

While they were insulting her, Ursula had been drinking and listening. Now she spoke up and said, “Aye, aye, funsters, mock a plain plump soft wench of the suburbs, do, because she’s juicy and wholesome.”

The suburbs had less onerous laws than London, and so disreputable businesses congregated in the suburbs. Brothels and theaters were located in the suburbs.

She continued, “You must have your thin pinched ware, pent up in the compass of a dog-collar (or it will not do), that looks like a long striped conger eel, set upright and displaying a green feather, like fennel in the mouth of the eel.”

In other words, these men preferred thin ware, aka thin prostitutes.

Jordan Knockem said, “Well said, Urse, my good Urse! Go after them, Urse!”

Quarlous asked, “Is she your quagmire, Daniel Knockem? Is this your bog?”

“Quagmire” and “bog” in this context meant “vagina.”

Nightingale said, “We shall have a quarrel soon.”

Jordan Knockem said, “What! Bog! Quagmire? Foul vapors! Humph!”

“Foul vapors” in this context unintentionally meant “stinky crotch.”

Quarlous said, “Yes, he who would venture for her bog, I assure him, might sink into her and be drowned for a week before any friend he had could find out where he had disappeared.”

Mr. Winwife said, “And then he would be a fortnight raising him up again.”

“Raising him up again” meant both 1) lifting him out of her vagina, and 2) giving him another erection.

Quarlous said, “It would be like falling into a whole shire of butter; it would take a team of Dutchmen to draw him out.”

A stereotype of Dutchmen was that they loved butter.

Jordan Knockem said, “Answer them, Urse. Where’s your Bartholomew wit now, Urse? Where’s your Bartholomew wit?”

Ursla said, “Hang them, the rotten, roguey cheaters, I hope to see them plagued one day (poxed with venereal disease they are already, I am sure) with lean playhouse poultry that has the bony rump, sticking out like the ace of spades, or the point of a partisan, so that every rib of them is like the tooth of a saw; and will so grate them with their hips and shoulders, as (take them altogether) they might as well lie with and have sex with a rake.”

“Lean playhouse poultry” referred to the thin prostitutes who picked up customers in and around the theaters.

A partisan is a long-handled (and therefore skinny) spear.

Quarlous said, “Damn her, look at how she drips with sweat! She’s able to give a man the sweating sickness if he just looks at her.”

Ursula said, “By Saint Mary, you had better look off since you have a patch on your face, and a dozen in your breeches, although they are made of scarlet, sir.”

Quarlous’ breeches were dyed scarlet, which was an expensive dye used on expensive clothing. In this society, patches were used to cover the sores of venereal disease. Ursula was saying that although Quarlous and Mr. Winwife were well-to-do, they were also well infected with venereal disease.

She continued, “I have seen people with as fine outsides as either of yours bring lousy linings to the brokers, before now, twice a week.”

“Bring lousy linings to the brokers” had two meanings: 1) Bring lice-infected underwear to the pawnbrokers, and 2) Bring venereal disease-infected genitals to the bawds.

Quarlous said, “Do you think there may be a fine new cucking-stool in the fair, to be purchased: one large enough, I mean? I know there is a pond big enough for her.”

The cucking-stool was a ducking-stool. Scolding women were publicly humiliated by being dunked into a pond.

Ursula said, “Use it for your mother, you rascal! Get out, you rogue, you hedge-bird, you pimp, you pannier-man’s bastard, you!”

A hedge-bird was either someone born under a hedge, and therefore lower-class, or someone who stood near a hedge, such as a vagrant or a highwayman who robbed while on foot.

Quarlous laughed mockingly.

Ursula said to him, “Do you sneer, you dog’s-head, you trundle-tail!”

A trundle-tail is a mongrel with a curly tail.

She continued, “You look as if you were begotten on top of a cart in harvest time, when the whelp — the bitch — was hot and eager. Go and sniff after your brother’s bitch, Mistress Commodity.”

A commodity can be many things, including female flesh. “Mistress Commodity” can mean “whore.” The reference to “brother” was to Mr. Winwife, who had also insulted her and whom she did not know was single.

She continued, “That’s the livery you wear; it will be out at the elbows shortly. It’s time you went to it for the other remnant.”

“Livery” is the clothing of a servant. She meant that Quarlous served a whore, perhaps as pimp, perhaps as servant. If as pimp, he needed to go back to work and make money off the whore so that he could replace his fine clothing when it wore out at the elbows. If as customer, his satiety would soon be worn out and he needed to go back and make use of the whore before she was completely shagged out.

Jordan Knockem said, “Peace, Urse. Peace, Urse.”

He whispered to Nightingale and Ezekiel Edgworth, “They’ll kill the poor whale, and make oil of her.”

He then said to Ursla, “Please, go inside your booth.”

Ursla said, “I’ll see them poxed first, and piled, and double piled.”

“Poxed” meant infected with syphilis.

“Piled” meant bald as a result of treatment for venereal disease.

“Double-piled” referred to layers of cloth. They would have two layers: 1) their regular breeches, and 2) cloth bandages for their venereal sores.

Mr. Winwife said to Quarlous, “Let’s go away now. Her language grows greasier than her pigs.”

Ursula said, “Does it now, Snotty-nose? Good lord! Are you sniveling? You were engendered on a she-beggar in a barn when the bald thrasher, your sire, was scarcely warm.”

According to Ursula, the thrasher — Mr. Winwife’s father — was bald, meaning in this context that he lacked any kind of vital force. That is, he was scarcely warm while having sex. This was an insult to Mr. Winwife as well as to his father. Being begotten by a sire who is hot at the planting of his semen is much better than having a sire who is scarcely warm at the planting of his semen.

Mr. Winwife said to Quarlous, “Please, let’s go now.”

Quarlous said, “No, indeed. I’ll stay for the end of her ranting now. I know she cannot last much longer. I find by her similes she is waning quickly.”

Ursula said, “Am I now? I’ll get you gone. Let me get my pig-pan here in a little bit, and I’ll scald you away from here, if you will not go.”

She exited to get a dripping-pan that was used to catch the hot fat dripping from the roasting pigs.

Jordan Knockem said, “Gentlemen, these are very strange vapors, and very idle vapors, I assure you.”

Quarlous said, “You are a very serious ass, we assure you.”

Jordan Knockem said, “Humph, ‘ass’! And you are serious! Well, then pardon me my vapor. I have a foolish vapor, gentlemen. Any man who does vapor me the ass, Mr. Quarlous —”

Quarlous interrupted, “What then, Mr. Jordan?”

Jordan Knockem said, “I do vapor him the lie.”

To say that a man is lying is a serious insult — one serious enough to lead to a duel.

Quarlous said, “Indeed, and to any man who vapors me the lie, I do vapor that.”

Quarlous hit Jordan Knockem.

Jordan Knockem said, “Now then, vapors upon vapors.”

They fought.

Ursla returned, carrying a dripping-pan full of hot pig-fat.

Ezekiel Edgworth shouted, “Beware of the pan, the pan, the pan!”

Nightingale shouted, “Here she comes with the pan, gentlemen!”

In the midst of all the fighting and confusion, Ursla fell with the pan, the contents of which splashed on her.

Ezekiel Edgworth shouted, “God bless the woman!”

Ursla screamed in pain.

Quarlous and Mr. Winwife ran away.

Joan Trash ran over and asked, “What’s the matter?”

The disguised Justice Overdo said, “Good woman!”

Mooncalf said, “Boss!”

Ursla shouted, “Curse of Hell! That ever I saw these fiends! Oh! I have scalded my leg, my leg, my leg, my leg! I have lost a limb in the service! Run for some cream and salad oil, quickly.”

They would be used to treat the burn.

Mooncalf knelt to look at the burn.

Ursla said, “Are you looking up my skirt, you baboon?”

She then said, “Rip off my hose, if you are men, men, men.”

Her stockings needed to be taken off so that her burn could be treated.

Mooncalf said to Joan Trash, “Run for some cream, good mother Joan. I’ll look after your basket of gingerbread.”

Joan Trash exited to get the cream.

Lantern Leatherhead said, “Best sit up in your chair, Ursla.”

He then requested, “Help, gentlemen.”

They lifted her into the chair.

Jordan Knockem said, “Be of good cheer, Urse; you have hindered me the currying of a couple of stallions here, that abused the good race-bawd of Smithfield; it was time for them to go.”

“The currying of a couple of stallions here” meant “my beating Quarlous and Mr. Winwife.” “Race bawd” meant that she was “the breeder of bawds.” Bartholomew Fair was located at Smithfield.

Nightingale said quietly to Ezekiel Edgworth, “Indeed, when the pan came — they would have made Jordan Knockem run if not for that.”

He added quietly, “This would have been a fine time for cutting purses, if you had ventured to try it.”

Ezekiel Edgworth, an experienced cutpurse, replied, “Not a whit — these fellows were too fine to carry money.”

Many wealthy people carry little money; wealthy people can usually get credit when they want it. A wealthy person who bought cloth at the fair, for example, would probably buy a lot of expensive cloth on credit and have it delivered.

Jordan Knockem said, “Nightingale, get some help to carry her leg out of the air. Take off her shoes.”

He looked at her legs and said, “Body of me! She has the mallanders, the scratches, the crown scab, and the quitter bone in the other leg.”

All these terms referred to horse diseases of the legs and hooves.

Ursla said, “Oh, damn it! Why do you remind of my leg like that? It makes it prick and shoot with pain! Would you have me in the hospital before my time?”

Going to the hospital meant having a very serious, life-threatening injury or sickness. Many people died in the hospital.

Jordan Knockem said, “Patience, Urse, be calm and have a good heart. It is only a blister as big as a windgall.”

A windgall is another horse’s illness: a soft tumor on a leg.

He added, “I’ll treat it with the white of an egg, a little honey and hog’s grease, and I’ll have your pasterns well rolled, and you shall walk again by tomorrow.”

“Pasterns” referred to part of a horse’s leg.

He added, “I’ll tend your booth, and look after your affairs all the while. You shall sit in your chair, and give orders, and shine like Ursa Major.”

Ursa Major is the constellation that is known as the Big Bear.

Jordan Knockem and Mooncalf exited, carrying Ursula in her chair.

— 2.6 —

Bartholomew Cokes, who was carrying his box with the marriage license in it, arrived at the fair with Humphrey Wasp, Mistress Overdo, and Grace Wellborn.

The disguised Justice Overdo stood up and began to deliver an oration against vice: “These are the fruits of bottle-ale and tobacco! The foam of the one, and the fumes of the other! Wait, young man, and despise not the wisdom of these few hairs that are grown grey in the care of you.”

Ezekiel Edgworth said, “Nightingale, wait a little while. Indeed, I’ll hear some of this!”

Bartholomew Cokes said to Humphrey Wasp, “Come, Numps, come, where are you?”

He then said, “Welcome to the fair, Miss Grace.”

Ezekiel Edgworth said, “By God’s light, he will call an audience to hear his oration, you shall see, and give us an opportunity to ply our illegal trade in a moment.”

The disguised Justice Overdo orated, “Thirst not after that frothy liquor, ale; for who knows when he opens the stopple, what may be in the bottle? Has not a snail, a spider, and yes, a newt, been found there? Thirst not after it, youth; thirst not after it.”

Bartholomew Cokes said, “This is a brave fellow, Numps, so let’s hear him.”

By “brave,” he meant “splendid.”

Humphrey Wasp said, “By God’s blood! How brave is he? He is wearing a coat trimmed with braid!”

By “brave,” he sarcastically meant “finely dressed.” The disguised Justice Overdo was wearing a coat that Fools of his time wore.

Humphrey Wasp continued, “You had best do a swap with him. Go ahead and strip quickly, and trade clothing with him — it will become you.”

He continued, “Why will you listen to him? Because he is an ass, and may be akin to the Bartholomew Cokeses?”

Bartholomew Cokes said, “Oh, good Numps.”

The disguised Justice Overdo orated, “Neither should you lust after that tawny weed tobacco —”

Bartholomew Cokes said, “These are brave — splendid — words!”

The disguised Justice Overdo continued, “— whose complexion is like the Indian’s who sells it.”

Tobacco shops often had a sign with an illustration of a Native American on it.

Bartholomew Cokes asked, “Are they not brave words, sister?”

The disguised Justice Overdo orated, “And who can tell, if before the gathering and making up thereof, the alligator has not pissed on the tobacco?”

Humphrey Wasp said to Bartholomew Cokes, “By God’s heart, let them be brave words, as brave as they will! If they were all the brave words in a country, what then? Will you go away now? Have you had enough of him?”

He then said, “Miss Grace, leave now; please don’t be an accessory to this foolishness.”

He then said to Bartholomew Cokes, “If you lose your license, or something else, sir, by listening to his fables, say that Numps is a witch; with all my heart, do say so.”

He would be called a male witch because he had correctly predicted the future: He had said that Bartholomew Cokes would be robbed.

Bartholomew Cokes said, “Avoid in your satin doublet, Numps.”

“Avoid” meant “get lost” and was used to order the Devil to leave, as in “Avoid, Satan!”

The disguised Justice Overdo orated, “The creeping venom of which subtle serpent — the alligator — as some recent writers affirm, neither the cutting of the perilous plant, nor the drying of it, nor the lighting or burning, can any way lessen or assuage. The venom is still present in all its power.”

Bartholomew Cokes said, “This is good, indeed! Isn’t it, sister?”

The disguised Justice Overdo orated, “Hence it is that the lungs of the tobacconist are rotted, the liver spotted, the brain smoked like the backside of the pig-woman’s booth here, and the whole body within as black as the outside of her pan that you saw just now.”

Bartholomew Cokes said to Ezekiel Edgworth, “That was a fine comparison, that was, sir! Did you see the pan?”

Smoke from the fire that roasted the pigs blackened the outside of the pan.

Ezekiel Edgworth replied, “Yes, sir.”

The disguised Justice Overdo orated, “Indeed, the hole in the nose here of some tobacco-smokers, or the third nostril, if I may so call it, which makes it possible that they can vent the tobacco out, like the ace of clubs, or rather the flower-de-lis, is caused from the tobacco, just by tobacco!”

The ace of clubs and the flower-de-lis (fleur-de-lis) have curves like swirls of tobacco smoke.

He continued, “The poor innocent pox, which has nothing to do with the third nostril, is miserably and most unconscionably slandered and blamed for what the tobacco does.”

He was wrong about the cause of the third nostril. It was the pox (and its treatment), not tobacco, which caused the bridge of the nose to collapse. The pox is syphilis.

Bartholomew Cokes asked, “Who would have missed this, sister?”

Mrs. Overdo said, “No one except for Numps.”

Bartholomew Cokes said, “He does not understand.”

Ezekiel Edgworth, who was picking Bartholomew Cokes’ pocket and stealing one of the purses he was carrying, thought, Nor do you feel.

Bartholomew Cokes said, “What would you have, sister, of a fellow who knows nothing but a basket-hilt, and an old fox on it?”

He was referring to Humphrey Wasp and saying that he was old-fashioned. The basket-hilt was part of an old-fashioned sword; the basket-hilt was shaped like a basket and protected the hand. Some old-fashioned swords had foxes engraved on the hilt. Over time, the word “fox” became a name for these old-fashioned swords.

Bartholomew Cokes continued, “The best music in the fair will not move a log.”

The “log” was Humphrey Wasp.

Ezekiel Edgworth gave the purse to Nightingale and said, “Go in the booth to Ursula, Nightingale, and give her the comfort of this purse. Make sure the money in it is counted. This fellow was sent to us by Lady Fortune to be our first fairing.”

A “fairing” is something acquired at a fair.

As a cutpurse, Ezekiel Edgworth was competent. It is good to have accomplices such as Nightingale and Ursula to carry away and hide the purse. That way, when the purse was missed, it would not be found on the cutpurse. It is also good to have the money counted so that later Ursula could not claim that a lesser amount was in the purse.

Nightingale exited.

The disguised Justice Overdo orated, “But why do I speak about the diseases of the body, children of the fair?”

Bartholomew Cokes said, “‘Children of the fair.’ That means us, sister. This is splendid, indeed!”

The disguised Justice Overdo orated, “Listen, oh, you sons and daughters of Smithfield! And hear what maladies tobacco causes the mind. It causes swearing, it causes swaggering, it causes sniffing with contempt and snarling, and now and then it causes an injury.”

Mrs. Overdo said, “He has something of my husband, Justice Overdo, in him, I think, brother.”

Bartholomew Cokes said, “I thought the same thing, sister. He has very much of Justice Overdo, my brother-in-law, in him, and it is noticeable when he speaks.”

The disguised Justice Overdo orated, “Look into any out-of-the-way corner of the town, the Straits, or the Bermudas, where the quarrelling lesson is read, and how do they pass the time, but with bottle-ale and tobacco? The lecturer is on one side, and his pupils on the other; but the seconds — the assistants — are still bottle-ale and tobacco, for which the lecturer reads, and the novices pay. Thirty pounds a week in bottle-ale! Forty pounds in tobacco! And ten more pounds in ale again. Then for a suit to drink in, so much, and, that being slobbered on, so much for another suit, and then a third suit, and a fourth suit! And still the bottle-ale gets slobbered on the suits, and the tobacco stinks it up.”

Fashionable, well-to-do young men could study dueling, although Justice Overdo’s description of the study was exaggerated, especially in the costs. The lecturer would die from so much alcohol and tobacco.

Humphrey Wasp said to Bartholomew Cokes, “Heart of a madman! Are you rooted here? Will you never leave? What can any man find in this bawling, orating fellow that makes it worthwhile to stay here and grow here?”

He said to Mrs. Overdo, “Your brother is a few inches taller; he has grown that much in the very long time he has spent listening to the orator.”

He then asked Bartholomew Cokes, “Will you fix and root yourself here, and set up a booth, sir?”

The disguised Justice Overdo orated, “I will conclude briefly ___”

Humphrey Wasp said, “Hold your peace and be quiet, you roaring rascal, or I’ll stick my head in between your jaws to shut you up.”

He then said to Bartholomew Cokes, “It would be best for you to build a booth, and hire him; if you say the word, you can make your will and make him your heir! Dear friend, I never knew anyone to be so taken with a two-gallon mouth before. By this light, I swear I'll carry you away on my back, if you will not go away willingly."

He got Bartholomew Cokes up on his back in piggyback style.

Bartholomew Cokes said, "Wait, Numps, wait, set me down. I have lost my purse, Numps. My purse! One of my fine purses is gone!"

Mrs. Overdo asked, "Is it gone indeed, brother?"

Bartholomew Cokes said, "Yes, as I am an honest man, I say it is true. If I am lying, I wish I would be an arrant rogue! A plague on all damned roguery cutpurses — that's how I feel about them."

He examined his pockets.

Humphrey Wasp said sarcastically, "Bless them with all my heart, with all my heart, do you see! Now, as I am no unbelieving infidel as far as I know, I am glad about it. Yes, I am — here's my testimony — do you see, sir? I did not tell you about pickpockets' tricks! No, no, I am a dull dray horse, I am. I know nothing. Are you not justly served, in your conscience, now? Answer in accordance with your conscience. I say much good may it do you with all my heart, and much good may it do the good heart of him who has your purse, I say with all my heart again."

Ezekiel Edgworth thought, This fellow is very "charitable." I wish he had a purse, too! But I must not be too bold all at one time. I need to refrain from being greedy and taking excessive risks.

Bartholomew Cokes said, "Numps, it is not my best purse."

Humphrey Wasp said, “Not your best! Death! Why should it be your worst? Why should it be any, indeed, at all? Give me an answer to that. Give me a reason: Why should it be any? Why should you have any purse stolen?”

Bartholomew Cokes said, “Nor was it my gold, Numps. I still have that.”

He took out his other purse, which had gold in it, and showed it to his sister, saying, “Look here, sister.”

Humphrey Wasp said, “Why, so there’s all the feeling he has!”

Bartholomew Cokes had been only briefly upset at finding out his pocket had been picked. Now he was calm again.

Mrs. Overdo said, “Please take better care of that purse, brother.”

Bartholomew Cokes said, “So I will, I promise you. Let him catch this who can catch it. I would like to see him get this — look here!”

He waved his purse in the air.

Humphrey Wasp said, “So, so, so, so, so, so, so, so! Very good.”

Bartholomew Cokes said, “I would like to have him come again now, and just try to steal this purse. Sister, will you take notice of a good jest? I will put this purse just where the other purse was, and if we have good luck, you shall see a delicate, fine trap to catch the cutpurse nibbling.”

Ezekiel Edgworth thought, Indeed, the cutpurse will try to steal it before you are out of the fair.

He had the advantage of knowing exactly where the purse was located on Bartholomew Cokes’ body.

Bartholomew Cokes said, "Come, Miss Grace, please don't be melancholy for my misfortune; sorrow will not bring my purse back, sweetheart."

Grace Wellborn replied, "I don't think about your stolen purse, sir."

Bartholomew Cokes said, "It was just a little scurvy white money, hang it! It may hang the cutpurse one day."

White money means silver coins.

The cutpurse could definitely hang one day because his crime was a capital one.

Bartholomew Cokes said to Grace Wellborn, "I have gold left to give you a fairing yet, as hard as the world goes. Nothing angers me but that nobody here looked like a cutpurse, unless it were Numps."

"What!" Humphrey Wasp said. "I? I look like a cutpurse? Death! Your sister's a cutpurse! And your mother and father, and all your kin were cutpurses! And here is a rogue who is the bawd of the cutpurses, whom I will beat to begin with."

Confusion broke out with everybody speaking at the same time and with Humphrey Wasp beating the disguised Justice Overdo.

The disguised Justice Overdo said, "Restrain your hand, child of wrath, and heir of anger, make it not Childermass Day in your fury, or the feast of the French Bartholomew, parent of the massacre."

Childermass was the feast of the Innocents, held on December 28 in memory of the young children whom Herod had ordered to be killed in an attempt to kill the young Jesus. This was known as the Massacre of the Innocents.

Matthew 2:16 (King James Version) states this:

“Then Herod, when he saw that he was mocked of the wise men, was exceeding wrath, and sent forth, and slew all the children that were in Bethlehem, and in all the coasts thereof, from two years old and under, according to the time which he had diligently inquired of the wise men.”

The French Bartholomew was the massacre of thousands of French Protestants — Huguenots — by Catholics in France on Saint Bartholomew’s Day in 1572.

Bartholomew Cokes shouted, “Numps! Numps!”

Mrs. Overdo shouted, “Good Mr. Humphrey!”

Humphrey Wasp shouted at the disguised Justice Overdo, “You are the Patrico, are you? The patriarch of the cutpurses? You share, sir, they say; let them share this with you. Are you in your hot fit of preaching again? I’ll cool you.”

The Patrico was a hedge-priest who married vagabonds.

Humphrey Wasp beat the disguised Justice Overdo again.

The disguised Justice Overdo ran away, shouting, “Murder! Murder! Murder!”

Humphrey Wasp ran after the disguised Justice Overdo. Bartholomew Cokes and Mrs. Overdo ran after Humphrey Wasp.

— 3.1 —

Lantern Leatherhead, Joan Trash, and others were sitting by their wares.

Whit, Haggis, and Bristle arrived and began to talk together. Whit was a pimp who made extra money by being an informer. Haggis and Bristle were watchmen. Whit would inform these watchmen about troublemakers at the fair, the watchmen would accept a bribe from the troublemakers who wanted to stay out of trouble, and Whit would get a cut of the bribe.

Whit spoke with an odd Irish accent:

G sometimes became SH. GENTLEMEN became SHENTLEMEN.

S sometimes became SH. 'TIS became 'TISH. SUFFICIENT became SHUFFISHIENT.

TH sometimes became D. THIS became DISH. OTHER became ODER.

TH sometimes became T. THOU became TOU.

W sometimes became V. WISE WATCHMAN became Vishe Vatchman.

WH sometimes became PH. WHEN became PHEN.

Whit frequently said, “an’t be,” which seems to have a number of meanings: indeed, really, to be sure, if that’s what you want, if that’s how things are, and be it as it may be.

Whit was complaining about the watchmen, aka officers, being hard to find when he wanted to report a disturbance. They were supposed to be at Ursla’s but had been occupied elsewhere when he wanted to report a noisy disturbance involving gallants with money — money that the gallants would have paid out in bribes to avoid additional trouble. The gallants may have been Quarlous and Mr. Winwife, and/or Bartholomew Cokes.

Whit said, “Nay, ’tish all gone, now! Dish ’tish, phen tou wilt not be phitin call, master offisher, phat ish a man te better to lishen out noyshes for tee, an tou art in an oder ’orld, being very shuffishient noyshes and gallantsh too? one o’ their brabblesh would have fed ush all dish fortnight, but tou art so bushy about beggersh still, tou hast no leshure to intend shentlemen, an ’t be.”

[Whit said, “It is all gone, now! That is what happens when you will not be within calling distance, mister officers. What good does it do a man to listen out for noisy disturbances for you, if you are in another world, and these are very sufficient noisy disturbances and with gallants, too? One of their noisy brabbles would have fed us all for this fortnight, but you are always so busy about beggars that you have no leisure to attend to gentlemen, if they are involved.”]

Haggis said, “Why, I told you, Davy Bristle.”

Bristle replied, “Come, come, you told me a pudding, Toby Haggis; you told me a matter of nothing; I am sure it came to nothing.”

A pudding is partially made of tripe. He was engaging in wordplay on the food called haggis, which is one kind of pudding.

Bristle continued, “You said, ‘Let’s go to Ursla’s,’ indeed. But then you met the man with the monsters, and I could not get you from him. You are an old fool who has not stopped looking at monsters such as five-legged cattle yet!”

Haggis said, “Why, who would have thought anybody would have been quarrelling so early; or that the ale of the fair would have been up so soon?”

Excessive drinking of ale leads to quarrels.

Whit said, “Phy, phat a clock tost tou tink it ish, man?”

[Whit said, “Why, what time do you think it is, man?”]

Haggis said, “I don’t know.”

Whit said, “Tou art a vishe vatchman, i’ te mean teeme.”

[Whit said, “You are a wise watchman, in the meantime.”]

Haggis said, “Why, should the watch go by the clock, or the clock by the watch, I ask?”

Bristle said, “One should go by another, if they did well.”

He meant that the watchman and the clock should agree about the time.

Whit said, “Tou art right now! Phen didst tou ever know or hear of a shuffishient vatchman, but he did tell the clock, phat bushiness soever he had?”

[Whit said, “You are right now! When did you ever know or hear of a sufficient — competent — watchman, but he did tell the clock, whatsoever business he had?”]

One meaning of “tell the clock” is “count the hours” until he could go home.

Bristle said, “That’s most true: A sufficient watchman knows what time it is.”

Whit said, “Shleeping or vaking: ash well as te clock himshelf, or te Jack dat shtrikes him.”

[Whit said, “Sleeping or waking, the watchman knows the time as well as the clock himself, or the Jack that strikes him.”]

The jack was a figure — a mechanical man — that would strike the clock to toll the hours. Awake, the watchman would know the time as well as the clock. Asleep, the watchman would know the time as well as the Jack — a real man — who struck him: It’s time to wake up!

Bristle said, “Let’s inquire for information from Mr. Leatherhead or Joan Trash here.”

He said, “Mr. Leatherhead, do you hear me, Mr. Leatherhead?”

Whit said, “If it be a Ledderhead, ’tish a very tick Ledderhead, tat sho mush noish vill not piersh him.”

[Whit said, “If it is a leather head, it is a very thick leather head, if so much noise will not pierce it.”]

Lantern Leatherhead said, “I’m a little busy now, good friends, so do not trouble me.”

Whit said, “Phat, because o’ ty wrought neetcap, and ty phelvet sherkin, man? Phy, I have sheene tee in ty ledder sherkin, ere now, mashter o’ de hobbyhorses, as bushy and stately as tou sheemest to be.”

[Whit said, “What, you don’t want to be bothered because of your embroidered nightcap, and your velvet jerkin, aka jacket, man? Why, I have seen you in your leather jerkin, before now, master of the hobbyhorses, as busy and stately as you seem to be.”]

Whit was basically saying, “Are you too proud to talk to us because of your fancy clothing? I have seen you wear plain clothing before.”

Lantern Leatherhead was wearing an expensive velvet jacket. His hat was embroidered, so it was fancy, but he was somewhat eccentric in his choice of clothing because it was a nightcap of the kind that well-to-do people would wear at home. (They tended to wear plain nightcaps in bed.)

Joan Trash said, “Why, what if you have seen him in a plain leather jacket, Captain Whit? He has his choice of jackets, as you may see by that, and his choice of caps, too, I assure you, when he pleases to be either sick or employed.”

Lantern Leatherhead said, “God-a-mercy, Joan, answer for me. Answer their questions so I won’t have to.”

Whit looked up and saw Quarlous and Mr. Winwife coming, so he said to the watchmen, “Away, be not sheen in my company, here be shentlemen, and men of vorship.”

[Whit looked up and saw Quarlous and Mr. Winwife coming, so he said to the watchmen, “Leave, don’t be seen in my company; here come gentlemen, and men of worship.”]

“Men of worship” are “well-to-do men.”

Haggis and Bristle exited.

— 3.2 —

Quarlous and Mr. Winwife arrived.

Quarlous said, “We have had wonderfully bad luck to miss this prologue of the purse, but the best thing is that we shall have five acts of him before night. He’ll be spectacle enough, I am sure.”

He and Mr. Winwife had not been present when Bartholomew Cokes had had his first purse stolen, but Quarlous was sure that the theft was only the prologue to a metaphorical five acts’ worth of foolishness.

Recognizing him, Whit said, “O Creesh, duke Quarlous, how dosht tou? Tou dosht not know me, I fear: I am te vishesht man, but justish Overdo, in all Bartholomew Fair now. Give me twelve-pence from tee, I will help tee to a vife vorth forty marks for’t, and’t be.”

[Recognizing him, Whit said, “Oh, Christ, Duke Quarlous, how are you? You don’t recognize me, I fear: I am the wisest man, except for Justice Overdo, in all Bartholomew Fair now. Give me twelve-pence from yourself, and I will help you to a wife worth forty marks for it, be it as it may be.”]

“Duke” was an honorary, flattering title for Quarlous.

The “wife” was a temporary one — a prostitute.

Quarlous said roughly, “Go away, rogue; pimp, go away.”

Whit said to Mr. Winwife, “And she shall shew tee as fine cut orke for’t in her shmock too as tou cansht vish i’faith; vilt tou have her, vorshipful Vinwife? I will help tee to her here, be an’t be, into pig-quarter, gi’ me ty twelve-pence from tee.”

[Whit said to Mr. Winwife, “And she shall show you as fine cut work for it in her smock, too, as you can wish indeed; will you have her, worshipful Winwife? I will help you to her here, be it as it may be, in the pig-quarter. Give me your twelve-pence from yourself.”]

Mr. Winwife gave him the money and said, “Why, there’s twelve-pence. Please, won’t you be gone?”

The money was a bribe for Whit to let Quarlous and Mr. Winwife alone. Neither man wanted to recognize Whit in public.

Whit said, “Tou art a vorthy man, and a vorshipful man still.”

[Whit said, “You are a worthy man, and a worshipful man always.”]

Quarlous said, “Get you gone, rascal. Leave!”

Whit said, “I do mean it, man. Prinsh Quarulous, if tou hasht need on me, tou shalt find me here at Ursla’s, I will see phat ale and punque ish i’ te pigsty for tee, bless ty good vorship.”

[Whit said, “I do mean it, man. Prince Quarulous, if you have need of me, you shall find me here at Ursla’s. I will see that ale and punk, aka a prostitute, are in the pigsty for you, bless your good worship.”]

Whit exited into Ursla’s booth.

Quarlous looked up and said, “Look and see who is coming here: John Littlewit!”

Mr. Winwife said, “And his wife and her mother, who is my widow: The whole family is coming here.”

Quarlous said, “By God’s light, you must give them all fairings — gifts from the fair — now.”

“Not I,” Mr. Winwife said. “I’ll pretend not to see them.”

“They are going afeasting,” Quarulous said. “What schoolmaster is that who is with them?”

Mr. Winwife said, “That’s my rival for the widow, I believe: the baker.”

Zeal-of-the-land Busy, Dame Purecraft, John Littlewit, and Mrs. Win Littlewit came toward Ursla’s booth.

Zeal-of-the-land Busy said, “So, walk on in the middle way, straight away, turn neither to the right hand nor to the left; let not your eyes be drawn aside with vanity, nor your ear with noises.”

Quarlous said, “Oh, I know him by that start.”

He meant that he recognized him from the way he had begun to speak. Possibly, Zeal-of-the-land Busy also had a peculiar way of walking that Quarlous also recognized.

Lantern Leatherhead shouted, “What do you need? What are you buying, Mrs.? A fine hobbyhorse, to make your son a tilter, aka jouster? A drum to make him a soldier? A fiddle to make him a reveler? What is it you lack? Little dogs for your daughters? Or baby dolls, male or female?”

Zeal-of-the-land Busy said, “Don’t look toward them. Don’t listen to them. The place is Smithfield, or the field of smiths, the grove of hobbyhorses and trinkets. The wares are the wares of Devils, and the whole fair is the shop of Satan. There are hooks and baits — definitely baits — that are hung out on every side, to catch you, and to hold you, as it were, by the gills, and by the nostrils, as the fisher does; therefore, you must not look nor turn toward them.”

Normally, we think of fishers of men as a good thing, but Zeal-of-the-land Busy was thinking of Devils fishing for men’s souls by using the baits available at Bartholomew Fair.

Matthew 4:19 states, “And he [Jesus] saith unto them, Follow me, and I will make you fishers of men” (King James Version).

Zeal-of-the-land Busy continued, “The heathen man could stop his ears with wax against the harlot of the sea; do you the like with your fingers against the bells of the beast.”

Many Puritans disliked bells because they were sometimes used in Catholic masses.

The heathen man is Odysseus, whom Circe told to plug the ears of his men with wax so they would not hear the Sirens’ song. Odysseus had the option of doing this, but he wanted to hear the song of the Sirens, so he had his men tie him to the mast so he could hear the song and yet be unable to jump overboard and swim to the Sirens, who would destroy him.

Mr. Winwife said, "What flashes come from him!"

He was referring to flashes of inspiration, but he was being sarcastic: He knew that there were more than one Siren.

Quarulous said, "Oh, he has those flashes from his oven; he was a notably hot baker when he plied the peel; he is leading his flock into the fair now."

The peel is a baker's long-handled shovel for removing loaves of bread and other baked items from the oven. Each time the oven door is opened, the baker is hit with a flash of heat.

Mr. Winwife said, "Rather, he is driving them to the pens, for he will let them look upon nothing."

Jordan Knockem and Whit came out of Ursula's booth.

Jordan Knockem said to Dame Purecraft and Mrs. Win Littlewit, "Gentlewomen, the weather's hot; where are you walking? Take care of your fine velvet caps, for the fair is dusty. Take a sweet, delicate, delightful booth, with boughs, here in the way, and cool yourselves in the shade, you and your friends."

He said to Mr. John Littlewit, "Here is the best pig and bottle-ale in the fair, sir. Old Ursula is the cook. There you may read it."

He pointed to a sign that had an illustration of a pig's head with writing in large letters under it.

He continued, "The pig's head says it. Poor soul, old Ursla has had an injury called the maryhinchco, but she's prettily amended. She is healing."

The maryhinchco was a horse's illness affecting the legs.

Whit said, "A delicate show-pig, little mistress, with shweet sauce, and crackling, like de bay-leaf i' de fire, la! tou shalt ha' de clean side o' de table-clot, and di glass vash'd with phatersh of dame Annesh Cleare."

[Whit said, "A delicate, delightful sow, little mistress, with sweet sauce, and crackling, like the bay leaf in the fire, la! You shall have the clean side of the tablecloth, and your glass washed with the spring waters of Dame Agnes Clare."]

Dame Agnes Clare was a wealthy widow who married a courtier who wasted all her wealth, leaving her destitute. She committed suicide by drowning in the waters of a spring that was then named after her.

Mr. John Littlewit looked at the sign and said, "This is truly fine. Here are the best pigs, and she does roast them as well as ever she did, the pig's head says."

Jordan Knockem said to Mrs. Win Littlewit, "Excellent, excellent, Mrs. She roasts them with a fire made of aromatic juniper and rosemary branches!"

He then said to Mr. John Littlewit, "That shows the oracle of the pig's head is true, sir."

Dame Purecraft said to Mr. John Littlewit, "Son-in-law, weren't you warned of the vanity of the eye? Have you forgotten that wholesome admonition so soon?"

Mr. John Littlewit said, "Good mother-in-law, how shall we find a pig, if we do not look around for it? Will it run off of the spit and into our mouths, do you think, as in Lubberland, and cry, 'Wee, wee'?"

Lubberland was a fantasyland in which roasted pigs ran around asking people to eat them.

Zeal-of-the-land Busy said, “No, the pig won’t do that, but your mother-in-law, who is religiously wise, understands that the pig may offer itself by other means to the senses, as by way of smell-carrying steam, which I think it does here in this place” — sniff, sniff — “yes, it does.”

He was sniffing the air like a hound.

He continued, “And it would be a sin of obstinacy, great obstinacy, high and horrible obstinacy, to decline or resist the good titillation of the famelic — hunger-inducing — sense, which is the smell. Therefore, be bold” — sniff, sniff, sniff — “and follow the scent. Enter the tents of the unclean, for just this once, and satisfy your wife’s frailty. Let your frail wife be satisfied; your zealous mother and my suffering self will also be satisfied.”

A suffering Puritan is one who suffers hardship for the sake of religion. Zeal-of-the-land Busy was going to suffer the “hardship” of pigging out on roast pig so that he could show that Puritans were not partial to Jews.

Mr. John Littlewit said, “Come, Win, we might as well winny here as to go farther and see nothing.”

“Winny” meant “stay.”

Zeal-of-the-land Busy said, “We escape so much of the other vanities by our early entering into this booth and eating pig.”

Dame Purecraft said, “It is an edifying consideration.”

Mrs. Win Littlewit said quietly to her husband, “This is scurvy — that we must come into the fair, and not look around and enjoy ourselves.”

“Win, have patience, Win,” her husband replied quietly. “I’ll tell you more soon.”

He wanted to ditch the others so that he and his wife could enjoy the fair together.

Mr. John Littlewit, Mrs. Win Littlewit, Zeal-of-the-land Busy, and Dame Purecraft went into Ursla’s booth.

Jordan Knockem called to Mooncalf, who was inside the booth, “Mooncalf, entertain within there. Give them the best pig in the booth, a pork-like pig — one with a lot of meat on it. These are Banbury-bloods, of the sincere, genuine breed, come a pig-hunting.”

Banbury-bloods were Puritans.

He then said, “Whit, wait, Whit, look after your business.”

Whit’s business was informing on others to the police and prostituting women. Possibly, Jordan Knockem was telling him to go inside the booth and keep an eye on Dame Purecraft and Mrs. Win Littlewit, who could be made prostitutes if separated from the others. Or he may have simply meant for Whit to help Ursla and Mooncalf by serving food and drink.

Whit went into Ursla’s booth.

Zeal-of-the-land Busy said from the booth, “Prepare a pig immediately; let a pig be prepared for us.”

Mooncalf and Ursla came out from inside the booth.

Mooncalf asked Jordan Knockem, “By God’s light, who are these people you sent in to us?”

Ursla asked, “Is this the good service, Jordan, you’d do me?”

Jordan Knockem said, “What, Urse? What, Urse? You’ll have vapors in your leg again soon, so please go in, or else your injury may become the scratches.”

The scratches is a horse disease of the ankle.

Ursla said, “Hang your vapors, they are stale, and they stink like you! Are these the guests of the game you promised to fill my pit with today?”

The “game” is prostitution. Ursla sold roast pigs and helped sell the services of prostitutes, and Jordan Knockem’s job was to send both kinds of customers to her.

Jordan Knockem asked, “Yes, what is wrong with them, Urse? Do they ail?”

Ursla said, “Do they ail? They are all sippers, sippers of the city; they look as though they would not drink off two pennyworths of bottle-ale amongst them.”

The city is London, home of many Puritans. People of the suburbs were much more likely to drink much more. Ursla was worried that these Puritans would sip ale rather than guzzle it, thus lessening her profits.

Mooncalf said, “A body may read that in their small printed, aka precisely folded, ruffs.”

Puritans frowned on vain things such as large starched ruffs, and so they wore small, precisely folded ruffs without starch.

Jordan Knockem said, “Go away, you are a fool, Urse, and your Mooncalf is a fool, too. You are in your ignorant vapors now! Leave! They are good guests, I say; they are complete hypocrites and good gluttons. Go in, and set a couple of pigs on the board, and half a dozen of the biggest ale-bottles in front of them, and tell Whit to come to me.”

Mooncalf exited.

Jordan Knockem continued, “I do not love to hear innocents abused; these are fine ambling hypocrites! And one of them is a stone Puritan with a sorrel head and beard!”

A stone Puritan is a male Puritan; the word “stone” was slang for “testicle” in this society. Jordan Knockem was saying that Ursla would not only make money from the guests’ gluttony, but also from Zeal-of-the-land Busy’s lechery.

The word “sorrel” means “chestnut” and is used to refer to the coloring of horses.

He continued, “They are good-mouthed gluttons; two of them eat up one pig, so go and serve them.”

Ursla asked, “Are you sure they are such gluttons?”

Jordan Knockem said, “They are of the right breed — you shall see that by looking at their teeth, Urse.”

He then called, “Where’s this Whit?”

Whit came out of Ursla’s booth. He was in a good mood and sang this song:

“Behold, man, and see,

“What a worthy man am ee! [me!]

“With the fury of my sword,

“And the shaking of my beard,

“I will make ten thousand men afeard [afraid].”

Jordan Knockem said, “Well said, brave Whit! Go in, and fear, aka frighten, the ale out of the bottles and into the bellies of the brethren and the sisters. Drink to the cause of Puritanism and pure vapors.”

Jordan Knockem, Whit, and Ursla went into her booth.

Quarlous said, “My roarer — Jordan Knockem — has turned bartender, I think. Now would be a fine time for you, Winwife, to lay aboard your widow. Get right up next to her and prepare to board her. You shall never be master of a better time or place; a woman who will venture herself into the fair and into a pig-booth will admit any assault, be assured of that.”

Mr. Winwife said, “I don’t care for enterprises of that suddenness, though.”

Quarlous said, “I’ll promise you, then, no wife out of the hundred of widows.”

A man unwilling to take action to court a widow will not get even one widow out of a hundred available widows.

Another meaning of “hundred” was “a district that had its own law court” and therefore was sizable. Again, Quarulous’ meaning was that a man who is unwilling to take action to court a widow will not get even one widow out of many available widows.

Quarlous said, “If I had only as much title to her as to have breathed once on that straight stomacher of hers, I would now be assured that I could carry her, yet, before she went out of Smithfield; or she should carry me, which were the fitter sight, I confess.”

The stomacher was a piece of women’s clothing that covered part of her torso: her stomach and part of her chest. Quarulous meant that if he had talked previously to her, he could now carry her — that is, be successful at courting her.

In part, he was being bawdy. If she would carry him, she would carry — bear — his weight during sex.

Quarlous continued, “But you are a modest undertaker, by circumstances and degrees.”

In other words: You, Mr. Winwife, are an unadventurous wooer, going about your wooing circuitously and little by little.

Quarlous continued, “Come, it is a real disease in you, not a subjective judgment I am making about you. If I were in your position, I would make an all-out attempt at winning the widow.”

The disguised Justice Overdo showed up.

Seeing him, Quarlous said, “Look, here’s the poor fool again, the fool who was stung by the Humphrey Wasp just a while ago.”

— 3.3 —

The disguised Justice Overdo talked to himself:

“I will make no more orations that shall draw on these tragic conclusions.”

Wisely, he wanted to avoid making orations that would get him beaten. Immediately, he began to make an oration, but only to himself. Mr. Winwife and Quarlous could see but not hear him.

The disguised Justice Overdo continued, “And I begin now to think that by a kind of collateral justice, I, Adam Overdo, deserved this beating, for I, the said Adam, was one cause (but only a by-cause) why the purse was lost — and it was my wife’s brother’s purse, too, but they don’t know yet that I was a partial cause of the purse’s being stolen.

“But I shall make very good mirth with it at supper. The story of my being beaten will be some entertainment, and it will put my little friend, Mr. Humphrey Wasp, quite out of countenance when he hears what he did in his anger.

“He will be nonplussed when, sitting at the upper end of my table, as I am accustomed, and drinking to my brother-in-law Bartholomew Cokes, and Mrs. Alice Overdo, my wife, as I will, for their good affection to old Bradley, I will relate the story to them and tell them that it was I who was cudgeled, and show them the marks.”

Justice Overdo had disguised himself as old mad Arthur of Bradley, England.

He continued, “To see what bad events may peep out of the tail of good purposes!”

This is a poor image. “To peep out of the tail” sounds like “peep out of the ass.”

He continued, referring to Ezekiel Edgworth, “The concern I had for that civil young man I took a liking to this morning (and have not left it yet) drew me to that exhortation, which indeed drew a company of people, which drew the cutpurse, who withdrew the money from the purse, which drew my brother Bartholomew Cokes’ loss, which drew on Humphrey Wasp’s anger, which drew on my beating: a pretty series of causes and conclusions!

“And they shall have my story in their dish, indeed, at night for fruit; it shall make a nice dessert. I love to be merry at my table.

“I had thought once, at one special blow he gave me, to have revealed my real identity, but then (I thank you, fortitude) I remembered that a wise man, one who is always so great a part of the commonwealth in himself — and I am one such man because I am a Justice — ought not, on account of a particular, personal disaster, to abandon a public good design and plan.

“The husbandman, aka farmer, ought not, on account of one unthankful year, to forsake the plow. The shepherd ought not, for one scabbed sheep, to throw away his tar-box.”

The tar-box was filled with tar that was used to treat some diseases of sheep.

He continued, “The pilot ought not, for one leak in the poop of the ship, to quit the helm. Nor ought the alderman, for one custard more at a meal, to give up his cloak, the badge of his office.”

A part of the alderman’s job was to be hospitable and entertain and feed people such foods as custards. A custard is an open pie in which such ingredients as meat, fish, fruit, nuts, beaten eggs, milk, cream, and broth are baked.

He continued, “The constable ought not to break his staff, and forswear the watch, for one roaring night, nor ought the piper of the parish, ut parvis componere magna solebam, to put up his pipes for one rainy Sunday.”

“Ut parvis componere magna solebam” is Latin for “For I was accustomed to compare great things to small.”

Virgil’s Eclogues 1:23 has the same Latin words except that Virgil used sic (thus) instead of ut (for).

He continued, “These are certain decisive conclusions, out of which I am resolved, come what can come — come beating, come imprisonment, come infamy, come banishment, indeed, come the rack, come the hurdle (I welcome all) — I will not reveal who I am until the due and right time; and yet still all shall be, as I said, always in the name of justice and the King and for the commonwealth.”

The rack is an instrument of torture. The hurdle is a frame or sled used to take a criminal to the place of execution.

The disguised Justice Overdo exited.

Mr. Winwife asked, “Why does he talk to himself, and act so seriously, poor fool!”

Seeing some people coming, Quarlous said, “It doesn’t matter. Here’s fresher matter for debate coming. Attend to that.”

— 3.4 —

Bartholomew Cokes, Mrs. Overdo, and Grace Wellborn arrived. Following them was Humphrey Wasp, who was carrying an armload of toys that Bartholomew Cokes had purchased.

Bartholomew Cokes said, “Come, Miss Grace. Come, sister. Here’s more fine sights yet, indeed. By God’s eyelid, where’s Numps?”

Lantern Leatherhead shouted, “What do you lack, gentlemen? What is it you buy? Fine rattles, drums, babies, little dogs, and birds for ladies? What do you lack?”

Bartholomew Cokes said, “Good honest Numps, keep in front of me. I am so afraid that you will lose something; my heart was at my mouth when I missed you just now.”

Humphrey Wasp said, “You had better buy a whip and have it in your hand to drive me.”

Bartholomew Cokes said, “Don’t be disagreeable, Numps. You are so apt to take what I say the wrong way! I would simply watch out for the goods you are carrying. You see, just now the treble fiddle you are carrying was almost lost.”

Humphrey Wasp replied, “Please be careful not to lose yourself. Your best way to do that is to get up on my back and ride on me for more safety. Buy a farthing’s worth of great pins so you can fasten yourself to my shoulder.”

Lantern Leatherhead shouted, “What do you lack, gentlemen? Fine purses, pouches, pin cases, pipes? What is it you lack? A pair of smiths to wake you in the morning? Or a fine whistling bird?”

The pair of smiths would be jacks in the form of blacksmith figures that would make the alarm clock sound in the morning.

Bartholomew Cokes said, “Numps, here are finer things by some extent than any we have bought! And more delicate hobbyhorses, a great deal more delicate. Good Numps, wait, and come over here.”

Humphrey Wasp said, “Will you deal with him? You are in Smithfield, where you may outfit yourself with a fine easy-going street-nag, for your saddle horse, in preparation for the upcoming Michaelmas term of the high Court of Justice.”

Smithfield had plenty of places where Bartholomew Cokes could buy a real horse that he could really use; he need not buy another toy horse.

Humphrey Wasp continued, “Has he also a little odd cart for you to make a luxury carriage of so you can ride in the country with four dappled hobbyhorses? Why the measles should you stand here, with your train of fellows, bargaining for toy dogs, birds, and babies? You have no children to bestow them on, have you?”

Bartholomew Cokes replied, “No, not yet, but someday I shall have children, Numps, so your objection doesn’t hold up.”

Humphrey Wasp said, “Do, do, do, do.”

One meaning of “do” is “f*k.”

He continued, “How many children shall you have, do you think? If I were like you, I’d buy for all my tenants, too; they are a kind of savages living in a civilized country, and they will part with their children for trifles such as rattles, pipes, and knives. You had best buy a hatchet or two and barter with them.”

Bartholomew Cokes said, “Good Numps, hold that little tongue of yours, and save it such labor. I am a resolute Bat — you know that.”

Humphrey Wasp said, “You are a resolute fool, I know, and you are a very sufficient coxcomb — I say that I know this with all my heart.”

Professional Fools sometimes wore hats resembling coxcombs.

Humphrey Wasp continued, “There you have it, sir. You have my opinion of you, and if you are angry, then I say ‘turd in your teeth’ twice, if I have not said it once before, and much good may it do you.”

Mr. Winwife and Quarlous had been watching and listening.

Mr. Winwife said to Quarlous about Humphrey Wasp, “Was there ever such a self-affliction, and so impertinent?”

Quarlous said, “Alas, the person he is supposed to be taking care of — Bartholomew Cokes — is getting close to making him crazy. Let’s go over and comfort him.”

Mr. Winwife and Quarlous came forward.

Humphrey Wasp said, “I wish that I had been set in the ground, all except my head, and then had my brains bowled at, or threshed out, when first I underwent this plague of a charge! I would rather be dead than try to take care of Bartholomew Cokes!”

Humphrey Wasp had a kind of protectorship of Bartholomew Cokes; he was supposed to look out for the young man and keep him from doing foolish things.

Quarlous said, “How are you now, Numps? Almost tired in your protectorship? Overparted? Are you overparted?”

A part is a role in a play. Quarlous was asking if Humphrey Wasp had taken on too big of a role — one he was unsuited for — in real life.

Humphrey Wasp said, “Why, I cannot tell, sir; it may be that I have. Does it grieve you?”

Quarlous said, “No, I swear it does not, Numps. That is the answer to your question.”

“Numps” is a familiar nickname; it should not be used by a mere acquaintance.

Humphrey Wasp said, ““Numps’! By God’s blood, you are very familiar. How long have we been acquainted, I ask you?”

Quarlous replied, “I think that may be remembered, Numps. We have been acquainted since this morning, I am sure.”

Humphrey Wasp said, “Why, I hope I know it well enough, sir; I did not ask to be told.”

He had asked a rhetorical question that did not need to be answered.

Quarlous said, “No! Why did you ask me, then?”

Humphrey Wasp said, “It does not matter why.”

He added, “You see with your eyes now what I said to you earlier today. Will you believe what I say at another time?”

Earlier, he had complained about the childishness of Bartholomew Cokes. Quarlous could see for himself that what Humphrey Wasp had said was true.

Quarlous said, “Are you removing the fair, Numps?”

He was punning. His question meant two things: 1) Are you leaving the fair, Numps? And (referring to the large load of toys Humphrey Wasp was carrying) 2) Are you carrying away the entire fair on your back?

Humphrey Wasp said, “That is a pretty question, and a civil one! Yes, indeed, I have my lading, aka load, you see, or shall have a complete load soon; you may know whose beast I am by my burden. If the pannier-man’s jack were ever better known by his loins of mutton, I’ll be flayed, and feed dogs in place of him — the jack — when his time comes.”

A pannier is a waiter; a jack is a jackass. At Bartholomew Fair were many people serving food. Jackasses carried food such as mutton-loins to the fair. The mutton-loins were a more valuable load than toys, and so when the time came for one of the beasts of burden to be killed, flayed, and fed to the dogs, Humphrey Wasp would be killed before the pannier-man’s jackass — according to Humphrey Wasp.

Actually, he was punning. A pannier is 1) a waiter in the Inns of Court; he blew the horn to announce the meal and also brought in provisions, 2) a basket that could be used for carrying food such as mutton-loins, and 3) a server in general, such as could be at Bartholomew Fair. A jack is 1) a jackass, 2) a mechanism for roasting meat such as mutton-loins, 3) a representative common man of the working class, and so one who could be an assistant, and 4) a figure that would strike a bell on a clock and so one who was metaphorically a workingman.

Mr. Winwife said, “How melancholy Miss Grace is yonder! I say, let’s go enter ourselves in grace with her.”

“In grace” meant “in favor,” but there is a bawdy meaning to “enter ourselves in Grace.”

Standing in front of Lantern Leatherhead’s booth, Bartholomew Cokes said, “I’ll have those six hobbyhorses, friend —”

Humphrey Wasp said, “What!”

Bartholomew Cokes continued, “And the three Jew’s-harps, and half a dozen of toy birds, and that drum (I have one drum already) and your smiths; I like that device of your smiths, very prettily done; and four toy halberts — and, let me see, that fine painted great lady, and her three women for state, aka to make her appear stately, I’ll buy.”

Humphrey Wasp said sarcastically, “No, the shop; buy the whole shop, it will be best, the shop, the shop!”

Out to make a profit, Lantern Leatherhead said, “Yes, if his worship pleases to do so.”

Humphrey Wasp said to Lantern Leatherhead, “Yes, and he will keep it during the fair, bobchin.”

A bobchin is a kind of fool whose chin bobs up and down as he says something unwanted and unwonted.

Bartholomew Cokes said, “Peace, Numps. Don’t be angry.”

He then said to Lantern Leatherhead, “Friend, do not meddle with him, if you are wise and want to show your head openly and freely. He will sting you through your fancy nightcap, believe me.

“A set of these violins I would buy, too, for a delicate young noise I have in the country, who are every one a size less than another, just like your fiddles.”

The violins were toys, and the delicate young noise was a group of children who would play with the toy violins. A “noise” of musicians is a band of musicians.

Bartholomew Cokes continued, “I would like to have a fine young masque at my marriage, now I think about it.”

By “young,” he meant “new” or “recently created,” or possibly a masque whose entertainers are children and young people. A masque is an entertainment with music, dancing, and costumes.

He continued, “But I want such a number of things! And Numps will not help me now, and I dare not speak to him.”

Joan Trash said, “Will your worship buy any gingerbread, very good bread, comfort-food bread?”

Bartholomew Cokes said, “Gingerbread! Yes, let’s see it!”

He ran to her shop.

Humphrey Wasp said, “There’s the other springe.”

Literally, a springe is a trap for birds, some species of which are reputed to be bird-brained. Metaphorically, it is a trap for fools.

Lantern Leatherhead said, “Is this good behavior, Goody Joan, to interrupt my market in the midst of my making a sale, and call away my customers? Can you defend this behavior at the Pie-Powders Court?”

“Goody” is short for “Goodwife,” a way to address a female head of a household. The equivalent for men is “Goodman,” which is used to address a male head of a household below the rank of gentleman.

Joan Trash replied, “Why, if his mastership has a mind to buy, I hope my ware lies as open as another’s; I may show my ware as well as you may show yours.”

By “ware,” she meant gingerbread, which was the thing she had for sale.

Bartholomew Cokes said, “Be at peace; I’ll make both of you happy. I’ll buy up his shop of toys, and your basket of gingerbread.”

Humphrey Wasp said, “Will you, indeed?”

Lantern Leatherhead asked, “Why should you stop him from doing it, friend?”

Humphrey Wasp said, “I beg your mercy! You’d be sold too, would you? What’s the price of you, jacket and all, as you stand?”

The word “sold” meant “cheated,” as in “persuaded to buy goods of low quality at a higher price than ought to be set,” and it meant “bought by someone.”

Humphrey Wasp asked Lantern Leatherhead, “Have you any accomplishments?”

Joan Trash replied for him, “Yes, good man, angry man, you shall find he has accomplishments if you ask the price for — the worth of — him.”

Humphrey Wasp said, “By God’s soul, you are in charge of selling him! What are his accomplishments? Will they be bought for love or money?”

Joan Trash replied, “For love or money? No, indeed, sir.”

Humphrey Wasp asked, “For what then? Food?”

Joan Trash said, “He scorns food, sir; he has bread and butter at home, thanks be to God! And yet he will do more for a good meal, if the fancy takes him in the belly. Indeed, then they must not set him at the lower end of the table; if they do, he’ll go away, although he does not eat and will fast. But put him a-top o' the table, where his place is, and he'll do you forty fine things."

The less important guests were at the lower end of the table, and the more important guests, including the jester, aka Professional Fool, were at the higher end of the table, where the jester entertained the guests.

She continued, "He has not been sent for, and sought out for nothing, at your great city-suppers, to put down Coriat and Cokely, and been laughed at for his labor; he'll play you all the puppets in the town over, and the players, every company, and his own company, too; he spares nobody."

Coriat and Cokely were famous clowns. According to Joan Trash, Lantern Leatherhead was much sought-after and was funnier than them. Lantern Leatherhead's accomplishments included providing the voices for the puppets and acting.

Bartholomew Cokes said, "Indeed? Is that true?"

Joan Trash said, "He was the first, sir, who ever baited the fellow in the bear's skin, if it please your worship. No dog has ever come near him since."

In a bear-baiting, a bear would be tied to a stake, and dogs would be set on the bear to torment it. Recently, a man had put on a bearskin and then been "baited" by other men costumed as dogs. Lantern Leatherhead had been the first of the "dogs" to "bait" the "bear" and had been so good at it that he was better than real dogs. In fact, according to Joan Trash, according to Joan Trash, he had been so good at it that real dogs left him alone.

Joan Trash added, "And he is renowned for fine motions!"

One of Lantern Leatherhead's accomplishments was putting on puppet-plays, aka motions.

Bartholomew Cokes asked, “Is he good at those, too? Can he produce a masque, do you suppose?”

Joan Trash replied, “Oh, lord, Mr.! He is sought far and near for his inventions, and he monopolizes it all — he makes all the puppets in the fair.”

The inventions are devices — toys and puppets — and also shows as a whole.

Bartholomew Cokes said to Lantern Leatherhead, “Do you do all that? Truly? Do you, you in the old velvet jerkin? Give me your hand.”

Joan Trash said, “Sir, you shall see him in his velvet jerkin, and a scarf, too, at night, when you hear him put on Mr. Littlewit’s puppet-play.”

Bartholomew Cokes said, “Speak no more, but shut up shop immediately, friend. I’ll buy both it and you, too, to carry the contents away with me, and I will buy her hamper of gingerbread beside. Your shop shall furnish out the masque, and her shop shall furnish the dessert. I cannot do any less, if I want to provide entertainment that will suit the occasion well.

“What’s the price, at a word, of your whole shop, case and all, as it stands?”

Lantern Leatherhead said, “Sir, it stands me in — costs, and is worth to me — six and twenty shillings seven-pence halfpenny, besides three shillings to rent the ground on which my booth stands.”

Bartholomew Cokes said, “Well, thirty shillings will pay for all, then!”

He gave him the money.

He then asked Joan Trash, “And what does yours come to?”

Joan Trash replied, “Four shillings and eleven-pence, sir, ground and all, if it pleases your worship.”

Bartholomew Cokes said, “Yes, it does please my worship very well, poor woman: That’s five shillings more, rounded up.”

He gave her the money, and then he added, “What a masque shall I furnish, for forty shillings, which is twenty Scotch pounds — and a dessert of gingerbread! There’s a stately thing!

“Numps? Sister?

“And my wedding gloves, too! I never thought of that before!”

Gloves were an expensive traditional gift for wedding guests.

He continued, “All my wedding gloves will be made of gingerbread! Oh, me! What a joke will that be — my guests will eat their fingers’ ends!”

In other words, they will eat the gingerbread and then lick their fingers.

He continued, “And delicate brooches for the bridemen — male attendants for the bride — and all!”

A fashion had been for men to wear ornaments on their hats — Bartholomew Cokes wanted the ornaments to be gingerbread.

He continued, “And then I’ll have this poesy put to them, ‘For the best grace,’ meaning Miss Grace — that will be my wedding poesy.”

A poesy is a brief poetic expression. He would have it written on the gingerbread.

Grace said, “I am beholden to you, sir, and to your Bartholomew wit.”

“Bartholomew wit” is not a good thing. Bartholomew Cokes was a fool, and Miss Grace did not approve of his plans for celebrating their wedding. Giving guests cheap gingerbread instead of the expensive traditional gloves seemed cheap.

Humphrey Wasp also disapproved of Bartholomew Cokes’ plans: “You do not mean this, do you? Is this your first purchase?”

A “purchase” is “an attempt to bring about something.” This was Bartholomew Cokes’ first attempt at planning a big social event.

Bartholomew Cokes said, “Yes, indeed, and I do not think, Numps, but you shall say that it was the wisest act that I ever did in my wardship.”

He was young and still in his wardship. And he probably thought that he was being economical and therefore wise, but both Humphrey Wasp and Miss Grace probably thought that he was wasting money on toys he did not need and skimping on things that he ought to pay money for, such as wedding gloves.

Humphrey Wasp said sarcastically, “That is likely enough! I shall say anything at all, I shall!”

— 3.5 —

Ezekiel Edgworth, Nightingale, and some fairgoers arrived, followed at a distance by the disguised Justice Overdo.

The disguised Justice Overdo said quietly to himself, “I cannot beget a project, even with all my shrewd, political brain, yet. My project is how to fetch off this proper young man from his debauched company.”

He was referring to Ezekiel Edgworth, who of course he did not know was a cutpurse.

The disguised Justice Overdo continued, “I have followed him all over Bartholomew Fair, and always I find him with this songster, and I begin shrewdly to suspect their familiarity.”

The songster was Nightingale.

He continued, “And I suspect the young man of a terrible taint — poetry! If he is infected with that idle disease, there’s no hope of him ever enjoying a political career. Actum est of him for a commonwealth’s-man, if he even once goes to it in rhyme.”

Actum est is Latin for “It is over” or “He is finished.” If people should ever hear him sing even one song, he has no chance of a career in politics.

Ezekiel Edgworth said to Nightingale about Bartholomew Cokes, “Yonder he is buying gingerbread. Move in quickly, before he parts with too much of his money.”

Nightingale advanced and sang, “My masters, and friends, and good people, draw near —”

Bartholomew Cokes ran to Nightingale and exclaimed, “Ballads! Listen! Listen! Please, fellow, stay a little while here.

“Good Numps, look after the goods I have purchased.

“What ballads do you have? Let me see! Let me see for myself!”

Humphrey Wasp said to Quarlous and Mr. Winwife, “Why! He’s flown to another lime-bush. There he will flutter as long as it takes for him to have not even one feather left. Is there a vexation like this, gentlemen? Will you believe me now, hereafter? Shall I have credit with you?"

Bushes were coated with sticky birdlime to catch foolish birds.

Quarulous said, "Yes, indeed, you shall have credit with us, Numps. We will believe you, for you are worthy of being believed — you are sweating for it."

He said quietly to Mr. Winwife, "I never saw a young pimp-errant and his squire better matched."

The obsolete verb "pimper" meant "pamper and coddle," so a "pimp-errant" is a wandering spoiled child, and Humphrey Wasp is a squire — someone subordinate to him but also someone who is supposed to take care of him.

Mr. Winwife said, "Indeed, the sister comes after them well, too."

The sister is Bartholomew Cokes' sister: Mrs. Overdo.

Miss Grace Wellborn said, "Indeed, if you saw Justice Overdo, her husband and my guardian, you would have a group of four well-matched to sit together for a meal — he is such a 'wise' one in his way —"

Mr. Winwife said, "I wonder why we don't see him here."

Miss Grace Wellborn said, "Oh, he is too serious for this place, and yet he is better entertainment when he is serious than the other three are, I assure you, gentlemen. This is true wherever he is, even if it is on the judicial bench."

Bartholomew Cokes said to Nightingale, "What do you call this song? 'A Caveat Against Cutpurses!'"

The word "caveat" means "warning."

He continued, “A good jest, indeed. I would like to see that demon, that cutpurse you talk of, that delicate-handed Devil. They say he walks hereabouts. I would like to see him walk now.”

He then said to his sister, “Look, sister, look here, here” — he showed her his remaining purse, the one with the gold — “let him come, sister, and welcome.”

He then said to Nightingale, “Balladman, do any cutpurses haunt hereabout? I ask you to conjure up and raise one or two for me. Begin, and show me a cutpurse.”

Nightingale said, “Sir, this song is a spell against them. It is spick and span new, and it is made as if it were in and for my own person, and I sing it in my own defense against cutpurses. But it will cost you a penny for this ballad alone, if you buy it.”

Bartholomew Cokes said, “The price doesn’t matter. You don’t know me, I see. I am an odd Bartholomew.”

Mrs. Overdo asked, “Has it a fine picture, brother?”

The lyrics of ballads were printed on paper that was also illustrated with a picture of some kind.

Bartholomew Cokes said, “Oh, sister, do you remember the ballads over the nursery chimney at home? I myself did the pasting up.”

Ballads were often pasted up on walls or chimneys in alehouses and sometimes in private residences.

He said to Nightingale, “Those are splendid pictures; they are a different kind of pictures than these, friend.”

Humphrey Wasp said, “Yet these will serve to pick the pictures out of your pockets, you shall see.”

Coins had pictures of Kings on them. Humphrey Wasp's words could be applied to a pickpocket picking the pictures — and the coins on which the pictures were printed — out of someone's pocket.

Bartholomew Cokes said, "So I heard them say!"

He then said to Nightingale, "Please don't mind him, fellow; he'll have an oar — and stick his nose — in everything."

Ballad-singers were sometimes thought to be in league with cutpurses: The ballad-singer would draw a crowd and the cutpurse would pick pockets. Nightingale, who really was in league with a cutpurse, was leery of Humphrey Wasp's words.

Nightingale said, "This song was intended, sir, as a protection against a purse's being cut in my presence now. I may be held blameless, though, as by the sequel will more plainly appear."

One sequel was the singing of the song, which was clearly an admonition against cutpurses. Another sequel, as would soon become apparent, was the picking of a purse.

Bartholomew Cokes said, "We shall find that in the sequel. Please begin."

Nightingale said, "To the tune of 'Paggington's Pound,' sir."

"Paggington's Pound" was a well-known tune. Most copies of ballads had the lyrics and a woodcut picture on them. As far as music was concerned, a note would indicate the tune, as here: "To the tune of 'Paggington's Pound.'"

Bartholomew Cokes knew the tune and began singing, "Fa, la la la, la la la, fa, la la la!"

He then said to Nightingale, "I'll put you in tune and all; this will be my own country dance! Please begin."

Nightingale replied, "It is a gentle admonition, you must know, sir, both to the purse-cutter and the purse-bearer."

He may have said this in part as a warning to Ezekiel Edgworth. Humphrey Wasp's words may have caused Nightingale to be wary, and he perhaps thought that maybe now was not the time to cut Bartholomew Cokes' purse.

Bartholomew Cokes said, "Not a word more that is not part of the tune, if you respect me. Fa, la la la, la la la, fa, la la la."

Growing impatient, he said, "Come on! When will you begin to sing?"

Nightingale began to sing, and as he sang, Bartholomew Cokes provided his own commentary.

Nightingale sang:

"My masters, and friends, and good people, draw near,

"And look to your purses, because of what I do say."

Bartholomew Cokes said, "Ha, ha, this chimes! This rings true. This is good counsel right from the start."

Nightingale sang:

"And though little money in them you do bear,

"It costs more to get, than to lose in a day."

Bartholomew Cokes said, "This is good!"

Nightingale sang:

"You oft [often] have been told,

"Both the young and the old,

"And bidden [advised to] beware of the cutpurse so bold."

Bartholomew Cokes said, “Well said! He would be to blame who would not beware of cutpurses, to be sure!”

Nightingale sang:

“Then if you take heed not, free me from the curse,

“Who give you both warning, for [you] and the cutpurse.

“Youth, youth, you had better been starved by your nurse,

“Than live to be hanged for cutting a purse.”

Bartholomew Cokes said, “This is good, indeed. What do you say, Numps? Is there any harm in this?”

Nightingale sang:

“It has been upbraided to men of my trade,

“That oftentimes we are the cause of this crime.”

Bartholomew Cokes said, “The more coxcombs are they who did it, certainly.”

Nightingale sang:

“Alack and for pity, why should it be said?

“As if they regarded or [either] places or time!

“Examples have been

“Of some that [who] were seen

“In Westminster Hall, yea the pleaders between;

“Then why should the judges be free from this curse,

“More than my poor self, for cutting the purse?”

Westminster Hall was a site where several law courts met, so a cutpurse could very well regard as a challenge the picking of a pocket there.

Bartholomew Cokes said, “God-a-mercy for that! Why should they be more free indeed?”

The archaic phrase “God-a-mercy” expresses gratitude or thanks.

Nightingale sang the chorus again:

“Youth, youth, you had better been starved by your nurse,

“Than live to be hanged for cutting a purse.”

Bartholomew Cokes requested, “Sing that again, good ballad-man, sing that again.”

Nightingale and Bartholomew Cokes sang the chorus together:

“Youth, youth, you had better been starved by your nurse,

“Than live to be hanged for cutting a purse.”

Bartholomew Cokes said, “Oh, splendid! I would like to rub my elbow now, but I dare not pull out my hand.”

To rub elbows meant to hug oneself with delight. Bartholomew Cokes would have liked to do that, but he was keeping his hand tightly closed around his purse.

He continued, “Sing on, please; he who made this ballad shall be the poet-playwright of my masque.”

Nightingale sang:

“At Worcester, it is known well, and even in the jail,

“A knight of good worship did there show his face,

“Against the foul sinners, in zeal for to rail,

“And lost ipso facto his purse in the place.”

The Latin phrase ipso facto means “for that very reason” or “inevitably.”

Some cutpurses have been known to cut purses on the day before they were to be hung for cutting purses.

Bartholomew Cokes said, “Is it possible?”

Nightingale sang:

“Once from the seat

“Of judgment so great,

“A judge there did lose a fair pouch of velvete.”

“Velvete” is velvet.

Bartholomew Cokes asked, “Is that true?”

According to one story, Sir Thomas More was annoyed by a judge who criticized the victims of cutpurses, saying that the victims ought to have been more careful, so Sir Thomas More persuaded a cutpurse to steal the judge’s purse during the cutpurse’s trial. When the judge noticed that his purse was missing, Sir Thomas More gave it back to him along with the advice to not blame the victims of cutpurses.

Nightingale sang:

“Oh, Lord, for your mercy, how wicked or worse,

“Are those who so venture their necks for a purse!

“Youth, youth, you had better been starved by your nurse,

“Than live to be hanged for cutting a purse.”

Bartholomew Cokes sang the refrain after Nightingale had sang it, and then he said to Nightingale, “Please, stay a little while, friend.”

He then asked, “Yet on your conscience, Numps, speak, is there any harm in this?”

Humphrey Wasp replied, “To tell you the truth, the song is too good for you, unless you have the grace to follow the song’s advice.”

The disguised Justice Overdo said to himself, “It does reveal the enormity of the sin of purse-cutting. I’ll listen to it some more. I have not liked a paltry piece of poetry as well for a good long while.”

Bartholomew Cokes sang the refrain again:

*“Youth, youth, you had better been starved by your nurse,
Than live to be hanged for cutting a purse.”*

He then said, “Where’s now this youth who became a cutpurse? A man must call upon him for his own good, and yet he will not appear. Look here, here’s for him” — he displayed his purse and tossed it from hand to hand — “handy dandy, which hand will he have?”

Handy-dandy is a game in which children guess which hand an item is in.

Bartholomew Cokes said, “Sing on, please. Sing the rest of the song. I do hear of him, but I cannot see him. I do not see this master youth, the cutpurse.”

Nightingale sang:

*“At plays, and at sermons, and at the [law] sessions,
It is daily their practice such booty to make.
Yes, under the gallows at executions,
They stick not the stare-about’s purses to take.”*

In other words, they even steal the purses of people who are watching the executions of such people as cutpurses.

“Nay, one without grace,

“At a [far] better place,

“At court, and in Christmas, before the King’s face.”

On Christmas Day of 1611, John Selman cut a purse in the King’s Chapel at Whitehall. He did this while King James I was going forward to celebrate the sacrament of communion. John Selman was executed on 7 January 1612.

Bartholomew Cokes said, “That was a fine fellow! I would like to have him here now.”

Nightingale sang:

“Alack then for pity must I bear the curse,

“That only belongs to the cunning cutpurse?”

Bartholomew Cokes said, “But where’s the cutpurses’ cunning now, when they should use it? They are all chained up in prison now, I promise you.”

He sang the refrain again:

“Youth, youth, you had better been starved by your nurse,

“Than live to be hanged for cutting a purse.”

He then sang extempore, “The rat-catchers’ charme, are all fools and asses to this.”

The comma showed where he paused briefly while singing.

The word “charme” is an obsolete spelling of “charm.” The context shows that the word is plural. We would use the word “charms” today.

His sentence means this: “The rat-catchers’ charmed ones are all fools and asses compared to this cutpurse I am trying to trap.”

The word “charme” as used in this sentence is a noun. By metonymy, it means “charmed ones.” The phrase “to this” means “compared to this.” “This” refers to the cutpurse whom Bartholomew Cokes was trying to entice to steal his purse.

Rat-charmers were supposed to be able to charm rats with enchanted songs that would kill them. In Ireland, rat-catchers were said to rhyme rats to death. Sometimes, the charms were said to drive rats out of the country.

One meaning of “charm” as a verb is “subdue.”

Because the rat-catchers were able to kill rats or to drive them out of the country, the rats were fools and asses compared to this cutpurse, who was staying safe by staying hidden.

The word “charm” has other meanings that come into play here. As a verb, “to charm” means “to enchant” or “to bewitch,” and so as a noun, “a charm” means “an enchantment” or “a bewitchment.” Also as a noun, “a charm” is “a blending of voices” (possibly a choir) or “a song,” and “charm” means “singing.”

Bartholomew Cokes continued, “I hope that the cutpurses will suffer from the pox because they will not come here! It’s a shame that a man should have such a desire for a thing, and lack that thing!”

He wanted to see a cutpurse, but so far no cutpurse was forthcoming.

Quarulous said to Mr. Winwife, “Before God I say that I’d give half the fair, if it were mine, for a cutpurse for him, to satisfy his longing. I'd give half of Bartholomew Fair for a cutpurse to go to him and cut his purse."

Bartholomew Cokes said, "Look, sister."

He showed her his purse, and then quickly put it in one pocket and then another, saying, "Here it is. Here it is. Where is it now? Which pocket is it in? Do you want to make a wager?"

Humphrey Wasp said to him, "I ask you to leave your wagers, and let the singer end his song, if that is possible."

Bartholomew Cokes said, "Oh, are you edified by the song, Numps? Have you gained moral enlightenment from hearing it?"

The disguised Justice Overdo said to himself, "Indeed, Bartholomew Cokes interrupts the singer too much. There Numps spoke to good purpose."

Bartholomew Cokes said, "Sister, I am an ass. I cannot keep my purse!"

He showed his purse to his sister, and then he put it away and said to Nightingale, "Go on. Continue, please, friend."

Nightingale sang the refrain again:

"Youth, youth, you had better been starved by your nurse,

"Than live to be hanged for cutting a purse."

Mr. Winwife said to Quarlous, "Will you see something entertaining? Look, there's a fellow going over to Bartholomew Cokes, see."

As Nightingale sang, Ezekiel Edgworth went over to Bartholomew Cokes and tickled him in the ear with a straw twice to draw his hand out of his pocket.

Ezekiel Edgworth then put his hand in one of Bartholomew Cokes' pockets.

Quarulous said, "Good, indeed! Oh, he has lighted on the wrong pocket."

Ezekiel Edgworth then put his hand in Bartholomew Cokes' other pocket.

Mr. Winwife said, "He has it! He has the purse. Before God, I say that he is a brave, splendid fellow. It would be a pity if he were detected and handed over to the police."

Nightingale sang:

"But oh, you vile nation of cutpurses all,

"Relent [cease your sinning] and repent, and amend and be sound,

"And know that you ought not, by honest men's fall,

"Advance your own fortunes, to die above ground;"

People who are hung die above ground.

"And though you go [about] gay

"In silks, as you may,

"It is not the highway to heaven (as they say).

"Repent then, repent you, for better, for worse,

"And kiss not the gallows for cutting a purse.

"Youth, youth, you had better been starved by your nurse,

"Than live to be hanged for cutting a purse."

All cried, "An excellent ballad! An excellent ballad!"

Ezekiel Edgworth said to Nightingale, "Friend, let me buy the first copy of the ballad! Let me have the first, please."

As Nightingale handed him a copy of the ballad, Ezekiel Edgworth slipped the purse into his hand.

Bartholomew Cokes said, "Pardon me, sir. First come, first served — and I'll buy the whole bundle of ballads, too."

Mr. Winwife said to Quarlous, "That conveyance of the purse to the ballad-singer was better than even the theft. Did you see it? He has given the purse to the ballad-singer."

Quarlous said, "Has he!"

Ezekiel Edgworth said to Bartholomew Cokes, "Sir, I beg your pardon. I'll not hinder the poor man's profit; please, don't think I would stop you from buying his ballads. Don't mis-take me."

Bartholomew Cokes replied, "Sir, I take you for an honest gentleman, and I don't think that is mis-taking you. I met you earlier today."

He reached into his pocket and shouted, "Oh, Lord! My purse is gone, my purse, my purse, my purse!"

Humphrey Wasp said, "Come, do not cry and make a stir and make yourself an ass throughout Bartholomew Fair before your time."

He did not believe that the purse was missing.

Bartholomew Cokes said, "Why, do you have it, Numps? Good Numps, how did you come to get it, I wonder?"

Humphrey Wasp said, "Please seek some other gamester to play the fool with. You may lose your purse soon enough, despite all your Bartholomew Fair wit."

Bartholomew Cokes said, "By this good hand, glove and all, I have lost it already if you don't have it. Feel my pocket, and I have lost Miss Grace's handkerchief, too, out of the other pocket."

The handkerchief was an expensive embroidered gift that Miss Grace had given to him.

Humphrey Wasp said sarcastically, “Why, this is good, very good, exceedingly pretty and good.”

Ezekiel Edgworth asked, “Are you sure you have lost it, sir?”

Bartholomew Cokes said, “Oh, Lord! Yes, as I am an honest man, I had it but just now, as I was singing ‘Youth, youth.’”

Nightingale asked, “I hope you don’t suspect me, sir?”

Ezekiel Edgworth said, “You! That’s very funny, indeed! Do you think that the gentleman is foolish? Where did you have your hands, I ask you? Nowhere near his pockets. Go away, ass, go away!”

Nightingale exited to give the stolen purse to Ursula.

The disguised Justice Overdo said, “I shall be beaten again, if I am seen.”

He attempted to slip away without being noticed.

Ezekiel Edgworth said to Bartholomew Cokes, “Sir, I suspect an odd fellow, yonder, who is stealing away.”

Mrs. Overdo said, “Brother, it is the preaching fellow we saw and heard earlier. You must suspect him. He was present when your other purse was stolen, you know!”

She said to the disguised Justice Overdo, who was actually her husband, “No, stay, sir, and view the work you have done; if you are given a position at the gallows, and preach there, thank your own handiwork.”

Criminals on the gallows were allowed to make a speech of repentance before they were hung.

Bartholomew Cokes said, “Sir, you shall take no pride in your preferment; you shall be silenced quickly.”

The preferment was being given a position on the gallows. Bartholomew Cokes was saying that the disguised Justice Overdo, who he supposed was the cutpurse, would be quickly hung.

The men present seized the disguised Justice Overdo, who asked, “What do you mean, sweet buds of gentility?”

By “buds,” he meant “young folks.”

Bartholomew Cokes said, “To have my pennyworth’s out of you, bud.”

He wanted his money back, or if it was not forthcoming, he wanted his money’s worth of revenge.

He continued, “No less than two purses a day will serve you! I thought you were a simple fellow, when my man Numps beat you this morning, and I pitied you.”

Mrs. Overdo said, “So did I. I’ll be sworn that I did, brother, but now I see he is a lewd and pernicious enormity, as Justice Overdo would call him.”

The disguised Justice Overdo thought, My own words are being turned upon me like swords!

Bartholomew Cokes said, “Can’t you let a man’s purse lie quietly in the owner’s pocket? Instead, you must entice it out of the pocket, and debauch it!”

Men carried away the disguised Justice Overdo.

Humphrey Wasp said to Bartholomew Cokes, “Sir, sir, keep your ‘debauch,’ and your other fine Bartholomew terms to yourself, and make as much of them as you please. But give me this from you in the meantime. Please, let’s see if I can look after this.”

He attempted to get the black box containing the marriage license from Bartholomew Cokes, who asked, “Why, Numps?”

Humphrey Wasp replied, “Why? Because you are an ass, sir, there’s the reason expressed in the shortest and most direct way I can tell you, if you must know the reason.

“Now that you have got the trick of losing things, you’d lose your pants if they were loose. I know you, sir, come, deliver the box to me.”

He took the box from him.

He continued, “You’ll go and crack the vermin you breed now, will you?”

This meant that Bartholomew Cokes wanted to catch and strike the cutpurses whom he had created by daring people to steal his purse. Another meaning was “speak contemptuously about someone or something.” Yet another meaning of the word “crack” was “break wind,” a meaning that can be associated with pants. Unfortunately, vermin can also be associated with pants; for some people in this society, the seams of pants were breeding grounds for lice.

Humphrey Wasp continued, “That’s very fine in theory, but will you have the truth of it? The cutpurses are reckless flies just like you, who breed cutpurses abroad in every corner. Your foolish handling of money creates cutpurses. If there were here no one wiser than I am, sir — that is, if I could have my way — the trade would lie open for you, sir, it would, indeed, sir.”

The word “trade” meant “path” at this time. If it were up to Humphrey Wasp, the path out of Bartholomew Fair would lie open for Bartholomew Cokes. Humphrey Wasp wanted Bartholomew Cokes to go home.

He continued, “I would teach your wit to come to your head, sir, as well as your land to come into your hand, I assure you, sir.”

He meant that he would teach him to have a well-regulated life that would bring him wealth.

Mr. Winwife said, “This is a pity, good Numps!”

Humphrey Wasp said, “No, gentlemen, don’t pity me. I am not worth it. If the Lord ever sends me home to Harrow o’ the Hill, again, then if I travel any more, call me Coriat with all my heart.”

Harrow on the Hill was a town northwest of London.

Coriat was a Fool who traveled extensively.

Humphrey Wasp, Bartholomew Cokes, and Mrs. Overdo exited. Humphrey Wasp was carrying the box. Still remaining were Ezekiel Edgworth, Quarlous, Mr. Winwife, and Miss Grace Wellborn.

Ezekiel Edgworth started to exit, but Quarlous stopped him and said, “Stay, sir, I must have a word with you in private. Do you hear me?”

“A word with me, sir?” Ezekiel Edgworth replied. “What do you want, good sir?”

Quarlous said, “Do not deny it: You are a cutpurse, sir. This gentleman here and I saw you. But we do not mean to reveal to the authorities what you have done, although we can sufficiently inform ourselves about the danger of concealing you, thereby becoming accessories after the fact — but you must do us a piece of service.”

Ezekiel Edgworth said, “Good gentlemen, do not ruin me. I am a civil young man, and indeed I am only a beginner at this work.”

Quarlous replied, "Sir, your beginning shall bring on your ending as far as we are concerned. You can continue to do what you have begun to do. We are neither catchpoles nor constables."

Catchpoles are sheriff's officers.

Quarlous continued, "The piece of service that you are to undertake for us is this. Do you see the old fellow with the black box here?"

Ezekiel Edgworth replied, "The little old governor, sir?"

Quarlous replied, "The same. I see you have marked him as a possible mark already. I would have you get that box away from him, and bring it to us."

Ezekiel Edgworth said, "Would you have the box and all, sir, or only that which is inside it? I'll get you that, and leave him the box to play with still, which will be the harder of the two services, because I would gain your worship's good opinion of me."

Mr. Winwife said, "He speaks well. Getting the document and leaving the box will take a greater mastery of the art of thievery, and we will have the greater entertainment when what is in the box is missed."

Ezekiel Edgworth said, "Yes, and it will take longer to discover that it is missing, which will lengthen the entertainment."

Quarlous said, "But look you do it now, sirrah, and keep your word, or —"

"Sirrah" was a title given to a man of lower status than the speaker.

Ezekiel Edgworth interrupted, "Sir, if I ever break my word with a gentleman, may I never read word at my need."

People could get out of capital punishment if they could show that they could read Latin. Ezekiel Edgworth was saying that if he broke his word to Quarlous, then he was willing to be hung.

He then asked, “Where shall I find you?”

Quarlous said, “Somewhere in the fair, around here. Do this quickly.”

Ezekiel Edgworth exited.

Quarlous continued, “I would like to see Humphrey Wasp — the painstaking fool — deluded! Of all beasts, I love the serious ass: he who takes pains to be one and who plays the fool with the greatest diligence that can be.”

Miss Grace Wellborn said, “Then you would not choose, sir, but to love my guardian, Justice Overdo, who is answerable to that description in every hair of him. He is a painstaking fool.”

Quarlous said, “So I have heard. But how came you, Miss Grace Wellborn, to be his ward, or to first have any kind of relationship to him?”

Miss Grace Wellborn said, “Indeed, through a common calamity, he bought me, sir; and now he will marry me to his wife’s brother, this ‘wise’ gentleman whom you see; or else I must pay value of my land.”

She was an orphan and the heir of parents who held land from King James I. Because of this, she was the King’s ward, and because he wanted to raise money, the King had exercised his right to sell his guardianship of her. Justice Overdo had bought her guardianship, which allowed him to choose a husband for her, and he was now seeking to marry her to his wife’s brother: Bartholomew Cokes. He was not a suitable husband for her, but it was common for people to misuse their guardianships to provide advantageous marriages for family members. Miss Grace Wellborn could refuse to marry Bartholomew Cokes, but doing that would cost her a significant part of her inheritance.

The selling of guardianships was a common catastrophe and would be abolished in a few years.

Quarlous said, “By God’s eyelid, is there no device of disparagement, or something similar? Talk with some crafty fellow, some picklock of the law. I wish I had studied a year longer in the Inns of Court, even if the result had been only that I could be in your case.”

This has a bawdy meaning. “Case” can mean “legal case” or “vagina.”

Mr. Winwife thought, Mr. Quarlous, what are you proposing?

Miss Grace Wellborn said, “You’d bring but little aid, sir.”

There were some limits on whom a guardian could choose as spouse for his ward. The two had to be similar in social status, and the spouse could not be an idiot. Bartholomew Cokes and Miss Grace Wellborn were of similar social status, and he could read, so he was not an idiot in the accepted legal sense.

Mr. Winwife thought about Quarlous, I’ll keep an eye on you, indeed, gamester.

He said out loud, “This is an unfortunate foolish tribe, aka family, you have fallen into, lady. I wonder that you can endure them.”

Miss Grace Wellborn said, “Sir, they who cannot work their fetters off must wear them.”

Mr. Winwife said, “You see what care they are taking of you — they have left you behind like this.”

Miss Grace Wellborn said, “Indeed, they take the same care of me that they take of themselves, sir. I cannot greatly complain, if this were all I had against them.”

Mr. Winwife said, “That is true, but will it please you to withdraw with us for a little while, so you can make them think they have lost you? I hope our manners and our language have been such as will give you no cause to fear for your safety while you are in our company.”

Miss Grace Wellborn replied, “Sir, I will give myself no cause or reason to fear my being in your company. I am so secure in my own conduct and morality that I will not suspect yours.”

She was positive that she would behave properly and that the two men would follow suit.

Looking up, Quarlous said, “Look, John Littlewit is coming.”

Mr. Winwife said, “Let’s leave. I don’t want to be seen by him.”

Quarlous said, “No, it is best for you that he not see you. He’d tell his mother, the widow.”

Mr. Winwife said, “What! What do you mean?”

Quarlous said, “I beg your pardon. Is that the way the wind blows? Must I not mention the widow?”

Both Quarlous and Mr. Winwife were interested in Miss Grace Wellborn. Mr. Winwife did not want the widow to be mentioned because he did not want Miss Grace Wellborn to know, or to remember, that he had been courting the widow.

Quarlous, Mr. Winwife, and Miss Grace Wellborn exited.

Mr. John Littlewit and his wife, Mrs. Win Littlewit, emerged from Ursula's booth, where they had been eating pig.

Mr. John Littlewit said, "Do you hear, Win, Win?"

Mrs. Win Littlewit asked, "What are you saying, John?"

Mr. John Littlewit said, "While they are paying the reckoning, Win, I'll tell you a thing, Win. We shall never see any sights in Bartholomew Fair, Win, unless you continue to have cravings, Win. So, good Win, sweet Win, long to see some hobbyhorses, and some drums, and rattles, and dogs, and fine devices, Win. Long to see the bull with the five legs, Win, and the immense hog. Now that you have begun with longing for pig, you may long for anything, Win, and so you can long to see my puppet-play, Win."

Mrs. Win Littlewit said, "But we shall not eat of the bull and the hog, John; how then shall I long for them?"

Mr. John Littlewit said, "Oh, you can, Win, you may long to see, as well as to taste, Win.

"Remember the apothecary's wife, Win, who longed to see the dissection of a corpse, Win?

"Remember the lady, Win, who desired to spit in the great lawyer's mouth, after his very eloquent pleading?"

In this society, hunters would spit in the mouths of hunting dogs as a way to encourage them. Hunting dogs did not mind this, although most lawyers would. However, the lawyer may have metaphorically spit out fancy words and in doing so may have literally and accidentally spit on the lady, which may have made her importunate and insistent about spitting in the great lawyer's mouth.

Mr. John Littlewit continued, "I assure you that these women longed, Win. Good Win, go inside, and long to see the sights of the fair."

Mr. John Littlewit and Mrs. Win Littlewit went back inside Ursula's booth.

Joan Trash and Lantern Leatherhead were still at their booths.

Joan Trash said, "I think we are rid of our new customer, brother Leatherhead. We shall hear no more of him."

The new customer was Bartholomew Cokes, who had bought all of their wares. He had paid the money for their wares, but in the excitement over having his purse cut, he had not taken possession of the wares he had bought.

Lantern Leatherhead said, "All the better; let's pack up everything and leave, before he finds us."

Joan Trash said, "Stay a little longer. Yonder comes a company of people. It may be that we may make some more money."

Joan Trash and Lantern Leatherhead were willing to make more money by reselling wares that Bartholomew Cokes had already paid money for.

Jordan Knockem and Zeal-of-the-land Busy came out of Ursula's booth. Zeal-of-the-land Busy had been trying to convert Jordan Knockem to Puritanism.

Jordan Knockem said, "Sir, I will take your advice, and cut my hair short like a Puritan, and leave vapors. I see that tobacco, and bottle-ale, and pig, and Whit, and even Ursula herself, is all vanity."

Zeal-of-the-land Busy, who had just eaten pig, said, “Only pig was not comprehended in my admonition. All the rest were.

“As for long hair, it is an ensign of pride, a banner, and the world is full of those banners, very full of banners.

“And bottle-ale is a drink of Satan’s, a drink prescribed by Satan. It is devised to puff us up, and make us swell in this latter age of vanity.

“The purpose of the smoke of tobacco is to keep us in mist and error.

“But the fleshly woman, which you call Ursla, is above all to be avoided, having the marks upon her of the three enemies of man: the World, as being in the fair; the Devil, as being in the fire; and the Flesh, as being herself.”

He used “which” to refer to Ursla rather than the word “whom,” which we use to refer to human beings.

Dame Purecraft came out of Ursla’s booth and said, “Brother Zeal-of-the-land! What shall we do? My daughter Win-the-fight is fallen into her fit of longing again.”

Zeal-of-the-land Busy said, “For more pig! There is no more, is there?”

Dame Purecraft said, “To see some sights in the fair.”

Zeal-of-the-land Busy said, “Sister, let her flee from the impurity of the place swiftly, lest she partake of the pitch thereof. Oh, Smithfield, you are the seat of the beast, and I will leave you! Idolatry peeps out on every side of you.”

Jordan Knockem thought, He is an excellent complete hypocrite! Now that his belly is full, he falls to railing and kicking the jade, aka metaphorical bad horse. A very “good” vapor! I’ll go in and entertain Ursla by telling her how her pig works. He has eaten two and a half portions, and he has drunk a pail full of ale. He eats with his eyes, as well as his teeth.

Zeal-of-the-land Busy had warned others not to look at the sights of the fair, but he was looking at them now as he criticized them.

Jordan Knockem went inside Ursula's booth.

Lantern Leatherhead shouted, "What do you lack, gentlemen? What is it you want to buy? Rattles, drums, doll babies —"

Zeal-of-the-land Busy said, "Silence! Be quiet about your apocryphal wares, you profane publican. Be quiet about your bells, your dragons, and your Tobie's dogs."

Zeal-of-the-land Busy was alluding to parts of the Apocrypha, all of which the Puritans rejected. Those parts were the stories of Bel and the Dragon and of Tobit (Tobie).

He continued, "Your hobbyhorse is an idol, a very idol, a fierce and rank idol; and you, the Nebuchadnezzar, the proud Nebuchadnezzar of the fair, who set it up for children to fall down before and worship."

Nebuchadnezzar was a King of Babylon who forced his people to worship a golden idol.

Lantern Leatherhead shouted, "I beg your mercy, sir; will you buy a fiddle to fill up your noise?"

A noise is a group of musicians, but Lantern Leatherhead meant that the fiddle could be the accompaniment to the noise that Zeal-of-the-land Busy was making.

Mr. John Littlewit and Mrs. Win Littlewit came out of Ursula's booth.

Mr. John Littlewit said, “Look, Win, do, look in God’s name, and save your craving. Here are fine sights.”

The word “save” meant “anticipate and take action to prevent.” Win’s way of taking action to prevent her craving was to satisfy her craving.

Dame Purecraft said to her, “Yes, child, as long as you hate them, as our brother Zeal-of-the-land Busy does, you may look at them.”

Lantern Leatherhead said to Zeal-of-the-land Busy, “Or what do you say to a drum, sir?”

Zeal-of-the-land Busy replied, “It is the broken belly of the beast, and your bellows there are its lungs, and these pipes are its throat, those feathers are of its tail, and your rattles are the gnashing of its teeth.”

Joan Trash said, “And what’s my gingerbread, I ask you?”

Zeal-of-the-land Busy replied, “The provender that pricks him up.”

“Pricks him up” meant “stimulates him.” The words included sexual imagery.

He continued, “Go away and take with you your basket of popery, your nest of images, and your whole legend of ginger-work.”

The Puritans rejected Catholic saints and such things as books of legends about Catholic saints. Joan Trash had gingerbread men, and Zeal-of-the-land Busy was likening them to images of Saint Bartholomew.

Lantern Leatherhead said, “Sir, if you are not quiet very quickly, I’ll have you clapped by the heels quickly into the stocks for disturbing the fair.”

Zeal-of-the-land Busy said, “The sin of the fair provokes me! I cannot be silent!”

Dame Purecraft said, “Good brother Zeal!”

Lantern Leatherhead said, “Sir, I’ll make you silent, believe it.”

Mr. John Littlewit said quietly to Lantern Leatherhead, “I’ll give you a shilling if you do that, indeed, friend.”

Lantern Leatherhead said, “Sir, give me your shilling. I’ll give you my shop if I do not get him clapped into the stocks. In the meantime, I’ll leave my shop in pawn with you.”

Mr. John Littlewit gave him a shilling and said, “Agreed, but do it quickly.”

Lantern Leatherhead exited.

Zeal-of-the-land Busy said to Dame Purecraft, “Don’t try to stop me, woman. I was moved in spirit to be here this day, in this fair, this wicked and foul fair — and fitter may it be called a foul than a fair — to protest against the abuses of it, the foul abuses of it, in regard of the afflicted saints, who are troubled, very much troubled, exceedingly troubled, with the opening of the merchandise of Babylon again, and the peeping of popery upon the stalls here, here, in the high places.”

The afflicted saints, Zeal-of-the-land Busy believed, are the Puritans.

He pointed to a yellow-haired doll and said, “Don’t you see Goldy-locks, the purple strumpet there, in her yellow gown and green sleeves?”

Purple is a color associated with repentance from sin, so it would have been better for Zeal-of-the-land Busy’s rhetorical purposes if the doll had been scarlet.

He continued, “Don’t you see the profane pipes, the tinkling timbrels? A shop of relics!”

He was criticizing Lantern Leatherhead’s toys, which he then attempted to seize in order to destroy them.

Mr. John Littlewit said, “I have to tell you not to do that. I have been entrusted to look after them.”

Zeal-of-the-land Busy turned to Joan Trash and said about her gingerbread men, “And this idolatrous grove of images, this flasket of idols, which I will pull down —”

He hit the gingerbread basket and knocked much of the gingerbread onto the ground.

Zeal-of-the-land Busy was envisioning himself as emulating Jesus in the Temple of God chasing away the changers of money.

This is John 2:13-16 (King James Version):

13 And the Jews’ passover was at hand, and Jesus went up to Jerusalem.

14 And found in the temple those that sold oxen and sheep and doves, and the changers of money sitting:

15 And when he had made a scourge of small cords, he drove them all out of the temple, and the sheep, and the oxen; and poured out the changers’ money, and overthrew the tables;

16 And said unto them that sold doves, Take these things hence; make not my Father’s house an house of merchandise.

Joan Trash lamented, “Oh, my ware! My ware! God bless it!”

Zeal-of-the-land Busy said, “In my zeal and glory I have been thus angered.”

Lantern Leatherhead returned, bringing with him some law officers, who were led by Poacher.

Lantern Leatherhead pointed to Zeal-of-the-land Busy and said, “Here he is; please lay hold of his zeal. We cannot sell a whistle because of him and his tune. Stop his noise first.”

Zeal-of-the-land Busy said, “You cannot; this is a sanctified noise. I will make a loud and most strong noise, until I have daunted the profane enemy. And for this cause —”

Lantern Leatherhead interrupted, “Sir, no man here is afraid of you, or your cause. You shall swear it in the stocks, sir.”

Ready to become a martyr, Zeal-of-the-land Busy said, “I will thrust myself into the stocks, upon the pikes of the land.”

Pikes are long-handled weapons with points at the end.

The law officers seized him.

Lantern Leatherhead said, “Carry him away.”

Dame Purecraft shouted, “What are you doing, wicked men?”

Zeal-of-the-land Busy said, “Let them alone. I don’t fear them.”

The law officers exited with him in custody, followed by Dame Purecraft.

Mr. John Littlewit said, “Wasn’t this shilling well spent, Win, since it has gotten us our liberty? Now we may go play, and see all of the fair, and go where we want to go. My mother-in-law has gone after him, and let’s let her go, because it frees us to do what we want.”

Mrs. Win Littlewit replied, “Yes, John, but I don’t know what to do.”

“About what, Win?”

“For a thing I am ashamed to tell you, indeed, and it’s too far for me to go home.”

Mr. John Littlewit said, “Please don’t be ashamed, Win. Come, I won’t make you feel ashamed. Is it anything about the hobbyhorse man? If it is, speak freely.”

He thought that she wanted to buy something.

Mrs. Win Littlewit said, “Hang him. He’s a base bobchin. I scorn him; no, I have very great what sha’ call ’um, John.”

She whispered to him that she urgently needed to pee.

He replied, “Oh, is that all, Win? We’ll go back to Captain Jordan, to the pig-woman’s, Win, he’ll help us, or she, with a dripping-pan, or an old kettle, or something.”

A dripping-pan is a clever term — or item — to use for a chamber pot.

Mr. John Littlewit continued, “The poor greasy soul loves you, Win, and afterward we’ll go all over the fair, Win, and see my puppet-play, Win; you know it’s a fine matter, Win.”

Mr. John Littlewit and Mrs. Win Littlewit exited.

Lantern Leatherhead said, “Let’s leave. I advised you to pack up before, Joan.”

Joan Trash said, “A pox on that Puritan’s Bedlam purity! He has spoiled half my ware, but the best thing is, we lose nothing if we can avoid our first customer.”

She meant Bartholomew Cokes.

Lantern Leatherhead said, “It shall be hard for him to find or know us, when we are transformed by disguising ourselves.”

ACT 4 (Bartholomew Fair)

— 4.1 —

Among booths, stalls, and a pair of stocks at the fair stood Bartholomew Cokes. With him were the law officers Bristle, Haggis, and others. Also present were the disguised Justice Overdo, who was in the custody of the law officers, and the madman Troubleall.

Troubleall said, “Sirs, I have no doubt that you are officers.”

Bristle asked, “What about it then, sir?”

Troubleall continued, “And you are the King’s loving and obedient subjects.”

“Obedient, friend!” Bristle said, “Be careful what you say, I — Oliver ‘Davy’ Bristle — advise you. His loving subjects, we grant you; but not his obedient, at this time, by your leave; we know ourselves to be a little better than that; we are to command, sir, and such as you are to be obedient. Here’s one of his obedient subjects going to the stocks; and we’ll make you such another, if you talk like that.”

Troubleall said, “You are all wise enough in your places, I know.”

“If you know it, sir, why do you bring it in question?” Bristle asked.

“I question nothing, pardon me,” Troubleall said. “I only hope you have a warrant for what you do, and if you do, quit ye and multiply ye.”

The words “quit ye and multiply ye” meant “may God reward you and may God make your family grow in number”; however, the word “God” was not mentioned because Troubleall feared committing blasphemy.

A warrant is an order authorizing an act.

Troubleall exited.

Haggis asked, “Who is he?”

He then said about the disguised Justice Overdo, “Bring him up to the stocks there. Why aren’t you bringing him up?”

The disguised Justice Overdo was brought forward.

Troubleall returned and said, “If you have Justice Overdo’s warrant, all is well and you are safe: His is the warrant of warrants. I wouldn’t give this button for any other man’s warrant.”

Bristle said, “That’s likely enough, sir, but let me tell you, if you play with your buttons like this, you will want and need them before night, for any abundance I see about you. You had best keep them, and save the need for pins to use on your clothing, indeed.”

Troubleall exited again.

The disguised Justice Overdo said to himself, “Who is he, the man who esteems and praises my warrant? He seems a sober and discreet person: It is a comfort to a good conscience to be followed with a good reputation after his sufferings. The world will have a pretty taste — because of this — of how I can bear adversity; and it will beget a kind of reverence towards me hereafter, even from my enemies, when they shall see that I carry my calamity nobly, and that it neither breaks me nor bends me.”

Haggis said to the disguised Justice Overdo, “Come, sir, here’s a place for you to preach in. Will you put in your leg?”

These stocks restrained only one leg, rather than both legs, of the prisoner.

The disguised Justice Overdo said, “That I will, cheerfully.”

The law officers put him in the stocks.

Bristle said, “On my conscience, he is a seminary! He kisses the stocks.”

A seminary is a Catholic priest who was trained abroad and is serving in England.

Bartholomew Cokes said, “Well, my sirs, I’ll leave him with you; now I see him bestowed, I’ll go look for my goods, and for Numps.”

He had paid Lantern Leatherhead and Joan Trash for all their wares, but because he thought that the disguised Justice Overdo had stolen his purse, he had gone away without collecting his purchases.

Haggis said, “You may leave, sir, I warrant you.”

Bartholomew Cokes exited.

Haggis said, “Where’s the other bawler? Fetch him, too. You shall find them both fast enough.”

The other bawler was Zeal-of-the-land Busy. Bawlers are religious people who bother other people with their sermonizing.

Some law officers exited.

The disguised Justice Overdo said to himself, “In the midst of this tumult, I will yet be the author of my own rest, and not minding their fury, I will sit in the stocks in that calm as shall be able to trouble a triumph.”

Victorious Roman generals were given triumphs, parades in which their army marched and in which important prisoners were bound and forced to walk behind the general’s chariot.

Troubleall returned and said, “Do you assure me upon your words? May I vouch for you, if I am asked the question, that you have this warrant? Do you have the necessary warrant from Justice Overdo to carry out this punishment?”

Haggis asked, “Who is this fellow, for God’s sake?”

Troubleall said, “Do but show me Justice Adam Overdo, and I am satisfied.”

He exited again.

Bristle replied, “He is a fellow who is distracted — mad, they say. His name is Troubleall. He was an officer in the Pie-Powders Court here last year, and he was put out of his position by Justice Overdo.”

The disguised Justice Overdo said to himself, “Oh!”

Bristle said, “After he lost his position on the court, he acquired a foolish obsession, and is run mad because of it, so that ever since he will do nothing except by Justice Overdo’s warrant. He will not eat a crust, nor drink a little, nor get dressed, without the warrant of Justice Overdo. His wife, begging your pardon, cannot get him to pee, or change his shirt, without the warrant of Justice Overdo.”

The disguised Justice Overdo said to himself, “If this is true, this is my greatest disaster. I am bound to help this poor man who has so good a nature toward me but who is out of his wits, when I arrive at a time and place where I have no need for dissembling — no need to be in disguise.”

Troubleall returned and said, “If you cannot show me Adam Overdo, I fear for you; I am afraid you cannot answer the charges that will be made against you.”

Troubleall exited.

Haggis said, “I say, neighbor Bristle — now that I have had time to think better about it — Justice Overdo is a very parantory person.”

By “parantory,” he meant “peremptory.”

Bristle replied, “Oh, are you aware of that! And he is a severe justice-giver, by your leave.”

The disguised Justice Overdo said to himself, “Do I hear ill from that side, too?”

He was now hearing ill things about himself coming from a law officer.

Bristle said, “He will sit as upright on the bench, if you observe him closely, as a candle in the socket, and he will give light to the whole court in every business.”

Haggis said, “But he will burn blue, and swell like a boil, God bless us, if he is angry.”

A candle flame that burns with a bluish tint is a bad omen.

Bristle said, “Yes, and he will be angry, too, when he wants to be, what’s more, and when he is angry, be it right or wrong, he always has the law on his side. I have noticed that, too.”

The disguised Justice Overdo said to himself, “I will be more tender hereafter. I see that compassion may become a justice, although it is a weakness, I confess, and it is closer to being a vice than a virtue.”

Haggis said, “Well, take him out of the stocks again. We’ll go a sure way to work, and we’ll have the ace of hearts — the winning card — on our side, if we can.”

He did not want to get on Justice Overdo’s bad side.

They took the disguised Justice Overdo out of the stocks.

Poacher and the other law officers arrived with Zeal-of-the-land Busy in their custody. Dame Purecraft followed them.

Poacher said, “Come, bring him over to his fellow there.”

His fellow was the disguised Justice Overdo.

He then said, “Mr. Busy, we shall rule your legs, I hope, though we cannot rule your tongue.”

Zeal-of-the-land Busy said, “No, minister of darkness, no; you cannot rule my tongue; my tongue is my own, and with it I will both knock and mock down your Bartholomew abominations, until you are made an object to be hissed at by all the neighboring parishes round about here.”

Haggis said, “Let him alone. We have devised a better way to do things.”

Dame Purecraft asked, “And he shall not go into the stocks then?”

Bristle said, “No, Mrs., we’ll take them both to Justice Overdo, and let him judge over them as is fitting. That way, I and my friend Haggis and my beadle, aka law officer, whose name is Poacher, are relieved of our responsibility over them.”

Dame Purecraft said, “Oh, I thank you, blessed honest men!”

Bristle said, “No, you need not thank us, but thank this madman who is coming here! He put the idea in our heads.”

Troubleall returned.

Dame Purecraft said, “Is he mad? May Heaven now increase his madness, and bless it, and thank it.”

She said to Troubleall, “Sir, your poor handmaid thanks you.”

Troubleall asked, “Have you a warrant? If you have a warrant, show it.”

Dame Purecraft said, “Yes, I have a warrant out of the Word to give thanks for removing any scorn intended to the brethren.”

Puritans — the brethren — called the Bible the Word.

Everyone except Troubleall exited.

Troubleall said, “It is Justice Overdo’s warrant that I look for; if you have not that, then you keep your word and I’ll keep mine. Quit ye and multiply ye.”

— 4.2 —

Ezekiel Edgworth and Nightingale appeared.

Ezekiel Edgworth said, “Come away with me, Nightingale, please.”

“Where are you going?” Troubleall asked. “Where’s your warrant?”

“Warrant!” Ezekiel Edgworth asked. “For what, sir?”

Troubleall replied, “For what you go about doing, you know how fit it is; if you have no warrant, then bless you, and I’ll pray for you — that’s all I can do.”

He exited.

Ezekiel Edgworth asked, “What does he mean?”

“He’s a madman who haunts Bartholomew Fair,” Nightingale replied. “Don’t you know him? It’s a marvel he hasn’t more followers after his ragged heels.”

Sometimes, children followed Troubleall.

Ezekiel Edgworth said, “Curse him, he startled me. I thought he had known about our plot. Guilt’s a terrible thing. Have you prepared the costardmonger?”

“Yes, and we have agreed on a price for his basket of pears,” Nightingale said. “He is at the corner here, ready. And as for your prize, he comes down sailing that way all alone, without his protector; he is rid of him, it seems.”

The prize was Bartholomew Cokes, who was likened to a pirates’ prize — a ship that the pirates would seize and plunder.

Ezekiel Edgworth said, “Yes, I know; I should have followed his protectorship because of a feat I am going to do upon him, but this opportunity offered itself so opportunely, I could not let it pass by without taking advantage of it.”

Bartholomew Cokes’ protectorship was Humphrey Wasp, who was carrying the box whose contents Ezekiel Edgworth was going to steal.

Ezekiel Edgworth continued, “Here he comes, whistle; let this sport be called Dorrying the Dottrel.”

“Dorrying the Dottrel” means “Fooling the Simpleton.” A dorr is a sound that is known as a raspberry or a Bronx cheer, and a dottrel is a bird that is known to be easily caught.

Bartholomew Cokes arrived.

Nightingale whistled.

Bartholomew Cokes said, “By this light, I swear that I cannot find my gingerbread wife, nor my hobbyhorse man, in all the fair now, to get my money back, and I do not know the way out of the fair so I can go home for more money. Do you hear me, friend, you who whistle? What tune is it that you are whistling?”

Bartholomew Cokes wanted to get his money back so he could spend it again. Apparently, he would have Lantern Leatherhead and Joan Trash deliver the items he had bought to his home, and he would pay them upon delivery.

Nightingale said, "It's a new tune I am practicing, sir."

Bartholomew Cokes said, "Do you know where I am staying, I ask you?"

Bartholomew Cokes lived in the country; he was only visiting London and staying with his sister and her husband, and he did not know his way around.

He continued, "No, go on and practice your tune; I am in no haste for an answer. I'll practice with you."

The costardmonger arrived with a basket of pears and shouted, "Buy some pears, very fine pears, fine pears!"

Nightingale set his foot in front of him, and the costardmonger fell with his basket.

Boys at the fair began to scramble for the pears.

Bartholomew Cokes said, "Gee! A scramble! A scramble! A scramble! A scramble!"

The costardmonger said, "Good gentlemen, my wares for sale! My wares! I am a poor man! Good sir, my wares!"

Bartholomew Cokes began to scramble to pick up pears.

Nightingale said to him, "Let me hold your sword, sir. It is getting in your way."

Bartholomew Cokes said, "Do, and hold my cloak if you will, and my hat, too."

He handed over all these items to a person he thought was doing a good deed.

Nightingale and Ezekiel Edgworth withdrew with Bartholomew Cokes' possessions.

Ezekiel Edgworth said, "He is a delightful overgrown boy! I think he out-scrambles them all. I cannot persuade myself other than that he still goes to grammar school and is playing truant from school today.”

Nightingale said, “I wish he had another purse to cut, Ezekiel.”

Ezekiel Edgworth said, “Purse! A man might cut out his kidneys, I think, and he would never feel them leaving his body because he is so earnest at the sport of scrambling for pears.”

Boys were grabbing pears and then running away.

Nightingale said, “His soul is halfway out of his body at the game.”

Ezekiel Edgworth said, “Leave, Nightingale; go that way.”

Nightingale ran off with Bartholomew Cokes’ sword, cloak, and hat.

Bartholomew Cokes said, “I think I am furnished with enough Catherine pears for one afternoon snack. Give me my cloak.”

The costardmonger said, “Good gentleman, give me my pears.”

Bartholomew Cokes asked, “Where’s the fellow I gave my cloak to? My cloak and my hat! By God’s eyelid, has he gone? Thieves, thieves! Help me to raise a hue and cry, gentlemen.”

A hue and cry is a number of people shouting and running after a criminal to capture him or her.

Still carrying the pears, Bartholomew Cokes ran away, shouting and looking for the man who had taken his sword, cloak, and hat, all of which were expensive items.

Did Bartholomew Cokes mean to steal the pears? Was he going to pay for them so he could eat them honestly, and was he simply distracted by being robbed? Or was his soul halfway out of his body because he was willing to steal pears from a lowly fruit-seller? Since both of his purses had been stolen, perhaps he lacked the money to pay for the pears and so he may have deliberately stolen the pears. Earlier, Humphrey Wasp had complained about him snatching pears from a Catherine-pear woman.

Ezekiel Edgworth said, “Costardmonger, go to Ursula’s. We will meet there.”

The costardmonger exited.

Ezekiel Edgworth said to himself, “Talk of him having a soul! By God’s heart, if he has any more than a thing given him instead of salt just to keep him from stinking, I’ll be hanged before my time, immediately.”

Salt keeps food from rotting, and the soul keeps the body from rotting; once the soul departs from the body, the body begins to rot. Ezekiel Edgworth believed that Bartholomew Cokes had just enough soul to keep his body from rotting, but not enough soul to keep him from stealing pears.

Ezekiel Edgworth continued, “Where should it be, indeed? In his blood? He has not so much an amount of it in his whole body as will maintain a good flea!”

In other words, he was saying that yes, Bartholomew Cokes definitely lacks soul — and the things that go with it, such as morality. He was also saying that Bartholomew Cokes lacked blood. If he meant that literally, he meant that although Bartholomew Cokes was tall, he was skinny. If he meant that figuratively, he meant that Bartholomew Cokes lacked fighting spirit. Of course, he could have meant that both literally and figuratively.

“And if he continues to take this course of action, he will not have so much land left as to rear a calf, within this twelvemonth. Was there ever a green plover so pulled!”

This course of action was one of foolishness and innocence. Bartholomew Cokes had innocently handed over valuable clothing to a person he thought was doing a good deed for him, and he did that because he apparently wanted to scramble for and grab pears and keep them without paying for them (because he had lost his purses of money). Finders keepers, losers weepers.

A pulled green plover is an innocent, foolish bird that — or person who — has been plucked. Its feathers have been pulled from it. Some of Bartholomew Cokes’ feathers — his clothing — had been plucked from him.

Ezekiel Edgworth continued, “I wish that his little overseer had been here now, and been tall enough to see him steal pears in exchange for his beaver hat and his cloak!”

The little overseer was Humphrey Wasp.

Ezekiel Edgworth continued, “I must go and find him next, because of his black box, and his patent that it seems he has of his place, which I think the gentleman would have a reversion of — I mean the gentleman who spoke to me for it so earnestly.”

He was mistaken about the document in the black box. He thought it was a patent — a document giving Humphrey Wasp the right of guardianship over Bartholomew Cokes. He also thought that Quarlous wanted a reversion — the right of succession. In other words, Quarlous wanted to replace Humphrey Wasp as the guardian of Bartholomew Cokes.

Ezekiel Edgworth exited.

Bartholomew Cokes returned and said, “I wish that I would lose my jacket, and my stockings, too, as I am an honest man, and never again move around, if I think that there is anything but thieving and cheating in this whole fair. Bartholomew Fair — ha! If any Bartholomew has ever had that luck in it that I have had, I’ll be martyred for him, and in Smithfield, too.”

Actually, another Bartholomew had had worse luck in Smithfield, where the fair was held annually. In 1611, Bartholomew Legate was burned at the stake in Smithfield after being found guilty of heresy.

Bartholomew Cokes continued, “I have ‘paid’ for my pears with the loss of my clothing — may the pears rot! I’ll keep them no longer.”

He threw his pears away.

He continued, “You were choke-pears to me. I would have done better to have gone to mum-chance for you — I wish I had done that.”

Choke-pears are not fit for eating; they are used to make an alcoholic drink.

Mumchance is a gambling game using dice.

He continued, “I think the fair should not have treated me like this, if only because of my namesake, Saint Bartholomew. I would not have treated a dog named Bartholomew like this. Oh, Numps will triumph now! He will say, ‘I told you so!’”

Troubleall returned.

Bartholomew Cokes said to him, “Friend, do you know who I am, or where I am staying? I do not know myself, I’ll be sworn. Do but take me home, and I’ll make you happy. I have money enough there at home. I have lost myself, and my cloak, and my hat, and my fine sword, and my sister, and Numps, and Miss Grace, a gentlewoman whom I would have married, and an openwork embroidered handkerchief she gave me, and two purses, today, and I have lost my purchase of hobbyhorses and gingerbread, which grieves me worst of all.”

Silly as always, he was grieved most of all by the loss of his toys and gingerbread.

Troubleall asked, “By whose warrant, sir, have you done all this?”

“Warrant!” Bartholomew Cokes said. “You are a ‘wise’ fellow indeed — as if a man would need a warrant to lose anything!”

Troubleall said, “Yes, a man may gain and lose with Justice Overdo’s warrant, I swear.”

Bartholomew Cokes said, “Justice Overdo! Do you know him? I am staying there, he is my brother-in-law, he married my sister. Please show me the way there. Do you know the house?”

Troubleall replied, “Sir, show me your warrant. I know nothing without a warrant, pardon me.”

Bartholomew Cokes said, “Why, I warrant you. Come along. You shall see I have embroidered pillows there, and cambric sheets, and sweet bags filled with aromatic herbs to perfume the linen, too. Please guide me to the house.”

Troubleall said, “Sir, I’ll tell you what. You go there first by yourself alone, tell your worshipful brother your mind, and bring me just three lines of his handwriting, or his clerk’s, with Adam Overdo’s signature underneath. I’ll stay here and wait for you, I’ll obey you, and I’ll guide you to the house immediately.”

Bartholomew Cokes said, “By God’s eyelid, this man is an ass. I have found him out. A pox upon me! What am I doing talking to such a dull fool!”

He said to Troubleall, “Farewell! You are a complete coxcomb. You are a complete fool, do you hear me?”

Troubleall replied, “I think I am; if Justice Overdo signs a warrant to it, I am, and so are we all. He’ll quit us all, multiply us all.”

Troubleall’s last sentence was troublesome. He was putting Justice Overdo in the place of God, Who is the Being Who will “quit [requite] us all, multiply us all.”

— 4.3 —

In another part of the fair, Miss Grace Wellborn, Quarlous, and Mr. Winwife were talking. Quarlous and Mr. Winwife had drawn their swords.

Miss Grace Wellborn said, “Gentlemen, this is no good way to act; you are only breeding trouble and offence for one another, and you are giving me no contentment at all. I am not a woman who wants to be fought over, or to have my name or fortune made the question of men’s swords.”

Quarlous said, “By God’s blood, we love you.”

Miss Grace Wellborn replied, “If you both love me, as you say you do, your own reason will tell you that only one of you can enjoy me, and to that point there leads a more direct line, than by my infamy, which must follow, if you fight.

“It is true, and I have professed it to you without any pretense, that rather than be yoked with this bridegroom — Bartholomew Cokes — who has been appointed to be my husband, I would take up any husband almost without any inquiry into his credentials. I know that a cunning mind would say to me that Bartholomew Cokes is a fool, and he has an estate, and I could order him around and enjoy a lover on the side. But these are not my aims; I must have a husband I can love, one who is worthy of my love, or I cannot live with him. I shall badly make one of these cunning, shrewd wives — that is not the kind of thing I could or would do.”

Mr. Winwife said, “Why, if you can like either of us, lady, say which of us you prefer, and the other shall swear instantly to desist. Choose one of us to marry.”

Quarlous said, “Good idea! I agree to that willingly.”

Miss Grace Wellborn said, “Surely, you think that I am a woman of an extreme levity, gentlemen, or a strange fancy, if, meeting you by chance in such a place as this, both at the same time, and not yet knowing you two gentlemen for two hours, and neither of you appearing to be more deserving than the other to me, I should so forsake my modesty (although I might prefer one more particularly than the other) as to say, this is the man I will marry, and name him.”

Quarlous asked, “Why, for what reason shouldn’t you do that? What would hinder you from doing that?”

Miss Grace Wellborn said, “If you will not allow my modesty to be my reason for not choosing so quickly, then allow my reason to be my intelligence. Believe that I am enough of a woman and have enough cunning not to betray myself unsuitably. How can I judge between you, so far as to making a choice of whom to marry, without knowing you more and better? You are both equal and alike to me yet, and so impartially and equally esteemed by me, that each of you might be the man I would choose to marry, if the other were away, because you are reasonable creatures and you have understanding and rationality and gracious speech, and if fate will send me an understanding husband, I don’t doubt at all but that my own manners shall make him a good husband.”

Quarlous said, "I wish that I were put forth to making for you then."

"Put forth to making" meant "sent out for training." The words referred to the training of animals, but Quarlous meant that he wanted to be trained to be a good husband for her. Another meaning of "make" was "mate with," and so the sentence also meant that he wanted to have sex with her and perhaps make a baby.

Miss Grace Wellborn said, "It may be you will; you don't know what is in store for you."

She then asked both men, "Will you consent to a proposal of mine, gentlemen?"

Mr. Winwife said, "Whatever it is, we'll presume that it is reasonable because it comes from you."

Quarlous added, "And we'll presume it's fitting and suitable, too."

She said, "I saw one of you buy a pair of writing notebooks, just now."

Mr. Winwife said, "Yes, here they are, and they are maiden ones, too — they are unwritten in."

Miss Grace Wellborn said, "All the better for what they may be employed in. Each of you shall write here in this notebook a word or a name, whatever you like best, but of only two or three syllables at most; and the next person who comes this way, because Destiny has a high hand in business of this nature, I'll demand which of the two words he or she approves of better, and, according to that sentence, fix my resolution and affection without change. I will marry the man whose word is chosen."

"Agreed," Quarlous said, "I have already chosen my word."

Mr. Winwife added, "And I shall quickly choose my word."

Miss Grace Wellborn said, "But you shall promise, gentlemen, not to be curious to know which of you it is — which person's word has been chosen; instead, give me permission to conceal that until you have brought me either home or to a place where I may safely tender myself."

"Tender myself" meant either 1) take care of myself, or 2) offer myself.

"Why, that's only fair," Mr. Winwife said.

"We are pleased to agree," Quarlous said.

She said, "I will bind both of you to endeavor to work together friendly and jointly each to the other's fortune, and I will have myself fitted with some means to make the man who is forsaken a part of amends. You two shall be friends and help each other, and I shall find a way to give some compensation to the man who does not marry me."

"These conditions are very courteous," Quarlous said. "Well, my word is out of the romance Arcadia by Sir Philip Sydney: I choose the name Argalus."

Mr. Winwife said, "And the name I choose is out of the romance The Two Noble Kinsmen by William Shakespeare and John Fletcher: Palamon."

Argalus and Palamon were both young men who loved young women. Both names were from romances, which is fitting. Miss Grace Wellborn had said that "Destiny has a high hand in business of this nature," and this is certainly true in romances.

Quarlous and Mr. Winwife each wrote his preferred name in a notebook.

Troubleall showed up and asked, “Have you any warrant for this, gentlemen?”

Quarlous and Mr. Winwife laughed: “Ha!”

Troubleall said, “There must be a warrant had, believe it.”

“Had for what?” Mr. Winwife asked.

“For whatsoever it is, anything indeed, no matter what,” Troubleall replied.

Quarlous said, “By God’s light, here’s a fine ragged prophet dropped down in the nick of time!”

Troubleall said, “May Heaven reward you, gentlemen!”

“Stay a little while,” Quarulous requested.

He then said to Miss Grace Wellborn, “Good lady, let him choose the name he prefers.”

Miss Grace Wellborn asked, “You are OK with that, then?”

“Yes, yes,” Quarulous and Mr. Winwife said.

Miss Grace Wellborn said to Troubleall, “Sir, here are two names written —”

“Is the name Justice Overdo one of them?” Troubleall asked.

Miss Grace Wellborn said, “What, sir? Please read them to yourself; it is for a wager between these gentlemen; and with a checkmark, or any other symbol, mark which you approve of best.”

Troubleall replied, “They may be both worshipful names for all I know, Miss; but the name ‘Adam Overdo’ would be worth three of them, I assure you in this place — I say this in plain English.”

“This man amazes me,” Miss Grace Wellborn said to Quarlous and Mr. Winwife.

She then said to Troubleall, “I ask you to like one of them more than the other, sir.”

Troubleall marked the notebook and said, “I like him there; that name has the best warrant.”

He added, “Miss, to satisfy your longing, and to multiply him, it may be this.”

Although he did not know the purpose of choosing one of the names, Troubleall’s sentence was accurate enough. His choosing the name may satisfy her longing for a husband she can love, and it may increase her husband’s family — if he gets her pregnant.

Troubleall then said, “But I am still for Justice Overdo, that’s my conviction; and quit you.”

“Quit you” could mean 1) May God reward you, 2) May Justice Overdo reward you, or 3) I am leaving you.

He exited.

Mr. Winwife asked, “Is it done, lady? Has the choice of whom you will marry been made?”

Miss Grace Wellborn replied, “Yes, and as strangely as ever I saw. What fellow is this, I wonder? Who is he?”

Quarlous said, “No matter who he is, we have made him a fortune-teller. Which is it? Which is it? Which name did he choose?”

“I won’t tell you,” Miss Grace Wellborn said. “Didn’t you promise not to ask that?”

Ezekiel Edgworth arrived.

Quarlous said, “By God’s eyelid, I forgot that. Please pardon me.”

Seeing Ezekiel Edgworth, he said, “Look, here’s our Mercury; the marriage license arrives in the finest time, too! All we have to do is scratch out Bartholomew Cokes’ name, and the marriage license will serve for either me or Mr. Winwife.”

Mercury is the god of thieves. Ezekiel Edgworth, of course, is a thief.

Mr. Winwife said, “How now, lime-twig, have you committed the theft?”

Birdlime was used to catch birds. Sticky birdlime was smeared on branches, and birds stuck to the branches. Metaphorically, a lime-twig is a thief because whatever the thief touches sticks to his hand.

Ezekiel Edgworth replied, “Not yet, sir. Unless you want to go with me and see the theft, it is not worth speaking about. The act is nothing without a witness. Yonder he is, your man with the box, fallen into the finest company, and so transported with vapors!”

The man with the box, of course, was Humphrey Wasp, who had fallen into bad company, including Jordan Knockem, who constantly spoke about vapors.

Ezekiel Edgworth continued, “In their assembly is a Northern clothier named Norder, and a man called Puppy who is from the west of England and has come to wrestle before my Lord Mayor soon.”

Wrestling matches were part of the opening-day entertainment of the fair.

He continued, “And there’s Captain Whit, and one Val Cutting, who helps Captain Jordan to roar — Jordan Knockem is a circling boy.”

Jordan Knockem was a bully, a roaring boy who picked fights by telling people to step into a circle of friendship. If they don’t step into the circle, they aren’t his friend and he quarrels with them. If they do step in the circle, he asks them for a favor that he knows they cannot and/or will not grant and then he quarrels with them.

Ezekiel Edgworth continued, “Your Numps is so taken with Jordan Knockem that you may strip him of his clothes, if you want to. I’ll undertake to geld him for you, if you will just have a surgeon ready to cauterize him. And Mrs. Justice Overdo there is the goodest woman! She does so love them all over in terms of justice and the style of authority, with her hood upright that — I beg you to come with me, gentlemen, and see it.”

Quarlous said, “By God’s light, I would not miss it for the fair. What will you do, Ned Winwife?”

Mr. Winwife said, “Why, I will stay here in place of you. Miss Grace Wellborn must not be seen.”

Quarlous replied, “Do that, and find a priest in the meantime; I’ll bring the marriage license.”

He then said to Ezekiel Edgworth, “Lead on. Which way is it?”

Ezekiel Edgworth replied, “Here, sir, you are at the back of the booth already; you may hear the noise.”

— 4.4 —

In Ursula’s booth were Jordan Knockem, Whit, Norderm, Puppy, Val Cutting, Humphrey Wasp, and Mrs. Overdo, all of them drunk.

During a lull in the noise, Jordan Knockem said quietly, “Whit, tell Val Cutting to continue the vapors for a lift, Whit, for a lift.”

A lift is a theft. The game of vapors is a rowdy game in which people insult each other. The insults start out jocularly, but they can escalate until a fight breaks out. During the fight, a thief can find an opportunity to steal.

A Scotsman, Nordern said, “I’ll ne mare, I’ll ne mare; the eale’s too meeghty.”

[A Scotsman, Nordern said, “I’ll [drink] no more, I’ll [drink] no more; the ale’s too mighty [strong].”]

Jordan Knockem said, “What? My Galloway nag has the staggers, ha!”

Galloway horses were Scottish horses with a good reputation for endurance. The staggers are diseases that cause a horse to stagger.

Jordan Knockem recommended some cures for the staggers: “Whit, give him a slit in the forehead. Cheer up, man; we need a needle and thread to stitch his ears. I’d cure him now with a little butter and garlic, long-peppers and grains, if I had it. Where’s my drenching-horn for giving medicine to horses? I’ll give him a mash immediately that shall take away this dizziness.”

Puppy, who spoke a west-country dialect, asked, “Why, where are you, zurs? Do you vlinch, and leave us in the zuds now?”

[Puppy, who spoke a west-country dialect, asked, “Why, where are you, sirs? Do you flinch, and leave us in the suds now?”]

“In the suds” meant “in trouble.”

Nordern said, "I'll ne mare, I is e'en as vull as a paiper's bag, by my troth, I."

[Nordern said, "I'll [drink] no more, I am even as full as a bagpiper's bag, indeed I am."]

Puppy asked, "Do my Northern cloth zhrink i' the wetting, ha?"

[Puppy asked, "Does my Northern cloth shrink in the wetting, ha?"]

Shrinkage was a common complaint made against cloth manufactured in the North.

Jordan Knockem said, "Why, well said, old flea-bitten; you'll never tire, I see."

A flea-bitten horse was a dappled horse, aka a horse with bay or sorrel spots. Such horses were supposed not to tire easily.

They began to play the game of vapors again.

Val Cutting said, "No, sir, for he may tire if it pleases him."

Whit, who spoke with an Irish accent, said to Jordon Knockem, "Who told dee sho, that he vuld never teer, man?"

[Whit, who spoke with an Irish accent, said, "Who told you so, that he would never tire, man?"]

Val Cutting said, "It doesn't matter who told him so, as long as he knows."

Jordan Knockem said, "I know nothing, sir. Pardon me there."

Ezekiel Edgworth and Quarlous entered Ursula's booth.

Ezekiel Edgworth said, "They are at it still, sir; this is the game they call vapors."

Whit said, “He shall not pardon dee, Captain: dou shalt not be pardoned.

“Pre’dee, shweet-heart, do not pardon him.”

[Whit said, “He shall not pardon you, Captain. You shall not be pardoned.

[“Please, sweetheart, do not pardon him.”]

The Captain was Jordan Knockem, Captain of the roarers; Whit himself was also sometimes called Captain. The “sweetheart,” aka friend, was Val Cutting.

Val Cutting said, “By God’s light, I’ll pardon him, if I wish, no matter whosoever says nay to it.”

“Where’s Numps?” Quarlous said. “I don’t see him.”

Humphrey Wasp spoke up and said, “Why, I say nay to it.”

The “nay” meant “I agree with Whit: Don’t pardon Captain Jordan Knockem.”

Quarlous said, “Oh, there he is.”

Jordan Knockem asked, “To what do you say nay, sir?”

They were continuing to play their game of vapors, which was nonsense. Every man was supposed to oppose the last man who spoke, whether it concerned him, or not, although occasionally they could agree — but then almost immediately again disagree.

Drunk like the others playing the game, Humphrey Wasp said, “To anything, whatsoever it is, as long as I do not like it.”

Whit said, “Pardon me, little man, dou musht like it a little.”

[Whit said, “Pardon me, little man, you must like it a little.”]

Val Cutting said, “No, he must not like it at all, sir. There you are in the wrong.”

Whit said, “I tink I bee; he musht not like it indeed.”

[Whit said, “I think I am [in the wrong]; he must not like it indeed.”]

Val Cutting said, “In that case, then he both must and will like it, sir, in spite of you.”

Jordan Knockem said, “If he has a reason, he may like it, sir.”

Whit said, “By no meensh, Captain, upon reason, he may like nothing upon reason.”

[Whit said, “By no means, Captain [Jordan Knockem], upon reason, he [Humphrey Wasp] may like nothing upon reason.”]

Humphrey Wasp said, “I have no reason, nor I will hear of no reason, nor I will look for no reason, and he is an ass who either knows any reason, or looks for any reason from me.”

Val Cutting said, “Yes, in some sense you may have reason, sir.”

Humphrey Wasp said, “Yes, in some sense, I don’t care if I grant you.”

Whit said, “Pardon me, thou ousht to grant him nothing in no shensh, if dou do love dyshelf, angry man.”

[Whit said, “Pardon me, you ought to grant him nothing in no sense, if you do love yourself, angry man.”]

Humphrey Wasp said, “Why, then I do grant him nothing; and I have no sense.”

Val Cutting said, “It is true, you have no sense indeed.”

Humphrey Wasp said, “By God’s eyelid, but I have sense, now I think on it better, and I will grant him anything, do you see?”

Jordan Knockem said, “He is in the right, and he utters a sufficient vapor.”

Val Cutting objected, “No, it is no sufficient vapor neither. I deny that.”

Jordan Knockem said, “Then it is a sweet vapor.”

Val Cutting agreed, “It may be a sweet vapor.”

Humphrey Wasp disagreed, “No, it is no sweet vapor neither, sir; it stinks, and I’ll stand to it.”

Whit said, “Yes, I tink it dosh shtink, Captain. All vapor dosh shtink.”

[Whit said, “Yes, I think it does stink, Captain. All vapor does stink.”]

Humphrey Wasp said, “No, then it does not stink, sir, and it shall not stink.”

Val Cutting said, “By your leave, I say it may stink, sir.”

Humphrey Wasp said, “Yes, by my leave it may stink. I know that.”

Whit said, “Pardon me, thou knowesht nothing; it cannot by thy leave, angry man.”

[Whit said, “Pardon me, you know nothing; it cannot [stink] by your leave, angry man.”]

Humphrey Wasp asked, “How can it not stink?”

Jordan Knockem said, “No, don’t question what he says, for he is in the right.”

Whit said, “Yesh, I am in de right, I confesh it, so ish de little man, too.”

[Whit said, “Yes, I am in the right, I confess it, [and] so is the little man [Humphrey Wasp, in the right], too.”]

Whit said it did not stink, and Humphrey Wasp said it did stink, so both cannot be in the right. In this “game,” people argued for the sake of arguing.

Humphrey Wasp said, “I’ll have nothing confessed that concerns me. I am not in the right, nor never was in the right, nor never will be in the right, while I am in my right mind.”

Val Cutting said, “Mind! Why, here’s no man minds you, sir, nor anything else.”

He meant this: No man here is paying attention to you, sir, or to anything else.

Except for Norderm, they drank again, although they were so drunk that no one needed to take a drink.

Puppy said to Norderm, “Vriend, will you mind this that we do?”

[Puppy said to Norderm, “Friend, would you mind [doing] this that we are doing?”]

He offered Norderm the drinking cup.

Norderm replied, “I’ll ne mare. My waimb warkes too mickle with this auredy.”

[Norderm replied, “I’ll [drink] no more. My stomach works too much with what I have drunk already.”]

Quarlous said to Ezekiel Edgworth, “Do you call this vapors! This is such belching of quarrel as I never heard. Will you do your business, sir?”

The business was stealing the marriage license out of the box that Humphrey Wasp was still carrying.

Ezekiel Edgworth said, "You shall see, sir."

He went over to Humphrey Wasp.

Ezekiel Edgworth said, "Will you take that, Mr. Humphrey Wasp? He insulted you when he said that nobody should mind you!"

Humphrey Wasp asked, "Why, what have you to do with this? Is it any business of yours?"

Ezekiel Edgworth said, "No, but I think that you should not be unminded, though."

Humphrey Wasp said, "And I would not be, now I think about it. Do you hear, new acquaintance? Does no man mind me, you say?"

Val Cutting said, "Yes, sir, every man here minds you, but how do they mind you?"

Humphrey Wasp said, "I care as little how they mind me as you do; that was not my question."

Whit said, "No, noting was ty question, tou art a learned man, and I am a valiant man, i'faith la, tou shalt speak for me, and I will fight for tee."

[Whit said, "No, nothing was your question. You are a learned man, and I am a valiant man; indeed, la, you shall speak for me, and I will fight for you."]

Jordan Knockem said, "Fight for him, Whit? That's a gross vapor — he can fight for himself!"

Humphrey Wasp said, "It may be I can, but it may be I would not, so what then?"

Val Cutting said, “Why, then you may choose.”

Humphrey Wasp said, “Why, then I’ll choose whether I choose or not.”

Jordan Knockem said, “I think you may, and it is true; and I allow it for a resolute vapor.”

Humphrey Wasp said, “Then I think you do not think, and it is no resolute vapor.”

Val Cutting said, “Yes, in some sort he may allow you.”

“In some sort” meant “to some extent.”

Jordan Knockem said, “In no sort, sir; pardon me, I can allow him nothing. You mistake the vapor.”

Humphrey Wasp said, “He mistakes nothing, sir, in no sort.”

Whit said, “Yes, I pre dee now, let him mistake.”

“Pre dee” meant “pray thee” or “prithee,” aka “ask you please.”

[Whit said, “Yes, I ask you to please now let him mistake.”]

Humphrey Wasp said, “A turd in your teeth, never pre dee me, for I will have nothing mistaken.”

Jordan Knockem said, “Turd! Ha, turd? A noisome vapor.”

He then said quietly to Whit, “Hit him, Whit. Start a fight.”

While Whit and Humphrey Wasp fought, Ezekiel Edgworth stole the marriage license out of the box, and exited.

Mrs. Overdo said, “Why, gentlemen, why, gentlemen, I order you upon my authority to preserve the peace. In the King’s name, and my husband’s, put up your weapons, I shall be driven to commit you myself, otherwise.”

She meant that she would commit them to prison, but Quarlous laughed because in this society “commit” also had the meaning of “commit adultery” or “fornicate.”

Humphrey Wasp asked, “Why do you laugh, sir?”

Quarlous replied, “Sir, you’ll allow me my Christian liberty; I may laugh, I hope.”

Val Cutting said, “In some sort you may, and in some sort you may not, sir.”

The first “in some sort” possibly meant “to some extent,” and the second “in some sort” possibly meant “in some company.”

Jordan Knockem said, “In some sort, sir, he may neither laugh nor hope in this company.”

Humphrey Wasp said, “Yes, then he may both laugh and hope in any sort, if it should please him.”

Quarlous said, “Indeed, and I will then, for it does please me exceedingly.”

Humphrey Wasp said, “Not exceedingly neither, sir.”

Jordan Knockem said, “No, that vapor is too lofty.”

Quarlous said, “Gentlemen, I do not play well at your game of vapors. I am not very good at it, but —”

Val Cutting drew a circle on the ground and said, “Do you hear, sir? I would speak with you in the circle.”

Quarlous, not sure what this meant, asked, “In the circle, sir! Why would you want to speak with me in the circle?”

Val Cutting asked, “Can you lend me a piece, a Jacobus, in the circle?”

A Jacobus was a valuable gold coin also known as a sovereign. Val Cutting had just met Quarlous, and he was asking him for money as a pretext to starting a fight.

Quarlous said, “By God’s eyelid, your circle will prove more costly than your vapors, then. Sir, no, I will not lend you a Jacobus.”

Val Cutting said, “Your beard’s not well turned up, sir.”

He pulled Quarlous’ beard — a deadly insult.

Quarlous said, “What, rascal! Are you pulling my beard? I’ll break the circle with you.”

Val Cutting and Quarlous drew their swords and fought.

Puppy and Norderm wanted peace: “Gentlemen! Gentlemen!”

Jordan Knockem said quietly to Whit, “Gather up, Whit. Gather up, Whit, good vapors.”

Jordan Knockem exited while Whit took others’ cloaks, etc., and concealed them. Then Whit exited to summon the watchmen.

Mrs. Overdo said, “What do you mean? Are you rebels, gentlemen? Shall I send out a sergeant at arms, or a writ of rebellion, against you? I’ll commit you upon my womanhood, for a riot, upon my justice-hood, if you persist.”

Quarlous and Val Cutting exited.

Drunk, Humphrey Wasp said, “Upon my justice-hood! Indeed, shit on your hood. You’ll commit! Spoken like a true Justice of the Peace’s wife indeed, and a fine female lawyer! Turd in your teeth for a lawyer’s fee, now.”

Mrs. Overdo said, “Why, Numps, in Justice Overdo’s name, I order you to preserve the peace.”

Humphrey Wasp said, “Good Mrs. Underdo, hold your tongue — shut up!”

Mrs. Overdo said, “Alas, poor Numps!”

The drunk Humphrey Wasp said, “Alas! And why alas from you, I ask you? Or why poor Numps, goodwife Rich?”

The Rich family owned the land that Bartholomew Fair was held on and made money from rents for booths, etc.

He continued, “Am I come to be pitied by your fancy tuft-taffata clothing now? Why, Mrs. Overdo, I knew Adam the clerk, your husband, when he was Adam Scrivener, and wrote for two-pence a sheet, as high as he bears his head now, or you your hood, dame.”

Bristle and some other watchmen, aka keepers of the peace, arrived. Whit, who had summoned them, came with them.

Humphrey Wasp asked, “Who are you, sir?”

Bristle said, “We are men, and no infidels. What is the matter here, and the reason for the noises, can you tell me?”

Humphrey Wasp said, “By God’s heart, what have you to do with it? Can’t a man quarrel in quietness, but you must interrupt him! Who are you?”

Bristle said, “Why, we are his majesty’s watchmen, sir.”

Humphrey Wasp said, “Watchmen! By God’s blood, you are a sweet watch indeed. A body would think that if you watched well at nights, you would be contented to sleep at this time of day. Get you to your fleas and your flock-beds, you rogues, get you to your kennels, and lie down close.”

Flock-beds were beds with wool as the stuffing.

Bristle said, “Down! Yes, we will down, I promise you. Down with him, in his majesty’s name, down, down with him, and carry him away to the pigeon-holes.”

The pigeon-holes were the holes in the stocks used to restrain arms and legs.

Some of the watchmen seized Humphrey Wasp and carried him off.

Mrs. Overdo said, “I thank you, honest friends, in the behalf of the crown, and the peace, and in Justice Overdo’s name, for suppressing enormities.”

Whit said, “Stay, Bristle, here ish anoder brash of drunkards, but very quiet, special drunkards, will pay de five shillings very well.”

[Whit said, “Stay, Bristle, here is another brace of drunkards, but very quiet, special drunkards, who will pay you five shillings very well.”]

He pointed to Nordern and Puppy, who were drunk and asleep, on the bench. According to Whit, they would pay five shillings as a bribe to stay out of trouble.

Whit said, “Take ’em to de, in de graish o’ God: one of hem do’s change cloth for ale in the fair, here” — he pointed to Nordern — “te toder ish a strong man, a mighty man, my Lord Mayor’s man, and a wrastler. He has wrashed so long with the bottle here, that the man with the beard hash almosht streek up hish heelsh.”

[Whit said, “Take them into your custody, in the grace of God. One of them does exchange cloth for ale in the fair, here he is” — he pointed to Nordern — “the other is a strong man, a mighty man, my Lord Mayor’s man, and a wrastler. He has wrestled so long with the bottle here, that the man with the beard has almost struck up his heels.”]

The wrestler, of course, was Puppy. “The man with the beard” was a decoration on a beer mug. Puppy had drunk so much that he had almost taken to dancing and kicked up his heels or had almost fallen down drunk with his heels in the air or had almost started fighting with and kicking a man. He had also tilted the beer mug so much that the man with the beard had had his heels over his head.

Bristle said, “By God’s eyelid, the Clerk of the Market has been crying for him all the fair over here, for my lord’s service. The Clerk of the Market has been paging him to come and wrestle before the Mayor.”

The Clerk of the Market was an official who inspected the marketplace.

Whit said, “Tere he ish, pre de taik him hensch, and make ty best on him.”

[Whit said, “There he is, please take him hence, and make the best of him.”]

Bristle and the rest of the Watchmen exited with Norderm and Puppy.

Whit then said to Mrs. Overdo, “How now, woman o’ shilk, vat ailsh ty shweet faish? Art tou melancholy?”

[Whit then said to Mrs. Overdo, “How are you now, woman of silk? What ails your sweet face? Are you melancholy?”]

She wore fine clothing made of silk and velvet.

Mrs. Overdo said, “I am a little distempered with these enormities. Shall I ask you for a favor, Captain?”

Whit said, “Entreat a hundred, velvet voman, I vill do it, shpeak out.”

[Whit said, “Ask me for a hundred favors, velvet woman. I will do it. Speak out.”]

Mrs. Overdo said, “I cannot with modesty speak it out loud, but —”

She whispered to him.

Whit said, “I vill do it, and more and more, for de.

“What, Ursula, an’t be bitch, an’t be bawd, an’t be!”

[Whit said, “I will do it, and more and more, for you.

[“Hey, Ursula, you bitch, you bawd, you whatever you are!”]

Ursula arrived and said, “What now, rascal! What are you roaring for, you old pimp?”

Whit said, “Here, put up de clokes, Urs; de purchase. Pre de now, shweet Ursh, help dis good brave voman to a jordan, an’t be.”

[Whit said, “Here, put up the cloaks, Urs; put away the booty. Please now, sweet Urs, help this good splendid woman to a jordan.”]

The cloaks were the cloaks he had just stolen and hidden.

A jordan is a chamberpot.

Ursula said, “By God’s eyelid can’t you call your Captain Jordan to come to her?”

Whit said, “Nay, pre de leave dy consheits, and bring the velvet woman to de —”

[Whit said, “No, please put aside your jokes, and bring the velvet woman to the —”]

Ursula said, “I bring her! Hang her! By God’s heart, must I find a common pot for every punk in your purlieus?”

A punk is a prostitute, and the purlieus were the suburbs, places where prostitutes congregated. Mrs. Overall was unaccompanied by a male protector, and that gave Ursula the idea that she must be one of Whit's whores.

Whit said, "O, good voordsh, Ursh, it ish a guest o' velvet, i'fait la."

[Whit said, "Oh, use good words! Use more genteel language! Urs, she is a guest who dresses in expensive velvet clothing, indeed."]

Ursula said, "Let her sell her hood, and buy a sponge, with a pox to her! My vessel is employed, sir. I have but one, and it is the bottom of an old bottle. An honest proctor and his wife are at it within; if she'll wait for her turn, so be it."

The sponge would be used to soak up the urine.

The honest proctor and his wife were Mr. John Littlewit and his wife, Mrs. Win Littlewit. According to Ursula, the two were at it — either taking turns peeing, or having sex.

Whit said, "As soon as tou cansht, shweet Ursh."

[Whit said, "As soon as you can, sweet Urs.]

Ursula exited.

Whit said, "Of a valiant man I tink I am te patientsh man i' the world, or in all Smithfield."

[Whit said, "As I am a valiant man, I think I am the most patient man in the world, or in all Smithfield."]

Jordan Knockem arrived and said, "How are you now, Whit! Close vapors, stealing your leaps! Covering in corners, ha!"

"Leaping" and "covering" were terms used to refer to the mating of animals. Jordan Knockem was implying that Whit had been having sex with Mrs. Overdo. Mrs. Overdo was unaccompanied by a male protector, and that gave Jordan Knockem the idea that she might be a whore.

Whit said, “No, fait, Captain, dough tou beesht a vishe man, dy vit is a mile hence now. I vas procuring a shmall courtesie for a woman of fashion here.”

[Whit said, “No, in fact or in deed, Captain. Although you are a wise man, your wit and intelligence are a mile away from here now. I was procuring a small courtesy for a woman of fashion here.”]

Mrs. Overdo said, “Yes, Captain, although I am a Justice of the Peace’s wife, I do love men of war, and the sons of the sword, when they come before my husband.”

Jordan Knockem said, “Do you say so, filly? You shall have a leap presently. I’ll horse you myself, otherwise.”

A “leap” is a “bout of sex.”

From inside her booth, Ursla called, “Come, will you bring her in now, and let her take her turn?”

Whit said, “Gramercy, good Ursh, I tank de.”

[Whit said, “By God’s mercy, good Urs, I thank you.”]

Mrs. Overdo said, “Justice Overdo shall thank her.”

She went inside Ursla’s booth.

— 4.5 —

Ursla came out of her booth with Mr. John Littlewit and Mrs. Win Littlewit.

Mr. John Littlewit said, “Good gammer Urse, Win and I are exceedingly beholden to you, and to Captain Jordan and Captain Whit.”

“Gammer” meant “old woman” or “grandmother.”

He then said to his wife, “Win, I’ll be so bold as to leave you in this good company, Win, for half an hour or so, Win, while I go and see how my puppet-play goes forward and while I see if the puppets are word-perfect; and then I'll come and fetch you, Win."

Mrs. Win Littlewit asked, "Will you leave me alone with two men, John?"

Respectable gentlewomen tended to be accompanied by male protectors when out in public.

Mr. John Littlewit said, "Yes, they are honest gentlemen, Win, Captain Jordan and Captain Whit; they'll use you very civilly, Win."

The word "use" meant "treat," but it also meant "f**k."

He then said, "May God be with you, Win," and exited.

Ursula asked, "What, is her husband gone?"

Jordan Knockem said, "On his false gallop, Urse, he's gone away."

Mr. John Littlewit's leaving his wife in this company was a false gallop — a foolish move.

Ursula said, "If you are really Bartholomew birds, now show yourselves to be so. We are undone for want of fowl in the fair here."

The word "fowl" meant "prostitutes."

She continued, "Here will be Ezekiel Edgworth, and three or four gallants with him at night, and I have neither plover nor quail for them."

The words "plover" and "quail" both metaphorically meant "prostitutes." Plovers were birds that were supposed to be easy to catch, and quail were birds that were supposed to be horny.

She continued, “Persuade this woman between you two to become a bird of the game, while I work on the velvet woman within, as you call her.”

Birds of the game were prostitutes. She wanted Jordan Knockem and Whit to persuade the obviously pregnant Mrs. Win Littlewit to become a prostitute, while she persuaded Mrs. Overdo to become a prostitute.

Jordan Knockem said, “I understand you, Urse. Go about your business.”

Ursla exited.

“Did you hear, Whit?” Jordan Knockem asked.

He then said about Mrs. Win Littlewit, describing her using terms that described a good horse, “Isn’t it a pity that my delicate dark chestnut here, with the fine lean head, large forehead, round eyes, even mouth, sharp ears, long neck, thin crest, close withers, straight back, deep sides, short fillets, and full flanks; with a round belly, a plump buttock, large thighs, knit knees, straight legs, short pasterns, smooth hoofs, and short heels, should lead a dull honest woman’s life, when she might live the life of a lady?”

“Life of a lady” could be 1) life of an upper-class woman, or 2) life of a lady of the night.

Whit replied, “Yes, by my fait and trot it is, Captain; de honest woman’s life is a scurvy dull life indeed, la.”

[Whit replied, “Yes, by my faith and truth, it is a pity, Captain; the honest woman’s life is a scurvy dull life indeed, la.”]

Mrs. Win Littlewit asked, “How, sir, is an honest woman’s life a scurvy life?”

An honest woman is a faithful woman; an honest wife is faithful to her husband.

Whit said, “Yes, fait, shweet-heart, believe him, de leef of a bond-woman! But if dou vilt hearken to me, I vill make tee a free woman and a lady; dou shalt live like a lady, as te Captain saish.”

[Whit said, “Yes, by my faith, sweetheart, believe him, it is the life of a bondwoman [female servant or slave]! But if you will listen to me, I will make you a free woman and a lady; you shall live like a lady, as the Captain says.”]

Jordan Knockem said, “Yes, and be honest, too, sometimes; shee shall have her wires and her tires, her green gowns and velvet petticoats.”

The wires held up a headdress or a ruff. “Tires” meant 1) dresses, and/or 2) headdresses.

Whit said, “Ay, and ride to Ware and Rumford in dy coash, shee de players, be in love vit ’em: sup vit gallantsh, be drunk, and cost de noting.”

[Whit said, “Yes, and ride to Ware and Rumford in your coach, see the actors and be in love with them, dine with gallants, be drunk, and it will cost you nothing.”]

Ware and Rumford were places commonly used for affairs.

It would cost her “noting.” In Whit’s accent, this meant “nothing,” but it would cost Mrs. Win Littlewit noting — her being a prostitute would eventually become noted and talked about.

Jordan Knockem said, “Brave vapors!”

Whit said, “And lie by twenty on ’em, if dou pleash, shweet-heart.”

[Whit said, “And you will have sex with twenty of them, if you please, sweetheart.”]

Mrs. Win Littlewit said, “What, and still be honest! That would be fine entertainment.”

Whit said, “Tish common, shweet-heart, tou may’st do it by my hand: it shall be justified to thy husband’s faish, now: tou shalt be as honeshst as the skin between his hornsh, la.”

[Whit said, “This is commonly done, sweetheart. You may do it, too, I swear by my hand. It shall be justified to your husband’s faith, now. You shall be as honest as the skin between his horns, la.”]

According to Whit, respectable women often became whores, and Win could very well become one, too. Win could justify her acting as a whore by blaming her husband’s faith in her. If he could leave her alone in such company as that of Whit and Jordan Knockem and Ursla, then he deserved what the obvious result would be. He deserved to be cuckolded; he deserved to have an unfaithful wife. If the fault was her husband’s, Win could still claim some degree of honesty.

A proverb of the time was “as honest as the skin between his brows.” Whit altered that to “as honest as the skin between his horns” to make a joke about the invisible horns that were said to grow on a cuckold’s head.

Jordan Knockem said, “Yes, and you shall wear a dressing, top and top-gallant, to compare with ever a husband of them all, for a foretop.”

She would wear a headdress as elaborate as the sails of a ship, a headdress that would compare with the horns of her husband.

He continued, "It is the vapor of spirit in the wife to cuckold her husband nowadays, as it is the vapor of fashion in the husband not to suspect. Your prying cat-eyed citizen is an abominable vapor."

In other words, nowadays wives are expected to cuckold their husbands, and the husbands are expected to not notice. Some citizens are sharp-eyed and will notice, but they are abominations.

His last sentence was partly true: People do find out. And "citizens" can mean "citizens of the world" who would accept that wives ought to cuckold their husbands. Such citizens are abominations.

But "citizen" can also mean a person who is spiritually pure and will become an inhabitant of Heaven. A citizen is also someone who is subject to the laws of a society.

Mrs. Win Littlewit said, "Lord, what a fool have I been!"

Did she mean that she had been a fool to have not become a whore earlier? Or did she mean that she was a fool for even talking to these men? Was she being sarcastic? Did she think being a whore was better than being a Puritan?

Whit said, "Mend then, and do every ting like a lady hereafter; never know ty husband from another man."

[Whit said, "Mend [your ways] then, and do everything like a lady hereafter; never know your husband from another man."]

Jordan Knockem added, "Nor any one man from another, but in the dark."

Whit said, "Ay, and then it ish no disgrash to know any man."

[Whit said, “Yes, and then it is no disgrace to know any man.”]

“Know” means to 1) have sex with (Biblically know), and 2) recognize socially. “Know” also means distinguish. Whit did not want her to distinguish her husband from other men when it came to sex. Jordan Knockem wanted her to Biblically know men in the dark.

From inside her booth, Ursla shouted, “Help! Help here!”

Jordan Knockem asked, “What’s going on now? What vapor’s there?”

Ursla came out from her booth and said, “Oh, you are a sweet ranger, and look well to your walks!”

Literally, rangers took care of forest walks. Figuratively, rangers were pimps who worked in a certain area.

Ursla said, “Yonder is your punk of Turnbull, Ramping Alice, who has fallen upon the poor gentlewoman within, and pulled her hood over her ears, and her hair through it.”

Ramping Alice was one of Jordan Knockem’s punks, aka prostitutes. “Ramping” meant 1) violent, like an animal, and 2) whorish. Turnbull Street was where she worked as a prostitute.

Ramping Alice and Mrs. Overdo came out of Ursla’s booth. Ramping Alice was beating Mrs. Overdo.

Mrs. Overdo shouted, “Help, help, in the King’s name!”

Ramping Alice said, “May evil fall on you! It is whores such as you who undo us and take our trade from us, with your tuft-taffata haunches.”

Ramping Alice was a common whore, with open legs to all. Her competition was private whores — the wives of respectable men. They would undo the common whores — ruin them (undo them) by sleeping with (doing) their customers. Because the private whores were taking their customers, the common whores were undone, aka ruined and unf**ked.

Jordan Knockem said, “What’s going on?”

Ramping Alice said, “The poor common whores can have no traffic because of the private rich ones.”

She then said to Mrs. Overdo, “Your caps and hoods of velvet call away our customers, and lick the fat from us. By taking away our customers, you take away our livelihood.”

Ursla said, “Peace, you foul ramping jade, you —”

A jade is a bad horse.

Ramping Alice said to Ursla, “By God’s foot, you bawd in grease, are you talking?”

“In grease” meant fattened up, and ready for slaughter.

Jordan Knockem said, “Why, Alice, I say.”

Ramping Alice said to Ursla, “You sow of Smithfield, you!”

Ursla replied, “You tripe of Turnbull!”

Jordan Knockem said, “Cat-a-mountain vapors, ha!”

A “cat” is a woman. A cat-a-mountain is a leopard, wildcat, or panther, or a whore with spirit.

Ursla said, “You know where you were tawed lately; you were both lashed and slashed in Bridewell.”

To “taw” is to make leather supple by beating it. Ursla was saying that Ramping Alice’s leathery skin had been beaten.

“Lashed” was whipped, and “slashed” was whipped so hard that it cut the skin.

Bridewell was a London prison for whores, bawds, and pimps.

Ramping Alice said, “Yes, and by the same token you rode in a cart that week, and broke out the bottom of the cart, you night-tub.”

Whores and bawds were humiliated publicly as they rode in a cart. A night-tub is used at night to catch night-soil, aka excrement.

Jordan Knockem said to Ramping Alice, “Why, lion face, ha! Do you know who I am? Shall I tear ruff, slit waistcoat, make rags of petticoat, ha! Go to, vanish for fear of vapors.”

Pimps controlled their whores by doing such things as beating them and tearing their clothing.

He then said, “Whit, a kick, Whit, in the parting vapor.”

A “kick in the parting vapor” is a “kick in the butt.”

They kicked out Ramping Alice.

He then said to Mrs. Overdo, “Come, brave woman, take a good heart; you shall be a lady, too.”

Whit said, “Yes, fait, dey shall all both be ladies, and write ‘Madam’: I vill do’t myself for dem. ‘Do’ is the word, and D is the middle letter of ‘madam.’ D D, put ’em together, and make deeds, without which all words are alike, la.”

[Whit said, “Yes, by my faith, they shall all both be ladies, and write ‘Madam’: I will do it myself for them. ‘Do’ is the word, and D is the middle letter of ‘madam.’ D D, put them together, and make deeds, without which all words are alike, la.”]

To write “Madam” is to sign and style oneself as Madam, aka a lady of rank. Of course, another kind of madam is associated with prostitutes.

The word is “do,” which means “f**k.” “Deeds” are sexual deeds. Sexual deeds are those that employ the middles of bodies, which are put together. It is deeds that make words distinct and not similar. Is a whore really a whore if she does not do the deeds of a whore?

Jordan Knockem said, “That is true.”

He then ordered, “Ursla, take these two women inside, open your wardrobe, and dress them suitably for their calling. Green gowns, crimson petticoats, green women, my Lord Mayor’s green women!”

Giving a woman a green gown meant having sex with her while she lay on green grass. Green was a color associated with prostitutes.

He said, “They are true-bred guests of the game.”

The game was the game of prostitution.

He then said, “I’ll provide you with a coach to take the air in.”

Mrs. Win Littlewit asked, “But do you think you can get one?”

Was she sarcastic?

Jordan Knockem said, “Oh, they are common as wheelbarrows where there are great dunghills.”

By analogy, coaches equal wheelbarrows and whores (Mrs. Win Littlewit and Mrs. Overdo) equal huge heaps of sh*t.

He continued, “Every pettifogger’s wife has a coach because first he buys a coach so that he may marry, and then he marries so that he may be made a cuckold in his coach, for if their wives ride not to their cuckolding, they do them no credit.”

A “pettifogger” is a bad lawyer.

The “right” way to be cuckolded is to be cuckolded while your wife ostentatiously displays your wealth by riding to an assignation in your coach.

Ursla, Mrs. Win Littlewit, and Mrs. Overdo went inside Ursla’s booth. Mrs. Win Littlewit and Mrs. Overdo perhaps knew they might be beaten if they did not.

Jordan Knockem continued, “Hide, and be hidden, ride and be ridden, says the vapor of experience.”

The kind of riding he meant was sexual riding.

— 4.6 —

Troubleall the madman arrived and asked, “By what warrant does it say so?”

Jordan Knockem said, “Ha, mad child of the Pie-Powders! Are you there? Fill us a fresh can of ale, Urse, so that we may drink together.”

Troubleall said, “I may not drink without a warrant, Captain.”

Jordan Knockem said, “By God’s blood, you’ll not pee without a warrant shortly.”

He then said, “Whit, give me pen, ink, and paper, I’ll draw him a warrant immediately so he can drink.”

This was a good deed on his part.

“It must be Justice Overdo’s warrant,” Troubleall said.

“I know, man,” Jordan Knockem replied, and then he said, “Fetch the drink, Whit.”

Whit said, “I pre dee now, be very brief, Captain, for de new ladies stay for dee.”

[Whit said, “I ask you please now to be very brief, Captain, for the new ladies are waiting for you.”]

He exited and then returned with a can of ale.

Jordan Knockem said, “Oh, I’ll be as brief as can be — the warrant is done already.”

He gave Troubleall a paper and said, “It’s a warrant from Adam Overdo.”

Troubleall said, “Why, now I’ll toast you, Captain.”

Jordan Knockem said, “Drink it all up, and I’ll come to you soon again.”

They exited.

In the back of Ursla’s booth, Justice Overdo was in the stocks.

Quarlous and Ezekiel Edgworth arrived. Quarlous had the marriage license that Ezekiel Edgworth had stolen.

Quarlous said, “Well, sir, you are now discharged; beware of being detected as a cutpurse hereafter.”

Ezekiel Edgworth said, “Sir, if you please, you may enter in here at Ursla’s, and make use of a silken gown, a velvet petticoat, or a wrought smock; I am promised such, and I can spare a gentleman a part.”

Ezekiel Edgworth, who was inviting Quarlous to have sex with a prostitute, was generous in sharing what he stole and the perks of his trade. This made him popular with many people and helped keep him safe.

Quarlous was having none of it.

Quarlous said, “Keep it for your companions in beastliness; I am not one of your companions, sir. If I had not already forgiven you a greater trespass, or thought you yet worth my beating, I would instruct your manners concerning to whom you made your offers.”

He meant that he would teach Ezekiel Edgworth manners — not to attempt to become friends with Quarlous — by beating him.

He added, “But go on your way, and don’t talk to me. Only the hangman is fit to discourse with you; the hand of the beadle is too merciful a punishment for your trade of life.”

The hand of the beadle whipped petty criminals.

Ezekiel Edgworth exited.

Quarlous said to himself, “I am sorry I employed this fellow, for he thinks me such a person as he is: Facinus quos inquinat, aequat.”

“Facinus quos inquinat, aequat” is a Latin quotation from Lucan’s Pharsalia and means, “Crime makes socially equal those whom it pollutes.”

Quarlous considered himself better than Ezekiel Edgworth, but he recognized that both had been engaged in theft.

He continued, “But it was for entertainment, and I wish I could make it serious — the getting of this license is nothing to me, unless other circumstances concur.”

He had gotten the marriage license so that he could marry Miss Grace Wellborn, but he would not be able to marry her unless Troubleall had chosen the name he — Quarlous — had written in the notebook.

Quarlous continued, “I think about how uselessly I labor, if the word is not mine that the ragged fellow — Troubleall — marked. I also think about what advantage I have given Ned Winwife in allowing him to have all this time now to work on Miss Grace Wellborn and persuade her to marry him, even if the word Troubleall chose and marked is mine.

“Ned Winwife’ll go near to make her an image of what a ‘debauched rascal’ I am, and frighten her out of all her good opinion of me. I would do the same thing to him, I am sure, if I had the opportunity. But my hope lies still in her disposition, and my hope must necessarily be next to despair because it is grounded in any part of a woman’s discretion. I would give, I say truly now, all I could spare, up to but not including my clothes and my sword, to meet my tattered soothsayer — who kept asking about warrants — again, who was my judge in the question, to know for certain whose word he has damned or saved because until then I live but under a reprieve. I must seek him.”

Some people came, and he asked himself, “Who are these people?”

Bristle and some other watchmen arrived, with Humphrey Wasp in custody.

Humphrey Wasp said, “Sir, you are a Welsh cuckold, and a prating runt, and no constable.”

Bristle replied, “You speak very well.”

He then ordered the other watchmen, “Come, put his leg in the middle roundel, and let him hole there.”

The stocks had three holes, which could restrain three prisoners, if each prisoner put one leg in one hole.

The watchmen put Humphrey Wasp in the stocks beside the disguised Justice Overdo.

Humphrey Wasp said to Bristle, “You stink of leeks, metheglin, and cheese, you rogue.”

The Welsh were stereotypically fond of leeks, which are related to the onion; metheglin, which is a Welsh mead; and cheese.

Bristle replied, “Why, what is that to you, if you sit sweetly in the stocks in the meantime? If you have a mind to stink, too, your breeches sit close enough to your bum. Sit you merry, sir.”

A bum is a butt.

Quarlous asked, “How are you now, Numps?”

Humphrey Wasp replied, “It doesn’t concern you; please look away.”

Quarlous said, “I’ll not offend you, Numps; I thought you had sat there in order to be seen.”

Humphrey Wasp said, “And to be sold, didn’t you think? Please mind your own business, if you have any.”

Quarlous said, “I beg your mercy, Numps. Does your leg lie high enough?”

Haggis the watchman arrived.

Bristle asked, “How are you now, neighbor Haggis? What does Justice Overdo’s worship say about the other offenders?”

Haggis said, “Why, he says just nothing. What should he say, or where should he say? He is not to be found, man; he has not been seen in the fair here all this livelong day. He has not been seen since seven o’clock in the morning. His clerks don’t know what to think about it. There is no Court of Pie-Powders yet.”

He looked up and said, “Here they have returned.”

Some members of the watch returned with Zeal-of-the-land Busy in custody.

Bristle said, “What shall be done with them, then, in your discretion, aka judgment?”

Haggis replied, “I think it would be best to put them in the stocks in discretion, aka out of prudence (there they will be safe in discretion, aka separation) for the valor, aka length, of an hour or so until his worship comes.”

Bristle said, “It is but a hole matter if we do, neighbor Haggis.”

It would be a whole matter, as well as a matter of holes (in the stocks).

Bristle said to Humphrey Wasp, “Here is company for you.”

Then he ordered, “Heave open the stocks.”

As they opened the stocks, Humphrey Wasp put his shoe on his hand, and slipped it into the stock-hole instead of his leg.

Humphrey Wasp said to himself, “I shall pull a trick upon your Welsh diligence perhaps.”

Bristle said to Zeal-of-the-land Busy, “Put in your leg, sir.”

Quarulous looked and said, “What, Rabbi Busy! Has he come to this?”

Zeal-of-the-land Busy said to Haggis, “I obey you; the lion may roar, but he cannot bite. I am glad to be thus separated from the heathen of the land, and put apart in the stocks, for the holy cause.”

Humphrey Wasp asked, “Who are you, sir?”

Zeal-of-the-land Busy replied, “One who rejoices in his affliction, and sits here to prophesy the destruction of fairs and May-games, wakes and Whitson-ales, and one who sighs and groans for the reformation of these abuses.”

The Puritans were against frivolities such as fairs and country festivals such as May-games, wakes, and Whitson-ales.

Humphrey Wasp asked the disguised Justice Overall, “And do you sigh and groan, too, or do you rejoice in your affliction?”

The disguised Justice Overdo said, “I do not feel it, I do not think of it, it is a thing outside of me.”

He then said to himself, “Adam, you are above these batteries, aka heavy blows, and these contumelies, aka insults. In te manca ruit fortuna, as your friend Horace says; you are one Quem neque pauperies, neque mors, neque vincula, terrent. And therefore, as another friend of yours says, I think it is your friend Persius, Non te quaesiveris extra.”

“In te manca ruit fortuna” is Latin for “In attacking you, Fortune maims herself.”

“Quem neque pauperies, neque mors, neque vincula, terrent” is Latin for “Neither poverty nor death nor fetters terrify” the wise man.

The two Latin quotations above are from Horace’s Satires 2.7.83-8. The disguised Justice Overall slightly changed Horace in the first Latin quotation.

“Non te quaesiveris extra” is Latin for “Don’t look outside yourself.” The quotation is from Persius’ Satires 1.7.

The three quotations express Stoic ideas such as to endure quietly what you cannot change.

Overhearing the disguised Justice Overall, Quarulous said, “What’s here! A Stoic in the stocks? The Fool has turned into a philosopher.”

Zeal-of-the-land Busy said, “Friend, I will cease to communicate my spirit with you, if I hear any more of those superstitious relics, those bits and pieces of Latin, the very rags of Rome, and patches of Popery.”

Puritans were against Latin because they were against Catholicism. For one thing, they objected to Latin services because most people could not understand Latin.

Humphrey Wasp said, “If you begin to quarrel, gentlemen, I’ll leave you. I have paid for quarrelling too recently. Look, here’s a trick. I put a hand instead of a foot in the hole. May God be with you.”

He slipped out his hand.

Zeal-of-the-land Busy said, “Will you then leave your brethren in tribulation?”

Humphrey Wasp said, “For this once, sir, I will.”

He ran away.

Zeal-of-the-land Busy said after him, “You are a halting neutral.”

A neutral is not committed to either side: the side of the watchmen or the side of the people in the stocks; the side of Zeal-of-the-land Busy or the side of the disguised Justice Overdo; the side of the Puritans or the side of the Catholics.

1 Kings 18:21 states, “And Elijah came unto all the people, and said, How long halt ye between two opinions? If the Lord be God, follow him: but if Baal, then follow him. And the people answered him not a word” (King James Version).

Humphrey Wasp may also have been limping if his leg had fallen asleep in the stocks or if he had not taken the time to put on his shoe.

Zeal-of-the-land Busy then said to the watchmen, “Stop him there! Stop that man who will not endure the heat of persecution!”

Bristle said, “What is it now? What’s the matter?”

Zeal-of-the-land Busy said about Humphrey Wasp, “He has fled. He has fled, and he dares not sit his punishment out.”

Bristle said, “Has he made an escape! Which way did he go?”

Zeal-of-the-land Busy pointed.

Bristle then ordered, “Go after him, neighbor Haggis.”

Haggis and some watchmen ran after Humphrey Wasp.

Dame Purecraft arrived.

Seeing Zeal-of-the-land Busy in the stocks, she said, “Oh, in the stocks! Have the wicked prevailed?”

Zeal-of-the-land Busy said, “Peace, religious sister, it is my calling, comfort yourself; it is an extraordinary calling, and it is done for my better standing, my surer standing, hereafter.”

Troubleall the madman arrived, holding a can of ale.

He asked, “By whose warrant, by whose warrant, is this?”

Quarulous said to himself, “Here’s the man I was looking for.”

Recognizing Troubleall, the disguised Justice Overdo said, “Ah!”

Dame Purecraft said to Troubleall, "Oh, good sir, they have set the faithful here to be wondered at; and they have provided holes for the holy of the land."

The holes were in the stocks.

"Did they have a warrant for it?" Troubleall asked. "Was the warrant in Justice Overdo's handwriting or with his signature? If they had no warrant, they shall answer for it."

Toby Haggis the watchman returned.

Bristle said, "Surely you did not lock the stocks sufficiently well enough, neighbor Toby."

"No!" Haggis said. "See if you can lock them better."

Bristle looked at the stocks and said, "They are very truly and sufficiently locked, and yet something is the matter."

"That's true," Troubleall said. "Your warrant is the matter that is in question; by what warrant are you acting?"

Bristle said, "Madman, hold your peace. Be quiet, or else I will put you in his place in the very same hole in the stocks, do you see?"

"What!" Quarlous said, "Is he a madman?"

Troubleall said, "If you show me Justice Overdo's warrant, I will obey you."

"You are a mad fool," Haggis said. "Hold your tongue."

Haggis and Bristle exited.

Troubleall said, "In Justice Overdo's name, I drink to you, and here's my warrant."

He lifted his can of ale, which he believed that Justice Overdo had authorized him to drink.

“Alas, poor wretch!” the disguised Justice Overdo said to himself. “How my heart grieves for him!”

“If he is mad, it is in vain to question him,” Quarlous said to himself. “I’ll still try to question him, though.”

He asked Troubleall, “Friend, some hours previously there was a gentlewoman who showed you in a book two names, Argalus and Palamon, for you to mark one of them. Which of them was it you marked?”

“I mark no name but Adam Overdo,” Troubleall said. “That is the name of names. Only he is the sufficient magistrate, and that is the name I reverence. Show his name to me.”

Troubleall was putting Justice Overdo in the place of God.

“This fellow’s mad indeed,” Quarlous said to himself. “I am further off now than before.”

Before, he had some hope of finding out from Troubleall which name he had chosen, but now he had no hope of that.

The disguised Justice Overdo said quietly to himself about Troubleall, “I shall not breathe in peace until I have made him some amends.”

Quarlous said about Troubleall, “Well, I will make another use of him — an idea has come in my head. I have a nest of beards in my trunk-hose, and one of them is similar to his.”

Trunk-hose was stuffed with wool to make the thighs look huge. Apparently, Quarlous was something of an amateur actor because he used some trunk-hose as a storage area for his false beards. Or perhaps he had another use for false beards.

Bristle and Haggis returned.

Bristle complained about Troubleall, “This mad fool has made me so upset that I don’t know whether I have locked the stocks or not; I think I locked them.”

He opened the locks to inspect them.

Troubleall said, “Take Adam Overdo in your mind, and fear nothing.”

“By God’s eyelid, this is madness itself!” Bristle said. “Hold your peace, and take that.”

He struck Troubleall, who said, “You struck me without a warrant? Take that.”

They fought.

The locks on the stocks were still open.

Zeal-of-the-land Busy said, “We are delivered by a miracle.”

He was thinking of the release by miracle of Paul and Silas from the stocks at Philippi, as recounted in Acts 16:19-34. Paul and Silas did not flee, but stayed and converted their captors.

Zeal-of-the-land Busy said to the disguised Justice Overdo, “Fellow in fetters, let us not refuse the means; this madness was of the spirit: The malice of the enemy has mocked itself.”

Zeal-of-the-land Busy and the disguised Justice Overdo escaped. So did Troubleall.

Dame Purecraft said about Troubleall, “Mad do they call him! The world is mad in error, but he is mad in truth: I love him all of a sudden (everything the cunning man said is true), and I shall love him more and more.”

The cunning man had said she needed to marry a madman within a week.

She continued, “How well it becomes a man to be mad in truth! Oh, that I might be his yoke-fellow, his wife, and be mad with him — what a many should we draw to madness in truth with us!”

According to St. Paul, true wisdom is being a fool for Christ.

Corinthians 4:10 states, “We are fools for Christ’s sake, but ye are wise in Christ; we are weak, but ye are strong; ye are honourable, but we are despised” (King James Version).

She exited.

Bristle looked around and said, “Damn, all have escaped! Where’s the woman? It is witchcraft! The woman in the velvet hat is a witch, on my conscience or my key! She is the one responsible for this. The madman was a Devil, and I am an ass; so bless me, my place, and my office!”

Frightened, Bristle and Haggis exited.

— 5.1 —

Lantern Leatherhead, now dressed as a puppet-show man, stood at the location where he would put on a puppet-play. He was wearing very fine clothing and was disguised enough that Bartholomew Cokes would not recognize him. Lantern Leatherhead would provide the voices of the puppets in the show and act as master of ceremonies.

His assistants, Filcher and Sharkwell, were with him. Sharkwell carried a flag.

To “filch” meant to steal. To “shark” meant to victimize or to act like a “shark,” aka a swindler or sharper.

The disguised Lantern Leatherhead said, “Well, luck and Saint Bartholomew! Put out the sign advertising our show, in the name of wit, and beat the drum all the while to advertise our show. All the foul in the fair, I mean all the dirt in Smithfield — that’s one of Mr. Littlewit’s carwhitchets, aka puns, now — will be thrown at our banner today, if our show does not please the people.”

Lantern Leatherhead was producing the puppet-play written by Mr. John Littlewit.

He continued, “Oh, the puppet-plays that I, Lantern Leatherhead, have given light to, in my time, since my mentor, Mr. Pod, died! Jerusalem was a stately thing, and so was Nineveh, and The City of Norwich, and Sodom and Gomorrah, with the rising of the apprentices, and pulling down the bawdy houses there upon Shrove Tuesday, but The Gunpowder Plot — there was a get-penny, aka money-maker! I have presented that to an eighteen- or twenty-pence audience, nine times in an afternoon.”

Jerusalem told the story of the Romans' destruction of the city of Jerusalem.

Nineveh told the story of Jonah and the whale and the threatened destruction of the city of Nineveh.

The City of Norwich told the story of the raising of the city of Norwich in an hour, according to legend, or perhaps it told the story of Saint George and the Dragon. Norwich is associated with dragons.

Sodom and Gomorrah told the story of the destruction of these two sinful cities.

The Gunpowder Plot told about a then-recent event: Guy Fawkes' failed plot to blow up Parliament in 1605.

Apprentices were then accustomed to riot on Shrove Tuesday.

The disguised Lantern Leatherhead continued, "Your home-born projects always prove to be the best because they are so easy and familiar. Nowadays, playwrights put too much learning in their things, and I fear that is what will be the spoil and ruination of this puppet-play by Littlewit.

"Littlewit! Micklewit! If not too mickle!"

"Mickle" means "much."

The disguised Lantern Leatherhead was afraid that Mr. John Littlewit's puppet-play would be too intellectual for the audience.

He then ordered, "Look to your gathering there, goodman Filcher."

Filcher and Sharkwell would take money from the crowd gathering to see the puppet-play.

"I promise you that I will, sir," Filcher said.

The disguised Lantern Leatherhead said, “If there come any gentlefolks, take two-pence apiece for admission from them, Sharkwell.”

Sharkwell said, “I promise you that I will, sir, and three-pence if we can get it.”

— 5.2 —

In another part of the fair stood Justice Overdo, who was now disguised as a porter. Previously, he had been disguised as a Fool. Porters wore a distinctive costume: red cap, long coat, and a rope on the shoulders.

The porter-disguised Justice Overdo said to himself, “This most recent disguise, which I have borrowed from a porter, shall help me carry out all my great and good ends, which however interrupted were never destroyed in me. Nor has yet come the hour of my severity in chastising evil-doers. In that hour I will reveal myself, and in that hour, cloud-like, I will break out in rain and hail, lightning and thunder, upon the head of enormity.

“Two main works I have to accomplish. The first one is to invent some satisfaction for the poor kind wretch who is out of his wits for my sake, and yonder I see him coming. I will walk aside, and plan how to accomplish that main work.”

He stepped aside.

Mr. Winwife and Miss Grace Wellborn arrived.

Mr. Winwife said, “I wonder where Tom Quarlous is and why he has not returned. It may be that he has turned in here to seek us.”

Miss Grace Wellborn said, “Look, here’s our madman coming again.”

Quarlous arrived, disguised as Troubleall the madman. He was wearing a false beard and the clothing that Troubleall wore. As would be learned later, he had actually stolen the clothing from Troubleall. Dame Purecraft followed him.

The disguised Quarlous said to himself, "I have made myself as like him as his gown and cap will allow me to be."

Dame Purecraft said, "Sir, I love you, and I would be glad to be mad with you in truth."

Mr. Winwife said, "What! My widow is in love with a madman?"

Dame Purecraft said, "Verily, I can be as mad in spirit as you."

"By whose warrant?" the disguised Quarlous said. "Leave your canting."

Canting is specialized language, aka jargon. Criminals speak one kind of cant; Puritans speak another kind of cant.

He then said to Miss Grace Wellborn, "Gentlewoman, have I found you? Save you, quit you, and multiply you! Where's your book? It was a sufficient name I marked, let me see it, be not afraid to show it to me."

Miss Grace Wellborn said, "Why do you want to see it, sir?"

"To mark it again and to again be at your service," the disguised Quarlous said.

"Here it is, sir," Miss Grace Wellborn said, showing him the book. "This is the name you marked."

The disguised Quarlous read out loud, "Palamon!"

Then he said, "Fare you well. Fare you well. Farewell."

Palamon was the name that Mr. Winwife had written. Mr. Winwife would wed Miss Grace Wellborn.

“What! Palamon!” Mr. Winwife said.

“Yes, indeed, he has revealed it to you now, and therefore it would be vain to hide it longer,” Miss Grace Wellborn said. “I am yours, sir, by the benefit of your fortune.”

“And you have won a man, mistress, believe it, who shall never give you cause to repent her benefit,” Mr. Winwife said, “but will make you think that in this choice Lady Fortune had both her eyes open rather than blindfolded.”

Miss Grace Wellborn said, “I desire to put it to no danger of protestation.”

She had no intention of objecting to what he had just said. She also wanted the marriage to occur quickly so that her legal guardian would be unable to formally protest and object to the marriage.

Miss Grace Wellborn and Mr. Winwife exited.

The disguised Quarlous said, “‘Palamon’ is the word marked, and Mr. Winwife is the man who will yoke himself to Miss Grace Wellborn!”

Dame Purecraft said, “Good sir, vouchsafe a yoke-fellow in your madness, and shun not one of the sanctified sisters, one who would draw as a yoke-fellow with you in truth. I want to marry you.”

The word “vouchsafe” meant “grant” or “give.”

The sanctified sisters are female Puritans, and Puritans were a group whom Quarlous was not fond of.

The disguised Quarlous said, “Go away. You Puritans are a herd of hypocritical proud ignorants, rather wild than mad; you are fitter for woods and the society of beasts than for houses and the congregation of men.

“You are the second part of the society of canters, outlaws to order and discipline, and the only privileged church-robbers of Christendom.”

The first part of the society of canters was criminals such as cutpurses and other thieves.

When a theft occurred in a church, Puritans were sometimes accused of the theft because they disapproved of golden and jeweled items in churches.

The disguised Quarlous continued, “Let me alone. ‘Palamon’ is the word marked, and Mr. Winwife is the man who will yoke himself to Miss Grace Wellborn!”

Dame Purecraft said to herself, “I must reveal my secrets to him, or I shall never enjoy him as his wife, despite all the cunning men’s predictions that I must marry a madman.”

She then said to him out loud, “Good sir, listen to me. I am worth six thousand pounds, and my love to you has become my rack and torture. I’ll tell you everything and all of it is the truth, since you hate the hypocrisy of the party-colored brotherhood.”

A party-colored brotherhood is a factionalistic brotherhood or party. Factionalism can be quite bad if it leads one or more factions to behave evilly to advance their faction. In this society, a “color” is a trick.

Dame Purecraft continued, “These seven years I have been a willful holy widow only in order to draw feasts and gifts from my entangled suitors.

“I also have the position of an assisting sister of the deacons, and I am a devourer instead of a distributor of the alms.

“I am a special maker of marriages for our financially decayed Puritan brethren with our rich widows, for a third part of their wealth, when they are married, for the relief of the poor elect. I also make marriages for our poor pretty young Puritan virgins with our wealthy bachelors or widowers; I make the marriage so that I can make the women steal from their husbands, after I have confirmed the husbands in the faith, and got all put into their wives’ custodies.”

Women could be guaranteed a dower: a certain amount of money they would receive if the husband died before the wife did. Some women even in Elizabeth and Jacobean times could control at least some of their husbands’ money. Puritan women could be persuaded to make donations to the church.

She arranged financially beneficial marriages for Puritans for a cut of the spouse’s wealth, wealth that was supposed to go to good works such as helping poor Puritans. She, however, devoured the alms herself rather than distributing them to the poor.

Dame Purecraft continued, “And if I don’t get what I was promised, they may sooner turn a scolding drab into a silent minister than make me stop pronouncing reprobation and damnation upon them.

“Our elder, Zeal-of-the-land Busy, would have married me, but I know him to be the capital knave of the land, making himself rich by being made a caretaker in trust to deceased brethren and cheating their heirs by swearing that the inheritance was left to him and was his property when the actual trust was that he was named only as the trustee of the property, which had really been left to the heirs.”

In other words, Quarlous was right. The Puritans were unethical cheaters. Certainly, this was true of Dame

Purecraft and, if she had told the truth about him, of Zeal-of-the-land Busy.

She continued, “And thus having eased my conscience, and uttered my heart with the tongue of my love, I beg you to enjoy all my deceits together with me.”

She thought that the disguised Quarlous, whom she believed was Troubleall, would approve of her deceits and would be happy to share the profits.

She continued, “I should not have revealed this to you, except that opportunely I think you are mad, and in time I hope you’ll think me so, too, sir.

“So will you marry me?”

The disguised Quarlous said, “Stand to the side. I’ll give you an answer very quickly.”

He walked a short distance away and said to himself, “Why shouldn’t I marry this six thousand pounds, now I think about it, and a good trade, too, that she has besides, hmm?”

The good — profitable — trade was the trade of arranging marriages.

He continued, “The other wench — Miss Grace Wellborn — Mr. Winwife is sure of marrying; there’s no expectation for me there. Here I may recover for myself at least some of what I have lost by not marrying Miss Grace, if Dame Purecraft continues to be mad.”

He thought that Dame Purecraft had to be mad to propose marriage to a madman such as Troubleall.

He continued, “Will she continue to be mad until we are married — there’s the question. It is money that I want, so why shouldn’t I marry the money when it is offered to me? I have a marriage license and all that is needed to make a legal marriage; all I have to do is erase one name, and write in its place another name. There's no playing with a man's fortune! I am resolved; I have made up my mind; I would be truly mad if I would not marry her!"

The disguised Quarlous then said to Dame Purecraft, "Well, we'll do what you want. Follow me, if you will be mad, and I'll show you a marriage warrant!"

Dame Purecraft said, "Most zealously I will follow you, for it is that which I zealously desire."

They started to walk away.

The porter-disguised Justice Overdo stopped the disguised Quarlous and said, "Sir, let me speak with you."

"By whose warrant?" the disguised Quarlous asked.

"By the warrant that you have regard for, value, and respect so much: Justice Overdo's. I am the man, friend Troubleall, though thus disguised (just as the magistrate who cares for the society he lives in ought to be sometimes) for the good of the republic in the fair, and the weeding out of enormity. Do you want a house, or food, or drink, or clothes? Tell me whatsoever it is that you want, and it shall be given to you. Tell me what you want."

"Nothing but your warrant," the disguised Quarlous said.

"My warrant! For what?"

"To be gone, sir."

"Please, stay," the porter-disguised Justice Overdo said. "I am serious, and I do not have many words to exchange or much time to spend with you. Think of something that may do you good."

“Your hand and seal will do me a great deal of good,” the disguised Quarlous said. “Nothing else in the whole fair that I know of will do me good.”

The porter-disguised Justice Overdo said, “If it were of any value, I would give you my warrant willingly.”

“Why, it will satisfy me and make me happy,” the disguised Quarlous said. “That’s value for me; if you will not give me your warrant, let me go.”

The porter-disguised Justice Overdo said, “It’s a pity you didn’t choose something valuable! You shall have my warrant immediately; I’ll just step into the notary’s shop here, and bring it. Do not go away.”

He entered the notary’s shop.

“Why, this madman’s shape will prove a very fortunate one, I think,” the disguised Quarlous said to himself. “Can a ragged robe produce these effects? If this really is the wise justice, and he brings me his signed warrant, I shall soon make some use of it.”

The porter-disguised Justice Overdo came out of the notary’s shop.

“Here he is again already!” the disguised Quarlous said to himself.

“Look!” the porter-disguised Justice Overdo said. “Here is my signature and my seal — those of Adam Overdo; if anything would be written above in that paper that you want now or at any time hereafter — think carefully about it — this is my deed and contract, and I will deliver what you want to you. Can your friend write?”

“She can sign it as a witness, and all will be well,” the disguised Quarlous said.

The porter-disguised Justice Overall said, “I agree to that with all my heart.”

He urged Dame Purecraft to sign the warrant, and she did.

The disguised Quarlous thought, Why shouldn't I find the ability in my conscience to make this out for a bond of a thousand pounds now, or whatever else I want?

If he were to write in words to make it a contract stating that Justice Overdo owed him, Quarlous, one thousand pounds, Justice Overdo would have to pay him one thousand pounds.

The porter-disguised Justice Overall said, “Look, there it is, and I deliver this warrant to you as my deed again.”

He gave the disguised Quarlous the blank warrant.

The disguised Quarlous said to Dame Purecraft, “Let us now proceed in madness.”

The disguised Quarlous and Dame Purecraft exited.

The porter-disguised Justice Overdo said, “Well, my conscience is much eased. I have done my part, although it does him no good. Still, Adam Overdo has offered him satisfaction. The sting is removed from hence!

“Poor man, he is much altered with his affliction; it has brought him low.

“Now for my other main work, recalling the young man whom I have followed so long in a kind of love from the brink of his bane to the center of safety.”

He was referring to Ezekiel Edgworth, whom he considered to be a good young man who hung out with the wrong company.

He continued, “Here, or in some similar vain place, I shall be sure to find him. I will wait for the opportune time to help him.”

— 5.3 —

Sharkwell and Filcher, carrying bills, stood in front of the puppet-show booth. Bartholomew Cokes, wearing a jacket and long stockings — his cloak, sword, and hat had been stolen — arrived. Some young children followed him.

Bartholomew Cokes said to Sharkwell, “How are you now? What’s going on here, friend? Are you the master of the monuments?”

Westminster Abbey had a master of the monuments, aka the effigies. That person was a guide; Bartholomew Cokes thought that Sharkwell was a kind of guide, too — one who could tell him what was the structure (the puppet-show stage) in front of him.

Sharkwell replied, “It is a show, if it pleases your worship.”

The porter-disguised Justice Overdo arrived, saw Bartholomew Cokes and said to himself, “My fantastical, capricious brother-in-law, Mr. Bartholomew Cokes!”

Bartholomew Cokes said, “A show! What kind of show?”

He then read the sign out loud: “The ancient modern history of Hero and Leander, otherwise called the Touchstone of true Love, with as true a trial of friendship between Damon and Pythias, two faithful friends of the Bankside.”

In Greek mythology, Leander was a man who loved the woman Hero. He used to swim across the Hellespont to see her, but drowned one night. The modern name for the Hellespont is the Dardanelles.

Damon and Pythias (who was also known as Phintias) were two close friends. Dionysius I of Syracuse, a tyrant, sentenced Damon to death. Damon requested that he be allowed to return to his home to say goodbye to his family and settle his affairs; Pythias volunteered to stay in Syracuse as a hostage until Damon returned. He would die in Damon's place if Damon did not return. Dionysius I of Syracuse was surprised when Damon did, in fact, return to face death, and impressed by the true friendship of Damon and Pythias, he allowed both of them to live.

Bartholomew Cokes said, "Pretty words, indeed, but what's the meaning of it? Is it an interlude, or what is it?"

An interlude is a short, witty play.

Filcher said, "Yes, sir, if it pleases you to come near, we'll take your admission money inside."

Bartholomew Cokes said, "Keep these children back; they have been following me up and down!"

Mr. John Littlewit, who had written the puppet-play, arrived and attempted to enter, saying, "By your leave, friend."

Filcher said, "You must pay the admission fee, sir, if you go in."

"Who, I!" Mr. John Littlewit said. "I see that you don't know me; call the master of the show."

The master of the show was Lantern Leatherhead.

Recognizing Mr. John Littlewit, Sharkwell said, "Don't you know the author, fellow Filcher? You must take no money from him; he must come in free and gratis: Mr. Littlewit is a volunteer; he is the unpaid author."

Mr. John Littlewit said, "Quiet! Don't speak too loudly. I don't want anyone to know that I am the author until we see whether the show is a success or a failure."

Hearing the disturbance and looking around, Bartholomew Cokes asked, "Mr. John Littlewit, how are you?"

Mr. John Littlewit said, "Mr. Bartholomew Cokes! You are exceedingly well met: It's good to see you! What! You are wearing your jacket and long stockings, and you are without a cloak or a hat!"

Bartholomew Cokes said, "I wish that I might never move again, I swear as I am an honest man and by that fire, for the reason that I have lost everything in the fair, and I have lost all my acquaintances and friends, too."

The fire may have been the roasting fire in Ursula's booth, or, more generally, Hellfire. For Bartholomew Cokes, at least at times, Bartholomew Fair was a kind of Hell, with Ursula's fire at its center.

He continued, "Did you meet anybody whom I know, Mr. Littlewit? Did you meet my man-servant Numps, or my sister, Mrs. Overdo, or Miss Grace? Please, Mr. Littlewit, lend me some money to see the interlude here; I'll pay you again, as I am a gentleman. If you will only see me home, I have money enough there."

"Oh, sir, you shall have some of my money," Mr. John Littlewit said. "Will a crown be enough?"

"I think it will," Bartholomew Cokes said.

He asked Filcher and Sharkwell, "What do we pay for coming in, fellows?"

Filcher replied, "Two-pence, sir."

Bartholomew Cokes said, “Two-pence! There’s twelve-pence, friend.”

He had paid six times the admission price. This was noted, and during the puppet-play he would be treated well, even being allowed to interrupt the show with questions and comments.

He continued, “I am a gallant, despite being as humbly clothed and without a cloak and hat as I am now. You will know that I am a gallant if you see me with my man-servant and with my artillery — that is, my sword — again.”

Mr. John Littlewit said, “Your man-servant Numps was in the stocks just now, sir.”

“Who?” Bartholomew Cokes asked. “Numps?”

“Yes, indeed.”

“For what, indeed?” Bartholomew Cokes asked. “I am glad that he was in the stocks; remember to tell me about it soon; I have enough information about it now.”

He then asked, “What manner of matter is this, Mr. Littlewit? What kind of play is it? What kind of actors have you gotten? Are they good actors?”

Mr. John Littlewit replied, “They are pretty youths, sir; they are all children, both old and young; here’s the master of them —”

At this time, many actors were children.

The disguised Lantern Leatherhead came over and whispered to Mr. John Littlewit, “Call me Lantern, not Leatherhead.”

He did not want Bartholomew Cokes to recognize him. Recently, he had defrauded him of thirty shillings.

Mr. John Littlewit continued, “— Mr. Lantern, who gives light to the business.”

Bartholomew Cokes said, “At an opportune time, sir, I would be glad to see them. I would be glad to drink with the young company. Which is the tiring-house?”

The tiring-house was the attiring-house, or dressing-room.

Lantern Leatherhead replied, “Truly, sir, our tiring-house is somewhat little; we are still only beginners. Please pardon us; you cannot stand upright in it.”

“No!” Bartholomew Cokes said. “Not now, with my hat off? What would you have done with me, if you had had me, feather and all, as I was earlier today?”

“Have you none of your pretty impudent boys now, to bring stools, fill pipes with tobacco, fetch ale, and beg money, as they have at other houses?”

Some stools were placed on the stage for spectators to sit on.

He continued, “Let me see some of your actors.”

Mr. John Littlewit said, “Show him the actors. Show him them. Mr. Lantern, this is a gentleman who is a favorer of the acting profession.”

Lantern Leatherhead exited to get the actors.

The porter-disguised Justice Overdo said to himself, “Yes, the favoring of this licentious acting profession is the consumption of many a young gentleman; it is a pernicious enormity.”

Lantern Leatherhead returned; he was carrying a basket.

Bartholomew Cokes said, “What! Do the actors live in baskets?”

Lantern Leatherhead replied, “They do lie in a basket, sir. They are some of the small players.”

He opened the covering of the basket and revealed the puppets.

Bartholomew Cokes said, “These be players minors — small players — indeed. Do you call these players?”

Lantern Leatherhead said, “They are actors, sir.”

The term “actors” was a more distinguished term than “players.” Actors delivered a better quality of performance.

He added, “And they are as good as any, none dispraised, for dumb shows; indeed, I am the mouth of them all.”

Dumb shows were silent shows with lots of action. The puppets would not speak; Lantern Leatherhead would do the speaking for them; he would also provide commentary.

Bartholomew Cokes said, “Your mouth will hold them all. I think one tailor would go near to beat all this company with a hand bound behind him.”

Tailors had a reputation for cowardice, but even a tailor could probably beat up a company of puppets.

“Yes,” Mr. John Littlewit said, “and eat them all, too, if they were made of gingerbread.”

Tailors had a reputation for eating lots of bread.

Bartholomew Cokes said, “I thank you for that joke, Mr. Littlewit; it is a good jest!”

He then asked the disguised Lantern Leatherhead, “Which is your Burbage now?”

Richard Burbage was the leading actor of his time; he originated the title roles of William Shakespeare’s Richard

III, Othello, Hamlet, and King Lear. He also played leading roles in Ben Jonson's Volpone and The Alchemist.

Lantern Leatherhead asked, "What do you mean, sir?"

Bartholomew Cokes replied, "Which puppet is your best actor, your Field?"

Nathan Field was another leading actor of his time, and was probably playing the role of Mr. John Littlewit or Bartholomew Cokes during Bartholomew Fair's early performances.

Mr. John Littlewit said, "That was a good jest, indeed! You are even with me, sir."

Lantern Leatherhead held up a puppet and said, "This is our Field. He acts the role of young Leander, sir. He is extremely beloved by the womankind. The green gamesters who come here so affect his action!"

"Green gamesters" were young, relatively inexperienced prostitutes.

"Affect his action" meant 1) like his acting, and 2) desire his action in bed.

Lantern Leatherhead held up other puppets and identified them:

"And this is lovely Hero.

"This puppet with the beard is Damon.

"And this puppet is pretty Pythias.

"This puppet is the ghost of King Dionysius in the clothing of a scrivener, as you shall see soon in full."

"Well, they are a civil company," Bartholomew Cokes said. "I like them for that; they promise not to laugh scornfully, nor jeer, nor crack jokes, as the great-sized players do, and then, there is not so much expense as to the feasting of them, or making them drunk by reason of their littleness, as opposed to the expenses for other great-sized actors.

“Are they accustomed to perform word-perfect? Are they ever flustered?”

“Sir, they are never flustered,” Lantern Leatherhead said. “No, sir, I thank my industry and management for it; they are as well governed a company, though I am the one to say it ___”

He meant that he ought to be modest and not be the one to praise his own industry and management.

He continued, “And here is young Leander, who is as proper an actor of his inches, and shakes his head like an Ostler.”

Another popular and successful actor around that time was William Ostler.

Bartholomew Cokes asked, “But do you play it according to the printed book? I have read that.”

The printed book was Hero and Leander by Christopher Marlowe.

“By no means, sir,” Lantern Leatherhead replied.

“No!” Bartholomew Cokes said. “How do you play it, then?”

“We play it a better way, sir,” Lantern Leatherhead said. “The printed book is too learned and poetical for our audience. Do they know what the Hellespont is? Do they know the meaning of ‘guilty of true love’s blood’? Do they know what ‘Abydos’ is? Do they know the meaning of ‘the other Sestos hight’?”

Marlowe’s poem began in this way:

*On Hellespont, guilty of true love's blood,
In view and opposite two cities stood,
Sea-borderers, disjoin'd by Neptune's might;
The one Abydos, the other Sestos hight [is named].*

Bartholomew Cokes said, "You are in the right; I myself do not know the meaning of those things."

The disguised Lantern Leatherhead said, "I have entreated Mr. John Littlewit to take a few pains to reduce the printed book to a more familiar strain for our people."

Ben Jonson's plays were quite learned, and if a play of his failed, he sometimes blamed the failure on the audience.

Bartholomew Cokes said, "How, I ask you, good Mr. Littlewit, did you do that?"

Mr. John Littlewit said, "It pleases Lantern to make a big deal of it, sir; but it is not such a big deal, I assure you. I have only made it a little easier and have made it modern for the times, sir, that's all. In place of the Hellespont, I imagine our Thames here; and then I make Leander a dyer's son from around Puddle Wharf, and I make Hero a wench of the Bankside."

A wench of the Bankside was likely to be a prostitute.

He continued, "As Hero is crossing over the Thames one morning to Old Fish Street, Leander sees her land at Trig Stairs, and falls in love with her. Then I introduce Cupid, who, having metamorphosed himself into a bartender, strikes Hero in love with a pint of sherry."

This was ambiguous: It could mean that 1) Cupid used a pint of sherry to make Hero fall in love with someone, or 2) Cupid made Hero fall in love with a pint of sherry.

John Littlewit continued, “And there are other pretty passages about the friendship, passages that will delight you, sir, and please you men of judgment.”

Bartholomew Cokes said, “I’ll be sworn that those passages shall please me. I am in love with the actors already, and I’ll be allied to them presently.

“The actors shall be my friends. The actors respect gentlemen, these fellows.”

He then matched the puppets with his fairings — things that he had bought, but lost, at the fair.

“Hero shall be my fairing, but which of my fairings? Let me see — indeed, she shall be my fiddle.

“Leander shall be my fiddlestick.

“Then Damon shall be my drum.

“And Pythias shall be my pipe.

“And the ghost of Dionysius shall be my hobbyhorse.

“All of the puppets are matched with my fairings.”

— 5.4 —

Mr. Winwife and Miss Grace Wellborn arrived.

“Look, yonder’s your Bartholomew Cokes gotten in among his playfellows,” Mr. Winwife said. “I was sure we could not miss him at such a spectacle.”

Miss Grace Wellborn said, “Let him alone; he is so busy he will never see us.”

Bartholomew Cokes grabbed one of the puppets — the one portraying Hero — and inspected it.

The disguised Lantern Leatherhead said to him, “No, good sir!”

“I promise you that I will not hurt her, fellow,” Bartholomew Cokes replied. “What! Do you think that I am uncivil? I ask you to be not jealous; I am engaged to a future wife.”

Mr. John Littlewit said, “Well, good Mr. Lantern, get ready to begin so that I may fetch my wife and bring her here, and see to it that you remember the lines perfectly, or else you will ruin my reputation.”

The disguised Lantern Leatherhead said, “I promise you I will, sir.”

His sentence was ambiguous.

He continued, “But don’t breed too great an expectation of your puppet-play among your friends; that’s the hurter of these things. Excessive expectations are difficult to meet.”

“No, no, no,” Mr. John Littlewit said. “I won’t do that.”

He exited in order to get his wife: Mrs. Win Littlewit.

“I’ll stay here and see the play,” Bartholomew Cokes said. “Please let me see it.”

Mr. Winwife said, “How diligent and pains-taking he is!”

Miss Grace Wellborn said, “The place is suitable for him, I think.”

In other words, Bartholomew Cokes was so child-like that he was a good audience member for a puppet-play.

The porter-disguised Justice Overdo said to himself, “My ward, Miss Grace, is in the company of a stranger! I fear that I shall be compelled to reveal my true identity before my time.”

Jordan Knockem, Ezekiel Edgworth, and Mrs. Win Littlewit arrived. Whit followed them, supporting the drunken Mrs. Overdo. Mrs. Win Littlewit and Mrs. Overdo were wearing masks and green gowns.

Women sometimes wore masks while attending plays.

Filcher said to them, “Two-pence apiece, gentlemen, and it’s an excellent puppet-play.”

Jordan Knockem asked, “Shall we have fine fireworks, and good vapors?”

Fireworks can mean a display of wit, anger, or some other great emotion.

Sharkwell replied, “Yes, Captain, and waterworks, too.”

The scene portrayed in the puppet-play was on the Thames River and its banks.

Whit said, “I pree dee take care o’ dy shmall lady there, Edgworth; I will look to dish tall lady myself.”

[Whit said, “Please take care of the small lady there, Edgworth; I will look after this tall lady myself.”]

The small lady, who had a baby bump, was Mrs. Win Littlewit, and the tall lady was Mrs. Overdo.

The disguised Lantern Leatherhead said, “Welcome, gentlemen. Welcome, gentlemen.”

With his Welsh accent, Whit said, “Predee mashter o’ the monshtersh, help a very sick lady here to a chair to shit in.”

[With his Welsh accent, Whit said, “Please, master of the monsters, help a very sick lady here to a chair to sit in.”]

Mrs. Overdo was sick because she was drunk.

The disguised Lantern Leatherhead replied, “Immediately, sir.”

An assistant brought in a chair for Mrs. Overdo to sit in.

Whit said, “Good fait now, Ursula’s ale and aqua-vitae ish to blame for’t; shit down, shweet-heart, shit down and sleep a little.”

[Whit said, “Good faith now, Ursula’s ale and aqua vitae is to blame for it; sit down, sweetheart, sit down and sleep a little.”]

Ezekiel Edgworth said to Mrs. Win Littlewit, “Madam, you are very welcome here.”

Jordan Knockem said, “Yes, and you shall see very good vapors.”

The disguised Justice Overdo said about Ezekiel Edgworth, “Here is the young man I care and worry about! I like to see him in so good company, and yet I wonder that persons of such fashion should come to a puppet-play.”

Ezekiel Edgworth said to the masked Mrs. Win Littlewit, “There is a very private house, madam.”

Many stages for plays and other entertainments were large and open air and open to the general public. Others were small, inside, and restricted to higher-class audience members. Ezekiel Edgworth was joking about the small size of the puppet-show stage and spectator area.

The disguised Lantern Leatherhead said, “Will it please your ladyship to sit, madam?”

Mrs. Win Littlewit replied, “Yes, goodman.”

She then said to herself, “They do so all-to-be-madam me that I think they think I am a true lady.”

“Madam” was a title of respect for ladies, but it has other meanings. By making Mrs. Win Littlewit a prostitute, Jordan Knockem and Whit were perhaps making her a future madam, aka bawd.

In addition, in this society “all” was an intensifier, while “to” meant “asunder” or “into pieces.” By making Mrs. Win Littlewit a prostitute, Jordan Knockem and Whit were completely blowing into pieces any chance of her being a true lady.

Overhearing her, Ezekiel Edgworth said, “What else, madam?”

The porter-disguised Justice Overdo was watching Ezekiel Edgworth closely and also closely observing the masked woman — Mrs. Win Littlewit — Ezekiel Edgworth was with.

Regarding him as a potential customer, Mrs. Win Littlewit asked Ezekiel Edgworth, who knew her to be a prostitute, “Must I put off my mask to him?”

She meant, “Should I take off my mask and show him my face?”

Ezekiel Edgworth replied, “Oh, by no means.”

Mrs. Win Littlewit asked, “How should my ‘husband’ know me then?”

Her customer would be a temporary “husband” who would “know” her Biblically.

Jordan Knockem said, “Husband! That’s an idle vapor; he must not know you, nor you him — there’s the true vapor.”

He meant that there was no need for her and her customer to know each other any more than Biblically.

The porter-disguised Justice Overdo said to himself, “Hmm! I will observe more of this.”

He said quietly to Whit about the masked Mrs. Win Littlewit, “Is this woman a lady, friend?”

Whit said, “Ay, and dat is anoder lady, shweet-heart; if dou hasht a mind to ’em, give me twelve-pence from tee, and dou shalt have eder oder on ’em.”

[Whit said, “Yes, and that [the masked Mrs. Overdo] is another lady, sweetheart; if you have a mind to sleep with either of them, give me twelve-pence from your pocket, and you shall have either one of them.”]

The porter-disguised Justice Overdo said to himself, “Yes, this will prove the chiefest enormity I find at the fair. I will further investigate this.”

Ezekiel Edgworth asked, “Isn’t this a finer life, lady, than to be clogged with a husband?”

“Yes, a great deal better,” Mrs. Win Littlewit replied. “When will they begin, I wonder, in the name of the puppet-play?”

Ezekiel Edgworth replied, “By and by, madam; they are waiting only for the company.”

The company was the people associated with the theatrical troupe.

Jordan Knockem said, “Do you hear, puppet-master? These are tedious vapors. When will you begin?”

The disguised Lantern Leatherhead replied, “We are waiting only for Mr. John Littlewit, the author, who has gone to get his wife: We will begin soon.”

Mrs. Win Littlewit said to Ezekiel Edgworth, “That’s me! That’s me! I am Mr. Littlewit’s wife.”

Ezekiel Edgworth replied, "That was you, lady, but now you are no such poor thing."

Jordan Knockem said, "Hang the author's wife, a running vapor! Here are ladies who will wait for never a Delia of them all."

Delia was an unattainable married woman in poems by the Roman poet Tibullus and in poems by the English poet Samuel Daniel. Her name was an anagram of "ideal." Jordan Knockem, however, meant by "Delia" a "self-important woman."

Whit said, "But hear me now, here ish one o' de ladish ashleep, stay till shee but vake, man."

[Whit said, "But hear me now, here is one of the ladies asleep. Wait just until she wakes up, man."]

Humphrey Wasp arrived and asked, "How are you, friends? What's going on here?"

Filcher said, "Two-pence per person, sir, for the best puppet-play in Bartholomew Fair."

"I believe you are lying," Humphrey Wasp said, "If you are, I'll get my money back again, and beat you."

Mr. Winwife said to Miss Grace Wellborn, "Numps has come!"

Humphrey Wasp asked, "Did you see a master of mine come in here? He's a tall young squire of Harrow o' the Hill named Mr. Bartholomew Cokes."

Filcher replied, "I think there is such a person within."

"It would be best for you that he is inside," Humphrey Wasp said, "but it is very likely. I wonder that I didn't find him at all the other fair attractions. I have been at the eagle, and the black wolf, and the bull with the five legs and two pizzles — he was a calf at Uxbridge Fair two years ago — and at the dogs that dance the Morris Dance, and the hare of the tabor; and I did not see him at all these!”

All of the places he had been were fair attractions.

A “pizzle” is a “penis.”

The hare of the tabor was a trained hare that played the drum known as the tabor.

He continued, “Surely this must be some fine sight that holds him so, if he is here to see it.”

An impatient Bartholomew Cokes said to the puppet master, “Come, come, are you ready now?”

The disguised Lantern Leatherhead replied, “Very soon, sir.”

Seeing Bartholomew Cokes, Humphrey Wasp said, “Hey! He’s at work in his jacket and long stockings!”

He asked him, “Listen, sir, are you employed as a workman here? Is that why you are bare-headed and so busy?”

“Hold your peace, Numps,” Bartholomew Cokes said. “Don’t criticize me. You have been in the stocks, I hear.”

Humphrey Wasp said to himself, “Does he know that! Well, then the date of my authority is out; I must think no longer to reign; my government is at an end. He who will correct another must lack fault in himself.”

His time of trying to control Bartholomew Cokes had come to an end; he could no longer exert any moral authority over him.

“Sententious Numps!” Mr. Winwife said to Miss Grace Wellborn. “I have never heard so much sense from him before.”

A sententious person is given to pompous moralizing.

“Surely, Mr. John Littlewit is not coming back,” the disguised Lantern Leatherhead said. “Please take your place, sir; we’ll begin.”

Bartholomew Cokes said, “Please begin the puppet-play. My ears long to hear it, and my eyes long to see it.

“Oh, Numps, you were in the stocks, Numps! Where’s your sword, Numps!”

His sword had been stolen along with others’ swords during the fight.

“Please watch your puppet-play, sir,” Humphrey Wasp said, “and let me alone.”

“Well, then we are even for everything,” Bartholomew Cokes said. “Come, sit down, Numps; I’ll explain the puppet-play to you.

“Did you see Miss Grace? It doesn’t matter, now I think about it. Tell me about her soon.”

Mr. Winwife said to Miss Grace Wellborn, “A great deal of love and concern he expresses for you!”

Miss Grace Wellborn said, “Alas, would you have him express more love and concern than he has? That would be tyranny.”

Bartholomew Cokes said, “Silence, ho! Now! Quiet!”

The disguised Lantern Leatherhead, who as puppet master would provide the voices of the puppets and be the master of ceremonies, began the performance:

“Gentles, [so] that no longer your expectations may wander,

“Behold our chief actor, amorous Leander.

*“With a great deal of cloth, lapped about him like a scarf,
“For he yet serves his father, a dyer at Puddle Wharf;
“Which place we’ll make bold with, to call it our Abydus,
“As the Bankside is our Sestos; and let it not be denied us.
“Now as he is beating to make the dye take the fuller;”*

“The fuller” meant “more completely.” In the fulling of woolen cloth, the cloth is cleaned and beaten to make it thicker. Once the cloth is clean, the dye will adhere to the parts that had been dirty.

“Who chances to come by, but fair Hero in a sculler;”

A sculler is a small boat that is propelled by special oars called sculls. A sculler is also the person who sculls — rows with the special oars — the boat.

“And seeing Leander’s naked leg and goodly calf,

“Cast at him from the boat a sheep’s eye and an half.”

A “sheep’s eye” is a “loving look.”

“Now she is landed, and the sculler come back,

“By and by you shall see what Leander does lack.”

Puppet Leander called, “Cole, Cole, old Cole!”

“Cole” is a stereotypical name for a pander.

The disguised Lantern Leatherhead said as the puppet master, “That is the sculler’s name without control.”

“Without control” means “freely stated.”

Puppet Leander called, “Cole, Cole, I say, Cole!”

Puppet master Lantern Leatherhead said, “We hear you.”

Puppet Leander called, "Old Cole."

Puppet master Lantern Leatherhead joked, "Old Coal! Is the dyer turned collier? How do you sell?"

Calling a person a collier, aka a dealer in coal, was an insult because colliers were dirty from being around coal and because colliers had a reputation for cheating their customers.

Puppet Leander said, "A pox on your manners! Kiss my hole here, and smell it!"

Puppet master Lantern Leatherhead said, "Kiss your hole and smell it! There's manners indeed."

Puppet Leander yelled, "Why, Cole, I say, Cole!"

Puppet master Lantern Leatherhead asked, "Is it the sculler you need?"

Puppet Leander replied, "Yes, and be hanged."

Lantern Leatherhead said, "Be hanged! Look yonder.

"Old Cole, you must go hang with Mr. Leander."

Puppet Cole asked, "Where is he?"

Puppet Leander replied, "Here, Cole. What fairest of fairs, "Was that fare whom you landed just now at Trig Stairs?"

As puppet master, Lantern Leatherhead used a high-pitched voice.

Not yet used to the voice, Bartholomew Cokes asked him, "What was that, fellow? Please tell me. I scarcely understand what you are saying."

In his normal voice, puppet master Lantern Leatherhead replied, "Leander does ask, sir, what fairest of fairs, was the fare he landed just now at Trig Stairs?"

Puppet Cole answered Puppet Leander, "It is lovely Hero."

Puppet Leander asked, "Nero?"

Nero was a tyrannical Roman emperor.

Puppet Cole replied, "No, Hero."

Puppet master Lantern Leatherhead said, "It is Hero

"Of the Bankside, he says, to tell you truth without erring,

"Is come over into Fish Street to eat some fresh herring.

"Leander says no more, but as fast as he can,

"Gets on all his best clothes, and will after [will go] to the Swan."

The Swan is an inn.

Bartholomew Cokes said, "This is extremely good, isn't it!"

Puppet master Lantern Leatherhead said, "Wait, sculler."

Puppet Cole replied, "What did you say?"

Puppet master Lantern Leatherhead said:

"You must stay [wait] for Leander,

"And carry him to the wench."

Puppet Cole said, "You rogue, I am no pander."

"He says that he is no pander," Bartholomew Cokes said.

"This is a fine language. I understand what the puppets are saying now."

Puppet master Lantern Leatherhead said:

“Are you no pander, goodman Cole? Here’s no man says you are;

“You’ll grow a hot [angry] Cole [pun on “hot, burning coal”], it seems; pray [please] you stay [wait] for your fare.”

Puppet Cole asked, “Will he come away?”

Puppet master Lantern Leatherhead asked, “What do you say?”

Puppet Cole answered, “I’d have him come away.”

Puppet master Lantern Leatherhead asked:

“Would you have Leander come away? Why, pray [please], sir, stay.

“You are angry, goodman Cole; I believe the fair maid

“Came over with you on trust: tell us, sculler, are you paid?”

“On trust” means “on credit.” Puppet master Lantern Leatherhead was hinting that Puppet Hero had paid for her passage with sex.

Puppet Cole replied, “Yes, goodman Hog-rubber of Pict-Hatch.”

“Rub” is an action performed during sex, so Puppet Cole was charging puppet master Lantern Leatherhead with bestiality.

Pict-Hatch was an area known for its prostitutes and thieves.

Puppet master Lantern Leatherhead said, “What! Hog-rubber of Pict-Hatch?”

Puppet Cole replied, “Yes, Hog-rubber of Pict-Hatch. Take that!”

Puppet Cole hit the puppet master on the head.

Puppet master Lantern Leatherhead said, "Oh, my head!"

Puppet Cole said, "Harm watch, harm catch!"

In other words, if you look for trouble, you'll find it.

Bartholomew Cokes said, "Harm watch, harm catch, he says; that is very good, indeed."

He then said to the puppet master, "The sculler was likely to have beaten you, sirrah."

Puppet master Lantern Leatherhead replied, "Yes, except that his fare called him away."

Puppet Leander said, "Row apace, row apace, row, row, row, row, row."

Puppet master Lantern Leatherhead said, "You are knavishly loaden [Devilishly loaded], sculler. Take heed where you go."

Puppet Cole said, "Knave in your face, Goodman rogue."

"Knave in your face" meant "I call you a knave directly to your face."

Puppet Leander said, "Row, row, row, row, row."

Bartholomew Cokes laughed and said, "He said, 'Knave in your face,' friend."

Puppet master Lantern Leatherhead replied, "Yes, sir, I heard him, but there's no talking to these watermen — they will have the last word."

Bartholomew Cokes said, "God's my life! I am not allied to the sculler yet; he shall be 'Dolphin My Boy.'"

Earlier, he had matched the puppets with fairings that he had purchased but lost. For example, he had matched a fiddlestick to Puppet Leander.

“Dolphin My Boy” was part of a ballad, so he may have decided to match Puppet Cole with one of the ballads he had bought, or perhaps with a toy dolphin.

Talking about Puppet Leander, he continued, “But my fiddlestick does fiddle in and out too much. Please speak to him about it; tell him I would have him tarry in my sight more.”

Puppet master Lantern Leatherhead replied, “Please be patient; you’ll get enough of him, sir.”

He then continued with the puppet-play:

“Now, gentles, I take it, here is none of you so stupid,

“But that you have heard of a little god of love called Cupid;

“Who out of kindness to Leander, hearing he but saw her,

“This present day and hour does turn himself to [into] a drawer [bartender].”

Puppet Jonas (the disguised Cupid) came on stage as the bartender.

“And because he would have their first meeting to be merry,

“He strikes Hero in love to him with a pint of sherry;

“Which he tells her from amorous Leander is sent her,

“Who after him into the room of Hero does venture.”

Puppet Leander went into Mistress Hero’s room.

Puppet Jonas said, “A pint of sack, score a pint of sack in the Coney.”

The rooms in inns were given names, not numbers.

Bartholomew Cokes said, “Sack! You said just now it would be sherry.”

He was unaware that “sack” was a generic name for white wine, and sherry is made from white grapes.

Puppet Jonas said to Bartholomew Cokes, “Why, so it is.”

Puppet Jonas then continued the puppet-play: “Sherry, sherry, sherry.”

Bartholomew Cokes said, “Sherry, sherry, sherry! By my truth, he makes me merry. I must have a name for Cupid, too.

“Let me see, you might help me, now, if you would, Numps, in a pinch, but you are still dreaming about the stocks. Don’t worry about your being in the stocks. I have forgotten about it. It is just a nine days’ wonder, man, so don’t let it trouble you.”

Humphrey Wasp replied, “With all my heart, I wish that the stocks were around your neck, sir, on the condition that I would hang by the heels in them until the wonder would wear off from you.”

“Well said, resolute Numps!” Bartholomew Cokes said.

He then said to the puppet master, “But listen, friend, where’s the friendship all this while between my drum Damon and my pipe Pythias?”

Lantern Leatherhead replied, “You shall see very soon, sir.”

Bartholomew Cokes said, “You think my hobbyhorse is forgotten, too; no, I’ll see them all in action and acting before I go, else I shall not know which to love best.”

Earlier, he had matched Puppet Dionysius with his hobbyhorse.

Growing irritated, Jordan Knockem said, “This gallant has interrupting vapors, troublesome vapors; Whit, puff with him.”

“Puff with him” meant “shut him up,” perhaps by fighting him and huffing and puffing, or by blowing smoke in his face, which could cause a fight.

Whit replied, “No, I pree dee, Captain, let him alone; he is a child, i’faith, la.”

[Whit replied, “No, I say, Captain, let him alone; he is a child, indeed, la.”]

Puppet master Lantern Leatherhead said:

“Now, gentles, [let us turn] to the friends, who in number are two,

“And lodged in that alehouse in which fair Hero does do.”

“Do” has three meanings applicable here: 1) work, 2) have sex, and 3) work as a prostitute.

“Damon, for some kindness done him the last week,

“Is come, fair Hero, in Fish Street, this morning to seek:

“Pythias does smell the knavery of the meeting,

“And now you shall see their true-friendly greeting.”

In other words, Damon and Hero have scheduled an assignation, but Pythias has found out about it.

Puppet Pythias said to Puppet Damon, “You whore-masterly slave, you!”

Bartholomew Cokes said, “‘Whore-masterly slave, you!’ Very friendly and familiar, that.”

Puppet Damon replied:

“I call you ‘whore-master’ to your face,

“You have lain [have had sex] with her yourself, I’ll prove it in this place.”

Bartholomew Cokes said, “Damon says that Pythias has lain with her himself, he’ll prove it in this place.”

Puppet master Lantern Leatherhead said, “Both of them are whore-masters, sir, that’s plainly the case.”

Puppet Pythias said to puppet master Lantern Leatherhead, “You lie like a rogue.”

Puppet master Lantern Leatherhead replied, “Do I lie like a rogue?”

Puppet Pythias said, “A pimp and a scab.”

A “scab” is a “scoundrel.”

Puppet master Lantern Leatherhead said, “A pimp and a scab?”

“I say, between you, you have both but one drab.”

A “drab” is a “whore.”

Puppet Damon said, “You lie again.”

Puppet master Lantern Leatherhead asked, “Do I lie again?”

Puppet Damon said, “Like a rogue again.”

Puppet master Lantern Leatherhead asked, “Like a rogue again?”

Puppet Pythias said, “And you are a pimp again.”

Bartholomew Cokes said, “‘And you are a pimp again,’ he says.”

Puppet Damon said, “And a scab again.”

Bartholomew Cokes said, “‘And a scab again,’ he says.”

Puppet master Lantern Leatherhead said:

“And I say again, you are both whore-masters, again.”

“And you have both but one drab again.”

Puppet Damon and Puppet Pythias said, “Do you say so? Do you? Do you?”

The puppets began to beat him.

Puppet master Lantern Leatherhead said, “What! Both at once?”

Puppet Pythias said, “Down with him, Damon.”

Puppet Damon said, “Pink his guts, Pythias.”

“Pink” means “stab.”

Puppet master Lantern Leatherhead said, “What! So malicious?”

“Will you murder me, masters both, in my own house?”

Bartholomew Cokes said, “Ho! Well acted, my drum! Well acted, my pipe! Well acted still!”

Humphrey Wasp said, “Well acted, with all my heart.”

Puppet master Lantern Leatherhead said to the puppets, “Hold, hold your hands!”

In other words: Stop beating me!

Bartholomew Cokes said, “Yes, both your hands, for my sake! For you have both done well.”

Puppet Damon said, “Gramercy, pure Pythias.”

“Gramercy” meant “Thank you.”

Puppet Pythias said, “Gramercy, dear Damon.”

Bartholomew Cokes said, “Gramercy to you both, my pipe and my drum.”

Puppet Pythias and Puppet Damon said, “Come, now we’ll go together to have breakfast with Hero.”

Puppet master Lantern Leatherhead said:

“It is well you can now go to breakfast to Hero.

“You have given me my breakfast, with a hone and honero.”

Hone and honero are Gaelic words meaning “alas!”

Bartholomew Cokes asked, “What is it, friend? Have they hurt you?”

Puppet master Lantern Leatherhead said, “Oh, no. Between you and me, sir, we do but make show.”

In other words: We’re acting.

He continued with the puppet-play:

“Thus, gentles, you perceive, without any denial,

“Between Damon and Pythias here, friendship’s true trial.

“Though hourly they quarrel thus, and roar each with [the] other.

“They fight no more than does brother with brother;

“But friendly together, at the next man they meet,

“They let fly their anger, as here you might see it.”

Bartholomew Cokes said, “Well, we have seen it, and you have felt it, whatsoever you say. What’s next? What’s next?”

Puppet master Lantern Leatherhead said:

“This [happened] while young Leander with fair Hero is drinking,

“And Hero grown drunk to any man’s thinking!

“Yet was it not three pints of sherry could flaw her,”

“Flaw her” meant “make her drunk.”

“Till Cupid distinguished [disguised] like Jonas the drawer [bartender],

“From under his apron, where his lechery lurks,

“Put love in her sack. Now mark how it works.”

One meaning of the word “sack” is “vagina.”

Puppet Hero said:

“Oh, Leander, Leander, my dear, my dear Leander,

“I’ll forever be your goose, so [as long as] you’ll be my gander.”

A “goose” can be 1) a simpleton, and/or 2) a prostitute.

Bartholomew Cokes said, “Excellently well said, fiddle, she’ll ever be his goose, so he’ll be her gander; wasn’t that what was said?”

He had paired Puppet Hero with his fiddle; Puppet Leander was paired with the fiddlestick.

Puppet master Lantern Leatherhead said, “Yes, sir, but pay attention to his answer now.”

Puppet Leander said:

“And sweetest of geese, before I go to bed,

“I’ll swim over the Thames, my goose, you to tread.”

“Tread” meant “have sex”; the word was used of birds.

Bartholomew Coke said, “Splendid! He will swim over the Thames, and tread his goose tonight, he says.”

Puppet master Lantern Leatherhead said, “Yes, peace, sir. Be quiet, sir. They’ll be angry if they hear you eavesdropping now while they are setting up their assignation.”

Puppet Leander said:

“But lest the Thames should be dark, my goose, my dear friend,

“Let your window be provided with a candle’s end.”

The candle would be his guide as he swam across the Thames.

Puppet Hero said:

“Fear not, my gander, I protest I should handle

“My matters very ill, if I had not a whole candle.”

“Matters” was a word that could refer to sexual matters; Hero’s words could be interpreted as saying that for at least some of her sexual matters, she used a whole candle as a dildo.

Puppet Leander said, “Well, then, look to it, and kiss me to boot.”

Puppet master Lantern Leatherhead said:

“Now here come the friends again, Pythias and Damon,

“And under their cloaks they have of bacon a gammon.”

A “gammon” is “part of a side of bacon.”

Puppet Pythias and Puppet Damon entered the puppet alehouse.

Puppet Pythias said, “Drawer, fill some wine here.”

Puppet master Lantern Leatherhead ordered:

“Hey, bring some wine there!

“There’s company already, sir, pray forbear.”

“Pray forbear” meant “please be patient.”

Puppet Damon said about the company already present, “It is Hero.”

Puppet master Lantern Leatherhead said:

“Yes, but she will not be taken,

“After sack and fresh herring, with your Dunmow bacon.”

Dunmow bacon was a side of bacon that was presented to a married couple in Dunmow, Essex, if after being married for a year they could convince a jury of six bachelors and six maidens that they had not argued during the year or regretted being married.

Since Pythias and Damon possessed what puppet master Lantern Leatherhead called their “Dunmow bacon,” he was implying that they were a homosexual couple.

He was also saying that Hero was already satisfied with what Leander had given her.

Puppet Pythias said about the bacon, “You lie, it’s Westfabian.”

The Fabian priests of Pan were permitted much licentious license at the Roman festival Lupercalia. Flaunting Fabians were swaggerers and roisterers.

Puppet master Lantern Leatherhead said, “Westphalian, you should say.”

Westphalian ham had a reputation for being very good ham.

Puppet Damon said, “If you hold not your peace, you are a coxcomb, I would say.”

Puppet Leander and Puppet Hero kissed.

Puppet Damon said, "What's going on here? What's going on here? Kiss, kiss, upon kiss!"

Puppet master Lantern Leatherhead said:

"Yes, why shouldn't they? What harm is in this?"

"It is mistress Hero."

Puppet Damon said, "Mistress Hero's a whore."

Puppet master Lantern Leatherhead said:

"Is she a whore?"

"Keep you quiet, or, sir knave out of door."

Puppet Damon asked, "Knave out of door?"

Puppet Hero said, "Yes, knave out of door."

Puppet Damon said, "Whore out of door."

Puppet Hero, Puppet Damon, and Puppet Pythias started fighting.

Puppet Hero said, "I say, knave out of door."

Puppet Damon said, "I say, whore out of door."

Puppet Pythias said, "Yes, so say I, too."

Puppet Hero said, "Kiss the whore on the arse [ass]."

Puppet master Lantern Leatherhead said:

"Now you have something to do:"

"You must kiss her on the arse, she says."

Puppet Damon and Puppet Pythias said, "So we will, so we will."

They kicked her.

Puppet Hero said, “Oh, my haunches! Oh, my haunches! Stop! Stop!”

Puppet master Lantern Leatherhead said to Puppet Leander:

“Do you stand still?”

“Leander, where are you? Stand you still like a sot,

“And not offering to break both their heads with a pot?”

“See who’s at your elbow there! Puppet Jonas and Cupid.”

Cupid, god of love, was disguised as Jonas, bartender.

Puppet Jonas said, “Attack them, Leander, be not so stupid.”

Puppet Leander said, “You goat-bearded slave!”

Puppet Damon said, “You whoremaster knave!”

The puppets fought.

Puppet Leander said, “You are a whoremaster.”

Puppet Jonas said, “Whoremasters all.”

Puppet master Lantern Leatherhead said, “See, Cupid, aka Jonas, with a word has taken up the brawl.”

The word was “whoremasters.” A whoremaster can be a whoremonger, aka one who has sex with whores. A whoremaster can also be a procurer, aka a pimp.

Jordan Knockem said, “These be fine vapors!”

Bartholomew Cokes said, “By this good day, they fight splendidly and bravely; don’t they, Numps?”

Humphrey Wasp said, “Yes, they lacked only you to be their second all this while.”

A “second” is a supporter in a duel.

Puppet master Lantern Leatherhead said:

“This tragical encounter falling out thus to busy us,

“It raises up the ghost of their friend Dionysius;

“Not like a monarch, but the master of a school,

“In a scrivener’s furred gown, which shows he is no fool:”

A scrivener is a clerk. Dionysius II, not Dionysius I, of Syracuse was supposed to have become a schoolteacher after falling from power.

Puppet master Lantern Leatherhead continued:

“For therein he has wit enough to keep himself warm.

“‘Oh, Damon,’ he cries, ‘and Pythias, what harm

“‘Has poor Dionysius done you in his grave,

“‘That after his death you should fall out thus and rave,

“‘And call amorous Leander [a] whoremaster knave?’”

Puppet Damon said, “I cannot, I will not, I promise you, endure it.”

— 5.5 —

Rabbi Zeal-of-the-land Busy rushed in and shouted, “Down with Dagon! Down with Dagon! It is I, and I will no longer endure your profanations.”

Dagon was the god of the Philistines. One of the accusations that Puritans made against many plays was that they kept alive the memory of pagan gods such as Cupid.

By saying, “Down with Dagon! It is I,” Zeal-of-the-land Busy was grammatically identifying himself with Dagon.

Puppet master Lantern Leatherhead asked, “What do you mean by this, sir?”

Zeal-of-the-land Busy said, “I will remove Dagon there, I say, that idol, that heathenish idol, that remains, as I may say, a beam, a very beam — not a beam of the sun, nor a beam of the moon, nor a beam of a balance, neither a house-beam, nor a weaver’s beam — but a beam in the eye, in the eye of the brethren.”

The puppet-play was a beam in the eye of the Puritans, according to Zeal-of-the-land Busy. In other words, it was a blind spot.

Matthew 7:3-5 (King James Version) states:

3 And why beholdest thou the mote that is in thy brother’s eye, but considerest not the beam that is in thine own eye?

4 Or how wilt thou say to thy brother, Let me pull out the mote out of thine eye; and, behold, a beam is in thine own eye?

5 Thou hypocrite, first cast out the beam out of thine own eye; and then shalt thou see clearly to cast out the mote out of thy brother’s eye.

The Biblical passage stressed being aware of one’s own faults, but Zeal-of-the-land Busy was much more concerned with being aware of other people’s faults.

Zeal-of-the-land Busy continued, “It is a very great beam, an exceeding great beam, such as are your stage-players, rhymers, and Morris-dancers, who have walked hand in hand, in contempt of the brethren, and the cause; and been supported by instruments of no mean countenance.”

“Instruments of no mean countenance” meant “agents in high positions — agents of the Devil.” It also meant that these entertainments had received official encouragement.

Puppet master Lantern Leatherhead said, “Sir, I present nothing but what is licensed by authority.”

Zeal-of-the-land Busy replied, “You are all license, even licentiousness itself, Shimei!”

Shimei had cursed King David in 2 Samuel 16, but Zeal-of-the-land Busy, not puppet master Lantern Leatherhead, was doing the cursing here.

Puppet master Lantern Leatherhead said, “I have the Master of the Revels’ signature on the license for the puppet-play, sir.”

Zeal-of-the-land Busy said, “You have the signature of the Master of the Rebels Against God. You have Satan’s signature! Hold your peace because of your scurrility, shut up your mouth, your profession is damnable, and in pleading for it you plead for the idol Baal. I have long opened my mouth wide, and gaped; I have gaped as the oyster for the tide, after your destruction, but cannot compass it by suit or dispute; so that I look for a bickering, before long, and then a battle.”

Zeal-of-the-land Busy was using phrasing from two Puritan prayers:

1) “We look for a bickering, ere long, and then a battle, which we cannot endure.”

2) “Our souls are constantly gaping after thee, O Lord, yea verily, our souls do gape, even as an oyster.”

Jordan Knockem said, “Good Banbury vapors!”

Bartholomew Cokes said to puppet master Lantern Leatherhead, “Friend, you’d have an ill match of it, if you bicker with him here; although Zeal-of-the-land Busy is no man of the fist, he has friends who will fight for him.”

Bartholomew Cokes then said, “Numps, won’t you take our side?”

Ezekiel Edgworth said to Bartholomew Cokes, “Sir, there is no need for a fight; in my opinion the Puritan offers the puppet master a fairer course of action: to end it by formal disputation and argument.”

He then asked puppet master Lantern Leatherhead, “Do you have nothing to say for yourself in defense of your occupation?”

Puppet master Lantern Leatherhead said, “Indeed, sir, I am not well-studied in these controversies between the hypocrites — the Puritans — and us. But here’s one of the puppets in my puppet-play — Puppet Dionysius — who shall undertake to debate the Puritan, and I’ll wager the case on the puppet’s defense.”

The Puritans, as should be already clear, were opposed to theatrical entertainments of all kinds.

The name Dionysius is close to the name Dionysus, which is the name of the ancient Greek god of theater and wine.

Bartholomew Cokes said, “Who? My hobbyhorse! Will he dispute with him?”

Puppet Dionysius had been matched with Bartholomew Cokes’ hobbyhorse. The puppet would engage in a battle of wits with Zeal-of-the-land Busy.

“Yes, sir,” puppet master Lantern Leatherhead said, “and make a hobby-ass of him, I hope.”

“That’s excellent!” Bartholomew Cokes said. “Indeed he looks like the best scholar of them all.”

He then said to Zeal-of-the-land Busy, “Come, sir, you must be as good as your word now.”

Zeal-of-the-land Busy replied, "I will not fear to make my spirit and gifts known."

He prayed, "Assist me, zeal! Fill me, fill me, that is, make me full!"

"What a desperate, profane wretch is this!" Mr. Winwife said. "Is there any ignorance or impudence like his, to call on his religious zeal to fill him against a puppet?"

Miss Grace Wellborn said, "I know no fitter match than a puppet to join battle with a hypocrite!"

Zeal-of-the-land Busy said to Puppet Dionysius, "First, I say to you, idol, you have no calling."

He was using the word "calling" to mean "vocation." Puritans believed that people ought to engage in work and use the gifts that God had given to them. But the puppet replied as if the word "calling" referred to the name that one was called.

Puppet Dionysius replied, "You lie! I am called Dionysius."

Puppet master Lantern Leatherhead said to Zeal-of-the-land Busy, "The puppet says that you lie, he is called Dionysius in the puppet-play, and to that calling he answers."

Zeal-of-the-land Busy said to Puppet Dionysius, "By 'calling,' I mean you have no vocation, idol. You have no present lawful calling."

In fact, actors could be arrested as vagrants unless they were associated with a company that had a noble or royal person as a patron. This is why acting companies were named after their sponsors: The King's Men, Lady Elizabeth's Men, etc.

Puppet Dionysius asked, "Is yours a lawful calling?"

Puppet master Lantern Leatherhead said to Zeal-of-the-land Busy, "The puppet asks if yours is a lawful calling."

Zeal-of-the-land Busy said, “Yes, my calling is of the spirit.”

Puppet Dionysius said, “Then the name ‘idol’ is a lawful calling.”

Puppet master Lantern Leatherhead said to Zeal-of-the-land Busy, “He says that then the name ‘idol’ is a lawful calling; for you called him ‘idol,’ and your calling is of the spirit.”

Bartholomew Cokes said, “Well disputed, hobbyhorse.”

Zeal-of-the-land Busy said to Bartholomew Cokes, “Don’t take sides with the wicked, young gallant: He neighs and hinnies like a horse — all is but hinnying sophistry. I call him ‘idol’ again; always, I say, his calling, his profession is profane.”

He then said to the puppet, “It is profane, idol.”

Puppet Dionysius said, “It is not profane.”

Puppet master Lantern Leatherhead said to Zeal-of-the-land Busy, “‘It is not profane,’ he says.”

Zeal-of-the-land Busy said, “It is profane.”

Puppet Dionysius said, “It is not profane.”

Zeal-of-the-land Busy said, “It is profane.”

Puppet Dionysius said, “It is not profane.”

All too many arguments are like this.

Puppet master Lantern Leatherhead complimented Puppet Dionysius, “Well said. Confute him with ‘not,’ continually.”

He then said to Zeal-of-the-land Busy, “You cannot bear and wear him down with your base noise, sir.”

Zeal-of-the-land Busy said, “Nor he me, with his treble creaking, even if he creaks like the chariot wheels of Satan. I am zealous for the cause —”

Puppet master Lantern Leatherhead interrupted: “As zealous as a dog is for a bone.”

Zeal-of-the-land Busy continued, “And I say, it is profane, as being the page of Pride, and the waiting-woman of Vanity.”

Puppet Dionysius said, “Indeed! What do you say about your attire- and dressmakers, then?”

Puppet master Lantern Leatherhead said, “Good point.”

The Puritans despised vain, flashy attire and dresses, yet Puritans made money by providing such things.

Puppet Dionysius continued, “What do you say about feather-makers in the Blackfriars district, who are of your faction of faith? Are not they with their perukes, and their puffs, their fans, and their huffs, as much pages of Pride and waiters upon Vanity? What do you say? What do you say? What do you say?”

Feathers were used in hats. Peruges were wigs. Puffs were ornamental items such as bunches of feathers or ribbons. Fans were often made with feathers. Huffs were shoulder pads.

Zeal-of-the-land Busy said, “I will not answer for them.”

Puppet Dionysius said, “Because you cannot! Because you cannot! Is a bugle-maker a lawful calling?”

Bugle-makers made beads.

Puppet Dionysius continued, “Or the sweet-makers? They make such candy as you have there.”

Zeal-of-the-land Busy, who had been a baker, was carrying some sweets.

Puppet Dionysius continued, “Or your tailors and dressmakers who make French fashions? You would have all the sin within yourselves, wouldn’t you, wouldn’t you?”

Zeal-of-the-land Busy replied, “No, Dagon.”

Puppet Dionysius said, “What then, Dagonet?”

King Arthur’s Fool was named Dagonet.

Puppet Dionysius continued, “Is the occupation of a puppet worse than these occupations?”

Zeal-of-the-land Busy answered, “Yes, and my main argument against you is that you are an abomination; for the male among you puts on the apparel of the female, and the female of the male.”

Deuteronomy 22:5 states, “The woman shall not wear that which pertaineth unto a man, neither shall a man put on a woman’s garment: for all that do so are abomination unto the Lord thy God” (King James Version).

In the theater of the time, no actresses appeared on stage. Men or boys played all the female roles. In some of the plays, a female character would disguise “herself” as a man.

Puppet Dionysius said, “You lie, you lie, you lie abominably.”

Bartholomew Cokes said, “Good, indeed! He has given him the lie thrice.”

Being told that you lied was a fighting offense.

Puppet Dionysius said, “It is your old stale argument against the actors, but it will not hold against the puppets; for we have neither male nor female amongst us.”

Zeal-of-the-land Busy had referred to a passage in the Old Testament, but Puppet Dionysius had just now referred to a passage in the New Testament.

Galatians 3:28 states, “There is neither Jew nor Greek, there is neither bond nor free, there is neither male nor female: for ye are all one in Christ Jesus” (King James Version).

Puppet Dionysius continued, “And so that you may see, if you will, like a malicious purblind zeal as you are, I lift up my garment.”

“Purblind” can mean either completely blind or partially blind.

Lifting up his garment, Puppet Dionysius revealed that he had no sex organs.

Ezekiel Edgworth said, “By my faith, there he has answered you, friend, with a plain demonstration.”

Puppet Dionysius said, “Indeed, I’ll prove, against ever a Rabbi of them all, that my standing is as lawful as his; that I speak by inspiration, as well as he does; that I have as little to do with learning as he; and that I do scorn her helps as much as he.”

Puppet Dionysius had plainly stated that Puritans cared little for scholarship.

Zeal-of-the-land Busy said, “I am confuted. I have been proven wrong. The cause has failed me.”

He had been proven wrong when it came to puppet-plays, and with the use of Galatians 3:28, he had been proven wrong when it came to Christian actors.

Puppet Dionysius said, “Then be converted! Be converted.”

“Be converted, please,” puppet master Lantern Leatherhead said, “and let the play go on!”

“Let it go on,” Zeal-of-the-land Busy said, “for I am changed, and I will become a beholder with you.”

Bartholomew Cokes said, “That’s splendid, indeed! You brought it off, hobbyhorse. You have won the debate. On with the play.”

The disguised Justice Overdo cast aside enough of his disguise to be recognized and said, “Stop! I now forbid the play to go on! I am Adam Overdo! Sit still, I order you.”

Bartholomew Cokes said, “My brother-in-law!”

Miss Grace Wellborn said, “My wise guardian!”

Ezekiel Edgworth said, “Justice Overdo!”

Justice Overdo said, “It is time to take enormity by the forehead, and brand it; for I have discovered enough.”

He had modified the proverb “take opportunity by the forelock.”

— 5.6 —

Quarlous, still disguised as Troubleall, arrived, along with Dame Purecraft.

Quarlous said, “Come, mistress bride; you must do as I do, now. You must be mad with me, truly. I have here Justice Overdo for it.”

He wanted Justice Overdo to marry them.

Justice Overdo said, “Peace, good Troubleall. Be quiet! Come hither, and you shall trouble none. I will take charge of you, and of your friend, too.”

He then said to Ezekiel Edgworth, “You also, young man, shall be my concern; stand there.”

Ezekiel Edgworth said to himself, “May God now have mercy upon me.”

Jordan Knockem said quietly, “I wish we were away, Whit, because these are dangerous vapors. We had best fall off with our birds, for fear of the cage.”

He wanted to escape, leaving behind their newly recruited prostitutes, out of fear of being put in the cage that served as a temporary jail at the fair. Mrs. Overdo was still in a drunken stupor and unable to leave. Possibly, Mrs. Win Littlewit attempted to leave with them, or she may have decided to stay with Mrs. Overdo.

Jordan Knockem and Whit attempted to steal away, but Justice Overdo saw them.

Justice Overdo ordered, “Stop! Isn’t my name your terror?”

Whit said, “Yesh fait, man, and it ish for tat we would be gone, man.”

[Whit said, “Yes, by my faith, man, and it is for that we want to be gone, man.”]

Mr. John Littlewit arrived and said, “Oh, gentlemen! Have you seen my wife? I have lost my little wife, as I shall be trusted; I have lost my little pretty Win. I left her at the obese woman’s house in trust yonder, the pig-woman’s, with Captain Jordan and Captain Whit, who are very good men, and I cannot learn what has happened to her. Poor fool, I fear she’s stepped aside.”

“Stepped aside” meant lost her way. The phrase could mean literally or morally or both.

He asked Dame Purecraft, “Mother-in-law, have you seen Win?”

Justice Overdo said, "If this grave matron is your mother-in-law, sir, stand by her, et digito compesce labellum."

The Latin quotation was from Juvenal (Satires 1:160) and meant "and control your lip with a finger." In other words, put a finger to your lips and be quiet.

Justice Overdo continued, "I may perhaps spring a wife for you soon."

"Spring" was a hunting term. It was used to describe causing a bird to rise from cover. Had Justice Overdo recognized Mrs. Win Littlewit despite her being masked? Mrs. Overdo knew Mr. John Littlewit, so it is possible that Justice Overdo knew one or both Littlewits.

Justice Overdo then said, "Brother-in-law Bartholomew Cokes, I am sadly sorry to see you so lightly given and such a disciple of enormity, along with your grave governor Humphrey Wasp. But stand you both there, in the middle place; I will reprehend and scold you in your course of action in turning toward enormity and sin."

Bartholomew Cokes and Humphrey Wasp were in the middle of the group. On one side were Quarlous and Dame Purecraft. On the other were Mr. Winwife and Miss Grace Wellborn.

Justice Overdo then said, "Miss Grace Wellborn, let me rescue you out of the hands of the stranger."

He thought that Mr. Winwife was a stranger to Miss Grace Wellborn.

"Pardon me, sir," Mr. Winwife said. "I am a kinsman of hers."

He meant that he would soon be married to her.

Justice Overdo said, "Are you! What is your name, sir?"

“Mr. Winwife, sir.”

Justice Overdo said, “Mr. Winwife! I hope you have won no wife of her, sir; if you have, I will examine the possibility of it at a suitable time.”

As her guardian, Justice Overdo had much say over whom she would marry.

Justice Overdo continued, “Now, let’s turn to my enormities, aka crimes and sins.”

He meant enormities he had witnessed and uncovered, although it sounded as if he meant that he was referring to enormities he himself had committed.

He continued, “Look upon me, London! And see me, Smithfield! I am the example of justice and the Mirror of Magistrates; I am the true top of legal form and the scourge of enormity.”

Justice Overdo regarded himself as a splendid example of a minister of justice.

He continued, “Hearken unto my labors, and but observe my discoveries; and compare Hercules of old with me, if you dare; or Columbus, Magellan, or our countryman Drake, of later times.”

Now he wanted to be compared to the PanHellenic hero Hercules, who accomplished twelve seemingly impossible labors, including sailing to the islands of Hesperia and Erytheia in the West. He also wanted to be compared to Christopher Columbus, who sailed all the way across the Atlantic Ocean and discovered the new world. He also wanted to be compared to the Portuguese explorer Ferdinand Magellan, who led the expedition that first circumnavigated the world; Magellan himself died in the Philippines before completing the expedition. He also wanted to be compared to the English explorer Sir Francis Drake, who led the first English expedition that circumnavigated the world. Sir Francis lived for another 16 years after completing the expedition.

Justice Overdo continued, “Stand forth, you weeds of enormity, and spread out.

“First, Rabbi Busy, you superlunatical hypocrite.”

He then said to Lantern Leatherhead, “Next you other extremity, you profane professor of puppetry, little better than poetry.”

Justice Overdo knew little about poetry. The puppet-show was nowhere close to being as good as the Iliad, Odyssey, Aeneid, and Divine Comedy.

He then said to Whit, “Then you strong debaucher and seducer of youth; witness this compliant and honest young man.”

He pointed to Ezekiel Edgworth.

He then said to Jordan Knockem, “Now, you esquire of dames, madams, and twelve-penny ladies.”

Twelve-penny ladies are prostitutes who can be slept with for twelve pennies.

He said to the masked Mrs. Win Littlewit, “Now, my green madam herself of that price; let me unmask your ladyship.”

He removed Mrs. Win Littlewit’s mask.

Recognizing his wife, Mr. John Littlewit said, “Oh, my wife, my wife, my wife!”

“Is she your wife?” Justice Overdo asked. “Redde te Harpocratem!”

The Latin means “Make yourself like Harpocrates!” Harpocrates was the ancient god of silence, so Justice Overdo was telling Mr. John Littlewit, “Be quiet!”

Carrying a dripping-pan, Troubleall arrived. He was wearing few clothes and was covering his near-nakedness with the dripping-pan. Ursula and Nightingale followed him.

Seeing Justice Overdo, Troubleall said, “By your leave, stand by, my masters, be uncovered. Take off your hats to show respect to Justice Overdo.”

Ursula said, “Oh, stop him, stop him! Help me to cry out, Nightingale! My pan! My pan!”

Justice Overdo asked, “What’s the matter?”

Nightingale said about Troubleall, “He has stolen old Ursula’s pan.”

“Yes,” Troubleall said, “and I fear no man but Justice Overdo.”

“Ursula!” Justice Overdo said. “Where is she? Oh, the sow of enormity, this! Welcome.” Pointing to a place, he said, “Stand there.”

Pointing at Nightingale and then to a place, he said, “You, songster, stand there.”

Ursula said to Justice Overdo, “If it please your worship, I am in no fault; a gentleman stripped him in my booth, and borrowed his gown and his hat; and he — Troubleall — ran away with my goods here because of it.”

Justice Overdo said to Quarlous, who was still disguised as Troubleall, “Then this man is the true madman, and you are the enormity!”

“You are in the right,” Quarlous said, taking off his false beard. “I am mad only from the gown outward.”

Justice Overdo said, "Stand there."

"Wherever you please, sir," Quarlous said.

Waking up, sick and hungover, Mrs. Overdo said, "Oh, lend me a basin, I am sick, I am sick! Where's Mr. Overdo? Bridget, call hither my Adam."

She thought she was at home. Bridget was one of her servants.

Justice Overdo said, "What!"

He knew that his wife was dressed like a prostitute, and he was ashamed and fell silent.

Whit said, "Dy very own wife, i' fait, worshipful Adam."

[Whit said, "Your very own wife, indeed, worshipful Adam."]

"Won't my Adam come to me?" Mrs. Overdo asked. "Will I see him no more then?"

"Why don't you go on with the enormity?" Quarlous said to Justice Overdo. "Sir, are you oppressed with it? I'll help you.

"Listen, sir, I'll whisper it in your ear. Your innocent young man whom you have been so concerned about all this day is a cutpurse, and he has gotten all your brother-in-law Bartholomew Cokes' things and helped you to your beating and the stocks. If you have a mind to hang him now, and show him your magistrate's wit, you may, but I should think it would be better to recover the goods that Bartholomew Cokes lost, and to save your reputation by pardoning him."

Justice Overdo could lose much reputation through his wife's wearing the clothing of a prostitute and through his being beaten and put in the stocks. One way to save his reputation would be by showing mercy.

Quarlous showed Justice Overdo the blank warrant that he had given to him when he thought that the disguised Quarlous was Troubleall. Quarlous had filled it out to make himself the guardian of Miss Grace Wellborn, who was obliged to forfeit some of her wealth to her guardian if she were to marry someone against her guardian's consent.

Quarlous said out loud, "I thank you, sir, for the gift of your ward, Miss Grace Wellborn; look, here is your hand and seal, by the way.

"Mr. Winwife, may God give you joy. You are Palamon, you signed that name in the book, you have won Miss Grace as your wife, and you are possessed of the gentlewoman, but she must pay me wealth for marrying against my consent — here's the warrant for it."

Actually, Quarlous had given Miss Grace Wellborn permission to marry whoever had written the name that Troubleall had chosen, but it is also true that Miss Grace Wellborn had promised to find a way to give some compensation to the man whose name was not chosen; however, she had made Quarlous and Mr. Winwife agree to be friends and help each other and Quarlous was definitely not doing that.

Quarlous then handed over Troubleall's gown and cap to their rightful owner and said to him, "And, honest madman, there's your gown and cap again; I thank you for my wife."

He said to his future wife, Dame Purecraft, "I can still be mad, sweetheart, when I please. Don't be afraid I can't."

He next said, "Careful Numps, where's he? I thank him for my license."

"What!" Humphrey Wasp said.

"It is true, Numps," Quarlous said.

“I’ll be hanged then,” Humphrey Wasp said.

“Look in your box, Numps,” Quarlous said.

Humphrey Wasp looked in the box and discovered that the marriage license was missing.

Quarlous then said to Justice Overdo, “Don’t stand fixed here, like a stake in Finsbury, to be shot at, or like you are tied to the whipping post in the fair, but get your wife out of the air, or it will make her worse; and remember you are but Adam, flesh and blood.”

Archers shot at targets in Finsbury fields, which were north of London, and yes, there was a whipping post at Bartholomew Fair.

In this society, fresh air was thought to be bad for ill people.

Quarlous continued, “You have your frailty, forget your other name of Overdo, and invite us all to supper. There you and I will compare our discoveries; and we will drown the memory of all enormity in your biggest bowl of wine at home.”

Everything may seem to have worked out well for Quarlous, but he was a widow-hater who would soon be married to a widow.

(See 1.3 for Quarlous’ opinion of widows, including the widow he would soon marry.)

Bartholomew Cokes said, “How now, Numps? Have you lost the marriage license? I bet that you lost it when you were in the stocks. Why don’t you speak?”

Humphrey Wasp said, “I will never speak while I live again, for anything I know.”

Justice Overdo said, “No, Humphrey, if I am calm and patient, you must be so, too.”

Referring to Quarlous, he said, “This pleasant conceited gentleman has wrought upon my judgment, and prevailed.”

“Pleasant conceited” can mean “pleasant and witty” or “ridiculous and self-important.”

Justice Overdo said to Mrs. Win Littlewit, “Please take care of your sick friend: Mrs. Alice Overdo, my wife.”

He then began, “My good friends all —”

Quarlous interrupted, “And no enormities.”

Justice Overdo continued, “I invite you to go home with me to my house to supper. I will have no one fear to go along with me, for my intentions are ad correctionem, non ad destructionem; ad aedificandum, non ad diruendum, and so lead on.”

“Ad correctionem, non ad destructionem; ad aedificandum, non ad diruendum” is Latin for “for correction, not destruction; for building up, not tearing down.”

Bartholomew Cokes said, “Yes, and bring the actor-puppets along. We’ll have the rest of the puppet-play at home.”

EPILOGUE (Bartholomew Fair)

Your Majesty has seen the play, and you
Can best allow [license] it from your ear and view.
You know the scope of writers, and what store
Of leave [permission] is given them, if they take not more,
And turn it into license: you can tell
If we have used that leave [permission] you gave us well;
Or whether we to rage or license break [break into madness or improper behavior],
Or be profane, or make profane men speak:
This is your power to judge, great sir, and not The envy [malice] of a few. Which [royal approval] if we have got,
We value less what their dislike [the dislike of the malicious] can bring,
If it [this play] so happy be, to have pleased the King.

NOTE: This epilogue was written for the court performance with King James I in attendance on 1 November 1615.

NOTES (Bartholomew Fair)

Induction: Tarlton

One of Tarlton's jests was a story about his clothes being stolen, something that happens to Bartholomew Cokes in Bartholomew Fair:

How fiddlers fiddled away Tarlton's apparel.

It chanced that one Fancy and Nancy, two musicians in London, used often with their boys to visit Tarlton when he dwelt in Gracious Street, at the sign of the Saba, a tavern, he being one of their best friends or benefactors, by reason of old acquaintance, to requite which they came one summer's morning to play for him "The Hunt's Up" [the name of the tune played to wake the hunters and collect them together. It was also used for any morning song] with such music [musical instruments] as they had.

Tarlton, to requite them, would open his chamber door, and for their pains would give them muscadine wine, which a cony-catcher [a sharper, a cheat] noting, and seeing Tarlton come forth in his shirt and nightgown to drink with these musicians, the while this nimble fellow stepped in and took Tarlton's apparel, which everyday he wore, [the thief] thinking that if he were espied to turn it to jest, but it passed for current [he got away with it] and he goes his ways.

Not long after, Tarlton returned to his chamber, and looked for his clothes, but they were safe enough from him. The next day this was noised [gossiped] abroad, and one in mockage threw him in this theme, he playing then at the Curtain.

Tarlton, I will tell thee a jest

Which after turned to earnest.

One there was, as I heard say.

Who in his shirt heard music play.

While all his clothes were stolen away.

Tarlton, smiling at this, answered on the sudden [ad-libbed] thus:

That's certain, sir, it is no lie.

That same one in truth was I.

When that the thief shall pine and lack,

Then shall I have clothes to my back:

And I, together with my fellows,

May see them ride to Tiborne gallows.

[May see the clothes, worn by Tarlton, ride to Tiborne gallows, where Tarlton and his friends will see the thief hang.]

I have modernized the language, punctuation, and paragraphing, as I have for the complete Tarlton's Jests.

Cranion (1.5)

An online article about “daddy-long-legs” includes this information:

The crane-fly is a slender two-winged fly with very long legs. The word is applied to any member of the family Tipulidae, which has many genera and species, in particular the large and common Tipula maxima.

In Great Britain, the crane-fly is popularly called daddy-long-legs. Similar names have been used. In 1753, A Supplement to Mr. Chambers's Cyclopaedia: or, Universal Dictionary of Arts and Sciences thus defined crane-fly:

a name given by some to the creature we commonly call father long-legs, and the authors of histories of insects, tipula terrestris.

In Transactions of the Philological Society (1859), Ernest Adams gave the following list of synonyms in an article titled On the names of Spiders:

Fly Cranion, Long-leggs, Tom-taylor, Long-legged-tailor, Jenny-spinner, Father-long-legs, Daddy-long-legs, Gramfer-long-legs, Harry-long-legs, Jacky-long-legs, and in Somersetshire Friars-flies. All these, except the last, explain themselves; but I can make nothing of the Friars.

The crane-fly is mentioned in this article about spiders because the author observes that "the long-legged 'Shepherd' [a spider] is frequently confounded in popular phraseology with the Crane-fly".

In fact, the term daddy-long-legs has also been used as a name for arachnids or spiders of similar appearance. An article published in The Mirror of Literature, Amusement, and Instruction of 15th February 1834 contains the following:

An immense spider is, I understand, found in the county of Bucks, the body as large as a pigeon's egg, and covered, as well as the very long legs, with hair; it is said to live amongst the rank grass of the fields, and to be exceedingly venomous; but, though I have, during my residence in this county, seen several spiders of extraordinary size, and distinct from the Father Long-legs, or Harvest-man, of the harvest- time, I cannot vouch for the existence of the sort I name upon ocular demonstration.

Dogs and Plague (2.1)

People thought that dogs and cats carried plague, and therefore they killed many dogs and cats during the Great Plague of 1665 in England:

People thought that animals might spread the disease so strays were killed by special dog killers — around 40,000 dogs and 200,000 cats were slaughtered.

Here is a quote from The Great Plague: The Story of London’s Most Deadly Year, which is about the great plague of 1665:

Rather than killing rats and mice, the Guildhall focused on killing their enemies — cats and dogs. Neighborhood beadles and constables had gone through the streets at the end of June telling householders to kill “all their dogs of what ort or kind soever before Thursday next at ye furthest.”

The Heathen Man (3.2)

The heathen man is Odysseus. This is how he describes hearing the song of the Sirens in Homer's Odyssey:

“Circe told me, ‘First you will come to the island of the Sirens, who enchant men with their lovely song. Sailors who hear their song crash their ships on the Sirens’ island, whose shores are strewn with the bones of men. Sail quickly past the Sirens! Your men must not hear their song. Soften beeswax and plug their ears with it. But if you must hear their song, have your men tie you to the mast so that you don’t jump overboard and swim to their island and die. Tell your men that when you order them to untie you, they must tie you tighter.’ [...]

“When Circe finished speaking to me, dawn arrived, and I went directly to my ship and we set sail. Circe sent us a favorable wind to help us on our way. I told my crewmembers, ‘I will tell you everything — everything that Circe told me. Dangers await us. We will come to the island of the Sirens. Circe said that only I would hear their song. You must tie me to the mast so that I cannot jump overboard, swim to their island, and die.’ I did not tell them everything, as I had promised. I did not tell them about Scylla — I feared a mutiny.

“As we approached the island of the Sirens, I melted beeswax and stopped the ears of the crewmembers with it so that they could not hear the song of the Sirens. They tied me tightly to the mast. I heard the song of the Sirens: ‘Come to us, Odysseus. Your fame has reached the sky. Hear our song and become wise. We know what happened at Troy, and we know what will happen on the Earth.’

“I wanted my crewmembers to untie me. They tied me tighter to the mast. They rowed quickly to escape from danger. Once we were past the island of the Sirens, they removed the beeswax from their ears and untied me.

This is a reference to the story in Lucian’s Nigrinus 19:

For, to give evil its due, believe me, there is no better school for virtue, no truer test of moral strength, than life in this same city of Rome. It is no easy thing, to withstand so many temptations, so many allurements and distractions of sight and sound. There is no help for it: like Odysseus, we must sail past them all; and there must be no binding of hands, no stopping of our ears with wax; that would be but sorry courage: our ears must hear, our hands must be free, — and our contempt must be genuine.

(3.5)

This information comes from wordhippo.com:

What’s the plural form of charme? Here’s the word you’re looking for.

The noun charme can be countable or uncountable.

In more general, commonly used, contexts, the plural form will also be charme.

However, in more specific contexts, the plural form can also be charmes e.g. in reference to various types of charmes or a collection of charmes.

Source: <http://tinyurl.com/y9ntksce>

In my retelling, I interpret Bartholomew Cokes' sentence in one way. The sentence can also be interpreted in these ways:

- 1) "The rat-catchers' choir (of voices singing charms) are all fools and asses compared to this Nightingale (and me)."
- 2) "The rat-catchers' enchanted charms are all metaphorical fools and asses compared to this charm that is being sung by Nightingale (and me)."

However, if Bartholomew Cokes meant these meanings, would he be right or wrong?

It depends on the purpose of the rat-catchers' charm.

Suppose that the purpose of the charm is to attract the rats so they can be gotten rid of.

Most of us are familiar with the story of the Pied Piper of Hamelin in which the piper used music to attract rats and lead them out of town and into a river where they drowned. The Pied Piper of Hamelin was effective at getting rid of rats, and so his singing and his charm were effective — more effective than the song of Nightingale and Bartholomew Cokes.

But suppose that the purpose of the charm is to keep the rats away. Getting rid of the rats is certainly the ultimate purpose of the charm.

Also certainly, the Pied Piper of Hamelin was effective at getting rid of rats, but the Pied Piper story is a folktale. In real life, rats will not be rhymed to death. In the real world, Bartholomew Cokes would say (until his purse is cut), his and Nightingale's song is much more effective at keeping unwanted beings away.

Zeal-of-the-Land Busy and the Disguised Justice Overdo Escape from the Stocks (4.6)

Acts 16:19-34 (King James Version)

19 And when her masters saw that the hope of their gains was gone, they caught Paul and Silas, and drew them into the marketplace unto the rulers,

20 And brought them to the magistrates, saying, These men, being Jews, do exceedingly trouble our city,

21 And teach customs, which are not lawful for us to receive, neither to observe, being Romans.

22 And the multitude rose up together against them: and the magistrates rent off their clothes, and commanded to beat them.

23 And when they had laid many stripes upon them, they cast them into prison, charging the jailor to keep them safely:

24 Who, having received such a charge, thrust them into the inner prison, and made their feet fast in the stocks.

25 And at midnight Paul and Silas prayed, and sang praises unto God: and the prisoners heard them.

26 And suddenly there was a great earthquake, so that the foundations of the prison were shaken: and immediately all the doors were opened, and every one's bands were loosed.

27 And the keeper of the prison awaking out of his sleep, and seeing the prison doors open, he drew out his sword, and would have killed himself, supposing that the prisoners had been fled.

28 But Paul cried with a loud voice, saying, Do thyself no harm: for we are all here.

29 Then he called for a light, and sprang in, and came trembling, and fell down before Paul and Silas,

30 And brought them out, and said, Sirs, what must I do to be saved?

31 And they said, Believe on the Lord Jesus Christ, and thou shalt be saved, and thy house.

32 And they spake unto him the word of the Lord, and to all that were in his house.

33 And he took them the same hour of the night, and washed their stripes; and was baptized, he and all his, straightway.

34 And when he had brought them into his house, he set meat before them, and rejoiced, believing in God with all his house.

Shimei (5.5)

This is 2 Samuel 16:5-13 (King James Version):

5 And when king David came to Bahurim, behold, thence came out a man of the family of the house of Saul, whose name was Shimei, the son of Gera: he came forth, and cursed still as he came.

6 And he cast stones at David, and at all the servants of king David: and all the people and all the mighty men were on his right hand and on his left.

7 And thus said Shimei when he cursed, Come out, come out, thou bloody man, and thou man of Belial:

8 The Lord hath returned upon thee all the blood of the house of Saul, in whose stead thou hast reigned; and the Lord hath delivered the kingdom into the hand of Absalom thy son: and, behold, thou art taken in thy mischief, because thou art a bloody man.

9 Then said Abishai the son of Zeruiah unto the king, Why should this dead dog curse my lord the king? let me go over, I pray thee, and take off his head.

10 And the king said, What have I to do with you, ye sons of Zeruiah? so let him curse, because the Lord hath said unto him, Curse David. Who shall then say, Wherefore hast thou done so?

11 And David said to Abishai, and to all his servants, Behold, my son, which came forth of my bowels, seeketh my life: how much more now may this Benjamite do it? let him alone, and let him curse; for the Lord hath bidden him.

12 It may be that the Lord will look on mine affliction, and that the Lord will requite me good for his cursing this day.

13 And as David and his men went by the way, Shimei went along on the hill's side over against him, and cursed as he went, and threw stones at him, and cast dust.

THE SCENE and TIME: MILAN in 1529

Notes

In this society, a person of higher rank would use “thou,” “thee,” “thine,” and “thy” when referring to a person of lower rank. (These terms were also used affectionately and between equals.) A person of lower rank would use “you” and “your” when referring to a person of higher rank.

“Sirrah” was a title used to address someone of a social rank inferior to the speaker. Friends, however, could use it to refer to each other.

This society believed that the mixture of four humors in the body determined one's temperament. One humor could be predominant. The four humors are blood, yellow bile, black bile, and phlegm. If blood is predominant, then the person is sanguine (active, optimistic). If yellow bile is predominant, then the person is choleric (bad-tempered). If black bile is predominant, then the person is melancholic (sad). If phlegm is predominant, then the person is phlegmatic (calm, apathetic, indolent).

A humor can be a personal characteristic.

A humor can also be a fancy or a whim.

The word “wench” at this time was not necessarily negative. It was often used affectionately.

“The case is altered” means “The situation has changed.”

ACT 1 (The Case is Altered)

— 1.1 —

Juniper, a cobbler, was sitting at work in his shop and singing a song about troubled love:

“Now, woeful wights [persons], give ear awhile,

“And mark the tenor [drift] of my style,

“Which shall such trembling hearts unfold

“As seldom hath [has] tofore [before] been told.

“Such chances rare and doleful [sorrowful] news.”

Peter Onion, the servant of the hall to Count Ferneze of Milan, Italy, came into Juniper’s shop in a hurry and said, “Fellow Juniper! Peace, in God’s name! Stop singing!”

Juniper continued to sing:

“As may attempt your wits to muse [contemplate].”

“Godso, listen, man!” Onion said. “A pox of God on you!”

“Godso” is a mild curse word.

Juniper continued to sing:

“And cause such trickling tears to pass,

“Except [Unless] your hearts be flint or brass.”

Hearts made of flint or brass are hard hearts.

“Juniper! Juniper!” Onion cried.

Juniper continued to sing:

“To hear the news which I shall tell,

“That in Castella [Castile] once befell.”

He then complained, “By God’s blood, where did thou learn to corrupt a man in the midst of a verse, ha?”

A comic character, Jupiter frequently made malapropisms. By “corrupt,” he meant “interrupt.”

Onion replied, “By God’s eyelid, man, the food service is ready to go up, man. You must slip on your coat and come in. We lack waiters pitifully.”

Although Juniper was a cobbler, he was being asked to put on a coat and assist in serving a meal to members of Count Ferneze’s household.

“That is a pitiful thing to hear, for now must I from a merry cobbler become a mourning creature,” Juniper said.

Count Ferneze’s wife, the Countess Ferneze, had recently died, and so Juniper would put a black coat.

“Well, you’ll come?” Onion asked.

“Presto,” Juniper said. “Quickly. Bah, a word to the wise. Away, fly, vanish! Go, irritating thing!”

The full proverb is “A word to the wise is enough.”

Onion exited, and Juniper sang:

“Lie there, the weeds [clothing] that I disdain to wear.”

Antonio Balladino, the pageant poet of Milan, entered the scene and said, “May God save you, Master Juniper.”

“What! Signor Antonio Balladino!” Juniper said. “Welcome, sweet ingle.”

An “ingle” is 1) a lover, especially a boy in a homosexual relation with an older man, or 2) a close friend.

“And how do you do, sir?” Antonio Balladino asked.

Putting on a black coat, Juniper said, “Indeed, you see, I am put to my shifts here as poor servants often are.”

A shift is 1) an article of clothing, or 2) a trick.

Juniper continued:

“Sirrah Antony, there’s one of my fellows mightily enamored of thee and, indeed, you slave, now that you have come, I’ll bring you together.”

The two men — Peter Onion and Antonio Balladino — had never met, and Juniper’s fellow was not feeling romantic amour for Antonio Balladino, so it’s more accurate to say that the person respected Antonio Balladino because of his reputation.

Juniper continued:

“It’s Peter Onion, the servant of the hall. Do you know him?”

“No, not yet, I assure you,” Antonio Balladino answered.

Juniper said:

“Oh, he is one as right of thy humor and disposition as may be, a plain, simple rascal, a true follower of the philosopher-theologian Duns Scotus.

“By the Virgin Mary, he has been a notable villain in his time. He is in love, sirrah, with a wench, and I have recommended thee to him. Thou shall make him some pretty paradox or some allegory.”

Paradoxes are contradictions that contain truth.

Allegories are narratives with hidden spiritual or political meanings. In some works of art, a journey on a road may be allegorically interpreted as a journey through life.

“How does my coat sit? Well?”

“Aye, very well,” Antonio Balladino said.

Onion re-entered the scene and said, “Nay, Godso, fellow Juniper, come away!”

Juniper said:

“Are thou there, mad slave? Aye, come with a powder! Come impetuously!

“Sirrah fellow Onion, I must have you peruse this gentleman well and treat him with respect and kindness, as examples of why he deserves such respect and kindness shall be given.”

Juniper exited, and Onion turned to “this gentleman” — Antonio Balladino — and bowed.

“Nay, good master Onion, what do you mean? I pray you, sir, you are too respectful, in good faith,” Antonio Balladino said.

“I wish you would not think so, sir,” Onion said, “for although I have no learning, yet I honor a scholar in any ground of the earth, sir. Shall I request your name, sir?”

“My name is Antonio Balladino.”

“Balladino?” Onion said. “You aren’t the pageant poet to the city of Milan, sir, are you?”

Pageants were grand spectacles.

“I supply the place, sir, when a worse cannot be had, sir,” Antonio Balladino said.

A “worse” poet? Hmm. He was joking, but what does this say about pageants?

“I beg your pardon, sir,” Onion said. “I love you the better for that, sir. By Jesu, you must pardon me; I didn’t recognize you, but I'd pray to be better acquainted with you, sir. I have seen some of your works."

"I am at your service, good master Onion," Antonio Balladino said. "But concerning this maiden whom you love, sir, who is she?"

"Oh, did my fellow Juniper tell you about her?" Onion said. "By the Virgin Mary, sir, she is, as one may say, only a poor man's child, indeed; and as for my own part, I am no gentleman born, I must confess, but 'My mind to me a kingdom is,' truly."

"My mind to me a kingdom is" is the title line of a poem by Edward Dyer.

"Truly, a very good saying," Antonio Balladino said.

"It is somewhat stale, but that doesn't matter," Onion said.

"Oh, staler is the better," Antonio Balladino said. "Such things are always like bread, which, the staler it is, the more wholesome."

"This is but a hungry comparison, in my judgment," Onion said.

A hungry comparison is a far-fetched comparison.

"Why, I'll tell you, Master Onion, I use as much stale stuff, although I say it myself, as any man does in that kind, I am sure," Antonio Balladino said. "Did you see the last pageant I set forth?"

"No, indeed, sir, but there goes a huge report on it," Onion said. "It has caused a lot of talk."

"Why, you shall be one of my Maecen-asses," Antonio Balladino said. "I'll give you one of the books. Oh, you'll like it admirably."

Maecenas was a patron of celebrated Roman authors such as Horace and Virgil. Onion could be Antonio Balladino's patron by reading and saying good things about a printed copy of one of Antonio's pageants.

"That's certain," Onion said.

It was certain that Onion would be a Maecen-ass.

Onion continued, "I'll get my fellow Juniper to read it."

Possibly, Onion was illiterate.

"Read it, sir?" Antonio Balladino said. "I'll read it to you."

"Tut, then I shall not choose but to like it," Onion replied.

Antonio Balladino said:

"Why, look, sir, I write so plainly and keep that old decorum that you must of necessity like it. By the Virgin Mary, you shall have some now — as, for example, in plays — who will have every day new tricks and write you nothing but humors."

Humors are dispositions such as being sanguine (active, optimistic), choleric (bad-tempered), melancholic (sad), or phlegmatic (calm, apathetic, indolent). A humor can also be a personal characteristic, or a fancy or whim.

Antonio Balladino continued:

"Indeed, this pleases the gentlemen, but the common sort, they don't care for it. They don't know what to make of it; they look for good matter, they do, and they are not edified with such trifles."

"Humors" was a fashionable term at the time, and many plays used the term. Ben Jonson himself wrote the plays Every Man Out of His Humor and Every Man in His Humor.

“The common sort” are the less-educated members of the audience. They tended to like spectacle for the sake of spectacle.

“You are in the right,” Onion said. “I’ll not give a halfpenny to see a thousand of them. I was at one the last term, but if I ever see a more roguish thing, I am a piece of cheese and no onion. Nothing but kings and princes in it; the fool came out not a jot.”

Onion liked comic plays in which fools had major parts. Tragedies and histories without fools were not to his liking.

“True, sir, they would have me make such plays, but as I tell them, even if they would give me twenty pounds a play, I’ll not raise my style of writing,” Antonio Balladino said.

The going rate for plays was six pounds.

“No, it would be a vain thing if you should, sir,” Onion said.

“Tut, give me the penny, give me the penny. I don’t care for the gentlemen, I. Let me have a good ground,” Antonio Balladino said. “No matter for the pen; the plot shall carry it.”

The groundlings — the common sort — paid a penny to see a play. They stood on the ground and were not seated while watching the play.

“Indeed, that’s right,” Onion said. “You are in print — known — already as the best plotter.”

“Aye, I might also have been noted for dumb shows, too,” Antonio Balladino said.

Dumb shows were portions of plays with no dialogue.

“Aye, by the Virgin Mary, sir, I marvel that you were not,” Onion said. “Stand aside, sir, for a while.”

Antonio Balladino exited.

The Sewer — the servant who superintended the serving of the food — passed by, along with some half-dozen servants wearing mourning coats. All of them were carrying food and utensils.

Valentine, a servant of the visiting nobleman Francisco Colonna, entered the scene.

“How are you now, friend?” Onion said. “Who are you there? Be uncovered. Take off your hat. Do you want to speak with any man here?”

“Aye, or else I must have returned you no answer,” Valentine said.

If he would not speak to Onion, he could not answer Onion’s question.

“Friend, you are somewhat too peremptory and cheeky,” Onion said. “Let’s crave your absence. Go. Now. Nay, never scorn my words; I am a little your better in this place.”

“I do acknowledge it,” Valentine said.

“Do you acknowledge it?” Onion said. “Nay, then, you shall go forth. I’ll teach you how you shall acknowledge it another time. Go to another place, leave. I must have the hall purged. No setting up of a rest here. Pack off. Begone.”

“I ask you, sir,” Valentine said. “Isn’t your name Onion?”

“I am your friend, according to how you treat me, and I am Master Onion. Say what you have to say.”

“Master Onion with a murrain — a plague!” Valentine said. “Come, come, put off this lion’s hide; your ears have revealed you.”

In one of Aesop's fables, an ass finds and wears a lion's hide. The other animals are afraid of the ass until he brays with happiness at being feared, revealing his true identity.

Valentine then said to Peter Onion, "Why, Peter, don't I know you, Peter?"

"Godso, Valentine!" Peter Onion said, recognizing him.

"Oh, can you recognize me now, sir?" Valentine asked.

"Good Lord, sirrah, how thou are altered with thy travel!" Onion said.

"Nothing so much as thou are altered with thine office," Valentine said. "But, sirrah Onion, is the Count Ferneze at home?"

"Aye, bully, he is above on the second floor, and the Lord Paolo Ferneze, his son, and Madam Aurelia and Madam Phoenixella, his daughters, are with him. But, oh, Valentine!"

In this society, the word "bully" was not negative. One could call a friend "bully."

"How are thou now, man?" Valentine asked. "How are thou doing?"

"Indeed, I am sad, heavy, as a man of my coat ought to be," Onion said.

He was wearing a black coat as a sign of mourning.

"Why, man, thou were merry enough just now," Valentine said.

Onion replied:

"True, but as thou know,

"All creatures here sojourning

“Upon this wretched earth

“Sometimes have a fit of mourning

“As well as a fit of mirth.

“Oh, Valentine, my old lady is dead, man.”

“Dead!” Valentine said.

“Indeed,” Onion said.

“When did she die?” Valentine asked.

Onion replied:

“By the Virgin Mary, tomorrow shall be three months since she died. She was seen going to heaven, they say, about some five weeks ago.

“How are you now? Trickling tears, I see?”

Crying, Valentine said, “Indeed, thou have made me weep with this news.”

“Why, I have done but the part of an onion,” Onion said. “You must pardon me.”

Cutting onions makes one weep tears.

— 1.2 —

The Sewer again passed by with servers carrying food and utensils. The servants acknowledged Valentine with nods when they saw him. The Sewer and other servants exited.

Juniper entered from his cobbler’s shop and greeted Valentine and handed Onion a dish.

“What! Valentine?” Juniper said. “Fellow Onion, take my dish, please.”

Onion exited, carrying the dish.

Juniper said to Valentine, “You rogue, sirrah, tell me how thou are doing, sweet ingle?”

“Indeed, Juniper, the better to see thee thus frolic and be merry,” Valentine said.

“Nay, by God’s eyelid, I am no changeling, I am Juniper still.”

A changeling is a baby left by fairies in place of a human baby. Juniper was saying here that he is not an imposter.

Juniper continued, “I keep the pristinate: the original state. Ha, you mad hieroglyphic, when shall we swagger?”

Juniper’s education was lacking. He was using the word “hieroglyphic,” which refers to Egyptian pictorial writing, as a term of friendship.

“Hieroglyphic?” Valentine said. “What do thou mean by that?”

“Mean?” Juniper said. “Godso, isn’t it a good word, man? What! Stand upon meaning with your friends? Pooh, absconde.”

The Latin word “absconde” means “put away.” Juniper wanted Valentine to put away — stop — such behavior.

“Why, but wait, wait,” Valentine said. “How long has this sprightly humor haunted thee?”

“Bah, humor?” Juniper said. “A foolish, natural gift we have in the equinoctial.”

A humor can be a passing fancy.

“Equinoctial” refers to the spring equinox and autumn equinox: the day when the lengths of the day and of the night are equal. Juniper’s use of the word was probably nonsensical, similar to much of his vocabulary. Or he may have been saying that people have a humor twice a year.

“Natural?” Valentine said. “By God’s eyelid, it may be supernatural, this.”

The way Juniper used words was not natural.

“Valentine, I ask you to ruminate thyself welcome,” Juniper said. “What, fortuna de la guerra.”

By “ruminate,” Juniper meant “consider.”

Fortuna de la guerra means “the fortune of war.”

The fortune of a war against words, yes.

“Oh, how pitifully are these words forced, as though they were pumped out from his belly!” Valentine said to himself.

“Sirrah ingle, I think thou have seen all the strange countries in Christendom since thou went,” Juniper said.

“I have seen some, Juniper,” Valentine said.

“You have seen Constantinople?” Juniper asked.

“Aye, that I have,” Valentine said.

“And Jerusalem, and the Indies, and Goodwin Sands, and the tower of Babylon, and Venice, and all?” Juniper asked.

Most of these were places where foreign languages were spoken. Of course, foreign languages are unintelligible to those who cannot speak them.

Goodwin Sands was dangerous shoals near Kent, where English was spoken. But even English can be unintelligible when the speaker — e.g., Juniper — misuses words.

The story of the Tower of Babel in Genesis is a mythological explanation of how different languages arose in the world. The word “babel” means “unintelligible sounds.”

Genesis 11:9 states, “Therefore is the name of it called Babel; because the Lord did there confound the language of all the earth: and from thence did the Lord scatter them abroad upon the face of all the earth” (King James Bible).

“Aye, all of them,” Valentine said.

He then said to himself, “It’s no marvel if he has a nimble tongue, if he uses it to vault thus from one side of the world to another.”

“Oh, it’s a most heavenly thing to travel and see countries, especially at sea, if a man had a patent — the privilege — not to be sick,” Juniper said.

Valentine said to himself, “Oh, seasick jest, and full of the scurvy!”

Scurvy was a disease, caused by a Vitamin C deficiency, that frequently afflicted sailors, who often lacked access to fresh fruit.

— 1.3 —

Sebastian, Martino, Vincentio, and Balthasar entered the scene. They were servants to Count Ferneze. These servants should have been attending to serving the meal upstairs.

“Valentine, welcome, indeed,” Sebastian said. “How do thou do, sirrah?”

“How do you do, good Valentine?” Martino asked.

“Truly, Valentine, I am glad to see you,” Vincentio said.

“Welcome, sweet rogue,” Balthasar said.

“Before God, he never looked better in his life,” Sebastian said.

“And how is it, man?” Balthasar said. “What! Allo coraggio! Have courage!”

Valentine replied, “I was never better, gentlemen, indeed.”

“By God’s will, here comes the steward,” Juniper said.

Christophero, Count Ferneze’s steward, entered the scene.

“Why, how are you now, fellows, all here?” Christophero said. “And nobody to wait above now they are ready to rise from the table? Look smart, one or two of you, and go upstairs.”

Juniper, Martino, and Vincentio exited. Sebastian and Balthazar remained to talk with Valentine and Christophero.

Christophero said to Valentine, “Signor Francisco Colonna’s serving-man, how does your good master?”

“He is in health, sir,” Valentine said. “He will be here soon.”

“Has he come home, then?” Christophero asked.

“Aye, sir, he is not more than six miles from here,” Valentine said. “He sent me before him to learn if Count Ferneze were here and then return word to him.”

“Yes, my lord is here,” Christophero said, “and you may tell your master he shall come very happily to take his leave of Lord Paolo Ferneze, who is now very quickly to depart with other noble gentlemen upon special service.”

Paolo Ferneze was Count Ferneze’s son. He was departing so he could perform military service.

“I will tell him, sir,” Valentino said.

“Please do,” Christophero said. “Fellows, give him something to drink.”

Christophero wanted the others to make Valentino welcome.

Christophero exited to attend to his duties upstairs.

“Sirs, what military service is it they are employed in?” Valentino asked.

“Why, against the French,” Sebastian said. “They mean to have a fling at Milan again, they say.”

The year was 1529, and in 1510, the French had besieged the Italian town of Vicenza, which is about forty miles west of Venice. The French were and had been trying to control northern Italy. From 1500 to 1515, the French had occupied Milan.

“Who leads our forces?” Valentine asked. “Can you tell me?”

“By the Virgin Mary, Signor Maximilian does that,” Sebastian said. “He is above us on the second floor now.”

“Maximilian of Vicenza?” Valentine asked.

“Aye, he,” Balthazar said. “Do you know him?”

“Know him?” Valentine said. “Oh, yes, he’s an excellently brave soldier.”

“Aye, so they say, but he is also one of the most vainglorious men in Europe,” Balthazar said.

“He is, indeed, by the Virgin Mary, exceedingly valiant,” Valentine said.

“And that is rare,” Sebastian said.

“What?” Balthazar asked.

“Why, to see a vainglorious man valiant,” Sebastian answered.

A vainglorious man is overly proud: He is vain and thinks himself glorious.

“Why, he is so. He is valiant, I assure you,” Valentine said.

Juniper returned and said:

“What, no further along with the drinking yet?”

“Come on, you precious rascal, Sir Valentine. I’ll give you a health — a toast, indeed, for the heavens, you mad capriccio, hold, hook and line!”

A capriccio is a madcap: a fantastical person.

Fishermen can say, “Hold, hook and line,” when catching a fish. It was also a line said to encourage drinking.

— 1.4 —

Lord Paolo Ferneze, the son of Count Ferneze, entered the scene, with his serving-boy following him.

“Boy!” Paolo Ferneze said.

“My lord?” his serving-boy answered.

“Sirrah, go upstairs to Signor Angelo, and ask him, if he can, to devise some means to leave my father and come speak with me, ” Paolo Ferneze ordered.

Angelo was one of Paolo Ferneze’s friends.

“I will, my lord,” his serving-boy said as he exited.

Alone, Paolo Ferneze said to himself:

“Well, may heaven be auspicious in the event! For I do this against my genius, against my natural temperament, and yet my thoughts cannot propose a reason why I should fear or faint thus in my hopes of having one whom I love so dearly.”

Paolo Ferneze was in love with Rachel De Prie, the daughter of Jaques De Prie, who was reputed to be a beggar. Paolo worried about his hopes of having her, although he could think of no reason why he should fear that she would not return his love.

Paolo Ferneze was going to ask his friend Angelo to help him win Rachel De Prie. Angelo had always been a loyal friend, but now Paolo was wondering if he would continue to be loyal.

Angelo was a lady’s man, and Rachel was a lady.

Paolo Ferneze continued:

“Some spark it is, kindled within the soul, whose light yet breaks not to the outward sense, that propagates this timorous suspect.”

Paolo Ferneze felt some mistrust of Angelo, but he had no evidence that would justify his mistrust. It was simply a feeling that he could not justify.

Paolo Ferneze continued:

“Angelo’s actions have never carried any appearance of change or weakness. Then I injure him in being thus skeptical of his faith and loyalty to me.”

He looked up and said, “Oh, here he comes.”

Angelo and the serving-boy entered the scene.

“How are you now, sweet lord?” Angelo asked. “What’s the matter?”

Paolo Ferneze said to himself, “Good faith, his presence makes me half-ashamed of my straying thoughts.”

He ordered his serving-boy, “Sirrah, bestow yourself elsewhere.”

The serving-boy exited.

Paolo Ferneze then asked, “Signor Angelo, where is my father?”

“By the Virgin Mary, he is in the gallery, where Your Lordship left him,” Angelo answered.

The gallery was a walking space. Count Ferneze was taking a walk after his meal.

Paolo Ferneze said:

“That’s well. So then, Angelo, I will be brief.

“Since time forbids the use of circuitous speech, let how well you are received in my affection appear by this one instance only: that now I will deliver to your trust the dearest secrets treasured in my bosom.

“Dear Angelo, you are not just any man, but you are one whom my considered judgment has designated as the true, proper object of my soul.

“I don’t urge this to insinuate my desert, or to soften your tried temper with soft phrases — true friendship loathes such oily compliment — but my speech is enforced and comes from the abundance of that love that flows through all my spirits.”

The friendship of Paolo Ferneze and Angelo was well-established.

Angelo replied, “Before Your Lordship proceeds too far, let me be bold to intimate thus much: that whatsoever your wisdom has to expose, whether it is the weightiest, richest affair that ever was included in your breast, my faith and loyalty shall be equal to it; if not —”

Paolo Ferneze interrupted, “— oh, no more! Those words have enthralled me with their sweet effects, so freely breathed and so responsible and answerable to that which I endeavored to extract, arguing a happy mixture of our souls.”

Angelo said, “Why, even if there were no such sympathy and union in feeling, sweet lord, yet the impressure — the mental impression — of those ample favors I have derived from your unmatched spirit would bind my faith to all duties.”

“What!” Paolo Ferneze said. “Favors, Angelo? Oh, don’t speak about them. They are mere paintings — they are only shows — and they import no merit. Is my true friendship for you apparent to you? On that friendship my hopes are placed. Faith that is bought with favors cannot last.”

True love and true friendship cannot be purchased.

Paolo’s serving-boy entered the room and said, “My lord!”

“What is it now?” Paolo asked.

“You are sought for all about the house inside,” the serving-boy said. “The Count, your father, calls for you.”

Paolo Ferneze said:

“God, what cross, contrary events thwart my purposes! Now my father will violently fret and grieve because I am absent.

“Boy, say I will come soon.”

His serving-boy exited.

Paolo said, “Sweet Angelo, I cannot now speak about particulars; I must serve the time. The main point of all this is, I am in love.”

He startled.

“Why does Your Lordship startle?” Angelo asked.

“I thought I heard my father coming here,” Paolo said.
“Listen!”

“I don’t hear anything,” Angelo said. “It was only your imagination, surely.”

“No,” Paolo said.

“There is no sound, I assure Your Lordship,” Angelo said.

“I would work safely and securely,” Paolo said.

He was worried that his father would find out that he was in love with Rachel de Prie. His father was likely to disapprove.

“Why, has he no knowledge of it — your being in love — then?” Angelo asked.

Paolo said:

“Oh, no. No creature yet knows it except yourself in a third person — only you, I, and Rachel know — and believe me, friend, the world does not contain now another spirit to whom I would reveal it.

“Listen! Listen!”

Some servants were calling for him inside Count Ferneze’s house, “Signor Paolo! Lord Ferneze!”

“A plague upon those brazen-throated slaves!” Angelo said.
“What, are they mad, do you think?”

Paolo said:

“Alas, don’t blame them. Their services are, clock-like, to be set backward and forward at their lord’s command.

“You know that my father is wayward and unreasonable, and his humor must not receive a check, for then all objects feed both his grief and his impatience; and those affections in him are like powder, apt to inflame with every little spark and blow up reason.

“Therefore, Angelo, be at peace.”

From inside the house came voices:

Count Ferneze said, “Why, this is ‘excellent’! Isn’t he in the garden?”

“I don’t know, my lord,” Christophero replied.

“See if he is,” Count Ferneze said. “Call him.”

Paolo said, “He is coming this way. Let’s withdraw a little distance.”

Paolo and Angelo exited.

The servants called from inside the house: “Signor Paolo! Lord Ferneze! Lord Paolo!”

— 1.5 —

Count Ferneze, Maximilian, Aurelia, Phoenixella, Sebastian, and Balthasar entered the scene. Maximilian was the general of the Milanese. Aurelia and Phoenixella were Count Ferneze’s daughters. Sebastian and Balthasar were two of the Count’s servants.

“Where should he be, do you think?” Count Ferneze said. “Did you look in the armory?”

The armory was where weapons were stored.

“No, my lord,” Sebastian answered.

“No? Why, go there!” Count Ferneze said. “Oh, who would keep such drones?”

He was complaining about his servants.

Sebastian and Balthasar exited.

Martino, another of the Count's servants, entered the scene.

"How are things now?" Count Ferneze asked. "Have you found him?"

"No, my lord," Martino answered.

"'No, my lord.' I shall have shortly all my family speak nothing but 'No, my lord,'" Count Ferneze said. "Where is Christophero?"

Christophero entered the scene.

Count Ferneze looked at Martino and said, "Look how he just stands there! You sleepy knave!"

Martino exited.

Count Ferneze asked Christophero, "Isn't my son in the garden?"

"No, my good lord," Christophero answered.

"Your 'good lord'? Oh, how this smells of fennel!" Count Ferneze said.

In this society, the herb fennel was associated with flattery.

Sebastian and Balthazar entered the scene.

"You have been in the garden, it appears," Count Ferneze said. "Well? Well?"

"We cannot find him, my lord," Balthazar said.

"He is not in the armory," Sebastian said.

"He isn't?" Count Ferneze said. "He is nowhere, is he?"

"Count Ferneze!" Maximilian said.

"Signor?" Count Ferneze replied.

“Preserve your patience, honorable count,” Maximilian said.

“Patience?” Count Ferneze said. “A saint would lose his patience to be crossed as I am with a sort of motley brains.”

The motley brains, according to the Count, were those of his servants.

The word “motley” described the clothing worn by Fools.

Common sayings of the times stated, “Enough to vex a saint” and “Enough to make a saint swear.”

Onion entered the scene as the Count continued, “See, see, how like a nest of rooks they stand, gaping on one another.”

According to the Count, his servants were standing around and staring at each other with open mouths.

A rook is 1) a crow, or 2) a simpleton.

Seeing Onion, Count Ferneze said, “Now, Diligence, what news do you bring?”

When giving Onion the name “Diligence,” Count Ferneze was being sarcastic.

“If it please Your Honor —” Onion began.

“Tut, tut, leave off pleasing of my honor,” Count Ferneze said. “Diligence, you double — you act deceitfully, you act double-faced — with me. Come.”

Onion said to himself, “What! Does he find fault with ‘please His Honor’? By God’s wounds, it has begun a serving-man’s speech ever since I belonged to the blue order.”

Servants normally wore blue coats, but now, as a sign of mourning, they were wearing black coats.

Onion continued speaking to himself, “I don’t know how it may show, now I am in black, but —”

“What’s that you mutter, sir?” Count Ferneze asked. “Will you proceed?”

Onion began, “If it like Your good Lordship —”

“Yet more!” Count Ferneze complained. “God’s precious!”

Onion said to himself, “What! Doesn’t this please him, either?”

“What are you saying, Sir Knave?” Count Ferneze said sarcastically.

Onion said out loud, “By the Virgin Mary, I say that Your Lordship would be best to set me to school again to learn how to deliver a message.”

“What!” Count Ferneze said. “Do you take exception at and argue with me, then?”

“Exception?” Onion said. “I take no exceptions but, by Godso, your humors and moods —”

“Bah,” Count Ferneze said. “You are a rascal. Hold your tongue.”

“Your Lordship’s poor servant, I am,” Onion said.

“Don’t tempt my patience,” Count Ferneze said.

“Why, I hope I am no spirit, am I?” Onion said.

“No spirit” means “no devil.” Devils tempt people, and Onion was tempting Count Ferneze to lose his temper.

Maximilian said to Count Ferneze, “My lord, command your steward to correct and discipline the slave.”

“Slave” meant “servant.”

“Correct him?” Onion said. “By God’s blood, come and correct him if you have a mind to it. Correct him! That’s a good jest, indeed. The steward and you both, come and correct him.”

Count Ferneze said to his other servants, “Nay, see, away with him. Pull his cloth over his ears.”

Stripping a servant of his coat was a way to fire a servant.

“Cloth?” Onion said. “You tell me of your cloth?”

He took off his black coat and said, “Here’s your cloth. If I mourn a minute longer, I am the rottenest onion that ever spoke with a tongue!”

The other servants thrust him outside.

Onion was fired; he left his black coat behind.

Maximilian said, “What do you call your hind, Count Ferneze?”

A hind is a servant.

“His name is Onion, signor,” the Count answered.

“I thought him some such saucy rascal,” Maximilian said.

“Signor Maximilian!” the Count said, shocked by the word “saucy,” which he did not regard as applying to Onion.

“Sweet lord?” Maximilian replied.

“Let me entreat you that you would not regard any contempt flowing from such a spirit to be so rude, so barbarous,” Count Ferneze said.

Count Ferneze actually liked Onion. The firing was temporary, and such firings probably happened frequently.

Maximilian said, “Most noble count, under your favor —”

“Under your favor” was a polite way to introduce a statement the hearer was unlikely to like.

Count Ferneze interrupted:

“Why, I’ll tell you, signor, Onion will bandy with me word for word — nay, more, he will put me to silence, strike me perfectly dumb, and so amaze me that often I don’t know whether to check or cherish his presumption.

“Therefore, good signor —”

Maximilian interrupted, “— sweet lord, know that I am not now to learn how to manage my affections, feelings, and emotions. I have observed and know the difference between a base wretch and a true man. I can distinguish them. The property of the wretch is, he would hurt and cannot; the property of the man is, he can hurt and will not.”

Aurelia laughed, and Count Ferneze now said to her, “Bah, my merry daughter. Oh, these looks agree well with your clothing, don’t they?”

She was wearing black, the color of mourning, because her mother had died.

Juniper entered the room while talking to Onion, who remained outside, “Tut, leave it to me.”

Looking at Maximilian, he said to Count Ferneze, “By your favor — if you don’t mind — this is the gentleman, I think.”

Using and misusing his vocabulary, he then said to Maximilian, “Sir, you appear to be an honorable gentleman. I understand and could wish for my own part that things were condent [conducted] otherwise than they are.”

Speaking about Onion, he said, “But, the world knows, a foolish fellow, somewhat proclive [headlong] and hasty; he did it — spoke rashly — in a prejudicate [precipitant, and in such a way as to cause you to judge him before you know him] humor. By the Virgin Mary, now, upon better computation [consideration], he wanes, he melts, his poor eyes are in a cold sweat.

“Right noble signor, you can have only compunction. I love the man; tender [give] your compassion.”

“Compunction” is a feeling of guilt or distress that prevents or follows an evil action.

“Does any man here understand this fellow?” Maximilian asked.

“Oh, God, sir, I may say frustra to the comprehension of your intellection,” Juniper said.

The Latin frustra means “in vain.”

Juniper was criticizing Maximilian’s inability to understand him.

“Before the Lord, I swear that he speaks all in riddles, I think,” Maximilian said. “I must have a comment before I can conceive him.”

A comment? To understand Juniper, one needs an entire commentary.

“Why, he asks to have his fellow, Onion, pardoned, and you must grant it, signor,” Count Ferneze said.

“Oh, with all my soul, my lord,” Maximilian said. “Is that his proposition? Is that what he wants?”

Juniper said, “Aye, sir, and we shall retort [return] these kind favors with all the alacrity of spirit we can, sir, as may be most expedient [fit] as well for the quality [generosity] as the cause [decision, also a legal case]; until that time, in spite of this compliment [your kindness in listening to my words], I rest, a poor cobbler, servant to my honorable lord here, your friend, and Juniper.”

Juniper exited.

“His name is Juniper?” Maximilian asked.

“Aye, signor,” Count Ferneze answered.

“He is a sweet youth,” Maximilian said. “His tongue has a happy turn when he sleeps.”

“Aye, for then it rests,” Count Ferneze replied.

Paolo Ferneze, Francisco Colonna, Angelo, and Valentine entered the scene.

Maximilian said to Paolo, “Oh, sir, you’re welcome. Why, God be thanked you are found at last.”

He then greeted Francisco Colonna, “Signor Colonna, truly you are welcome. I am glad to see you, sir, so well returned.”

Francisco Colonna replied, “I gladly thank Your Honor; yet, indeed, I am sorry for such a cause of sadness as has possessed Your Lordship in my absence.”

He was referring to the death of the Countess Ferneze.

Count Ferneze replied, “Oh, Francisco, you knew her — Countess Ferneze — and what she was!”

“She was a wise and honorable lady,” Francisco Colonna said.

Count Ferneze said:

“Aye, wasn’t she?”

“Well, don’t weep because she is gone.

“Passion’s dulled eye can make two griefs of one.

“Whomever Death marks out to die, neither virtue nor blood can save.

“Princes and beggars, all must feed the grave.”

Maximilian asked, “Are your horses and men ready, Lord Paolo?”

“Aye, signor, they wait for us at the gate,” Paolo replied.

Maximilian said, “Well, that is good.”

He said to Count Ferneze’s two daughters, Aurelia and Phoenixella, “Ladies, I will take my leave of you. May your fortunes be as yourselves: fair.”

He said to Paolo, “Come, let us get on horseback.”

He then said, “Count Ferneze, I bear a spirit full of thanks for all your honorable courtesies.”

“Sir, I could wish the number and value of them more in respect of your deservings,” Count Ferneze said. “But, Signor Maximilian, please, let me have a word with you in private.”

They walked to the side and talked.

Aurelia said to Paolo, “Indeed, brother, you are provided with a general — Maximilian — yonder. Curse my heart if I would not wish myself to become a man if I had Fortunatus’ hat here and go with you just to enjoy his presence.”

The fictional character Fortunatus’ magic hat took the wisher wherever he or she wished to go.

“Why, do you love him so well, sister?” Paolo asked.

“No, by my faith, but I have such an odd, singular, pretty apprehension of his humor that I think that I am even tickled with the idea of it,” Aurelia said. “Oh, he is a fine man.”

“And I think another man may be as fine as he is,” Angelo said.

“Oh, Angelo, do you think I would urge any comparison against you?” Aurelia said. “No, I am not so ill-bred as to be a defamer of your worthiness. Believe me, if I hadn’t some hope of your abiding with us, I would never desire to not wear black while I lived, and I would learn to speak in the nose and turn Puritan immediately.”

Angelo could abide — dwell — with Aurelia and her close relatives if he married her sister, Phoenixella.

The stereotype of Puritans was that they spoke through their nose, always wore black, and always lacked humor.

“I thank you, lady,” Angelo said. “I know you can flout, mock, and jeer.”

“Come, do you take it that way?” Aurelia said. “Indeed, you wrong me.”

Francisco Colonna and Phoenixella spoke together a short distance away from the others.

Colonna said, “Aye, but madam, thus to renounce all the feelings of pleasure may make your sadness seem too much affected and put on for show, and then the proper and true grace of it is lost.”

Phoenixella said:

“Indeed, sir, if I did put on this sadness only when I was outside and in society, and if I were merry and quick-humored in private, then it might seem affected and abhorred.

“But as my looks appear, such is my spirit, drowned up with confluence of grief and melancholy which like rivers run through all my veins, quenching the pride and fervor of my blood.”

Maximilian and Count Ferneze talked apart from the others. Count Ferneze was worried about his son’s going to war.

Maximilian said, “My honorable lord, no more. There is the honor of my blood engaged for your son’s safety.”

“Signor, don’t blame me for looking after and being concerned about Paolo’s safety so much,” Count Ferneze said. “He is my only son, and that word ‘only’ has with its strong and repercussive, reverberating sound struck my heart cold, and given it a deep wound.”

Maximilian said, “Why, but wait a moment, I ask you. Has Your Lordship ever had any more sons than this?”

“Why, haven’t you heard the story, Maximilian?” Count Ferneze asked.

“Let my sword fail me, then, if I have heard it,” Maximilian said.

Count Ferneze said:

“I had one other son, younger born than this one, Paolo, by twice as many hours as would fill the circle of a year; his name was Camillo, whom in that black and fearful night I lost.”

His lost son Camillo and his son Paolo were separated by two years.

“It is now nineteen years ago at least, and yet the memory of it sits as fresh within my brain as if it were but yesterday.”

Count Ferneze continued:

“It was that night wherein the great Chamont, the general for France, surprised Vicenza.”

Vicenza had no previous notice or warning of the attack.

Count Ferneze continued:

“I think the horror of that clamorous shout his soldiers gave when they attained the wall still tingles in my ear.

“I think I see with what amazed looks, distracted thoughts, and confused minds, we who were citizens confronted one another. Every street was filled with bitter, self-tormenting cries, and happy was that foot that first could press the flowery champaign — meadow — bordering on Verona.

“Here I, employed about my dear wife’s safety, whose soul is now in peace, lost my Camillo, who surely was murdered by the barbarous soldiers, or else I should have heard something — my heart is great.

“Sorrow is faint, and passion makes me sweat.”

His young son Camillo apparently died in the fighting when the French forces took control of Vicenza.

Maximilian said:

“Don’t grieve, sweet count. Comfort your spirits. You have a son, Paolo, a noble gentleman. He stands face to face with honor as his equal. As for his safety, let that be no question. I am the master of my fortune and he shall share my fortune with me.”

He then said loudly:

“Farewell, my honorable lord.

“Ladies, once more, adieu.”

He said to Aurelia, “As for yourself, madam, you are a most splendid creature. I tell you so, be not proud of it, I love you.”

He then said, “Come, Lord Paolo, let’s mount our horses.”

Paolo said, “Adieu, good Signor Francisco. Farewell, sister.”

Francisco was Francisco Colonna.

Everyone departed, going in different directions, except for Maximilian, Paolo Ferneze, and Angelo.

Angelo said quietly to Paolo, “How shall we get him to leave?”

He was referring to Maximilian. Angelo and Paolo wished to speak privately.

Paolo replied quietly, “Why, easily enough.”

He said out loud, “Sweet Signor Maximilian, I have some small reason to stay here briefly. If it may please you, just go on horseback ahead of me. I’ll overtake you before your troops be ranged and set in order.”

“Your proposal does taste well,” Maximilian said. “Lord Ferneze, I go.”

He exited.

Paolo said to Angelo, “Now, if my love, fair Rachel, were so happy as just to look forth and come here.”

Rachel de Prie entered the scene.

Seeing her, Paolo said, “Look, fortune gives grace to me, before I can request it!”

He asked Rachel, “How are you now, my love? Where is your father?”

“He has gone away from home, my lord,” Rachel de Prie said.

“That’s well,” Paolo said.

“Aye, but I fear he’ll immediately return,” she said.

Paolo started to leave.

Rachel asked, "Are you now going, my most honored lord?"

"Aye, my sweet Rachel," Paolo said.

Angelo said to himself, "Before God, she is a sweet wench."

Paolo said, "Rachel, I hope I shall not need to urge the sacred purity of our affections, as if it hung in trial or suspense, since in our hearts and by our mutual vows it is confirmed and sealed in sight of heaven."

Rachel cried.

"Nay, do not weep," Paolo said.

She startled.

Paolo said:

"Why do you startle? Don't fear, my love. Your father cannot have returned so soon.

"Aye, please, do not look so sorrowfully. Thou shall lack nothing."

"No? Is your presence nothing?" Rachel said. "I shall lack that, and lacking that, I shall lack everything, for your presence is everything to me."

Paolo said:

"Content thee, sweetheart. Be content and happy.

"I have made choice here of a loyal friend, this gentleman, on whose zealous love I do repose more than on all the world, with the exception of thy beauteous self; and to him I have committed my dear care of thee, as if I had committed it to my genius — my attendant spirit — or my other soul."

Paolo continued:

“Receive him, gentle love, and what lacks my absence causes, his presence shall supply.

“The time is envious of our longer stay. I must leave.

“Farewell, dear Rachel.”

Rachel replied:

“My most dear lord, adieu.

“May Heaven and honor crown your deeds and you!”

She exited.

Paolo said, “Tell me truly, Angelo. How do thou like her?”

“Truly, I like her well, my lord, but shall I speak my mind?”
Angelo replied.

“Aye, please do,” Paolo said.

Angelo said, “She is derived too meanly to be the wife to such a noble person as yourself, in my judgment.”

Rachel was lowly born, while Paolo was the son of a Count.

Paolo said:

“Nay, then, thy judgment is too mean-spirited, I see.

“Haven’t thou ever read, in differentiating good from evil,
‘It is better to shine in virtue than in blood?’”

A proverb stated, “Virtue is the true nobility.”

“Come, you are so sententious, my lord,” Angelo said.

Jaques de Prie, Rachel’s father, entered the scene.

Seeing him, Paolo said to Angelo, “Here comes her father.”

He then asked, “How are thou, good Jaques?”

Angelo greeted him: “May God save thee, Jaques.”

Jaques was suspicious at being greeted so well: “What should this mean?”

He called, “Rachel, open the door.”

Rachel locked the doors when her father was not at home.

Jaques exited.

Angelo said, “By God’s blood, how the poor slave looks, as though he had been haunted by the spirit, Lar, or seen the ghost of some great Satrapas, wrapped in an unsavory sheet.”

A spirit is a ghost.

A Lar is a protective household god, worshipped by the Romans.

A satrap was a provincial governor in wealthy ancient Persia.

Ghosts appearing on stage wore sheets.

Paolo said:

“I wonder that he did not speak to us; likely he was amazed, coming so suddenly and unprepared upon us.

“Well, let’s go.”

ACT 2 (The Case is Altered)

— 2.1 —

Alone in his house, Jaques De Prie, the father of Rachel, said to himself:

“So now enough, my heart; beat now no more, at least for this cause of fright. What a cold sweat flowed on my brows and over all my bosom!

“Had I not reason to be frightened? To behold my door beset with unthrifths, and myself outside?”

“Unthrifths” are unthrifty people. In Jaques’ opinion, Paolo and Angelo were unthrifths.

Jaques continued:

“Why, Jaques, was there nothing in the house worth a continual eye, a vigilant thought, a watcher whose head should never nod, nor eyes once wink?

“Look on my coat, my thoughts, worn quite threadbare, which time could never cover with a nap, and by it learn never with naps of sleep to smother your thoughts of that which you keep.”

Jaques’ coat was threadbare, and so were his thoughts.

Jaques continued:

“But yet, I marvel why these gallant youths spoke to me so fairly, when I am thought to be a beggar!

“The goal of flattery is gain or lechery.

“If they seek gain from me, then they must think that I am rich, but they do not think that.

“As for their other goal, which is satisfaction of lechery, their goal is in my beautiful daughter, if it be in anything.

“And, by your leave, her beauty may tell them my beggary counterfeits because her neatness flows from some store of wealth, which breaks my coffers with this same engine: love for my own child.”

Although everyone thought of him as a poor beggar, Jaques was a rich miser who had money and seldom spent it, but he did spend it on his daughter, who was well-dressed.

Jaques continued:

“But this is answered: ‘Beggars will keep fine their daughters, being fair, though they themselves pine.’

“Well, then, their lecherous interest is for her, aye, it is surely for her, and I make her so brisk, smart, and finely dressed for some of them so that I might live alone with my gold once she is married.

“Oh, gold is a sweet companion, kind and true! A man may trust it when his father, brother, friend, or wife cheats him.

“Oh, wondrous wealth! That which makes all men false is true itself.

“But now this maiden is but supposed and thought to be my daughter, for I, being steward to a lord of France, of great estate and wealth, called Lord Chamont, once he had gone into the wars, I stole his treasure — but don’t overhear this, anything! — I stole his treasure, and I stole his daughter, who was only two years old, because the little girl loved me so much that she would leave the nurse herself to come into my arms, and, if I had left her, the child would surely have died.”

This Lord Chamont was the older Chamont: the one who had surprised Vicenza.

Jaques gave no reason for why “the child would surely have died.” This may just be an excuse for kidnapping her.

Jaques continued:

“Now herein I was kind and had a conscience. And, since her lady mother, who died in childbed delivering her, loved me surpassingly well, it may be the case that nature fashioned this affection, both in the child and her. But anyone who ransacks tombs and defaces the dead is ill-bred.

“I’ll therefore say no more; suppose the rest.”

Jaques may have had an affair with the Lady Chamont, Rachel’s mother. Perhaps Rachel really was his daughter and not Lord Chamont’s.

Jaques continued:

“Here have I changed my form, my name, and hers, and I live obscurely, to enjoy more safely my dearest treasure.

“But I must go outside.”

He called, “Rachel!”

Rachel appeared and asked, “What is your pleasure, sir?”

“Rachel, I must go outside,” Jaques said. “Lock thyself in, but yet take out the key, so that whosoever peeps in at the keyhole may yet imagine there is no one at home.”

“I will, sir,” Rachel said.

Jaques said:

“But, listen, Rachel.

“Say that a thief should come and peep in at the keyhole and not see the key; he would conclude indeed that no one was at home and so break in all the sooner.

“Open the door, Rachel, set it open, daughter. But sit in the doorway thyself and talk aloud, as if there were some more people in the house with thee.

“Put out the fire, kill the chimney’s heart, so that it may breathe no more than a dead man.

“The more we spare, my child, the more we gain.”

He exited.

— 2.2 —

Christophero, Juniper, and Onion talked together.

“What does my fellow Onion say?” Christophero said. “Come on.”

“All of a house, sir, but no fellows,” Onion said. “You are my lord’s steward.”

Onion was pointing out that although Christophero and he were servants in the same household, they were not fellows — that is, they were not equals. As Count Ferneze’s steward, Christophero ranked higher than Onion.

“But I ask you, what do you think of love, sir?” Onion asked.

“Of love, Onion?” Christophero said. “Why, it’s a very honorable humor.”

“Nay, if it is only worshipful, I don’t care,” Onion said.

In this society, “Your Honor” is a higher, better title than “Your Worship.”

“Bah, it’s honorable,” Juniper said. “Don’t recoil from the conceit — the idea — of the gentleman.”

“But in truth, sir,” Onion said, “you shall do well to think well of love, for in my opinion, it thinks well of you, I assure you.”

“Gramercy — thanks — fellow Onion, I do think well of love,” Christophero said. “Thou are in love, are thou?”

“Partly, sir, but I am ashamed to say wholly,” Onion said.

“Well, I will further it in thee to any honest woman or maiden, the best I can,” Christophero said.

Using and misusing his vocabulary as usual, Juniper said, “Why, now you come near Onion, sir. Onion does vail [take off his hat], he does remunerate [recompense], he does chaw the cud [ruminate] in the kindness of an honest imperfection [malapropism for ‘intervention’] by Your Worship.”

In other words, Onion wants your help, which you have agreed to give him.

“But who is it thou love, fellow Onion?” Christophero asked.

“By the Virgin Mary, a poor man’s daughter, but none of the honestest, I hope,” Onion answered.

“Honest” means “chaste.” Onion loved a poor man’s daughter, and he hoped that she was not overly chaste.

“Why, wouldn’t thou have her honest and chaste?” Christophero asked.

“Oh, no, for then I am sure she would not have me,” Onion replied. “The woman I love is Rachel de Prie.”

“Why, she has the name — and the reputation — of a very virtuous maiden,” Christophero said.

Prie is French for “pray.”

“So she is, sir; but the fellow talks in quiddits, he does,” Juniper said.

“The fellow” is Onion, and “quiddits” is a malapropism for “quibbles” and “quiddities.”

“Quiddities” are peculiarities, and quibbles are plays on words.

Christophero asked Onion, “What do thou want me to do in the matter?”

“Do nothing, sir, I pray you, but speak for me,” Onion said.

He wanted Christophero to say good things about him to Rachel.

“In what manner?” Christophero asked.

“My fellow Juniper can tell you, sir,” Onion replied.

Juniper said to Christophero, “Why, speak as thus, sir: Your Worship may commend him for a fellow fit for consanguinity, and may say that he shakes with desire of procreation, or so.”

“Consanguinity” means “blood mingling” and is a euphemism for sex.

“That would not be so good to tell her, I think,” Christophero said.

“No, sir? Why so, sir?” Juniper asked.

He then gave some examples of what Christophero could say to Rachel in Onion’s behalf:

“What if you should say to her, ‘Corroborate thyself, sweet soul; let me distinguish thy paps with my fingers, divine Mumps, pretty Pastorella,’” Juniper said.

“Corroborate” means “confirm.” Here it may mean, “Corroborate that you are loved.”

“Distinguish thy paps” means “feel thy breasts.”

“Mumps” is an affectionate nickname, and “Pastorella” is a name for a shepherdess.

Juniper continued with a suggestion of what Christophero could say to Rachel in Onion’s behalf:

“Look thou so sweet and bounteous? Comfort my friend here.”

The kind of comfort could be sexual in nature. The “friend” could be between Onion’s legs.

Christophero said, “Well, I perceive that you wish I should say something that may do him grace and show him in a good light and further his desires, and that, you can be sure, I will.”

“I thank you, sir. May God save your life, I pray to God, sir,” Onion said.

“Your Worship is too good to live long,” Juniper said to Christophero.

A proverb stated, “Those whom God loves do not live long.”

“You’ll contaminate me no service?” Juniper asked.

“‘Contaminate’?” Christophero said. “‘Command,’ thou meant to say. No, good Juniper.”

“May you have health and wealth, sir,” Juniper said.

Onion and Juniper exited.

Alone, Christophero said to himself, “This wench — Rachel — I will solicit for myself, letting my lord and master — Count Ferneze — in on the secret. And if he seconds me with his consent, I will proceed, as I have long before this thought her a worthy choice to make my wife.”

He exited.

— 2.3 —

Aurelia and Phoenixella talked together.

Aurelia said:

“Make room for a pair of matrons colored black!”

They were wearing black clothing to show mourning for their dead mother: Countess Ferneze, who had died three months ago. Both had heavily mourned, but Aurelia was beginning to come out of her grief.

Aurelia continued:

“How motherly my mother’s death has made us!

“I wish I had some girls now to bring up. Oh, I could make a wench so virtuous that she would say grace for every bit of food and gape — open her mouth — no wider than a wafer’s thickness. And she should make French curtsies so very low that every touch should turn her over backward.”

The wench could fall backward and lie on her back with her legs wide open.

Phoenixella replied, “Sister, these merry words do not become your mourning attire, nor your having lost a mother. Our virtuous mother’s death should imprint deeper effects of sorrow in us than may be worn out in so little time.”

Aurelia said, “Sister, indeed, you take too much tobacco. It makes you as black within as you are without.”

Tobacco smoke colors lungs black.

Aurelia then said, “What, true-stitch, sister? Are both your sides alike?”

True-stitch is a type of embroidery that is the same on both sides. Phoenixella’s two sides — inside and outside — are both somber.

Aurelia continued, “Be of a slighter, less fussy work for, on my word, you shall be sold as dear, or rather dearer, if you are less fussy.”

If Phoenixella were to stop being melancholy, she would be sold — that is, married — and make a better match than if she stayed melancholy.

Aurelia continued:

“Will you be bound to customs and to rites?”

“Shed profitable tears, weep when it benefits you, or else do all things as you are inclined.

“‘Eat when your stomach is hungry,’ says the physician, ‘Not at eleven and six, the usual hours for meals.’”

“So if your mood is now affected with this heaviness, give me the reins and don’t hold back. Do as I do in this my appetite for pleasure.

“It is precisianism — Puritanism — to alter with austere judgment that which is given by nature.”

In other words: Our nature is to seek pleasure, and we ought not to restrain that nature without good reason. Mourning is a good reason, but mourning must at some time come to an end.

Aurelia continued:

“I wept, you saw, too, when my mother died, for then I found it easier to do so, and fitter with my mood than not to weep.

“But now it is otherwise. Another time perhaps I shall have such deep thoughts of her that I shall weep afresh, some twelve months from now, and I will weep, if I am so disposed, and put on black as grimly then as now.

“Let the mind — our mood — go always with the body’s stature — our body’s inclination!

“Judgment is fit for judges; give me nature.”

Aurelia believed that we ought to mourn when we are sorrowful, and we ought to show joy when we are happy.

— 2.4 —

Francisco Colonna and Angelo entered the scene.

“See, Signor Angelo, here are the ladies,” Francisco Colonna said. “Go and comfort one; I’ll go to the other and comfort her.”

“Therefore I come, sir,” Angelo said. “I’ll go to the eldest.”

Aurelia was the elder of the two sisters.

Angelo said, “God save you, ladies. These sad moods of yours, which make you choose these solitary walks, are hurtful for your beauties.”

“If we had them,” Aurelia said.

Aurelia was being modest when saying that she and her sister could not claim to be beautiful.

They split into two couples: Angelo and Aurelia, and Francisco Colonna and Phoenixella.

Angelo said to Aurelia, “Come, that condition might be for your hearts when you protest faith, since we cannot see them. But this same heart of beauty, your sweet face, is in my eye always.”

He was saying that he could not see into the sisters’ hearts, so perhaps such a comment as she had made was appropriate when referring to the sisters’ hearts, but nevertheless the sisters were obviously beautiful.

A person’s face can be beautiful, and yet the same person’s heart can lack beauty, as when the woman rejects a man’s love.

Because the sisters had been mourning, they had not been concerned with love and romance.

“Oh, you cut my heart with your sharp eye,” Aurelia said.

“Nay, lady, that’s not so,” Angelo said. “Your heart’s too hard.”

“My beauty’s heart?” Aurelia asked.

“Oh, no,” Angelo said, “I mean that regent of affection — that ruler of love — madam, which tramples on all love with such contempt in this fair breast.”

The ruler of love was Aurelia’s hard heart.

“No more,” Aurelia said. “Your drift is savored: I understand your words’ meaning. I had rather seem hard-hearted —”

Angelo interrupted, “— than hard-favored and ugly? Is that your meaning, lady?”

“Bah, sir,” Aurelia said. “Your wits are fresh, I know; they need no spur.”

The word “fresh” means 1) saucy, and 2) well-rested.

“And therefore you will ride them,” Angelo said.

This kind of riding can be sexual riding.

“Say that I do,” Aurelia said. “They will not tire, I hope.”

“No, not with you,” Angelo said. “Listen, sweet lady.”

They talked quietly.

Francisco Colonna said to Phoenixella, “It is very much a pity, madam, that you should have any reason to retain this sign and appearance of grief and mourning, much less the thing designed.”

In other words: It is very much a pity that you show signs of mourning and that you have reason to show such signs.

“Griefs are more fit for ladies than their pleasures,” Phoenixella said.

“That is for such ladies as follow nothing but pleasures,” Francisco Colonna said.

Some women who pursue only pleasure should sometimes feel grief. No ladies should always feel grief.

Colonna continued:

“But you ladies who temper them so well with virtues, using your griefs so, it would prove them to be pleasures, and you would seem to be in a situation of griefs and pleasures equally pleasant.”

Phoenixella said:

“Sir, so I do now.

“It is the excess of either that I strive so much to shun in all my tried, tested, and proved endeavors.

“Although perhaps to a general eye I may appear most wedded to my griefs, yet my mind forsakes no taste of pleasure — I mean that happy pleasure of the soul, divine and sacred contemplation of that eternal and most glorious bliss proposed as the crown to our souls.”

“I will be silent,” Francisco Colonna said. “Yet that I may serve but as a decade in the art of memory, to put you always in mind of your own virtues when your too serious thoughts make you too sad, accept me as your servant, honored lady.”

One popular memorization technique of the time put items to be memorized into sets of ten. Each set of ten was called a decade.

Francisco Colonna wanted to be Phoenixella's servant — that is, her male admirer.

Phoenixella replied, "Those ceremonies are too common, Signor Francis, for your uncommon gravity and judgment, and they are fitting only for those who are nothing but ceremony."

According to Phoenixella, his love-talk consisted of clichés, and such love-talk is fitting only for those who are just talk.

Angelo said to Aurelia, "Come, I will not sue stalely to be your servant; but I will use a new term: Will you be my refuge?"

He would still be her male admirer, but without using the word "servant."

"Your refuge?" Aurelia said. "Why, sir?"

"So that I might fly to you when all else fails me," Angelo said.

"If you are good at flying, be my plover," Aurelia said.

A plover is a bird, and the word "plover" is slang for "fool."

Angelo replied, "Nay, take away the 'p.'"

Take away the "p," and "plover" becomes "lover."

"Tut, then you cannot fly," Aurelia said.

"I'll promise you that I'll borrow Cupid's wings," Angelo said.

Aurelia replied:

"By the Mass, then I fear you'll do strange things.

"I pray you [Please], blame me not if I suspect you;

"Your own confession simply doth [does] detect you.

“Nay, if you be so great in Cupid’s books [lists of lovers], “It’ll make me jealous. You can with your looks,
“I warrant [promise] you, inflame a woman’s heart,
“And at your pleasure take love’s golden dart [golden arrow]
“And wound the breast of any virtuous maid [maiden].
“Would I [I wish I] were hence [away from here]! Good faith, I am afraid
“You can constrain one, ere [before] they be aware,
“To run mad for your love.”

Angelo said, “Oh, this is rare [splendid]!”

— 2.5 —

Count Ferneze entered the scene and said, “Close, intimate, and secret with my daughters, gentlemen? Well done. It is like yourselves and in accordance with your characters. Nay, lusty Angelo, don’t let my presence make you balk your sport. I will not break a minute of discourse between you and one of your fair mistresses.”

“One of my mistresses?” Angelo said. “Why, does Your Lordship think I have so many?”

“Many?” Count Ferneze said. “No, Angelo, I do not think thou have many. Some fourteen I hear thou have, even of our worthiest dames of any note in Milan.”

“Nay, my good lord, fourteen?” Angelo said. “It is not so.”

“By the Mass, that it is,” Count Ferneze said.

He gave Angelo a piece of paper and said, “Here are their names to show fourteen or fifteen to one. Good Angelo, you need not be ashamed of any of them. They are all attractive and fashionable women.”

“By God’s blood, you are such a lord!” Angelo said.

He started to go, but Count Ferneze said, “Nay, stay, sweet Angelo. I am disposed to be a little more jocular than I usually am.”

Angelo exited.

Count Ferneze said:

“He’s gone, he’s gone. I have disgraced him shrewdly.

“Daughters, take heed of him; he’s a wild youth. Be careful about what he says to you, and don’t believe him. He will swear love to everyone he sees.

“Francisco, give them advice, good Francisco; I dare trust thee with both my daughters, but him with neither of my daughters.”

“Your Lordship yet may trust both of them with him,” Francisco Colonna said.

“Well, go on your ways,” Count Ferneze said. “Away!”

Everyone except Count Ferneze exited.

— 2.6 —

Christophero entered the scene.

“How are you now, Christopher?” Count Ferneze asked. “What is the news with you?”

“I have a humble request to ask Your good Lordship,” Christophero answered.

“A request, Christopher?” Count Ferneze asked. “What request, I ask you?”

“I would crave pardon at Your Lordship’s hands if my request seems vain or simple or foolish in your sight,” Christophero said.

“I’ll pardon all simplicity, Christopher,” Count Ferneze said. “What is thy request?”

“Perhaps being now so old a bachelor, I shall seem half unwise to bend myself in strict affection to a poor young maiden,” Christophero said.

“Does your request concern love, Christopher?” Count Ferneze asked. “Are thou disposed to marry? Why, it is well.”

“Aye, but Your Lordship may imagine now that I, who am steward of Your Honor’s house, once I am married, will more concern myself with the maintenance of my wife and of my charge than with the due discharge of my place and office,” Christophero said.

“No, no, Christopher, I know thee to be honest,” Count Ferneze said.

Christophero said, “In good faith, my lord, Your Honor may suspect that I would put my family first, before yourself, but —”

Count Ferneze interrupted, “— then I should wrong thee. Thou have always been honest and true, and thou will still be honest and true, I know.”

“Aye, but often marriage alters men, and you may fear it will alter me, my lord,” Christophero said. “But before it should alter me, I will undergo ten thousand different deaths.”

“I know it, man,” Count Ferneze said. “Who would thou have as thy wife, I ask?”

“Rachel de Prie, if Your good Lordship will grant me your consent,” Christophero answered.

“Rachel de Prie? What! The poor beggar’s daughter?” Count Ferneze said. “She’s a very beautiful maiden, however poor, and thou have my consent, with all my heart.”

“I humbly thank Your Honor,” Christophero said. “I’ll now ask her father for permission to marry her.”

“Do so, Christophero,” Count Ferneze said. “Thou shall do well.”

Christophero exited.

Alone, Count Ferneze said to himself:

“It is strange, she being so poor, that he should love her, but this is stranger — that I myself should love her!

“I spied her lately at her father’s door, and if I did not see in her sweet face gentle birth and nobleness, never again believe anything I say.

“But Love wrought this persuasion that she is gentle and noble in me, that love being created with the maiden’s looks. For where Love is, he thinks his basest object gentle and noble.

“I am deep in love, and I shall be forced to wrong my honest steward, for I must sue and seek her for myself.

“However much my duty to my late dead wife and my own dear renown holds sway, “I’ll go to her father straightaway.

“Love hates delays.”

Onion, Juniper, Valentine, Sebastian, Balthasar, and Martino talked together. All of them were servants, but Valentine served Francisco Colonna while the others served Count Ferneze.

Onion said, “Come on, indeed, let’s have some exercise or other, my hearts. Fetch the hilts.”

Martino exited.

The hilts were supposedly the hilts of swords and daggers, but Martino would bring them cudgels, aka clubs.

“Fellow Juniper, will thou play?” Onion asked.

This kind of “play” was fighting with cudgels.

Juniper replied, “I cannot resolve [satisfy] you. It is as I am fitted with the ingenuity, quantity, or quality of the cudgel.”

He was perhaps claiming to be well versed in the art of fighting with cudgels. With Juniper’s use and misuse of words, it’s hard to tell.

Since the ingenuity of a cudgel is that of a stick of wood, perhaps he was telling the truth when he said that he was “fitted with the ingenuity [...] of the cudgel.”

The quantity of a cudgel is one, and Juniper was one man.

The quality of a cudgel is regarded as less than the quality of a sword, and Juniper’s social quality was less than that of gentlemen, who wore swords.

“Why, do thou bastinado the poor cudgel with terms?” Valentino asked.

The word “bastinado” means “hit with a stick or cudgel.”

Juniper replied, “Oh, ingle, I have the phrases, man, and the anagrams, and the epitaphs [malapropism for ‘epigrams’ or ‘epithets’ or both] befitting the mystery of the noble science.”

Anagrams are words that are made of the letters of other words. E.g., “satin” is an anagram of “saint.” Epigrams are short, witty sayings or poems. E.g., “Man proposes but God disposes.” Epithets are descriptive words or phrases. E.g., Homer’s “wine-dark sea.”

“I’ll be hanged if Juniper were not misbegotten by some fencer,” Onion said.

“Sirrah Valentine, you can resolve — satisfy — me now,” Sebastian said. “Do they in other countries have their masters of defense as we have here in Italy?”

Masters of defense are fencing masters.

“Oh, Lord, aye, especially they in Utopia,” Valentine, who had traveled, replied. “There they perform their prizes and challenges — that is, participate in a fencing match — with as great ceremony as the Italian or any nation else.”

“Indeed?” Balthasar said. “How is the manner of it, for God’s love, good Valentine?”

Juniper said, “Ingle, please, make recourse to us. We are thy friends and familiars, sweet ingle.”

“Familiars” are 1) intimate associates and friends, and 2) attendant evil spirits such as the familiars of the witches in Macbeth.

Valentine said, “Why, thus, sir —”

Onion interrupted, “God-a-mercy, good Valentine, nay, go on.”

“God-a-mercy” means “thank you.”

Juniper said, “Silentium, bonus socius Onionus.”

The Latin words mean, “Be silent, good friend Onion.”

Juniper continued, “Good fellow, Onion, don’t be so ingenious and turbulent.”

He then said to Valentine, “So, sir. And how? How, sweet ingle?”

Valentine said, “By the Virgin Mary, first they are brought to the public theatre.”

“What?” Juniper said. “Have they theatre there in Utopia?”

“Theatres?” Valentine said. “Aye, and plays, too, both tragedy and comedy, and set forth with as much state as can be imagined.”

“By Godso, a man is nobody until he has travelled,” Juniper said.

In Ben Jonson’s time, travelers told exaggerated stories about the places they had visited.

Actually, Valentine’s Utopia sounds remarkably like the theater scene in Ben Jonson’s day.

“And how are their plays?” Sebastian said. “As ours are, extemporal?”

“Oh, no, they are all premeditated things, and some of them very good, indeed,” Valentine said. “My master used to visit them often when he was there.”

“Why, how, now, are they in a place where any man may see them?” Balthasar asked.

Valentine said:

“Aye, in the common theatres, I tell you.

“But the sport at a new play is to observe the sway and variety of opinion that passes judgment on the play. A man shall have such a confused mixture of judgment poured out in the throng there, as ridiculous as laughter itself. One says he does not like the writing; another does not like the plot; another does not like the acting.

“And sometimes a fellow who doesn’t come into a theater there past once in five years, at a Parliament time or so, will be as deep-mired in censuring as the best, and swear by God’s foot he would never stir his foot to see a hundred such as that is.”

Parliament time is when Parliament is in session. A man might come to London then on business and take the time to see a play.

“I must travel to see these things,” Onion said. “I shall never think well of myself otherwise.”

Juniper said, “Fellow Onion, I’ll bear thy charges [pay thy way] if thou will but pilgrimize it [go as a pilgrim] along with me to the land of Utopia.”

“Why, but I think such rooks — fools — as these should be ashamed to judge,” Sebastian said.

“Not a whit,” Valentine said. “The rankest stinkard of them all will take it upon himself as peremptorily as if he had written himself in artibus magister.”

In artibus magister is a Master of Arts, one who holds a Master of Arts degree.

“And do they stand to a popular censure — judgment — for anything they present?” Sebastian asked.

The plays are always judged.

Valentine said, “Aye, always, always, and the people generally are very acceptive and receptive and apt to applaud any meritable and meritorious work; but there are two sorts of persons who most commonly are infectious to a whole auditory.”

According to Valentine, two sorts of people were unhealthy for anyone who heard them. They infected their hearers with bad opinions.

“Who are they?” Balthasar asked.

“Aye, come, let’s know them,” Juniper requested.

“It would be good if they were noted and known,” Onion said.

Valentine said, “By the Virgin Mary, one is the rude, barbarous crew, a people who have no brains and yet grounded judgments. These will hiss anything that mounts above their grounded capacities.”

Valentine was describing the groundlings, who paid a penny to stand and watch a play. They had poor literary educations.

He continued, “But the others are worth the observation, indeed.”

The others asked, “Who are they? What kind of people are they?”

“Indeed, there are a few capricious gallants.”

They were young gentlemen who were subject to whims.

“‘Capricious’?” Juniper said. “Wait, that word’s for me.”

It is a word he liked, and one he would use.

Valentine continued:

“And they have taken such a habit of dislike in all things that they will approve nothing, be it never so clever and witty or elaborate, but they will sit dispersed, making faces and spitting, wagging their upright ears, and cry, ‘Filthy! Filthy,’ simply uttering their own condition describing themselves and using their contorted and twisted countenances instead of a Vice to turn the good countenances and gazes of all who shall sit near them from what they behold.”

The capricious gallants acted in such a way to make the audience look at them instead of the actors on stage.

Medieval morality plays had a character called the Vice who attempted to turn men from good to evil.

Onion said, “Oh, that’s well said.”

Martino returned carrying cudgels.

Onion said to Martino, “Lay them down.”

He then asked, “Come, sirs, who plays? Fellow Juniper, Sebastian, Balthasar? Somebody take them up, come.”

“Ingle Valentine?” Juniper said, suggesting that Valentine be a fighter.

“Not I, sir,” Valentine said. “I don’t claim to have knowledge of the art of fighting.”

“Sebastian?” Juniper suggested.

“Balthasar?” Sabastian suggested.

“Who, I?” Balthasar said.

“Come, just one bout of fighting,” Onion said. “I’ll give thee a cudgeling, indeed.”

“Why, here’s Martino,” Balthasar said.

“Bah, he?” Onion said. “Alas, he cannot play — fight — a whit, man.”

Juniper said:

“That’s all one. That makes no difference. No more could you in stata quo prius.”

He meant, “in the former state,” but the correct Latin is in statu quo prius.

Juniper continued:

“Martino, play with him. Every man has his beginning and conduction [malapropism for ‘conclusion’].”

“Won’t you hurt me, fellow Onion?” Martino asked.

“Hurt thee?” Onion said. “No. If I do, put me among pot-herbs and chop me to pieces.”

Pot-herbs are herbs that go in the cooking pot.

“Come on,” Onion invited.

Juniper said:

“By your favor, sweet bullies [companions], give them room. Back!

“So, Martino, do not look so thin and feeble upon the matter.”

Onion and Martino fought with cudgels.

Onion said:

“Ha, well played.

“Fall over to my leg now; so, to your guard again. Excellent!

“To my head now. Make home your blow; don’t spare me, make it home.

“Good! Good again!”

Martino then struck Onion on the head with a cudgel.

“Why, how are you now, Peter Onion?” Sebastian asked.

“Godso, Onion has caught a bruise,” Valentine said.

Juniper said, “Coraggio! Courage! Don’t be capricious. What?”

“Capricious?” Onion said. “Not I. I scorn to be capricious for a scratch. Martino must have another bout with me. Come!”

Onion was bleeding from his wound, and so Valentine, Sebastian, and Balthasar said, “No! No! Play no more! Play no more!”

Bleeding, Onion said, “Bah, it’s nothing, a fillip, a trifle, a lucky blow. Fellow Juniper, please, get me a plantain. I had much rather play with one who had skill.”

Plantains were broad leaves that were used to stop bleeding.

“By my truth, fellow Onion, it was against my will for me to hurt you,” Martino said.

“Nay, that’s not so,” Onion said. “It was against my head. But come, we’ll have one bout more.”

“Not a bout, not even a stroke,” Juniper said.

All except Onion said, “No more! No more!”

Martino exited.

Juniper said, “Why, I’ll give you a demonstration of how the injury came about.”

In demonstrating how the injury occurred, Juniper used fencing terms and pretended the cudgels were swords and daggers. Fencers used a rapier to attack and a dagger to ward off attacks.

Juniper said to Onion, “Thou opened the dagger to falsify over with the back sword trick, and he interrupted before he could fall to the close.”

Onion replied, “No, no, I know best how it was, better than any man here. I felt his play presently, for, look here” — he demonstrated — “I gathered my strength upon him thus, thus — do you see? — for the double lock and took it single on the head.”

“Double lock” means “with both hilts”: the hilt of the sword and the hilt of the dagger.

“He says very truly,” Valentine said. “He took it single on the head.”

Onion was hit once on his head with the cudgel.

“Come, let’s go,” Sebastian said.

Martino returned with a cobweb and said, “Here, fellow Onion, here’s a cobweb.”

In this society, people used cobwebs to stop bleeding.

“What, a cobweb, Martino?” Onion said. “I will have another bout of fighting with you. By God’s wounds, do you first break my head and then give me a plaster — a bandage — in scorn? Come to it, I will have a bout of fighting with you.”

Martino said, “God’s my witness —”

“Tut, your witness cannot serve,” Onion said.

Juniper said, “By God’s blood, why, what, thou aren’t lunatic, are thou? If thou are lunatic, get thee gone, Mephistopheles!”

In this society, lunatics were thought to be possessed by evil spirits, and so Juniper was pretending to exorcize Onion.

Juniper continued, "Say the sign should be in Aries now, as it may be for all of us, where were your life? Answer me that."

Aries the Ram is a sign of the Zodiac.

"He says well, Onion," Sebastian said.

"Aye, indeed, he does," Valentine said.

Juniper said to Onion, "Come, come, you are a foolish naturalist [natural, aka fool]. Go, get a white of an egg and a little flax, and close the breach of the head. It is the most conducive [conducive] thing that can be."

He then said, "Martino, do not insinuate [presume] upon your good fortune, but play an honest part and carry away the bucklers."

"To carry away the bucklers" means "To come off as a winner."

Martino picked up the cudgels, and all exited.

ACT 3 (The Case is Altered)

— 3.1 —

Alone, Angelo said to himself:

“My young and naïve friend, Paolo Ferneze, bound me with mighty, solemn conjurations and oaths to be true to him in his love to Rachel and to solicit the remembrance of him always in his forced absence. That is, he wants me to keep his memory alive in Rachel’s mind! That’s likely to happen, indeed! True to my friend in cases of affection?”

The word “case” can mean female genitals.

Angelo continued:

“In women’s cases? What a jest it is! How silly he is who imagines it! Any man is an ass who will keep his promises strictly in anything that checks and hinders his private pleasure, chiefly in love.

“By God’s blood, am I not a man? Haven’t I eyes that are free to look, and blood to be inflamed, as well as his? And when it is so, shall I not pursue my own love’s longings, but promote my friend’s love longings instead?

“Aye, he is a good fool who would do that. Do so, go ahead and hang me then, because I swore to protect his interest in Rachel.

“Alas, who does not know that lovers’ perjuries are ridiculous?”

A proverb stated, “Jove laughs at lovers’ perjuries.”

Angelo continued:

“Have at thee, Rachel!”

“Have at thee” meant “Get ready for an attack” — or, in this case, “Get ready for an ‘attack.’”

Angelo continued:

“I’ll go court her for sure, for now I know her father is abroad and out of the house.”

Jaques entered the scene.

Angelo said to himself, “By God’s blood! Look, he is here. Oh, what damned luck this is! This labor’s lost. I must by no means see him.”

He exited the scene, singing the nonsense syllables, “Tau, dery, dery.”

Or perhaps the syllables meant “Taw-dry, —dry.” Some of Angelo’s thoughts were tawdry indeed.

— 3.2 —

Alone, Jaques said to himself:

“Mischief and hell! What is this man, a spirit? Does he haunt my house’s ghost? Always at my door? He has been at my door; he has been in, in my dear door. I pray to God that my gold is safe!”

Jaques had earlier seen Paolo Ferneze and Angelo near his door.

Christophero entered the scene.

Jaques said, “God’s pity, here’s another!”

He called to his daughter, “Rachel! Ho, Rachel!”

Christophero walked up to him and said, “May God save you, honest father.”

Jaques again called to his daughter, “Rachel! By God’s light, come to me! Rachel, Rachel!”

He exited into his house.

“Now in God’s name, what is ailing him?” Christophero said. “This is strange! He loves his daughter so, I’ll wager my life, that he’s afraid, having been now abroad, that I come to seek her love unlawfully.”

Jaques re-entered the scene after checking on his gold at home and said, “It’s safe! It’s safe. They have not robbed my treasure.”

Christophero said, “Don’t let it seem offensive to you, sir —”

Jaques said to himself, “‘Sir’? God’s my life! ‘Sir,’ ‘sir,’ does he call me ‘sir’?”

“Good father, listen to me,” Christophero said.

“You are ’most welcome, sir,” Jaques said.

He said to himself, “I meant ‘almost.’”

He then said out loud, “And does Your Worship want to speak to me? Would you abase yourself by speaking to me?”

“It is not abasing, father,” Christophero said. “My intent is to do further honor to you, sir, than only speak to you. I want to be your son-in-law.”

Jaques said to himself, “My gold is in his nostrils! He has smelt it. Break, breast! Break, heart! Fall on the earth, my entrails, with this same bursting astonishment! He knows about my gold; he knows about all my treasure.”

He then said out loud, “How do you know, sir? Whereby do you guess?”

“Guess at what, sir?” Christophero asked. “What do you mean?”

Jaques said, “I ask, if it please Your gentle Worship, how you know — I mean, how I should make Your Worship know — that I have nothing — to give with my poor daughter? I have nothing. The very air, bounteous to every man, is scanty to me, sir.”

“I do think, good father, you are just poor,” Christophero said.

Jaques said to himself, “He thinks so. Listen! He just ‘do think’ so! He does not think so; he knows about all my treasure.”

He went inside his house to check on his treasure and see if it was still safe.

Alone, Christophero said to himself, “Poor man, he is so overjoyed to hear that his daughter may be better bestowed than he had hoped that between fear and hope, if I mean honestly, he is thus passionate.”

Christophero thought that a marriage between Rachel and him was a much better marriage for Rachel than her father, Jaques, could have hoped for.

Jaques returned, saying to himself, “Still, all is safe within. Is no one outside? Nobody is breaking down my walls?”

“What do you say, father?” Christophero asked. “Shall I have your daughter? Do you agree to let me marry her?”

“I have no dowry to bestow upon her,” Jaques said.

“I don’t expect one, father,” Christophero said.

“That is well,” Jaques said. “Then I ask Your Worship to make no question of that which you wish for. You can marry my daughter. It is too much favor to me — it is more than I deserve.”

Christophero said to himself, “I’ll leave him now to give his passions a chance to breathe and calm down. Once his emotions are settled down, I will fetch his daughter. I shall but excite his emotions too much if I speak to him now.”

Christophero exited.

Jaques said:

“So, he’s gone.

“I wish that all were dead and gone,

“So that I might live with my dear gold alone!”

— 3.3 —

Count Ferneze entered the scene.

Seeing Jaques, he said, “Here is the poor old man.”

Seeing Count Ferneze, Jaques said to himself, “Bah, on my soul, another! Is he coming here?”

“Be not dismayed, old man,” Count Ferneze said. “I come to cheer you.”

Jaques said to himself, “He is coming to me, by heaven! Turn ribs to brass, turn voice into a trumpet to rattle out the battles of my thoughts! One comes to hold me in talk, while the other robs me.”

He went inside his house to check on his treasure and see if it was still safe.

Count Ferneze said, “He has forgotten who I am, surely. What should this mean? He fears that my authority and my lack of a wife will take his daughter from him to defame her and ruin her reputation. He who has nothing on earth but one poor daughter may make this frenzy of care to keep her.”

Of course, Count Ferneze wanted to marry Rachel, but Jaques did not know that.

Jaques returned and said, “And yet, it is safe. They intend not to use force but to use fawning, coming here to flatter me. I shall easily know by his next question if he thinks that I am rich.”

He then said out loud, “Whom do I see? My good lord!”

He knelt before Count Ferneze.

“Stand up, good father,” Count Ferneze said.

Jaques stood up.

Count Ferneze said, “I don’t call thee father because of thy age but because I gladly wish to be thy son-in-law, in honorable marriage with thy beauteous daughter.”

Jaques said to himself, “Oh, so, so, so, so, so, this is for gold! Now it is sure. My daughter’s neatness makes them believe that I am rich.”

Rachel was well dressed.

Jaques said out loud, “No, my good lord, I’ll tell you all, how my poor, hapless daughter got that attire she wears from top to toe.”

“Why, father, this is nothing,” Count Ferneze said. “That doesn’t matter.”

“Oh, yes, it does, my good lord,” Jaques said.

“Indeed, it does not,” Count Ferneze said.

“Nay, sweet lord, pardon me,” Jaques said. “Do not pretend it doesn’t matter. Hear your poor beadsman speak.”

A beadsman recites prayers for a patron, counting the prayers on rosary beads. Here, Jaques meant that he was a humble servant to the Count.

Jaques continued, “It is requisite that I, so entirely a beggar, account for things that surpass my calling.”

If he were a beggar, then why was his daughter dressed so well?

Jaques said:

“She was born to enjoy nothing underneath the sun except the sun. If she had more than other beggars, she would be envied. I will tell you, then, how she acquired all she wears.

“Her warm shoes, God knows, a kind maiden gave her, seeing her go barefoot on a cold, frosty morning, may God reward the kind maiden!

“Her homely stockings —”

Count Ferneze said:

“Father, I’ll hear no more. Thou explain too much with thy too particular answer for thy daughter, who deserves a thousand times as much.

“I’ll be thy son-in-law, and she shall wear the attire of countesses.”

“Oh, my good lord, don’t mock the poor,” Jaques said. “Doesn’t Your Lordship remember that poverty is the precious gift of God, as well as riches?”

Mathew 5:3 states, “Blessed are the poor in spirit: for their’s is the kingdom of heaven” (King James Version).

He knelt and said, “Tread upon me rather than mock my poorness.”

“Rise, I say,” Count Ferneze said. “When I mock poverty, may the heavens then make me poor!”

Jaques stood up.

— 3.4 —

Nuntius, a messenger, entered the scene.

Nuntius said to himself, “See, here’s the Count Ferneze. I will tell him about the hapless accident and bad luck of his brave son, so that he may seek the sooner to ransom him.”

Jaques exited.

Nuntius said to Count Ferneze, “God save Your Lordship!”

“You are very welcome, sir,” Count Ferneze said.

“I wish I brought such news as might deserve such a welcome,” Nuntius said.

“What! Do you bring me ill news?” Count Ferneze asked.

“It is ill news, my lord, yet it is such news as the usual chance of war affords, and for which all men are prepared who engage in it, and those who do not engage in it, except in the persons of their friends, or in their children,” Nuntius said.

A proverb stated, “The chance of war is uncertain.”

People who engage in war can be victorious, defeated, killed, maimed, or taken prisoner.

“Ill news about my son?” Count Ferneze said. “My dear and only son, I’ll lay my soul. Aye, me, I am curst! The thought of his death wounds me, and the report of it will kill me quite.”

“Aye, me” is an expression of mourning.

“It is not so ill, my lord,” Nuntius said.

“What is the news, then?” Count Ferneze asked.

“He has been taken prisoner, and that’s all,” Nuntius said.

Count Ferneze said:

“That’s enough, enough.

“I set my thoughts on love, on servile love, and forget my virtuous wife.

“I don’t feel the dangers, the bonds and wounds of my own flesh and blood, and therein I am a madman, therein I am plagued with the most just affliction under heaven.”

He felt guilty because he had been thinking about getting married and had not been thinking about the danger that his son was in because his son was a soldier.

Count Ferneze asked, “Has Maximilian been taken prisoner, too?”

“Nay, my good lord, he has returned with prisoners,” Nuntius said.

“Is it possible?” Count Ferneze said. “Can Maximilian return and view my face without my son, for whom he swore to take such care as for himself?”

“My lord, no amount of care and concern can change the events of war,” Nuntius said.

Count Ferneze said:

“Oh, in what tempests do my fortunes sail, still wracked and ruined with winds more foul and contrary than any northern gust or southern squall that ever yet enforced the sea to gape open and swallow the poor merchant’s merchandise up!

“First, in Vicenza I lost my first son.

“Next, here in Milan, I lost my most dear and loved lady, my wife.

“And now, my Paolo, prisoner to the French, which last, being printed with my other griefs, makes so huge a volume that my breast cannot contain them.

“But this is my love: I gave my love to Rachel and not to my son! Heaven has thrown this vengeance on me most deservedly, even if it were for nothing but the wronging of my steward.”

Count Ferneze had wished to wrong his steward, Christophero, by marrying Rachel after giving Christophero permission to marry her.

“My lord, since money — just money — may redress the worst of this misfortune, don’t be grieved,” Nuntius said. “Prepare his ransom, and your noble son shall greet your cheered eyes with the more honor.”

His was a problem that could be solved with money, and many other things are more valuable than money.

The larger the ransom, the more honor because the ransom showed how highly the prisoner was valued.

“I will prepare his ransom,” Count Ferneze said. “Gracious heaven, grant his imprisonment may be his worst fate — honored and soldier-like imprisonment — and that he is not manacled and made a drudge to his proud foe! And here I vow never to dream of unseemly, shameful amorous toys, nor aim at other joy on earth except the fruition of my only son: the pleasure of getting my son back safely.”

They exited.

Jaques came out of his house. He was carrying his gold and a scuttle — a container — full of horse dung.

Not seeing Count Ferneze, Jaques said:

“He’s gone. I knew it. This is our hot lover!

“I will believe them, aye. They may come in like simple wooers and be arrant thieves, and I would not know them. What servile villainies men will do for gold is not to be told.”

Referring to his gold, he said:

“Oh, it began to have a huge, strong smell, which, lying so long together in a place, I’ll give it ventilation.”

It must have acquired a huge, strong smell because Paolo Ferneze, Angelo, Christophero, and now Count Ferneze had been coming around his house. They must have smelled the gold.

Jaques continued:

“It shall have trick enough, and if the devil, which envies and is jealous of all goodness, has told them about my gold and where I kept it, I’ll set his burning nose once more to work, to smell where I removed it.”

He uncovered his gold and said, “Here it is! I’ll hide it and cover it with this horse dung.”

He buried his gold and covered it with horse dung.

Jaques continued:

“Who will suppose that such a precious nest is crowned with such a dunghill full of excrement?”

He now referred to his gold as if it were a child of his:

“Go in, my dear life. Sleep sweetly, my dear child, scarcely lawfully begotten, but yet gotten, and that’s enough.

“Rot, all hands that come near thee, except my own!

“Burn out, all eyes that see thee, except my own!

“All thoughts of thee be poison to their enamored hearts, except my own!”

He now referred to his gold as it were his ruler:

“I’ll take no leave, sweet prince, great emperor, but see thee every minute, king of kings.

“I’ll not be rude to thee and turn my back in going from thee, but go backward out, with my face toward thee, with humble curtsies.

“No one is within. No one overlooks my wall.

“To have gold and to have it safe, is all.”

As he exited, he kept facing and bowing to his gold.

ACT 4 (The Case is Altered)

— 4.1 —

Maximilian, Chamont (who had taken the identity of Gaspar), Gaspar (who had taken the identity of Chamont), and Pacue entered the scene. Some soldiers attending Maximilian also arrived.

Chamont and Gaspar were Maximilian's prisoners of war. They had exchanged identities because Chamont was a general, Chamont and Gaspar were friends, and Gaspar wanted to protect Chamont in case generals were not well treated. They had exchanged clothing so that Gaspar was dressed like a French general.

Pacue was a comic character, a boy who was likely to reveal Chamont's and Gaspar's identities through carelessness.

Maximilian said to Gaspar, who had taken the identity of Chamont, "Lord Chamont, and your valiant friend there, I cannot say 'welcome' to Milan. Your thoughts and that word are not musical and are not in harmony. But I can say you have come to Milan."

Pacue said, "Mort Dieu!"

[By God's death!]

He was laughing because Maximilian did not know his prisoners' true identities.

Wanting Pacue to be quiet, Chamont (disguised as Gaspar) said sharply, "Garçon!"

The French word means, "Boy!"

Maximilian said, "Gentlemen — I would call an emperor so — you are now my prisoners. I am sorry. By the Virgin Mary, I say this: Spit in the face of your fortunes, for your treatment shall be honorable."

He would treat his prisoners well.

Count Ferneze had prayed for the French to treat Paolo, his son who had been taken prisoner, well.

Gaspar (disguised as Chamont) said, “We know it, Signor Maximilian. The fame and reputation of all your actions sounds nothing else but perfect honor from Honor’s swelling cheeks.”

The artistic personification of Honor blows a trumpet to proclaim itself.

Maximilian had a reputation for behaving honorably.

“It shall do so still, I assure you, and I will give you reason why,” Maximilian said. “There is in this last battle, you know, a noble gentleman of our party and a truly valiant, semblably — similar to you — prisoner to your general as your honored selves to me, for whose safety this tongue has given warrant to his honorable father, the Count Ferneze.”

Who is “your general”? Chamont, whom Maximilian thought he was talking to (but he was actually talking to Gaspar), was a French general, but he had been captured. Paolo was now in the custody of another French general.

Because Paolo Ferneze had been taken prisoner, he was in a similar position as Maximilian’s two prisoners. Maximilian wanted Paolo to be treated well, and so out of empathy (and, no doubt, honor), he would treat his two prisoners well.

Maximilian asked, “Do you understand me?”

“Aye, signor,” Gaspar (disguised as Chamont) said.

“Well, then I must tell you, your ransoms will be to redeem him,” Maximilian said. “What do you think? What is your answer?”

The two men would be traded for Paolo Ferneze: Two men would be the ransom for one man.

Chamont (disguised as Gaspar) replied:

“By the Virgin Mary, with my lord’s leave here, I say, signor, this free and ample offer you have made agrees well with your honor, but not ours, for I don’t think other than that Chamont is as well born as is Ferneze. Then, if I am not mistaken, he scorns to have his worth so underprized that it should need an adjunct — an extra person — in exchange of any equal fortune.”

He was objecting that Chamont was so valuable a prisoner that he ought to be exchanged for Paolo: one man ought to be exchanged for one man. To add Gaspar to the ransom would be to undervalue Chamont. It would insult Chamont.

“Noble signor, I am a soldier and I love Chamont. Before I would bruise his reputation with the least ruin of my own reputation in this vile kind, these legs should rot with irons, this body pine in prison until the flesh dropped from my bones in flakes like withered leaves, in the heart of autumn, from a stubborn oak.”

If Gaspar (disguised as Chamont) were exchanged for Paolo, that would leave the real Chamont a prisoner. He, however, would not be mistreated.

Maximilian said to Chamont (disguised as Gaspar), “Monsieur Gaspar — I take it that Gaspar is your name — don’t misunderstand me. I will trample on the heart, on the soul of him who shall say I will wrong you. What I purpose you cannot now know, but you shall know, and, doubt not, to your contentment.”

Maximilian would treat Chamont (disguised as Gaspar) well.

Maximilian then said to Gaspar (disguised as Chamont), “Lord Chamont, I will leave you. While I go in and present myself to the honorable count, until my return, so please you, your noble feet may measure this private, pleasant, and most princely walk.”

He then ordered, “Soldiers, watch them and respect them.”

Maximilian exited, and the soldiers guarded the prisoners. The soldiers were close to the prisoners but not so close that they could overhear their conversation.

Pacue said with a heavy French accent, “Oh, ver’ bon! [very good!] Excellenta gull [fool]! He take-a my Lord Chamont for Monsieur Gaspra and Monsieur Gaspra for my Lord Chamont! Oh, dis be excellent for make-a me laugha. Ha, ha, ha. Oh, my heart tickle-a!”

Gaspar (disguised as Chamont) said to Chamont (disguised as Gaspar):

“Aye, but Your Lordship does not know what hard fate might have pursued us; therefore, howsoever, the exchanging of our names was necessary, and we must now be careful to maintain this error strongly, which our own trick has thrust into their ignorant understandings.

“For should we, on the promise of this good fortune, appear again as ourselves — our real selves — it would both create in them a kind of anger and, perhaps, invert those honorable courses they intend.”

They needed to remain in disguise lest Maximilian become angry and treat them badly.

Chamont (disguised as Gaspar) said:

“True, my dear Gaspar, but this hang-by — this hanger-on, this Pacue — here will at one time or other, on my soul, reveal us and our trick.

“A secret in his mouth is like a wild bird put into a cage, whose door no sooner opens but it is out.”

He then said to Pacue, “But, sirrah, if I just learn thou have uttered this secret —” “Uttera vat [what], Monsieur?” Pacue asked.

“That he is Gaspar and I am truly Chamont,” Chamont (disguised as Gaspar) said.

“Oh, pardonnez-moi, ’fore my tongue shall put out de secreta, shall breed de cankra [canker, open sore] in my mouth!” Pacue said.

“Don’t speak so loudly, Pacue!” Chamont (disguised as Gaspar) said.

“Faugh, you shall not hear de fool, for all your long ear [long ears],” Pacue said to the soldiers, but so quietly that they could not hear him. The long ears were asses’ ears.

He then said to Gaspar (disguised as Chamont), “Regard [Look], monsieur, you be de Chamont, Chamont be Gaspra.”

— 4.2 —

Count Ferneze, Maximilian, Francisco, Aurelia, Phoenixella, and Finio entered the scene. Finio was Francisco Colonna’s young Italian page.

Chamont (disguised as Gaspar) and Gaspar (disguised as Chamont) talked together quietly, apart from the others.

“Quiet, here comes Maximilian,” Chamont (disguised as Gaspar) said.

“Oh, it’s likely that old man is the Count Ferneze,” Gaspar (disguised as Chamont) said.

“Are those his daughters, do you think?” Chamont (disguised as Gaspar) asked.

“Aye, to be sure, I think they are,” Gaspar (disguised as Chamont) said.

“Fore God, the taller is a gallant lady,” Chamont (disguised as Gaspar) said.

The taller lady was Aurelia.

“Both ladies are gallant, believe me,” Gaspar (disguised as Chamont) said.

Maximilian pointed to Gaspar (disguised as Chamont), and said to Count Ferneze, “Truly, my honorable lord, Chamont was the father of this man.”

The elder Chamont had surprised Vicenza in 1510. His son bore his name: Lord Chamont, the friend of Gaspar.

“Oh, that may be, for when I lost my son, this man was but young, it seems,” Count Ferneze said.

“This man” was Gaspar (disguised as Chamont).

“Indeed, had Camillo lived, he would have been about the same age as this man, my lord,” Francisco Colonna said.

Camillo was Count Ferneze’s long-lost son.

“He would have been, indeed,” Count Ferneze said. “Well, speak no more of him.”

Maximilian said to Francisco Colonna, “Signor, perceive you the error? It was no good office in us to stretch the remembrance of so dear a loss.”

He then said, “Count Ferneze, let summer sit in your eye. Let there be no clouds or rain — let there be no tears. Look cheerfully, sweet count. Will you do me the honor to confine this noble spirit within the circle of your arms?”

Would he hug “this noble spirit”?

The noble spirit was Gaspar (disguised as Chamont).

Chamont was the son of the man who had surprised Vicenza, causing a battle in which Count Ferneze had lost his son.

Count Ferneze was unwilling to hug “this noble spirit,” but he did say, “Honored Chamont, reach me your valiant hand.”

He and Gaspar (disguised as Chamont), shook hands.

Count Ferneze then said:

“I could have wished some happier occurrence had introduced us to each other and had made the way to this mutual knowledge and acquaintanceship we each have with the other, but surely it is the pleasure of our fates that we should thus be wrecked on Fortune’s wheel.

“Let us prepare with steeled and settled patience to tread on Fortune’s torment, and, with minds confirmed, welcome the worst of the malice of Lady Fortune.”

Count Ferneze had suffered the loss of his son, and Gaspar (disguised as Chamont) had suffered being taken prisoner. Count Ferneze was recommending that they both stoically endure their fates.

Maximilian said to Count Ferneze: “Noble lord, this is the situation.”

He gestured toward Chamont (disguised as Gaspar) and said, “I have here, in my honor, set this gentleman free without ransom. He is now himself the master of his own destiny; his valor has deserved it, in the eye of my judgment.”

He then said to Chamont disguised as Gaspar, “Monsieur Gaspar, you are dear to me. Fortuna non mutat genus.”

The Latin proverb was “Fortune does not change kind.”

In other words: Good fortune does not change a bad man, who will remain bad. And bad fortune will not change a good man, who will remain good. Also, a nobly born man or woman will remain noble, despite his or her fortune/luck.

The proverb may not always be true, but events will show that the real Gaspar was and is a good man; the bad fortune in his past has not changed him.

Maximilian then said, “But let’s get to the main point.”

He said to Gaspar (disguised as Chamont), “If it may square with Your Lordship’s liking and his love, I could desire that he [Chamont disguised as Gaspar] were now immediately employed to go to your noble general and propose the exchange of Paolo Ferneze for yourself [Gaspar disguised as Chamont]. It is a business that requires the tender hand of a friend.”

Count Ferneze said, “Aye, and it would be with more speed effected if he would undertake it.”

“That is true, my lord,” Maximilian said.

He then said to Chamont (disguised as Gaspar), “Monsieur Gaspar, how stand you disposed to this motion? Do you agree with it?”

Chamont (disguised as Gaspar) replied, “My duty must attend His Lordship’s will.”

Maximilian then asked Gaspar (disguised as Chamont), “What does the Lord Chamont say?”

Gaspar (disguised as Chamont) replied, “My will then approves what these have urged. I agree with this proposal.”

Maximilian said, “Why, there is good harmony, good music, in this.”

He then said to Chamont (disguised as Gaspar), “Monsieur Gaspar, you shall waste no time. Only, I will give you a bowl of rich wine to the health of your general, another to the success of your journey, and a third to the love of my sword.”

They would drink together.

Maximilian then ordered, “Pass!”

“Pass” was an order for the soldiers to leave, too.

Everyone except Aurelia and Phoenixella exited.

Aurelia said:

“Why, how are you now, sister? In a motley muse?”

A motley muse is a variegated mood, one in which conflicting emotions exist.

Aurelia continued:

“Come on, there’s something in the wind — there’s something happening, I see. Indeed, this brown study — this reverie — suits not with your black.”

A brown study is a reverie; it occurs when someone is absorbed in his or her thoughts.

“Your clothing and your thoughts are of two colors.”

Her clothing was black, but her mood was light.

Phoenixella replied, “In good faith, I think that this young Lord Chamont [Gaspar, disguised as Chamont] resembles my mother. Sister, doesn’t he resemble our mother?”

“That is a motherly fancy and opinion,” Aurelia said. “Oh, blind excuse, blinder than Love himself!”

Aurelia believed that her sister had fallen in love.

Love, aka Cupid, is depicted blindfolded.

Aurelia continued, “Well, sister, well, Cupid has taken his stand in both your eyes — you have fallen in love. The case is altered.”

“The case is altered” means “The situation has changed.”

“And what of that?” Phoenixella asked.

Aurelia said, “Nay, nothing but a saint, another Bridget, one who for a face, aka reputation, would put down Vesta, in whose looks swim the very sweetest cream of modesty. And now are you to turn tippet?”

Saint Bridget of Ireland refused to marry, and she lived in a religious cell. In doing so, she did not follow Vesta, goddess of the hearth. The hearth is the center of family life.

A “tippet” is a garment. “To turn tippet” was then-current slang for “to change one’s behavior.” In a bad sense, a turn-tippet is a turncoat or renegade.

Phoenixella had been mourning and refusing to feel pleasure, but now she was falling in love.

Aurelia then said, “Ha, ha. Will you give a packing-penny to virginity?”

A penny was a gift given to someone whose presence was unwanted, such as a beggar. They were given a penny so they would pack off.

Aurelia continued, “I thought you’d dwell so long in Cyprus isle that you’d worship Madam Venus eventually.”

Phoenixella had been wearing the mourning fabric called cypress for a long time, and now Aurelia was joking that she had finally started to worship the goddess of sexual love: Venus, who was born on the island of Cyprus.

Aurelia said, “But, come, the strongest fall, and why not you?”

Phoenixella frowned and Aurelia said, “Nay, do not frown.”

“Bah, you fool, adieu,” Phoenixella said.

She exited.

Alone, Aurelia said to herself:

“Well, I may jest or so, but Cupid knows that my falling in love is as bad or worse than hers.

“Oh, Monsieur Gaspar [Chamont (disguised as Gaspar)], if thou are a man, don’t be afraid to court me! Do but speak. Challenge thy right and wear it, for I swear, until thou arrived, never came affection here.”

She wanted Chamont (disguised as Gaspar) to pursue her.

— 4.3 —

Pacue and Finio talked together. Pacue was Chamont’s French page, and Finio was Francisco Colonna’s Italian page. Both were comic characters, and both were boys.

Finio said, “Come on, my sweet, finical Pacue, the very prime — the first — of pages, here’s an excellent place for us to practice in. Nobody sees us here. Come, let’s get to it.”

They were going to practice courtly etiquette: hand-kissing, deep bowing, the saying of formulaic protestations, and so on. Their gestures shall not be described in any kind of detail; some of them perhaps ought not to be done in public.

Onion entered the scene.

Pacue replied to Finio, “Contenta. Regardez, vous le premier.”

[I am content with that. Look, you go first.]

“Sirrah Finio!” Onion said.

“Mort Dieu, le pesant,” Pacue said.

[My God, I am weighing it — I am considering my answer.]

“Did thou see Valentine?” Onion asked.

“Valentine?” Finio said. “No.”

“No?” Onion said.

He started to leave.

“No,” Finio said. “Sirrah Onion, where are you going?”

“Oh, I am vexed!” Onion said. “He who would trust any of these lying travelers —”

Travelers frequently told outrageous lies about their travels.

Finio interrupted, “— please, stay, good Onion.”

Pacue said, “Monsieur Onion, venez ça, come hidera, je vous prie [come here, come hither, I beg you]. By gar [By God], me ha’ see [I have seen] two, tree, four hundra tousand [hundred thousand] of your cousin hang. “

Onions for sale were strung on a rope in the marketplace. (And some people named Onion were occasionally hung as punishment for their crimes.)

Pacue continued, “Lend me your hand; shall pray for know you bettra.”

[Shake hands with me. I desire to know you better].

Onion shook his hand and replied, "I thank you, good Signor Parlez-vous."

He then said quietly to himself, "Oh, that I were in another world, in the Indies or somewhere, so that I might have room to laugh!"

Overhearing Onion, Pacue said, "Ah, oui, fort bien."

[Ah, yes, very well.]

He then said to Finio, "Stand. You be dere now; me will come to you. Bonjour, monsieur."

Pacue and Finio now practiced one form of greeting each other.

They embraced each other under the arm.

"Good morrow, good signor," Finio said.

Pacue replied, "By gar, be mush glad for see you."

[By God, I am very glad to see you.]

"I return you most kind thanks, sir," Finio said.

Amused by their practicing courtly etiquette, Onion said to himself, "What! What! By God's blood, this is rare!"

Overhearing Onion, Pacue said, "Nay, shall make you say 'rare' by and by."

"Rare" can mean "splendid."

Pacue and Finio now practiced another form of greeting each other.

They embraced each other over the shoulder: one arm over the other's shoulder, and one arm under the other's shoulder.

Pacue said, "Regard [Look], Monsieur Finio."

“Signor Pacue!” Finio said,

“Dieu vous garde [God save you], monsieur,” Pacue said,

“God save you, sweet signor,” Finio replied.

Pacue then asked, “Monsieur Onion, is it not fort bien [very good]?”

Onion misheard bien as “bean.”

Onion said, “‘Bean,’ said he? I wish that I were in debt of a pottle of beans; I could do as much.”

A pottle is two quarts.

For two quarts of beans — enough to pay off the debt — Onion would act as Finio and Pacue were acting.

“Welcome, signor,” Finio said. “What’s next?”

What was the next form of greeting they would practice?

Pacue replied, “Oh, here, vois de grand admiration, as should meet perchance, Monsieur Finio!”

[Oh, here, see the grand admiration, if we should meet by chance, Monsieur Finio!]

Pacue performed an exaggerated act of courtesy, one that Onion would soon comment on.

Finio bowed back and said, “Monsieur Pacue!”

Pacue said, “Jesu! By gar, who think we shall meet here?”

[Jesus! By God, who would have thought that we two would meet here?]

“By this hand, I am not a little proud of it, sir,” Finio said.

Onion said, “This trick is only for the chamber; it cannot be cleanly done in public.”

Some acts of etiquette, such as embracing someone's knees, are more intimate than others.

Pacue said, "Well, what say you for dis, den, Monsieur?"

He demonstrated a courteous gesture.

"Nay, please, sir," Finio said.

"Par ma foi, vous bien encounters!" Pacue said.

[By my faith, you are good at encounters!]

"What do you mean, sir?" Finio said. "Let your glove alone."

Pacue had used the glove in the greeting.

"Comment se porte la santé?" Pacue said.

[How is your health?]

"Indeed, exceeding well, sir," Finio said.

"Trot, be mush joy for hear," Pacue said.

[Truly, it gives me much joy to hear that.]

"And how is it with you, sweet Signor Pacue?" Finio asked.

"Fait, comme vous voyez," Pacue answered.

[Truly, it is as you can see.]

Onion said, "Young gentlemen, spirits of blood [gentlemen of courage and breeding], if ever you'll taste of a sweet piece of mutton, do Onion a good turn now."

Mutton means both 1) a kind of food, and 2) a sexually available woman.

Pacue asked, "Quoi? Quoi? Parlez, monsieur, what is it?"

[What? What? Speak, monsieur, what is it?]

“Indeed, teach me one of these tricks,” Onion requested.

He wanted to learn one of their greetings even though he was not in debt for a pottle of beans..

Pacue answered, “Oh, me shall do presently. Stand you dere; you signor, dere; myself is here. So, fort bien [very good]. Now I parle to Monsieur Onion, Onion parle to you, you speaka to me, so, and as you parle, change the bonnet [remove your hat], Monsieur Onion.”

Parle meant “speak.”

They greeted one another with comically extravagant gestures.

“Monsieur Finio!” Onion said.

“Monsieur Pacue!” Finio said.

“Pray, be covera,” Pacue said.

[Please, put your hat back on.]

“Nay, I beseech you, sir,” Onion said.

“What do you mean?” Finio asked.

“Pardon-moi, shall be so,” Pacue said.

“Oh, God, sir,” Onion said.

“Not I, in good faith, sir,” Finio said.

“By gar, you must,” Pacue said.

Onion said to Pacue, “It shall be as you wish.”

Pacue and Finio had been arguing about whether Onion should or should not wear his hat. Pacue wanted him to wear his hat; Finio did not.

Onion had agreed to wear his hat.

“Nay, then, you wrong me,” Finio said.

Onion said, “Well, if ever I come to be great —”

Some people rise and become great men.

Pacue interrupted, “— you be big enough for de Onion already.”

“I mean a great man,” Onion said.

“Then thou would be a monster,” Finio said.

Onion said:

“Well, God doesn’t know what fortune may do.

“Command me; use me from the sole to the crown and the crown to the sole, meaning not only from the crown of the head and the sole of the foot, but also the foot of the mind and the crowns of the purse.”

Presumably the “foot of the mind” has a sole, or soul.

Onion continued:

“I cannot stay now, young gentlemen, but — time was, time is, and time shall be.”

They exited.

— 4.4 —

Chamont (disguised as Gaspar) and Gasper (disguised as Chamont) talked together. Chamont, a free man, was leaving, while Gaspar, a prisoner, was staying. Chamont was going to arrange a prisoner exchange that would free Gaspar. They were talking privately with no one around to overhear them.

Chamont said:

“Sweet Gaspar, I am sorry we must part, but strong necessity forces it to happen.

“Don’t let the time seem long to you, my friend, until my return, for I swear by our love — the sacred sphere wherein our souls are knit — I will endeavor to effect this business of the prisoner exchange with all industrious care and happy speed.”

Gaspar replied, “My lord, these declarations would come well to one less capable of deserving your favor than I, in whom your merit is confirmed with such authentic and grounded proofs.”

“Well, I will use up no more time. Gaspar, adieu,” Chamont said.

“Farewell, my honored lord,” Gaspar said.

“Commend me to the lady, Aurelia, my good Gaspar,” Chamont said.

“I would have remembered that, even if you had not,” Gaspar said.

“Once more, adieu, sweet Gaspar,” Chamont said.

“My good lord!” Gaspar said.

Gaspar exited.

Chamont said:

“Thy virtues are more precious than thy name.”

Jasper is a precious gemstone.

Chamont continued:

“Kind gentleman! I would not sell thy love for all the earthly objects that my eyes have ever tasted. Surely, thou are nobly born, however fortune has obscured thy birth, for native honor sparkles in thine eyes.

“How may I bless the time wherein Chamont, my honored father, did surprise Vicenza, where this my friend, known by no name, was found, being then a child and scarcely able to speak, to whom my father gave this name of Gaspar, and my father considered Gaspar as his own until his — my father’s — death.

“Since that time we two have shared our mutual fortunes with equal spirits and, except for death’s rude hand, no violence shall dissolve this sacred bond.”

Gaspar was a gentleman by nature. Was he also a gentleman by birth?

— 4.5 —

Juniper was in his cobbler’s shop, singing. Onion walked over to him.

Peter Onion said, “Fellow Juniper, no more of thy songs and sonnets, sweet Juniper, no more of thy hymns and madrigals. Thou sing, but I sigh.”

“What’s the matter, Peter, ha?” Juniper asked. “What, in an academy still, still in sable and costly black array, ha?”

University scholars wore black robes.

“Please, rise,” Onion said. “Mount, mount, sweet Juniper, for I go down the wind and yet I puff, for I am vexed.”

Juniper stood up, but part of Onion’s meaning was metaphorical.

“Down the wind” meant “in the direction of the wind.” Onion was being blown in a certain direction — toward Rachel — by Love.

“Ha, bully, vexed?” Juniper said. “What, intoxicate? Is thy brain in a quintessence, an idea, a metamorphosis, an apology?”

In other words, is your brain in a turmoil?

Juniper continued, “Ha, rogue? Come, this love feeds upon thee, I see by thy cheeks, and this love drinks healths of vermilion tears, I see by thine eyes.”

Onion’s cheeks were hollow, a sign of unrequited love. His eyes were red and teary.

“Healths” are “toasts.” So are “carouses.”

“I confess Cupid’s carouse,” Onion said. “He plays super negulum with my liquor of life.”

Super ungulem means “on the fingernail.” Drinkers would pour the last couple of drops on their left thumbnail to show that the cup was empty.

According to the Oxford English Dictionary, supernaculum means “to the last drop.” Cupid, aka Love, has drunk Onion’s vital life essence to the last drop.

“Tut, thou are a goose to be Cupid’s gull, aka fool,” Juniper said. “Bah, no more of these contemplations and calculations, thoughts and schemes. Don’t mourn, for Rachel’s thine own.”

“As for that, let the higher powers work,” Onion said. “But, sweet Juniper, I am not grieved on account of her, and yet I am grieved on account of her in a second person or, if not so, yet in a third.”

The “second person” would turn out to be Valentine, as Onion would soon make known.

“What! Second person?” Juniper said. “Away! Away! In the crotchets already? What’s the longitude and latitude? Where are you? What second, what person, huh?”

“Juniper, I’ll betray and expose myself before thee, for thy company is sweet to me,” Onion said, “but I must entreat thy helping hand in the case.”

Juniper replied, “Tut, no more of this surquedry — this arrogance and presumption. I am thine own, ad unguem [to the fingernail, aka to the end], upsy Friese, pell mell.”

“Upsy Friese” means the Frisian way of drinking deeply.

“Pell mell” means “in a disordered rush.”

Juniper then asked, “Come, what case, what case?”

“Case” can mean 1) female genitalia, 2) matter, and/or 3) a legal case.

“As for the case, it may be any man’s case as well as mine — Rachel, I mean — but I’ll meddle with her soon,” Onion said.

One meaning of “meddle with” is “have sex with.”

Onion continued, “In the meantime, Valentine is the man who has wronged me.”

“What! My ingle wrong thee?” Juniper said. “Is it possible?”

“Your ingle?” Onion said. “Hang him, infidel! Well, and if I am not revenged on him, let Peter Onion, by the infernal gods, be turned in to a leek or a scallion! I spoke to him about a ditty for this handkerchief.”

He had spoken to Valentine about writing a poesy to be embroidered on a handkerchief that would be given to Rachel as a gift.

“Why, hasn’t he done it?” Juniper asked.

“Done it?” Onion said. “Not a verse, I swear by this hand.”

“Oh, in diebus illis!” Juniper said.

In diebus illis is Latin for “in those days.” It basically means, “Once upon a time.”

Juniper continued:

“Oh, preposterous! Well, come, be blithe. The best inditer — writer — of them all is sometimes dull.

“Fellow Onion, pardon my ingle. He is a man, and he has imperfections and declinations as other men have. His muse sometimes cannot curvet nor prognosticate and come off, as it should.”

“Imperfectons” are faults.

By “declinations,” Juniper may have meant “instances of declining to do something.” In this case, it meant not keeping a promise.

“Curvet nor prognosticate” meant “dance nor prophesy.” In other words, Valentine’s muse sometimes takes the day off.

Juniper continued:

“No matter. I’ll hammer out a paraphrase for thee myself.”

He meant that he would write a short poesy for Onion.

“No, sweet Juniper, no,” Onion said. “Danger breeds delay; love makes me choleric. I can bear it no longer.”

The proverb actually is this: “Delay breeds danger.”

“Not bear what, my mad meridian slave, not bear what?” Juniper asked.

“Meridian” means “relating to noon,” when the sun is at its highest. Jupiter is using the word to mean “supreme.”

“I can’t bear Cupid’s burden, which is love,” Onion said. “It is too heavy, too tolerable [he meant ‘intolerable’]. And as for the handkerchief and the posey, I will not trouble thee. But if thou will go with me into her father’s backside, old Jaques’ backside, and speak for me to Rachel, I will not be ingratitude [be ungrateful]. The old man is abroad — out of his house — and all.”

“Backside” can mean “the backyard of the house.” You already know the other meaning.

“Are thou sure of it?” Juniper asked.

“As sure as a legal obligation,” Onion said.

“Let’s leave, then,” Juniper said. “Come, we spend time in a vain circumference [useless dilly-dallying]. Trade, I cashier [dismiss] thee until tomorrow. Fellow Onion, for thy sake I finish this workaday [workday].”

He was going to take the day off so he could help Onion.

Onion said, “God-a-mercy, thank you, and for thy sake I’ll at any time make a holiday and take a day off so I can help you.”

— 4.6 —

Angelo and Rachel talked together.

Angelo said, “Nay, I say to thee, Rachel, I come to comfort thee. Don’t be so sad.”

“Oh, Signor Angelo,” Rachel said, “no comfort but Paolo’s presence can remove this sadness from my heart.”

Angelo said:

“Nay, then, you’re fond, and you lack that strength of judgment and election that should be attendant on your years and form and body shape.”

“Fond” can mean “foolish” or “in love.”

Angelo continued, “Will you, because your lord has been taken prisoner, blubber and weep and keep a peevish stir, as though you would turn turtle with the news?”

Turtledoves have a mournful cry.

Angelo continued:

“Come, come, be wise.

“By God’s blood, let’s say that your lord dies, and you go mar your face as you begin to do now with your mourning, what would you do, do you think? Who would care for you?

“But this is how it is:

“When nature will bestow her gifts on such as don’t know how to use them, you find some who, had they but one quarter of your fair beauty, they would make it show a little otherwise than you do this, or they would see the face-painter [cosmetician] twice an hour.

“And I commend them, aye, who can use the art of cosmetology with such good skill and judgment.”

“You talk idly,” Rachel said. “If this is your best comfort for me, keep it still. My senses cannot feed on such sour delicacies.”

“And why, sweetheart?” Angelo said.

“Nay, stop, good signor,” Rachel said.

“Come, I have sweeter foods yet in store,” Angelo said.

Juniper, out of sight but within hearing, said to Onion, “Aye, in any case.”

He then called, “Mistress Rachel!”

“Rachel?” Angelo said.

“For God’s pity, Signor Angelo, I hear my father!” Rachel said. “Leave, for God’s sake!”

Angelo said, “By God’s blood, I am between the impulse to go and the impulse to stay, I think. This is twice now I have been interrupted thus.”

Earlier, in 2.5, Rachel’s father had interrupted his intended pursuit of Rachel.

Angelo exited.

Rachel said, “I pray to God that Angelo does not meet my father!”

She thought that the man calling her — who was actually Juniper — was her father.

— 4.7 —

Onion and Juniper entered Jaques’ backside, aka backyard.

“Oh, splendid! She’s yonder,” Onion said.

Rachel exited.

“Oh, terrible! She’s gone,” Onion said.

Juniper said, “Yea, so nimble in your dilemmas and your hyperboles? ‘Hey, my love,’ ‘Oh, my love,’ ‘At the first sight,’ by the Mass.”

“At the first sight” is “love at first sight.”

Onion said, “Oh, how she scudded! Oh, how she darted nimbly! Oh, sweet, hurried scud! Oh, sweet movement! How she tripped! Oh, delicate trip-and-go!”

To “scud” is to “move briskly.”

A “scud” is a brisk movement.

A scut, which Onion may have been thinking of, is 1) a rabbit’s or deer’s short tail, or 2) female genitalia.

A trip is a skip or a light, quick walk.

“Come, thou are enamored with the influence of her profundity,” Juniper said.

Rachel’s “profundity” may be her fundament, or backside.

He continued, “But, sirrah, listen a little.”

“Oh, rare!” Onion said. “What! What! Surpassing, indeed. What is it! What is it!”

“What will thou say now if Rachel were to stand now and play hity-tity through the keyhole to behold the equipage of thy person?” Juniper asked.

In other words, what if Rachel is standing behind the door and playing bo-peep with her eyes through the keyhole in order to observe Onion’s “equipage.”

The equipage is appurtenances. What appurtenances? Perhaps a bulge in his pants.

“Oh, sweet equipage!” Onion said. “Try, good Juniper, tickle her, talk, talk. Oh, drare!”

“Drare” is a portmanteau word combining “dare” and “rare.” He wanted to take a chance for a splendid outcome. If Rachel were behind the door, and if Juniper could speak the right words to her, then Rachel could become Onion’s wife.

Juniper called through the door, “Mistress Rachel!”

He said to Onion, “Watch then in case her father comes.”

He called, “Rachel, Madonna, Rachel!”

He then said to Onion, “No answer.”

“Say I am here, Onion or Peter or so,” Peter Onion said.

“No, I’ll knock,” Juniper said. “We’ll not stand upon horizons and tricks but fall roundly to the matter.”

“Horizons” are “orisons” or “entreaties.”

“Fall roundly” may mean “fall into a round,” or “fall’ into a vagina.”

He knocked.

“Well said, sweet Juniper,” Onion said. “Horizons? Hang ’em! Knock, knock!”

From inside the house, Rachel said, “Who’s there? Father?”

“Father?” Juniper said. “No, and yet a father, if you please to be a mother.”

Onion wanted to be the father of her children.

“Well said, Juniper,” Onion said. “Speak to her again: a smack or two more of the mother.”

Juniper called to Rachel, “Do you hear, sweet soul, sweet Rhadamant, sweet <https://universitypublishingonline.org/cambridge/benjonson/k/works/case/facing/Machiavel?> One word, Melpomone. Are you at leisure?”

Rhadamant is a judge in the Land of the Dead. Machivel is Machiavelli, who had the reputation of being unscrupulous when it came to politics. Melopomone is the Muse of Tragedy.

Not many, if any, women would want to be called Rhadamant, Machivel, or Melopomone.

“At leisure?” Rachel said. “To do what?”

“To do what?” Juniper said. “To do nothing but be liable to the ecstasy of true love’s exigent or so. You smell [detect] my meaning?”

“Exigent” means “necessity,” but Onion thought that Juniper had said “excrement.”

“Smell?” Onion said. “Filthy, fellow Juniper, filthy! Smell? Oh, most odious!”

“How ‘filthy’?” Juniper said.

“Filthy, by this finger!” Onion said. “Smell? Smell a rat, smell a pudding.”

“To smell a rat” means “to smell trouble.”

“Pudding” can mean 1) entrails, or 2) a food consisting of a stuffed stomach or other entrail.

“Away!” Onion said.

He wanted Juniper to get away from Rachel’s door and let him do the talking.

Onion continued, “These tricks are for trulls. A plain wench loves plain dealing and straight talking. I’ll <https://universitypublishingonline.org/cambridge/benjonson/k/works/case/facing/>go talk to her, myself. Smell, to a marchpane wench!”

A trull is a prostitute.

“Marchpane” is marzipan, a sweet dish. Rachel is a sweet wench.

“With all my heart,” Juniper said. “I’ll be legitimate and silent as an apple-squire. I’ll see nothing and say nothing.”

By “legitimate,” Juniper may have meant “intimate.”

An apple-squire is a pimp.

Juniper was saying that he would be as quiet as a pimp standing at a door behind which a prostitute and her customer were transacting “business.”

“Sweetheart! Sweetheart!” Onion called to Rachel.

“And bag pudding,” Juniper said. “Ha, ha, ha!”

A bag pudding is a pudding that has been boiled in a bag.

Juniper had mentioned together a sweet heart and a bag pudding (stuffed stomach or other entrail).

Not my kind of humor, but Juniper thought his joke was funny.

Jaques, Rachel’s father, called, “What, Rachel, my girl? What, Rachel!”

“By God’s eyelid!” Onion said.

“What, Rachel!” Jaques called.

“Here I am,” Rachel answered from behind the door.

“What rakehell calls Rachel?” Onion said. “Oh, treason to my love!”

He had not recognized her father’s voice.

A “rakehell” is a scoundrel.

“It’s her father, on my life,” Juniper said. “How shall we entrench and edify [hide and fortify] ourselves from him?”

“Oh, coney-catching Cupid!” Onion said.

A coney can be 1) a rabbit, 2) a fool, or 3) a lady.

Cupid, aka Love, makes fools of many people.

Jaques entered the scene and said, “What! In my backside? Where? What did they come for?”

There were two possible answers: 1) Rachel, and 2) his gold.

Onion climbed a tree.

Jaques said, “Where are they? Rachel! Thieves! Thieves!”

He seized Juniper and said, “Stay, villain, slave!”

He called, “Rachel, untie my dog!”

He then said to Juniper, “Nay, thief, thou cannot escape.”

“I beg you, sir,” Juniper said.

“A pitiful Onion!” Onion said, hiding in the tree. “I wish that thou had a rope!”

Onions for sale in the marketplace were strung on a string.

“Why, Rachel!” Jaques said. “When will you do what I say? Let loose my dog! Garlic, my mastiff! Let him loose, I say!”

“For God’s sake, hear me speak!” Juniper said. “Keep your cur tied up!”

“I don’t fear Garlic,” Onion said to himself. “He’ll not bite Onion, his kinsman. I pray to God he comes out, and then they’ll not smell me.”

“Well, then, deliver,” Jaques said. “Come, deliver, slave.”

“Deliver” means “give me your valuables,” as in a highwayman’s order to “stand [still] and deliver [your valuables].”

Jaques thought that Juniper had stolen his gold, and he wanted his gold back.

“What should I deliver?” Juniper asked.

“Oh, thou would have me tell thee, would thou?” Jaques said. “Show me thy hands. What do thou have in thy hands?”

Juniper held out his hands and said, “Here are my hands.”

“Wait,” Jaques said. “Aren’t thy fingers’ ends begrimed with dirt? No, thou have wiped them.”

Jaques was afraid that Juniper had dug up his gold.

“Wiped them?” Juniper asked.

“Aye, thou villain!” Jaques said. “Thou are a subtle knave. Take off thy shoes. Come, I will see them.”

He called, “Give me a knife here, Rachel.”

He then told Juniper, “I’ll rip the soles.”

In the tree, Onion said to himself, “It’s doesn’t matter. He’s a cobbler; he can mend them.”

“What, are you mad?” Juniper asked. “Are you detestable? Would you make an anatomy of me? Do you think that I am not true orthography?”

“Anatomy” is a body used for dissecting.

“Orthography” is the study of proper spelling.

“‘Orthography’? ‘Anatomy’?” Jaques said.

Like most people, he frequently did not understand Juniper.

“For God’s sake, be not so inviolable [‘unable to be violated,’ but Juniper meant ‘impervious to argument’],” Juniper said. “I am no ambuscade [person lying in ambush]. What predicament [situation] call you this? Why do you intimate [hint] so much?”

Jaques patted Juniper’s body, searching for gold, and said, “I can feel nothing.”

Onion said to himself, “By our Lady, but Onion feels something.”

He may have felt fear.

Jaques said to Juniper, “Wait, sir, you are not yet gone. I have not yet finished. Shake your legs, come, and your arms. Be brief, wait.”

Juniper shook his arms and legs, but no gold fell to the ground.

Jaques began searching Juniper’s breeches, whose then-current style was wide and baggy and stuffed with hair.

Jaques said, “Let me see these drums, these kilderkins [casks], these bombard slops [baggy trousers]. What is it crams — stuffs — them so?”

Jaques thought that his gold might be hidden in Juniper’s wide, baggy trousers.

“Nothing but hair,” Juniper said.

“That’s true,” Jaques said, finishing his search of Juniper’s trousers.

He then began to search Juniper’s hair, saying, “I had almost forgot this rug, this hedgehog’s nest, this hay-mow, this bear’s skin, this heath, this furze-bush.”

A “hay-mow” is a hay-stack.

A “heath” is uncultivated land.

“Oh, let me go!” Juniper said. “You tear my hair, you revolve [spin about] my brains and understanding!”

Jaques said to himself:

“Heart, thou are somewhat eased. Half of my fear has taken its leave of me; the other half still keeps possession in despite of hope, until these amorous eyes of mine court my fair gold.

“Dear, I come to thee!”

He then said to Juniper, “Fiend, why are thou not gone? Leave, my soul’s vexation! Satan, go hence! Why do thou stare at me? Why do thou stay? Why do thou pore — stare — on the ground with thievish eyes? What do thou see there, thou cur? What do thou stare open-mouthed at? Go away from my house!”

He called, “Rachel, send Garlic forth!”

“I am gone, sir. I am gone,” Juniper said. “For God’s sake, stop!”

Juniper exited.

“Pack off and thank God thou escape so well away!” Jaques said.

Still in the tree, Onion said to himself, “If I escape from this tree, Destinies, I defy you.”

The three Destinies are the Three Fates. One Fate spins the thread of life, a second Fate measures the thread of life, and the third Fate cuts the thread of life.

Thinking himself alone, Jaques said to himself:

“I cannot see by any characters — signs — written on this earth that any felonious foot has taken acquaintance of this hallowed ground.

“No one sees me.

“Knees, do homage to your lord — to your gold.”

He knelt and dug up the gold.

Seeing the gold, he said:

“It is safe. It is safe. It lies and sleeps so soundly that it would do one good to look on it. If this bliss should be given to any man who has much gold, justly to say, ‘It is safe,’ then I say, ‘It is safe.’

“Oh, what a heavenly round — a circular dance — these two words dance within me and without — outside — me!

“First, I think them, and then I speak them, then I watch — heed and listen to — their sound, and drink it greedily with both my ears, then think, then speak, then drink their sound again, and racket round about this body’s court these two sweet words: ‘It is safe.’

“Wait, I will feed my other senses.”

Jaques smelled the gold and said, “Oh, how sweet it smells!”

Still in the tree, Onion said, “I marvel he doesn’t smell Onion, being so near it.”

Burying the gold, Jaques said:

“Down to thy grave again, thou beauteous ghost!

“Angels, men say, are spirits; spirits are invisible. Bright angels, are you so?

“Be you invisible to every eye, except only these eyes of mine.”

Angels are 1) attendant spirits, and 2) coins.

Jaques then said:

“Sleep. I’ll not break your rest, although you break mine because I worry about you.

“Dear saints, adieu, adieu!

“My feet part from you, but my soul dwells with you.”

Jaques exited.

“Has he gone?” Onion asked himself

Climbing down from the tree, Onion said:

“Oh, Fortune my friend, and not Fortune my foe,

“I come down to embrace thee and kiss thy great toe!”

Juniper returned to Jaques’ backyard and said, “Fellow Onion? Peter?”

“Fellow Juniper!” Peter Onion said.

Juniper said, “What, has the old panurgo gone, departed, cosmographied, ha?”

A “panurgo” is a deceitful old man.

By “cosmographied,” Juniper meant that Jaques had vanished into the cosmos.

“Oh, aye, and listen, sirrah,” Onion said.

Then he reconsidered telling Juniper about the gold: “Shall I tell him? No.”

Juniper said, “Nay, be brief and declare. Stand not upon conundrums now. Thou know what contagious [malapropism for ‘outrageous’] speeches I have suffered for thy sake. If he should come again and invent me here —”

The Latin invenire means “locate” or “encounter.”

Juniper meant that he was worried that Jaques would find him here.

Onion said to himself, “He says the truth; he suffered for my sake. I will tell him.”

He said out loud, “Sirrah Juniper —”

Then he reconsidered: “And yet I will not.”

“What do thou say, sweet Onion?” Juniper asked.

Onion said, “If thou had smelled the scent of me when I was in the tree, thou would not have said so.”

Juniper would not have told Jaques where Onion was hiding.

Onion continued, “But, sirrah, the case is altered with me. My heart has given love a box of the ear — a smash on the side of the head — made him kick up the heels, indeed.”

One meaning of “kick up the heels” is to trip someone.

The gold had made Onion fall out of love. He wanted the gold more than he wanted Rachel.

Juniper said, “Do thou say that to me, mad Greek? How did that happen? How did that chance to happen?”

Greeks were proverbially madcap.

Onion said to himself, “I cannot hold it inside myself.”

He then said out loud, “Juniper, have an eye. Look. Keep an eye on the door. Watch for Jaques.”

He dug up the gold, which was hidden under horse dung.

Then he said:

“The old proverb’s true, I see: ‘Gold is but muck.’

“Nay, Godso, Juniper, look to the door! An eye to the main chance! Here, you slave, have an eye!”

The main chance was the main issue: the chance to get rich by stealing the gold. The way to do that was to keep an eye out for Jaques.

“O inexorable, O infallible, O intricate, divine, and superficial Fortune!” Juniper said, looking at the gold.

The word “superficial” seems not to go with the other adjectives. “Sufficient” is more appropriate. Or “super-sufficient.”

“Nay, it will be sufficient soon,” Onion said. “Here, look here!”

“O insolent good luck!” Juniper said.

Another odd use of an adjective.

Perhaps Juniper meant “insolvent good luck,” or “good luck to someone who is insolvent.”

Juniper asked, “How did thou produce the intelligence [gain the knowledge] of the gold minerals?”

“I’ll tell you that soon,” Onion said.

He handed Juniper some gold and said, “Here, make shift, do your best, convey, cram.”

In other words, hide the gold on your person.

“I’ll teach you, Jaques, how you shall call for Garlic again, indeed,” Onion said.

Juniper said, “By God’s blood, what shall we do with all this? We shall never bring it to a consumption.”

In other words, they would never be able to spend this much money. There was too much wealth to consume in spending.

“Consumption?” Onion said. “Why, we’ll be most sumptuously attired, man.”

“By this gold, I will have three or four most stigmatical suits soon,” Jaques said.

“Stigmatical” means “villainous.”

In this culture, there were rules saying that people could not dress above their social class. If Juniper and Onion were to wear sumptuous clothing, they would be breaking those rules. For them, such clothing would be a stigma: a mark of infamy.

“I’ll go in my footcloth,” Onion said. “I’ll turn gentleman.”

A “footcloth” is an ornamental cloth for a horse. Onion meant that he would ride a horse that wore a footcloth, but it sounded as if Onion would be wearing the footcloth.

“So will I,” Juniper said.

“But what badge shall we display?” Onion asked. “What cullison?”

Badges and cullisance were signs of nobility.

Juniper answered, “As for that, let’s use the infidelity and commiseration [corruption and sympathetic consideration] of some harrot [herald] of arms; he shall give us a gudgeon.”

Juniper was using the word “gudgeon,” which is a kind of fish, but he had meant the word “scutcheon,” which refers to a shield that displays a coat of arms.

A herald could be bribed to give them a coat of arms; the herald could take the bribe and say that he gave them the coat of arms out of sympathetic consideration for them.

“A ‘gudgeon’?” Onion said. “A scutcheon, thou should say, man.”

“A scutcheon or a gudgeon,” Juniper said. “All is one and the same.”

“Well, our arms are good enough,” Onion said. “Let’s look to our legs.”

They had decided to get coats of arms; now they needed to run away.

“I am content,” Juniper said. “I agree. We’ll be jogging.”

They would be jogging their body as they ran. They would also be jingling the gold coins.

“Rachel, we retire,” Onion said. “Garlic, God be with you.”

“Farewell, sweet Jaques,” Juniper said.

“Farewell, sweet Rachel,” Onion said.

He then said about Garlic, “Sweet dog, adieu.”

They exited Jaques’ backyard.

— 4.8 —

Maximilian, Count Ferneze, Aurelia, Phoenixella, and Pacue talked together.

The scheme of Gaspar and Chamont exchanging identities had been discovered. Maximilian, Count Ferneze, and the others knew now that Chamont, a noble, had been released, and that Gaspar still remained as their prisoner. Now Count Ferneze worried that Paolo, his son, would not be ransomed because why would the French exchange Paolo, the son of a Count, for a nobody like Gaspar.

Maximilian and Count Ferneze were in the middle of an argument.

Maximilian said, “Nay, but sweet Count —”

“Away!” Count Ferneze said. “Leave! I’ll hear no more. Never was a man so palpably abused: My son has been so basely marketed and sold, and I myself am made the subject of your mirth and scorn.”

“Count Ferneze, you tread too hard upon my patience,” Maximilian said. “Don’t persist, I advise Your Lordship.”

“I will persist, and to thee I speak,” Count Ferneze said. “Thou, Maximilian, thou have injured me.”

“Before the Lord —” Maximilian began.

“Sweet signor —” Aurelia began.

“Oh, my father!” Phoenixella said.

“Lady, let your father thank your beauty,” Maximilian said to Phoenixella.

Maximilian could fight Count Ferneze as an act of honor: Count Ferneze had insulted his honor. Phoenixella, however, was beautiful and Maximilian liked her, and so Maximilian would grant her wish that the two men would not fight.

Pacue said to himself, “By gar [god], me shall be hang for tella dis same. Me tella mademoiselle, she tell her fadera [father].”

Which mademoiselle? Aurora? Phoenixella? Don’t know.

As Chamont and Gaspar had feared, Pacue had told the secret.

Count Ferneze complained, “The true Chamont set free, and one left here, of no descent, clad barely in his name!”

Gaspar was noble in nature, but he had no name — no family — of nobility, as far as anyone knew.

Count Ferneze said to Pacue, “Sirrah boy, come here, and be sure you speak the simple truth.”

“Oh, pardonnez-moi [excuse me], monsieur,” Pacue said.

“Come, leave your ‘pardons’ and directly say what villain is the same who has usurped the honored name and person of Chamont,” Count Ferneze ordered.

“Oh, monsieur, no point villain, brave chevalier, Monsieur Gaspar!” Pacue said.

“No point villain” means “no villain at all.” The French “ne ... point” means “not at all.”

“Monsieur Gaspar!” Count Ferneze said. “On what occasion did they exchange their names? What was their policy — their plot — or their pretext?”

“Me can no tell, par ma foi [by my faith], monsieur,” Pacue said.

“My honorable lord —” Maximilian began.

Count Ferneze interrupted, “Tut, tut, be silent!”

“Silent? Count Ferneze, I tell thee, if Amurath, the ruthless great Turk, were here, I would speak and he should hear me!” Maximilian said.

“So will I not,” Count Ferneze said.

“By my father’s hand, but thou shall, count,” Maximilian said. “I say, until this instant I was never touched — hurt — in my reputation. Hear me. You shall know that you have wronged me, and I will make you acknowledge it. If I cannot, my sword shall.”

“By heaven, I will not hear you,” Count Ferneze said. “I will stop my ears. My senses loathe the savor of thy breath. It is poison to me. I say, I will not hear you. What shall I know?”

It is you who have injured me. What will you make? Make me acknowledge it?"

He went to the door and ordered, "Fetch forth that Gaspar, that base, wicked counterfeit."

Some serving-men entered the room with Gaspar.

Count Ferneze said to Maximilian, "I'll make him to your face prove your wrongs. I'll make him show that you have wronged me."

He then said to Gaspar, "Come on, false substance, shadow to Chamont! Had you no one else to work upon and trick but me? Was I your fittest project? Well, confess what you intended by this secret plot, and by whose policy it was contrived. Speak the truth, and you will be treated courteously. But speak deceitfully to me, and you must resolve to suffer the most extreme torment that I can inflict."

"My honored lord, hear me with patience," Gaspar said. "Neither hope of favor nor the fear of torment shall sway my tongue from uttering the truth."

"It is well," Count Ferneze said. "Proceed, then."

Gaspar said, "The morning before this battle did begin, wherein my Lord Chamont and I were captured, we vowed one mutual fortune, good or bad, that day should be embraced of us both, and, thinking that things might turn out badly after we had made our vow, we there concluded to exchange our names."

One way for things to turn out badly would be for both of them to be taken prisoner. Since Chamont was a general, he might face bad treatment. Paolo was willing to share that bad treatment or even to take it on himself, and so he and Chamont had exchanged names.

“Then Maximilian mistook you for Chamont,” Count Ferneze said.

“True, noble lord,” Gaspar said.

“It is false, ignoble wretch!” Count Ferneze said. “It was but a plot to betray my son.”

“Count, thou liest in thy bosom, count!” Maximilian said.

These were fighting — dueling — words.

“Lie?” Count Ferneze said.

“Nay, I beseech you, honored gentlemen,” Gaspar said. “Don’t let the untimely ruin of your love follow as a consequence of these slight occurrents. Be assured, Chamont’s return will heal these wounds again and break the points of your too piercing thoughts.”

Maximilian and Count Ferneze were fighting with words, but their fight was unnecessary because soon Chamont would return and bring Paolo with him. So Gaspar said, but Count Ferneze did not believe him.

Count Ferneze said:

“Return? Aye, when? When will Chamont return? He’ll come to fetch you, will he? Aye, it is likely. Ha! You’d have me think so; that’s your devious trick.

“No, no, young gallant, your trick is stale. You cannot feed me with so vain a hope.”

“My lord, I am not feeding you with a vain hope,” Gaspar said. “I know assuredly that he will return and bring your noble son along with him.”

“Aye, I dare bet my soul he will return,” Maximilian said.

“Oh, impudent derision, open scorn, intolerable wrong!” Count Ferneze said. “Isn’t it enough that you have played upon me and fooled me all this while, but still to mock me, still to jest at me?”

He said to his serving-men, “Fellows, take him away.”

He said to Gaspar, “Thou ill-bred slave, who sets no difference between a noble spirit and thy own slavish humor, do not think but I’ll take worthy vengeance on thee, wretch.”

Gaspar said:

“Alas, these threats are idle, like the wind,

“And breed no terror in a guiltless mind.”

Count Ferneze replied, “Nay, thou shall lack no torture: Know that and be ready to be tortured.”

He ordered his serving-men, “Take him away!”

Gaspar said:

“I welcome the worst. I suffer for a friend.

“Your tortures will, but my love shall never, end.”

Maximilian, Aurelia, Phoenixella, and Pacue remained.

Phoenixella said to herself about the absent Gaspar:

“Alas, poor gentleman! My father’s rage is too extreme, too stern and violent. Oh, I wish that I knew, with all my strongest powers, how to remove it from thy patient breast! But that I cannot do.”

She wanted her father not to be angry at the patient – calm and collected — Gaspar.

Phoenixella continued:

“Yet my willing heart shall minister, in spite of tyranny, to thy misfortune. Something there is in him who does force this strange affection with more than common rapture in my breast.

“For, being but Gaspar, he is still as dear

“To me as when he did as Chamont appear.”

She loved him when she thought he was Chamont; she still loved him when she knew he was Gaspar.

Aurelia said, “But in all seriousness, signor, do you think Chamont will return?”

“Do I see your face, lady?” Maximilian answered.

Yes, he saw her face, and yes, he thought that Chamont would return.

“Aye, to be sure, if love has not blinded you,” Aurelia said.

Maximilian said, “That is a question; but I will assure you, no, I am not blinded by love. I can see, and yet love is in my eye. Well, the Count, your father, simply has dishonored me, and this steel shall engrave it on his burgonet.”

A burgonet is a kind of helmet.

Count Ferneze had called him a liar; by doing so, he had dishonored him.

“Nay, sweet signor,” Aurelia said.

“Lady, I prefer my reputation to my life, but you shall rule me,” Maximilian said. “Come, let’s march.”

“I’ll follow, signor,” Aurelia said.

Maximilian exited with Phoenixella and Pacue.

Alone, Aurelia said to herself:

“Oh, sweet queen of love, Venus, sovereign of all my thoughts, and thou, fair Fortune, who, more to honor my affections, have thus translated Gaspar to Chamont!

“Let both your flames now burn in one bright sphere and give true light to my aspiring hopes!

“Hasten Chamont’s return! Let him love me,

“Even if father, friends, and all the world reject me.”

ACT 5 (The Case is Altered)

— 5.1 —

Angelo and Christophero talked together. Christophero's nickname was Kit, and he was carrying gold coins.

Angelo said:

“Sigh for a woman? Would I fold my arms, rave in my sleep, talk idly being awake, pine and look pale, make love-walks in the night, to steal cold comfort — small consolation — from a day-star's eyes?”

In this culture, folded arms were a sign of melancholy.

Literally, the day-star is the sun; metaphorically, it is Rachel.

Angelo continued:

“Kit, thou are a fool. Will thou be wise? Then, lad, renounce this boy-god Cupid's foolish idolatry. Don't insist on compliment and wooing tricks.

“Thou love old Jaques' daughter, do thou?”

“Love her?” Christophero asked.

“Come, come, I know you do,” Angelo said. “Be ruled and take my advice, and she's thine own. Thou will say her father Jaques, the old beggar, has pledged his word to thee that none but thou shall be his son-in-law?”

“He has,” Christophero said.

Angelo said:

“He has? Will thou believe him and be made a rook — a fool — to wait on such an antique weathercock? Why, he is more inconstant than the sea; his thoughts, chameleon-like, change every minute.”

These three things change: weathervanes, the sea, and chameleons. According to Angelo, a fourth thing also changes: Jaques.

Angelo continued:

“No, Kit, work soundly. Steal the wench away, wed her and bed her, and, when that is done, then say to Jaques, ‘Shall I be your son-in-law?’”

“But come, to our plot. Where is this gold?”

Showing him some gold coins, Christophero said, “Here, Signor Angelo.”

Angelo said:

“Bestow it. Bid thy hands shed golden drops. Let these bald French crowns be uncovered in open sight to do obeisance to Jaques’ staring eyes when he steps forth.”

The French crowns — gold coins — will shine like French heads — heads made bald because of the French disease: syphilis.

Angelo continued:

“Jaques, the needy beggar, will be glad of gold. So now keep aloof, and, as he treads this gilded path, stretch out his ambling hopes with scattering more and more gold that he will walk after to collect, and, as thou go, cry, ‘Jaques! Jaques!’”

“Tush, leave it to me,” Christophero said.

Angelo said:

“First I’ll play the ghost. I’ll call him out of his house but not be seen.

“Kit, stand to the side.”

“But, Signor Angelo, where will yourself and Rachel wait for me, after the trick has ended?” Christophero asked.

“By the Mass, that’s a good question,” Angelo said. “At the old priory behind Saint Foy’s.”

A priory is a monastery or a nunnery.

“Agreed; there is no better place,” Christophero said. “I’ll meet you there.”

He withdrew, dropping gold coins on the ground.

Angelo said to himself, “Do, good fool, do, but I’ll not meet you there. Now to this trick.”

He stepped to the side to hide himself and called, “Jaques! Jaques! What! Jaques!”

From inside his house, Jaques said, “Who calls? Who’s there?”

“Jaques!” Angelo called.

Jaques asked, “Who calls?”

Angelo said to Christophero, who was Count Ferneze’s steward, “Steward, he comes, he comes.”

He called again, “Jaques!”

Jaques stepped out of his house and said, “What voice is this? Nobody here? Wasn’t I called? I was, and one cried ‘Jaques’ with a hollow voice. I was deceived.”

He saw a gold coin and said, “No, I was not deceived. See, see, it was an angel that called me forth! Gold, gold, man-making gold!”

A man with much gold is a made man.

Jaques saw another gold coin and said, “Another star! Do they drop from heaven? No, no, my house, I hope, is haunted with a fairy! My dear Lar, my household god, my fairy. On my knees.”

He knelt, all the better to pick up the gold.

In this society, fairies were reputed to sometimes strew gold around.

Lars are protective household spirits.

Christophero called, “Jaques!”

He exited, leaving a trail of gold coins behind him so that Jaques would follow them, pick them up, and leave his daughter, Rachel, unattended.

Jaques said, “My Lar calls me! Oh, sweet voice, musical as the spheres! See, see, more gold!”

In Ptolemaic astronomy, the planets and stars were encased in spheres that moved around the Earth. These spheres made music: the Music of the Spheres. This music was thought to be beautiful.

Out of sight, Christophero called, “Jaques!”

Rachel entered the scene.

“What, Rachel, Rachel!” Jaques said. “Lock my door. Look after my house.”

Christophero called again, “Jaques!”

“Shut fast my door,” Jaques said to Rachel.

He picked up a gold coin, “A golden crown! Jaques shall be a king.”

He exited.

Angelo said to himself about Jaques, “To a fool’s paradise that path will bring thee and thy household Lar.”

“What does my father mean?” Rachel said to herself. “I wonder what strange mood he is in?”

Angelo came out of hiding, walked over to her and said, “Come, sweet soul, stop wondering. Don’t be startled. It was I who laid this plot to get thy father out of the house.”

“Oh, Angelo!” Rachel said.

“O me no O’s, but listen,” Angelo said. “My lord, your love, Paolo Ferneze, has returned from war. He lingers at Pont Valerio, and from thence by post at the most recent midnight I was entreated to accompany you thither. Do not insist on replies. A horse is saddled for you, if you will go, and I am at your service. If you will stay, why, so be it.”

A pont is a bridge.

“Oh, Angelo, every minute is a day until my Ferneze comes to me,” Rachel said. “Come, we’ll go, sir.”

She exited.

Angelo said to himself:

“Sweet soul, I guess thy meaning by thy looks. At Pont Valerio thou shall see thy love, but not Ferneze.

“Steward Christophero, fare you well. You wait for Rachel, too. When will you see her, can you tell?”

The answer to “When will you see her, can you tell?” is “Never.”

Angelo exited.

Jaques returned and said:

“Oh, in what a golden circle have I danced!”

Fairies were thought to dance in circles.

Jaques continued:

“Milan, these odorous and enflowered fields are none of thine. No, here’s Elysium. Here blessed ghosts do walk.”

Elysium is the part of the Land of the Dead where the good souls go to enjoy the afterlife.

Jaques continued:

“This is the court and glorious palace where the god of gold shines like the sun of sparkling majesty.”

Plutus is the god of gold and other forms of wealth.

Jaques said to the gold coins he had picked up:

“Oh, fair-feathered, my red-breasted birds, come fly with me!”

Angels have wings, and another kind of angels is gold coins.

In this society, the color of gold was sometimes called red.

Jaques continued:

“I’ll bring you to a choir, whose consort — musical harmony — being sweetened with your sound, the music will be fuller, and each hour these ears shall banquet with your harmony.”

He sang, “Oh! Oh! Oh!”

He then left to go to his backyard and dig up his gold so he could add these new gold coins.

Christophero entered the scene and said to himself, “At the old priory behind Saint Foy’s, that was the place of our appointment, I am sure. I hope he will not make me lose my gold, and mock me, too. Perhaps they are within. I’ll knock.”

He knocked at Jaques' door.

Discovering that his gold was gone, Jaques said to himself, "Oh, God, the case is altered!"

Christophero called, "Rachel! Angelo! Signor Angelo!"

Jaques said, "Angels? Aye, where? My angels? Where's my gold? Why, Rachel —"

He then said to Christophero, "Oh, thou thievish cannibal! Thou eat my flesh in the stealing of my gold!"

"What gold?" Christophero asked.

"What gold!" Jaques said.

He called, "Rachel, call help! Come forth!"

Jaques then said to Christophero, "I'll rip thine entrails but I'll have my gold!"

He called, "Rachel, why don't thou come? I am ruined!"

He said to himself, "Aye, me, she doesn't speak."

"Aye, me" is an expression of mourning.

He said to Christophero, "Thou have slain my child!"

He exited into his house.

Christophero said to himself:

"Is the man possessed, do you suppose? This is strange.

"Rachel, I see, has gone with Angelo.

"Well, I'll once again go to the priory, and see if I can meet them."

Christophero exited.

Jaques returned and said:

“It is too true, thou have made away with my child, Rachel, and thou have my gold!

“Oh, what hyena called me out of doors?

“The thief is gone! My gold’s gone! Rachel’s gone!

“All’s gone except I, who expend my cries in vain,

“But I’ll go from here, too, and die, or end this pain.”

— 5.2 —

Juniper, Onion, Finio, and Valentine talked together.

Valentine was Francisco Colonna’s serving-man, and Finio was Colonna’s Italian page.

Juniper and Onion were both wearing fine clothes, and they were pretending to be fine gentlemen. In fact, they thought that they were fine gentlemen. They wore rapiers and used dueling terms.

Pretending to fight a duel, Juniper said, “By God’s wounds, let me go! Hai, cazzo!”

Hai is an Italian word said when thrusting a sword; it means “You have it!” Cazzo is Italian slang for “penis.”

Juniper shouted, “Catch him alive! I call, I call, boy. I come, I come, sweetheart.”

Onion said to Finio, “Page, hold my rapier while I hold my friend here.”

He gave his rapier to Finio.

Valentine said to himself about Juniper and Onion, “Oh, here’s a sweet metamorphosis: a couple of buzzards turned into a pair of peacocks.”

“Signor Onion, lend me thy boy to unhang — take off — my rapier,” Juniper said.

Finio was acting as Onion’s page.

Onion said, “Signor Juniper, for once or so you may borrow him, but the truth is you must inveigle and tempt, as I have done, my lord’s page here, a poor follower of mine.”

Onion had tempted Finio to become his page.

Juniper said, “Heigh-ho! Your page, then, shall not be superintendent upon me?”

Juniper used the word “superintendent” to mean “be super intent” on serving him.

Juniper added, “He shall not be addicted?”

The verb “addict” means someone who devotes himself to the service of another person. The adjective “addicted” means “had been attached by compulsion to a person.”

Juniper then said, “He shall not be incident, he shall not be incident, he shall not be incident, shall he?”

The noun “incident” means “likely to attach itself to something.” The adjective “incident” means “naturally attaching.”

Juniper drew his rapier and thrust it.

“Oh, sweet Signor Juniper!” Finio said.

“By God’s blood, stand away, princox — saucy boy! Do not aggravate my joy,” Juniper said.

“Nay, good master Onion,” Valentine said, seeing that Onion was ready to duel Juniper.

Taking back his rapier from Finio, Onion said, “Nay, if he have the heart to draw my blood, let him come.”

“I’ll slice you, Onion, I’ll slice you!” Juniper shouted.

“I’ll cleave you, Juniper!” Onion shouted.

“Why, stop, stop, ho!” Valentine said. “What do you mean?”

“Let him come, ingle,” Juniper replied.

He said to Finio, “Stand by, boy.”

He then said, “His alabaster blood cannot fear me.”

“Alabaster” means white. Alabaster blood is cowardly blood.

By “cannot fear me,” Juniper meant, “cannot make me afraid.” Readers can be forgiven for thinking Juniper’s words meant, “Even a coward cannot be afraid of me.”

“Why, listen, sweet signor,” Finio said to Juniper. “Let there not be any contention between my master and you about me. If you want a page, sir, I can help you to a proper, handsome stripling.”

“Can thou?” Juniper said. “What parentage, what ancestry, what genealogy is he?”

“A French boy, sir,” Finio said.

“Has he his French linguist [Juniper meant ‘language’], has he?” Juniper said.

“Aye, sir,” Finio replied.

“Then, transport [bring] him,” Juniper said. “Here’s a crusado for thee.”

He gave Finio a crusado: a Portuguese coin.

“You will not embezzle my servant with your benevolence, will you?” Onion said. “Wait, boy, there’s a portmanteau for thee.”

A portague — the word Onion meant — is a different Portuguese coin.

“Lord, sir!” Finio said.

This was a good tip.

“Do take it, boy,” Onion said. “It’s three pounds, ten shillings, a portmanteau.”

Finio took the money and said, “I thank Your Lordship.”

Finio exited.

Juniper said to Valentine, “Sirrah ningle [a favorite], thou are a traveler, and I honor thee. Please, discourse. Cherish thy muse; discourse.”

“On what topic, sir?” Valentine asked.

“Discourse on whatever topic thou will,” Juniper said. “By God’s blood, hang sorrow.”

“Please, Valentine, assoil [clear up for] me one thing,” Onion said.

“It would be a pity to soil you, sir, in your new apparel,” Valentine said.

“By the Mass, thou say the truth,” Onion said. “Apparel makes a man forget himself.”

Onion was wearing fine apparel, and he had forgotten that he was not a gentleman.

“Begin,” Juniper said. “Find your tongue, ningle.”

Valentine said to himself, “Now I will gull — fool — these ganders splendidly.”

Travelers often told outrageous lies. Valentine was not an exception.

He said to Onion and Juniper, “Gentlemen, having in my peregrination through Mesopotamia —” “Speak legibly [intelligibly],” Juniper said.

Seeing some people coming, he said, “This game’s gone, without the great mercy of God. Here’s a fine tragedy, indeed.”

Valentine would not be able to tell his lies.

Seeing Finio returning with a boy (Pacue) who might become his paid page, Juniper pulled out some money and said, “There’s a Kaiser’s royal. By God’s eyelid, neither king nor Kaiser shall —”

A Caesar’s rial is a gold coin.

— 5.3 —

Finio, Pacue, Balthasar, and Martino entered the scene. Pacue was Chamont’s French page. Balthasar and Martino were two of Count Ferneze’s serving-men.

“Where? Where? Finio, where are they?” Balthasar asked.

He was looking for Juniper and Onion.

Juniper said to Valentine, “Wait a while. I’ll be with you soon.”

“Oh, here’s the page, Signor Juniper,” Onion said.

Pacue was supposed to become Juniper’s new page.

“What did Monsieur Onion say, boy?” Juniper asked.

Finio asked Juniper, “What did you say, sir?”

“Tread out, boy,” Juniper said to Pacue.

“Tread out” means “walk on a path.” This path was to follow Juniper and be his page.

“Take up, you mean, sir,” Finio said.

“Take up” means “take up service,” aka “begin work.”

“Tread out, I say,” Juniper repeated.

He preferred his own way of saying “Work for me.”

Juniper then thanked Finio for his help: “So, I thank you. Is this the boy?”

The boy was Pacue, whom Juniper wanted to hire to be his page.

“Oui, Monsieur,” Pacue said.

“Who gave you that name?” Juniper asked.

“Give me de name? Vat name?” Pacue said.

“He thought your name is ‘We,’” Onion said. “Young gentleman, you must do more than his legs can do for him. Bear with him, sir.”

“Sirrah, give me instance of your carriage,” Juniper said.

“Carriage” is bodily deportment. Juniper wanted to see how Pacue carried himself.

“You’ll serve my turn, won’t you?” Juniper asked Pacue.

“Serve my turn” means “serve me.”

Misunderstanding Juniper, Pacue thought that “serve my turn” was a kind of pirouette or other dance move.

“Vat? Turn upon the toe?” Pacue asked.

“Oh, signor, no,” Finio said.

“Page, will you follow me?” Juniper asked. “I’ll give you good exhibition [maintenance, income].”

“Exhibition” also likely included new clothing: new livery, aka distinctive clothing that showed for whom the page worked.

“By gar, shall not alone follow you, but shall lead you, too,” Pacue said.

“Follow you” meant “be your servant,” but the servant would also lead Juniper — that is, manipulate him into acting as the servant wanted him to.

“Plaguy boy! He soothes his humor and flatters him,” Onion said. “These French villains have pocky wits.”

“Pocky” means “pockmarked.” Smallpox made skin pockmarked.

“Here, disarm me,” Juniper said. “Take my semitary [scimitar].”

Pacue took Juniper’s rapier.

“Oh, splendid!” Valentine said to himself. “This would be a splendid man, if he had a little travel.”

Valentine then said out loud, “Balthasar, Martino, take off your shoes and bid Juniper to cobble them.”

“Friends, friends, but pardon me for fellows,” Juniper said. “I am no more in occupation, no more in corporation [business].”

Juniper was no longer a cobbler, and so he was no longer a fellow to Balthasar and Martino, although they were still his friends.

Juniper continued, “It is so, pardon me. The case is altered. This is law, but I’ll stand to nothing.”

“Stand to nothing” means “submit to nothing, including legal judgments.”

“Fait, so me tink,” Pacue said.

[Indeed, so I think.]

“Well, then, God save the Duke’s Majesty!” Juniper said. “Is this any harm now? Speak, is this any harm now?”

“No, nor good neither,” Onion said. “By God’s blood!”

“Do you laugh at me?” Juniper asked Valentine. “Do you laugh at me? Do you laugh at me?”

“Aye, sir, we do,” Valentine said.

“You do, indeed?” Juniper asked.

“Aye, indeed, sir,” Valentine said.

Juniper said, “It is sufficient.”

He then ordered Pacue, “Page, carry my purse; dog me. Follow me closely like a dog at heel.”

In this society, pages would carry the purse, aka moneyholder, for the gentleman they served.

Juniper exited.

“Gentlemen, don’t leave him,” Onion said. “You see in what state he is. He is not in adversity; his purse is full of money. Don’t leave him!”

They exited.

— 5.4 —

Angelo and Rachel talked together on the road to Pont Valerio.

“Nay, gentle Rachel!” Angelo said.

“Go away! Forbear!” Rachel said. “Ungentle Angelo, don’t touch my body with those impious hands that like hot irons sear my trembling heart and make it hiss at your disloyalty.”

Chamont and Paolo Ferneze entered the scene, but Angelo and Rachel did not notice them. Chamont and Paolo watched Angelo and Rachel quietly.

Rachel continued, “Was this your scheme, to use Ferneze’s name? Was he your fittest decoy and bait? Oh, wild dishonor!”

Paolo said quietly to Chamont, “Wait, noble sir!”

He wanted to hear what Angelo and Paolo would say to each other.

Angelo said to Rachel, “By God’s blood, how like a puppet you talk now! You are being melodramatic! Dishonor? What dishonor? Come, come, fool. Nay, then, I see you’re peevish. By God’s heart, dishonor? To have you go to a priest and marry you, and put you in an honorable state?”

He was claiming to want to marry Rachel.

“To marry me?” Rachel said. “Oh, Heaven, can it be that men should live with such unfeeling souls, without either touch or conscience of religion, or that their warping appetites should spoil those honored appearances that the true seal of friendship had set upon their faces?”

“Do you hear me?” Angelo said. “What is the need of all this commotion? Tell me, will you have me or not?”

“I’ll have you gone, and I’ll have you leave me, if you would,” Rachel said.

“Leave you?” Angelo said. “I was cursed — bewitched — to bring you here and make so fair an offer to a fool. A pox upon you! Why should you be coy? What good thing have you in you to be proud of? Are you anything other than a beggar's daughter because you have beauty? Oh, God's light, a blast!"

A blast is a withered blossom. Blossoms bloom and then wither. Beauty blooms and then fades.

"Aye, Angelo," Paolo said.

Another thing that can be blasted is a friendship.

"You scornful baggage, you worthless woman," Angelo said. "I loved thee not as much as now I hate thee!"

Rachel knelt and prayed, "Upon my knees, you heavenly powers, I thank you, which thus have tamed his wild affections."

Angelo said to himself, "This will not do. I must again make an attempt upon her."

And her honor.

He had already made a successful attempt — attack — on his own honor.

He said out loud, "Rachel, oh, I wish that thou saw my heart, or did behold the place from whence that scalding sigh found a vent! Rachel, by Jesu, I love thee as my soul. Rachel, sweet Rachel!"

"What, again returned to this violent passion?" Rachel said.

"Do but hear me!" Angelo said. "By heaven, I love you, Rachel."

"Please, forbear! Stop!" Rachel said. "Oh, I wish that my Lord Ferneze were but here!"

Angelo said, "By God's blood, if he were, what would he do?"

Paolo stepped forward, slapped Angelo, and said, “This is what he would do, base villain!”

“My dear lord!” Rachel said.

Paolo said to Angelo:

“Thou monster, thou art even the soul of treachery! Oh, what dishonored title of reproach may my tongue spit in thy deserved face? I think my very presence should invert the steeled — hardened — organs of those traitorous eyes, to take into thy heart and pierce it through.

“Do thou turn thy eyes on the ground? Wretch, dig a grave with their sharp points to hide thy abhorred head!”

Eyes were thought to emit beams that enabled them to see. Angelo’s eyes (and the rest of him) were hardened spiritually and their beams were sharp enough to pierce his own heart and dig his own grave.

Paolo said to Rachel, “Sweet love, the wrongs done to thee have been too violent since my departure from thee, I perceive, but now true comfort shall again appear and, like an armed guardian angel, guard thee and keep thee safe from all the assaults of covered — covert — villainy.”

He said to Chamont, “Come, monsieur, let’s go and leave this wretch to his despair.”

Angelo began, “My noble Ferneze —”

Paolo interrupted:

“What, can thou speak to me, and not have thy tongue, forced with the torment of thy guilty soul, break that infected circle of thy mouth, like the rude clapper of a crazed bell?

“I, who in thy bosom lodged my soul, with all her train of secrets, thinking them to be as safe and richly entertained as in a prince's court or tower of strength, and thou to prove a traitor to my trust, and basely to expose it! Oh, this world!"

Angelo tried again to speak: "My honorable lord —"

Paolo again interrupted, "— the very owl, which other birds do stare and wonder at, shall hoot at thee, and snakes in every bush shall deafen your ears with their —"

In other words: Owls are strange creatures, but they will hoot at you, Angelo, who are stranger than they are. And snakes are deaf, but they will deafen you (by hissing at you).

"Nay, my good lord," Chamont said. "Give an end to your passionate anger."

"You shall see that I will redeem your lost opinion," Angelo said.

Rachel said to Paolo, "My lord, believe him."

"Come, be satisfied," Chamont advised Paolo. "Sweet lord, you know our haste. Let us get on horseback. The time for my promised return is past. Be friends again. Take him along with you."

"Come, Signor Angelo," Paolo said. "Hereafter prove more true and loyal."

They exited.

— 5.5 —

Count Ferneze, Maximilian, and Francisco Colonna talked together.

Count Ferneze said, "Tut, Maximilian, as for your honored self, I am persuaded; but no words shall turn away the edge of purposed vengeance on that wretch: Gaspar."

He then ordered his men-servants, "Come, bring him forth to execution."

His man-servants brought in Gaspar, who was tied with ropes.

Count Ferneze said, "I'll hang him for my son; he shall not escape, even if he had a hundred lives."

He then said to Gaspar, "Tell me, vile slave, do thou think that I love my son? Is he my flesh? Is he my blood, my life? And shall all these — my flesh, my blood, my life — be tortured for thy sake, and not be revenged?"

He ordered his man-servants, "Truss up and hang the villain."

"My lord, there is no law to confirm this action," Maximilian said. "It is dishonorable."

"Dishonorable, Maximilian?" Count Ferneze said. "It is dishonorable in Chamont. The day of his prefixed return is past, and he — Gaspar — shall pay for it."

"My lord, my lord, use your most extreme vengeance," Gaspar said. "I'll be glad to suffer ten times more for such a friend."

"Oh, resolute and peremptory — utter — wretch!" Count Ferneze said.

"My honored lord, let us entreat a word with you," Francisco Colonna said.

"I'll hear no more," Count Ferneze said. "I say he shall not live. I myself will hang him."

Count Ferneze advanced threateningly, but seeing an apparition, he stopped.

He said:

“Wait, what appearance is this that stands between him and me and stops my hand?”

“What miracle is this? It is my own imagination that carves this impression in me, my soft nature, which always has retained such foolish pity of the most abject creature’s misery that my soft nature abhors it! What a child am I to have a child! Woe to me! My son! My son!”

Christophero entered the scene and said to himself, “Oh, my dear love, Rachel, what has become of thee? What unjust absence lay thou on my breast like weights of lead, when swords are at my back that run me through with thy unkind flight? My gentle disposition grows wild. I shall run frantic. Oh, my love, my love!”

Jaques entered the scene and said to himself, “My gold, my gold, my life, my soul, my heaven! What has become of thee? See, I’ll impart my miserable loss to my good lord.”

He then said out loud to Count Ferneze, “Let me have search, my lord! My gold is gone!”

Count Ferneze said, “My son — Christophero, do you think it is possible that I ever shall behold my son’s face again?”

Christophero said to Jaques, “Oh, father, where’s my love? Were you so careless as to let an unthrift — a dissolute person — steal away your child?”

Jaques said to Count Ferneze, “I know Your Lordship may find out where is my gold. For God’s sake, pity me. Justice, sweet lord!”

Count Ferneze said, “Now that they have young Chamont, Christophero, surely they never will restore my son.”

Christophero said to Jaques, “Who would have thought you could have been so careless as to lose your only daughter?”

Jaques said to himself, “Who would think that, looking after my gold with such hare’s eyes, which are always open — aye, even when they sleep — I thus should lose my gold?”

This society believed that rabbits kept their eyes open even when asleep.

He said to Count Ferneze, “My noble lord, what says Your Lordship?”

“Oh, my son! My son!” Count Ferneze said.

“My dearest Rachel!” Christophero said.

“My most honey — sweet — gold!” Jaques said.

“Hear me, Christophero!” Count Ferneze said.

“Nay, hear me, Jaques!” Christophero said.

“Hear me, most honored lord!” Jaques said to Count Ferneze.

“What rule is here?” Maximilian said. “What can bring order here?”

“Oh, God, that we should let Chamont escape!” Count Ferneze said.

Aurelia and Phoenixella entered the scene.

“Aye, and that Rachel, such a virtuous maiden, should be thus stolen away!” Christophero said.

“And that my gold, being so hid in earth, should be found out!” Jaques said.

“Oh, confusion of languages, and yet no tower of Babel!” Maximilian said.

According to the Bible, people had attempted but failed to build a tower — the tower of Babel — that would reach heaven. To stop the building of the tower, God made the people speak different languages so that they could not work together.

Francisco Colonna said to Aurelia and Phoenixella, “Ladies, beshrew and curse me if you come not fit and ready to make a jangling consort. Will you laugh to see three constant passions?”

In this society, a consort is a company of musicians. In this society, a noise is also a company of musicians. The three constant passions were making a lot of noise.

The three constant passions were 1) the Count’s for his son, 2) Christophero’s for Rachel, and 3) Jaques’ for his gold.

“Stand by,” Maximilian said. “I will interrogate them.”

He said to Count Ferneze, “Sweet count, will you be comforted?”

Count Ferneze said, “It cannot be but he — Paolo — is handled the most cruelly that ever any noble prisoner was.”

He was still worried that his son was being cruelly mistreated as a prisoner of war.

Maximilian said to Christophero, “Steward, go cheer my lord: Count Ferneze.”

Still preoccupied with his passion, Christophero said, “Well, if Rachel took her flight willingly —”

Maximilian said to Jaques, “Sirrah, do you speak touching your daughter’s flight?”

Jaques had been speaking about his literal gold, but Maximilian and the others did not know that because Jaques was a beggar. Therefore, Maximilian thought that Rachel was his figurative gold.

Jaques said, “Oh, that I could so soon forget to know the thief again who had my gold, my gold!”

“Isn’t this purely a matter for wonder?” Maximilian said.

Count Ferneze said to Gaspar, “Oh, thou base wretch, I’ll drag thee through the streets, and, as a monster, make thee wondered at.”

Balthasar entered the room and walked over to Count Ferneze, who asked, “What is it now?”

Balthasar whispered to him that Paolo, his son, was coming.

Phoenixella said to Gaspar, “Sweet gentleman, how too unworthily are thou thus tortured!”

She then said, “Brave Maximilian, pity the poor youth and appease my father.”

Count Ferneze said, “What! My son Paolo has returned? Oh, Maximilian, Francisco, daughters! Tell Paolo to come here!”

— 5.6 —

Chamont, Paolo Ferneze, Rachel, Angelo, and some servants entered the scene.

Still disbelieving, Count Ferneze said to Balthasar, “Aren’t thou mocking me?”

Seeing his son, he said, “Oh, my dear Paolo, welcome!”

“My Lord Chamont!” Maximilian said.

“My Gaspar!” Chamont said.

“Rachel!” Christophero said.

“My gold, Rachel, my gold!” Jaques said.

“Somebody tell the beggar to cease his noise,” Count Ferneze said about Jaques.

Christophero said:

“Oh, Signor Angelo, would you deceive your honest friend — me — who simply trusted you?”

“Well, Rachel, I am glad thou are here again.”

Angelo said to Christophero, “Indeed, she is not for you, steward.”

Jaques said to Phoenixella, “I beseech you, madam, urge your father to find my gold.”

“I will soon,” Phoenixella said. “Good Jaques, be content and calm.”

Aurelia said, “Now, God-a-mercy — thank you! — Lady Fortune and sweet Venus! Let Cupid do his part, and all is well.”

She wanted Cupid to bring Chamont and her together.

“I think my heart’s in heaven with this comfort,” Phoenixella said.

She was happy because Gaspar would be spared.

Seeing that Gaspar had been about to be hanged, Chamont said, “Is this the true Italian courtesy?”

He then said to Count Ferneze, “Ferneze, were you tortured thus in France? By my soul’s safety!”

Count Ferneze had not been tortured in France when Chamont’s father had taken Vicenza. Why then was he torturing — even executing — Gaspar?

Count Ferneze knelt before Chamont, a much younger man, and said, “My most noble lord, I do beseech Your Lordship.”

He was begging for forgiveness.

Paolo's ropes were untied.

Chamont said, "Honored Count, don't wrong your age with the flexure of a knee. I do impute it to those cares and griefs that did torment you in the absence of your son."

Rising, Count Ferneze said, "Oh, worthy gentlemen, I am ashamed that my extreme affection to my son should give my honor so uncured a maim. But my first son, being in Vicenza lost —"

"What! In Vicenza? Did you lose a son there? About what time, my lord?" Chamont asked.

"Oh, the same night wherein your noble father took the town," Count Ferneze said.

"How long ago is that since, my lord? Can you remember?" Chamont asked.

"It is now well-nigh upon the twentieth year," Count Ferneze answered.

"And how old was he then?" Chamont asked.

"I cannot tell," Count Ferneze said. "Between the years of three and four, I take it."

"Had he no special note in his attire or otherwise that you can call to mind?" Chamont asked.

Count Ferneze answered, "I cannot well remember his attire, but I have often heard his mother say he had about his neck a tablet given to him by the Emperor Sigismund, his godfather, with this inscription under the figure of a silver globe: In minimo mundus."

A tablet is an inscribed medal or inscribed piece of wood.

The Latin motto means: "In the smallest thing, the whole world."

“What did you call your son, my lord?” Chamont asked.

“Camillo, Lord Chamont,” Count Ferneze answered.

Chamont said to Gaspar, “Then, you are no more my Gaspar, but Camillo! Take notice of and pay respect to your father, for Count Ferneze is, in fact, your father.”

Chamont then said to all present:

“Gentlemen, don’t stand amazed.”

He produced a medal and said:

“Here is a tablet with that inscription found about his neck that night and in Vicenza by my father, who, being ignorant what name he had, christened him Gaspar. Nor did I reveal this secret until this hour to any man.”

Crying, Count Ferneze said, “Oh, happy revelation! Oh, blessed hour! Oh, my Camillo!”

“Oh, strange!” Phoenixella said. “My brother!”

Francisco Colonna said, “Maximilian, see how the abundance of his joy drowns him — Count Ferneze — in tears of gladness.”

“Oh, my boy!” Count Ferneze said to Camillo/Gaspar. “Forgive thy father’s late austerity and harshness.”

Maximilian said, “My lord, I delivered as much before, but Your Honor would not be persuaded. I will hereafter give more credit to my visions. I dreamt of this.”

“I can be still no longer, my good lord,” Jaques said. “Do a poor man some grace among all your joys.”

“Why, what’s the matter, Jaques?” Count Ferneze asked.

Jaques said, “I am robbed, I am ruined, my lord, robbed and ruined! A heap of thirty thousand golden crowns was stolen from me in one minute and, I fear, by the help of her who calls me father! But she's none of mine. Therefore, sweet lord, let her be tortured to confess the truth."

"More wonders yet!" Maximilian said.

"What! Jaques! Isn't Rachel, then, thy daughter?" Count Ferneze asked.

"No, I legally disclaim her. I spit at her," Jaques said. "She is a harlot, and her customers — your son, this gallant named Angelo, and your steward here — have all been partners with her in my despoil. They have taken my riches, no less than thirty thousand golden crowns."

"Jaques, Jaques, this is impossible!" Count Ferneze said. "How should thou come to the possession of so huge a heap of coins, you being always a known beggar?"

Jacques said to himself, "Oh! Alas! I have betrayed myself with my own tongue. The case is altered."

He began to leave.

"Someone stop him there!" Count Ferneze ordered.

Maximilian said:

"What! Does he intend to depart?"

"Count Ferneze, upon my soul, this beggar is a counterfeit. Interrogate him."

He then asked Jaques, "Did thou lose gold?"

"Oh, no, I lost no gold," Jaques lied.

"Is what I said not true?" Maximilian asked.

Count Ferneze asked Jaques, "How did thou first lose thirty thousand crowns, and now thou lost no gold? Was Rachel first thy child, and is she now not thy daughter? Sirrah Jaques, you know how far our Milan laws extend for the punishment of liars.”

“Aye, my lord,” Jaques answered.

He said to himself, “What shall I do? I have no starting-holes.”

Starting-holes are literally holes in which hunted prey takes refuge. For human beings, they are figuratively places of refuge.

Jaques begged, “Monsieur Chamont, stand and take a place as my honored lord. Be my protector.”

“For what, old man?” Chamont asked.

“Ill-gotten goods never thrive,” Jaques said. “I played the thief and now I am robbed myself. I am not as I seem, Jaques de Prie, nor was I born a beggar, as I am, but formerly I served as steward to your noble father.”

“What! Are you Melun, who robbed my father’s treasure and stole my sister?”

Melun/Jaques replied, “Aye, aye, that treasure is lost, but Isabel, your beautiful sister, here survives in Rachel. And, therefore, on my knees —”

He knelt.

Maximilian said, “Wait, Jaques [Melun], wait. The case still alters.”

Count Ferneze said, “Fair Rachel is sister to the Lord Chamont!”

Angelo said to Christophero, “Steward, your cake is dough, as well as mine.”

“Your cake is dough” means “your hopes are disappointed.”

Paolo said, "I see that honor's flames cannot be hid, no more than lightning in the blackest cloud."

Angelo was now doing the right thing: acknowledging that Isabel/Rachel was lost to him and letting Christophero know that she was lost to him as well. Isabel/Rachel and Paolo belonged together.

"So then, sirrah, it is true that you have lost this gold?" Maximilian asked.

"Aye, worthy signor, thirty thousand crowns," Melun/Jaques said.

"By the Mass, who was it who told me that a couple of my serving-men were become gallants recently?" Count Ferneze asked.

"By the Virgin Mary, it was I, my lord," Francisco Colonnia said. "My serving-man told me."

Onion and Juniper, both wearing fine clothing well above their station in life, entered the scene.

"What is this now? What pageant is this?" Maximilian asked.

"Come, Signor Onion, let's not be ashamed to appear," Juniper said. "Keep your state. Keep your dignity. Don't look ambiguous now."

"Don't look ambiguous" meant "look like one thing only: a gentleman."

"I won't look ambiguous, while I am in this suit of clothing," Onion said.

"Lordings, equivalence to you all," Juniper said.

He meant that Onion and he were equal to them now.

“We thought good to be so good as to see you, gentlemen,” Onion said.

“What? Monsieur Onion?” Maximilian said.

“How are thou doing, good captain?” Onion asked.

“What, are my hinds turned gentlemen?” Count Ferneze asked.

Hinds are servants.

“Hinds, sir?” Onion said. “By God’s blood, if that word — hinds — will bear legal action, it shall cost us a thousand pounds apiece but we’ll be revenged.”

“Will thou sell thy lordship, count?” Juniper asked Count Ferneze.

“What! Peasants purchase lordships?” Count Ferneze said.

“Is that any novels, sir?” Juniper asked.

By “novels,” he meant “news.”

“Oh, transmutation of elements!” Maximilian said. “It is certified you had pages.”

Alchemists believed in the transmutation of elements; they believed that they could transmute base metals such as iron and bronze into precious metals such as gold and silver. Onion and Juniper had been transmuted from members of the working class to (pseudo-)members of the upper class. They even had pages: boys who served them.

“Aye, sir, but it is known they proved ridiculous,” Juniper said. “They did pilfer, they did purloin, they did procrastinate our purses, for the which wasting of our stock we have put them to the stocks.”

Procrastinate? They seem to have wasted no time in helping themselves to their new masters' wealth.

The stocks were devices of punishments that would immobilize an offender's head, and/or hands, and/or feet.

"And thither shall you two go immediately," Count Ferneze said. "These are the villains who stole Jaques' gold. Take them away and set them in the stocks with their serving-men!"

"Onion, you will now be peeled," Maximilian said.

"The case is altered now," Francisco Colonna said.

"My good lord! My good lord!" Onion said.

Juniper said to Onion, "Away, scoundrel! Do thou fear a little elocution? Shall we be confiscate [have our property confiscated] now? Shall we droop now? Shall we be now in helogabalus?"

Heliogabalus was a corrupt Roman emperor.

Possibly, Juniper thought that "Helogabalus" was a location: Helot-opolis, the city of Helots. In ancient Sparta, helots were in an intermediate social class between ordinary slaves and free citizens.

Juniper and Onion had tried to be noblemen but had failed. Now they were going in the stocks as if they were beggars. After their punishment, they would return to the intermediate social class between nobles and beggars.

"Peace, peace, stop thy gabbling and chattering," Onion said.

"Take them away, away with them," Count Ferneze said. "What's this they prate?"

Some serving-men exited with Juniper and Onion.

Count Ferneze continued, "Keep the knaves securely restrained in the stocks. Strict inquisition shall presently be made for Jaques' gold, to be disposed at the pleasure of Chamont."

"She is your own, Lord Paolo, if your father will give his consent," Chamont said.

"She" was Chamont's sister: Isabel/Rachel.

"How are things now, Christophero?" Angelo said. "The case is altered."

"With you as well as me," Christophero said. "I am content, sir."

Since Rachel was now Isabel, the sister of a noble, she was no longer wife-material for Christophero.

Count Ferneze said to Chamont, "With all my heart. And in exchange of her, if with your fair acceptance it may stand, I tender my Aurelia to your love."

Aurelia's prayer had come true: She and Chamont would be wed.

Chamont said to Count Ferneze:

"I take her from Your Lordship with all thanks, and I bless the hour wherein I was made a prisoner, for the fruition of this present fortune, so full of happy and unlooked-for joys."

He then said to Melun/Jaques, "Melun, I pardon thee, and, as for the treasure, recover it, and hold it as thine own. It is enough for me to see my sister live in the circle of young Ferneze's arms, my friend Gaspar/Camillo, the son of such a noble father, and my unworthy self, enraptured above all, by being the lord to so divine a dame."

Maximilian said, "Well, I will now swear the case is altered."

Maximilian said to Aurelia:

“Lady, fare you well; I will subdue my affections for you.”

Maximilian said to Phoenixella:

“Madam, as for you, you are a professed virgin, and I will be silent.”

Phoenixella had shown no outward signs of romantic love. Indeed, the one person she loved that way had turned out to be her long-lost brother.

Maximilian said to Count Ferneze:

“My honorable Lord Ferneze, it shall become you at this time not to be frugal, but bounteous and open-handed; your fortune has been so to you.”

Maximilian said to Chamont:

“Lord Chamont, you are now no stranger. You must be made welcome. You have a fair, amiable, and splendid lady.

Maximilian said to Paolo and Camillo/Gaspar:

“But Signor Paolo, Signor Camillo, I know you are valiant; be loving.”

Maximilian said to Isabel/Rachel:

“Lady, I must be better known to you.”

Maximilian said to Christophero and Angelo:

“Signors, as for you, I pass you not, though I let you pass, for in truth I pass not for you.”

One meaning of “pass” is “care about.”

Maximilian was going to let Christophero and Angelo’s error pass, although he did not care for them. Their error, and the reason Maximilian did not care for them, was that they had pursued Isabel (Rachel), who was above them.

Also, of course, although Maximilian did not know this, they had pursued Isabel (Rachel) in a devious way, stealing her from her presumed father, not getting her love first, and in Angelo's case, lying to her.

Maximilian then concluded:

“Lovers, go to your nuptials.

“Lordings, go to your dances.

“March fair and walk briskly, all, for a fair March is worth a king's ransom.”

A dry March meant a good harvest. A proverb stated, “A bushel of March dust is worth a king's ransom.”

PAGES.

CHORUS.

The SCENE: ROME.

The TIME: 63-62 B.C.E.

Before the events of the play:

In 65 B.C.E., the first Catilinarian conspiracy took place. In it, Catiline and others plotted to kill the Roman Consuls. The plot failed.

After the events of the play:

In 48 B.C.E., Julius Caesar defeats Pompey in the civil war.

In 44 B.C.E., Julius Caesar becomes dictator perpetuo, but he is assassinated on the Ides of March (March 15).

NOTES:

Spoiler Alert: Catiline loses. Ben Jonson's play includes a scene in which the Roman Senators decide how some of Catiline's co-conspirators will be punished.

Cicero defeated Catiline in an election to be one of the two Consuls who would rule Rome in 63 B.C.E. Catiline formed a conspiracy, and Cicero, an excellent politician as well as an excellent orator and an excellent author, thwarted it, something he boasted about in many later speeches.

At the time, and later, the Roman Republic was under attack. Later, people would accuse Julius Caesar of wanting to be crowned King of Rome. Two triumvirates — a triumvirate is a group of three powerful men — would exercise power in Rome at different times. Eventually, Octavius Caesar, the adopted son of Julius Caesar, would defeat Mark Antony and become Rome's first Emperor, ending Rome's republic.

In this play, Catiline is a villain and Cicero is a hero.

Pietas means proper, dutiful behavior. It means respect for things for which respect is due, including gods, family, and destiny. In Virgil's Aeneid, Aeneas is noted for his pietas, as when he carries his father on his back out of Troy when the city fell to the Greeks. When this book refers to piety, it is referring to this kind of dutiful behavior.

We don't read drama to learn history. In Ben Jonson's play, Catiline is thoroughly evil. In real life, he may have been thoroughly evil or may simply have had rumors spread about him. For some of his reputed evil deeds, such as committing adultery with a Vestal nun, he was found innocent in a court of law. Winston Churchill is thought to be the originator of the quotation "History is always written by the victors."

Sulla: 138–78 B.C.E.

Lucius Sergius Catiline: 108–62 B.C.E.

In this society, a person of higher rank would use "thou," "thee," and "thy" when referring to a person of lower rank. (These terms were also used affectionately and between equals.) A person of lower rank would use "you" when referring to a person of higher rank. This book uses Jonson's "thou," "thee," and "thy" only in a scene with Fulvia and Sempronia.

Roman Offices

Consuls: The office of Consul was the highest political office of the Roman Republic. Two Consuls were elected each year and served for one year. Cicero is one of the two Consuls elected early in this play.

Praetors: A Praetor can be 1) the commander of an army, or 2) a magistrate. The office of Praetor (magistrate) is the second highest political office of the Roman Republic. They were subject only to the veto of the Consuls. Praetors could take the auspices, the performance of which was a religious rite. In 63 B.C.E. Lentulus, Flaccus, and Pomptinus were Praetors. After the events of this play, Julius Caesar served as Praetor in 62 B.C.E.

Lictors: Lictors served the Consuls and carried rods and axes as symbols of the Senators' authority. Rods were symbols of the Consuls' power to inflict corporal punishment, and axes were symbols of their power to inflict capital punishment. Lictors executed punishments on those convicted.

Tribunes: Tribunes were administrative officers in Rome. Some were judicial Tribunes, and some were military Tribunes.

Aediles: An Aedile was a Roman magistrate who was in charge of maintaining public buildings. They also organized public festivals and were in charge of weights and measures.

Censors: They supervised public morality and maintained the census.

Prefects: They had civil or military power, but that power was delegated to them from others.

ACT 1 (Catiline's Conspiracy)

— 1.1 —

The ghost of Sulla, a deceased dictator of Rome, appeared. The year was 63 B.C.E., and he had been dead for 15 years. The first Roman civil war pitted Sulla versus Marius. Sulla won. As dictator, in 81 B.C.E. Sulla condemned many people to death by putting their names on proscription lists. The young Catiline had fought under him.

Sulla's Ghost now prophesied the destruction of Rome and urged Catiline to be cruel and commit the vilest deeds:

“Don't you feel me, Rome? Not yet? Is night so heavy on you, and my weight so light?”

“Can Sulla's Ghost arise within your walls and be regarded as less than an earthquake threatening the imminent destruction of you and yours?”

Sulla's Ghost continued:

“Don't the frightened heads of your lofty towers shake? Don't they shrink to their very foundations?”

“Won't the collapse of your lofty towers fill the large Tiber River and make the river swell up and drown the seven proud hills that you are built on?”

“What sleep is this that seizes you, a sleep so like death and yet is not death? Wake, and feel her — feel death — in my breath.”

“Behold, I come, sent from the Stygian sound — the River Styx — like a poisonous dire vapor that had cleft the ground to mix with the night and blight the day, or like a pestilence that would display and spread infection through the world — which, thus, I do.”

He pointed to the infection: Catiline, who was in his study.

Sulla's Ghost continued:

“May Pluto, god of the Land of the Dead, be present at your — Catiline's — deliberations; and let Sulla's spirit enter into your darker bosom. All that was mine, and bad, let your breast inherit.

“Alas, how weak is that, for Catiline!

“Did I but say — vain voice! — all that was mine?

“All that the Gracchi, Cinna, Marius — revolutionaries all — would; and what now, if I — coming from hell — had a body again, I could; what fiends would wish would be; and worse than Hannibal the Carthaginian general who brought elephants across the Alps to attack Rome could have wished to see, I wish you, Catiline, to think and carry out.”

The Gracchi were two brothers who instituted land and social reforms; they were opposed by the conservative Senators and were murdered separately, in 133 and 121 B.C.E. Some people may think that the reforms of the Gracchi were justified; Sulla does not.

During Sulla's absence from Rome, Cinna and Marius wreaked vengeance on Roman aristocrats.

Hannibal terrified Roman citizens in the Second Punic War.

Sulla's Ghost was wishing for Catiline to be as revolutionary as the Gracchi, as vengeful as Cinna and Marius, as fiendish as fiends, and to terrify Roman citizens worse than Hannibal could have wished to do.

Sulla's Ghost continued:

“Let the long-hid seeds of treason in you now shoot forth in evil deeds ranker than horror, and your former evil crimes not be mentioned except to urge the doing of new evil acts.

“Let your consciousness of your former crimes provoke you on to commit more crimes.

“Let your incests, murders, and rapes be always in your mind.

“Let your raping first a Vestal nun be always in your mind.”

The Vestal nun was Fabia, the half-sister of Cicero’s wife: Terentia.

Vestal nuns were virgins who attended on Vesta, goddess of the hearth.

“Let your parricide, recently, on your own only son, be always in your mind after his mother, to make empty way for your most recent wicked nuptials, be always in your mind.”

In this culture, “parricide” referred to the murder of a close relative, who was not necessarily a father. Catiline murdered his first wife and his son in order to be able to marry his second wife, who was wealthy and beautiful and did not wish to have an adult stepson.

“Worse than those crimes is that blazing, flagrant crime, that act of your incestuous life, which got you at once a daughter and a wife.”

Catiline had committed incest with his own daughter.

“I pass over and don’t mention the slaughters that you did for me, of Senators, for which I hid for you your murder of your brother, being so bribed, and wrote him in the list of my proscribed after your evil deed, to save your little shame.”

Catiline was accused of murdering people for Sulla after Sulla made up his lists of proscriptions. These were lists of people whom Sulla regarded as enemies of the state. They were murdered, and their property was confiscated. Catiline murdered his own brother-in-law. After the murder, the brother-in-law's name was added to a list of proscriptions, making the murder legal.

Sulla's Ghost continued:

“Your incest with your sister I do not name.

“All of these crimes I have mentioned are too slight and trivial.

“Fate will have you pursue new evil deeds after which no evil can be new: The new evil deeds will result in the ruin of your country.

“You were built for such a work, and you were born for no less guilt.

“So what if you were defeated once before, and your plot was discovered? Attempt now to overthrow your country once again.”

Catiline had been involved in a conspiracy to murder Roman Consuls and Senators two years earlier in 65 B.C.E.

Sulla's Ghost continued:

“The ruin of Rome is your act, or none.

“What all the several evils that visit earth, brought forth by night with a sinister birth — what plagues, famine, fire — and what the sword and sicknesses of excess, could not achieve, let your fury do.”

In this society, night air was regarded as dangerous.

Sulla's Ghost continued:

“Make all past, present, future evil your own, and conquer all example — outdo all previous similar crimes and evils — in your own singular example.

“Nor let your thought find any vacant time to hate an old crime, but always let a fresher crime drown the remembrance of the old crime.

“Don’t let evil cease, but while it is in the act of punishing, let it increase.

“Let conscience and care — worry and caution — die in you and let not even heaven itself be free from your impiety — your neglect of your duty to gods and men.

“Let night grow blacker with your plots, and let day, at the showing of just your head forth, start away from this half-sphere (the half of the world illuminated by the sun), and leave Rome’s blinded — deprived of light — walls to embrace lusts, hatreds, slaughters, funerals, and not recover sight until their own flames light them to their ruins.

“Let all the names of your confederates, too, be no less great in Hell than here, so that when we would repeat our strengths in a roll-call of names, we may name you all.”

In Dante’s Inferno, the sinners in the lower circles of Hell do not wish to give Dante the Pilgrim their names because they do not want to be remembered in the Land of the Living.

“And let Furies call upon you for Furies, while what you do may strike them into fears, or make them grieve and wish your evil deeds theirs.”

Sulla was saying that he wanted Catiline and his co-conspirators to become more dreadful than the Furies: avenging goddesses of Hell. He wanted Catiline and his co-conspirators to strike fear into the Furies or to make the Furies grieve because Catiline and his co-conspirators did more fearsome deeds than they — the Furies — did.

Sulla's Ghost exited.

Catiline had been unable to hear the words that Sulla's Ghost had spoken, although those words had echoed some of his own thoughts.

Alone in his study, Catiline spoke:

“It is decided; I know what I shall do. Nor shall your fate, Rome, resist my vow. Though hills were set on hills and seas met seas to guard you, I would win through.”

The giants Otus and Ephialtes wanted to pile mountain on mountain to attack — not protect — the gods. These two giants made war against the gods and attempted to carry away goddesses to make them their wives. Otus wanted to marry Diana, and Ephialtes wanted to marry Juno. Part of their plan was to pile the mountains Ossa and Pelion on top of Mount Olympus. The Olympian gods defeated the two giants.

The steep Alps help protect northern Italy from invasions.

The Tyrrhenian Sea, the Ionian Sea, and the Adriatic Sea help guard Italy.

Catiline continued:

“Aye, plow up rocks, steep as the Alps, in dust and dip up the Tyrrhenian Sea waters into clouds, but I would reach your head, proud city.

“The evils that I have done cannot be made safe and secure from reprisal except by greater attempts to do greater evils; and I feel a spirit within me that chides my sluggish hands and says they have been innocent and have not been doing harm for too long.”

An attempt is a dangerous undertaking, such as an assault or attack.

Catiline continued:

“Was I a man bred great as Rome herself? One formed for all her honors, all her glories, equal to all her titles? A man who could stand close up with Atlas, and sustain Rome’s name as strongly as Atlas holds up heaven on his shoulders?”

Atlas was a Titan — a pre-Olympian god — who was condemned to hold up the sky for eternity after the Titans lost a war against the Olympian gods.

Catiline continued:

“And was I, of all Rome’s brood, marked out for the repulse — defeat in the election — by Rome’s no-voice, no-vote, and rejection, when I stood as a candidate to be commander in the Pontic War?”

The Roman general Pompey defeated King Mithridates VI, King of Pontus, in the Third Mithridatic War. Catiline resented not being given command of the Roman forces.

Catiline continued:

“I will hereafter call Rome my stepdame and no true mother, forever. If she can lose her nature, I can lose my piety, and in her stony entrails I will dig me a seat where I will live again as the labor of her womb, and I will be a burden weightier than all the prodigies and monsters that she has been pregnant with and given birth to since she first knew Mars.”

According to Catiline, Rome has treated him badly and so he will make her give birth to him as a monster worse than all the other monsters she has given birth to.

Mars, the Roman god of war, was the father of Romulus and Remus, twin brothers who founded Rome. Their mother was Rhea Silva.

Aurelia, Catiline's wife, entered the study.

"Who's there?" Catiline asked.

"It is I," Aurelia answered.

"Aurelia?"

"Yes."

"Appear," Catiline said, "and break like day, my beauty, to this circle — this orb, this world. Upbraid your sun-god Phoebus Apollo because he is so long in mounting to that summit that should give you your proper splendor."

The name "Aurelia" is derived from the Latin word aureus, which means "golden."

"Why does my sweetheart frown?" Catiline asked. "Have I too long been absent from these lips, this cheek, these eyes?"

He kissed them.

"What is my trespass?" Catiline said. "Speak."

"It seems you know what your trespass is, you who can accuse yourself," Aurelia answered.

In fact, he had too long been absent from her lips, her cheek, her eyes.

"I will redeem it," Catiline promised.

"Always you say you will," Aurelia Orestilla responded. "But when?"

Catiline answered, "When Orestilla, by bearing well these my retirements and stolen times for thought, shall give their effects permission to call her Queen of all the world, in place of humbled Rome.”

Catiline was plotting to become King of Rome. That was the reason for his retirements and stolen times for thought. When he and Aurelia became King and Queen of Rome, there would be no need for these retirements and stolen times for thought, he believed.

“You court me now,” Aurelia said.

He wanted to put her in a royal court, and he was courting — persuading — her to act the way he wanted her to act.

“As I would always, love, by this ambrosiac kiss” — he kissed her — “and” — he kissed her a second time — “this kiss of nectar.”

Ambrosia is the food of the gods, and nectar is the drink of the gods.

Catiline continued:

“If you would only hear as gladly as I speak. Could my Aurelia think I meant her less when, wooing her, I first removed a wife and then a son in order to make my bed and house spacious and fit to embrace her?”

He was referring to his murdering his first wife and then his son so that he could marry Aurelia, his second wife.

Catiline continued:

“These were deeds not to have begun with but to end with more and greater. He who, building, stops at one floor, or the second, has erected nothing.

“I was meditating on how to raise you and make you Queen of Rome. I was meditating on how to make some act of mine answer your love, that love which, when my state was now quite sunk, came with your wealth and raised it up again.”

Aurelia's wealth had allowed Catiline to pay off his debts.

Catiline continued:

“Your love that also made my arising fortune once more look above the main, above the high sea, which now shall hit the stars and stick my Orestilla there, among them, if any tempest can but make the billow, and any billow can but lift her greatness.”

Heroes and great personages are found among the stars in constellations such as those named after Orion the Hunter, Hercules, and Perseus.

Catiline continued:

“But I must pray to my love that she will put on like habits with myself and act as I do. I have to do with many men and many natures.”

Catiline was skilled at manipulating people. He wanted her to also manipulate people.

The word “habits” meant 1) clothes, and 2) habitual practice. Catiline wanted his wife, like him, to dress and act a part in order to manipulate people.

Catiline continued:

“Some men must be blown — puffed up — and soothed, such as Lentulus, whom I have exalted with exaggerating his noble blood and family and with a vain dream out of the Sibyl's books of prophecy.”

Sibyls are female prophets.

Before Rome became a republic, an old woman — the Cumaean Sibyl in disguise — arrived in Rome and offered to sell to King Tarquin — Lucius Tarquinius Superbus, the last Roman king — nine books of prophecy at a high price. When he declined to buy them, the Sibyl burned three books and then offered to sell to him the remaining six books at the same high price. When he declined to buy them, the Sibyl burned three more books and then offered to sell to him the remaining three books at the same high price. He bought them.

Catiline continued:

“The vain dream is that a third man of that great family whereof he is descended, the Corneli, should be a king in Rome — which I have hired the flattering augurs to interpret the third man as being him, Cinna and Sulla being dead.”

According to these fortune-tellers, the three Corneli were Cinna, Sulla, and Lentulus. One of these men was supposed to become King of Rome, and Cinna and Sulla were dead. In fact, Catiline had bribed the augurs to interpret the Sibylline prophecies in this way.

Catiline continued:

“Then, there is bold Cethegus, whose valor I have turned into his poison and praised him so into daring that when I would bid him move, he would make an attack upon the gods, kiss lightning, wrest the thunderbolt away from the Cyclops, and fire the thunderbolt directly at the face of a full, swelling cloud, and resist his — Jove’s — anger.”

The one-eyed Cyclops made thunderbolts for Jupiter, king of gods and men, to use.

Catiline continued:

“Others there are whom malice to the state attracts and incites for contumelies — contemptuous treatment — received; and such are sure ones, such as Curius and the forenamed Lentulus, both of whom have been degraded in the Senate.”

In 70 B.C.E., the Censors threw Lentulus and Curius out of the Senate because of Lentulus' and Curius' immorality.

Catiline continued:

“And both must have their disgraces always newly rubbed — the disgraces are like a sore — to make them smart, and labor for revenge.

“Others are there whom mere ambition fires. They have vainly convinced themselves that they have a chance to achieve the governorship of provinces abroad, and I have promised the provinces to them.

“These men include Laeca, Vargunteius, Bestia, and Autronius.

“Some there are whom their needs oppress, such as the idle, unemployed captains of Sulla's troops; and diverse Roman knights, the profuse wasters of their patrimonies, who are so threatened by their debts that they will now take any desperate risk for a change.

“These for a time we must relieve and assist, Aurelia, and make our house their safeguard and protection; we must do that for those who fear the law, or stand within her control, for any act past or to come.

“Such men will be seditious because of their own crimes, as they will be from our crimes.

“Some more men there are, who are slight airlings — rash youngsters — and who will be won with the gifts of dogs, and horses, or perhaps a whore — which must be had.

“And if they risk their lives for us, Aurelia, we must risk our honors a little.

“Get a quantity and a variety of women, as I have gotten of boys; and give them time and place and every encouragement to sin.”

Some of the conspirators would be bribed with prostitutes, both female and male.

Catiline continued:

“You yourself, too, shall be courtly and be courtly flattering, and entertain, and feast, stay up late, and revel. Call all the great, the fair, and the spirited dames of Rome about you, and begin a fashion of freedom and social intercourse and licentiousness.

“Some will thank you, although the sour Senators frown, whose heads must ache in fear and feeling — and presentiment, too.”

The heads could ache because of the growing of the invisible horns that cuckolds — men with unfaithful wives — wore. Or the heads could ache because they were beaten.

Catiline continued:

“We must not spare either expense or modesty. It can but show like one of Juno’s or one of Jove’s disguises in either you or me; and will as soon, when things succeed, be thrown aside or let fall as is a veil put off, a mask changed, or the scene — a place of dramatic action — shifted in our theaters —”

The gods, such as Jupiter — Jove — and his wife, Juno, could assume disguises, pretending to be mortal humans, for example. When the need for the disguise was over, they would appear as their true immortal selves.

Catiline was interrupted by a noise outside the room.

“Who’s that?” he said. “It is the voice of Lentulus.”

“Or of Cethegus,” Aurelia said.

“Go into another room, my fair Aurelia, and think upon these stratagems,” Catiline said. “They must not see how far you are trusted with these secret matters, although you rise on their shoulders, necks, and heads.”

The rebellion of these men could make Aurelia the Queen of Rome.

Aurelia exited the room from one door.

Lentulus and Cethegus entered from another door.

Lentulus was a disgraced Senator who hoped to become King of Rome because of a supposed prophecy by the Cumaean Sibyl, and Cethegus was a young Senator.

“It is, I think, a morning full of fate!” Lentulus said. “Dawn rises slowly, as if her sullen car — her gloomy, sluggish chariot — had all the weights of sleep and death hung at it.”

In Roman mythology, the goddess Dawn arrives in a chariot pulled by two horses.

Lentulus continued, “Dawn is not rosy fingered but swollen black. Her face is like a water turned to blood, and her sick head is bound about with clouds, as if she threatened night before the noon of day. This dawn does not look as if it would have a ‘hail’ or ‘health’ wished in it, as on other morns.”

“Hail” is a Roman greeting.

Cethegus said, “Why, all the fitter, Lentulus: Our coming is not for salutation; we have business to conduct.”

“Nobly said, brave Cethegus,” Catiline said.

Then he asked, “Where’s Autronius?”

“Hasn’t he come?” Cethegus asked.

“He is not here,” Catiline said.

“Hasn’t Vargunteius come?” Cethegus asked.

“No,” Catiline answered.

Cethegus said, “Let a fire be in their beds and bosoms, who so will serve their sloth rather than virtue and courage! They are no Romans, not when they act so lethargically at such a time of high need as now.”

Lentulus said, “Both Autronius and Vargunteius, as well as Longinus, Laeca, Curius, Fulvius, and Gabinius, gave me the word last night, by Lucius Bestia, that they would all be here, and early.”

“They did?” Cethegus said. “As you would have overslept, had I not called you. Come, we all sleep and are mere sleepy dormice, flies little less than dead; more dullness hangs on us than on the morn. We’re spirit-bound in ribs — bars — of ice; our whole bloods are one stone; and honor cannot thaw us, nor our wants, although they burn hot as fevers to our states of being.”

“I wonder why they would be tardy at an hour of so great purpose and importance,” Catiline said.

Cethegus said:

“If the gods had called them to a purpose, they would just have come with the same tortoise speed, they who are thus slow to have come to such an action, which the gods will envy, as asking no less means than all their powers conjoined to effect.

“I would have seen Rome burnt by this time, and her ashes in an urn, the kingdom of the Senate rent asunder, and the degenerate talking gown run frightened out of the air of Italy.”

The degenerate talking gown is Cicero, the orator who, like other Roman citizens, wore a toga during formal occasions.

“Spirit of men!” Catiline said, praising Cethegus. “You heart of our great enterprise! How much I love these voices — these opinions and expressions of emotion — in you!”

Cethegus said, “Oh, for the days of Sulla’s sway, when the free sword took leave to act all that it would!”

Catiline added, “And the sword was as familiar with entrails as our augurs!”

Augurs sacrificed animals and examined their entrails as a way of divining the future. Sulla’s supporters were as familiar with the entrails of humans as augurs were with the entrails of animals.

Cethegus said, “Sons killed fathers. Brothers killed their brothers.”

Catiline added, “And they received price — high esteem — and praise for acting in such a way. All hate had license given to it, and all rage was given the reins so it could run unchecked.”

Cethegus said, “Slaughter straddled the streets and stretched himself to seem huger, while to his stained thighs the gore he drew flowed up and carried down whole heaps of limbs and bodies through the arch made by Slaughter’s legs. No age was spared, and neither sex was spared.”

“None, and no rank in society,” Catiline said.

“Infants in the entrance of life were not free from slaughter,” Cethegus said. “The sick, the old, who could hope for only a day longer to live by the natural order of things, were not allowed to stay that extra day in the Land of the Living. Virgins and widows, matrons, pregnant wives — all died.”

“It was crime enough that they had lives,” Catiline said.

To Catiline, the fact that these people were alive was reason enough to kill them.

He continued, “To strike but only those who could do hurt was dull, and poor. Some fell to make the number, as some fell to make the prey, aka the booty.”

Some died simply to increase the number of the dead; others died because they had possessions that could be looted.

Cethegus said, “The rugged Charon fainted, and asked for a navy, rather than a boat, to ferry the newly dead over the river Styx to the sad, sorry, heavy world that is the Land of the Dead.”

Charon was a ferryman who transported the souls of the dead across a river to Hades, the Land of the Dead. So many people died in Sulla’s civil war that Charon needed an entire navy rather than a single ferry to transport the souls of the dead.

Cethegus continued, “The maws — stomachs — and dens of beasts could not receive the bodies that those souls were frightened from; and even the graves were filled with men yet living, whose flight and fear had mixed them with the dead.”

“And this shall be again, and more, and more,” Catiline said, “now that Lentulus, the third Cornelius, is to stand up and be eminent in Rome.”

“Nay, don’t urge that which is so uncertain,” Lentulus said.

“What do you mean?” Catiline said.

“I mean, not cleared and proven to be trustworthy, and therefore not to be reflected on,” Lentulus said.

“The Sibyl’s leaves uncertain?” Catiline said. “Or the comments of our grave, deep, divining men not clear?”

The Cumaean Sibyl wrote her prophecies on leaves.

The augurs interpreted those prophecies.

“All prophecies, you know, suffer the torture,” Lentulus said.

Roman slaves and foreigners were tortured to extract confessions or testimony.

Prophecies tend to be uncertain and unclear. Many meanings can be tortured — interpreted — out of them.

“But this prophecy already has confessed without torture,” Catiline said, “and it has been so weighed, examined, and set forth that it would be malicious ignorance in that man who would be faint in the belief.”

According to Catiline, the prophecy that Lentulus would be King of Rome was completely clear.

“Do you believe it?” Lentulus asked.

“Do I love Lentulus?” Catiline asked. “Or pray to see him become King of Rome?”

“The augurs all are in agreement in saying that I am the member of the Cornelius family meant to be King of Rome,” Lentulus said.

The augurs — whom Catiline had bribed — all said that the prophecy stated that Lentulus would be king.

“They would have shown that they had lost their science of augury if they were not in agreement,” Catiline said.

“They count from Cinna,” Lentulus said.

Lucius Cornelius Cinna had been a four-time Consul of Rome.

“And Sulla next, and so that makes you the third, and the third shall be king,” Catiline said. “All who can say the sun has risen must think it.”

Lentulus’ becoming king soon was as obvious as the newly risen sun. So said Catiline.

“Men notice me more recently, as I come forth,” Lentulus said.

Catiline said:

“Why, what can they do less? Cinna and Sulla are set like the sun, and they are gone; and we must turn our eyes on him who is, and shines.

“Noble Cethegus, just view him with me, here! He looks already as if he shook a scepter over the Senate and the awed purple dropped their rods and axes!”

Roman Senators wore a tunic or a toga with a purple stripe, and their Lictors carried rods and axes as symbols of the Senators’ authority. Rods were symbols of their power to inflict corporal punishment, and axes were symbols of their power to inflict capital punishment.

Catiline continued, “The statues melt again.”

In 65 B.C.E., lightning struck the Capitol and melted statues — a foreboding omen.

Catiline continued, “And household gods in groans confess the travail of the city.”

When Troy fell, the greatest Trojan warrior, Hector, who was carrying the image of Vesta, goddess of the hearth, appeared before Aeneas in a dream and told him to leave the burning city and to rescue the city’s household gods. Later, the household gods appeared to Aeneas in a dream and told him to go to Italy, where Aeneas became an important ancestor of the Romans.

Catiline continued, “The very walls sweat blood before the change; and stones start out to ruin, before the change comes.”

“But he, and we, and all are idle still,” Cethegus said.

“I am your obedient follower, Sergius,” Lentulus said.

Catiline’s full name was Lucius Sergius Catiline.

Lentulus continued, “And whatever the great Cornelian name shall succeed in becoming, it is not augury, nor the Sibyl’s books, but Catiline who makes it.”

“I am the shadow to honored Lentulus and Cethegus here, who are the heirs of Mars,” Catiline said.

Cethegus praised Catiline by saying, “By Mars himself, I say that Catiline is more my parent, for whose virtue Earth cannot make a shadow great enough, although envy should come, too.”

Others were heard approaching.

“Oh, there they are,” Cethegus said. “Now we shall talk more, although we yet do nothing.”

Autronius, Vargunteius, Longinus, Curius, Laeca, Bestia, Fulvius, Gabinius, and some servants entered Lucius Sergius Catiline’s study.

“Hail, Lucius Catiline,” Autronius said.

“Hail, noble Sergius,” Vargunteius said to Catiline.

“Hail, Publius Lentulus,” Longinus said.

“Hail, the third Cornelius,” Longinus said to Lentulus.

“Caius Cethegus, hail,” Laeca said.

“Hail, sloth and words, instead of men and spirits,” Cethegus said to everyone.

Trying to keep the peace, Catiline said, “Nay, dear Caius —”

“Are your eyes unsealed yet?” Caius Cethegus said. “Are your eyes still blinded?”

A young falcon’s eyes were stitched closed — sealed — during its early training. After its training, the falcon’s stitches were removed.

Cethegus continued, “Dare they look at even a dull day?”

Catiline said, “He’s zealous for the affair concerning which you have come, and he blames you for your tardy coming, gentlemen.”

Cethegus began, “Unless we had sold ourselves to sleep and ease, and would be our slaves’ slaves —”

Trying to keep the peace, Catiline interrupted, “— please don’t criticize them.”

Cethegus began, “The north is not so stark and cold —”

Catiline interrupted, “— Cethegus —”

“We shall redeem all, if your fire will let us,” Bestia said.

“You are too full of lightning, noble Caius,” Catiline said to Cethegus.

He then said to a servant, “Boy, see that all the doors are shut so that no one approaches us in this part of the house.”

He then ordered another servant, “Go and tell the priest to kill the slave I designated last night and tell him to bring me some of the slave’s blood when I shall call for him.

“Until then, all you servants wait outside.”

The servants exited.

Darkness appeared and covered the scene. It was an omen.

“What is it, Autronius?” Vargunteius asked.

“Longinus?” Autronius asked.

“Curius?” Longinus asked.

“Laeca?” Curius asked.

“Do you feel nothing?” Vargunteius asked.

“A strange unwonted horror invades me,” Longinus said. “I don’t know what it is. A darkness comes over the place.”

“The day goes back,” Laeca said. “Or else my senses do.”

“As at Atreus’ feast!” Curius said.

Atreus and Thyestes were brothers, but Thyestes committed adultery with Atreus’ wife and through trickery took Atreus’ crown as King of Mycenae. To get revenge, Atreus killed Thyestes’ three sons and cooked them, except for their hands and feet. After Thyestes had eaten the flesh of his sons, Atreus showed him their hands and feet, which Thyestes recognized. In horror at the deed, the gods caused darkness.

“Darkness grows more and more!” Fulvius said.

“The vestal flame on the altar in Vesta’s shrine in the Roman Forum, I think, has gone out,” Lentulus said.

This was indeed an ominous sign.

A groan of many people sounded from underground.

Hades, the Land of the Dead, is located underground.

“What groan was that?” Gabinius asked.

“It comes from our imaginations,” Cethegus said. “Let us strike fire out of ourselves and force a day. We can provide light through our own fieriness.”

One way to create fire is by striking flint against metal.

Another groan sounded from underground.

“Again it sounds!” Autronius said.

“As if all the city gave it!” Bestia said.

“We fear what we ourselves imagine,” Cethegus said.

A fiery light appeared.

“What light is this?” Vargunteius asked.

“Look out the window!” Curius said.

“It still grows greater,” Lentulus said.

“From where does it come?” Laeca asked.

“It is a bloody arm that holds a pine torch lighted above the Capitol,” Longinus said, looking out the window. “And now it waves to us!”

“Splendid and full of omen!” Catiline said. “Our enterprise is sealed and confirmed.”

He interpreted the omen as propitious to their rebellion.

“In spite of darkness that would look with disfavor on it,” Cethegus said. “Look no more. We lose time and ourselves to what we came for. Speak, Lucius! We will pay attention to you.”

They were losing time by looking at the omens; although Cethegus did not know it, they were losing themselves by rebelling against the Roman Republic.

Lucius Sergius Catiline said:

“Noblest Romans, if you were less, or if your faith and virtue did not justify that title of Roman as does your blood and birth, I should not now unprofitably spend myself in words or snatch at empty hopes, by airy ways, for solid certainties.”

In other words, if those present had not shown themselves to be good Romans, Catiline would not now be speaking and forming plans, which would be uncertain (because not backed by good Romans) to achieve solid certainties: victory in their rebellion.

In his speech, Catiline was assuming both that the co-conspirators were good Romans and that the rebellion would succeed.

Catiline continued:

“But because in many, and the greatest, dangers, I always have known you to be no less true than valiant, and because I perceive in you the same inclinations to want or not want, to think things good or bad, alike with me — which testifies to and gives evidence of your firm friendship — I dare the more boldly to set out on foot with you or to lead to this great and goodliest — most splendid — action.

“What I have thought of it before, you all have heard individually. I then expressed my zeal to the glory. Now the need inflames me, when I consider beforehand the hard conditions that our states of condition must undergo, unless in due course we redeem ourselves to liberty and break the iron yoke forged for our necks.

“For, what less can we call it, when we see the commonwealth so monopolized by a few, the giants of the state, who by turns enjoy her and defile her? All the earth, her kings and petty rulers, are their tributaries — rulers who pay tribute. People and nations pay them hourly taxes and tribute money. The riches of the world flow to their coffers, and not to Rome’s.

“While, except for those few, the rest, however great we are, however honest and valiant, are herded with the common people, and so kept as if we were bred only to consume grain, or wear out wool, to drink the city’s water, to be without honors, without authority or distinction, trembling beneath their rods, to whom, if all were well in Rome, we should come forth like bright axes and be feared.”

According to Catiline, only a very few people in Rome enjoyed wealth and high rank. In contrast, Catiline and his co-conspirators, although deserving of wealth and high rank, were treated like mere consumers and common people. The great Romans wanted Catiline and his co-conspirators to fear their rod, but Catiline wanted himself and his co-conspirators to attack the great men of Rome with axes.

Catiline continued:

“All places, honors and magistracies, and high offices are theirs, or they are where they will confer them! They leave us the dangers and liability, the repulses, the judgments and decreed obligations, the lacks and wants, which how long will you bear, most valiant spirits?

“Wouldn’t we be better off to fall, once, with virtue than draw a wretched and dishonored breath, to lose with shame, when these men’s pride will laugh?

“I call the faith of gods and men as witness: The power is in our hands, our bodies are able, and our minds are as strong as our bodies. In contrast, in them all things have grown aged and decayed with their wealth and years.

“There lacks but only to begin the business. The outcome of our rebellion is certain.”

“On, let us go on,” Cethegus and Longinus said.

“Go on, brave Sergius,” Curius and Bestia said.

Lucius Sergius Catiline continued:

“It strikes my soul — and who can escape that stroke, whoever has a soul or just the smallest breath of man within him? — to see them swell with treasure, which they pour out in their riots, eating, drinking, building. Yes, building, in the sea, planing and making level of hills with valleys, and raising valleys above hills, while we lack the necessities to give to our bodies.

“They have their multiple houses, manors, lordships. We scarcely have a fire or a poor household god — a Lar!”

Actually, Catiline and the co-conspirators were members of the Roman upper class.

Catiline continued:

“They buy rare Attic statues, Tyrian hangings, Ephesian pictures, and Corinthian plate, Attalic garments, and now newly found gems since Pompey went for Asia. These things they purchase at the price of provinces.

“The river Phasis cannot afford them fowl nor can Lucrine Lake afford them oysters enough; Mount Circeo, too, is searched to please the ingenious gluttony of a meal!”

The wealthy of Rome were feasting so much that Italy could not supply them with sufficient quantities of delicacies.

Catiline continued:

“Their ancient habitations they neglect and set up new habitations; then, if the echo is not pleasing in such a room, they pluck down those and build newer, alter them, too; and by all frantic ways they vex and keep in constant use their wild wealth, as they molest the people from whom they forcibly grab it.

“Yet, they cannot tame or overcome or exhaust their riches: not by making baths, orchards, fish-pools, letting in of seas here, and then there forcing them out again with mountainous heaps, for which the earth has lost most of her ribs — strata of rock — as entrails, being now wounded no less for marble than for gold.

“We all this while, like calm, benumbed spectators, sit until our residences do crack, and we do not hear the thundering ruins, while at home our needs, abroad our debts, subject us to pressure, our states of condition daily tending to bad, our hopes to worse; and what is left but for us to be crushed?

“Wake, wake, brave friends, and meet the liberty you often have wished for! Behold: Renown, riches, and glory court you. Fortune holds out these to you as rewards.

“I think, even if I were silent and unable to speak, the affair itself, the opportunity, your needs and dangers, with the splendid spoil the war brings, should invite you.

“Treat me as your general or your soldier. Neither my mind nor my body shall be lacking to you. And, once being newly elected Consul, I do not fear to do and effect all that you wish, as long as your trust in me does not flatter and blind me, and as long as you’d not rather still be slaves than be free.”

“Free! Free!” Cethegus said.

“It is freedom we choose!” Longinus said.

“It is freedom we all stand for!” Curius said.

“Why, these are noble voices!” Catiline said. “Nothing is lacking, then, but that we take a solemn oath to strengthen our commitment to our plot.”

“And so to act it,” Cethegus said. “Deferring and delaying hurts, where powers are so prepared.”

The word “powers” can mean 1) strengths, and 2) troops.

Autronius said, “Yet, before we enter into open act of rebellion — with your permission — it would be no loss, if it might be enquired what the condition of these arms would be?”

Autronius, who had been involved two years earlier in the first Catilinarian conspiracy, which failed, was rightly concerned about things that might stop this new conspiracy from succeeding.

“Aye, and the means to carry us through?” Vargunteius said.

Catiline said, “What, friends! Do you think that I would ask you to grasp the wind? Or call you to the embracing of a cloud?”

Ixion tried to rape the goddess Juno, but her husband, Jupiter, king of the gods, foiled the attempt by making a cloud take on the appearance of Juno. Punished in Hades, Ixion is bound on a flaming wheel that constantly spins.

Catiline continued:

“Do you think I would risk your recognized valors — your worth and valor — in so dear a business and have no other second — support and assistance — than the danger, nor any other garland than the loss? Become your own assurances and guarantees.

“And, for the means, consider, first, the stark safety — the absolute feeling of security from danger — the commonwealth is in now. The whole Senate is sleepy and is dreaming about no such violent blow.

“Their forces — armies — are all abroad, of which the greatest, which might annoy us most, is farthest off, in Asia under the command of Pompey. Those forces that are near at hand are commanded by our friends. One army in Spain is commanded by Gnaeus Piso; the other army in Mauritania is commanded by Nucerinus. Both of these generals I have firm and fast — they are committed to helping us in our plot.

“I myself, then, am standing as a candidate now to be Consul, with my hoped-for colleague Caius Antonius, one who is no less engaged and committed to our cause by his wants and needs than we are, and whom I have the power to melt and cast in any mold.”

Catiline was saying that he could manipulate Caius Antonius, who was also campaigning to be one of the two Consuls for the next year.

Catiline continued:

“Besides these men, there are some others who will not yet be named, both sure and great ones, who, when the time comes, shall declare themselves strong for our party; so that no resistance in nature — that is, anywhere — can be thought.

“As for our reward after our victory, then:

“First, all our debts are paid.

“The dangers of law, actions, decrees, judgments against us are acquitted.

“The rich men, as in Sulla’s times, are proscribed, and confiscation made of all their goods.”

Catiline pointed to various co-conspirators as he said, continuing to use the present tense:

“That house is yours; that land is his; those waters, orchards, and walks are a third’s. He has that honor, and he has that office. Such a province falls to Vargunteius, this province falls to Autronius, that province falls to bold Cethegus, Rome falls to Lentulus.

“You share the world, her magistracies, priesthoods, wealth, and felicity among yourselves, friends, and Catiline is your servant.

“Would you, Curius, revenge the contumely and disgrace stuck upon you in being removed from the Senate? Now, now is your time to do so.

“Would Publius Lentulus strike blows for the like disgrace? Now is his time.

“Would stout and bold Longinus walk the streets of Rome, openly opposing and defying the important person who holds the powerful office of Praetor? Now has he a time to spurn and tread the fasces — bundles of rods and a single-headed ax — into dirt made of the usurers’ and the Lictors’ brains.”

Dirt can be excrement. If the co-conspirators wanted to, they could cannibalize the brains of their enemies and turn them into excrement.

Catiline continued:

“Is there a beauty here in Rome you love? An enemy you would kill? What head’s not at your mercy? Whose wife, which boy, whose daughter, of what family or class, that the husband or glad parents shall not bring you and boast of the service?”

The co-conspirators would be so powerful that they could have sex whenever they wanted with other people’s wives, daughters, and sons. They could also kill whomever they wanted.

Catiline continued:

“Only spare yourselves, and you have all the earth beside, a field to exercise your longings in.

“I see you aroused and confident and read your forward — ardent — minds eager in your faces.”

Catiline then called to the servants, “Bring the wine and blood you have prepared there.”

Adult servants and pages arrived, carrying wine mixed with blood, and drinking bowls. Pages are boys who are servants.

“What is this?” Longinus asked.

Catiline said:

“I’ve killed a slave and have caused his blood to be mixed with wine. Fill every man his drinking bowl. There cannot be a fitter drink to make this oath in.

“Here I begin the sacrament to all. Oh, for a clap of thunder now, so loud as to be heard throughout the universe, to tell the world the fact and to applaud it.

“Be firm, my hand, shed not a drop, but pour fierceness into me with it, and cruel thirst of more and more, until Rome be left as bloodless as ever her fears made her, or the sword, and when I cease to wish this to you, stepdame — Rome — or stop working to effect it, with my powers fainting, so may my blood be drawn, and so drunk up as is this slave’s.”

“And so be my blood,” Longinus said.

“And mine,” Lentulus said.

“And mine,” Autronius said.

“And mine,” Vargunteius said.

They drank.

“Fill my bowl yet fuller — to overflowing,” Cethegus said. “Here I drink this blood as I would drink Cato’s, or the new fellow Cicero’s, with that vow which Catiline has given.”

Cicero was a novus homo, a new man, the first in his family to become so prominent — a Senator and a Consul — in Rome.

“So do I,” Curius said.

“And I,” Laeca said.

“And I,” Bestia said.

“And I,” Fulvius said.

“And all of us,” Gabinius said.

They drank again.

“Why, now’s the business safe and each man strengthened and made sure of,” Catiline said.

Seeing one of his serving-boys respond with aversion to Bestia’s sexual advances to him, Catiline said to the page, “Sirrah, what ails you?”

“Nothing,” the page answered.

“He is somewhat modest,” Bestia said.

The page knelt before Catiline.

Catiline said to the page, “Slave, I will strike your soul out with my foot, if I find you again with such a face of aversion, you whelp —”

“Nay, Lucius,” Bestia said.

Lucius Sergius Catiline said to the page, “Are you acting coyly, when I command you to be free and open and affable to all?”

In order to achieve his ends, Catiline was willing to allow his co-conspirators to commit sodomy with his boy-servants.

Bestia whispered to Catiline, “You’ll be observed.”

Catiline said to the page, “Arise, and if you show any least aversion in your look to a man who attempts to jest or to tilt with — board — you next, then your throat opens with a slit.”

Catiline could and would do this: The page was a slave, and Catiline was ambitious.

Catiline then said to the co-conspirators:

“Noble confederates and allies, thus far is perfect. Only I will expect your votes at the assembly for the choosing of Consuls, and all the votes you can get from friends to elect me as Consul. Then let me work out your fortunes and my own fortune.

“In the meanwhile, let all of us rest sealed up and silent, as when hard frosts have bound up brooks and rivers, forced wild beasts into their caves, and birds into the woods, countrymen into their houses, and the country sleeps, so that, when the sudden thaw comes, we may break upon them like a deluge, bearing down half of Rome before us, and invade the rest with cries and noise able to wake the urns of those who are dead, and make their ashes fear.

“The horrors that strike the world should come loud and unlooked for. Until they strike, be dumb and do not speak about this plot.”

“Oracular Sergius!” Cethegus said.

“God-like Catiline!” Lentulus said.

They all exited.

CHORUS (End of ACT 1) (Catiline's Conspiracy)

The Chorus appeared and spoke in rhyming couplets, lamenting that Rome, although so great and powerful, should be threatened as a result of an excess of plenty, wealth, and ease:

*Can nothing great and at the height
Remain so long, but its own weight
Will ruin it? Or is't [is it] blind Chance
That still [always] desires new states t'advance [to advance new states]
And quit the old? Else, why must Rome
Be by itself now overcome?
Has she not foes enough of those Whom she hath [has] made such, and enclose
Her round about [surround her]? Or are they none,
Except [Unless] she first become her own [her own foe]?
O wretchedness of greatest states,
To be obnoxious to [subjected to] these fates,
That cannot keep what they do gain,
And what they raise so ill sustain.
Rome now is mistress of the whole
World, sea, and land, to either pole;
And even that fortune will destroy
The power that made it. She doth joy [does enjoy]*

So much in plenty, wealth, and ease,

As [That] now th' [the] excess is her disease.

The Chorus then described some of Rome's luxuries, including luxuries that made men effeminate:

She builds in gold, and to the stars,

As if she threatened heav'n [heaven] with wars,

And seeks for hell in quarries deep,

Giving the fiends that there do keep [dwell],

A hope of day. Her women wear

The spoils of nations, in an ear,

Changed [Exchanged] for the treasure of a shell [a pearl],

And in their loose attires [loosely fitting dresses] do swell [puff up]

More light [Lighter] than sails, when all winds play.

Yet are the men more loose [effeminate, loosely dressed, wanton, unchaste] than they,

More kempt [combed], and bathed, and rubbed, and trimmed,

More sleeked [smoothed], more soft, and slacker limbed,

As [As a] prostitute: so much that kind [nature]

May seek itself there and not find.

They eat on beds of silk and gold,

At ivory tables or wood sold

Dearer than it [North African cedar was very expensive], and, leaving plate [setting aside gold and silver bowls],

Do drink in stone of higher rate [from bowls set with expensive jewels].

They hunt all grounds and draw [fish in] all seas,

Fowl [Hunt fowl in] every brook and bush, to please

Their wanton tastes, and in request

Have [seek after] new and rare things, not the best.

The Chorus next credited the virtue of Rome's past to "simple poverty." Now that Rome was rich, it had lost much virtue:

Hence comes that wild and vast expense

That hath [has] enforced [compelled] Rome's virtue thence [to leave],

Which simple poverty first made.

And now ambition doth [does] invade

Her state with eating avarice [avarice that devours everything],

Riot [Debauchery], and every other vice.

Decrees are bought, and laws are sold,

Honors, and offices for gold;

The people's voices [votes], and the free

Tongues in the Senate, bribed be [are bribed].

Such ruin of her manners [conduct and customs] Rome

Doth [Does] suffer now as [now that] she's become,

Without [Unless] the gods it soon gainsay [soon prevent it],

Both her own spoiler [despoiler] and own prey.

The Chorus next blamed the luxuries of Asia, which had been imported to Rome, for corrupting Rome, thus giving Asia revenge for being conquered:

So, Asia, are you cru'ly [cruelly] even

With us for all the blows you given [that you were given],

When we, whose virtue conquered you,

Thus by your vices ruined be [are ruined].

Catiline and his co-conspirators looked at the excesses of the powerful people of Rome and envied them.

The Chorus looked at the same excesses of the powerful people of Rome and deplored them.

ACT 2 (Catiline's Conspiracy)

— 2.1 —

Fulvia, Galla, and a servant spoke together in a room in Fulvia's house. Galla was a waiting-woman who served Fulvia, who was a woman of rank and who had many affairs.

Fulvia complained, "Those rooms stink extremely."

She then said, "Bring my mirror and table here, Galla."

"Madam," Galla said.

She went into another room — Fulvia's bedchamber — and brought out a mirror and a table.

"Look within, in my blue cabinet, for the pearl sent to me most recently, and bring it to me," Fulvia ordered.

"The pearl from Clodius?" Galla asked.

"From Caius Caesar," Fulvia said. "You're in favor of Clodius still. Or Curius."

Galla exited.

Fulvia said to the servant, "Sirrah, if Quintus Curius comes here, I am not in a fit mood to see him; I keep to my chamber. Give warning so, outside."

"Sirrah" was a title given to a person of lower social class than the speaker.

The servant exited, and Galla returned with the pearl.

"Is this it, madam?" Galla asked.

"Yes, help to hang it in my ear," Fulvia said.

Pearl earrings were one of the luxuries that the Chorus had criticized.

“Believe me,” Galla said. “It is a rich one, madam.”

“I hope so,” Fulvia said. “It would not be worn there otherwise. Finish what you are doing and bind my hair up.”

“In the same style as it was yesterday?” Galla asked.

“No, nor the other day,” Fulvia said. “When have you ever known me to appear two days in a row with the same hair-dressing?”

“Will you have your hair in the globe or spire?” Galla asked.

The globe and the spire were two different styles of hair dressing.

“Whichever you wish,” Fulvia said. “Any style, however you will do it, good impertinence. Your company, if I slept not very well during nights, would make me an errant fool on account of your questions.”

Galla began, “Alas, madam —”

Fulvia interrupted, “Nay, gentle half of the dialogue, cease talking.”

So far, she had called Galla by the terms “good impertinence” and “gentle half of the dialogue.”

“I do it, indeed, just for your exercise,” Galla said, “as your physician tells me.”

“What?” Fulvia said. “Does he tell you to anger me for exercise?”

“Not to anger you, but to stir your blood a little,” Galla said. “There’s a difference between lukewarm and boiling, madam.”

“By Jove!” Fulvia said. “She means to cook me, I think! Please, stop.”

“I mean to dress you, madam,” Galla said.

“To dress” means 1) to fix someone’s hair, and 2) to prepare food for cooking.

Galla proceeded to do Fulvia’s hair.

“Oh, my Juno, be a friend to me!” Fulvia said.

Juno was a goddess who watched over the women of Rome.

Fulvia continued, “Attempting to be a wit, too? Why, Galla, where have you been?”

Fulvia was pretending that Galla had deliberately made a pun on the phrase “to dress.”

“What, madam?” Galla asked.

“What have you done with your poor innocent self?” Fulvia asked.

“What do you mean, sweet madam?” Galla asked.

Fulvia answered, “Thus to come forth, so suddenly, a wit-worm?”

A wit-worm is a beginning wit, one who has just emerged like a caterpillar newly emerged from an egg.

“It pleases you to flout — mock — one,” Galla said.

She then attempted to change the subject: “I did dream of lady Sempronia —”

“Oh, the wonder is out,” Fulvia said. “Did that infect you? Well, and how?”

Dreaming of lady Sempronia must have caused Galla to attempt to be witty. So said Fulvia.

Galla said, “I thought she did discourse the best —”

Fulvia interrupted, “— that ever you heard?”

“Yes,” Galla said.

“In your sleep?” Fulvia said. “What did she talk about?”

“About the Republic, madam, and the state,” Galla said, “and how she was in debt, and where she meant to raise fresh sums of money. Sempronia is a great stateswoman — she has the ability of a statesman.”

“You dreamed all this?” Fulvia asked.

“No, but you know she is as able as a statesman, madam,” Galla said, “and she is a mistress of both the Latin language and the Greek.”

“Yes, but I never dreamt it, Galla, as you have done, and therefore you must pardon me,” Fulvia said.

“Indeed, you mock me, madam,” Galla said.

“Indeed, no,” Fulvia said. “Tell me more about your learned lady. Does she have a wit, too?”

“A very masculine — vigorous — one,” Galla replied.

“She is a she-critic of literature, Galla?” Fulvia asked. “And can she compose in verse, and make quick jests, modest or otherwise?”

“Yes, madam,” Galla said.

“Can she sing, too?” Fulvia asked. “And play on instruments?”

“Of all kinds, they say,” Galla answered.

“And does she dance splendidly?” Fulvia asked.

“Excellently,” Galla said. “So well that a bald Senator made a jest and said it was better than an honest — chaste — woman needed to dance.”

“Tut, she may bear that jest,” Fulvia said. “Few wise women’s ‘honesties’ will do their courtship hurt.”

In other words, the lack of chastity of wise women will seldom interfere with their being courted, aka desired, by men.

“She’s liberal, too, madam,” Galla said.

The word “liberal” meant 1) generous, and 2) free.

“What!” Fulvia said. “With her money or her honor, I ask you?”

“With both,” Gallia said. “You don’t know which she spares least.”

She may have been less sparing of her money, or she may have been less sparing of her honor. The implication was that both her money and her honor were in short supply because she had given away both.

“A comely commendation,” Fulvia said.

“Indeed, it is a pity that she is getting old,” Galla said.

“Why, Galla?” Fulvia asked.

“Because it is a fact that she is,” Galla said.

“Oh, is that all?” Fulvia said. “I thought you had a reason for saying that.”

“Why, so I have,” Galla said. “She has been a fine lady, and she still dresses herself — but not as well as you, madam — like one of the best in Rome, and she uses cosmetics and hides her signs of aging very well.”

Fulvia said, "They say it is rather a mask than a face she wears."

"They wrong her, truly, madam," Galla said. "She does sleek her face with crumbs of bread and milk, and she lies at nights in very neat gloves."

The word "sleek" means "make smooth." She used milk and bread to clean her face and make it sleek and smooth. She also wore gloves at night. The gloves were possibly dampened inside with something to keep her hands sleek and smooth. Today, a woman might put lotion on dry hands and wear gloves to bed.

Galla continued, "But she is obliged recently to seek men for sex more than she is sought for sex — the rumor is — and so she spends money for that purpose."

"You know everything," Fulvia said.

Galla had gotten her inside knowledge of Sempronia no doubt by gossiping with Sempronia's women-servants, and no doubt Galla had gossiped about Fulvia to those women-servants.

Fulvia continued, "But, Galla, what do you have to say about Catiline's lady, Orestilla? There is the gallant, fashionable woman!"

She meant, of course, Catiline's second wife, Aurelia Orestilla.

Galla said:

"She does well. She has very good and very rich suits of clothing, but then she cannot put them on. She doesn't know how to wear a garment. She shall wear all her jewels and gold sometimes, so that her own self appears to be the least part of herself.

“No, truly, as I live, madam, you excel them all with your excellent strength of judgment, and you draw, too, the world of Rome to follow you. You attire yourself so diversely, and with the spirit of always attracting the men with the noblest characters!

“They could make love to your dress, although your face were away, they say.”

Galla’s praise had gotten away from her. In praising Fulvia’s sense of fashion, Galla was making it sound as if the men were more interested in Fulvia’s dress than in her face.

Fulvia said, “And if my body were away, too, would they have the better match of it? Say they are not so, too, Galla?”

In other words, say that they are not effeminate men, Galla.

A servant entered.

Fulvia asked, “Now, what news troubles your face?”

The servant answered, “If it pleases you, madam, the lady Sempronia has alighted from her carriage at the gate —”

Galla interrupted, “By Castor, my dream, my dream!”

“By Castor!” was a woman’s oath in Rome. Both Castor and his twin brother, Pollux, were gods who were associated with miraculous interventions. Here, Galla had dreamed about Sempronia, and now Sempronia appeared.

The servant continued, “— and comes to see you.”

The servant exited.

“For Venus’ sake, good madam, see her —” Galla said.

“Peace! Be quiet!” Fulvia interrupted. “The fool is wild and out of her wits, I think.”

Galla continued, “— and hear her talk, sweet madam, about state matters and the Senate.”

The servant allowed Sempronia, who was of a higher social class than Fulvia, to enter.

Sempronia entered the room and asked, “Fulvia, good wench, how are thou?”

The word “wench” meant “young woman” and was not perjorative.

In this society, a person of higher rank would use “thou,” “thee,” and “thy” when referring to a person of lower rank. (These terms were also sometimes used affectionately and between equals.)

A person of lower rank would use “you” when referring to a person of higher rank.

“I am doing well, Sempronia,” Fulvia answered. “Where are you going so early?”

“To see Aurelia Orestilla,” Sempronia said. “She sent for me. I came to invite thee to go with me. Will thou go?”

“I cannot now, truly,” Fulvia said. “I have some letters to write and send away.”

“Alas, I pity thee,” Sempronia said. “I am so very weary because I have been writing all this night to all the tribes and centuries to ask for their voices — their votes — to help Catiline in his election.”

Rome had 35 tribes; a century was a group of 100 men. Tribes and centuries were both involved in voting.

Sempronia continued, “We shall make him Consul, I hope, among us. Crassus, I, and Caesar will gain the Consulship for him.”

“Is he a candidate for that political office?” Fulvia asked.

“He’s the chief candidate,” Sempronia said.

Fulvia asked, “Who is standing for election for Consul besides him?”

She then ordered Galla, “Give me some wine, and give me powder for my teeth.”

“Here’s a good pearl, in truth,” Sempronia said.

“A pretty one,” Fulvia said.

“A very lustrous one,” Sempronia said.

She then answered Fulvia’s question about the other candidates for the position of Consul: “There are other candidates for the office: Caius Antonius, Publius Galba, Lucius Cassius Longinus, Quintus Cornificius, Caius Licinius, and that talker Cicero.”

Cicero was an excellent writer and orator.

Sempronia continued, “But Catiline and Antonius will be chosen. For four of the others, Licinius, Longinus, Galba, and Cornificius, will give way, and they will not choose Cicero.”

“No?” Fulvia said. “Why?”

“It will be opposed and thwarted by the nobility,” Sempronia answered.

Galla said to herself, “How she does understand public affairs!”

Sempronia continued:

“Nor would it be fit for Cicero to be Consul. He is but a new fellow, not originally here in Rome. Catiline calls him a mere lodger here.

“And the Patricians should do very ill to let the Consulship be so defiled as it would be if Cicero obtained it. He is a perfect upstart who has no pedigree, no house, no coat of arms, no heraldic insignia of a family!”

“He has virtue,” Fulvia said.

“Hang virtue!” Sempronia said. “Where there is no blood, no good parentage, virtue is vice, and in him sauciness. Why should he presume to be more learned or more eloquent than the nobility? Or boast any quality worthy a nobleman, since he himself is not noble?”

“It was virtue only, at first, that made all men noble,” Fulvia said.

Sempronia replied, “I grant you that virtue might have made people noble at first, in Rome’s poor age, when her kings and her Consuls held the plow, or gardened well. But now we have no need to dig or lose our sweat for virtue.”

In 458 B.C.E., Lucius Quinctius Cincinnatus was plowing when news of his appointment as Dictator of Rome came. As Dictator, he had much power to deal with the crisis then facing Rome. Once the crisis was resolved, he stopped being Dictator and went back to farming.

Sempronia continued, “We have wealth, fortune, and ease, and also we have our ancestors’ stock of virtue to draw on and give us a reputation for virtue by association, which will defend us against all newcomers — and can never fail us, while the succession of high members of society to high offices stays.”

Nobility has its advantages. Nobles often have ancestors with reputations for virtue. Some of the ancestors’ glory rubs off on their descendants. Also, just a few high-born families can often monopolize the highest political offices.

Sempronia continued:

“And must we glorify a mushroom, an upstart, one of yesterday and lacking a long notable family history, a fine speaker, because he has nourished himself on rhetoric by studying in Athens? And must we advance him at our own loss?”

“No, Fulvia. There are others who can speak Greek, too, if there were need. Caesar and I have sat upon and judged Cicero; so has Crassus, too, and others. We have all decided on his arrest from rising farther. Yes, we will stop him from rising further.”

“Excellent and splendid lady!” Galla said.

“Sempronia, you are beholden to my serving-woman here,” Fulvia said. “She admires you.”

“Oh, good Galla, how are thou?” Sempronia asked.

“The better for your learned ladyship,” Galla replied.

“Is this grey powder a good dentifrice?” Sempronia asked. “Does it clean teeth well?”

“You see I use it,” Fulvia answered.

“I have one that is whiter,” Sempronia said.

“It may be so,” Fulvia said.

“Yet this smells well,” Sempronia said.

“And it cleanses very well, madam, and resists the crudities of unhygienic teeth,” Galla said.

“Fulvia, I ask thee, who comes to thee now?” Sempronia asked. “Which of our great patricians?”

“Truly, I keep no catalog of them,” Fulvia said. “Sometimes I have one, sometimes another, as sexual desire excites their blood.”

“Thou have them all,” Sempronia said. “In faith, when was Quintus Curius, thy special servant, here?”

“My special servant?” Fulvia asked.

A servant can be a lover.

“Yes, your idolater, I call him,” Sempronia said.

“He may be yours,” Fulvia said, “if you do like him.”

“What!” Sempronia said.

“He does not come here,” Fulvia said. “I have forbidden him to come here.”

“Venus forbid!” Sempronia said.

“Why?” Fulvia asked.

“He is your so constant lover,” Sempronia answered.

“He is so much to the contrary,” Fulvia said. “I want to have a change of lovers. So would you, too, I am sure. And now you may have him.”

“He’s fresh yet, Fulvia,” Sempronia said. “Beware how you tempt me.”

“Fresh” can mean 1) youthful, and 2) not preserved.

“In faith, for me he is somewhat too fresh, indeed,” Fulvia said. “The salt that gave him seasoning and flavor is gone.”

“Salt” can mean 1) a seasoning, and 2) sexual desire.

Fulvia continued, “His good gifts are done. He does not yield the crop that he used to yield.”

Quintus Curius no longer gave her valuable gifts.

She continued, “And as for the sexual act, I can have secret fellows — male prostitutes — with backs worth ten of him, and these male fellows shall please me, now that the land has fled, a myriad better than him.”

A strong back is a sign of a good lover.

Quintus Curius’ land had metaphorically fled from him because he had sold his land and spent the money.

Fulvia was a woman who looked at a lover and thought, How much money does he have left?

Sempronia said, “And one may command those secret fellows.”

“That is true,” Flavia said. “These lordings, these petty lords, your noble fauns, they are so imperious, saucy, and rude, and as boisterous and savage as Centaurs, leaping sexually on and mounting a lady at first sight.”

Fauns were notably horny minor gods.

Centaurs sometimes became drunk and unable to control their lust. The Centaur Eurytion got drunk at a wedding while visiting the Lapiths and tried to rape the bride but was stopped and punished.

Sempronia said, “And they must be borne both with and out, they think. They think they must be both put up with and humored.”

One now obsolete meaning of “to bear out” is “to praise publicly” and “to claim that one has accomplished something.”

The lovers expected themselves and their love-making to be praised.

Fulvia said, “Tut, I’ll pay attention to none of them all, nor humor them a jot longer than they come laden in the hand and say, ‘Here’s the one for the other.’”

In other words: Here’s the money for the sex. The men, however, would probably not say this so crudely but would use less business-like language.

“Does Caesar give well?” Sempronia asked.

“They who come here shall all give and pay well, if they will have it — sex,” Fulvia said. “And they will need jewels, pearl, gold and silver vessels and utensils, or round sums — plenty of money — to buy these sexual favors. I am not taken with a male swan, or a high-mounting bull, as foolish Leda and Europa were, but with the bright gold, as Danaë was.”

Jupiter, king of the gods, disguised himself as a male swan so he could sleep with Leda, and he disguised himself as a bull so he could carry Europa on his back from Crete to Europe and sleep with her there. To seduce Danaë, Jupiter appeared before her as a rain of bright gold.

Fulvia continued, “For such a price, I would endure a rough, harsh Jupiter, or ten such thundering and vehement amorous gamesters, and refrain from laughing at them until they are gone, with my much tolerating them.”

For bright gold, Fulvia would tolerate rough sex or a gangbang. She also would not laugh in their faces at them for parting with valuables in return for a little sexual excitement — she would laugh after they left.

Sempronia said, “Thou are a most happy wench, who thus can make use of thy youth and freshness in their season and have it to make use of.”

Fulvia said to herself, “Which is the happiness.”

Sempronia said, "I am now glad to give money to them and to keep music and a continual table to invite them to."

Fulvia said to herself, "Yes, and they study your kitchen more than you."

Sempronia continued, "I metaphorically eat myself and literally ruin myself with borrowing money at usurious interest rates, and I ruin my lord and husband, too, and all my domestic servants and friends besides, in order to procure money for the needful and necessary expenses I must be at to have young lovers; and yet, I scarcely can get young lovers even so."

Fulvia said, "Why, that's because you fancy young faces only, and smooth chins, Sempronia. If you'd love beards and bristles, one with another, as others do, or wrinkles —"

She was interrupted by knocking at the door.

"Who's that?" she said. "Go and find out, Galla."

Galla investigated and said, "It is the party, madam."

"What party?" Fulvia asked. "Has he no name?"

"It is Quintus Curius," Galla said.

"Didn't I tell my servants to say that I kept to my chamber?" Fulvia said.

"Why, so they do," Galla said.

Quintus Curius was insisting on seeing Fulvia.

"I'll leave you, Fulvia," Sempronia said.

"Nay, good Sempronia, stay," Fulvia said.

"In faith, I will not," Sempronia replied.

"By Juno, I don't want to see him," Fulvia said.

“I’ll not hinder you,” Sempronia said.

“You know he will not be kept out, madam,” Galla said.

“No, he shall not be kept out, careful Galla, by my intervention,” Sempronia said.

She wanted Curius and Fulvia to meet. It amused her.

Fulvia said, “As I do live, Sempronia —”

Sempronia interrupted, “— what is the need of this?”

Fulvia ordered Galla, “Go, say I am asleep and ill at ease.”

Sempronia said:

“By Castor, no. I’ll tell him that you are awake and you are very well.

“Stay here, Galla.

“Farewell, Fulvia. I know my manners. Why do you labor like this, acting against your real wishes?”

She called, “Quintus Curius, she is, indeed, here, and in good disposition.”

She meant that Fulvia was able to see Curius and she was in a good mood.

Sempronia then exited.

“Spite with your courtesy!” Fulvia said. “How I shall be tortured!”

Curius entered the room.

He said, “Where are you, pretty one, who conceal yourself and keep your beauty within locks and bars here, like a fool’s treasure?”

“True, she was a fool, when first she showed her treasure to a thief,” Fulvia said.

“What, pretty sullenness!” Curius said. “So harsh, and short?”

“The Fool’s artillery, sir,” Fulvia replied.

In other words, words are the Fool’s weapons.

In Ben Jonson’s day, Fools, aka jesters, were highly regarded.

“Then take my gown off, for the encounter,” Curius said.

He began to take his gown — a man’s outer garment — off.

An encounter can be 1) an amorous encounter, or 2) a military encounter.

“Stop, sir,” Fulvia said. “I am not in the mood.”

“I’ll put you in the mood,” Curius said.

“Best put yourself in your case again —” Fulvia said

By “case,” she meant his gown or cover; however, the word “case” also meant vagina, so her sentence had the unintentional meaning of telling him to have sex with her.

She continued, “— and keep your furious — extravagant and foolish — appetite warm, in preparation for when you have place for it.”

“What!” Curius said. “Do you pretend to be shy?”

“No, sir. I am not proud,” Fulvia said.

This kind of pride is “sexually aroused.” It is a now-obsolete meaning of the word “proud.”

“I wish you were proud,” Curius said. “You think this state becomes you? By Hercules, it does not.”

He showed her the mirror that Galla had earlier brought and said, "Look in your mirror now, and see how scurvily that countenance shows. You would be loath to own it."

"I shall not change it," Fulvia said.

"Indeed, but you must, and relax this bended brow and stop frowning, and you must shoot from your eyes less scorn at me," Curius said. "There is a Fortune coming towards you, dainty, that will take you thus" — he attempted to embrace her — "and set you aloft, to tread upon the head of Lady Fortune's own statue here in Rome."

He was predicting great things for her. She would be so fortunate that she could stand on Lady Fortune's head.

"I wonder who let this promiser in!" Fulvia said.

She asked Galla, "Did you, good diligence? Give him his bribe again."

Lovers would often bribe household servants to gain access to the beloved — or to the sexual object.

Fulvia continued, "Or if you had none, I ask you to demand from him why he is so bold to press thus to my chamber, despite being forbidden both by myself and my servants?"

"What!" Curius said. "This is handsome! And somewhat a new strain — tone — of expression!"

When he gave her expensive gifts, she talked to him with a much different tone of voice.

"My tone of voice is not strained, sir," Fulvia said. "It is not forced, and it is not artificial. It is very natural."

"I have known it otherwise between the parties, though," Curius said.

And between the sheets.

“For your knowledge of what has happened before, thank that which made it,” Fulvia said. “It will not be so hereafter, I assure you.”

What happened before? Sex.

What made it happen? Expensive gifts.

“No, my mistress?” Curius said.

“No, though you bring the same materials — the same gifts,” Fulvia said.

She knew he had no gifts to give her.

“Listen to me,” Curius said. “You over-react now when you should show restraint. Recall a little and remember yourself again and think. If you are doing this to trick me or find at what forced distance you can hold your servant — your lover — so that it is an artificial trick, to greater inflame and fire me with desire, fearing my love may need it — as heretofore you have done — why, proceed.”

Curius thought that Fulvia might be withholding sex from him in order to inflame his lust all the more.

“As I have done heretofore?” Fulvia asked.

Curius answered, “Yes, when you’d feign your husband’s jealousy, when your servants were keeping guard and watching you, and when you’d speak softly and run often to the door or to the window and form strange fears that were not necessary — doing all these things as if the pleasure were less acceptable when it was secure and free from fear of discovery.”

The possibility of being discovered in the act can thrill some people.

“You are an impudent fellow,” Fulvia said.

“And, when you might better have done it at the gate,” Curius said, “but instead you took me in at the casement.”

They could very well have had sex outside, but Fulvia would let him in through a window.

According to Curius, Fulvia’s husband did not mind Fulvia’s affairs, and so they could very well have sex in the garden, but Fulvia preferred pretending that they had to be careful when having sex so that her husband would not find out.

“I take you in?” Fulvia said.

“Yes, you, my lady,” Curius said. “And then, when I was in bed with you, you would have your well-taught waiting-woman and look-out here” — he pointed to Galla — “come running and cry, ‘Her lord!’ and hide me without cause, crushed in a chest, or thrust up in a chimney. This happened even when he, her husband, that tame crow, was not even present and was instead napping at his farm, or, if he had been here and present, he would have kept both eyes and beak sealed up for six sesterces.”

A sesterce is a coin of little worth.

Fulvia said, “You have a slanderous, beastly, unwashed tongue in your rude mouth, and your tongue is tasting of yourself, you unmannered lord.”

“What is this now!” Curius said.

“It is your title, sir,” Fulvia said, “who, since you have lost your own good name, and know not what to lose more, don’t care whose honor you wound or whose reputation you poison with it.”

Curius had been thrown out of the Senate a few years earlier because of immoral conduct.

Fulvia continued, “You should go and vent yourself in the region where you live: among the suburb-brothels, bawds, and pimps, to which place your broken fortunes have designated and consigned you.”

To. “vent himself” meant to “discharge himself.” He could be discharging semen there.

“Nay, then I must stop your fury, I see, and pluck the tragic mask off,” Curius said.

In ancient drama, actors wore masks. Curius thought that Fulvia was putting on an act.

He now called Fulvia lady Cyprus, a reference to Venus, one of whose major cult centers was located on the island of Cyprus: “Come, lady Cyprus, know your own virtues, quickly.”

According to Curius, Fulvia’s virtues lay in having sex, not in being a drama queen.

Curius continued, “I’ll not be put to the wooing of you thus, afresh at every turn, for all the Venus in you. Yield and be pliant, or by Pollux —”

He drew his dagger and attempted to force her to have sex, but she drew a knife.

Seeing her knife, he said, “What is this now? Will Lais turn into a Lucrece?”

Lais of Corinth and Lais of Hyccara were two famous courtesans.

Lucrece was a Roman woman who was raped by Sextus Tarquinian and then committed suicide. Sextus Tarquinian was the son of the King of Rome, Lucius Tarquinius Superbus. Because of the rape and subsequent suicide, the Romans drove the king and his family out of Rome and formed a republic.

Fulvia differed from Lucrece in that Lucrece stabbed herself with her knife, and Fulvia was prepared to stab Curius.

“No,” Fulvia said, “but by Castor, hold off your rapist’s hands! I will pierce your heart if you don’t. I’ll not be put to kill myself, as she did, for you, sweet Tarquin.”

Curius began to retreat.

Fulvia said, “What! Do you fall off? Nay, it becomes you graciously. Put not up.”

To “fall off” meant 1) to withdraw, and 2) to lose one’s erection.

“Put not up” meant 1) Don’t put your sword or dagger in its sheath, and 2) Don’t put your “sword” or “dagger” in my vagina. The Latin word vagina means “sheath.”

The word “weapon” can mean “penis.”

She continued, “You’ll sooner draw your weapon on me, I think, than on the Senate, who have cast you forth disgracefully, to be the common tale of the whole city, you base, infamous man!”

A common tale is the subject of much gossip.

A common tail can be a publicly available penis.

Curius had been thrown out of the Senate because of his immorality.

Fulvia continued, “For, if you were a different man, you would there employ your desperate dagger!”

The “dagger” that he would draw on Fulvia was his penis. But according to Fulvia, if Curius were a different kind of man, the dagger that he would draw on the Senate would be a real dagger.

Putting up his dagger, Curius said, "Fulvia, you know the strengths — the superior powers — you have upon me. Do not use your power too like a tyrant; I can bear almost until you break me."

He could bear her — put up with her — almost until she broke him.

"I do know, sir," Fulvia said. "So does the Senate, too, know you can bear."

Curius had to bear the infamy of being thrown out of the Senate because of his immorality.

"By all the gods, the Senate will smart deeply for your upbraidings," Curius said. "If I were you, I should be very sorry if I — Curius — were to have the means so to be avenged on you — at least the will — as I shall shortly on them. But go on still. Continue. Fare you well, dear lady. You could not still be fair unless you were proud. You will repent these moods, and before long, too. I shall have you come about and change direction again."

Curius hoped to become a rich and powerful man after the revolution against the Senate. If that happened, Fulvia would change her opinion about him.

"Do you think so?" Fulvia asked.

"Yes, and I know so," Curius said.

"By what augury?" Fulvia asked.

"By the fair entrails of the matrons' chests — their treasure-chests — which are gold, pearls, and jewels here in Rome, which Fulvia will then, but too late, say that she might have shared, and, grieving, miss," Curius said.

She would miss out on the wealth that Curius would have after the revolution succeeded.

Fulvia began, “Tut, all your promised mountains and seas, I am so stalely and tediously acquainted with —”

Because Curius could no longer afford to give her valuable gifts, he had begun to promise her great things — figurative mountains and seas.

Curius interrupted, “— but when you see the universal flood run by your coffers; when you see that my lords, the Senators, are sold for slaves, their wives sold for slave-women, their houses and fine gardens given away, and all their goods put under the spear and auctioned in public with loud cries, and you see that you have none of this, but are still Fulvia, or perhaps less, while you are thinking of it. You will advise then, Miss Coyness, with your cushion — you will talk to your pillow — and look on your fingers and say how you were wished for, desired, and invited — and so he left you.”

She would look at her fingers and imagine the valuable rings that could be adorning them if she had continued to be Curius’ mistress.

Curius exited.

“Call him back again, Galla,” Fulvia said.

Galla exited.

Fulvia said to herself, “This is not usual; something hangs on this that I must win out of him. Yes, something is going on, and I need to get him to tell me what it is.”

Curius returned.

“How are you now?” Curius asked. “Do you melt?”

“Come, will you laugh now at my easiness?” Fulvia said. “But it is no miracle: Doves, they say, will bill — kiss — after their pecking and their murmuring.”

“Yes, and then it is kindly and natural between them,” Curius said. “I would have my love angry sometimes, to make the rest of her behavior sweeter by contrast.”

“You do see, then, that I study how I may please you,” Fulvia said. “But do you think, Curius, that it is covetousness that has made me change my mind? If you love me, change that unkind thought.”

“By my loved soul, I love you like I love my soul,” Curius said, “and it is my study, more than my own revenge, to make you happy.”

The revenge was against the Senate for exposing him.

“And it is that just revenge that makes me happy to hear you strive after it — and which, indeed, has won me to you, more than all the hope of what else can be promised,” Fulvia said. “I love valor better than any lady loves her face or clothing — than I myself do. Let me become rooted always where I do embrace. But what good means have you to effect it? Shall I know your project?”

“You shall, if you’ll be gracious and give me your favors,” Curius said.

“I will be as gracious as I can be,” Fulvia said.

“And will you kiss me then?” Curius asked.

“As closely as the shells of cockles — mollusks — meet,” Fulvia said.

“And print them deep?” Curius asked.

Would she kiss him hard?

“Quite through our subtle, delicate lips,” Fulvia answered.

“And often?” Curius asked.

“I will sow kisses, faster than you can reap them,” Fulvia said. “What is your plot?”

“Why, now my Fulvia looks like her bright name, and she is herself!” Curius said.

The Latin word fulvus (feminine form fulva) means gold-colored.

“Nay, answer me: What is your plot?” Fulvia said. “I request that you tell me, Quintus.”

“Aye, these sounds become a mistress,” Quintus Curius said.

She kissed and flattered him as he spoke.

Curius continued, “Here is harmony! When you are harsh, I see, the way to bend you is not with violence, but instead with service and compliance. Cruel, a lady is a fire; gentle, a lady is a light.”

“Won’t you tell me what I ask you?” Fulvia asked.

“All that I can think, sweet love, or that my breast holds, I’ll pour into you,” Curius said.

“What is your design — plan — then?” Fulvia asked.

“I’ll tell you,” Curius said. “Catiline shall now be Consul. But you will hear more, shortly.”

Fulvia said, “Nay, dear love —”

“I’ll tell you while I am in your arms,” Curius said. “Let us go into your bedchamber. Rome will be sacked; her wealth will be our prize. By public ruin, private spirits — men of courage — must rise.”

“Spirit” can metaphorically mean semen, and “must rise” can refer to an erection. “Public ruin” can mean the loss of a woman’s reputation.

Curius and Fulvia exited to go to bed together.

CHORUS (End of ACT 2) (Catiline's Conspiracy)

Catiline and his co-conspirators wanted him to be elected Consul so that they could gain power and loot the city.

The Chorus, however, appeared now and spoke about the need for good government. He also mentioned what the qualities of a good Consul would be.

The Chorus began by praying to Mars, god of war, and to Jupiter, king of the gods:

Great father Mars, and greater Jove,

By whose high auspices [divine protection] Rome hath [has] stood

So long, and first was built in blood

Of your great nephew [nephew = descendant; Remus was Mars' son and Jupiter's grandson], that [who] then strove

Not with his brother but your rites:

Romulus and Remus, twin brothers, took auspices to determine after whom the city they were building should be named. The auspices said that the city should be named Rome after Romulus. Remus disagreed with the auspices, the two brothers fought, and Romulus killed Remus.

The Chorus next spoke about the election then occurring and prayed that the right kind of Romans — ones who cared about Rome — be elected Consuls:

Be present to her now, as then,

And let not proud and factious men

Against your wills oppose their might.

Our Consuls now are to be made:

*Oh, put it in the public voice
To make a free and worthy choice,
Excluding such [e.g. Catiline] as would invade [attack]
The commonwealth. Let whom we name
Have wisdom, foresight, fortitude,
Be more with faith than face [pretense, effrontery] endowed [endowed],
And study conscience above fame.*

The Chorus named other good qualities of men who should be elected Consul. Let these men be:

*Such as not seek to get the start [gain the political advantage]
In state by power, parts [possessions, or factions], or bribes,
Ambition's bawds, but move the tribes
By virtue, modesty, desert.
Such as to justice will adhere,
Whatever great one it offend,
And from th' [the] embraced truth not bend
For envy, hatred, gifts, or fear.
That [Who] by their deeds will make it known
Whose dignity they do sustain,
And life, state, glory, all they gain
Count [They account, aka regard as] the Republic's, not their own.*

The Chorus mentioned some Roman families who had served Rome well:

*Such the old Bruti, Decii were,
The Cipi, Curtii, who did give Themselves for Rome and would not live
As men good only for a year [the year of their Consulship].
Such were the great Camilli, too,
The Fabii, Scipios, that [who] still [always] thought
No work at price enough [too high a cost] was bought
That for their country they could do.
And to her honor so did knit [grow together]
As all their acts were understood
The sinews of the public good,
And they themselves one soul with it.
These men were truly magistrates;
These [These men] neither practiced force [violence] nor forms [manipulation of the political rules],
Nor did they leave the helm in storms;
And such [men as] they are make happy states.*

The Chorus had referred to many famous Roman families in his speech. These are some of the members of those families:

L. Junius Brutus led the Romans when they deposed the last of the Roman kings and started the Roman Republic.

Publius Decius Mus and his son and grandson, each having the same name as his, saved Rome by fighting well and sacrificing themselves in battle.

Genucius Cipus. According to legend, when Cipus was leaving Rome, horns grew on his head. Soothsayers said that this meant that Cipus would become king when he returned to Rome. Rather than become king, Cipus voluntarily exiled himself. Cipus, a legendary figure, was a Praetor. He declined to become king because he did not want to end the Roman Republic, believing that Romans who served a king would be no better than slaves.

Marcus Curtius saved Rome by sacrificing himself. In 362 B.C.E., a chasm opened in the Roman Forum and could not be filled in. Soothsayers said that the only way the chasm could be closed was by the sacrifice of what was most valuable in Rome. Marcus Curtius, a young soldier, said that the most valuable possession of Rome was the courage of its citizens, and he rode his horse directly into the chasm, which closed behind him.

M. Furius Camillus went into voluntary exile after being falsely accused of embezzlement. After the Gauls sacked Rome, the Romans recalled him and he led the Romans to military victory over their enemy.

Quintus Maximus Fabius Rullianus attacked and defeated the Samnites against the orders of his superiors.

Quintus Maximus Fabius Cunctator (the above's great-grandson) minimized the damage that the great Carthaginian general Hannibal did in Italy through a tactic of delaying. He harassed Hannibal's army but did not meet it in open battle. Cunctator is Latin for "the Delayer."

Publius Cornelius Scipio Africanus fought bravely in the Second Punic War and defeated Hannibal by taking the war to Carthage and forcing Hannibal to leave Italy and fight the Romans in Africa.

His adoptive grandson, Publius Cornelius Scipio Africanus Aemilianus, conquered and destroyed Carthage in the Third Punic War.

— 3.1 —

The results of the election were in.

Catiline had failed to become Consul; instead, Cicero had just been elected Consul, along with Antonius. Catiline and the co-conspirators were shocked by the results of the election.

Cicero, Cato, Catulus, Antonius, Crassus, Julius Caesar, the Chorus, some citizens, and some Lictors stood together following the election. The Lictors served the Consuls and carried the fasces: symbols of the Consul's power.

Cicero now began his victory speech:

“Great honors are great burdens; and when they are cast with opprobrium and odium on a man, that man bears two loads. His cares must always be double to his joys in any dignity where, if he would err, he finds no pardon and, for doing well, a very small praise, and that wrung out by force.

“I speak this, Romans, knowing what the weight of the high responsibility and position you have trusted to me is.

“Not that thereby I would wish to appear to undervalue the goodness or greatness of your benefit, for I ascribe it to your singular grace and favor and vow to owe it to no other cause or entitlement, except the gods, that I, Cicero, am your Consul.

“I have no funeral-urns containing the ashes of my ancestors, no dusty ancestral monuments, no broken images of ancestors lacking an ear or nose, no forged tables of long descents from ancestors, to boast false honors from or be my sureties to your trust.

“I am only a new man — as I am styled in Rome — whom you have dignified and, more, in whom you’ve cut a way, and left it open for virtue — excellence — hereafter, to that place which our great men held shut up, with all ramparts, for themselves.”

The word “hereafter” showed that Cicero believed that he had set a precedent for more Consuls who were well qualified for high office because of their excellence, although they lacked great ancestors.

Cicero continued:

“Nor have but few of them — those well qualified for high office because of their excellence — in the past been made your Consuls; new men, before me, none.

“At my first candidacy, in my just year, preferred to all competitors, and some the noblest —”

Cicero’s just year was the year in which he first became eligible to be a candidate for Consul: the year he turned forty-three years old.

Catiline, whom Cicero had defeated in the election, came from one of Rome’s noblest families.

Crassus whispered to Julius Caesar, “Now the vein — the style of rhetoric — swells.”

Crassus was also punning on the word “vein.” He believed that Cicero was vain.

Caesar said to Crassus, “Up glory!”

Caesar expected Cicero to glory in his victory.

Cicero continued:

“— and to have your loud consents from your own uttered voices, not silent voting tablets in the secret ballot, nor votes from the meaner tribes. Your loud consents have elected me Consul, but first and last, the universal concourse has elected me Consul: All of Rome's social classes supported me and elected me Consul.

“This is my joy, my gladness.”

The votes had actually been cast by writing a candidate's name on a tablet in a secret ballot, but Cicero was stressing the vocal acclaim that the people — including high-born people — had made when he was announced as a winner of one of the two Consul positions.

Cicero was also stressing the vocal acclaim of the Senators and the upper class, whose votes counted more than the votes from the meaner tribes. Often the winner of the election was known before the meaner tribes voted.

Of course, not everyone acclaimed Cicero's victory. Catiline and his supporters did not.

Cicero continued:

“But my care, my industry, and my vigilance now must work, so that always your opinions about me will be approved both by yourselves and by those candidates whom you have rejected and over whom you have preferred me.

“Two things I must labor for: That they who lost the election do not upbraid you and that you do not repent your vote.

“For every lapse of mine will now be called your error, if I make such lapses. But my hope is so to bear myself throughout my Consulship that spite shall never wound you, although it may wound me.

“And for myself I have prepared this strength to act so well as Consul that if evil should happen to me, it shall make the gods to blush, and it shall be their crime, not mine, that I am regarded with ill-will.”

Caesar said to himself, “Oh, confidence, newer than is the man!”

Cicero continued:

“I know well in what terms I do receive the commonwealth, how vexed, how perplexed, in which there’s not that evil or ill fate that good men fear not and wicked men expect not.”

He meant that the evil currently in the commonwealth was evil that good men fear and bad men expect.

Cicero continued:

“I know, besides, that some turbulent conspiracies are already on foot, and rumors of more dangers —”

Crassus said quietly, “Or you will make them, if there are none.”

Crassus believed that Cicero would make up a conspiracy if there were none so that he could “save” Rome from it. A Consul can’t be a hero unless there’s something to be heroic about.

Cicero finished his speech:

“Last, I know it was this which made the envy and pride of the great Roman blood abate and give way to my election.”

Cato, one of Marcus Tullius Cicero’s supporters, said, “Marcus Tullius, that is true: Our need made you our Consul, and your virtue also made you our Consul.”

Caesar whispered, “Cato, you will undo and ruin him with your praise.”

Cato whispered back, “Caesar will hurt himself with his own envy.”

The Chorus said, “The voice of Cato is the voice of Rome.”

A Latin proverb stated, “Vox populi, vox dei.” It means, “The voice of the people [is] the voice of God.”

“The voice of Rome is the consent of heaven!” Cato said. “And that has placed you, Cicero, at the helm, where now you must show yourself a man and master of your art. Each petty hand on deck can steer a becalmed ship —”

Cato meant that any low-ranking sailor could steer a ship in a calm sea.

He continued, “— but he who will steer and carry her to her destinations must know his tides, know his currents, know how to shift his sails, know what she will bear in foul weathers and what she will bear in fair weathers, know where breaches are caused by planks splitting, know her leaks and how to stop them. He must know what sandbanks, what ledges in the sea, what rocks do threaten her. He must know the forces and the natures of all winds, gusts, storms, and tempests. He must know when her keel plows hell and her deck knocks heaven. Knowing how to manage her — the ship — in all these situations befits the name and office of a pilot.”

Cicero said:

“All of this care of the state I’ll perform, with all the diligence and fortitude I have, not just for my year as Consul but for my life — unless my life be short, and my year as Consul concludes it.

“If my life must be short, let your will be done, beloved gods. This heart shall yet employ a day, an hour that is left me so for Rome’s benefit as it shall make a life spring out of my death to shine forever glorious in my deeds.

“The vicious count their years; the virtuous count their acts.”

Cicero wanted to count out his life not by the days he had lived, but by the good and notable deeds he had done.

“Most noble Consul!” the Chorus said. “Let us escort him home!”

Cato, Cicero, the Lictors, the citizens, and the Chorus exited.

“A very popular — demagogic — Consul he has grown, I think!” Caesar said.

“How the mob of people clings to him!” Crassus said.

“And Cato leads them!” Caesar said.

Crassus said to Antonius, “You, his colleague, Antonius, are not looked on. No one is paying any attention to you.”

Antonius had been elected the other Consul, and he would serve with Cicero.

“No attention is given to me, nor do I care,” Antonius said.

Caesar said, “He — I mean you, Antonius — enjoys rest and ease the while. Let the other Consul’s — Cicero’s — spirit toil and stay awake for it was created for turmoil.”

Catulus said, “Yet, if all the reports are true, Caius Caesar, the time has need of such a watch and spirit.”

Caesar said:

“Reports? Do you believe them, Catulus? Why, Cicero makes and breeds them for the people, to endear his service to them. Don’t you perceive a trick that is so common? Popular men must create strange monsters and then quell them, to make their arts — professional skills — seem something.

“Would you have such a Herculean actor in the scene, and not his Hydra? They must sweat no less to supply their theatrical properties than to express their parts.”

A Hydra was a monster that Hercules killed as one of his famous labors. It had nine heads, one of which was immortal. If a mortal head was cut off, two heads grew in its place. Hercules defeated the Hydra by having a nephew cauterize the places where mortal heads grew so that new heads would not grow in their place and by putting a boulder on the immortal head.

“Treasons and guilty men are made in states too often to dignify the magistrates,” Crassus said.

“Those states are wretched that are forced to buy their rulers’ reputation with their own infamy,” Catulus said.

A bad leader could get a reputation as a hero by creating an enemy and then defeating that enemy. For example, a bad leader could pit white-skinned people versus brown- and black-skinned people and then suppress the people who have brown or black skin.

Crassus and Caesar were saying that Cicero could make himself a hero by pretending that a treasonous plot had been laid; Cicero would be a hero if people believed he stopped that nonexistent plot.

“We therefore should take precautions that ours do not,” Crassus said.

“Antonius will make that his concern,” Caesar said.

“I shall,” Antonius said.

“And watch the watcher,” Caesar said.

Walking slowly, Catiline, Longinus, and Lentulus approached the group.

“Here comes Catiline,” Catulus said. “How does he take his recent loss in the election?”

“I don’t know,” Caesar said. “But painfully, to be sure.”

“Longinus, too, did stand as a candidate for Consul?” Catulus asked.

“At first,” Caesar said. “But he gave way to his friend.”

Longinus stepped aside in the election in an attempt to have his voters vote for Catiline instead.

“Who’s that coming?” Catulus asked. “Lentulus?”

“Yes,” Caesar said. “He is again taken into the Senate.”

In 70 B.C.E., the Censors threw Lentulus and Curius out of the Senate because of Lentulus’ and Curius’ immorality. Now Lentulus was again in the Senate.

“And he was made Praetor,” Antonius said.

Praetor was a high office, second only to Consul. Lentulus had been elected one of the new Praetors.

“I know it,” Catulus said. “He had my vote, immediately after the Consuls voted.”

“True, you were there, Prince of the Senate — the Senior Senator — then,” Caesar said.

Catulus was Princeps Senatus, a position that allowed him to vote after the Consuls. The position had no imperium, or power, but having the title was a great honor. In prestige, Catulus ranked just below the Consuls.

Catiline, Longinus, and Lentulus joined the others.

“Hail, noblest Romans!” Catiline said.

He said to Antonius, “The worthiest Consul, I congratulate your honor.”

Grammatically, the sentence can be construed as saying that Catiline was the worthiest Consul. “The worthiest Consul” could modify “I.” Or it could be in the vocative case and refer to Antonius.

“I could wish that it had been happier by your fellowship, most noble Sergius, had it pleased the people,” Antonius said to Catiline.

Antonius and Cicero, but not Sergius Catiline, had been elected Consul.

Lucius Sergius Catiline said, “It did not please the gods, who instruct the people, and their unquestioned pleasures must be served. They know what’s fitter for us than ourselves, and it would be impiety to think against them.”

“You bear it rightly, Lucius,” Catulus said to Catiline, “and it gladdens me to find your thoughts so even and calm.”

Catiline replied, “I shall always study to make them such — even and calm — to Rome and heaven.”

“Even” can mean 1) peaceful, or 2) equal. Catiline wanted to equal — rival — the gods. He also wanted to be equal — even — to the gods.

He also wanted to make his thoughts even in the sense of getting even with — getting revenge on — Rome and the gods.

Catiline whispered to Julius Caesar, “I would withdraw with you and speak to you a little, Julius.”

Caesar whispered back, “I’ll come to your home.”

He added, “Crassus would not have you speak to him in front of Quintus Catulus.”

Catiline whispered to Caesar, “I understand.”

Quintus Catulus had quarreled with Crassus. The two men has held the position of Censor together, but Catulus had resigned because he could not get along with Crassus.

Catiline then said to everyone present, “No, when the gods shall judge honors are suitable for me, I shall have them bountifully and with a full hand, I know it. In the meantime, men who obey are no less part of the commonwealth than those who command.”

“Oh, let me kiss your forehead, Lucius,” Catulus said. “How you are wronged!”

“By whom?” Lucius Sergius Catiline asked.

“By the public report, which gives out that you take offense at your repulse, and brook — endure — it deadly.”

The repulse was not being elected Consul.

Catiline said, “Sir, she — fama, public report — brooks not me. Instead, believe me, and believe yourself now that you see me. It is a kind of slander to trust rumor.”

“I know it,” Catulus said. “And I could be angry with it.”

“So may not I,” Catiline said. “Where it concerns himself, who’s angry at a slander makes it true.”

Being angry at a slander about oneself can make other people believe that the slander is true.

“Most noble Sergius!” Catulus said. “This equanimity of yours melts me.”

Crassus said to Quintus Catulus, “Will you render due respect to the Consul, Quintus?”

He was referring to Antonius, who had been elected Consul along with Cicero.

“The due respect that Cato and the rout have done to the other Consul: Cicero?” Caesar asked.

Catulus said, “I wait until he will go.”

He then said to Catiline, “Be always yourself. He who has virtue lacks no personal standing.”

Catulus, Antonius, Caesar, Crassus, and the Lictors exited.

Catiline said to himself, “Did I appear to be as tame as this man thinks me? Did I look so poor, so dead? Did I look so like that nothing that he calls virtuous? Oh, my breast, break quickly, and show my friends my inward thoughts, lest they think that I have betrayed them.”

“Where’s Gabinius?” Longinus asked.

“Gone,” Lentulus answered.

“And Vargunteius?” Longinus asked.

“Slipped away, all shrunk now that Catiline has missed the Consulship,” Lentulus answered.

Catiline said to himself, “I am the scorn of bondmen — slaves — who are next to beasts. What can I worse declare myself that’s fitter? What worse thing can I say about myself? I am the owl of Rome whom boys and girls will mock and hoot at! Or I could say that, if I were set up in the place of that wooden god — Priapus — that keeps our gardens as a scarecrow, I could not frighten the crows or the least bird enough to keep them from excreting on my head.”

Longinus and Lentulus continued to speak privately to each other, not listening to Catiline.

“It is strange that Catiline could miss being voted Consul,” Longinus said.

“Isn’t it stranger that the upstart Cicero should carry the votes so, by all consents, from men who are so much his masters?” Lentulus said.

“That’s true,” Longinus said.

Catiline said to himself, “To what a shadow am I melted!”

“Antonius won it by only a few votes,” Longinus said.

Catiline said to himself, “I have been struck through, as if I were air, and feel it not. My wounds close faster than they’re made.”

“The whole design — the whole enterprise — has been lost by Catiline’s loss in the election,” Lentulus said. “All hands quit it upon his failure.”

Catiline said to himself, “I grow mad at my patience. It is a visor — mask or helmet — that has poisoned me. I wish that it had burned me up and I died inward, with my heart turned to ashes.”

Cethegus entered the scene and walked over to Catiline to join him privately.

“Here’s Cethegus yet,” Longinus said. He began to pay attention to Catiline.

Catiline said, too loudly, “Repulse upon repulse! An inmate — a new lodger in Rome — elected Consul! I wish that I could reach the axle where the pins are that bolt this frame, so that I might pull them out and pluck all into chaos, with myself!”

The word “axle” also means axis. This society believed that the Earth had an axis passing through it. Catiline wanted to remove the pins holding the axis steady and let the Earth plunge into chaos.

“What! Are we wishing now?” Cethegus said, hearing Catiline’s words.

“Yes, my Cethegus,” Catiline said. “Who would not fall with all the world about him?”

If Catiline was going to fall, he wanted to take the entire world with him.

“Not I,” Cethegus said. “I would stand on the world when it falls and force new nature out, to make another. These wishings are those of a woman, not of a Roman. Let us seek other arms — another form of attack.”

The plan to make Catiline a powerful Consul had failed, so now Cethegus wanted to make a new plan.

“What should we do?” Catiline asked.

“We should do, and not wish,” Cethegus said. “Something that wishes cannot perform so suddenly that the gods could not anticipate and forestall it and scarcely have time to fear it.”

“Oh, noble Caius!” Catiline said.

“It pleases me better that you are not Consul,” Cethegus said. “I would not go through open doors; instead, I would break them. I would swim to my ends and accomplish my ends through blood; or I would build a bridge of carcasses and proceed upon the heads of men struck down like piles supporting a bridge, to reach the lives of those who remain and stand. It is then a prey, when danger stops and obstructs and destruction clears the way.”

“How you give voice to my feelings, brave soul,” Catiline said. “I may not at all times show myself as I really am, for I bend and conceal according to the occasion.”

Catiline and Cethegus joined Lentulus and Longinus.

Catiline pointed to Cethegus and said, “Lentulus, this man, if all our fire were out, would fetch down new fire out of the hand of Jove, and rivet Jove to Mount Caucasus, should Jove but frown, and let his own gaunt, ravenous eagle fly at him, to tear his flesh.”

Prometheus had stolen fire and taught Humankind to master it. To punish Prometheus, Jupiter, aka Jove, chained him to Mount Caucasus and each day sent an eagle to devour his liver, which grew back each night so the eagle could devour it again the following day.

Cato entered the scene. Cato supported Cicero, not Catiline.

“Peace! Silence! Here comes Cato,” Lentulus said.

He did not want Cato to hear Catiline’s words.

“Let him come and hear,” Catiline said. “I will no more dissemble and pretend to be that which I am not. All of you, leave us. Everyone except Cethegus leave now. I and my beloved Cethegus here alone will undertake this giants’ war, and we will carry — win — it.”

The giants — the Titans — fought a war against the Olympian gods, but the giants lost the war.

Lentulus and Longinus declined to leave.

“What is the necessity of this?” Lentulus asked.

“Lucius? Sergius, be more wary,” Longinus advised Lucius Sergius Catiline.

Ignoring Lentulus and Longinus, Catiline said, “Now, Marcus Cato, our new Consul’s spy, what has your sour austerity been sent to explore?”

“Nothing in you, licentious Catiline,” Cato said. “Nooses and racks — instruments of torture — cannot wring from you more than your bad deeds have already revealed. It is only judgment that awaits you.”

In other words, Catiline’s deeds had already proven his guilt. Now all that remained to do was to punish Catiline.

“Whose judgment? Cato’s? Shall he judge me?” Catiline asked.

“No, the judgment of the gods, who forever follow — pursue — those they don’t go with as benefactors. And the judgment of the Senate, who with fire must purge sick Rome of noisome, unwholesome, harmful citizens, of whom you are one. Be gone, or else I will go. It is poison to breathe the same air with you.”

“Strike him!” Caius Cethegus said, drawing his sword.

“Stop, good Caius!” Lentulus said.

“Aren’t you afraid, Cato?” Cethegus said.

“Rash Cethegus, no,” Cato said. “Something would be wrong with Rome, when Catiline and you threaten, if Cato was afraid.”

Cato had spoken of using fire to purge Rome’s illness by getting rid of bad citizens.

“The fire you speak of — if any flame of it would approach my fortunes, I’ll quench it, not with water but with ruin,” Catiline said.

One way to stop a house fire from spreading was to demolish the houses around it.

“You hear this, Romans,” Cato said.

He exited.

“Bear it to the Consul,” Catiline yelled after Cato.

He meant: Carry my words to Cicero.

“I would have sent away his soul before him,” Cethegus said. “I would have killed him instead of letting him leave. You are too sluggish, Lentulus, and remiss. It is for you we labor, and the kingdom promised to you by the Sibyls.”

The Sibylline prophecy — as interpreted by augurs whom Catiline had bribed — had stated that Lentulus would become King of Rome.

Catiline said, “A kingdom that Lentulus’ Praetorship and some small flattery from the Senate will make him forget.”

“You wrong me, Lucius,” Lentulus said to Catiline.

“He will not need these spurs to action,” Longinus said.

“The action needs them,” Catiline said. “These things, when they proceed not forward, they go backward.”

“Let us consult then,” Lentulus said. “Let’s make a plan.”

“Let us first take arms,” Cethegus said. “They who deny us just things now, will give all that we ask, if once they see our swords.”

“Our objectives must be sought with wounds, not words,” Catiline said.

— 3.2 —

Cicero and Fulvia talked together. Fulvia had informed Cicero about Catiline’s plot, a plot that Curius had told her about.

Cicero said:

“Is there a heaven and gods, and can it be that they should be so slow to hear and be so slow to see?”

“Has Jove no thunder, or has Jove become as torpid and stupefied as you are, nearly wretched Rome, when both your Senate and your gods sleep and neither your nor their own states do keep?”

“What will awake you, heaven? What can excite your anger, if this treasonous practice is too trivial?”

“Catiline’s former plots partake of former times, but this last plot was only Catiline’s. Oh, that it would be his last! But he before has safely done so much he’ll still dare more.”

“Ambition, like a torrent, never looks back and is an increasing swelling of pride and the last affection a high mind can put off, being both a rebel to the soul and reason; and it — ambition — overcomes by force all laws and all conscience, treads upon religion, and offers violence to nature’s self.”

“But here is that which transcends it! A black purpose to cast into confusion nature, and to ruin that which neither time nor mankind can ever repair and restore.”

“Sit down, good lady.”

Fulvia sat.

Using the third person, Cicero continued:

“Cicero is lost in this your story: for to think it is true tests my reason. It so far exceeds all the strange and immoderate fictions of the tragedies on stage.”

“The commonwealth, still panting underneath the strokes and wounds of a recent civil war, gasping for life, and scarcely restored to hope: To seek to oppress her with new cruelty and utterly extinguish her ancient name with so prodigious and unheard-of fierceness!

“What sink — scum, pit, cesspool — of monsters, wretches of lost minds, mad after change and desperate in their states, wearied and oppressed with their poverty — for all this I acknowledge them to be — dared have thought it?

“Would the barbarous deeds of Marius and Sulla have been believed by our children, had not this greater evil deed arisen forth for them? All that Marius and Sulla did was piety compared to this because they only murdered kinsfolk, brothers, and parents and raped the virgins and perhaps some matrons. They left the city and the temples standing: The gods and the majesty of Rome were safe yet.

“Catiline and his co-conspirators purpose to set on fire Rome, to despoil the temples — beyond the other evils — and lay waste the far-triumphed world — the world over which Rome has triumphed far and wide and in which it is known for its triumphs — for what can be enough for someone to whom Rome is too little room?”

“It is true, my lord,” Fulvia said. “I had the same reasoning.”

Cicero continued:

“And then to take a horrid sacrament of wine and human blood for the execution of this their dire design, which might be called the height of wickedness, except that for which they did it was higher wickedness still!”

The plotted rebellion was more wicked than the drinking of the mixture of wine and the slave’s blood.

Fulvia said, “I assure your lordship that the extreme horror of it almost turned me to injurious air, when first I heard it. I was all vapor when it was told to me, and I longed to vent it anywhere. It was such a secret that I thought it would have burnt me up.”

“Good Fulvia, don’t fear your act, must less repent of it,” Cicero said.

“I do not repent it, my good lord,” Fulvia said. “I know to whom I have uttered it.”

She had informed Cicero about the plot, and he was in a position of power to stop it.

“You have discharged your duty safely,” Cicero said. “Should Rome, for whom you have done the happy service, turn most ungrateful, yet would your virtue be paid in the consciousness of the deed. So much good deeds reward themselves.”

In other words: Virtue is its own reward.

“My lord, I didn’t do it for any other aim but for itself. I did not do it for any ambition of reward,” Fulvia said.

“You have learned the difference between doing office to the public welfare and private friendship, and have shown it, lady,” Cicero said. “Be still yourself. I have sent for Quintus Curius, and for your virtuous sake, if I can win him yet to the commonwealth, he shall be safe, too.”

“I’ll undertake, my lord, that he shall be won to the right side,” Fulvia said.

“Please, join with me then, and help to persuade him to do the right thing,” Cicero said.

A Lictor entered the room.

“How is it now?” Cicero said. “Has Curius come?”

“He is here, my lord,” the Lictor answered.

“Go immediately and tell my colleague Antonius I want to speak with him about some immediate business of the state.

“And, as you go, call on my brother Quintus and tell him, with the Tribunes, to come to me.

“Now tell Curius to enter.”

The Lictor exited.

Cicero asked, “Fulvia, you will aid me?”

“It is my duty,” Fulvia said.

Curius entered the room.

Cicero said:

“Oh, my noble lord! I have to chide you, truly. Give me your hand. Nay, don’t be troubled. It shall be gently, Curius. You look upon this lady? What, do you guess my business yet?”

“Come, if you frown, I will thunder. Therefore, put on your better looks and thoughts. There’s nothing but fair and good intended to you, and I would make those — your better looks and thoughts — your nature and habit of mind.”

Cicero then mentioned Lentulus, who had been restored to the Senate, although Curius had not:

“Would you, of whom the Senate had that hope, as to my knowledge it was in their purpose during the next sitting to restore you, as they have done the stupid and ungrateful Lentulus — excuse me that I name you thus together, for yet you are not such as he is —

“Would you, I say, a person both of blood and honor, coming from a long line of virtuous ancestors, embark yourself for such a hellish action with relative-killers and traitors, men turned Furies out of the waste and ruin of their fortunes — for it is despair that is the mother of madness — despair such as that arising from want and poverty — that which all conspirators, except they, have first — a mere pretext for their evil?”

In other words, Curius’ life was good. He came from a long and distinguished line of family members, and he was on the verge of again becoming a Senator. Most conspirators become traitors out of despair, but Curius had nothing to despair about.

Cicero continued:

“Oh, I must blush with you. Come, you shall not labor to extenuate your guilt, but to quit it entirely. Bad men excuse their faults, good men will leave and abandon them. He acts the third crime who defends the first crime.”

The three crimes are 1) the evil deed, 2) failure to repent, and 3) self-justification for committing the crime.

Cicero continued:

“Here is a lady — Fulvia — who has got the start in piety of us all, and for whose virtue I could almost turn lover again, except that Terentia — my wife — would be jealous.

“What an honor has Fulvia gained for herself! What voices, titles, and loud applauses will pursue her through every street! What windows will be filled with people who will shoot eyes — gaze — at her! What envy and grief will matrons feel because they are not she! All of this when her act here shall seem worthier a chariot than if Pompey came in triumph through Rome with his captives from Asia chained behind his chariot!

“All this is while she lives. But when she is dead, her very name will be a statue, not wrought for time but rooted in the minds of all posterity, when brass and marble, aye, and the Capitol itself, is dust!”

“Your Honor thinks too highly of me,” Fulvia said.

Cicero said:

“No, I cannot think highly enough of you. And I would have Curius emulate you.

“It is no shame to follow the better precedent. She shows you, Curius, what claim your country lays to you, and what duty you owe to it.

“Don’t be afraid to break with murderers and traitors for the saving life so near and necessary to you as is your country’s life.

“Think only on Rome’s right: No child can be too naturally loving to his parent. She is our common mother, and she lays claim to the best part of us; do not stop, but instead give her the best part of you. He who is void of fear may soon be just, and no religion binds men to be traitors.”

Fulvia said to Cicero, “My lord, he understands it and will follow your saving counsel and advice. But his shame yet stays him. I know that he is coming around to what you advise.”

“Do you know it?” Curius asked Fulvia.

Curius and Fulvia spoke privately apart from Cicero.

“Yes, let me speak with you,” Fulvia said.

Curius said, “Oh, you are —”

“What am I?” Fulvia said.

“Don’t speak so loudly,” Curius said.

Fulvia said, “I am what you should be. Come, do you think I’d take part in any plot where madam Sempronia should take precedence over me, and Fulvia walk in the rear, or be on the side in a place of secondary importance? Do you think that I would be her second in a business, although it might give me everything the sun sees?

“It was a silly fantasy — a foolish dream — of yours. Attach yourself to me and the Consul and be wise. Follow the fortune I have put you into. You may be something this way, and with safety.”

Cicero joined them and said, “Nay, I must tolerate no whisperings, lady.”

“Sir, you may hear,” Fulvia said. “I am telling him how hazardous his course was in the way wherein he was.”

Cicero said:

“How hazardous? How certain to all ruin. Did he, or do yet any of the conspirators, imagine that the gods would sleep and pay no attention to such a Stygian — Hellish — practice against the commonwealth that they have founded with so much labor, and with much care have kept now nearly seven hundred years?

According to tradition, Rome was founded in 753 B.C.E.

Cicero continued:

“It is a madness, wherewith heaven blinds them when it would confound them, that they should think it.”

A proverb stated, Quem Deus vult perdere, prius dementat. Translation: “Whom the god would destroy, he first makes insane.”

Cicero continued:

“Come, my Curius, I see your nature’s right; you shall no more be mentioned with the conspirators: I will call you mine and trouble this good shame of yours no farther.”

Either Curius was ashamed of his actions, or Cicero was pretending that Curius was ashamed of his actions.

Cicero continued:

“Stand firm for your country and become a man who is honored and loved. It would be a noble life to be found dead embracing Rome.”

Horace wrote Dulce et decorum est pro patria mori. Translation: “It is sweet and fitting to die for one’s country.”

Cicero continued:

“Do you know what thanks, what titles, what rewards the Senate will certainly heap upon you for your service? Don’t allow a desperate action to more engage you than your safety should, and don’t allow wicked friendship to force you to do what honesty and virtue cannot persuade you to do.”

“He tells you right, sweet friend,” Fulvia said. “It is saving counsel that can rescue you.”

Curius replied, “Most noble Consul, I am yours and hers — I mean my country’s. You have formed me anew, inspiring me with what I should be truly. And I entreat you: Don’t let my faith seem cheaper because it springs out of penitence.”

“Good Curius, it shall be of greater price rather, and because I’d make it such, hear how I trust you more,” Cicero said.

Cicero wanted Curius to be a spy for him:

“Keep still your former face — outward appearance — and mix again with these lost spirits who are the conspirators. Run all their mazes with them, for such are treasons. Find out their windings and subtle turnings, watch their snaky ways through thickets and hedges, into woods of darkness, where they are obliged to creep upon their breasts in paths never trodden by men, but wolves and panthers.

“Learn, beside Catiline, Lentulus, and those whose names I have, what new ones they draw into their plot; who else are likely to join them and be drawn into their plot; who those great ones are they do not name; what ways they mean to take; and whither their hopes point: to war or ruin by some surprise ambush.

“Explore all their intentions and acquaint me with whatever you find that may profit the Republic, either by yourself or by this your virtuous friend, on whom I impose the responsibility of urging you to do the right thing.

“I’ll see that Rome shall prove a thankful and a bounteous mother.

“Be as secret as the night.”

“And as constant, sir,” Curius said.

The night is not constant; it turns to day. Curius is also not constant; he turns from conspirator to anti-conspirator spy.

Cicero said, “I do not doubt it, although lack of time prevents you from making a vow of loyalty to Rome. The dignity of truth is lost with too much protesting.”

He called, “Who is there?”

This was a way of calling a servant to escort Curius and Fulvia out of Cicero’s house.

A servant entered the room.

Cicero said to Fulvia and Curius, “Leave this way, lest you be seen and met. And when you come, let this be your token to say to this servant.”

Cicero gave them the password.

He then said to the servant, “Light their way with torch-fire.”

The servant, Curius, and Fulvia exited.

Alone, Cicero said to himself:

“Oh, Rome, in what a sickness have you fallen! How dangerous and deadly, when your head is drowned in sleep, and all your body is feverish!

“Rome, your lethargy is such that no noise, no pulling, no vexation wakes you; or, if by chance you heave your eyelids up, you do forget, sooner than you were told, your own danger. I didn’t act reverently when I blamed the gods who wake and watch for you, although you snore to yourself.

“Isn’t it strange that you should be so diseased and feel so secure? But, more, isn’t it strange that the first symptoms of such a malady should not rise out from any worthy member, but a base and common strumpet, worthless to be named even a hair or other part of you?”

The base and common strumpet was Fulvia, who first informed Cicero about the conspiracy.

Continuing to refer to Rome as “you,” Cicero continued:

“Think, think hereafter what your needs were, when you must use such means; and lay it to your breast — remember — how much the gods upbraid your foul neglect of them by making so vile a thing the author of your safety.

“They — the gods — could have worked by nobler ways: They could have struck your foes with forked lightning or blasted thunder; thrown hills upon them in the process; have sent death, like a noxious vapor, to all their families; or caused their consciences to burst them.

“But, when they will show you what you are and make a scornful difference between their power and you, they help you by such aids as geese and harlots.”

Enemy soldiers once tried to sneak up the Capitoline Hill, but geese sacred to Juno cackled and alerted the Romans to the approach of the enemy soldiers.

The word “goose” was also slang for “prostitute” in addition to being the name of a kind of fowl.

A Lictor entered the room.

“How is it now?” Cicero asked. “What is the answer? Has he come?”

The Lictor replied, “Your brother will immediately be here, and your colleague Antonius said, coldly, that he would follow me.”

The Lictor exited.

Alone again, Cicero said to himself:

“Aye, that troubles me somewhat and is worth my fear. Antonius is a man against whom I must make provisions so that, as he’ll do no good, he will also do no harm.

“Antonius, although he is not of the plot, will like it and wish it should proceed; for all change is always welcome to men oppressed by and pressed with their needs.

“I must with offices and patience win him. I must make him by art that which he was not born: a friend to the public and the republic. And so I will bestow on him the province of Macedonia that is by the Senate decreed to me. That benefit will bind him.”

Antonius suffered from debt. Since Macedonia was a rich province that would supply him with much money, he need not support a dangerous conspiracy in an attempt to get money to pay his debts.

Consuls normally served as the governor of a province after their Consulship. The provinces were awarded by lot, and Cicero had won the wealthier province, but Cicero would trade Macedonia to Antonius for the less affluent province of Transalpine Gaul. This would make Antonius beholden to Cicero, and Cicero would make him do the right thing.

Cicero continued:

“It is well if some men will do well for reward. So few are virtuous when the reward’s away. Nor must I be unmindful of my own private interests, for which I have called my brother and the Tribunes, my kinsfolk, and my clients to be near me.”

Tribunes were administrative officers in Rome. Some were judicial Tribunes, and some were military Tribunes.

Cicero was the patron to some people of lower status than himself. They were his clients, and they had obligations to him as he had to them.

His private interests included self-protection. The conspirators wanted him dead.

Cicero continued:

“He who stands up against traitors and their ends shall need a double guard of law and friends, especially in such an envious state that sooner will accuse the magistrate than the delinquent and will rather grieve that the treason is not acted, than believe.”

— 3.3 —

Julius Caesar and Catiline spoke together in the house of co-conspirator Laeca.

Caesar said:

“The night grows later, and you are about to have your meeting. I’ll therefore end with a few words.

“Be resolute and put your plan in action. The more that actions of gravity, deep significance, and danger are considered, the less assuredly they are performed. And thence it happens the bravest and most splendid plots that are not executed immediately have been discovered. Say you are constant, or another, a third, or more, there may be yet one wretched spirit with whom the fear of punishment shall work above all the thoughts of honor and revenge.

“You are not now to think what’s best to do, as in the beginnings of a plot; instead, you are to think what must be done, now that the plot has thus begun, and you are to let pass no advantage that may secure you.

“Let them call it evil now. When it is past and has prospered, it will be called virtue. Petty crimes are punished, but great crimes are rewarded.

“Nor must you think of peril, since attempts and essays begun with danger always end with glory. And when need spurs action, despair will be called wisdom.

“Less ought the anxiety about men or reputation to frighten you, for they who win seldom receive shame from their victory, however it has been achieved, and they receive vengeance least.

“For who, besieged with wants and needs, would stop at death, or anything beyond it?

“Come, there was never any great thing yet attained but by violence, or fraud. And he who balks, because of the folly of a conscience, to reach it —”

Catiline finished Caesar’s sentence: “— is a good religious — superstitious — fool.”

Caesar agreed:

“He is a superstitious slave, and he will die a beast, not a man.

“Good night. You know what Crassus thinks, and I, by this: Prepare for yourself wings, as large as sails, to cut through air and leave no impression behind you.

“A serpent, before it comes to be a dragon, eats a bat, and so must you ‘eat’ a Consul who watches and guards.”

A Greek proverb stated, “Unless a serpent eat a serpent, he will not become a dragon.” The proverb meant that to advance one must make someone else fail.

Caesar then said to Sergius Catiline, “What you do, do quickly, Sergius.”

This is John 21-27:

21 When Jesus had thus said, he was troubled in spirit, and testified, and said, Verily, verily, I say unto you, that one of you shall betray me.

22 Then the disciples looked one on another, doubting of whom he spake.

23 Now there was leaning on Jesus’ bosom one of his disciples, whom Jesus loved.

24 Simon Peter therefore beckoned to him, that he should ask who it should be of whom he spake.

25 He then lying on Jesus’ breast saith unto him, Lord, who is it?

26 Jesus answered, He it is, to whom I shall give a sop, when I have dipped it. And when he had dipped the sop, he gave it to Judas Iscariot, the son of Simon.

27 And after the sop Satan entered into him. Then said Jesus unto him, That thou doest, do quickly. (King James Version)

Preparing to leave, Caesar said, "You shall not stir for me."

By "shall not stir," he meant that Catiline need not make a fuss.

"Excuse me," Catiline said.

He intended to stir himself to help Caesar get where he was going.

He called to servants outside the room, "Lights there!"

Catiline was calling a servant to bring a torch to light Caesar's way.

"By no means," Caesar said.

This was supposed to be a secret meeting. Having a servant light his way as he left would make him more noticeable.

Catiline called to the servants, "Stay then."

He then said to Caesar, "All good thoughts to Caesar! And the same to Crassus."

"Just bear in mind your friends' counsels and advice," Caesar said.

He exited, alone.

"Or I will lack spirit," Catiline said.

He meant that he would lack courage if he did not bear in mind his friends' counsels and advice.

His wife, Aurelia, entered the room.

"How are you now, Aurelia?" Catiline said. "Have your confederates come? The ladies?"

"Yes," Aurelia said.

"And is Sempronia there?" Catiline asked.

“She is,” Aurelia answered.

“That’s well,” Catiline said. “She has a sulfurous — fiery — spirit and will take light at a spark. Broach the subject to them, gentle love, about drawing as many of their husbands into the plot as they can. If not, to get rid of them: That’ll be the easier practice for some wives who have been long tired of them.”

One way to get rid of an unwanted husband is to have them die in the rebellion.

Catiline continued, “Solicit their aids for money, and their servants’ help in setting fire to the city at the designated time. Promise them states, and empires, and men for lovers, made of better clay than ever the old potter Titan knew.”

Prometheus, one of the Titans, made men out of clay and the goddess Athena breathed life into them.

Laeca, whose house they were in, entered the room.

“Who’s that?” Catiline said. “Oh, Porcius Laeca! Are they here?”

“They are all here,” Porcius Laeca said.

Catiline said to Aurelia, “Love, you have your instructions. I’ll trust you with the stuff — the material — you have to work on. You’ll give form to it.”

Aurelia would work at persuading the women to convince their husbands to support the rebellion.

Catiline then said to Porcius Laeca, “Porcius, fetch the silver eagle I gave into your keeping.”

The eagle was depicted on a battle standard, aka battle flag.

Catiline added, “And ask them to enter the room.”

Laeca exited.

Cethegus, Curius, Lentulus, Vargunteius, Longinus, Gabinius, Ceparius, Autronius, and Cornelius entered the room.

“Oh, friends, your faces gladden me,” Catiline said. “This will be our last meeting, I hope, of consultation.”

“So it had better be,” Cethegus said.

“Daily we lose the opportunity to act,” Curius, who was now acting as a spy for Cicero, said.

“Aye, and our means, whereof one wounds me most — that was the fairest. Piso is dead, in Spain,” Catiline said.

Piso had been murdered. One rumor was that Pompey had instigated the murder. Another rumor was that some Spaniards had murdered him because of his cruel rule.

“As we are, here,” Cethegus said.

Cethegus was a hothead who wanted violence — now.

“And, as it is thought, by the malice of Pompey’s followers,” Longinus said.

“He also is coming back now, out of Asia,” Lentulus said.

Pompey’s army, if it returned, would likely oppose Catiline.

Catiline said:

“Therefore, what we intend we must be swift in. Take your seats and listen.

“I have already sent Septimius into the Picene territories, and Julius to raise an army for us in Apulia. Manlius at Faesulae is by this time ready for war, with the old needy troops who followed Sulla; and they just wait until we will give the blow at home.”

Laeca entered with the eagle battle standard.

Catiline said:

“Behold this silver eagle. It was Marius’ standard in the Cimbrian war, and it was fatal to and influencing the fate of Rome, and, as our augurs tell me, shall still be so; for which single ominous, portentous cause I have kept it safe and done it sacred rites as if to a godhead, in a chapel built expressly for it.”

Marius won the war against the Cimbrians and so kept Rome safe; the word “fatal” meant “connected with [Rome’s] fate.” Catiline’s rebellion, however, if successful, would be fatal in another sense to the Roman Republic.

Catiline continued:

“Clasp then all your hands as a pledge to follow this battle standard, with vows of death and ruin struck silently and home.”

The conspirators made their vows, silently.

Catiline continued:

“So waters speak when they run deepest.

“Now’s the time. This year is the twentieth year from the burning of the Capitol, as fatal, too, to Rome, by all predictions. And in which honored Lentulus must rise and become a king, if he pursues it.”

“If he does not, he is unworthy of the great destiny,” Curius said.

“This destiny is too great for me,” Lentulus said, “but what the gods and their great loves decree me, I must not seem inattentive to.”

“No, nor must we be envious,” Catiline said. “We have enough beside: all Gallia, Belgia, Greece, Spain, and Africa.”

These were regions that the conspirators would split up among themselves.

“Aye, and Asia, too,” Curius said, “now that Pompey is returning.”

“Noblest Romans,” Catiline said, “I think our looks are not as quick and high — as fiery and noble — as they used to be.”

“No?” Curius said. “Whose is not?”

Catiline said, “We have no anger in our eyes, no storm, no lightning. Our hate is spent and fumed away in vapor, before our hands are at work. I can accuse not any one person, but I can accuse all of slackness.”

“Yes, and accuse yourself as such, while you do it,” Caius Cethegus said.

“What?” Catiline said. “That is sharply answered, Caius.”

“Truly, truly,” Cethegus said.

Lentulus said, “Come, let each of us know his part to do, and then let us be accused. Set aside these untimely quarrels.”

“I wish there were more Romes than one to destroy and ruin,” Curius said.

“More Romes?” Cethegus said. “More worlds.”

“Nay, then more gods, and natures, if they took part,” Curius said.

Curius was out-doing Cethegus in talking about violence, something that was difficult to do. Curius was even blaspheming.

“When shall the time be, first?” Lentulus said.

“I think the Saturnals,” Catiline said.

“It will be too long to wait,” Cethegus said. “That’s too far off in time.”

“They are not far off,” Catiline said. “It is not a month.”

“A week, a day, an hour is too far off,” Cethegus said. “Now would be the fittest time.”

“We have not laid — arranged — all things so safe and ready,” Catiline said.

Caius Cethegus said, “While we’re delaying, we shall all lie and grow to earth. I wish that I would have nothing to do with the plot, if we do not put it in action now. These things, they should be enacted before they are thought.”

One way to grow to earth is to die and be buried in a burial plot.

“Nay, now your reason forsakes you, Caius,” Catiline said. “Think but what convenience that time will furnish: The city’s custom is to be then in mirth and feast.”

During the Saturnalia, which occurred in the middle of December, slaves had freedom of speech and they ate a meal at which their masters served them. Schools and law courts were closed. Much merriment occurred, and no one would expect a rebellion.

After taking the Trojan Horse into the city of Troy, the Trojans thought that they had won the war, and so they celebrated with much drinking into the night. Their drunkenness made it easier for the Greek army to defeat them after the Greek soldiers hidden inside the Trojan Horse came out, went to the city gates and opened them, letting in the rest of the Greek army.

Lentulus said, “They will be entirely relaxed in pleasure and security —”

Autronius said, “Each house will be relaxed in freedom —”

Curius said, “Every slave will be a master —”

Longinus said, “And they, too, will be no mean aids —”

Curius interrupted, “— made from their hope of liberty —”

Lentulus interrupted, “— or hate to their lords.”

Vargunteius said, “It is certain there cannot be a time found out more apt and natural than the Saturnalia to have our rebellion.”

Cethegus did not look happy. He looked angry.

Lentulus said, “Nay, good Cethegus. Why do your passions now disturb our hopes?”

“Why do your hopes delude your certainties?” Cethegus asked.

To Cethegus, if the rebellion started now, it was certain to be successful.

Catiline said to Cethegus, “You must let him have his way. Think about the arrangement and method of it.”

“Yes,” Longinus said.

“I don’t like setting Rome on fire,” Lentulus said. “It will too much lay waste my city.”

“Even if Rome were reduced to embers, there will be wealth enough raked out of them to make spring up a new Rome,” Catiline said. “It must be fire, or nothing.”

Wealth could be raked out of the ashes, but not the souls of the dead.

“What else should frighten or terrify them?” Longinus asked.

“True,” Vargunteius said. “In that confusion must be the chief slaughter.”

“Then we shall kill them most splendidly,” Curius said.

“And in heaps,” Ceparus said.

“We will strew sacrifices,” Autronius said.

“We will make the earth an altar,” Curius said.

Animals were bloodily sacrificed on altars.

“And we will make Rome the fire,” Longinus said.

“It will be a noble night,” Laeca said.

“And worth all Sulla’s days,” Vargunteius said.

“When husbands and wives, grandsires and nephews, servants and their lords, virgins and priests, the infant and the nurse, go all to hell together, in a fleet,” Curius said.

Cethegus had spoken earlier about the need for a navy to carry the souls of those who died in the Sulla-Marius civil war to the Land of the Dead. Curius used the same image when he spoke about the need of a fleet to carry to the Land of the Dead the souls of those who would soon be dead because of the rebellion.

Catiline said:

“I would have you, Longinus and Statilius, take the charge of setting Rome on fire, which must be at a sign given with a trumpet, done in twelve chief places of the city at once. The flax and sulfur are already stored at Cethegus’ house. So are the weapons.

“Gabinus, you with other force — troops — shall stop the pipes and conduits, and you shall kill those who come for water to put out the fire.”

“What shall I do?” Curius asked.

“All will have employment, fear not,” Catiline said. “Ply the execution.”

The execution could be of the plan or of a person.

“For that, trust me and Cethegus,” Curius said.

Catiline said:

“I will be at hand, with the army, to meet those who escape.

“And, Lentulus, you surround Pompey’s house, to seize his sons alive, for they are the bargaining chips that we must use to make our peace with him.

“Cut up all the other people, as Tarquin did the poppy heads or as mowers do a field of thistles.”

Sextus Tarquinius sent a messenger to ask his father, Tarquinius Superbus (the last king of Rome) how he could conquer the city of Gabii. His father, who was in his garden, used his sword or his walking stick to decapitate the tallest flowers. Sextus Tarquinius understood that to mean that he should kill the most important men in the city.

Catiline continued:

“Or else cut up, as plows do barren lands; and strike together against flints and clods — strike against the ingrateful, ungrateful, unpleasant, and flinty Senate and strike against the clod-like common people — until no rage gone before or coming after in history may be equal in weight to yours, even though Horror herself would leap into the scale.

“Moreover, in your violent acts, let the fall of torrents and the noise of tempests, the boiling of the whirlpool Charybdis that threatened Ulysses, the sea’s wildness, the eating force of flames, and wings of winds, all be outwrought by your transcendent furies.

“It would have been done before this, had I been Consul. We would have had no stop, no hindrance.”

“Whose side is Antonius on?” Lentulus asked. “Is he loyal to us?”

Catiline said, “The other side has won him: Antonius is lost to us. Cicero was born to be my opposition and my obstacle, and he stands in all our ways.”

Cicero had given the governorship of Macedonia to Antonius and so won him over to the side of the protectors of the Roman Republic.

“Remove him first,” Curius said, referring to Cicero. “Kill him first.”

“May that yet be done sooner?” Cethegus said.

By “sooner,” he meant before the day that Rome would be set on fire.

“I wish it were done,” Catiline said.

“I’ll do it,” Cornelius and Vargunteius volunteered.

They were willing to murder Cicero.

“It is my province,” Cethegus said. “Let no one usurp it!”

“What are your means?” Lentulus asked. “How will you do it?”

“Don’t ask,” Cethegus said. “He shall die. ‘Shall’ was too slowly said. He’s dying. That is yet too slow. He’s dead.”

Catiline said to Cethegus, “Brave, peerless Roman, whose soul might be the world’s soul — anima mundi — if that were dying, don’t refuse yet the aids of these your friends.”

“Here’s Vargunteius, who has good relations with Cicero,” Lentulus said.

Catiline said, “And under the pretext of clientele — attendance on a patron — and visitation with the morning ‘hail,’ he will be admitted.”

Clients traditionally paid a morning visit to their patrons and greeted them with “Hail.” That would get Vargunteius close enough to kill Cicero, who was the patron of many.

“What is that to me?” Cethegus asked.

“Yes, we may kill him in his bed, and safely,” Vargunteius said.

Cethegus replied, “Safe is your way, then; take it. Mine’s my own way.”

He exited.

“Follow him, Vargunteius, and persuade him that the morning is the fittest time to kill Cicero,” Catiline said.

“The night will turn all into riot, tumult, and turmoil,” Longinus said.

“And perhaps fail to kill Cicero, too,” Lentulus said.

Catiline said, “Entreat and plead with Cethegus in all our names —”

Lentulus added, “— by all our vows and friendships.”

Vargunteius exited.

Sempronia, Aurelia, and Fulvia entered the room.

Sempronia asked, “Has our council broken up first?”

“You say that women are the greatest talkers,” Aurelia said.

Aurelia whispered with Catiline, while Fulvia took Curius aside.

“We have finished our discussion and are now fit for action,” Sempronia said.

“Which is passion. There’s your best activity, lady,” Longinus said.

Sempronia had a reputation for licentiousness.

“How does your wise Fatness know that?” Sempronia asked.

Longinus, who was fat, replied, “Your mother’s daughter taught me, madam.”

“Come, Sempronia, leave him alone,” Catiline said. “He is a joker. And our present business is of more serious consequence and importance. Aurelia tells me you’ve done most masculinely — vigorously — within, and you have played the orator.”

Sempronia said, “But we must hasten to execute our plot as well, and not remain inactive out of anxiety about the future.”

“You say well, lady,” Catiline said.

“I like our plot exceedingly well,” Sempronia said. “It is sure to succeed, and we shall leave little to luck in it.”

Catiline said to her, “Your banquet awaits you.”

He then said, "Aurelia, take her in."

Looking around, he asked, "Where's Fulvia?"

Seeing Fulvia with Curius, Sempronia said, "Oh, the two lovers are coupling."

"Indeed, she's very ill from sitting up late," Curius said.

"You'd have her laugh and lie down," Sempronia said.

She was making a bawdy joke.

"Laugh and Lie Down" was the name of a card game.

Fulvia said, "No, indeed, Sempronia, I am not well. I'll take my leave; it draws close to the morning. Curius shall stay with you."

She then said to Aurelia, "Madam, I ask you to pardon me. I must consider my health."

"Farewell, good Fulvia," Aurelia said.

Whispering to Fulvia, Curius said, "Make haste and tell Cicero to get his guards about him. For Vargunteius and Cornelius have undertaken to murder him if Cethegus should miss. Their reason is that they think Cethegus' open rashness will permit easier discovery than their attempt, which will be veiled under friendship."

He said out loud to her, "I'll take you to your coach."

Whispering, he said, "Tell him also about Caesar's coming here earlier."

"My sweet madam, are you leaving?" Catiline asked.

"In truth, my lord, I have some indisposition," Fulvia said.

"I do wish you had all your health, sweet lady," Catiline replied.

He then said, “Lentulus, you’ll do her service.”

“I’ll take her to her coach, and I’ll give her the service due to her,” Lentulus replied.

Everyone except Catiline exited.

Alone, Catiline said to himself:

“What agents men must use in their scheming!

“The rash, ambitious, needy, desperate, foolish, and wretched, even the dregs of mankind, all the way down to whores and women!

“Still, it must be so. Each has his or her own proper place, and they are the best in their jobs. Men-servants are fittest to kindle fires; slaves carry burdens, butchers are for slaughters; and apothecaries, wine-serving butlers, and cooks are for poisons.

“And so are these for me: dull, stupid Lentulus is my stale — my decoy — with whom I stalk and hunt; the rash Cethegus is my executioner; and fat Longinus, Statilius, Curius, Ceparius, and Cimber are my laborers, my pioneers who dig trenches, and they are my incendiaries.”

A stale is a decoy. Hunters would keep an animal in front of them in order to get close to their prey.

Incendiaries are weapons that start fires.

Catiline continued:

“With these, I have domestic traitors, bosom thieves whom custom has called wives, the readiest helps to betray heady — impetuous and headstrong — husbands, to rob those who are at ease and lend the money in exchange for lust.”

The wives rob the husbands and “lend” — give — the money to their lovers.

Catiline continued:

“Shall Catiline not do now, with these aids, so sought, so sorted — so recruited and given orders — something that shall be called their labor but his profit?”

“And shall Catiline not make Caesar repent his advice to be bold to a spirit so much his lord and master in evil?”

“Shall Caesar repent his advice when all these shall, like the brethren sprung of dragons’ teeth, ruin each other, and he shall fall — die — among them with Crassus, Pompey, or whoever else appears even if they only resemble or are near a great one?”

Ancient mythology has tales of the sowing of dragon’s teeth, leading to the growth of armed men who fight and kill each other.

Catiline continued:

“May my brain dissolve to water and my blood turn to phlegm, may my hands drop off, unworthy of my sword, and may that sword be inspired of itself to rip my breast for my lost entrails, when I leave a soul who will not serve me.”

This society believed that the mixture of four humors in the body determined one’s temperament. One humor could be predominant. The four humors are blood, yellow bile, black bile, and phlegm. If blood is predominant, then the person is sanguine (active, optimistic). If yellow bile is predominant, then the person is choleric (bad-tempered). If black bile is predominant, then the person is melancholic (sad). If phlegm is predominant, then the person is phlegmatic (calm, apathetic, indolent).

Catiline was optimistic that his rebellion would succeed.

Catiline continued:

“And those who will serve me are the same as with slaves:
Such clay I am so bold as not to fear.”

Catiline had no loyalty to his co-conspirators. Once they had served his needs, they would be tossed aside.

Catiline continued:

“The cruelty I mean to act I wish should be called mine and remain in my name, while after-ages do work themselves out in thinking to do the like but do it less. People in the future will try to be as evil as I am, but they shall fail.

“And even if in the future the power of all the fiends were let loose, with Fate to boot, my cruelty should be still the outstanding example.

“Soon what the Gauls or Moors could not effect — enduring victory over Rome — nor rival Carthaginians with their long history of spite and malice against Rome, shall be the work of one, and that my, night.”

Rome and Carthage battled for supremacy in the Mediterranean. They fought three wars, each of which Rome won. The Punic Wars, also called the Carthaginian Wars, were fought between 264 and 146 B.C.E. Following the Third Carthaginian War, Rome completely destroyed Carthage.

— 3.4 —

Cicero and Fulvia talked together. A servant was present.

Cicero said to Fulvia, “I thank your vigilance.”

He then said to the servant, “Where’s my brother, Quintus? Call all my servants up.”

The servant exited.

Cicero then said to Fulvia, “Tell noble Curius and say it to yourself: You are my saviors. But that’s too little for you: You are Rome’s saviors, too. Since you are Rome’s saviors, what could I then hope less than that you be my saviors, too?”

Quintus entered the room.

Cicero said to his brother, “Oh, brother, now the engineers of the plot I told you about are working; the machinations begin to move. Where are your weapons? Arm all my household immediately. And order the porter not to let any man in until daytime.”

“Not even your clients and your friends?” Quintus asked.

“The men who come to murder me wear those names,” Cicero said. “They will pretend to be my clients and my friends. Yet send for Cato and Quintus Catulus — those men I dare to trust — and send for Flaccus and Pomtinius, the Praetors, by the back way.”

Quintus said to Cicero, “Take care, good brother Marcus, that your fears are not formed greater than they should be. If they are, they will make your friends grieve while your enemies laugh.”

Many people at the time thought that Cicero was exaggerating any dangers facing Rome and also exaggerating his heroic response to them.

Cicero replied, “It is a brother’s counsel, and worth thanks. But do as I entreat you to do. I am exercising foresight, and I do not fear what people think about it.”

Quintus exited.

Cicero asked Fulvia, “Was Caesar there, do you say?”

“Curius says he met him coming from there,” Fulvia replied.

“Oh, so it’s true,” Cicero said. “And you had a council of ladies, too? Who was your speaker, madam?”

Fulvia answered, “She who would be the speaker, even if there had been forty more women there: Sempronia, who had both her Greek and her rhetorical figures of speech, and ever and anon — again and again — would ask us if the witty Consul could have improved on that, or if the orator Cicero could have said it better?”

The witty Consul was Cicero; in this society, “witty” meant “intelligent.”

“She’s my gentle enemy,” Cicero said. “I wish that Cethegus had no more danger in him than she has! But my guards are you, great powers, and the unabated strengths of a firm conscience, which shall arm each step taken for the state and teach me to slack no pace for fear of malice.”

The great powers could be great armies, the great gods, or both.

Quintus returned.

“How are things now, brother?” Cicero asked.

“Cato and Quintus Catulus were coming to you, and Crassus with them. I have let them in through the garden.”

“What would Crassus want?” Cicero asked himself.

He was not entirely sure whether Crassus was a friend or an enemy. Crassus had sometimes been critical of him.

Quintus said, “I hear some people whispering by the gate and wondering whether it is too early, or not. But I think they are your friends and clients, and they are afraid to disturb you.”

“You will change to another thought soon,” Cicero said. “Have you given the porter the order I told you to give to him?”

“Yes,” Quintus said.

“Withdraw and listen carefully,” Cicero said.

They were going to listen to the would-be assassins who wanted to murder Cicero. Cicero wanted witnesses.

— 3.5 —

Vargunteius, Cornelius, and some armed men stood in front of Cicero’s door.

“The door’s not yet open,” Vargunteius said.

“It would be best for you to knock,” Cornelius said.

“Let the other assassins stand hidden nearby then and, when we are in, rush after us,” Vargunteius said.

“But where’s Cethegus?” Cornelius asked.

“He has quit the assassination, since he might not do it his way,” Vargunteius said.

Vargunteius knocked.

The porter asked from inside the house, “Who’s there?”

“A friend, or more,” Vargunteius said.

He may have meant: 1) more than one friend, or 2) more than a friend — a client.

“I may not let any man in until daylight,” the porter said.

“No? Why?” Vargunteius asked.

“What is your reason?” Cornelius asked.

“I am commanded so,” the porter answered.

“By whom?” Vargunteius asked.

Cornelius said to the conspirators, “I hope that our plot has not been discovered.”

“Yes, by betrayal,” Vargunteius said to Cornelius.

He then asked the porter, “Please, good slave, who has commanded you?”

“He who may best command me — the Consul,” the porter replied.

Cicero, Cato, Catulus, Crassus, and Quintus stood on a balcony and observed the scene.

“We are his friends,” Vargunteius said.

The porter said, “All’s one. It’s all the same. It makes no difference.”

“It is best that you tell him your name,” Cornelius said to Vargunteius.

“Do you hear, fellow? I have some urgent business with the Consul. My name is Vargunteius.”

Cicero spoke to them from above, using the third person, “True, he knows it, and he knows for what ‘friendly’ job you have been sent to do.”

He then asked, “Cornelius, too, is there?”

“We are betrayed!” Vargunteius said to Cornelius.

“And desperate Cethegus, isn’t he there?” Cicero asked.

Vargunteius said to Cornelius, “You speak. Cicero knows my voice. He will recognize it.”

Cicero asked, “What do you say in answer to my question?”

“You are deceived, sir,” Cornelius said.

Cicero said:

“No, it is you who are deceived, poor, misled men. Your states are yet worth pity, if you would listen and change your savage minds. Cease to be mad: Forsake your purposes of treason, rapine, murder, fire, and horror.

“The commonwealth has eyes that keep watch as vigilantly over her life as yours do for her — the commonwealth’s — ruin.

“Be not deceived into thinking her lenity will be perpetual or, if men should be lacking, then the gods will be, to such a calling cause — the advocate of Rome against those who would hurt her.”

The calling cause is a case that is called to justice. The gods would prosecute people who were traitors to Rome.

Cicero continued:

“Consider your assaults and, while there’s time, repent them. It makes me tremble that there should yet breathe those spirits that, when they cannot live honestly, would rather perish basely.”

Cato said to Marcus Tullius Cicero, “You talk too much to them, Marcus. They are lost. Go forth and apprehend them.”

Catulus said to Cicero, “If you have proof of this piece of treachery, what should stop the commonwealth from taking due vengeance?”

Vargunteius said to the conspirators, “Let us slip away. The darkness has concealed us; we’ll say some people have abused and misused our names.”

Cornelius said, “We shall deny it all.”

Vargunteius, Cornelius, and the other would-be assassins exited.

Cato said, "Quintus, what guards do you have? Call for the Tribunes' aid and wake up the city. Consul, you are too mild: The foulness of some evil deeds takes away all mercy. Report it to the Senate."

Suddenly, thunder sounded and lightning flashed violently.

"Listen," Cato said. "The gods grow angry with your patience. It is their concern, and it must be yours, that guilty men do not escape. As crimes grow, justice should rouse itself."

CHORUS (End of ACT 3) (Catiline's Conspiracy)

Blaming ambition for Rome's crisis, the Chorus said:

“What is it, Heavens, you prepare with so much swiftness and so sudden uprising? There are no Sons of Earth — no Giants and Titans — that dare again to rebellion, or to ambush the gods?”

“The world shakes and nature fears, yet the tumult and the horror are greater within our minds than in our ears, so much do Rome's faults, now grown to be her fate, threaten her.

“The priests and people run about; each social class, age, and sex is terror-stricken at the others; and at the city-gates all are thronging out, as if their safety were to quit and leave their mother — Rome.

“Yet they find the same dangers there from which they make such haste to be preserved. For guilty states do ever bear the afflictions and calamities about them that they have deserved.

“And until those plagues rise above the mountain of our faults and there sit, we see them not. Thus still we love the evil we do until we suffer for or from it.

“But ambition, that vice which is close to virtue, has the fate of Rome most provoked and occasioned, and has now caused Rome herself to be not enough ransom to free her from the death with which she's yoked, that restless ill that always builds upon success and does not end, but begins, in aspiring.

“And ambition never is satiated while anything remains that seems even worth desiring, wherein the thought, unlike the eye, to which far things seem smaller than they are, deems all contentment placed on high, and thinks there's nothing great but what is far.

“Oh, Rome did not calculate her errors in time to forestall this fortune! If only Rome could have seen her crimes before they were past and had felt her faults before her punishment.”

ACT 4 (Catiline's Conspiracy)

— 4.1 —

The ambassadors of the Allobroges, who were tribesmen from Gaul, spoke together.

Thunder sounded and lightning flashed violently as several Senators, quaking and trembling, ran by them. To the Senators, the thunderstorm was an ominous warning of bad things to come.

An Allobrox said:

“Can these men be afraid, who are not only our masters but the world's masters? Then I see the gods reproach Rome for our sufferings, or the gods would humble these Senators, by sending them these frights while we are here, so that we might laugh at their ridiculous fear — the ridiculous fear of those whose names we trembled at beyond the Alps.

“Of all who pass, I do not see a face worthy a man who dares to look up and endure the sight of even one thunderbolt to the end with bravery; but they all look downward, like beasts, running away from every flash that is made. Even the end of the world could not deserve such timidity.”

Men look up to the heavens; beasts look down to the ground.

The Allobrox continued:

“Are we employed here by our miseries, like superstitious fools, or rather slaves, to complain about our griefs, wrongs, and oppressions to a mere clothed Senate — their authority lies only in their clothing — whom our folly has made, and still intends to keep, our tyrants?

“It is our base petitionary breath that inflates them to this greatness, which this prick” — he drew his sword — “would soon let out, if we were at the same time both boldly brave and miserably wretched.

“When they have taken all we have — our goods, crops, lands, and houses — they will leave us this: a weapon and an arm that will still be found, although left naked, and whose status is lower than the ground.”

It is wise not to outrage a subjugated people who have been robbed of gold and silver but who still have weapons.

Cato, Catulus, and Cicero entered the scene. All of them were Roman Senators.

Cato said, “Do, still present your anger, good and just heaven! Tell guilty men what powers are above them! In such a self-confidence and boldness arising from wickedness, it was time they should know something fit to fear.”

He wanted the thunderstorm to continue. It was ominous, but only for traitors.

“I never saw a morning fuller of horror,” Catulus said.

“To Catiline and his men,” Cato said. “But to just men, although heaven should speak with all his wrath at once, with the result that with his breath the hinges of the world cracked, we should stand upright and unafraid.”

“Why, so we do, good Cato,” Cicero said.

Seeing the ambassadors, he asked, “Who are these men?”

“I take them to be ambassadors from the Allobroges, judging by their clothing,” Catulus said.

An Allobrox said to his fellow ambassadors, “Aye, these men seem to be of a different race than the frightened Romans we just saw. Let’s seek justice from these men. There’s hope of justice, with their fortitude and bravery.”

The Allobroges approached the Senators.

Cicero said to the Allobrogian ambassadors, “Friends of the Senate and of Rome, today we ask you to leave us alone. Tomorrow what suit you have, given to us by Fabius Sanga, whose patronage your state has and uses, just know by the Consul’s — that is, my own — word, you shall receive either a quick reply or else an answer worth your patience.”

Fabius Sanga was the patron of the Allobroges; he was in effect their Roman-citizen ambassador who represented their interests in Rome. Fabius Sanga was a descendant of Fabius Allobrogicus, who had conquered the tribe. Traditionally, the conqueror of a tribe would become their patron. That patronage would be passed down in the family.

The Allobrox said, “We could not hope for more, most worthy Consul.”

Cato, Catulus, and Cicero exited.

The Allobrox said to his fellow ambassadors:

“This magistrate has struck an awe into me and by his sweetness has won a greater regard for his official position than all the boisterous dispositions that ignorant greatness employs to fill the large, ill-fitting authority it wears.

“How easy is a noble spirit recognized as being different from the harsh and sulfurous matter that flies out in harsh, contumelious language, makes a noise, and stinks!

“May we find good and great men who know how to condescend to consider wants and fitting necessities, and who will not turn away from any fair suits.

“Such men don’t help the cause they undertake with favor and success more than, by doing so, they raise their own good reputations by turning just men’s needs into praise of themselves because of their just actions.”

By doing the right thing, good and great people get praise heaped on them. It's a win-win situation for the people whom they help and for the good and great themselves.

— 4.2 —

Some Lictors, a Praetor, Marcus Tullius Cicero, Antonius, Cato, Catulus, Caesar, Crassus, and the other Senators entered the temple of Jupiter Stator for a meeting that Cicero had called after the assassination attempt against him had failed.

“Make room for the Consuls!” the Praetor called. “Fathers, take your places.”

The “Fathers” were Senators. Sometimes, they were called conscript Fathers. The word “conscript” means enrolled or elected. Conscript Fathers are those men who are enrolled or elected into the Roman Senate.

The Praetor continued, “Here, in the house of Jupiter the Stayer, by edict from the Consul Marcus Tullius, you are met, a full, well-attended Senate. Hear him speak.”

Jupiter was known as Jupiter Stator, the stayer, maintainer, and supporter of Rome.

Marcus Tullius Cicero began:

“I wish what may be happy and auspicious always to Rome and hers. Honored and conscript — elected — Fathers, if I were silent, and if all the dangers threatening the state and you were yet so hidden in the night or darkness that is thicker in the breasts of those who are the black contrivers, so that no beam of light could pierce them and reveal them, yet the voice of heaven — the thunder — this morning spoke loudly enough to give you a feeling of the horror and awaken you from a sleep as stark and rigid as death.

“I have recently spoken often in this Senate concerning this topic, but I always have lacked either your ears or your faith because their plots have seemed so incredible, or I have seemed so vain as to make up these things for my own glory and false greatness, as rumor has it. But so be it.

“When the dangers break forth and shall declare themselves by their too foul results, then the unpopularity of my just cares will find another name.

“As for me, I am just one person; and this poor life, so recently aimed at in an assassination attempt not an hour yet since, they cannot with more eagerness pursue my life than I with gladness would lay down and lose it to buy Rome’s peace, if that would purchase it.

“But when I see they’d make the loss of my life only the step to more and greater losses, all the way to the loss of your lives, Rome’s lives, all lives, I would with those lives preserve it, or then fall and die as part of Rome’s destruction.”

Julius Caesar and Crassus talked apart from the others present.

Caesar said:

“Aye, aye, leave it to you alone, cunning artificer — trickster!

“See how his gorget — his throat-armor — appears and peers out above his gown, to tell the people in what danger he was.

“Vargunteius acted absurdly when he named himself before he got into Cicero’s home.”

Crassus said, “It doesn’t matter, as long as they deny it all and can just maintain the same lie constantly and steadfastly.”

He then asked, “Will Catiline be here?”

“I’ve sent for him,” Caesar said.

“And have you told him to be confident?” Crassus asked.

“To that his own necessity will prompt him,” Caesar said.

“Seem to believe nothing at all that Cicero relates to us,” Crassus said.

“It will madden him,” Caesar said.

“Oh, and help the other faction,” Crassus said.

Cicero’s brother, Quintus, entered and conferred with him.

Crassus asked, “Who is that? His brother? What new intelligence has he brought him now?”

The intelligence — news — included the information that Quintus had brought some guards to protect Cicero.

Caesar said, “He has brought him some cautions from his wife about how to behave himself.”

Cicero said to Quintus, “Place some of the guards outside, and bring some inside. Thank their kind loves.”

Quintus exited.

Cicero then said to the Senate, “It is a comfort yet that all do not abandon their country’s cause.”

Quintus returned, bringing in the Tribunes and some guards.

Caesar whispered to Antonius, who had been elected Consul with Cicero, “What is this now? What is the meaning of this muster, Consul Antonius?”

“I do not know,” Antonius said. “Ask my colleague Cicero. He’ll tell you. There is some reason in state that I must yield to, and I have promised him — indeed, he has bought it, by giving me the province of Macedonia.”

Now that the guards were present, Cicero spoke about Catiline without naming him:

“I acknowledge that it grieves me, Fathers, that I am compelled to draw these arms and aids for your defense, and, more, I must draw them against a citizen of Rome, born here among you, a patrician, a man, I must confess, of no low family nor no small virtue, if he had employed those excellent gifts of fortune and of nature to the good, not ruin, of the state.

“But being bred in his father’s needy fortunes, he advanced his position politically by prostituting his sister, and he confirmed his position with civil slaughter, entering first into the politics of the commonwealth with murders of some of the gentry while he was a follower of Sulla.

“He has done these things by study, inclination, custom, and habit, and he is familiar with all licentiousness. What could be hoped for in such a field of riot and an expanse of debauchery, but a course of action that is extremely pernicious?

“Although, I must avow, I found his evils sooner with my eyes than with my thought, and I found his evils with these hands of mine before they touched at my suspicion.”

Catiline’s evils were so great that Cicero could not believe them although he saw them — and felt them.

Julius Caesar, who knew that Cicero was speaking about Catiline, said, “What are his evil deeds, Consul? You declaim against his behavior and corrupt your own.”

Caesar then stated a maxim: “No wise man should out of hatred of guilty men lose his own innocence.”

Cicero responded:

“The noble Caesar speaks godlike truth.

“But when he [Caesar] hears I can convict him [Catiline] by his [Catiline’s] behavior in his [Catiline’s] evil deeds, he [Caesar] might be silent, and not cast away his [Caesar’s] sentences — his [Caesar’s] maxims — in vain where they scarcely apply to his [Caesar’s] subject.”

Catiline entered the scene.

Cato said, “Here he himself comes.”

Catiline sat down by Cato, who stood up and moved away because he was unwilling to sit by him.

Cato said, “If Catiline is worthy of any good man’s voice and vote, then that good man can sit down by him; Cato will not.”

Catulus, who was sitting by Catiline, stood up and said, “If Cato leaves him, I’ll not keep by his side.”

Other Senators also moved away from Catiline.

“What face and appearance is this that the Senate here assumes against me, Fathers?” Catiline asked. “Allow my modesty and sense of honor and propriety to ask the cause of so much coldness.”

Julius Caesar said to Lucius Sergius Catiline, “It is reported here that you are the head of a hostile faction, Lucius.”

“Aye,” Cicero said, “and that accusation will be proved against him.”

Catiline rose from his seat and said:

“So let it be.

“Why, Consul, if in the commonwealth, there should be two bodies, one lean, weak, rotten, and has a head, while the other is strong and healthful, but has no head, if I give it a head, do I offend?”

The Senators made known their displeasure at hearing this.

Catiline continued:

“Restore yourselves to your good temper, Fathers, and without perturbation hear me speak. Remember who I am, and of what place and position, and remember what petty fellow this is who opposes me. He is one who has exercised his eloquence always to the bane of the nobility, a boasting, insolent tongue-man.”

Cicero was a member of the equestrian class, just below the level of the Senatorial class, which was dominated by nobles. The basis for the equestrian class was economic. Cicero’s name came from the Latin word for chickpea: cicer. Most likely, his ancestors sold chickpeas.

“Be silent, evil traitor, or wash your mouth,” Cato said. “Cicero is an honest man and loves his country. I wish that you did, too.”

“Cato, you are too zealous for him,” Catiline said.

“No, you are too impudent,” Cato said.

“Catiline, be silent,” Catulus said.

“Nay,” Catiline said, “for then I easily fear that my just defense will come too late, with so much prejudice against me.”

Julius Caesar asked himself, “Will he sit down?”

He was wondering what Catiline would do: stand up for himself, or the opposite.

“Let the world forsake me,” Catiline said, “yet my innocence must not.”

“You innocent?” Cato said. “Then so are the furies.”

In this context, the furies are violently angry mortals whose anger approaches madness.

Cicero said, “Yes, and Atë, too.”

Atë is a goddess who causes human beings to act rashly — in such a way that it causes their destruction.

Cicero continued:

“Don’t you blush, pernicious Catiline? Or has the paleness caused by your guilt drunk up your blood and drawn your veins as dry of blood as your heart is dry of truth and your breast is dry of virtue?

“How long, then, will you abuse our patience?

“Shall your fury always mock us? To what licentiousness and disregard of law does your unbridled boldness dare run itself?

“Do all the nightly guards kept on the palace — the Palatine Hill — the city’s watches, with the people’s fears, the rallying of all good citizens, this so strong and fortified seat, here, of the Senate, that presently looks upon you, impress you not at all?

“Don’t you feel your plans all laid open, and see your wild conspiracy restrained by each man’s knowledge of it? Which of all this order can you think ignorant — if they’ll but utter their conscience and inward conviction rightly — of what you did last night, what on the former, where you were, whom you called together, what your plots were?

“Oh, the times and manners!

“This the Consul sees, the Senate understands, yet this man lives! Lives, aye, and comes here into council with us, participates in our discussion about public cares and concerns, and with his eye marks and designates each man of us to slaughter.

“And we good men think we satisfy the state and do our duty, if we can shun just this man’s sword and madness.”

The word “shun” can mean 1) loathe, 2) flee from, 3) evade, and 4) avoid.

Cicero’s point was that action — more action than mere shunning — was needed. The Senators thought that they were good men, but they were actually doing very little to help Rome.

Cicero continued:

“There was that virtue once in Rome when good men would with more sharp coercion and application of force have restrained a wicked citizen than the deadliest foe.

“We have that law still, Catiline, for you. The Senate has passed an act that is as grave and authoritative as it is sharp. The Republic does not lack the law, nor does this Senate lack the authority to enforce it.

“We, we who are Consuls, only we ourselves fail — we are the ones who are lacking.

“For twenty days now we have let grow dull and rust the edge of that decree giving Consuls absolute authority to act. We have kept it shut up, as in a sheath, which when drawn should take your head.

“Yet you still live, and you live not to lay aside your audacity arising from wickedness, but to confirm it.

“I could desire, Fathers, to be found still merciful, to seem, in these great perils grasping the state, a man remiss and slack. But then I should condemn myself as being guilty of sloth and treachery.

“Their military camp is in Italy, pitched and set up in the jaws — the narrow passes — of Etruria, their numbers daily increasing and their general within our walls, nay in our council, plotting hourly some fatal evil to the public.

Etruria is in central Italy. Catiline’s army was close to Florence, which was in Etruria. Rome is south of Etruria.

Cicero continued:

“If, Catiline, I should command you now here to be taken and killed, I justifiably wonder whether all good men would not think it done rather too late than any man too cruel.”

“Except he were of the same type of flour and batch of loaves,” Cato said.

He meant: Unless he were the same sort of man as Catiline.

Cicero continued:

“But that which ought to have been done long since, I will, and for good reason, yet forbear from doing.

“Then I will take you, when no man is found so lost, so wicked, indeed, so like yourself, but shall profess that it is done out of need, and out of right.

“While there is one who dares to defend you, Catiline, live on.

“You shall have leave, but you will live as you now live. You are and will be watched closely, besieged, and suppressed from working the smallest disturbance and civil unrest to the state.

“I have those eyes and ears that shall always keep guard and spy on you, as they have always done, and you will not feel it nor be aware of it.

“What then can you hope for? Neither night can with her darkness hide your wicked meetings, nor a private house can in her walls contain the guilty whispers of your conspiracy. If all breaks out, all will be revealed, so change your mind at last, and lose your thoughts of ruin, flame, and slaughter.

“Remember how I told to the Senate here that on such a day your Lictor, Caius Manlius, would be in arms. Was I deceived, Catiline, either in the fact, or in the time, the hour?”

Manlius had raised an army for Catiline.

Cicero continued:

“I said, too, in this Senate that your purpose was on the fifth of the Kalends of November [October 28; the fifth day before the first of November, counting November first as one day], to have slaughtered this whole order of leading citizens. This warning of mine made many leave the city.

“Can you here deny that your black design was hindered that very day by me, with yourself closed in within my protecting forces, so that you could not move against a public decree and against a republic?

“When you were heard to say, upon the parting of the rest, that you would content yourself with the murder of us who remained?

“Hadn’t you hope, besides, by an ambush by night to take Praeneste?”

Praeneste was a stronghold approximately twenty miles south-east of Rome.

Cicero continued:

“Where, when you came, didn’t you find the place secured and fortified against you with my aids, my watches? My garrisons fortified it.

“You do nothing, Sergius. You can endeavor to do nothing, nay, you cannot think, but I both see and hear your thought, and I am with you, by, and before, about, and in you, too.

“Just remember your last night’s business. Come, I’ll use no circumlocution: I will speak plainly.

“Remember Laeca’s house, the workshop and foundry of your conspiracy, among your sword-men, where so many associates both of your evil and your madness met.

“Dare you deny this? Why are you silent?

“Speak and deny it, and this shall convict you and find you guilty: Here they are, I see them, in this Senate, those who were with you.

“Oh, you immortal gods, in what region of the earth are we? What region do we live in? In what air? What commonwealth or state is this we have?

“Here, here, among us, among our own number, Fathers, in this most holy council of the world, are men who seek the destruction of me, of you, of ours, of all.

“What I can name and specify is too narrow and too limited: Follow the sun around the world, and nowhere will you find ambition to rival theirs.

“As Consul, I behold these men. Indeed, I ask for their advice concerning the state, as I would as though I were asking advice from good patriots.

“Those whom it would be fitting for the axe to hew in pieces, I not so much as wound yet with my voice.

“You were last night with Laeca, Catiline. Your shares of Italy you and your co-conspirators there divided, and you appointed who and to where each should go.

“What men should stay behind in Rome were chosen, your tasks were set down, the parts and places of the city were marked out to be set on fire.

“You yourself, you affirmed, were ready to depart. Only a little hindrance held you back: The hindrance was that I yet lived.

“Upon the word stepped forth three of your crew to rid you of that care. Two undertook this morning, before day, to kill me in my bed.

“All this I knew when your meeting was scarcely broken up. I armed all my servants, called both my brother and friends, shut out your followers you sent to visit me, whose names I told to some witnesses with me there, of high rank, before your followers came to my house.”

“Yes, both Quintus Catulus and I can affirm it,” Cato said.

Caesar said to himself about Catiline, “He’s lost and gone. His spirits have forsaken him.”

The spirits could be Catiline’s guardian spirits or his psychological spirits, or both.

Cicero continued:

“If this is so, why, Catiline, why do you stay? Go where you mean to go. The ports are open. Go forth!

“The military camp abroad has lacked you, their chief, too long. Lead all your troops out with you. Purge the city. Draw dry that noisome and pernicious cesspool — your followers — who, left behind in Rome, would infect the world.”

Cicero wanted all of Catiline's co-conspirators to leave Rome. That would not happen.

Cicero continued:

“You will free me of all my fears at once, once I see a city-wall between us. Do you give up the idea of doing that thing now, commanded by me, which before of your own choice you were prone to do? Go! The Consul tells you, an enemy, to depart from the city.

“‘Whither?’ you will ask. ‘To exile?’ I do not tell you that. But if you ask me for my counsel, I will advise you to go into exile.

“What is there here in Rome that can delight you? In Rome, where there is not a soul outside your own foul cluster of associates but fears and hates you?

“What domestic brand of private filthiness exists but that which is burnt into your life?

“What hidden and secret shame exists but that which has become part of your known infamy?

“What lust was ever absent from your eyes?

“What evil deed was ever absent from your hands?

“What wickedness was ever absent from your whole body?

“Where's that youth, drawn in within your nets or caught with your baits before whose rage you have not borne a sword, and to whose lusts you have not held a torch?

“Your latter nuptials — your marriage to Aurelia — I let pass in silence. In your latter nuptials, sins incredible on sins were heaped, which I will not name, lest in a civil state so monstrous facts should either be seen to have taken place or be seen to have not been punished.

“Your ruined finances, too, I glance not at. Your finances hang on and survive only until the next Ides.”

The Ides was a day of payment of interest or debts. People without the money to pay their interest or debts would be ruined.

Cicero continued:

“I come to that which is more known, more public: the life and safety of us all, by you threatened and sought.

“Didn’t you stand in the field of Campus Martius when Lepidus and Tullus were our old Consuls, upon the day of choice, armed and with forces to take the lives of the newly elected Consuls, and our chief citizens’, when neither your fear nor your conscience changed your mind, and nothing but the fortunate luck of the commonwealth withstood your active malice?”

Cicero was referring to the first Catilinarian conspiracy.

Cicero continued:

“Speak the truth.

“How often have you attempted to take my life? How many of your assaults have I avoided only by moving my body out of the path of the dagger, as we’d say, and wresting your dagger from your hand? How often? How often has the dagger fallen or slipped by chance?”

Cicero had figuratively, not literally, moved his body out of the path of the dagger and wrested it from Catiline’s hand.

Cicero continued:

“Yet doesn’t the sheath at your side want your dagger back again? I don’t know which vows you have made to the dagger or with what rites you have consecrated it to yourself, with the result that you still make it a necessity to stab it in the body of a Consul.”

In other words, Catiline kept wanting to stab and kill Cicero.

Cicero continued:

“But let me stop this way of speaking and speak to you not as one moved by hatred, which is how I ought to speak to you, but as one who is moved by pity, of which none is owing to you.”

“No more than is owing to Tantalus or Tityus,” Cato said.

Tantalus was so proud that he tried to fool the gods. He killed and cooked his own son, Pelops, and he put the meat into a stew that he served the gods. The gods knew the trick, however, so they did not eat the stew — with the exception of the goddess Demeter, who ate part of Pelops’ shoulder. Outraged, the gods brought Pelops to life again and gave him a shoulder made out of ivory, and they sentenced Tantalus to eternal torment in the Land of the Dead. He stands in a stream of water, and branches heavily laden with ripe fruit are overhead, yet Tantalus is eternally thirsty and hungry. Whenever Tantalus bends over to drink from the stream, the water dries up. Whenever Tantalus reaches overhead to seize a piece of fruit, a breeze blows the fruit just out of his reach.

Tityus had once kidnapped and tried to rape Leto, the consort of Jupiter and mother of Apollo and Diana. For this infamous deed, Tityus, whose giant body lies across nine acres, is in Tartarus. Two vultures feed on his liver, which, once eaten, grow back so the vultures can eat it again and eternally torment Tityus.

Cicero continued:

“You came a short while ago into this Senate. Who in such a crowd of people, with so many friends and kindred you have here, saluted you?”

“Weren’t the seats made bare upon your entrance? Didn’t the Consular men — Senators who are ex-Consuls — rise and leave their places, as soon as you sat down, and fled your side as if you were a plague or a ruin, knowing how often they had been by you marked out for the slaughterhouse?”

“How do you bear this? Surely, if my slaves at home feared me with half the fright and horror that here your fellow citizens fear you, I would soon quit my house and think it necessary, too.

“Yet you dare to tarry here? Go forth at last, condemn yourself to flight and solitude. Discharge the commonwealth of her deep fear. Go. Go into banishment, if this is the word you have been waiting for.

“Why do you look around you? They all consent to it. Do you await the authority of their voices, whose silent wills condemn you? While they sit, they approve it; while they allow it, they decree it; and while they are silent to it, they proclaim it.

“If you prove yourself there honest and free from reproach, I’ll endure the envy.

“But there’s no thought you should ever be he whom either shame should call from filthiness, terror should call from danger, or reason should call from fury.

“Go, I entreat you — yet why do I so, when I already know they have been sent ahead and tarry for you in arms and expect you on the Aurelian Way?”

The Aurelian Way went from Rome north along the western coast and into Etruria, where Catiline’s troops were located.

Marcus Tullius Cicero continued:

“I know the day agreed between you and Manlius, to whom the silver eagle, too, is sent before, which I hope shall prove to you as baneful as you imagine it to the commonwealth.

“But this wise and sacred Senate may say: ‘What do you mean, Marcus Tullius? If you know that Catiline is awaited to be chief of a civil war and you know that he’s the author of such a wickedness, the summoner of well-known evil men to an action of so much horror, the leader of such a treason, then why do you send him forth? Why let him escape? This is to give him liberty and power. Instead, you should lay hold upon him and send him to a deserved death and a just punishment.’

“To these so holy voices, thus I answer: If I did think it timely, conscript Fathers, to punish him with death, I would not give the fencer the use of one short hour to breathe.”

The fencer is a swordsman, a gladiator. Gladiators were prisoners of war, or they were slaves. To call someone a fencer was an insult.

Cicero continued:

“But when there are in this grave order — the Senate — some who with weak judgments still nurse his hopes, some who, with not believing, have confirmed his designs more, and whose authority the weaker men, as well as the worst men, have followed, I would now send him where they all should see, clear as the light, his heart shine, his intentions made clear; where no man could be so wickedly or foolishly stupid, but should cry out he saw, touched, felt, and grasped it.

“Then, when he has run out himself, led forth his desperate party with him, collected aids of all kinds, both shipwrecked minds and fortunes, not only the grown evil that now has sprung and sprouted forth would be plucked up and weeded, but also the stock, root, and seed of all the evils choking the commonwealth.

“Whereas, should we take only him out of such a swarm of traitors, our cares and fears might seem a while relieved, but the main peril would bide still enclosed deep in the veins and bowels of the state. As human bodies laboring with fevers, while they are caused to toss and turn with heat, if they do take cold water, seem for that short space much eased, but afterward are ten times more afflicted.

“Wherefore, I say, let all this wicked crew depart, divide themselves from good men, and gather their forces to one head. As I said often, let them be severed from us with a wall. Let them leave off assassination attempts upon the Consul in his own house, to surround the Praetor, to surround the court with weapons, to prepare fire and missiles, swords, torches, sulfur, firebrands. In short, let it be written on each man’s forehead what thoughts he bears the public.

“I here promise, conscript Fathers, to you and to myself that diligence in us Consuls, for my honored colleague abroad and for myself at home.”

Cicero’s fellow Consul, Antonius, would lead the Roman army against Catiline’s army.

Cicero continued:

“I here promise you so great authority in you, so much virtue in these, the gentlemen — equites — of Rome, whom I could scarcely restrain today in zeal from seeking out the parricide to slaughter.”

Some of the equites, members of the upper class just below the Senatorial class, wanted to lynch Catiline.

Cicero continued:

“And I here promise you so much unanimity in all good men and minds as, only on Catiline’s going out of Rome, all treachery shall be clear, made plain, oppressed, revenged.”

Catiline was a parricide in the sense that he wanted to kill the leading citizens of Rome, including and especially Cicero, the leader of the opposition to him.

Cicero continued:

“And with this omen, this portent of the future, go, pernicious plague, out of the city, to the wished-for destruction of you and those who, to the ruin of her, have taken that bloody and black sacrament.”

Cicero wanted Catiline — the pernicious plague — and his co-conspirators to leave Rome. The omen — the portent of the future — was Cicero’s speech and promises. The bloody and black sacrament was the drinking of the slave’s blood mixed with wine.

Cicero continued:

“You, Jupiter, whom we call the Stayer — the Maintainer — both of this city and this empire, will, with the same auspice you did raise it first, drive from your altars and all other temples and buildings of this city, from our walls, lives, states, and fortunes of our citizens this fiend, this fury, with his accomplices.

“And all of this offence to good men — these known traitors to their country, thieves of Italy, joined in so damned a league of evil — you will with perpetual plagues, alive and dead, punish for Rome and save her innocent head.”

Catiline responded:

“If an oration or highly wrought language, Fathers, could make me guilty, here is one — Cicero — who has done it.

He has striven to emulate this morning's thunder with his prodigious rhetoric.

“But I hope that this Senate is more serious and dignified than to give credit rashly to all he vomits against a man of your own order, a patrician, and one whose ancestors have deserved more from Rome than this man's eloquence could utter, turned the best way, as always it is the worst.”

Catiline was complaining that he deserved the best that could be spoken about him, yet Cicero always spoke the worst that could be said about him.

Cato said, “His eloquence has deserved more today, in speaking your ill, than all your ancestors did in their good. And the state that he has saved will find that fact to be true.”

Catiline said, “Who, he? If I were that enemy that he would make me, I'd not wish the state more wretched than to need him to preserve it. What do you make him out to be, Cato? You make such a man as he out to be a Hercules? An Atlas? He is a poor petty inmate!”

Hercules is the great panhellenic hero.

Atlas is the Titan who holds up the sky.

Catiline was proud. He was against Cicero in part because Cicero was a member of the equites class, while Catiline was a member of the higher Senatorial class. In addition, Cicero was a mere inmate — lodger — in Rome, according to Catiline. He was not born in Rome, but instead was born in Arpinum and then came to Rome.

“Traitor!” Cato shouted.

“He save the state?” Catiline said. “A burgess' son of Arpinum? The gods would rather twenty Romes should perish than have that contumely — insult and disgrace — stuck upon them that he should share with them in the preserving a shed, or a sign-post.”

“Shut up, you monster!” Cato shouted.

Catiline said, “The gods would be attacked themselves again, and lost in the first rude and indigested heap — the primal chaos — before such a wretched name as Cicero should sound with theirs.”

“Away, you impudent person!” Catulus shouted.

“Do you all back him?” Catiline said. “Are you silent, too? Well, I will leave you, Fathers; I will go. But —”

He turned suddenly on Cicero.

He continued, “— my fine dainty speaker—”

Cicero interrupted, “What now, fury? Will you assault me here?”

“Help, aid the Consul!” the Chorus shouted.

Catiline said, “See, Fathers, don’t you laugh? Who threatened him? In vain you conceive, ambitious orator, hope of so splendid a death as by this hand.”

“Out of the court with the pernicious traitor!” Cato shouted. “Make him leave!”

Catiline said to Cicero, “There is no title that this flattering Senate, nor honor that the base multitude can give you, that shall make you worthy of Catiline’s anger.”

“Stop,” Cato shouted. “Stop Catiline’s monstrous mouth!”

Catiline said, “Or when it shall stop, I’ll look at you, and my look shall kill you.”

“Will no one restrain the monster?” Cato shouted.

“Parricide!” Catulus shouted.

Catiline was a parricide in that he wanted to kill Cicero. As Consul, Cicero was the head of his country, as a father is the head of a family in a paternalistic culture “Butcher, traitor, leave the Senate!” Quintus shouted.

Catiline said, “I am going into banishment, to please you, Fathers. I am thrust headlong forth.”

“Do you still murmur, monster?” Cato said.

Catiline said, “Since I am thus put out, and made a —”

“What?” Cicero interrupted.

“Not guiltier than you are,” Catulus said.

Catiline said, “I will not burn without my funeral pyre.”

“What does the fiend say?” Cato asked.

Catiline said, “I will have fuel, timber, to build my funeral pyre.”

“Sing out, screech-owl,” Cato said. “Sing out, bird of ill omen.”

Catiline said, “It shall be in —”

“Speak your incomplete thoughts,” Catullus interrupted.

Catiline continued, “— the common fire, rather than my own. For fall I will with all, before I fall alone.”

Catiline exited.

Crassus said quietly to Caesar, “He’s lost: There’s no hope for him.”

Caesar replied quietly, “Unless he immediately takes arms and gives a blow before the Consul’s forces can be levied.”

“What is your pleasure, Fathers?” Cicero asked. “What shall be done?”

“See that the commonwealth receives no loss,” Catulus said.

“Commit the care thereof to the Consuls,” Cato said.

Crassus said, “It is the time.”

Caesar said, “And there is need.”

Crassus and Caesar now at least publicly seemed to support Cicero.

Cicero said, “I give thanks to this frequent — full, well-attended — Senate. But what do they decree to Curius and Fulvia?”

Curius and Fulvia had informed on the conspiracy.

“What the Consul shall think suitable and fitting,” Catulus said.

“They must receive reward, although it is not publicly known,” Cicero said, “lest when a state needs ministers, the ministers will have no informers.”

If informers are not rewarded, there will be few or no informers. The ministers of a state need informers to give them information on which they can act.

The Senators left, but Cato and Marcus Tullius Cicero stayed behind and talked privately.

Cato said, “Yet, Marcus Tullius, I believe that Crassus and this Caesar here ring hollow and are false to Rome.”

Cicero replied, “And they would be proved to be so, if we dared to test them.”

“Why don’t we dare to test them?” Cato asked. “What honest act exists that the Roman Senate should not dare, and do?”

Cicero replied, “Not an unprofitable, dangerous act that would stir too many serpents up at once. Caesar and Crassus, if they are ill men, are mighty and powerful ones; and we must so provide that, while we take one head from this foul Hydra, twenty more heads do not grow.”

“I approve your counsel,” Cato said.

“They shall be watched, examined, and remembered,” Cicero said. “Until they declare themselves, I will not put them out by any question. There they stand. I’ll make myself no enemies, nor the state no traitors.”

— 4.3 —

Catiline was still in Rome.

He, Lentulus, Cethegus, Curius, Gabinius, Longinus, and Statilius talked together.

Catiline said, “False to ourselves? All our designs revealed to this state-cat?”

A state-cat is a person carefully watching the state the way a cat carefully watches a mouse. In this case, the state-cat was Cicero.

“Aye, if I had had my way, he would have mewed in flames at home, not in the Senate,” Cethegus said. “I had singed his furs by this time.”

Catiline said:

“Well, there’s now no time of retracting our former actions, or our standing still. We can’t change what has passed.

“Friends, be yourselves; keep the same Roman hearts and ready minds that you had yesternight at Laeca’s house. Prepare to execute what we resolved. And do not let labor or danger or discovery frighten you.

“I’ll go to the army; you, in the meantime, make ready things here at home in Rome. Draw to you any aids that you think fit, of men of all conditions or any fortunes that may help in a war.

“I’ll either bleed out my life-blood or win an empire for you.

“Within the next few days, look to see my battle flags here at the walls; be you but firm within.

“In the meantime, to cause dislike of the Consul and give less suspicion of our course of action, let it be given out here in the city that I, an innocent man, have gone into exile into Massilia, willing to bow to fate and the times, being unable to withstand so great a faction without troubling the commonwealth, whose peace I rather seek than all the glory of struggle or any action to vindicate my own innocence.

“Farewell, the noble Lentulus, Longinus, Curius, the rest — and you, my better genius — my attendant spirit — the brave Cethegus.

“When we meet again, we’ll sacrifice to liberty.”

“And revenge,” Cethegus said, “so that we may praise our hands once.”

Lentulus said, “Oh, you Fates, give Fortune now her eyes, to see with whom she visits, so that she may never forsake him!”

Lady Fortune is proverbially blind.

Curius said, “He does not need Lady Fortune, nor her eyes. Proceed, Sergius. A valiant man is his own fate and fortune.”

“May the fate and fortune of us all go with him!” Longinus said.

“And always guard him!” Gabinius Statilius said.

“I am the obedient servant of all of you,” Lucius Sergius Catiline said.

He exited.

Lentulus said:

“Now, friends, it is left with us. I have already dealt, by Umbrenus, with the Allobroges who are here resident in Rome, whose state I hear is discontent with the avarice and extortion of the governing magistrates they are oppressed with and by, and they have made diverse complaints to the Senate, but all in vain.

“These men I have thought — both for their own oppressions and also because, by nature, they are a people who are warlike and fierce, still seeking change and now hating our state — the fittest and the easiest to be drawn into our society of conspirators, and to aid the war. This is true all the more because of their geographical location — they border Italy — and because they abound with horses and cavalry, which is the one thing our military camp lacks.

“Also, I have found them forthcoming and inclined to help us. They will meet soon at Sempronia’s house, where I would ask you all to be present, to greater confirm and strengthen their support for our cause. The sight of such high spirits as we have will be no harm, nor will our great number.”

“I will not fail,” Gabinius said.

“Nor I,” Statilius said.

“Nor I,” Curius said.

Cethegus said, “I wish that I had something by myself, apart from the others, to do. I have no spirit or inclination for these many councils. Let me kill all the Senate for my share. I’ll do it at their next sitting.”

“Worthy Caius, your presence at the meeting will add much,” Lentulus said.

“I shall spoil more,” Cethegus said.

— 4.4 —

Cicero and Fabius Sanga talked together. Sanga was a Roman Senator and the patron of the Allobroges.

Cicero said, “The state’s beholden to you, Fabius Sanga, for this great care. And those Allobroges are more than wretched, if they lend a listening to such persuasion by the conspirators.”

Sanga replied, “They, most worthy Consul, as men employed here from a grieved state, groaning beneath a multitude of wrongs, and being told there was small hope of ease to be expected to their evils from here, were willing at first to give an ear and listen to anything that spoke of liberty. But since then, because of better thoughts and my urged reasons, they have come about and won to the true side. The Fortune of the commonwealth has conquered.”

“Who is that same Umbrenus, who was the intermediary between the conspirators and the Allobroges?” Cicero asked.

“One who has had business transactions in Gallia often and is known to their state,” Sanga answered.

“Have the ambassadors come with you?” Cicero asked.

“Yes,” Sanga answered.

“Well, bring them in,” Cicero said. “If they are steadfast and honest, never have men had the opportunity so to justly deserve rewards from Rome as they have.”

Sanga exited.

Alone, Cicero said to himself, “A happy, wished-for occasion, and thrust into my hands, for the discovery and manifestly proven conviction of these traitors. Be thanked, O Jupiter!”

Sanga returned with the ambassadors of the Allobroges.

Cicero said, “My worthy lords, allies by treaty of the Senate, you are welcome. I understand by Quintus Fabius Sanga, your painstaking patron here, you have been lately solicited against the commonwealth by a man named Umbrenus — take a seat, please —”

They sat.

Cicero continued:

“— who came to you from Publius Lentulus, who wants you to be associates in Catiline’s and the other conspirators’ intended war. I could caution you that men whose fortunes are yet flourishing, and are Rome’s friends, would not without a good reason become her enemies and mix themselves and their estates with the lost hopes of Catiline or Lentulus, whose mere despair arms them.

“That would be to risk certain-to-happen good things for airy promises and to undergo all danger for a voice and a promise.

“Believe me, friends: Loud tumults are not laid down with half the easiness that they are raised up. All may begin a war, but few can end it.

“The Senate has decreed that my colleague — the other Consul, Antonius — shall lead the Senators’ army against Catiline, and has declared both Catiline and Manlius traitors.

“Our Metellus Celer has already given part of their troops defeat. Honors are promised to all who will quit them, and rewards proposed even to slaves who can detect their courses of action and inform us about them.

“Here in the city of Rome I have, by the Praetors and Tribunes, placed my guards and watches so that not a foot can tread, not a breath can whisper, but I have knowledge of it.

“And be sure that the Senate and the people of Rome, out of their accustomed greatness, will sharply and severely punish not only any evil deed but any conspiracy or purpose against the state.

“Therefore, my lords, consult of your own ways, and think which direction is best for you to take. You, now, are present suitors for some redress of wrongs: I’ll undertake not only that that redress shall be assured you, but also whatever grace or privilege else the Senate or Roman people can cast upon you that is worthy such a service as you have now the way and means to do them, as long as your wishes are in agreement with my plans.”

The first Allobrox said, “We covet nothing more, most worthy Consul, and howsoever we have been tempted lately to a defection and abandonment of allegiance, that does not make us guilty. We are not yet so wretched in our fortunes, nor in our wills so lost, as to abandon a friendship, prodigally, so precious as is the Senate and the people of Rome’s, for hopes that do destroy themselves by impetuosity.”

“You then are wise, and honest,” Cicero said. “Do just this then.”

But before telling them what to do, he asked, “When shall you speak with Lentulus and the rest?”

“We are to meet soon, at Brutus’ house,” the first Allobrox answered.

“Who? Decius Brutus?” Cicero said. “He is not in Rome.”

Sanga said, “Oh, but his wife Sempronia —”

Cicero said:

“You, Sanga, inform and remind me: She is a chief figure.

“Well, Allobroges, don’t fail to meet them, and to express the best partiality you can pretend to all that they intend. Like it, applaud it, allege that the commonwealth and Senate will be lost to them. Promise them any aids by arms or counsel. What they can desire I would have you anticipate and promise.

“Only, say this: You’ve had dispatch, in private, by the Consul of your affairs; and, because of the many dangers the state’s now in, you are willed by him this evening to depart from Rome, which you by all sought means will do, in order to avoid suspicion.”

The words “You’ve had dispatch” don’t say whether the Allobroges’ affairs were satisfactorily resolved. The words leave open the possibility that the outcome of the ambassadors’ visit to Rome was unsatisfactory.

Cicero continued:

“Now, for the greater authority of the business they’ve entrusted to you, and to give it credit with your own state at home, say that you desire their letters to your Senate and your people, which once shown you dare pledge both life and honor, and what follows should in every way answer their hopes.

“Those letters being had, offer as an excuse that you have a sudden departure to make. Give me notice at what gate you will go out. I’ll have you intercepted and all the letters taken with you, so that you shall be redeemed in all opinions, and they shall be convicted of their manifest treason.

“Evil deeds are well turned back upon their authors; and against an injurer, the revenge is just.

“This must be done now.”

“Cheerfully and firmly,” the first Allobrox said. “We are men who would rather make haste to undertake it than stay to say so.”

“With that assurance and resoluteness, go,” Cicero said. “Make yourselves happy while you make Rome so. By means of Sanga, let me have notice and information from you.”

“Yes,” the first Allobrox said.

— 4.5 —

Sempronia and Lentulus talked together.

“When will these creatures, the ambassadors, come?” Sempronia asked. “I would like to see them. Are any of them scholars?”

“I think not, madam,” Lentulus said.

“Have they no Greek?” Sempronia asked.

“No, surely,” Lentulus answered.

“Bah, what am I doing here, waiting in attendance on them then, if they are nothing but only statesmen?” Sempronia said.

“Yes, your Ladyship shall observe their gravity, their dignity, and their reservedness, their attention to the correctness of their behavior, befitting their positions as ambassadors,” Lentulus said.

“I wonder much why states and commonwealths don’t employ women to be ambassadors sometimes!” Sempronia said. “We would do as good public service and could make as honorable spies — for so Thucydides calls all ambassadors.”

Thucydides wrote The History of the Peloponnesian War about a war between Athens and Sparta.

Cethegus entered the scene.

“Have they come, Cethegus?” Sempronia asked.

“Do you ask me?” Cethegus said. “Am I your scout or bawd?”

A scout is a spy; a bawd is a pander. Cethegus did not regard himself as either to Sempronia. One kind of scout is someone who searches for — spies — customers for prostitutes.

“Oh, Caius, it is no such business,” Lentulus said.

The business was revolution, not whoring.

Caius Cethegus replied, “No? What does a woman at it, then?”

“Good sir,” Sempronia said, “There are those of us women who can be as accomplished traitors as ever a male-conspirator of you all.”

“Aye, at smock-treason, matron, I believe you,” Cethegus said, “and especially if I were your husband.”

Smock-treasure is treason by women. It includes marital infidelity.

Cethegus added, “But when I trust to your cobweb-bosoms any other kind of treason, let me there die a fly and feast you, spider.”

Cobwebs snare prey; bosoms can also snare prey.

“You are too sour and harsh, Cethegus,” Lentulus said.

“You are kind and courtly,” Cethegus replied. “I’d be torn in pieces with wild Hippolytus, nay, I’d undergo the death of every limb, before I’d trust a woman with wind, if I could retain it.”

Hippolytus, a son of Theseus, fell from a chariot and was dragged by his horses and torn to pieces.

Cethegus would not entrust a fart to a woman.

“Sir, they’ll be trusted with as good secrets yet as you have any, and carry them, too, as close and as concealed as you shall, despite all your courage and resoluteness,” Sempronia said.

Cethegus replied, “I’ll not contend with you either in speech or behavior, good Calypso.”

Calypso was the nymph who held Ulysses as prisoner, preventing him from returning to his wife, Penelope, on his home island of Ithaca.

Longinus entered the scene and said, “The ambassadors have come.”

“I give thanks to you, Mercury, who so has rescued me,” Cethegus said.

Mercury was the messenger of the gods. He came to Calypso’s island with a message from Jupiter ordering her to let Ulysses leave her island.

Gabinus, Statilius, Volturcius, and the Allobroges entered the scene.

“What is the news now, Volturcius?” Lentulus asked.

“They desire some speech with you, in private,” Volturcius answered.

“Oh, it is about the prophecy, probably, and the promise of the Sibyl’s,” Lentulus said.

“It may be,” Gabinius said.

Lentulus talked with the Allobroges apart from the others.

“Do they shun me and will not negotiate with me, too?” Sempronia asked.

“No, good lady, you may participate,” Gabinius said. “I have told them who you are.”

“I should be loath to be left out, and here in my own house, too,” Sempronia said.

Cethegus said:

“Can these or such as these be any aids to us? Do they look as if they were built to shake the world, or be of importance to our enterprise? A thousand such as they are could not make one atom — one tiny particle — of our souls.

“They should be men worth heaven’s fear, who just by looking up would make Jove stand upon his guard and draw himself inside his thunder which, amazed, he should discharge in vain, and they remain unhurt.

“Or, if they were hurt, then like Capaneus at Thebes they should hang dead upon the highest spires and ask the second bolt to be thrown down.”

At Thebes, Capaneus had boasted that not even Jupiter could prevent him from conquering the city. Jupiter was insulted by Capaneus’ impiety, and so as Capaneus climbed a ladder to scale the Theban wall, Jupiter killed him with a thunderbolt. Capaneus’ corpse, burning, hung from the wall. His limbs burned quickly. According to Statius, author of the epic poem Thebaid, if his limbs had burned more slowly, Jupiter would have thrown a second thunderbolt.

Cethegus then said, “Why, Lentulus, do you talk so long? This amount of time would have been enough to have scattered all the stars, to have quenched the sun and moon and made the world despair of day or any light but ours.”

Lentulus said to the Allobroges, “How do you like this spirit? In such men Mankind lives. Such souls as these move the world.”

“Aye,” Sempronia said, “although he finds me hard to bear, I still must do him justice and give him credit. He is a spirit of the right Martian breed.”

The Martian spirit is the spirit of Mars, god of war.

The first Allobrox said, “He is a Mars! I wish that we had time to live here and marvel at him.”

Lentulus said:

“Well, I see that you would prevent the Consul from coming to an agreement with you. And I commend your care and painstaking attention: It was only reasonable to ask for our letters, and we have prepared them.

“Go in, and we will take an oath and seal them.

“You shall have letters, too, to Catiline. You can visit him on the way back to your country and confirm the alliance.

“This our friend, Volturcius, shall go along with you. Tell our great general that we are ready here; tell him that Lucius Bestia, the Tribune, has been provided with a speech to lay the blame of the war on Cicero; tell him that all long just for his approach and his person. And then you are made freemen like ourselves.”

— 4.6 —

Cicero, Flaccus, and Pomptinus talked together.

Cicero said:

“I cannot doubt the war will succeed well, both because of the honor of the cause and the worth of the man who commands our army. For my colleague and fellow Consul, Antonius, being so ill afflicted with the gout, will not be able to be there in person.

“Therefore, Petreius, his lieutenant, must necessarily take charge of the army. Petreius is much the better soldier, having been a Tribune, Prefect, Lieutenant, and Praetor in the war for thirty years. He is so accustomed to being in the army that he knows all the soldiers by their names.”

“They’ll fight, then, bravely and splendidly with him,” Flaccus said.

“Aye, and he will lead them on as bravely,” Pomtinius said.

Cicero said:

“They have a foe who will require them to be brave, whose necessities will arm the foe like a fury.

“But, however, I’ll entrust it to the management and the fortune of good Petreius, who’s a worthy patriot. Metellus Celer with three legions, too, will stop their course for Gallia.”

Two armies were closing in on Catiline’s army, ensuring that it could not get reinforcements or escape. Catiline’s soldiers could be expected to fight hard simply out of desperation.

Fabius Sanga entered the room.

Cicero asked, “How is the situation now, Fabius?”

“The trick with the Allobrogian ambassadors has worked,” Sanga said. “You must immediately place your guards upon the Mulvian Bridge; for by that way they mean to come.”

“Then go there, Flaccus and Pomtinius,” Cicero said. “I must have you lead that force you have and seize them all. Let not a person escape. The Allobrogian ambassadors will yield and surrender themselves. If there should be any violence, I’ll send you aid.”

Flaccus and Pomtinius exited.

Cicero then said, “In the meantime, I will call Lentulus to me, as well as Gabinius, and Cethegus, Statilius, Ceparius, and all these by separate messengers. These men no doubt will come without apprehension or suspicion. Prodigal men don’t feel their own supplies diminishing. When I have them, I’ll place guards upon them so that they will not be able to escape.”

“But what’ll you do with Sempronia?” Sanga asked.

Cicero replied:

“A state’s anger should not take notice either of fools or of women.

“I do not know whether my joy or my sorrow and concern ought to be greater: I have discovered so foul a treason, but also I must undergo the ill-will caused by the doom of so many important men.

“But whatever happens, I will be just. My fortune may forsake me, but not my virtue: That shall go with me, and before me, always, and gladden me, as I do well, although I hear ill things spoken about me.”

— 4.7 —

Flaccus, Pomtinius, and some guards met the loyal Allobroges and the conspirator Volturcius.

“Stand!” Flaccus said. “Who goes there?”

The first Allobrox answered, “We are the Allobroges, and we are friends of Rome.”

Pomtinus said, “If you are friends of Rome, then yield yourselves into the custody of the Praetors who, in the name of the whole Senate and the people of Rome, until you clear yourselves, charge you with treachery against the state.”

“Die, friends, and don’t be taken!” the conspirator Volturcius said.

He fought with the guards.

“What voice is that?” Flaccus said. “Down with them all!”

“We surrender,” the Allobroges said.

“Who’s he who resists arrest?” Pomtinus said. “Kill him there!”

“Stop! Stop! Stop!” Volturcius said. “I surrender upon conditions.”

“We give no conditions to traitors,” Flaccus said. “Strike him down! Kill him!”

Volturcius said, “My name is Volturcius; I know Pomtinus.”

Pomtinus said, “But he doesn’t know you — not while you stand out upon these traitorous terms.”

“I’ll surrender upon the guarantee of the safety of my life,” Volturcius said. “Promise to save my life.”

“If it should be forfeited, we cannot save it,” Pomtinus said.

“Promise to do your best!” Volturcius said. “I’m not as guilty as many others I can name — and will, if you will grant me leniency.”

Pomtinus replied, “All we can do is to deliver you to the Consul.”

He meant Cicero.

He then said to the guards, “Take him, and thank the gods who thus have saved Rome.”

CHORUS (End of ACT 4) (Catiline's Conspiracy)

The Chorus appeared and criticized the people of Rome:

Now do our ears, before our eyes,

Like men in mists [who hear before they see],

Discover who'd [who did] the state surprise [with a sudden attack],

And who resists [opposes such an attack]?

And, as these clouds do yield [give way] to light,

Now do we see

Our thoughts of things, how they did fight

Which seemed t'agree [to agree]?

Of what strange pieces [incompatible components] are we made

Who nothing know

But, as new airs [whispers] our ears invade,

Still censure [judge] so?

That now do hope and now do fear

And now envy,

And then do hate and then love dear,

But know not why;

Or if we do, it is so late

As our best mood [most correct opinion],

Though true, is then thought out of date

And empty of good.

How have we changed and come about

In every doom [person's judgment],

Since wicked Catiline went out

And quitted Rome?

Having recognized the citizens' changeability and their confusion about events, the Chorus then stated the citizens' changing opinion of Cicero: At first they thought he acted too strongly, and then they thought he had not acted strongly enough:

One while [At one time] we thought him [Catiline] innocent,

And then w'accused [we accused]

The Consul for his malice spent [exercised]

And [his] power abused.

Since that [Because] we [now] hear he [Catiline] is in arms

We think not so,

Yet charge [blame] the Consul with [for] our harms

That [Who] let him go.

[Yet we blame our injuries on the Consul, Cicero, who let Catiline go.]

So in our censure of the state

We still [always] do wander [and fall into error],

And make the careful magistrate

The mark [target] of slander.

The Chorus next recommended that the citizens recognize noble deeds as noble deeds.

*What age is this, where honest men
Placed at the helm
A sea of some foul mouth or pen
Shall overwhelm,
And call their diligence deceit,
Their virtue, vice,
Their watchfulness, but lying in wait,
And blood the price [reward they seek]?
Oh, let us pluck this evil seed
Out of our spirits,
And give to every noble deed
The name it merits,
Lest we seem fall'n [fallen], if this endures,
Into those times
To [Where we] love disease and brook [bear] the cures
Worse than the crimes.*

— 5.1 —

Petreius and some soldiers stood together at Faesulae, where Catiline and his forces were located. Because of the illness of Antonius, Petreius was now the general of the Senatorial army against Catiline's army. Another army, which was led by Metellus Celer, was keeping Catiline's army from escaping into Transalpine Gaul.

Petreius said:

“It is my fortune and my glory, soldiers, this day to lead you on, the worthy Consul Antonius being kept from the honor of it by disease.”

He was referring to the Consul Antonius' being afflicted with the gout.

Petreius continued:

“And I am proud to have so splendid a cause to exercise your arms in. We don't now fight for how long, how broad, how great and large the extent and boundaries of the people of Rome shall be, but to retain what our great ancestors, with all their labors, counsels, arts, and actions, were gaining for us during so many years.

“The quarrel is not now of fame and reputation, of tribute, or of wrongs done to allies, for which and whom the army of the people of Rome was accustomed to move, but for your own republic, for the lofty temples of the immortal gods, for all your fortunes, altars, and your fires and hearths, for the dear souls of your loved wives and children, your parents' tombs, your rites, laws, liberty, and, briefly, for the safety of the world against such men as only by their crimes are known, thrust out by riot, want, or rashness.”

The army against the Romans was composed of men who had been thrust out of Rome because of their evil deeds. These men had lived riotously and/or had fallen into poverty and/or were rash and violent.

Petreius then began to describe the enemy forces, which he divided into three sorts:

“One sort, Sulla’s old troops, left here in Faesulae, who, suddenly made rich by Sulla’s proscriptions in those dire times have since, by their unbounded vast expense, grown needy and poor and have nothing to wait for except new bills and new proscriptions from Catiline.”

In history, Catiline had promised his followers new bills, meaning cancellation of debts. The earlier proscriptions of Sulla in history included the murders of many individuals.

However, Petreius’ words had another meaning: The new bills would be long-handled weapons of war wielded against the conspirators, and the proscriptions would be of conspirators and would include seizure of their property and lives. The new bills and proscriptions had come into existence because of Catiline.

Petreius continued:

“These men, they say, are valiant; yet I think them not worth your hesitation, if you should hesitate out of fear of them. For either their old virtue has been lost because of their sloth and pleasures, or if their virtue still tarries with them, it is as ill matched to yours as is their small number compared to your number or their unworthy cause compared to your noble cause.

“The second sort are of those who are city-beasts rather than citizens — who, while they reach after our fortunes, have cast away their own. These, whelmed in wine, swelled up with food, and weakened with hourly whoredoms, never left the side of Catiline in Rome, nor are here loosed from his embraces. These men are such as, trust me, never employed their youth in riding or in using well their arms, watching during guard-duty, or doing other military labor. Instead, they just learned to love, drink, dance, and sing, make feasts, and be fine gamesters. And these will wish more hurt to you than they actually bring you.”

Petreius then described the final cluster of men he and his soldiers would face:

“The rest are a mixed kind, all sorts of furies, adulterers, dicers, fencers, outlaws, thieves, the murderers of their parents, all the cesspool and plague of Italy met in one torrent to take today from us the punishment due to their evil deeds for so many years.”

Petreius then encouraged his soldiers to fight well:

“And who of you, in such a cause and against such fiends, would not now wish himself all arm and weapon to cut such poisons from the earth and let their blood out, to be drawn away in clouds and poured on some uninhabitable place, where the hot sun and slime breeds nothing but monsters?”

The mythical Perseus killed Medusa by decapitating her and then flew on his winged horse over the deserts of Libya. Drops of blood from Medusa’s head, which he was carrying, fell onto the desert sands and turned into snakes.

Many people at this time believed that the sun shining on slime resulted in the creation of harmful creatures such as serpents and crocodiles.

Petreius then spoke about the joy in Elysium that awaited any Roman soldiers who died for Rome, and he spoke about the hell that awaited all the enemy soldiers who fought to destroy the Roman Republic:

“Chiefly, when this inevitable joy of our victory shall crown our side, we will know that the least man who falls on our side this day — as some must give their happy names to fate and that eternal memory of the best death recorded with it for their country — shall walk at pleasure in the tents of rest and see far off, beneath him, all the dead enemy soldiers tormented after life, and Catiline there walking, a wretched and less ghost than he, the viewer.”

The souls of dead soldiers loyal to Rome would end up in Elysium, where the souls of good men were rewarded. Catiline and his dead soldiers would end up in the part of hell where the souls of bad men were punished.

Petreius continued:

“I’ll speak to and urge you on no more; move forward with your eagles and entrust the Senate’s and Rome’s cause to heaven.”

The soldiers said, “To you, to great father Mars, and to greater Jove!”

— 5.2 —

Both Julius Caesar and Crassus kept a close eye on the politics of Rome. Both would have been happy to take advantage of a successful rebellion against Rome. Both would have been happy after the revolution to push Catiline aside and rule Rome in his place.

“I always expected this from Lentulus, when Catiline was gone,” Caesar said.

“I gave them up as lost many days ago,” Crassus said.

Caesar asked, “But why did you bear their letter to the Consul that they sent you to give you warning to leave the city so that you would be safe?”

Crassus replied, “Did I know whether he made it? It might come from him for anything I could ascertain for me.”

The letter had come from the conspirators and had warned Crassus to leave Rome before a massacre happened. Crassus thought, however, that the letter might have been a forgery commissioned by Cicero to test whether Crassus was loyal to Rome.

Crassus said, “If they meant that I should be safe, among so many to be killed, they might have come, as well as written.”

Caesar said, “There is no loss in being secure. I have recently, too, plied him thick with intelligences, but they’ve been of things he knew before.”

By “him,” he meant Cicero. The two men were not using names in case they were overheard.

Crassus replied, “A little serves to keep a man upright on these state-bridges, even if the passage were more dangerous.”

The state-bridge was like a narrow bridge with Cicero and his allies on one side and with Catiline and his allies on the other side. Until now, Caesar and Crassus had stayed in the middle, not fully committing to either side, but Caesar and Crassus now had to decide which way to cross the bridge. Whose side — Cicero’s or Catiline’s — would they end up on?

Crassus said, “Let us now take the standing part; let us join the side that will win.”

The winning side would stand; the losing side would fall.

Caesar agreed, “We must, and we must be as zealous for it as Cato is. Yet I would like to help these wretched men.”

The wretched men were the conspirators in Rome whom Cicero would soon order to be arrested.

“You cannot,” Crassus said. “Who would save them who have betrayed themselves?”

— 5.3 —

Cicero, his brother Quintus, and Cato stood together. Cicero was holding some letters.

“I will not be coerced to do it, brother Quintus,” Cicero said. “No man’s private enmity and hatred shall make me violate the dignity of another man. If there were proof against Caesar, or whoever, to declare that he is guilty, I would so declare him. But Quintus Catulus and Caius Piso both shall know that the Consul will not for their grudge have any man accused or named falsely.”

Quintus Catulus and Caius Piso were two of Julius Caesar’s enemies.

Julius Caesar had recently defeated Quintus Catulus in the election for Pontifex Maximus, and he had accused Caius Piso in court of having abused his provincial powers and illegally executing a Gaul.

Cicero’s brother, Quintus, replied, “Not falsely, but if any evidence by the Allobroges, or from Volturcius, would sustain the accusation.”

“That shall not be sought by me,” Cicero said. “If it should reveal itself, I would not spare you, brother, if it pointed at you, trust me.”

Cato said, “Good Marcus Tullius — who is more than great — you had your education with the gods.”

Marcus Tullius Cicero ordered, “Bring Lentulus here, and arrest the rest of the conspirators in Rome.”

He then said to Cato, "This task I am sorry, sir, to give to you."

Caesar, Crassus, Silanus, and other members of the Senate entered the scene.

Cicero said, "I wish what may be always happy and fortunate to Rome and to this Senate."

He showed them the letters he was holding and said, "May it please you, Fathers, to break open the seals of these letters and to view them."

He gave the letters to the Senators, who read them and passed them around.

Cicero then said, "If that which I fear should not be found in them, I yet request of you, at such a time as this, that my diligence and conscientiousness will not be scorned and condemned."

Flaccus and Pomtinius entered the scene.

Cicero asked them, "Have you brought the weapons here from Cethegus' house?"

"They are outside," Flaccus replied.

Cicero ordered, "Be ready with Volturcius, to bring him when the Senate calls, and see that none of the rest confer and talk together."

Flaccus and Pomtinius exited.

Cicero then asked the Senators, "Fathers, what do you read? Is it yet worth your care and concern, if not your fear, what you find written there?"

The letters had been sealed, so Cicero had taken a risk in giving them to the Senators to read. Cicero had believed that the letters were about Catiline's planned rebellion, but he had not been certain that they were.

"It has a face — an appearance — of horror!" Julius Caesar said.

"I am amazed!" Crassus said.

Cato pointed to a letter and said, "Look there."

"Gods!" Silanus said. "Can such men breathe common air?"

Cicero said:

"Although the greatness of the evil, fathers, has often made belief in me small in this Senate, yet since my casting Catiline out of Rome — for now I do not fear the hostility of the words 'cast out' unless the deed be rather to be feared that he went from here alive, when those I meant should follow him did not leave Rome — I have spent both days and nights in watching what the fury and rage of those who stayed in Rome were bent on against my wishes."

He had been carefully watching after the safety of Rome and protecting it against the fury and rage of the conspirators who had stayed in Rome when Catiline left.

Cicero said:

"And I have watched for an opportunity so that I might just take them in that light where, when you perceived their treason with your own eyes, your minds at length would consider your own safety.

"And now it is done. These letters are in their handwriting and sealed with their seals. Their persons, too, are kept in custody, thanks to the gods."

He then ordered, "Bring in Volturcius and the Allobroges."

Flaccus and Pomtinius brought in Volturcius and the Allobroges.

Pointing to the Allobroges, Cicero said, “These are the men who were entrusted with their letters.”

“Fathers, believe me, I knew nothing,” Volturcius said. “I was travelling to Gallia, and I am sorry —”

Cicero said, “Stop shaking out of fear, Volturcius. Speak the truth and hope — expect — well of this Senate, on the Consul’s word.”

Cicero was giving his word as Consul that Volturcius could expect mercy from the Senate if he told the truth.

“Since that is the case, I knew everything,” Volturcius said. “But truly I was drawn in just the other day.”

Julius Caesar said, “Say what you know, and don’t be afraid. You have the Senate’s faith and the Consul’s word to fortify you. The Senate and the Consul will keep their promises.”

Volturcius answered, but he was afraid and spoke disjointedly:

“I was sent with letters — and had a message, too — from Lentulus — to Catiline — that he should use all aids — slaves or others — and come with his army as soon to the city as he could — for they were ready and just waited for him — to intercept those who should flee the fire — these men, the Allobroges, did hear it, too.”

The first Allobrox said, “Yes, fathers, and they took an oath to us, besides their letters, that we should be free, and they asked us for some immediate aid of horses.”

Cicero said, “Here are other testimonies, Fathers: Cethegus’ armory.”

Cethegus’ weapons and armor were brought forth.

“What, not all these?” Crassus said.

Cicero replied, “Here’s not the hundredth part of his weapons.”

He then ordered, “Call in the fencer, so that we may know the arms that would wield all these weapons.”

Calling Cethegus a fencer was an insult. Gladiators were slaves or prisoners of war.

Under guard, Cethegus entered the scene.

Cicero said, “Come, my brave sword-player, to what active use was all this steel provided?”

Cethegus replied, “Had you asked in the days of Sulla, their use would have been to cut throats. But now their use is to look on only. I love to see good blades and feel their edge and points, to put a helmet upon a block and cleave it, and now and then to stab an armor through.”

Handing him a letter, Cicero asked, “Do you recognize that letter? That will stab you through. Is it your handwriting?”

Cethegus tore up the letter.

“Stop, save the pieces!” Cicero said.

He then said to Cethegus, “Traitor, has your guilt awakened your fury?”

“I wrote I know not what, nor care not,” Cethegus said. “That fool Lentulus dictated the letter and I, the other fool, signed it.”

Cicero ordered a guard, “Bring in Statilius: Does he know his handwriting, too? And bring in Lentulus.”

Under guard, Statilius and Lentulus entered the scene.

Cicero ordered, “Hand Statilius that letter.”

“I confess it all,” Statilius said.

Cicero asked Publius Lentulus, “Do you know that seal yet, Publius?”

“Yes, it is mine,” Lentulus said.

“Whose image is that on it?” Cicero asked.

“My grandfather’s,” Lentulus answered.

His grandfather was a patriotic Roman named Publius Cornelius Lentulus; he had been Consul.

“What, that renowned good man, who only embraced his country and loved his fellow citizens!” Cicero said. “Wasn’t his picture, although mute, powerful enough to call you away from doing from a deed as foul —”

Lentulus interrupted, “— as what, impetuous Cicero?”

Cicero finished, “— as you are, for I do not know what’s fouler.”

He pointed to the Allobroges and asked, “Look upon these men. Don’t these faces prove your guilt and impudence?”

“What are these men to me?” Lentulus asked. “I don’t know them.”

“No, Publius?” the first Allobrox said. “We were with you at Brutus’ house.”

They had met at the house of Decius Brutus, whose wife was Sempronia.

“Last night,” Volturcius said.

“What were you doing there?” Lentulus said to the Allobroges. “Who sent for you?”

“You yourself did,” the first Allobrox said. “We had letters from you, Cethegus, this Statilius here, Gabinius Cimber, all but from Longinus, who would not write because he was to come shortly in person after us, he said, to take charge of the horses that we should levy.”

“And he has fled to Catiline, I hear,” Cicero said.

“Spies? Spies?” Lentulus said.

He was referring to the Allobroges.

The Allobroges said to Lentulus, “You told us, too, about the Sibyl’s books, and how you were to be a king this year, the twentieth from the burning of the Capitol. You told us that three Cornelii were to reign in Rome, of which you were the last; and you praised Cethegus and the great spirits who were with you in the action.”

Cethegus said to Lentulus, sarcastically, “These are your honorable ambassadors, my sovereign lord.”

Cato said, “Shut up, too bold Cethegus!”

The first Allobrox said, “Besides Gabinius and your agent — Umbrenus — you named Autronius, Servius Sulla, Vargunteius, and some others.”

Volturcius said to Lentulus:

“I had letters from you to Catiline, and a message that I’ve told to the Senate, truly, word for word; for which I hope they will be gracious to me.

“I was drawn in by that same wicked Cimber, and I thought there would be no hurt at all.”

Cimber was Gabinius. “Cimber” was an epithet meaning “cruel.” He was Gabinius Cimber: Gabinius the Cruel.

Cicero said:

“Volturcius, peace. Be silent.

“Where is your visor — your mask, your pretense of innocence — or your voice now, Lentulus? Are you confounded? Why don’t you answer that question? Is all so clear, so plain, so manifest that both your eloquence and your impudence, and your ill nature, too, have left you at once?”

Cicero then ordered the guards, “Take him aside. There’s yet one more: Gabinius, the engineer — the plotter — of all.”

Under guard, Gabinius entered the scene.

Cicero ordered, “Show him that letter. Let’s see if he recognizes it.”

“I know nothing,” Gabinius said.

“No?” Cicero asked.

“No,” Gabinius answered. “Neither will I know.”

Cato said, “Impudent head! Impudent disposition! Stick his words back into his throat. If I were the Consul, I’d make you eat the evil you have vented.”

“Is there a law for it, Cato?” Gabinius asked.

“Do you ask about a law, you who would have broken all the laws of nature, manhood, conscience, and religion?” Cato replied.

“Yes, I may ask for it,” Gabinius Cimber said.

“No, pernicious Cimber,” Cato said. “The inquiring after good does not belong to a wicked person.”

“Aye, but Cato does nothing except by law,” Gabinius said.

Cato had a reputation for righteousness.

Crassus said to the guards, “Take Gabinius aside. There’s proof enough, although he doesn’t confess.”

“Wait, I will confess,” Gabinius said. “All’s true your spies have told you. Make much of them. Praise them well.”

Cethegus said, “Yes, and reward them well, for fear you get no more such. See that they do not die in a ditch and stink, now you have finished with them, or beg on the bridges here in Rome, whose arches their active industry and toil have saved.”

Many beggars begged on the bridges of Rome. It’s harder to avoid beggars on a bridge than beggars in a street.

Cicero said:

“See, fathers, what minds and spirits these are who, being convicted of such a treason and by such a multitude of witnesses, dare still retain their boldness. What would their rage have done if they had conquered?”

“I thought, when I had thrust out Catiline, neither the state nor I should need to have feared Lentulus’ lethargic sleep here, nor Longinus’ fat, nor this Cethegus’ rashness. It was only Catiline I watched while he was within our walls, as the one who had the brain, the hand, the heart.

“But now we find the contrary! Where was there a people grieved, or a state discontent, able to make or help a war against Rome, but these, the Allobroges? And the conspirators found those men: the Allobroges.

“If the just gods had not been pleased to make the Allobroges friends to our safety more than to their own, as it then seemed, neglecting and despising these traitorous men’s offers, where would we have been, or where would the commonwealth have been, when their great chief — Catiline — had been called home to Rome?”

Lentulus' letter, which the Allobroges had turned over to Cicero, called for Catiline to return to Rome.

Cicero pointed to Lentulus and said:

“This man, their absolute king — whose noble grandfather, armed in pursuit of the seditious Caius Gracchus, took a brave wound for dear defense of that which Lentulus would spoil — had gathered all his aids of ruffians, slaves, and other slaughtermen, and he had given us — the Senators — up for murder to Cethegus.

“The other rank of citizens — the non-Senators — he gave up to Gabinius, the city was to be set on fire by Cassius, and Italy, nay, the world, was to be laid waste by cursed Catiline and his accomplices.

“Imagine it, Fathers, just think that with me you saw this glorious city, the light of all the earth, the tower of all nations, suddenly falling in one flame.

“Imagine you viewed your country buried under the heaps of slaughtered citizens who had no grave.

“Imagine this Lentulus here reigning, as he dreamt he would do, and imagine those conspirators his purple Senate.”

This society called the color of blood purple, and Roman Senators wore a tunic or a toga with a purple stripe.

Cicero continued:

“Imagine Catiline come with his fierce army; and imagine the cries of matrons, the flight of children, and the rape of virgins.

“Imagine the shrieks of the living, with the dying groans on every side to assault your sense of hearing.

“Imagine these things happening until the blood of Rome becomes mixed with her ashes!

“This was the spectacle these fiends intended to please their malice.”

Cethegus said, “Aye, and it would have been a brave one, Consul. But your part would then not have been as long as now it is. I would have quite spoiled and defeated your oration and slit that fine rhetorical pipe of yours in the first scene.”

“Insolent monster!” Cato said.

Cicero asked, “Fathers, is it your pleasures they shall be committed to some safe but free custody, until the Senate makes some other decision?”

A safe but free custody would be in a private home rather than in a prison. A leading citizen would be responsible for the detained person.

“It pleases us well,” the Senators said.

Cicero said:

“Then, Marcus Crassus, you take charge of Gabinius; send him home to your house.

“You, Caesar, take charge of Statilius.

“Cethegus shall be sent to Cornificius, and Lentulus shall be sent to Publius Lentulus Spinther, who now is an Aedile.”

Cato said, “It would be best for the Praetors to convey them under guard to their respective houses and hand them over.”

“Let it be so,” Cicero said.

He then ordered the Praetors, “Take them away from here.”

Julius Caesar said, “But first let Lentulus divest himself of his Praetorship.”

“I resign my Praetorship here to the Senate,” Lentulus said.

He removed his robe that indicated his rank.

Officials such as Praetors could not be imprisoned while in office.

“So, now there’s no offence done to religion,” Julius Caesar said.

Praetors could take the auspices, the performance of which was a religious rite. Julius Caesar had been elected Pontifex Maximus — the chief priest of the official state religion — and so he was concerned about offence done to religion. Now that Lentulus was no longer a Praetor, he could be imprisoned without offense done to religion.

“Caesar, it was piously and timely urged,” Cato said.

Flaccus, Pomptinus, and some guards exited with Lentulus, Cethegus, Statilius, and Gabinius.

Cicero asked the Senators, “What do you decree to the Allobroges who threw light on and revealed this rebellion by providing information?”

“A free grant from the state of all their suits,” Crassus said.

“And a reward out of the public treasury,” Julius Caesar said.

“Aye, and the title of honest men to crown them,” Cato said.

“What about Volturcius?” Cicero asked.

Once captured, Volturcius had informed on the other conspirators in return for mercy.

“Life and mercy are a good reward enough for him,” Julius Caesar said.

“I ask no more,” Volturcius said.

“Yes, yes, some money,” Cato said. “You need it. It will keep you honest: Poverty made you a knave.”

Silanus said, “Let Flaccus and Pomtinus, the Praetors, have public thanks, and Quintus Fabius Sanga, too, for their good service.”

“They all deserve it,” Crassus said.

Cato asked, “But what do we decree to the Consul — Cicero — whose virtue, counsel, watchfulness, and wisdom have freed the commonwealth and, without tumult, slaughter, or blood, or scarcely raising an army, rescued us all out of the jaws of fate?”

“We owe our lives to him, and our fortunes,” Crassus said.

“Our wives, our children, our parents, and our gods,” Julius Caesar said.

“We all are saved by his fortitude and moral courage,” Silvanus said.

“The commonwealth owes him a civic garland,” Cato said. “He is the only father of his country.”

A corona civica, or civic garland, which was made of oak leaves, was a reward for saving the lives of citizens. Another great honor was being given the title pater patriae: father of his country.

“Let there be public prayer to all the gods made in that name for him,” Julius Caesar said.

Crassus said:

“And in these words:

“Because he has by his vigilance preserved Rome from the flame, the Senate from the sword, and all her citizens from massacre.”

Cicero said, “How my labors are more than paid, grave Fathers, in these great titles and decreed honors!”

Cicero was the first Roman to be given these honors because of his devotion to his civic duty rather than for military victories. He had deserved these titles and honors not because he had acted as a general on a battlefield, but because he had acted as a statesman in Rome.

Cicero said:

“Ever since Rome became Rome, I am the first of the civil robe to receive these titles and honors, and I have received them from this frequent — full, well-attended — Senate, which more gladdens me because I now see you have the sense of your own safety.

“If those good days come no less pleasing to us wherein we are preserved from some great danger than those wherein we’re born and brought to light — because the gladness of our safety is certain, but the condition of our birth not so, and because we are saved with pleasure, but are born without the sense of joy —”

We take pleasure in being saved as adults because we are aware that we are being saved, but an infant who is being born does not have the knowledge needed to feel pleasure at being born. An infant does not know the condition of his or her birth — is the infant born into the Senatorial class or is the infant born into a family that cannot feed it?

If we are saved, we know that we have been saved and we feel pleased that we have been saved. Being born is most likely a scary process for the infant. Most infants cry immediately after birth.

When Rome was born — founded — no one could know (outside of mythology) how great it would become.

Cicero’s listeners knew how great a city (and empire) had been saved through Cicero’s efforts.

Cicero continued, “— why shouldn’t then this day, to us and all descendants of ours, be had in equal fame and honor with that when Romulus first reared these walls, when so much more is saved than he built?”

The founding of Rome was an important event, and the saving of Rome — and all that Rome had acquired and accomplished since its founding — was an important event.

“It ought to be,” Julius Caesar said.

“Let it be added to our fasti — calendar — as an important historical event,” Crassus said.

Loud voices sounded outside.

“What tumult’s that?” Cicero asked.

Flaccus entered the scene and said, “Here’s one Tarquinius captured, going to Catiline, and he says he was sent by Marcus Crassus, whom he names as one guilty of the conspiracy.”

“He is some lying varlet,” Cicero said. “Take him away to prison.”

“Bring him in and let me see him,” Marcus Crassus requested.

“He is not worth it, Crassus,” Cicero said.

He then ordered, “Keep Tarquinius shut up in prison, and hungry, until he tells by whose pernicious counsel he dares to slander so great and good a citizen as Crassus.”

Crassus said to himself, “By yours, I fear it will turn out.”

Crassus suspected that Cicero himself was the source of the pernicious counsel that had led to the slander or “slander” against him.

Silanus said to Crassus, “Some of the traitors, to be sure, in order to give their action the more credibility, told him to name you, or any man.”

Cicero said, “I myself know, by all the course of events of this business, that Crassus is noble and just, and he loves his country.”

Flaccus said, “Here is a document, too, accusing Caesar, from Lucius Vectius and confirmed by Curius.”

“Away with all of that,” Cicero said. “Throw it out of the court.”

“A trick on me, too?” Julius Caesar said.

“It is some men’s malice,” Cicero said. “I said to Curius that I did not believe him.”

“Wasn’t that Curius your spy who had a reward decreed to him in the last meeting of the Senate along with Fulvia, upon your private motion?” Caesar asked.

Cicero had specifically requested a reward for Curius and for Fulvia.

“Yes,” Cicero said.

“But he has not received that reward yet?” Julius Caesar asked.

“No,” Cicero said. “Don’t let this trouble you, Caesar; no one believes his accusation.”

“It shall not, as long as he receives no reward,” Julius Caesar said. “But if he does receive a reward, surely I shall think my reputation for loyalty to be very uncertain and unsafe, where such as he is may receive pay to accuse me.”

“You shall have no wrong done to you, noble Caesar,” Cicero said. “Instead, you shall have all satisfaction and contentment.”

“Consul, I am silent,” Julius Caesar said.

He was satisfied and content with Cicero’s statement.

— 5.4 —

Catiline addressed his soldiers in his military camp:

“I never yet knew, soldiers, that words added virtue to valiant men in a battle, or that a general’s oration made an army fall or stand; but how much military prowess and valor, formed by habit or inherent in his nature, each man’s breast was owner of, so much in action it showed.

“It is in vain to seek to influence with speech a man whom neither glory nor danger can excite; for the mind’s fear keeps all brave sounds from entering at that ear.

“Yet I would remind you of some few things, my friends, and give you reasons for my present plans and course of action.

“You know no less than I what state, what point and conditions, our affairs stand in. And you all have heard what a calamitous misery the sloth and sluggishness of Lentulus has plucked both on himself and on us.

“And you all have heard how, while our aids there in the city looked for are defeated, our entrance into Gallia, too, is stopped. Two armies lie in wait for us: one from Rome, the other from the provinces in Gaul. And where we are, although I most desire it, our great need of grain and other foods forbids us to stay longer. So necessarily we must move away from here, but the sword must both point to and cut the passage to where we move.

“I therefore wish you, when you strike, only to have your courage and your souls about you, and think you carry in your laboring hands the things you seek, glory and liberty, your country that you want now, with the fates that are to be instructed by our swords.”

Usually, ancient people believed that fate is fixed and actions are what is fated. Catiline, however, was saying that his soldiers’ swords would determine their fate.

Catiline continued:

“If we can give the conquering blow, all will be safe and secure for us. We shall not lack provisions, nor supplies. The colonies and free towns will lie open to us.

“Whereas, if we yield to fear, expect no place nor friend to shelter those whom their own fortune and ill-used arms have left without protection.

“You might have lived in servitude, or exile, or safe at Rome, depending on the politically powerful great ones except that you thought those things unfit for men.

“And in that thought you then were valiant. For no man ever yet exchanged peace for war except he who meant to conquer. Hold that purpose. Keep that intention. There’s more necessity you should be conquerors who are fighting for yourselves than those men who are fighting for others.

“That man is base who trusts his feet although his hands are armed — a noble man will not flee while he holds a weapon in his arms.

“I think I see Death and the Furies waiting to see what we will do, and all the gods in heaven at leisure to watch the great spectacle. Draw then your swords, and if our destiny envies our courage and begrudges it the honor of the day, let us still take care to sell ourselves at such a price as may destroy the world to buy us, and to make Fate, while she attacks ours, fear her own estate.”

— 5.5 —

Pomtinus, Cicero, Silanus, Cato, Caesar, Crassus, and other members of the Senate stood together, along with some Lictors. They were going to decide the punishment of the conspirators who had been captured in Rome — without a trial.

“What is the meaning of this hasty calling of the Senate?” the first Senator said.

“We shall know immediately,” the second Senator said. “Wait until the Consul speaks.”

Pomtinus said:

“Fathers conscript, think about your safeties and what to do with these conspirators. Some of their clients, their freedmen — slaves they had freed — and their slaves begin to raise troops and start an insurrection.”

There had been attempts to rescue the conspirators.

Pomtinus continued:

“One of Lentulus’ bawds runs up and down the shops, through every street, with money to corrupt the poor artisans and needy tradesmen to their aid.

“Cethegus has sent, too, to his servants, who are many, picked out especially, and trained in bold assaults, to tell them that forthwith they should arm themselves and attempt to rescue him.

“All will be in instant uproar, if you don’t prevent it with immediate plans. We have done what we can to meet the fury, and we will do more.”

Guards had been stationed throughout Rome.

Pomtinus concluded:

“Be good to yourselves.”

Cicero addressed the Senators:

“What is your pleasure, Fathers, that shall be done?”

“Silanus, you are the Consul-elect; you will be the next Consul. What is your recommendation of the sentence to give these men?”

The Roman custom was for the Consul-elect to give his judicial opinion first. Once he took office, the Consul-elect would likely deal with much of the aftermath of the carrying out of the Senate’s sentence.

It was also the Roman custom, however, not to execute Roman citizens without giving them a trial. Lentulus and the other captured conspirators had not been given trials.

Silanus said:

“My recommendation is short, and it is this:

“Since the conspirators have sought to blot the name of Rome out of the world and raze this glorious empire with her own hands and arms turned on herself, I think it fitting that they die.

“And if my breath could now execute them, they should not enjoy a moment of time or tinge of light longer, to poison this our common air.”

“I think so, too,” the first Senator said.

“And I,” the second Senator said.

“And I,” the third Senator said.

“And I,” the fourth Senator said.

Cicero asked, “What is the sentence you recommend, Caius Caesar?”

Caius Julius Caesar said:

“Conscript Fathers, in great affairs, and in uncertain and controversial affairs, it behooves men who are asked their sentence to be free from either hate or love, anger or pity. For where the least of these hinders, there the mind does not easily discern the truth.

“I speak this to you in the name of Rome, for whom you stand, and to the case before us now:

“I say that this foul crime of Lentulus and the rest should not more prevail with you than your dignity, and you should not be more indulgent to your feelings than to your honor.

“If there could be found a pain or punishment equal to their crimes, I would help devise a plan for it and help execute it.

“But if the greatness of what they have done exceeds all man’s invention, I think it fitting to stop where our laws do.

“Poor petty states may alter their policies at their whim. And if they offend with anger, few know it because they are obscure; their fame and fortune are equal and the same — they are small.

“But the states that are the head of the world and live in that seen height, all mankind knows their actions.

“So we see the greater fortune has the lesser license and freedom of action. They must neither favor nor hate, nor be the least angry, for what with others is called anger, there is cruelty and pride.

“I know Silanus, who spoke before me, is a just, valiant man, a lover of the state, and one who would not in such a business use either judicial grace or judicial hatred.

“I also know well his manners and his modesty. Nor do I think his sentence cruel — for against such delinquents, what can be too bloody?

“But it is true that sentence is unacceptable to our state, since to an offending citizen of Rome our laws prescribe exile, and not death.

“Why then decrees he that? It would be wrong to think he decrees that out of fear, when, by the diligence of so worthy a Consul, all is made safe and secure.

“Is it for punishment? Why, death’s the end of evils, and a rest rather than a torment. It dissolves all griefs, and beyond death is neither worry nor joy.

“You hear that my recommended sentence would not have them die.

“What is my recommended sentence then?

“Set them free and increase Catiline’s army? So will they, if they are just banished.

“No, grave fathers, I would sentence them, first, to have their estates confiscated, and then, to have their persons remain prisoners in the free towns, far off from Rome and severed from it and from each other, where they might have relation hereafter neither to the Senate nor to the people.

“Or if they should have, those towns that were guarding them then would be fined as enemies to the state.”

The first Senator said, “What Caesar has uttered is good and honorable.”

Cicero said:

“Fathers, I see your faces and your eyes are all turned toward me, to see which of these two censures I prefer. Both censures are grave and corresponding to the dignity of the speakers and the greatness of the affair, and both censures are severe.

“One — Silanus — urges death; and he may well remember that this state has punished wicked citizens so.

“The other — Caesar — urges restraints, and those perpetual, which he thinks are devised as more appropriate punishments.

“Decree which you shall please. You have a Consul who is not readier to obey than to defend whatever you shall enact for the republic, and meet with willing shoulders any burden, or any fortune with equanimity, though it were death, which to a valiant man can never happen foul, nor to a Consul be premature, or to a wise man be wretched.”

Valiant men, Consuls, and wise men are always ready for death.

Consul-elect Silanus said, “Fathers, I spoke only as I thought the needs of the commonwealth required.”

Cato said, “Don’t excuse your recommendation.”

Cicero said, “Cato, speak your recommended sentence.”

Cato said:

“This it is.

“You here dispute about kinds of punishment and stand consulting about what you should decree against those whom you rather should beware.

“This evil deed is not like those common crimes that, when they are done, the laws may prosecute.

“But this evil deed, if you don’t prevent it before it happens, will not wait for your judgment once it has happened.”

The evil deed was revolution. Although these conspirators had been arrested, Catiline had an army and remained a danger to Rome.

If they could, most or all of the conspirators would join Catiline.

Cato continued:

“Good Caius Caesar here has very well and subtly discoursed of life and death, as if he thought those things a pretty fable that are related to us of Hell and Furies, or of the diverse way that evil men go from good to filthy, dark, and ugly places.

“And therefore he would have these live, and live long, too, but far from Rome and in the small free towns, lest here they might have rescue — as if men fit for such acts were only in the city, and not throughout all Italy! Or that boldness could not do more where it found least resistance!

“It is foolish advice, if he thinks the conspirators we have in custody are dangerous.

“And if he does not consider the conspirators dangerous, and he alone amid the so great fear of all men stands not frightened, he gives me cause, and you, more to fear him.”

If Julius Caesar alone was not frightened, then it could be because he himself was a secret conspirator.

Cato continued:

“I speak plainly, Fathers.

“Here you look about, one at another, doubting what to do, with faces as if you trusted to the gods who always have saved you — and they can do it.

“But neither wishings nor base womanish prayers can draw their aids, but only vigilance, counsel, action, which they will be ashamed to forsake.

“It is sloth the gods hate, and cowardice.

“Here you have the traitors in your houses, yet you stand doubting what to do with them. Let them loose, and send them away from here with arms, too, with the result that your mercy may become your misery as soon as it can.

“Some may say, ‘Oh, but they are great men, and they have offended only through ambition. We would spare their honor.’

“Aye, if they themselves had spared it, or their reputation, or their modesty, or either god or man, then I would spare them.

“But, as things now stand, Fathers, to spare these men would be to commit a greater wickedness than that which you would revenge.

“If there would be time and place for you to correct this error of sparing these conspirators’ lives, you should make it. It would be your punishment to feel your error of being dilatory and slow to do what needs to be done.

“But there is not time and place. Instead, necessity now bids me say to you: Let them not live an hour, if you intend that Rome should live a day.

“I have finished.”

“Cato has spoken like an oracle,” the first Senator said.

“Let it be so decreed,” Crassus said.

“We are all fearful,” the second Senator said.

“And we would have been base, had not Cato’s virtue raised us,” Silanus said.

“Proceed, most worthy Consul,” the third Senator said.
“We’ll assist you.”

“I’m not yet changed in my opinion about the sentence, Fathers,” Julius Caesar said.

“That doesn’t matter,” Cato said.

A servant carrying letters entered the scene.

Cato asked the servant, “What are those?”

The servant replied, “Letters for Caesar.”

He handed the letters to Caesar and then exited.

“From whom?” Cato asked. “Let them be read in the open Senate. Fathers, they come from the conspirators. I crave to have them read, for the benefit of the republic.”

Julius Caesar said, “Cato, you read it.”

He handed a letter to Cato and said quietly to him, “It is a love letter from your dear sister to me. Although you hate me, do not make the letter public.”

Cato’s half-sister was Servilia. She was the mother of Brutus, a future assassin of Julius Caesar, with whom she was having an affair. She was also the wife of Consul-elect Silanus.

Believing Caesar and unwilling to make the contents of the letter public, Cato returned the letter and said, “Keep the letter, drunkard.”

He could have called Caesar an adulterer, but that would have meant calling his half-sister an adulterer, too.

Cato said to Cicero, “Consul, go forth, confidently.”

Julius Caesar said, “You’ll repent this rashness, Cicero.”

In fact, Cicero would suffer consequences for the executions of Roman citizens without first giving them a trial. Cicero would be prosecuted four years later for the execution of Lentulus, although Lentulus' sentence of death was awarded by the Senate. As a result, Cicero went into voluntary exile.

Drawing his sword, Pomptinus said, "Caesar shall repent it."

"Stop, friends!" Cicero ordered.

"Caesar is scarcely a friend to the people of Rome," Pomptinus said.

"No violence!" Cicero said. "Caesar, you are safe."

Cicero then ordered the Lictors, "Lead on."

The Lictors carried out the sentences the Senate gave to offenders. They would escort Cicero to the places where the conspirators were being held.

Cicero asked, "Where are the public executioners?"

He then said to Pomptinus, "Tell them to come to us."

Pomptinus exited.

Cicero then said to the Lictors, "Let's go to Spinther's house."

Publius Lentulus Spinther was responsible for guarding the conspirator Publius Cornelius Lentulus.

They went there, and Cicero said, "Bring Lentulus forth."

Pomptinus returned with the public executioners.

Lentulus arrived, under guard.

Cicero said to the executioners, "Here, you, the grave revengers of capital crimes against the public, take this man to your justice. Strangle him."

Lentulus said to Cicero, “You do well, Consul. It was a cast at dice — a matter of chance — in Fortune’s hand, not long since, that you yourself would have heard these or other words as fatal.”

In other words, if things had turned out differently, it would be you, Cicero, who would die.

The executioners exited with Lentulus in their custody.

Cicero said to the Lictors, “Lead us on to Quintus Cornificius’ house.”

They went there, and Cicero said, “Bring forth Cethegus.”

Cethegus, under guard, entered the scene.

The public executioners returned.

Cicero said to the public executioners, “Take him to the appropriate death that he has deserved, and let it be said: ‘He was once.’”

“He was once” meant “he once existed and now he does not,” but Cethegus treated it as an incomplete sentence that he now completed.

He said, “— a beast or, what is worse, a slave, Cethegus. Let that be the name for all that’s base hereafter: that Cethegus would let this worm Cicero pronounce on him, Cethegus, and not have trampled Cicero’s body into — Ha! Aren’t you angered?”

Cicero replied, “Justice is never angry.”

He then said to the executioners, “Take him away.”

Cethegus said, “Oh, the whore Fortune and her bawds, the Fates, who put these tricks on men who knew the way to death by a sword! Strangle me, so I may sleep; I shall grow angry with the gods else.”

Death by strangulation was regarded as a base death; death by a sword was much to be preferred.

Cethegus wanted to sleep after death. If the gods were to put his ghost in the Land of the Dead, he would be angry at them.

The executioners exited with Cethegus under guard.

Cicero said to the Lictors, "Lead us to Caius Caesar's, for Statilius."

They went there, and Cicero said, "Bring him and savage Gabinius out."

Gabinius and Statilius, under guard, entered the scene.

The public executioners returned.

Cicero said to the executioners, "Here, take them into your cold hands and let them feel death from you."

"I thank you," Gabinius said. "You do me a pleasure."

"And me, too," Statilius said.

The executioners exited with Gabinius and Statilius under guard.

Cato said to Marcus Tullius Cicero:

"So, Marcus Tullius, you may now stand up and call Rome happy because you are its Consul.

"Great parent of your country, go and let the old men of the city, before they die, kiss you. Let the matrons hang about your neck. Let the youths and maidens store up in their memory in preparation for when they are old what kind of man you were, so they can tell their nephews about you when, some year in the future, they read within our fasti about your Consulship."

Petreius entered the scene.

“Who’s this?” Cato asked. “Petreius?”

“Welcome,” Cicero said. “Welcome, renowned soldier. What’s the news? This face can bring no ill with it to Rome. How is the worthy Consul, my colleague Antonius?”

“As well as victory can make him, sir,” Petreius said. “He greets the fathers, and to me he has entrusted the sad relation of the civil strife, for in such civil war, even victory is still black.”

“Shall we withdraw into the Temple of Concord?” Cicero asked.

“No, happy, fortunate Consul,” Cato said. “Let’s stay here; let all ears take the benefit of this tale. If he — Petreius — had a loud enough voice to extend to the poles and strike it through the center to the antipodes on the other side of the world, the tale would ask for it.”

Petreius said:

“The straits and needs of Catiline being such that he must fight with one of the two armies that then had nearly enclosed and surrounded him, it pleased Fate to make us the object of his desperate choice, wherein the danger almost peised — counterbalanced — the honor.

“As Catiline rose and took up arms, the day grew black because of him, and Fate descended nearer to the earth, as if she meant to hide the name of things under her wings and make the world her quarry.

“At this we roused, lest one small minute’s delay would have left it to be inquired what Rome was. And, as we ought, armed in confidence of our great cause, we in battle formation stood.

“Catiline advanced, not with the face of any man, but with the face of a public ruin. His countenance was a civil war itself. And all his soldiers had showing in their faces the paleness of the death that was to come.

“Yet they cried out like vultures and urged each other on, as if they would precipitate our fates, nor did we stay longer for them. We immediately advanced toward them.

“But Catiline himself struck the first stroke; and with it fled a life, which being cut, it seemed as if a narrow neck of land had broken between two mighty seas, and each flowed into the other, for so did the slaughter, and whirled about, as when two violent tides meet and do not yield.

“The Furies stood on hills circling the place and trembled to see men do more than they. Meanwhile, Piety left the field, grieved for that side that in so bad a cause they didn’t know what a crime their valor was.

“The Sun-chariot stood still and was, behind the cloud the battle made, seen sweating and laboring to drive up its frightened horses whom still the noise drove backward.

“And now fierce Enyo, like a flame, would have consumed all it could reach, and then itself, had not the fortune of the commonwealth come Pallas-like to every Roman thought.”

Enyo is the goddess of war. In this passage, she is metaphorically war.

Pallas is Pallas Athena, goddess of wisdom. The loyal Roman army wisely remembered Rome and so fought fiercely. What was consumed was not both armies but only Catiline’s army.

Another Pallas is the son of King Evander, who lived in Italy. This young Pallas fought on the side of Aeneas, a survivor of the Trojan War who became an important ancestor of the Roman people, in Virgil’s Aeneid. Pallas died in the fighting, but Aeneas won the war.

Petreius continued:

“Catiline seeing that, and also seeing that now his troops covered that earth they’d fought on with their dead trunks, he, ambitious for great fame, to crown his evil, collected all his fury and ran, armed with a glory high as his despair, into our army, like a Libyan lion running upon his hunters, scornful of our weapons, not caring about wounds, plucking down lives about him, until he had circled in himself with death, surrounded by our soldiers.

“Then fell he, too, to embrace it — death — where it lay. And as in that rebellion against the gods, Minerva extending in her hands Medusa’s head (seeing which turns men into stone), one of the giant brethren — Enceladus — felt himself turn into marble at the fatal sight and, now almost made stone, began to inquire what flint, what rock it was that crept through all his limbs, and, before he could think more, he had become that which he feared he would become, so Catiline, at the sight of Rome in us, became his tomb; yet did his look retain some of his fierceness, and his hands still moved, as if he labored yet to grasp the state with those rebellious parts of his body.”

Cato said, “His was a brave, bad death. Had this death been loyal, now, and as for his country as it was against it, who previously had fallen greater than he?”

Cicero said, “Honored Petreius, Rome, not I, must thank you.”

He then said about Petreius, “How modestly has he spoken of himself!”

“He did the more,” Cato agreed.

Petreius had been the general of the Roman army. He was largely responsible for its success in battle.

Cicero said:

“Thanks to the immortal gods, Romans, I now am paid for all my labors, my watchings, and my dangers. Here conclude your praises, triumphs, honors, and rewards decreed to me.

“Only the memory of this glad day, if I may know it shall live within your thoughts, shall much affect and influence my conscience, which I must always prefer before fame.

“Though both be good, the latter yet is worst,

“And always is ill gotten without the first.”

Upper Classes

Senatorial class (senatores): The basis for this class was political. It included all men who served in the Senate, and by extension their families. This class was dominated by the nobles (nobiles), families whose ancestors included at least one Consul (earlier the qualification had been a curule magistracy, i.e. curule aedile and up). The first man in his family to be elected Consul, thus qualifying his family for noble status, was called a “new man” (novus homo), although this term was used in varying senses—it could refer to an equestrian [sic] who was the first in his family to be elected to political office and thus join the senatorial class, or to a man from the senatorial class who was the first in his family to be elected Consul and thus join the nobles, or most dramatically to an equestrian like Cicero who was elected Consul. Senators had to prove that they had property worth at least 1,000,000 sesterces; there was no salary attached to service in the Senate, and senators were prohibited from engaging personally in nonagricultural business, trade or public contracts. Men of the senatorial class wore the tunic with broad stripes (laticlavi).

Equestrian class (equites): The basis for this class was economic. A man could be formally enrolled in the equestrian order if he could prove that he possessed a stable minimum amount of wealth (property worth at least 400,000 sesterces); by extension his family members were also considered equestrians. However, if an equestrian was elected to a magistracy and entered the Senate, he moved up to the senatorial class; this was not particularly easy or frequent. Equestrians were primarily involved in the types of business prohibited to senators. Equestrians wore the tunic with narrow stripes (angusti clavi).

The below information comes from the Wikipedia article titled “Cicero”:

Cicero’s cognomen, or personal surname, comes from the Latin for chickpea, cicer. Plutarch explains that the name was originally given to one of Cicero’s ancestors who had a cleft in the tip of his nose resembling a chickpea. However, it is more likely that Cicero’s ancestors prospered through the cultivation and sale of chickpeas. Romans often chose down-to-earth personal surnames. The famous family names of Fabius, Lentulus, and Piso come from the Latin names of beans, lentils, and peas, respectively. Plutarch writes that Cicero was urged to change this deprecatory name when he entered politics, but refused, saying that he would make Cicero more glorious than Scaurus (“Swollen-ankled”) and Catulus (“Puppy”).

Apparently, the Regents edition is incorrect because the counting should be inclusive:

Days

While we count the days of the month forwards starting, for example, with the first of April and ending with the 30th, the Romans counted the days backwards. And not just from the end of the month, but from the first quarter and the middle of the month and then from the first day of the next month. So the day we would call the 20th day of January Romans would call the 13th day before the first of February. That arithmetic only works with inclusive counting — count every day from 20 January to 1 February inclusive.

3. Strangulation

Believe it or not but spilling blood inside the Ancient city of Rome (and outside of the arenas) was actually a big taboo. Therefore, one of the most common methods of execution was strangulation, which conveniently didn't cause a bloody mess.

The condemned would first be paraded all around the city before being brought to the Roman Forum. There, the executioner would simply strangle the convicted felon to death with a rope.

Sometimes, the prisoner would just be paraded and taken back to his cell where he was then strangled. This was the case with for example Vercingetorix, a captured Gallic tribe leader who was brought to Rome and paraded during one of 4 of Julius Caesar's triumphs in 46 B.C.

CHAPTER 6: Ben Jonson's The Devil is an Ass

CAST OF CHARACTERS (The Devil is an Ass)

SATAN the great devil

PUG the less devil (an imp)

INIQUITY the Vice. The Vice was a stock character, often comic, in medieval morality plays. The Vice's job was supposed to be to tempt people to do evil. The Vice accompanied Satan. At the time of Ben Jonson's play, the Vice is an old-fashioned, out-of-date character.

FABIAN FITZDOTTREL a squire of Norfolk (a dotterel is a foolish bird)

MISTRESS FRANCES FITZDOTTREL his wife. "Mistress" means "female head of the house." She was the mistress or lady-boss of the servants — or servant — in the household. Her husband sometimes calls her "wedlock," which is appropriate because her marriage is a form of imprisonment.

MERECRAFT the projector ("mere" means "solely," "completely," or "only"; "crafty" means "tricky" in an unethical sense). A projector comes up with moneymaking schemes; projectors need money to put into effect their moneymaking schemes. Merecraft is a con man.

EVERILL his champion and defender. Everill gets Merecraft access to wealthy men to defraud. Everill is a con man.

WITTIPOL a young gallant. "Wit" means intelligence, and "pol" means "head" or "parrot." The name is ambiguous, so readers will have to study his character to see whether he is an intelligent man or merely an intelligent parrot. Even an intelligent parrot is not very intelligent.

EUSTACE MANLY his friend. Manly is a good and ethical man.

ENGINE a broker (a middleman; an engine is a piece of trickery). Engine is a con man.

TRAINS the projector's (Merecraft's) manservant (a train is a lure or a bait)

GILTHEAD a goldsmith (a gilthead is a fish with gold markings on its head)

PLUTARCHUS his son

SIR PAUL EITHERSIDE a lawyer and Justice (lawyers can argue for either side: prosecution or defense)

LADY EITHERSIDE his wife

LADY TAILBUSH the lady projectress

PITFALL her female attendant (a pitfall is a trap)

AMBLER her gentleman usher

SLEDGE a blacksmith, the constable

SHACKLES jail keeper of Newgate prison

The Scene

Notes

In this culture, a man of higher rank would use words such as “thee,” “thy,” “thine,” and “thou” to refer to a servant. However, two close friends or a husband and wife could properly use “thee,” “thy,” “thine,” and “thou” to refer to each other.

The word “sirrah” is a term usually used to address a man of lower social rank than the speaker. This was socially acceptable, but sometimes the speaker would use the word as an insult when speaking to a man whom he did not usually call “sirrah.” Close friends, whether male or female, could also call each other “sirrah.”

A purse is used to carry money. Men carried what they called a purse.

The word “wench” in Ben Jonson’s time was not necessarily negative. It was often used affectionately.

The events of The Devil is an Ass take place in one day.

ACT 1 (The Devil is an Ass)

— 1.1 —

Satan and Pug, a minor devil, talked together in London. Pug had made a request to Satan that Satan was now laughing at. They were visiting earth, and Pug wanted to take possession of a body and stay there for a while.

“Ho, ho, ho, ho, ho, ho, ho, ho,” Satan laughed. “To earth? And why do thou want to go to earth, thou foolish spirit? What would thou do on earth?”

“I want to go to earth to do, great chief, that which time shall show you,” Pug said. “I am asking only for my month on earth, which every petty, puny devil has. Within that length of time, the Court of Hell will hear something that may gain me a longer grant of time, perhaps, to spend on earth.”

Satan said, “For doing what?”

“Laming a poor cow or two?”

“Entering a sow to make her bear prematurely her farrow?”

“Or somewhere between this place and the village of Tottenham crossing the path of a market-woman’s mare and diverting it from its destination?”

The village of Tottenham was only a few miles from London.

Satan continued, “These are your usual main achievements, Pug.

“You must have some plot now concerning the storing of ale in casks: You want to make the yeast stale.

“Or you want to manage the churn so that the butter doesn’t form, despite the housewife’s cord, or her hot spit. You want to keep the housewife's cord or her hot spit from making butter."

In this society, housewives believed that wrapping a cord around a churn or thrusting a hot spit into the cream would encourage the formation of butter.

Satan continued, "Or some good ribibe — old hag — about Kentish Town or Hoxton, in the area of north London, you would hang now for a witch because she will not let you play round Robin?"

Puck, in William Shakespeare's A Midsummer Night's Dream, is also known as Robin Goodfellow. He goes around and plays tricks such as some of the ones Satan says that Pug likes to perform. Puck's tricks are annoying, but they are not life threatening.

Satan continued, "And you'll go sour a citizen's cream in preparation for Sunday, so that she may be accused of it, and condemned by a Middlesex jury, to the satisfaction of their offended friends, the Londoners' wives, whose teeth were set on edge with it?"

Middlesex juries had a well-deserved reputation for severity.

Satan continued, "Foolish fiend, stay in your place, know your own strengths, and don't go beyond the sphere of your activity. You are too dull, stupid, and foolish a devil to be trusted out in those parts, Pug, upon any affair that may concern our name on earth. It is not everyone's work. The state of Hell must care whom it employs in point of reputation, here about London.

"You would make, I think, an agent to be sent to Lancashire properly enough, or some parts of Northumberland, as long as you would have good instructions, Pug."

In other words, Pug could do good work in Lancashire or in Northumberland, but not in and around London, which is just too evil for an imp like Pug to deal with.

“Oh, chief!” Pug said. “You do not know, dear chief, what is in me.

“Test me for just a fortnight, or for a week, and lend me only a Vice to carry with me and help me corrupt any playfellow, and you will see that there will come more out of it than you’ll imagine, precious chief.”

A Vice was a companion of devils such as Satan. They had various names, which were the names of specific moral vices.

“What Vice?” Satan asked. “What kind of Vice would thou have?”

“Why, any,” Pug said. “Let the Vice be Fraud, or Covetousness, or Lady Vanity.

“Or old Iniquity — I’ll call him here.”

He called, “Iniquity!”

Iniquity the Vice appeared and said, “Who is he who calls upon me, and would seem to lack a Vice? Before his words are half spoken, I am with him in a trice, and here, there, and everywhere, as the cat is with the mice. I am true vetus Iniquitas.”

Iniquity the Vice knew Latin: Vetus Iniquitas is Latin for “old Inequity.”

The word “iniquity” means “gross injustice” or “wickedness.”

Iniquity the Vice said, “Do thou lack cards, friend, or dice? I will teach thee to cheat, child, to swindle and cheat, lie, and swagger, and forever and at once to be drawing forth thy dagger.

“I will teach thee to swear by Gog’s nouns — by God’s wounds — like a Lusty Juventus — like a Pleasure-Seeking Young Man.

“You will wear a cloak down to thy heel, and a hat like a penthouse, aka awning, Thy breeches will have three fingers of padding, and thy jacket will be all belly because it is stuffed with bombast — stuffing.

“And you will be with a wench who shall feed thee with aphrodisiacal cock-stones that are found in the gizzards of roosters — this wench will also feed thee with jelly.”

Iniquity the Vice skipped with delight.

Pug said to Satan, “Isn’t it excellent, chief? How nimble he is!”

Iniquity the Vice said, “Child of Hell, this is nothing! I will perform a leap from the top of the steeple of St. Paul’s Cathedral” — Iniquity the Vice was out of touch because lightning-caused fire had destroyed the steeple in 1561, and the current year was 1616 — “to the Standard, an ornamental pillar in Cheapside, and lead thee a dance through the streets without fail, as if I were a high-quality needle made in Spain, with a thread at my tail.”

Spanish lovers had a red-hot reputation, and readers can guess the meaning of a Spanish “needle.” (Non-metaphorical Spanish needles also had a reputation for good quality.)

The tail was the Vice’s bottom, and the non-metaphorical thread was his devil’s tail.

Iniquity the Vice now described a journey through disreputable areas of London, such as those filled with prostitutes, thieves, pubs, and lawyers:

“We will survey the suburbs, and make forth our sallies —

“We will go down Petticoat Lane and up the Smock Alleys
— those haunts of prostitutes —

“We will go to Shoreditch, which is known for prostitutes; Whitechapel, which is known for thieves; and so continue on to St. Katherine’s precinct, which is known for pubs — we will drink with the alcohol-loving Dutch there, and take away from there their patterns for weaving.

“From thence we will put in at Custom House Quay and see how the mercantile agents and apprentices play false with their masters; and geld — lighten — many a full pack, to spend it on pies at the Dagger and the Woolsack taverns.”

The mercantile agents and apprentices would steal items to sell to make money to spend on pies.

“Brave, brave Iniquity!” Pug said.

He then asked Satan, “Won’t this do, chief?”

Iniquity the Vice said:

“Boy, I will bring thee to the bawds and the roisterers feasting with claret wine and oysters at Billingsgate.

“From thence we will use oars to shoot boats upstream through the narrow arch-supports of the London Bridge, child, to go to the Cranes in the Vintry — three cranes used to upload wine from boats — and see there the gimlets that are used for piercing casks of wine, and see how they make their entry!

“Or if thou had rather go down to the Strand, in time to watch as the lawyers come dabbled — they dabble in law — from Westminster Hall, and observe closely how they cling with their clients together. As ivy is to oak, so velvet is to leather.”

The lawyers wore velvet, and the clients wore leather.

Iniquity the Vice concluded, “Ha, boy, the things I would show thee!”

“Splendid!” Pug said. “Splendid!”

Satan said to Iniquity the Vice, “Be quiet, dotard!”

He then said to Pug, “And thou more ignorant thing, who so admires Iniquity the Vice, are thou the spirit thou seem to be? Are thou so poor and misguided that thou choose this for a Vice to advance the cause of Hell now, as vice stands this present year?”

“Remember what number this year is: six hundred and sixteen.”

The year was 1616, but Satan did not want to number years using “A.D.,” which is an abbreviation of the Latin “Anno Domini,” which means “In the year of Our Lord.”

Satan was missing a thousand years in his reckoning.

Revelation 20:1-3 states this (King James Version):

1 And I saw an angel come down from heaven, having the key of the bottomless pit and a great chain in his hand.

2 And he laid hold on the dragon, that old serpent, which is the Devil, and Satan, and bound him a thousand years,

3 And cast him into the bottomless pit, and shut him up, and set a seal upon him, that he should deceive the nations no more, till the thousand years should be fulfilled: and after that he must be loosed a little season.

Most Christian authorities would say that these thousand years of imprisonment have not yet occurred, for they occur after the Second Coming of Christ.

Satan continued, “Had the number but been five hundred, though some sixty above — that’s fifty years gone, and six —”

He meant the year 560, although that year was actually 1560 A.D. From 616 take away 56, and you have 560. In the year 1560, the theatrical characters known as Vices were popular on the stage in England. By 1616, these characters were old fashioned.

Satan continued, “Back then, when every great man had his Vice stand by him — the Vice wearing a long coat and shaking his wooden dagger — I could consent that then this your grave choice might have done, with his lord chief, that which most of his chamber can do now. Back then, a Vice could be an effective diabolical companion.

“But Pug, as the times now are, who is it who will receive thee? What company will you go to, or whom will thou mix with?

“Where can thou carry the Vice, except to taverns? In a tavern, the Vice will stand on a joint-stool with a Jew’s harp, in order to put down and defeat the improvisatory jester Cokeley, and such performances must be before ordinary citizens. He never will be admitted there where Vennar comes.”

Richard Vennar announced that a new play would be performed on 6 November 1602 at the Swan Theater; he collected the admission money to see the play and then disappeared without having the play performed. According to Satan, Iniquity the Vice may be able to compete against the jester Cokeley in modest venues, but never could he compete against a con man such as Vennar, who operated in better venues.

Satan continued:

The Fool of the Lord Mayor of London would traditionally leap into a large bowl of custard as part of the entertainment at some feasts.

Satan continued:

“But this kind of thing is not what will do to accomplish the purposes of Hell.

“There are other things that are received now upon earth for Vices. There are stranger, and newer, Vices — and they are changed every hour.

“The newer Vices ride the older Vices like they ride their horses off their legs, and the older Vices come here to Hell, whole legions of them, every week, tired and exhausted.”

According to Satan, Vices such as old Iniquity could no longer compete with the new Vices that were appearing in London. The competition to commit vice had grown so fierce that Hell struggled to keep up.

Satan continued:

“We still strive to breed and rear up new Hell-Vices for Londoners, but the new Hell-Vices do not stand tall when they come to London. The Londoners turn our new Hell-Vices upside down and on our hands, and it is feared that the Londoners have a stud of their own that will put down ours.”

Satan was punning bawdily. The noun “a stand” means “an erection” and the verb “to stand” means “to have an erection.” The new Hell-Vices were impotent against the Londoners and their London-Vices.

Satan continued:

“Both our breed and trade will suddenly decay and dwindle unless we prevent it. Unless our Hell-Vice is a Vice of Quality or of Fashion now, the Londoners will not take it from us.

“Cart-men have gotten into the use of yellow starch, and chimney-sweepers have gotten into the use of their tobacco and strong waters: the strong ale known as hum, and mead, and obarni, which is scalded mead.”

A woman named Anne Turner introduced the use of yellow starch to England. In 1615, she was tried for complicity in the murder of Sir Thomas Overbury. Found guilty, she was forced to wear yellow ruffs at her execution, at which she confessed that the devil had possessed her.

Satan continued:

“We must therefore aim at sending extraordinarily subtle Hell-Vices now, when we send a Vice to London, to keep us up in credit. We must not send old Iniquities!”

Satan said to Iniquity the Vice, “Get you back all the way to Hell, sir. Return to the making of your rope of sand again.”

No one can make a rope out of sand; attempting to do so is meaningless work.

The punishments in Hell often consist of meaningless work, as these two punishments show:

1) The fifty sons of Aegyptus wanted to marry the fifty daughters of Danaus. Danaus was suspicious of Aegyptus and his fifty sons, so he fled with his fifty daughters, but Aegyptus and his fifty sons pursued them. To avoid a battle,

Danaus told his fifty daughters to marry the fifty sons of Aegyptus, but although he allowed the marriages to be performed he also ordered his fifty daughters to kill the fifty sons of Aegyptus. All of his daughters except Hypermnestra, who had married Lynceus, obeyed. Hypermnestra spared Lynceus because he treated her with respect and did not force her to have sex with him their first night together. The gods did not like what the forty-nine women who had killed their husbands had done, and so those forty-nine daughters are punished in the Land of the Dead with meaningless work. They are condemned to spend all their time trying to fill up with water a container that has a big leak and so can never be filled. Only one daughter avoided this eternal punishment.

2) When Sisyphus was on his deathbed, he ordered his wife not to give his corpse a funeral. After his death, his spirit went to the Land of the Dead and complained to Pluto, King of the Dead, that he had not yet had a funeral. Pluto allowed him to return to the Land of the Living so that he could tell his wife to give him a funeral, but once he was back in the Land of the Living, he refused to return to the Land of the Dead. He lived to an advanced old age and then died again. Now he is forced to forever roll a boulder up a hill. Just as he reaches the top of the hill, he loses control of the boulder and it rolls back to the bottom of the hill again. Sisyphus can never accomplish this task, which has no value, and so his punishment is endless meaningless work.

Satan continued speaking to Iniquity the Vice:

“You are not for the Londoners’ manners, nor the Londoners’ times.

“They have their Vices there in London that are very similar to Virtues. You cannot tell them apart by any difference. They wear the same clothes, eat the same food, sleep in the same beds, ride in those coaches — or, very likely, four horses in a coach — as the best men and women.

“Tissue gowns, garters, and the shoe decorations known as roses, which are worth fourscore pound a pair, embroidered stockings, cut-work smocks and shirts — all of these are more certainly marks of lechery and pride now, than ever they were of true nobility!”

Religious people preached sermons against lechery and pride, both of which are deadly sins.

They also preached sermons against extravagant clothing and starch, including yellow starch. Tissue gowns were expensive — tissue cloth looked like cloth of gold. Roses were ornaments on the tops of shoes. Cut-work was elaborate embroidery with pieces of cloth cut out.

At one time in London, only the nobles wore such expensive clothing — laws of the time forbade wearing clothing designated for those above one’s station in life. But now, in 1616, because of the sinful nature of the Londoners, even the drivers of carts had been using yellow starch. Previously, you could separate the nobles and the common people in London, but now that was difficult. Previously, you could separate the vices and the virtues in London, but now that was difficult — often, what seemed to be a virtue turned out to be a vice.

Iniquity the Vice bowed his head in shame and exited.

Satan then said, “But Pug, since you burn with such desire to do the commonwealth of Hell some service, I am content that you assume a body, go to earth, and visit men for one day.

“But you must take a ready-made body, Pug. I can create you none. Creation is not reserved for devils such as me.

“Nor shall you form yourself an airy body, for instead you must become subject to all impressions of the flesh you take so far as human frailty. You will be able to feel pain.

“So, there is a handsome cutpurse to be hanged at Tyburn this morning. Once his spirit has departed, you may enter his body.

“As for clothes, employ your credit with the hangman, or let our tribe of brokers furnish you with clothing.”

Pug would go to earth and take possession of a naked dead body. He could get clothing from the hangman, part of whose compensation was the clothing of the people he hanged, or he could go to a pawnbroker, a member of a profession closely associated with Hell. Or he could find a third way to get clothing.

Satan continued:

“And see how far your subtlety can work through those organs; with that body, spy among mankind — you cannot there lack vices to spy upon, and therefore the less need you have to carry Vices with you. But as you make your soon-to-come early-at-night’s relation of your day to us, we will listen and if we shall find it merits reward from the state of Hell, you shall have both trust and employment from us.”

Satan was using the majestic plural.

“Most gracious chief!” Pug said.

“Only this much more do I bind you,” Satan said. “You must serve the first man whom you meet — and that man I’ll show you now.”

A mortal man named Fitzdottrel walked near them.

Satan continued:

“Observe him. Yonder is the man whom you shall see first, after you find some clothing to wear.

“Follow him. But once you are engaged to serve him, there you must stay and be fixed in that job, and not shift to any other employment until the midnight’s cock crows.”

“I agree to any conditions so long as I can be gone!” Pug said.

“Leave, then,” Satan said.

Satan and Pug exited.

— 1.2 —

Fitzdottrel, who was holding a picture of a devil, really wanted to see a devil. He had been trying to get help from occultists to do just that.

He said to himself, “Aye, they do now name Bretnor, as before they talked of Gresham, and of Doctor Forman, Franklin, and Fiske, and Savory — he was in on the murder, too — but there’s not one of these who ever could yet show a man the Devil in his true form.”

These people were con men, astrologers, and quacks. Some of them were connected with the murder of Sir Thomas Overbury, who was poisoned in 1613. Anne Turner, who introduced the use of yellow starch in England, was executed in connection with that murder. Franklin was the apothecary who supplied the poison that killed Sir Thomas Overbury.

Fitzdottrel continued, “They have their crystals, I know, and rings, and virgin parchment, and their dead men’s skulls, their ravens’ wings, their candles, and pentacles with characters — I have seen all these.”

Charms were written on parchment; the skins of newborn lambs and kids (baby goats) are used to make virgin parchment. A pentacle is a pentagram; mystical characters were inscribed on pentagrams.

Fitzdottrel continued, “But — I wish that I might see the Devil! I would give a hundred of these pictures to see him once out in person and not in a picture.”

He looked at the picture of a devil and then said, “May I prove to be a cuckold, a man with an unfaithful wife — and that’s the one main mortal thing I fear — if I don’t begin now to think that the painters have only made up the Devil and that devils don’t really exist.

“By God’s light, the Devil would have been seen at one time or another if he really existed.

“The Devil would not let an antique gentleman of as good a family as most are now in England — because King James I sells titles for money — run wild and call upon him thus in vain, as I have done this past year.”

Fitzdottrel was an “antique” gentleman in the sense that the Fitzdottrels were a long-standing family of the gentle class.

He continued, “If the Devil does not at all exist, then why are there conjurers who say that they can summon devils? If they are not truly conjurers, then why are there laws against them? The best artists — learned men — of Cambridge, Oxford, Middlesex, and of London, Essex, and Kent, I have had in pay to raise the Devil these fifty weeks, and yet the Devil has not appeared. By God’s death, I shall suspect the conjurers can make circles only shortly — small circles made for only a short time — and know only his hard names.”

The conjurers had failed to summon the Devil. Why? Perhaps the circles they made around themselves for protection against the Devil they tried to summon were too small, or perhaps the conjurers gave up too quickly. Also, perhaps they lacked knowledge. Perhaps they knew only the names of the Devil — lists of these names were available — and lacked the other, specialized knowledge that a real conjuror possessed.

Fitzdottrel continued, “They say that the Devil will meet a man in person who has a mind to him. If he would do so, I have a mind and a half for him. By God’s light, he should not be long absent.

“I pray to thee, the Devil, come — I long for thee!

“If I were with child by him, and my wife, too, I could not long for thee more.

“Come, yet, good Beelzebub!”

Beelzebub was one of the Devil’s many names. “Good” is an adjective not normally applied to Satan.

Fitzdottrel continued, “If he were a kind Devil, and had humanity in him, he would come just to satisfy one’s longing.

“I would treat him well, I swear, and I would treat him with respect, if he were to test me.

“I would not treat him as the conjurers do when they have raised him. They put him in bonds, and send him posthaste on errands a thousand miles in distance. That is preposterous, and, I believe, that is the true reason he does not come. And he has good reason. Who would be bound, who might live freely, as he may do?

“I swear all the conjurers are wrong. The burnt child dreads the fire. They do not know to treat the Devil and keep him in service. I would so welcome him, observe his diet, get him his own chamber that is decorated with wall hangings — two of them — in my own house, lend him my wife’s embroidered pillows, and as I am an honest man, I think, if he had a mind to my wife, too, I would grant her to him, to make our friendship perfect. I would not do that for every man.

“I wish that the Devil would just hear me now, and would come to me in a brave young shape, and would take me at my word!

“Ha! Who is this?”

— 1.3 —

Pug walked over to Fitzdottrel. Pug had possessed the body of the recently hanged handsome young cutpurse, and he was now dressed in a fine new suit.

Pug said, “Sir, I beg your good pardon for my thus presuming upon your privacy. I was born a gentleman, I am a younger brother, and I am in some disgrace now with my friends and need some little means to keep me upright, until things can be reconciled. May it please you to let my service be of use to you, sir.”

The bulk of an inheritance passed to the oldest son, and so a younger son, who was the oldest son’s brother, was often left with little wealth.

Pug was asking Fitzdottrel to employ him — to put him in service.

“Service?” Fitzdottrel said to himself. “Before Hell, my heart was at my mouth until I had viewed his shoes well, for those roses on his shoes were big enough to hide a cloven foot.”

Fitzdottrel had just asked the Devil to appear, and Pug had appeared, and so Fitzdottrel at first thought that Pug was the Devil, especially because the Devil was thought to have cloven feet that could be covered by the large roses that Pug was wearing on his feet.

Fitzdottrel carefully looked again at Pug's feet to see if he could tell whether they were cloven. They weren't, but Pug will explain that the Devil's — and the devils' — cloven feet are just a myth.

“No, friend, my number of servants is full,” Fitzdottrel said to Pug. “I have one servant, who is my all, indeed, and does everything from the broom to the brush, for just so far I trust him. He is my wardrobe man, buyer of provisions, cook, butler, and steward; he looks after my horse, and helps to watch my wife. He has all the places that I can think of, from the garret downward even to the manger and the curry-comb for currying horses. My one servant does all of that.”

“Sir, I shall put Your Worship to no charge other than my food, and as for my food I eat only a very little,” Pug said. “I'll serve you for your friendship.”

Pug was offering to work for no wages, but only food. He did not ask for shelter because he was authorized to be on earth and out of Hell for only one day.

“Ha?” Fitzdottrel said. “You will work without wages? I'd hearken in my ear, if I were at leisure. But now I'm busy. Please, friend, forgive me. If thou had been a devil, I would say somewhat more to thee. Thou are hindering now my meditations.”

“Sir, I am a devil,” Pug said.

“What!” Fitzdottrel said.

“I am a true devil, sir.”

“Nay, now you lie — under your favor, friend, for I'll not quarrel,” Fitzdottrel said.

This society had rules regarding duels. Normally, being called a liar meant challenging the person who called you a liar to duel. But using the phrase “under your favor” and using the word “friend” qualified the assertion enough that a challenge to duel need not be issued.

Fitzdottrel said, “I looked at your feet earlier; you cannot trick me. Your shoe’s not cloven, sir, you are whole hoofed. Devils have cloven hooves.”

Fitzdottrel looked at Pug’s feet again.

“Sir, that’s a popular error that deceives many,” Pug said. “But I am what I tell you I am: I am a devil.”

“What’s your name?”

“My name is Devil, sir.”

“Is what you are saying true?”

“Indeed, it is, sir.”

“By God’s eyelid!” Fitzdottrel said. “There’s some omen in this! What part of the country are you from?”

“I am from Derbyshire, sir, about the Peak Cavern,” Pug said.

“That hole belonged to your ancestors?”

“Yes, it is called the Devil’s Arse, sir.”

Fitzdottrel said to himself, “I’ll employ him for the namesake, and I will turn away my other manservant, and save four pounds a year by doing that! There’s luck, and thrift, too! The Devil himself may come hereafter as well.”

He said to Pug, “Friend, I receive you into my service. But first I must inform you of this beforehand: If you offend me, I must beat you. It is a kind of exercise I am accustomed to use, and I cannot be without it.”

“Yes, if I do not offend, then you can follow your rule, certainly,” Pug said.

If he never offended, he would never be beaten, and so Pug was OK with Fitzdottrel following that rule.

“Indeed, Devil, I will follow my rule very heartily!” Fitzdottrel said. “I’ll call you by your surname, because I love it.”

— 1.4 —

Wittipol, Manly, and Engine talked together. Wittipol was a young gallant, Manly was his friend, and Engine was a middleman or broker. Engine was carrying a cloak.

Engine said to Wittipol, “Yonder Fitzdottrel walks, sir. I’ll go lift him for you.”

The phrase “lift him” meant 1) “make him excited in emotion” and 2) “excite his pride.” In addition, “lift” is a pun because some engines do the work of lifting.

“To him, good Engine, raise him up by degrees, gently, and hold him there, too,” Wittipol said. “You can do it. Show yourself now a mathematical — exact and calculating — broker.”

“I’ll warrant you that I will for half a piece,” Engine said.

A piece is a gold coin worth 22 shillings.

“It is done, sir,” Wittipol said. “Half a piece, it is.”

Engine took Fitzdottrel aside and spoke to him.

Manly asked, “Is it possible that there should be such a man?”

Engine and Wittipol were trying to persuade Fitzdottrel to do something that most husbands would never consider doing.

“You shall be your own witness,” Wittipol said. “I’ll not labor to tempt you past your faith.”

In other words, Manly would see the evidence for himself that yes, such a man exists; there was no need for Wittipol to persuade him that such a man exists. That kind of persuasion could result in a trial of faith, including faith that men are basically good.

“And is his wife so very beautiful, do you say?” Manly asked.

“I have not seen her since I came home from travel, and they say she is not altered,” Wittipol said. “According to other people, she still looks the same as when I left. Back then, before I went, I saw her only once; but even so, she has stayed always in my mind’s eye — no object has removed her.”

“Beauty is a fair guest, friend,” Manly said, “and once lodged deep in the eyes, she hardly leaves the inn. How does her husband, Fitzdottrel, keep her?”

“He keeps her very finely dressed,” Wittipol said. “However sordid he himself is, he is sensual that way. In every dressing he studies her.”

Fitzdottrel carefully looked at his wife in each outfit she wore, and he may have carefully studied her each time she dressed.

The word “sordid” means “dirty” or “mean.” Certainly, Fitzdottrel overvalued money in some areas of his life. As we have seen, he paid his one servant only four pounds a year. In other areas of his life, however, such as his wife’s clothing, he was willing to spend money.

“And he furnishes himself from the brokers?” Manly asked.

A broker was a middleman in bargains; for example, some people would go to a broker and pawn fine clothing. For special occasions, Fitzdottrel rented fine clothes for himself. He was willing to spend much money to dress himself well.

“Yes,” Wittipol said, “that’s a hired suit he now has on in order to see the play The Devil is an Ass today. This man named Engine gets three or four pounds a week by him. Fitzdottrel dares not miss a new play or a feast, whatever the rate he has to pay for hired clothes, and he thinks that he himself is still new in other men’s old.”

The clothing he wore may have been other men’s old clothing, but the clothing was new to Fitzdottrel.

“But wait,” Manly said, thinking about the feasts Fitzdottrel attended. “Does he love food so much?”

“Truly, he does not hate it,” Wittipol said. “But that’s not it. His belly and his palate would be compounded with for reason — he puts other priorities before his appetite. Indeed, he has an intelligence of that strange credit with him as opposed to all other men, as it makes him do just what it wishes. This strange obsession ravishes him forth wherever it pleases, to any assembly or place, and would make him conclude that he is ruined should he miss one public meeting because of the belief he has of his own great and catholic — universal and all-encompassing — strengths in arguing and discourse.”

Fitzdottrel attended feasts but not because of the food. He had convinced himself that he was a very intelligent man and a fine persuasive speaker, and that was why he attended so many public meetings and assemblies.

Engine had persuaded Fitzdottrel to try on the cloak.

“My plot is working, I see,” Wittipol said. “Fitzdottrel has got the cloak on him.”

Fitzdottrel said to Engine, “This is a fair garment, I swear by my faith, Engine!”

“It was never made, sir, for under threescore pounds, I assure you,” Engine said.

Any assurance made by Engine ought not to be reassuring: He was a con man.

Engine continued, “It will yield thirty pounds if sold.”

Threescore pounds is sixty pounds. Engine meant that the cloak could be worn for a while and then sold used for thirty pounds. Or perhaps the cloak was worth thirty pounds, not sixty.

Engine continued, “The plush, sir, cost three pounds, ten shillings a yard! And then there is the cost of the lace and velvet.”

This was a very fancy and very expensive cloak.

“I shall, Engine, be looked at prettily when I wear it!” Fitzdottrel said. “Are thou sure the play is played today?”

Engine handed Fitzdottrel a paper and said, “Oh, here’s the playbill, sir. I forgot to give it to you.”

“Ha? The Devil is an Ass!” Fitzdottrel said. “I will not lose you, sirrah — I will not miss this play! But, Engine, do you think that the gallant is so furious in his folly? So mad upon the matter that he’ll part with his cloak upon these terms you have told me?”

Engine said, “Trust not your Engine —”

Good advice, that.

He continued, “— if the gallant will not part with the cloak upon those terms, then break me to pieces, as you would a rotten crane or an old rusty jack-tool that does not have one true wheel. Do just talk with him.”

“I shall do that to satisfy you, Engine,” Fitzdottrel said, “and myself, too.”

Fitzdottrel went to Wittipol and Manly and said, “With your leave, gentlemen, which of you is he who is so complete an idolater to my wife’s beauty, and so very prodigal to my patience, that for the short parley of one swift quarter-hour’s conversation with my wife he will part with — let me see — this cloak here, the price of folly?”

Fitzdottrel thought that Wittipol was a fool to part with the cloak in return for fifteen minutes’ conversation with Fitzdottrel’s wife. Readers may think that Fitzdottrel was a fool for accepting the cloak in return for allowing Wittipol to have fifteen minutes’ conversation with Fitzdottrel’s wife.

He turned to Wittipol and asked, “Sir, are you the man?”

“I am that venturer, sir,” Wittipol said.

“Very good!” Fitzdottrel said. “Your name is Wittipol?”

“Yes, sir.”

“And it is told to me that you’ve travelled lately?”

“That I have, sir.”

“Truly, your travels may have altered your complexion,” Fitzdottrel said. “But surely, your intelligence stood still.”

“It may well be, sir,” Wittipol said. “All heads have not the same growth.”

Travel can alter people. It can make a complexion darker, and it can broaden one’s intelligence. Fitzdottrel was saying that Wittipol’s complexion may have changed, but his intelligence had remained the same — he had not grown more intelligent.

“The good man’s gravity that left you land, your father, never taught you these pleasant matches?” Fitzdottrel asked.

The word “match” has several meanings: 1) a husband or wife or lover, 2) an opponent, 3) a contest, and 4) a bargain.

Fitzdottrel was asking if Wittipol’s late father had taught him to make such bargains as the one Wittipol was now proposing. Perhaps the reason for Wittipol’s making such bargains was his father.

“No, nor can his mirth — the mirth of those with whom I make these pleasant matches — put me off,” Wittipol said.

Fitzdottrel was smiling at what he thought was the foolishness of Wittipol’s making such a bargain.

“You are resolved then to make this bargain?” Fitzdottrel asked.

“Yes, sir.”

“Beauty is the saint you’ll sacrifice yourself to the very shirt?”

Would Wittipol give up his cloak and strip himself to the shirt in order to talk to a beautiful woman — another man’s wife — for fifteen minutes?

“So long as I may still clothe, and keep warm your wisdom!” Wittipol said.

The cloak would clothe Fitzdottrel and keep him warm; in addition, Wittipol would still have clothing to wear.

Wittipol was using the word “wisdom” ironically when using it to refer to Fitzdottrel. Each man thought that the other man was a fool. Currently, both men were right.

Wittipol was pursuing Fitzdottrel's wife, and Fitzdottrel was allowing Wittipol access to his wife.

"You lade me, sir!" Fitzdottrel said.

Fitzdottrel meant that Wittipol was lading him with a cloak — Wittipol was putting a cloak on Fitzdottrel's back. One meaning of the verb "to lade" is "to load with gifts." Readers may be forgiven for thinking of an ass being laden with a load.

Yet another meaning of "to lade" was "to burden with guilt." Certainly, Fitzdottrel ought to feel guilty about the way he was acquiring this cloak, expensive as it may be.

"I know what you will bear, sir," Wittipol replied.

An ass can bear a heavy load. Fitzdottrel could bear a heavy load of insults.

"Well, let's get to the point," Fitzdottrel said. "The point of this bargain is only, sir, you say, to speak to my wife?"

"Yes, it is only to speak to her."

"And in my presence?"

"In your very presence."

"And in my hearing?"

"Yes, in your hearing — as long as you do not interrupt us," Wittipol said.

"For the short space you demand, the fourth part of an hour, I think I shall, with some convenient study, and this good help to boot" — Fitzdottrel lifted the cloak — "bring myself to agree to it."

He shrugged himself into the cloak.

"I ask for no more," Wittipol said.

“If you please, walk toward my house,” Fitzdottrel said. “Speak what you wish; that time is yours. My right I have departed with. But look for not a minute, or a second, beyond the fifteen minutes I have agreed to. Drawing out the length of time may much advance these matches, and so I will not allow it. And I forbid all kissing. Kisses are silent petitions always with willing lovers.”

Fitzdottrel knew that Wittipol wished to seduce his wife.

“Lovers?” Wittipol said. “How does your delusive imagination arrive at that fantasy?”

Wittipol wanted to be her lover — her only lover. Singular.

“Sir, I do know something,” Fitzdottrel said. “I forbid all lip-work.”

“I am not eager to go at forbidden dainties,” Wittipol said. “He who covets unfit things denies himself.”

He who covets unfit things denies himself the opportunity to be the best that he can be.

According to most people, Wittipol’s pursuing Fitzdottrel’s wife was unfit, but Wittipol regarded that wife as very fit, indeed. Wittipol may have convinced himself that pursuing Fitzdottrel’s wife was fitting for such a man as himself; he certainly regarded himself with more respect than he regarded Fitzdottrel.

“You say well, sir,” Fitzdottrel said. “That was prettily said, that same. He does indeed deny himself.

“I’ll have no touches, therefore, nor takings by the arms, nor tender circles cast about the waist — no hugs. Instead, all must be done at a distance.

“Love is brought up with those soft, dainty, delicate handlings. His pulse lies in his palm; and I forbid all melting joints and fingers. That's my bargain I make with you — I forbid anything like physical action and touching.

“But talk, sir, and say whatever you will. Use all the tropes, figures of speech, and rhetorical devices that the classical rhetorician Prince Quintilian can give to you, and much good may it do your rhetoric's heart. You are welcome, sir.”

He then said, “Engine, may God be with you.”

Wittipol said, “Sir, I must add the condition that I am allowed to have this gentleman — my friend Manly — present as a witness.”

“Well, I agree, as long as he is silent,” Fitzdottrel said.

“Yes, sir,” Manly agreed.

Wittipol, Manly, and Engine exited.

Pug had told Fitzdottrel that his name was “Devil,” and so Fitzdottrel called him that.

Fitzdottrel said to Pug, “Come, Devil, I'll make you room in my house very soon. But I'll show you first to your mistress, who's no common one, you must conceive, that brings this gain to see her.”

His wife was so beautiful that she had brought an expensive cloak into his possession.

Fitzdottrel said to Pug, “I hope that thou have brought me good luck.”

“I shall do that, sir,” Pug said.

— 1.5 —

Wittipol, Manly, and Engine talked together in a room in Fitzdottrel's house.

Wittipol said, “Engine, you hope to get your half piece? There it is, sir.”

He gave Engine eleven shillings and said, “Leave now.”

Engine took the money and exited.

Wittipol tapped Manly, who was staring into space, on his chest and said, “Friend Manly, who’s within here? Are you transfixed?”

“I am entirely in a fit of wonder,” Manly said. “What’ll be the outcome of this conversation you will have with Fitzdottrel’s wife?”

“As for that, don’t vex yourself until the outcome reveals itself,” Wittipol said. “How do you like Fitzdottrel?”

“I would gladly see more of him,” Manly said.

“What do you think about this?” Wittipol asked.

“I am past all degrees and all possible stages of logical thinking,” Manly said. “Old Africa and the new America with all their progeny of monsters cannot show so complete a freak as is Fitzdottrel!”

“Could you have believed, without seeing it yourself, that a mind so sordid inward should be so outwardly handsome and laid forth abroad to all the show that ever shop or ware was?” Wittipol asked. “He dresses as if he were a model advertising fine clothing.”

Fitzdottrel’s mind was sordid: dirty and ignoble. Despite this, however, he presented a handsome outward appearance — thus his appreciation of fine clothing and the expensive cloak that Wittipol had offered to him as a bribe to be allowed to talk to his wife.

“I believe anything now, although I confess that his vices are the most extreme I ever knew in nature,” Manly said. “But why does he loves the Devil so much?”

“Oh, sir!” Wittipol said. “He loves the Devil because of the hidden treasure he hopes to find, and he has proposed to himself that there is so infinite a mass of treasure to be recovered that he doesn’t care how much he transfers of his present wealth to his men of art — his conjurors — who are the race of men who may coin him: They are the kind of men who can take him and use him to make money for themselves. Make promises of mountains of gold, and the covetous are always the most prodigal.”

Conjurors were supposed to be able to get devils to tell them where treasure was hidden. Fitzdottrel believed that he would get mountains of gold, and so he was paying conjurors lots of money in anticipation of his great future wealth.

“But do you have faith that Fitzdottrel will hold to his part of the bargain?” Manly asked.

“Oh, dear sir!” Wittipol said. “He will not fail to live up to his part of the bargain. Fear him not. I know him. One baseness always accompanies another.”

Fitzdottrel’s accepting the cloak was one baseness; allowing Wittipol to speak to his wife was another.

Wittipol looked up and said, “See! He is here already, and his wife, too.”

Manly said about Fitzdottrel’s wife, “She is a wondrously beautiful creature — that statement is as true as the statement that I live is true!”

— 1.6 —

Fitzdottrel said, “Come, wife, this is the gentleman. No, don’t blush.”

“Why, what do you mean, sir?” Mrs. Frances Fitzdottrel said. “Do you still have your reason? Or have you lost your mind?”

“Wife, I don’t know that I have lent it forth to anyone, at least, without a pawn, wife, or that I’ve eaten or drunk the thing lately that should corrupt it,” Fitzdottrel said. “Therefore, gentle wife, obey me. It is thy virtue. Don’t argue with me.”

In this society, a good wife was an obedient wife.

“Aren’t you already enough the talk of feasts and meetings?” Mrs. Frances Fitzdottrel asked. “Must you make a new topic for fresh gossip?”

Fitzdottrel said, “Why, careful wedlock — that is, you, my worried wife — if I have a longing to have one more tale told about me, what is that to thee, dear heart? Why should thou resent my delight, or cross it, by being solicitous when it doesn’t concern thee?”

“This does concern me,” Mrs. Frances Fitzdottrel said. “Yes, I have a share in this. The scorn will fall as bitterly on me, where both you and me are laughed at.”

“Laughed at, sweet bird?” Fitzdottrel said. “Is that what you have scruples about? Come, come, thou are a nyas.”

A nyas is an unfledged bird. An eyas is an unfledged hawk taken out of the nest for training. These words, however, were sometimes used interchangeably. Young birds are innocent, and when they are taken out of the nest, they cry. Fitzdottrel was saying that his wife was naïve.

Fitzdottrel continued, “Which of your great houses — I will not mean at home, here, but abroad — your families in France, wife, do not send forth something within a seven-years’-time that may be laughed at? I do not say seven months, nor seven weeks, nor seven days, nor seven hours, but seven years, wife. I give them time. Once, within seven years, I think they may do something that may be laughed at, in France — I keep my opinion about this, still.”

His point was that people in great houses — higher-class people — were laughed at; therefore, he was in good company. He was patriotic, however, and so talked about families in France.

He continued, “Therefore, wife, let them who wish to always laugh at me rather than weep for me.

“Here is a cloak that cost fifty pounds, wife, which I can sell for thirty, after I have seen all London in it, and London has seen me in it.”

Engine had said that the cloak was never made for under sixty pounds, but Fitzdottrel was a good judge of clothing and knew its worth.

He continued, “Today, I go to the Blackfriars Playhouse to see The Devil is an Ass. I will sit where people can see me, salute all my acquaintance, rise up between the acts, let fall my cloak, show everyone that I am a handsome man and that I have an expensive suit of clothing — that’s the special reason why we go to the theater: to be seen. That is true of all of us who pretend to stand to show displeasure for what is on the stage.”

If a man disliked a certain playwright, that man could attend one of the playwright’s shows, and in between acts stand up with an expression of disgust and ostentatiously leave — it did not matter whether the play was good or bad. Of course, a person could also do that as a way of being the center of attention and displaying his fine clothing.

Fitzdottrel continued, “The ladies ask, who’s that? For they come to see us, love, as we come to see them. Shall I lose all this because of the false fear of being laughed at?”

He said sarcastically, “Yes, certainly!”

He then continued without sarcasm, “Let them laugh, wife. Let me have such another cloak tomorrow, and let them laugh again, wife, and again, and then grow fat with laughing, and then fatter, all my young gallants — and let them bring their friends, too, to laugh at me.

“Shall I forbid them? No, let heaven forbid them. Or let their intelligence forbid them, if intelligence has any kind of control of them.”

Fitzdottrel took her to the side and spoke privately to her: “Come, give me thy ear, wife. That is all I’ll borrow of thee.”

He said to Wittipol, “Set your watch, sir.”

He said privately to his wife, “Thou art to only listen, and not speak a word, dove, to anything he says. I tell you that in precept, and as an order. This is no less than counsel, on your wifeness, wife. Do not speak to him even if he flatters you, or courts you, or flirts with you, as you must expect him to do, or let’s say, if he rails at you — whatever his skills are, wife, I will have thee delude them with a trick, which is thy obstinate silence.

“I know advantages, and I love to hit these meddling young men at their own weapons. He will use eloquence, and your response of silence will neutralize him.”

Fitzdottrel led his wife to a place for her to stand, and he set his watch.

He then said to Wittipol, “Is your watch ready? Here my sail bears, for you.”

He said to his wife, “Tack toward him, sweet pinnacle.”

Women were often figuratively called pinnaces, which were small sailing boats; however, other meanings of “pinnacle” included “prostitute” and the sexual meaning of “mistress.”

In a way, Fitzdottrel was prostituting his wife for a cloak.

Fitzdottrel asked Wittipol, “Where’s your watch?”

Wittipol answered, “I’ll set it, sir, with yours.”

They were synchronizing their watches so they could agree when fifteen minutes had ended.

Mrs. Frances Fitzdottrel said to herself, “I must obey my husband.”

Noticing how sad she looked, Manly thought, Her modesty seems to suffer with her beauty, and so, as if his folly were away, it were worth pity.

He meant this: Because her modesty seemed to suffer with her beauty, she was worthy of pity. And if Fitzdottrel were not capable of such folly, he would be worthy of pity.

Or, possibly, he meant this: Because her modesty seemed to suffer with her beauty, then if Fitzdottrel were not capable of such folly, her modesty and her beauty — that is, she herself — would be worthy of pity. If this is what he meant, he was blaming her for marrying a fool.

Or, possibly, he meant this: Because her modesty seemed to suffer with her beauty, then if Fitzdottrel were not capable of such folly and therefore was not deserving of punishment by being made an ass of, it would be good to pity her and not continue with this situation.

Fitzdottrel compared his watch with Wittipol’s watch and said, “Now thou are right; begin, sir. But first, let me repeat the contract briefly.

“I am, sir, to freely enjoy this cloak I am wearing, as your gift, upon the condition that you may as freely speak here to my spouse your quarter of an hour, always keeping the measured distance of your yard, or more, away from my said spouse, and in my sight and hearing.”

In this society, one meaning of “yard” was “penis.”

He then asked Wittipol, “This is your covenant — your agreement — with me?”

“Yes, but you’ll allow for this time we spent just now?” Wittipol asked.

Fitzdottrel had spent a few seconds going over their covenant.

“Let’s set our watches back that much time,” Fitzdottrel said.

Changing his mind, Wittipol said, “I think I shall not need the extra time.”

“Well, begin, sir,” Fitzdottrel said. “There is your boundary, sir. Do not go beyond that rush-mat.”

“If you interrupt me, sir, I shall discloak you,” Wittipol said.

He then began speaking to Mrs. Frances Fitzdottrel:

“The time I have purchased, lady, is but short, and therefore, if I employ it thriftily, I hope I stand the nearer to my pardon. I am not here to tell you that you are fair, or lovely, or how well you dress yourself, lady; I’ll save myself that eloquence of your mirror, which can speak these things better to you than I. And it is a knowledge wherein fools may be as wise as a court parliament.”

During medieval times, a court of ladies would rule on questions of courtly love.

Wittipol continued, “Nor do I come with any prejudice — preconceived idea — or doubt that you should, to the realization of your own worth, need least revelation. She’s a simple woman who does not know her good — whoever knows her ill — and in every respect.”

A proverb stated, “Any woman is simple-minded who fails to know what’s best for her.”

Wittipol continued, “That you are the wife to so much blighted flesh as scarcely has soul, instead of salt, to keep it sweet, I think will need no witnesses to prove.”

The soul keeps the body alive and preserves it from rotting, just as salt preserves the flesh of animals for eating. Fitzdottrel’s covetousness showed that he had little soul.

Wittipol continued, “The cold sheets that you lie in, with the watching candle that sees how, dull to any thaw of beauty, bits and pieces of time, and quarter nights, half nights, and whole nights, sometimes, the devil-given elfin — malignant — squire your husband leaves you, quitting here his proper circle for a much worse one in the walks of Lincoln’s Inn, under the elms, to expect the fiend in vain there, will confess for you. All of these things are evidence of how your husband regards you.”

Wittipol was pointing out that Fitzdottrel neglected her: his wife. He left her circle — her vagina — in order to go to the walks of Lincoln’s Inn to see a conjuror’s circle in the vain hope of seeing the Devil.

“I looked for this nonsense,” Fitzdottrel said. “I expected you to say such things.”

Wittipol continued, “And what a daughter of darkness he makes you, locked up away from all society you wish to visit or object you wish to see.

“Your eye is not allowed to look upon a face under a conjurer’s — or under some mold, aka top of a head, hollow and lean like his — except but by such great means as I now make to allow you to see my face.”

Wittipol meant that Mrs. Frances Fitzdottrel was allowed to look at no male faces except those under a conjurer’s mold or crown (both words mean “top of head”) or the face that was under her husband’s mold or crown, which was hollow (due to lacking a brain) and lean (the human brain is mostly made of fat: almost 60 percent).

He continued, “Your own too acutely felt sufferings, without the extraordinary aids of spells or spirits, may assure you, lady.”

Assure her of what? Wittipol was hoping that her acutely felt sufferings would assure her that she ought to spend time with him.

“As for my part, I protest against all such practice. I work by no false arts, medicines, or charms to be said forward and backward.”

Fitzdottrel said, “No, I object —”

“Sir, I shall ease you of the burden of that cloak,” Wittipol said.

He made a motion as if he were going to take the cloak from him.

Fitzdottrel said, “I am mum.”

Wittipol said to Mrs. Frances Fitzdottrel, “Nor have I designs, lady, upon you more than this: to tell you how Love, Beauty’s good angel, he who waits upon her at all occasions, and no less than Fortune helps the adventurous, in me makes that proffer which never fair one was so fond to lose who could but reach a hand forth to her freedom.

“On the first sight I loved you; since which time, though I have travelled, I have been in travail more for this second blessing of your eyes that now I’ve purchased than for all aims else.

“Think about it, lady. Let your mind be as active as is your beauty; view your object well. Examine both my fashion and my years.

“Things that are like are soon familiar; and Nature joys still in equality.”

Wittipol was referring to two proverbs: “Like will to like” and “Marry your equal.” He did not think that Fitzdottrel was Mrs. Frances Fitzdottrel’s equal, and he did think that he himself and Mrs. Frances Fitzdottrel were alike.

He continued, “Let not the sign of the husband frighten you, lady, but before your spring is gone, enjoy it. Flowers, though fair, are often but of one morning. Think, all beauty does not last until the autumn.”

He was referring to this proverb: “Beauty does fade like a flower.” And, of course, he was advising her to seize the day: Carpe diem.

Wittipol continued, “You grow old while I tell you this. And such as cannot use the present are not wise. If Love and Fortune will take care of us, why should our will be wanting? This is all. What do you answer, lady?”

Mrs. Frances Fitzdottrel stood mute.

Her husband thought, Now the entertainment comes. Let him continue to wait, wait, wait, while the watch goes, and the time runs.

Mrs. Frances Fitzdottrel made a motion as if she would speak, and her husband thought, Wife! He shook his head at her.

“What!” Wittipol said. “You don’t speak any word? No, and so then I taste a trick in it. Worthy lady, I cannot be so false to my own thoughts of your presumed goodness to conceive this as your rudeness, which I see is imposed. Yet since your cautelous — crafty, wily — jailer here stands by you, and you’re denied the liberty of the house, let me take warrant, lady, from your silence — which always is interpreted as consent — to make your answer for you, which shall be to as good purpose as I can imagine, and what I think you’d speak.”

Since Mrs. Frances Fitzdottrel would not speak, he would speak in her behalf.

He moved Manly, his friend, in front of him.

Fitzdottrel objected, “No, no, no, no!”

Manly was beyond the rush-mat and close to Mrs. Frances Fitzdottrel.

“I shall resume, sir,” Wittipol said to Fitzdottrel.

He moved Manly back behind the rush-mat.

“Sir, what do you mean?” Manly asked Wittipol. “What are you doing?”

Wittipol said to Fitzdottrel, “One interruption more, sir, and you go into your hose and doublet, and nothing saves you. You will get no cloak.”

Because Manley was now behind the rush-mat and at least a yard’s distance from Fitzdottrel’s wife, Fitzdottrel ought not to object.

Wittipol then said to Fitzdottrel, “And therefore listen. This is for your wife.”

Manly would represent Wittipol, and Wittipol would represent Mrs. Frances Fitzdottrel and speak for her: He was going to speak the words that he wished she would say to him.

Not quite sure what was going on, Manly said to Wittipol, “You must play fair, sir.”

Wittipol said to Manly, “Stand for me, good friend. Represent me as I represent Mrs. Frances Fitzdottrel and speak for her.”

Wittipol then pretended to be Mrs. Frances Fitzdottrel and spoke the words that he wished that she would say to him:

“Truly, sir, what you have uttered about my unequal and so sordid match here, with all the circumstances of my bondage, is more than true.

“I have a husband, and a two-legged one, but he is such a moonling — a lunatic and an idiot — as no wit of man or roses can redeem from being an ass.”

In the Metamorphoses of Apuleius, a work that is sometimes called The Golden Ass, a man named Lucius is transformed into an ass. He recovers his human form by eating roses.

Wittipol continued speaking the words that he wished Mrs. Frances Fitzdottrel would say to him:

“He’s grown too much the story told by men’s mouths to escape his lading, aka burden. Should I make it my study, and plan all ways, and indeed even call mankind to help to take his burden off — why, this one act of his, to let his wife out to be courted, and at a price, proclaims his asinine nature so loudly as I am weary of my title — my legal right as his wife — to him.

“But sir, you seem a gentleman of virtue no less than of good birth, and one who in every way looks as he were of too good quality to entrap a credulous woman, or betray her.

“Since you have paid thus dearly, sir, for a visit, and made such venture on your wit and charge — the cloak — merely to see me, or at most to speak to me, I would be too stupid, or — what’s worse — too much of an ingrate if I were not to return your venture.

“Think but how I may with safety do it; I shall trust my love and honor to you, and I shall presume you’ll always husband and protect both my love and honor against this husband — who, if we chance to change his liberal ears to other ensigns, and with labor make a new beast of him, as he shall deserve, cannot complain he is unkindly dealt with.”

By committing adultery with Wittipol, she would change her husband’s ass’ ears to the horns of a cuckold. (Men with unfaithful wives were said to have invisible horns growing out of their forehead.)

Wittipol continued speaking the words he wished Mrs. Frances Fitzdottrel would say to him:

“This day he is to go to a new play, sir, from whence no fear, no, nor authority, scarcely the King’s command, sir, will restrain him, now that you have fitted him with a garment he can wear while sitting on the stage, for the mere name’s sake, were there nothing else.”

The name of the play was The Devil is an Ass. Fitzdottrel would certainly want to see a play about devils; in addition, Wittipol had made an ass of the “devil” named Fitzdottrel by successfully tempting him with a cloak.

Wittipol continued speaking the words he wished Mrs. Frances Fitzdottrel would say to him:

“And many more such journeys he will make, which, if they now or any time hereafter offer us opportunity, you hear, sir, me who’ll be as glad and eager to embrace, meet, and enjoy it as cheerfully as you.”

Wittipol now resumed his own voice and moved beside Manly and said to Mrs. Frances Fitzdottrel, "I humbly thank you, lady."

"Keep your ground, sir," Fitzdottrel said.

He did not need to say that. Wittipol was still a yard away from Fitzdottrel's wife.

"Will you be lightened by the removal of a cloak?" Wittipol said to Fitzdottrel.

Fitzdottrel said, "I am mum."

Wittipol said to Mrs. Frances Fitzdottrel, "And except that I am, by the solemn contract, thus to take my leave of you at this so envious distance, I would have taugth our lips before this to seal the happy mixture made of our souls. But we must both now yield to the necessity of our parting.

"Yet do not doubt, lady, that I can kiss, and touch, and laugh, and whisper, and do those crowning courtships, too, for which day and the public have allowed no name — but now my bargain binds me and I must leave.

"It would be a rude injury to importune you any more, or urge a noble nature to what of its own bounty it already is prone to; otherwise, I would speak. But, lady, I love so well as I will hope you'll do so, too."

Wittipol then said to Fitzdottrel, "I have finished, sir."

"Well, then, have I won?" Fitzdottrel asked.

Had he won the cloak? And had he won the contest for his wife?

"Sir," Wittipol said, "and I may win, too."

Fitzdottrel had won the cloak, but Wittipol hoped to win the wife.

Fitzdottrel said, sarcastically, “Oh, yes! No doubt of it. I’ll take care to order that my wife shall hang forth signs at the window to tell you when I am absent. Or I’ll keep three or four footmen ready always whose job shall be to run and fetch you when my wife longs to see you, sir. I’ll go and order a gilt luxurious coach for her and you to take the air in — yes, you two shall ride into Hyde Park and thence into Blackfriars so you can visit the painters, where you may see pictures, and note the most good-looking limbs, and how to make them.”

The paintings would be of lovers. Wittipol and Fitzdottrel’s wife could study the paintings so that they could imitate the positions of the lovers.

Fitzdottrel continued, “Or what do you say to a middling gossip — a female go-between or panderer — to bring you together at her lodging under pretext of teaching my wife some rare recipe for making almond milk? Ha? It shall be a part of my care for my wife.

“Good sir, may God be with you. I have kept the contract, and the cloak is mine.”

“Why, much good may it do you, sir,” Wittipol said. “It may turn out that you have bought it at a high price, although I have not sold it.”

“A pretty riddle!” Fitzdottrel said. “Fare you well, good sir.”

Fitzdottrel turned his wife around so that she was not facing Wittipol as he said to her, “Wife, turn your face this way.”

He then said, “Look at me, and think you’ve had a wicked dream, wife, and forget it.”

Manly said, “This is the strangest puppet show I ever saw.”

He had witnessed a strange performance.

Wittipol and Manly exited.

Fitzdottrel said, “Now, wife, does this fair cloak sit the worse upon me for my great sufferings, or your little patience? Does it? Do they laugh, do you think?”

His wife replied, “Why, sir, and you might see them laughing. What they think about you may be soon known by paying attention to the words of the young gentleman’s speech.”

“Young gentleman?” Fitzdottrel said. “By God’s death! You are in love with him, are you? Couldn’t he be called ‘the gentleman,’ without the ‘young’? Go up to your room again.”

“My cage, you were best to call it!” she replied.

“Yes, sing there,” Fitzdottrel said. “You’d prefer to be making blanc-manger with him at your mother’s! I know you.”

Blanc-manger is a dish made mainly of white ingredients, including fowl. Semen is white or whitish-gray, and Fitzdottrel was saying that his wife would prefer to be creating semen with Wittipol. In this society, the word “fowl” often meant “whore.”

He ordered his wife, “Go get you up to your room.”

His wife exited.

— 1.7 —

Pug the devil entered the room.

Fitzdottrel said, “How are you now! What do you say, Devil?”

“Here is a man named Engine, sir, who desires to speak with you,” Pug said.

“I thought he would bring some news about a broker!” Fitzdottrel said. “Well, let him come in, good Devil — or fetch him.”

Pug exited, and Engine entered the room.

Fitzdottrel said, “Oh, my fine Engine! What’s the affair? More cheaters?”

“No sir,” Engine said. “The wit, the brain, the great projector I told you of, has newly come to town.”

“Where is he, Engine?”

“I have brought him with me — he’s outside,” Engine said. “I brought him here even before he had time to pull off his boots, sir, but even so he was followed by people interested in conducting business with him.”

“You say that he is a projector, but what is a projector?” Fitzdottrel said. “I would like to understand that.”

Engine answered, “Why, a projector is a man, sir, who projects ways to enrich men, or to make them great, by petitions, by marriages, by undertakings, according as he sees they fancy it.”

People could petition the King for a monopoly to make a product or perform a service.

“Can’t he at all conjure?” Fitzdottrel said.

“I think he can, sir — to tell you the truth — but you know that recently the government has taken such note of conjurers, and compelled them to enter such great bonds, that the conjurers dare not practice their art,” Engine said.

“That is true,” Fitzdottrel said, “and I lie fallow for it all the while!”

In 1615, King James I had ordered the Lord Mayor of London to enforce more rigorously the laws restraining conjurors.

“Oh, sir!” Engine said. “You’ll grow the richer for the rest — the lying fallow — you are taking now.”

“I hope I shall,” Fitzdottrel said. “But Engine, you talk somewhat too much about my courses of action. My cloak-customer could tell me strange particulars.”

The cloak-customer — Wittipol — knew about Fitzdottrel’s dealings with conjurors, and Fitzdottrel believed that Engine must have told him about those dealings.

“By my means?” Engine asked.

“How else could he know about my courses of action?” Fitzdottrel said.

“You do not know, sir, what he has, and by what arts,” Engine said. “He is a moneyed man, sir, and he is as greatly involved with your almanac-men as you are!”

“Almanac-men” were men who created almanacs that contained weather predictions and medical lore. They were often astrologers.

“That gallant?” Fitzdottrel asked.

Uncomfortable, Engine changed the subject.

“You make the other man wait too long here,” Engine said, “and he is extremely punctual.”

“Is he a gallant?” Fitzdottrel asked.

“Sir, you shall see,” Engine said. “He’s in his riding suit, as he comes now from Court. But hear him speak. Minister matter to him, and then tell me whether he is a gallant.”

ACT 2 (The Devil is an Ass)

— 2.1 —

Merecraft the projector, Trains (Merecraft's manservant), and three waiters entered the room, joining Fitzdottrel and Engine. The waiters were possibly the attendants of Merecraft's clients and were waiting to get instructions from Merecraft. Or possibly they were helping Merecraft to con Fitzdottrel.

Merecraft was accurately named. His name meant "only tricks": He was a con man who preyed on the greed of his clients. By promising to make them rich, he was able to get their money for himself.

He said to Fitzdottrel, "Sir, money's a whore, a bawd, a drudge, fit to run out on errands; let her go. Via, pecunia!"

This was Latin for "The way or path, the money!" The Italian via, however, meant "away" or "leave" or "onward."

Merecraft wanted Fitzdottrel to let his money go so he — Merecraft — could possess it.

He continued, "When she's run and gone, and fled and dead, then I will fetch her again with aqua-vitae — distilled spirits — out of an old barrel. While there are lees of wine, or dregs of beer, I'll never lack money."

He would use the lees of wine or dregs of beer to distill aqua-vitae.

He continued, "Coin her out of cobwebs and dust, but I'll have her! Raise wool upon eggshells, sir, and make grass grow out of marrow-bones to make her come."

Merecraft said to the first waiter, "Commend me to your mistress. Tell her, let the thousand pounds just be had ready, and it is done."

The first waiter exited.

Merecraft said, “I would just like to see the creature of flesh and blood, the man, the prince, indeed, who could employ so many millions as I would help him to.”

Fitzdottrel said to Engine, “How he talks! Millions?”

Merecraft said to the second waiter, “I’ll give you an account of this tomorrow.”

The second waiter exited.

Merecraft said, “Yes, I will talk no less, and do it, too, if they were myriads — and without the devil, by direct means; it shall be good in law.”

He was talking about making millions without the help of conjuring. He was claiming to be able to do so legally.

King James I of England opposed conjuring.

“Sir,” Engine said.

Merecraft said to the third waiter, “Tell Master Woodcock I’ll not fail to meet him upon the Exchange at night. Tell him to have the documents there, and we’ll dispatch the business.”

A woodcock is a proverbially stupid bird.

The third waiter exited.

Merecraft turned to Fitzdottrel and said, “Sir, you are a gentleman of a good presence, a handsome man. I have considered you as a fit stock to graft honors upon. I have a project to make you a duke now.

“That you must be one, within so many months as I set down out of true reason of state, you shall not avoid it. But you must listen, then.”

“Listen?” Engine said. “Why, sir, do you doubt his ears? Alas! You do not know Master Fitzdottrel.”

“Do you doubt his ears?” meant 1) “Do you think he is deaf?” and 2) “Do you doubt that he has the ears of an ass?”

“He does not know me indeed,” Fitzdottrel said. “I thank you, Engine, for rectifying and correcting him.”

“Good!” Merecraft said.

He turned to Engine and said, “Why, Engine, then I’ll tell it to you — I see you have credit here, and I’ll not question that you can keep counsel. He shall be only an undertaker — a business partner — with me in a most feasible business. It shall cost him nothing —”

“Good, sir,” Engine said.

“— unless he wants to invest money,” Merecraft said. “But he shall lend his countenance — that I will have — to appear in it to great men, for which I’ll make him one.”

Fitzdottrel would join with him in business, and that support would help impress great men — according to Merecraft. In return for Fitzdottrel’s support, Merecraft would make Fitzdottrel a great man — or so Merecraft said he would do.

Men can be greedy for social status just as they can be greedy for money.

Merecraft continued, “He shall not open his wallet. I’ll drive his patent — execute his commission, his royal license — for him.”

King James I of England gave monopolies to people to perform certain tasks that would result in profit for them and for the Crown.

Merecraft continued, “We’ll take in — include — citizens, commoners, and aldermen to bear the expenses, and blow them off again like so many dead flies when the business is carried.”

He was saying that he and Fitzdottrel would work with other people. The other people would pay the expenses. Sharing the profits was another matter. (“Take in” also means “deceive.”)

Red flag, that.

Merecraft continued, “The thing is for recovery of drowned land, whereof the Crown will have its moiety if it be owner; else, the Crown and landowners will share that moiety, and the recoverers of the drowned land will enjoy the other moiety for their return on their investment.”

Draining a swamp recovered land that could be used for profitable purposes.

A moiety is a share or part.

“The recovery of drowned land will take place throughout England?” Engine asked.

“Yes, which will arise to eighteen millions, seven the first year,” Merecraft said. “I have computed all, and made my survey down to the last acre. I’ll begin at the hollow, the lowest ground, not at the outskirts, the edges — as some have done, and lost all that they wrought, their timber-work, their trench, their banks all borne away, or else filled up with water again by the next winter. Tut, they never went the right and best way; I’ll have it all.”

“A gallant tract of land it is!” Engine said.

“It will yield a pound an acre,” Merecraft said. “We must rent cheap, always, at first.”

He then said to Fitzdottrel, “But sir, this project looks too large for you, I see. Come hither, we’ll have a lesser project.”

He motioned to Trains, his manservant, and said, "Here's a plain fellow, you see him. He has his papers there, in a black buckram bag, and it will not be sold for the Earldom of Pancridge."

No Earldom of Pancridge exists.

Merecraft then said to Trains, "Draw one out at random, and give it to me."

Trains drew a paper out of the bag and gave it to him.

Merecraft said, "Project four. Dog skins? Twelve thousand pounds! The very worst, drawn out at first."

Twelve thousand pounds is a lot of money, but according to Merecraft, this was the worst and least profitable of his moneymaking ideas.

"Please, let's see it, sir," Fitzdottrel said.

"It is a toy, a trifle!" Merecraft said.

"A trifle!" Fitzdottrel said. "Twelve thousand pounds for dogs' skins?"

"Yes," Merecraft said, "but you must know, sir, by my way of preparing and treating the leather to a height of better-quality goods, like your borachio of Spain, sir —"

A Spanish borachio is a wine bottle made from pigskin or goatskin.

Merecraft continued, "— I can fetch nine thousand for it —"

"From the King's glover?" Engine asked.

Engine, another con man, was making it sound as if King James I of England was interested in purchasing great numbers of dog-skin gloves.

“Yes,” Merecraft said, “how did you hear that?”

“Sir, I know you can,” Engine said.

“Within this hour I can, and reserve half my secret,” Merecraft said.

He said to Engine, “Pluck another paper. See if thou have a more fortunate hand than Trains.”

Engine plucked out a second paper: one marked “Bottle-ale.”

Merecraft said, “I thought so. The very next worse to it! Bottle-ale. Yet, this is two-and-twenty thousand! Please pull out another two or three papers.”

“Good man,” Fitzdottrel said. “Wait, friend, by bottle-ale, you can make twenty-two thousand pounds?”

“Yes, sir,” Merecraft said. “It’s calculated to a penny-halfpenny-farthing. On the back of the paper, you may see it there. Read it.

“I will not reduce a harrington of the sum.”

A harrington is a farthing; it was named for Lord Harrington, who had a patent from the King that allowed him to coin farthings.

Merecraft continued, “I’ll win the sum in my water for making ale, and my malt, my furnaces, and the hanging of my copper vessels, the barreling, and the subtlety of my yeast, and then the earth — the clay — of my bottles, which I dig, turn up, and steep, and work, and fire in a kiln myself to a degree of porcelain.

“You will wonder at my calculations of what I will put up in seven years! For so long a time I ask for my invention.”

It would take seven years to produce and age the ale.

Merecraft continued, “I will save in cork, in my mere stoppering of the bottles, above three thousand pounds within that period of time, by gouging out the stoppers just to the size of my bottles, and not slicing the cork. There’s infinite loss in slicing the cork.”

Engine drew out another paper, which was marked “Raisins.”

“What have thou there?” Merecraft asked. “Oh, making wine out of raisins; this is in hand, now.”

Engine asked, “Isn’t it strange, sir, to make wine out of raisins?”

“Yes,” Merecraft said, “and as true a wine as the wines of France, or Spain, or Italy. Look at what kind of grape my raisin is, that wine I’ll render perfectly. From the muscatel grape, I’ll render muscatel wine. From the canary grape, I’ll render canary wine. From the claret grape, I’ll render claret wine. This is true of all kinds of grape, and I’ll lessen the prices of wine throughout the kingdom by fifty percent.”

“But, sir, what if you raze — wipe out — the other commodity: raisins?” Engine asked.

He was making a joke: punning on “raze” and “raisin.”

“Why, then I’ll make it out of blackberries, and it shall do the same,” Merecraft said. “It will just take more skill, and the expense will be less.

“Take out another paper.”

Fitzdottrel said, “No, good sir. Save yourself the trouble. I’ll neither look nor hear about any project but your first, there — the drowned land — if it will do as you say.”

Merecraft said, “Sir, there’s no place to give you demonstration of these things. They are a little too subtle.”

Red flag, that.

He continued, “But I could show you that the recovery of drowned land is so necessary that you must end up being what you want to be: a duke.

“You will become a duke despite the popular misconception that England bears no dukes.”

For many years in England there were no dukes, but with the accession of King James I, dukes had again appeared in England.

Merecraft said to Fitzdottrel, “If you will keep the land, sir; the greatness of the estate shall throw a dukedom upon you.

“But if you prefer to turn the estate to money instead of keeping the land, what may not you, sir, purchase with that wealth? Say you should part with two of your millions, to be the thing you would be — a duke — who would not do it?

“I say that I myself will, out of my dividend, bid for some pretty principality in Italy, outside the jurisdiction of the church.

“Now you, perhaps, fancy the mists of England rather? But — do you have a private room, sir, for us to withdraw to, to talk in more detail about this project?”

“Oh, yes,” Fitzdottrel said.

He called, “Devil!”

Merecraft said, “These, sir, are businesses that need to be carried out with caution, and in a cloud of secrecy.”

Red flag, that.

“I apprehend that they need to be done so, sir,” Fitzdottrel replied.

Pug entered the room, and Fitzdottrel asked, "Devil, where is your mistress?"

"She is above, sir, in her chamber," Pug replied.

"Oh, that's well," Fitzdottrel said.

He then said to Merecraft, "Then go this way, good sir."

"I shall follow you," Merecraft said.

He then said, "Trains, give me the bag, and go immediately to commend my service to my Lady Tailbush. Tell her I have come from court this morning; say that I've got our business moved, and well. Entreat her to give you the fourscore angels — eighty coins — and see that they are disposed of to my counsel, the lawyer Sir Paul Eitherside. Sometime today I'll wait upon her Ladyship and give her my report."

Trains exited quickly.

Engine said, "Sir, how quickly Trains acts. Do you see?"

Merecraft asked, "Engine, when did you see my cousin Everill? Does he still stay at your quarter in the Bermudas?"

The Bermudas were a bad part of London.

"Yes, sir," Engine said. "He was writing this morning very intensely."

"Don't let him know that I have come to town," Merecraft said. "I have arranged some business for him, but I would take the business to him before he has time to think about it."

Red flag, that.

"Is it past?" Engine asked.

"Not yet," Merecraft said. "It is well on the way."

"Oh, sir!" Engine said. "Your Worship takes infinite pains."

“I love friends to be active,” Merecraft said. “A sluggish nature puts off man and woman.”

“And such a blessing follows it,” Engine said.

“I thank my fate,” Merecraft said.

He then said to Fitzdottrel, “Please, let’s go somewhere private, sir —”

“In here,” Fitzdottrel said.

“— where none may interrupt us,” Merecraft said.

He and Engine went into the private room.

Fitzdottrel said to Pug, “Listen, Devil. Lock the street doors fast, and let no one in — unless they are this gentleman’s followers — to trouble me.

“Have you been paying attention? You’ve heard and seen something today, and by it you may gather that my wife is a fruit that’s worth the stealing, and therefore she is worth the watching.

“Be sure, now, that you’ve all your eyes about you; and let in no lace-woman, nor bawd who brings French masks and cut-work embroidery.

“Do you understand? Let in no old crones who sell wafers and convey letters. Let in no youths disguised like country wives with cream and marrow-puddings. Much knavery may be conveyed in a pudding, much bawdy intelligence; they’re shrewd ciphers.

“Do not turn the key to any neighbor’s need, whether it be only to kindle fire, or beg a little fire — put the fire out, instead. Put it all out, to ashes, so that they may see no smoke.

“Or if neighbors need water, spill it; knock on the empty tubs, so that by the sound the neighbors may be forbidden entry.

“Say that we have been robbed if anyone comes to borrow a spoon, or something else.

“I will not have ‘good fortune’ or ‘God’s blessing’ let in while I am busy.”

Beggars would say, “Good fortune” or “God’s blessing,” while begging.

Pug said, “I’ll take care of it, sir. They shall not trouble you, even if they want to.”

“Well, do what I tell you to do,” Fitzdottrel said.

He joined Merecraft and Engine in the private room.

— 2.2 —

Pug said, “I have no singular service of this now, nor no superlative master!”

Pug had come to London to do villainy, but there was nothing singular about that because Londoners were already doing lots of villainy. Also, his master was not superlative. Pug’s chief, Satan, wished to do evil, but Pug’s earthly master, Fitzdottrel, was doing lots of evil. But Fitzdottrel was not a superlative master because so many people were willing and certainly seemed capable of doing evil to him.

Pug continued, “I shall wish to be in Hell again, and at my leisure!”

And why should he not be at leisure in Hell? People such as Fitzdottrel and Merecraft were already doing lots of evil. Even such a man as Wittipol was devoting himself to tempting a married woman to commit adultery.

Pug continued, "Should I bring a Vice from Hell? That would be as crafty a scheme as to bring broadcloth here to England, or to transport fresh oranges into Spain."

There was no need to transport fresh oranges into Spain because Spain had lots of fresh oranges. There was no need to bring broadcloth here to England because England had lots of broadcloth. There was no need to bring a Vice from Hell to London because London had lots of vice.

He continued, "I find out the truth now. My chief was in the right. Can any fiend boast of a better Vice than by nature and practice they're already owners of here?"

"May Hell never own me if I am not impressed by such villainy as is here in London! The fine appeal of it pulls me along! To hear men grown such experts in our subtlest sciences!"

Certainly Merecraft was an expert in the art of conning greedy men.

Pug then said, "My first act now shall be to make this master of mine a cuckold. I will practice the earliest work of darkness!

"I will deserve so well of my fair mistress, by my revelations and useful information first, my advisory counsels afterward, and keeping secret counsel after that, as whosoever is one who sleeps with her, I'll be another; to be sure, I'll have my share. Most delicate damned flesh she will be!"

Pug intended to be one of those who slept with Mrs. Frances Fitzdottrel and cuckolded her husband.

He continued, "Oh, that I could delay time now! Midnight will come too fast upon me, I fear, to cut my pleasure —"

At midnight he would return to Hell, thus cutting the amount of time he would have to sleep with Mrs. Frances Fitzdottrel. Indeed, if midnight came fast enough, he would have no time to sleep with Mrs. Frances Fitzdottrel.

Mrs. Frances Fitzdottrel entered the room and said, "Go to the back door. Someone is knocking; see who it is."

Pug said to himself as he exited, "Dainty she-devil!"

Alone, Mrs. Frances Fitzdottrel said to herself, "I cannot get this venture of the cloak out of my fancy, nor the gentlemanly way Wittipol took, which, though it was strange, yet it was handsome, and had a grace that was beyond the originality.

"Surely he will think me that dull stupid creature he talked about, and may end his attempt to seduce me, if I don't find a way to thank him. He did presume, knowing that I was thinking about it, that I would give him an answer; and he will swear that my brain is very barren if it can yield him no return."

Pug returned.

Mrs. Frances Fitzdottrel asked him, "Who is it at the back door?"

Pug said, "Mistress, it is — but first, let me assure the very best of mistresses that I am, although my master's manservant, my mistress' slave, the servant of her secrets and sweet actions, and I know what fitly will conduce to either."

"What's this? I tell you to come to yourself and think what your job is: to make an answer to my question. Tell me this: Who is it at the door?"

"The gentleman, mistress, who paid the price of a cloak to speak with you this morning, and who expects only to take some small commandments from you — whatever commandments you please that are worthy your form, he says, and your gentlest manners.”

“Oh!” she said. “You’ll soon prove to be his hired man, I fear. What has he given you for this message?”

“Sir, tell him to put off his hopes of straw and stop spreading his nets in full view like this.”

“Hopes of straw” are “no hopes.” The purpose of the net was to capture her the way that a woodsman would capture a bird.

She continued, “Although the nets may capture Master Fitzdottrel, I am no such fowl — nor a fair one, tell him — who will be had with stalking.

“And tell him to not appear to me at the gentleman’s chamber-window in Lincoln’s Inn there, that opens to my gallery.”

The Fitzdottrels lived next to Lincoln’s Inn. Mrs. Frances Fitzdottrel’s gallery — a large reception room — was close to a window at Lincoln’s Inn.

She continued, “If he does not, I swear that I will acquaint my husband with his folly and leave him to the just rage of his offended jealousy. Or if your master’s sense will be not so quick to right me, tell him I shall find a friend who will repair — mend — me. Say I will be quiet in my own house! I tell you, in those words give my message to him.”

Her words could be interpreted as a coded message to Wittipol, telling him to 1) communicate with her by making use of the window at Lincoln’s Inn, 2) be her “friend” — a word that can mean “lover” — who would mend her, perhaps in bed, and 3) know that she will be quiet in her own house — for example, when her husband was gone.

But her words were deliberately misleading and ambiguous in order to fool Pug: She wanted Pug to think that she was telling Wittipol that he should not appear at the window in Lincoln's Inn. The word "friend" did not have to mean "lover." The word "quiet" could mean "unmolested."

Pug said to himself, "This is some fool turned!"

"Turned" meant "out of his — or was it her — wits."

Perhaps he meant, "Wittipol is a fool whom my mistress is turning away."

He exited to give Wittipol her message to him.

Mrs. Frances Fitzdottrel said to herself, "If Wittipol is the master now of that state and intelligence which I think that he is, surely he will understand me.

"I dare not be more direct because I find already that this officious fellow, my husband's new servant, is a spy my husband has set upon me.

"Yet, if Pug just tells Wittipol my message using my words, Wittipol cannot but know that he is both understood and requited.

"I would not have him think he met a statue, or spoke to someone who was not there, although I remained silent when he spoke to me in my husband's presence."

Pug returned, and she asked him, "What is your news? Have you told him my message?"

"Yes," Pug replied.

"And what does he say?" she asked.

"What does he say?" Pug said, "He says that which I myself would say to you, if I dared.

“He says that you are proud, sweet mistress, and also that you are a little ignorant — that you don’t know enough to entertain the good that’s proffered to you by him.

“And, pardon me for saying this to one as beautiful as you, he says that you are not all as wise as some true politic — crafty — wife would be, who, having married such a nupson, such a simpleton — my apology to my master — whose face has left to accuse him now, for it confesses him what you can make him, but will yet, out of scruple and a spiced — dainty — conscience, defraud the poor gentleman, or at least delay him in the thing he longs for and makes it his whole study how to compass only a title. If he would just write cuckold as his title, he would have what he deserved.”

According to Wittipol — and Pug — Fitzdottrel had a face that accused him of being a fool who deserved to be a cuckold, although he was not yet one, due to the dainty conscience of his wife. If Mrs. Frances Fitzdottrel were like other wives, the ones who were crafty, she would help him get what he wanted: a title. True, the title that he wanted was the title of duke, but she could give him the title that he deserved: the title of cuckold.

Pug continued, “For, look you —”

Mrs. Frances Fitzdottrel thought, This can be nothing but my husband’s plan.

Pug was not talking to her the way a servant should. A servant would relay Wittipol’s message, but Pug was adding that Wittipol’s message is what he himself would say to her. Wittipol wanted her to commit adultery with him, and Pug was saying the same thing but about himself. Mrs. Frances Fitzdottrel believed that this was a trap that her husband had set for her.

Pug continued, “— my precious mistress —”

Mrs. Frances Fitzdottrel thought, It creaks his engine — his trickery creaks. This servant would never dare otherwise to be so saucy if my husband had not put him up to this.

Pug continued, “— if it were not clearly his worshipful ambition, and the top of it, the very forked top, too” — readers should be thinking of the horned top of a cuckold — “why should he keep you thus walled up in a back room, mistress, never allow you a window opening to the street due to his fear of your becoming pregnant by the eyes with gallants? Why should he forbid you paper, pen, and ink, as if they were rat poison? Why should he search your half pint of muscatel lest a letter be sunk in the pot? And why would he hold your newly laid egg against the fire, lest any charm be written in invisible ink there?”

Lemon juice makes a good invisible ink. When heated, the dried juice turns brown and what is written becomes visible.

Pug continued, “Will you make yourself a benefit from knowing the truth, dear mistress, if I tell the truth to you? I don’t do it often!

“I am set over you, employed, indeed, to watch your steps, your looks, even your breaths, and report them to him.

“Now, if you will be a true, right, delicate, sweet mistress, why, we will make a cokes — a fool — of this ‘wise’ master. We will, my mistress, make of him an absolute fine cokes — and we will openly mock all the deep diligences of such a solemn and effectual ass, an ass to so good purpose as we’ll use him.

“I will contrive it so that you shall go to plays, to masques, to meetings, and to feasts.

“For why have all this rigging and fine tackle, mistress — all this fine clothing — if you neat handsome vessels of good sail do not ever and often put forth with your nets abroad into the world? It is your fishing.

“There you shall choose your friends, your servants, lady, your squires of honor.”

These friends, servants, and squires of honor would be her lovers.

Pug continued, “I’ll convey your letters, fetch answers, do you all the offices that can belong to your blood and beauty.

“And for the variety, when I am inclined, although I am not in due symmetry the man of that proportion, or in rule of medical science of the just complexion, or of that truth of fine fashion in clothes to boast a sovereignty over ladies, yet I know how to do my turns as a lover, sweet mistress.”

Pug was offering himself as a lover — for variety — to Mrs. Frances Fitzdottrel. In doing so, he was engaging in false modesty, calling himself a man without a fine body, a fine face, or fine clothes. Actually, the hanged cutpurse whose body Pug had possessed had a fine body and a fine face, and Pug had gotten fine clothes elsewhere.

Pug continued, “Come, kiss —”

“What is this!” Mrs. Frances Fitzdottrel said.

Pug said, “Dear delicate mistress, I am your slave, your little worm that loves you, your fine monkey, your dog, your servant, your pug, that longs to be styled one of your pleasures!”

Thinking that this was a trap and that her husband was watching, Mrs. Frances Fitzdottrel said loudly, “Did you hear all this? Sir, please come out from your hiding place so you can applaud your servant who so well follows your instructions!”

Fitzdottrel entered the room and asked, “What is it, sweetheart? What’s the matter?”

“Good man!” his wife said, sarcastically. “You are a stranger to the plot! You did not set your saucy Devil here to tempt your wife with all the insolent uncivil language or action he could vent and express?”

She still believed that he had used Pug to set a trap for her.

Fitzdottrel asked Pug, “Did you do that, Devil?”

Mrs. Frances Fitzdottrel said, “Not you? Weren’t you planted in your hole upon the stairs so you could hear him? Or weren’t you here, behind the wall hangings? Don’t I know your personal character? Did he dare to do it without you giving him directions? That is not possible!”

“You shall see, wife,” Fitzdottrel said, “whether he dared to do it on his own, or not, and what it was I directed him to do.”

He left, but immediately returned, carrying a cudgel.

“Sweet mistress, are you mad?” Pug asked.

He could guess who the cudgel was for, and he would like to get out of a beating by lying and blaming his mistress for giving false information to her husband.

“You most absolute rogue!” Fitzdottrel said to Pug. “You open and clearly revealed villain! You fiend apparent, you! You declared Hell-hound!”

He began to beat Pug with the cudgel.

“Good sir!” Pug said.

“Good knave, good rascal, and good traitor!” Fitzdottrel said. “Now I find you to be part-devil indeed. Upon the point of trust? In your first charge? The very day of your probation? To tempt your mistress?”

Pug’s job had been to keep Fitzdottrel’s wife from committing adultery, yet he was attempting to persuade her to commit adultery.

Fitzdottrel said to his wife, “You see, good wedlock — good wife — how I directed him.”

“Why, where, sir, were you?” Mrs. Frances Fitzdottrel asked.

If he hadn’t been spying on her, then where had he been?

Fitzdottrel paused and then hit Pug again with the cudgel.

He said to Pug, “There is one more blow, for exercise; I told you I would do it.”

He had said that he would beat Pug if Pug displeased him. He also had said that he beat his servant for exercise.

Pug replied, “I wish that you were done beating me!”

Fitzdottrel said, “Oh, wife, the rarest, most splendid man!”

He struck Pug again and said, “Yet there’s another blow to help you remember the last one.”

He said to his wife, “Such a splendid man, wife, is inside! He has his projects, and he vents them. They are the gallantest projects!”

He said to Pug, “Were you tentiginous — horny? Ha? Would you be acting like an incubus, an evil spirit that sleeps with women at night? Did her silks’ rustling excite you?”

“Gentle sir!” Pug said.

“Get out of my sight!” Fitzdottrel shouted. “If thy name were not Devil, thou would not stay a minute with me. Go in! Yet stay. Yet go, too. I have decided what I will do; and you shall know it beforehand — as soon as the gentleman has gone, do you hear? I’ll help your lispings.”

Pug, who had been sputtering, exited.

“Wife, such a man, wife!” Fitzdottrel said. “He has such plots! He will make me a duke! No less, by heaven. You will have six mares to your coach, wife! That’s your share. And your coachman will be bald because he shall be bare enough!”

It was the fashion for the coachmen of rich ladies to be bareheaded.

“Don’t you laugh,” Fitzdottrel added. “We are looking for a place all over the map for me to be duke of. Have faith, and don’t be an infidel when it comes to me. You know I am not easily gulled and made a fool of.

“I swear, when I have my millions, I’ll make another woman a duchess, if you don’t have faith in me.”

“You’ll have too much, I fear, in these false spirits,” Mrs. Frances Fitzdottrel said.

She believed that he would invest too much money in conjurors: Her husband had not yet identified the man he had been talking to.

“Spirits? Oh, no such thing, wife!” Fitzdottrel said. “Wit, mere wit! I’m talking about intelligence and skill. This man defies the devil and all his works! He does his work by the use of ingenuity and devices, he does! He has his winged plows that go with sails and plow forty acres at once! And he has mills that will spout out water from ten miles away!

“All Crowland is ours, wife; and the fens, from us in Norfolk to the utmost bound of Lincolnshire!”

Crowland was a town in marshy territory in the north of England. Fitzdottrel was hoping to drain the marshes, aka fens, and make a huge profit from the recovered land.

Fitzdottrel continued, “We have viewed it, and measured it within all, by the scale! It is the richest tract of land, love, in the kingdom! There will be made seventeen or eighteen millions, or more, depending on how well it is handled! Therefore think, sweetheart: If thou have a fancy to one place more than another to be duchess of, name it now. I will have it, whatever it costs, if it will be had for money, either here, or in France, or in Italy.”

“You have strange fantasies!” his wife replied.

— 2.4 —

“Where are you, sir?” Merecraft called.

Merecraft and Engine entered the room.

Fitzdottrel said to his wife, “I see thou have no talent in this area of expertise, wife. Go up to thy gallery; go, chuck. Leave us who understand it alone to talk about it.”

“Chuck” was a term of endearment, but it need not necessarily be said endearingly.

Mrs. Frances Fitzdottrel exited.

“I think we have found a place to fit you now, sir: Gloucester,” Merecraft said.

“Oh no, I’ll have nothing to do with Gloucester!” Fitzdottrel said.

“Why not, sir?” Merecraft said.

“It is fatal,” Fitzdottrel said.

Many dignitaries of Gloucester had died violently or under suspicious circumstances.

“You are right,” Merecraft said. “Spenser, I think, the younger, had his last honor from Gloucester. But he was only an earl.”

Hugh le Despenser’s father-in-law had been the Earl of Gloucester. When his father-in-law died, Hugh le Despenser was sometimes called the Earl of Gloucester.

“I did not know that, sir,” Fitzdottrel said. “But Thomas of Woodstock, I’m sure, was Duke of Gloucester, and he was made away with at Calais, as Duke Humphrey was at Bury. And King Richard III — you know what end he came to.”

Thomas of Woodstock, Duke of Gloucester, was murdered in 1397.

Duke Humphrey of Gloucester was the Lord Protector of King Henry VI; he died under suspicious circumstances in 1447.

King Richard III, who was another Duke of Gloucester, died in 1485 in the Battle of Bosworth.

“By my faith, you are knowledgeable in the contents of the historical chronicle, sir,” Merecraft said.

“No, I confess I have my history from the playbooks, and I think they’re more authentic than the historical chronicle,” Fitzdottrel said.

Plays such as William Shakespeare’s histories were popular on the stage, but Shakespeare and other playwrights of the time did such things as compress time: Events that took years in real life could seem to take only a few days when presented on the stage. Playwrights also invented characters and ignored facts when convenient for their purposes.

“That’s surely true, sir,” Engine said.

“What do you say to being duke of this, then?” Fitzdottrel asked.

He said quietly the name of a place.

“No, a noble house lays claim to that,” Fitzdottrel said. “I will do no man wrong.”

“Then listen to one more proposition,” Merecraft said, “and hear it as past exception.”

“What’s that?” Fitzdottrel asked.

“To be duke of those lands you shall recover. Take your title from there, sir: Duke of the Drowned-lands, or Duke of the Drowned-land.”

“Ha! That last has a good sound! I like it well,” Fitzdottrel said. “The Duke of Drowned-land!”

“Yes,” Engine said. “It’s a name like Green-land, sir, if you notice.”

“Aye, and drawing thus your honor from the work, you make the reputation of that work greater, and that reputation will stay the longer in your name,” Merecraft said.

Every time people heard “the Duke of Drowned-land,” they would remember the great task of draining the swampland. Since Fitzdottrel would be the Duke of Drowned-land, the glory of draining the swampland would for a long time be attached to his name.

“That’s true,” Fitzdottrel said. “Drowned-lands will live in Drowned-land! The memory of Drowned-lands will live in the title of Duke of Drowned-land!”

Merecraft said, “Yes, it will live on in the title when you have no foot of land left, as that must be, sir, one day.”

If Fitzdottrel invested Merecraft’s schemes, he very well could have no foot of land left one day.

Merecraft continued, “And, even though it tarry in your heirs some forty, fifty descents, yet the longer liver must at last thrust them out of it, if no quirk or quibble in law or odd vice of their own doesn’t do it first.”

He was saying that eventually the recovered land would pass out of the possession of Fitzdottrel’s descendants: Someone else would own it. Perhaps the land would be left to the longer-lived of two people: one of Fitzdottrel’s descendants and perhaps the descendant’s creditor. If the creditor lived longer, the creditor would possess the recovered land. If the creditor happened to be a lawyer, the lawyer would possess the land.

Merecraft continued, “We see those changes daily. The fair lands that were the client’s are the lawyer’s now, and those rich manors there of goodman tailor’s had once more wood upon them than the yard by which they were measured out for the last purchase.”

One of Fitzdottrel’s descendants could overspend so much on extravagant clothing that the tailor would end up possessing the land.

“Nature has these vicissitudes. She makes no man a state of perpetuity, sir.”

“You’re in the right,” Fitzdottrel said. “Let’s go in, then, and conclude our business.”

Pug entered the room.

Seeing Pug, Fitzdottrel said, “Are you in my sight again? I’ll talk with you soon.”

Fitzdottrel, Merecraft, and Engine exited.

— 2.5 —

Alone, Pug said to himself, “Surely, he will geld — castrate — me if I stay. Or worse, he will pluck out my tongue. He will do one of the two.

“This fool, there is no trusting him. And to quit him would be a show of contempt against my chief past pardon.

“It was a shrewd disheartening this, at first! Who would have thought a woman so well harnessed, or rather well-caparisoned, indeed, who wears such petticoats and lace to her smocks, broad laces to cover the seams in her stockings (as I see them hang there), and garters that are lost, if she can show them, could have done this? Hell!”

Pug was wondering how Mrs. Frances Fitzdottrel could dress so well and yet be so resistant to committing adultery. Why would a woman dress so well if not to attract someone who would beg a garter as a gift to treasure?

He continued, “Why is she dressed so splendidly? It cannot be to please Duke Dottrel, surely, nor the dull pictures of ancestors that hang in her gallery, nor to please her own dear reflection in her mirror.”

A dottrel is a stupid bird.

Pug continued, “Yet that last one may be true: I have known many women to begin their pleasure, but none to end it, there — that last one I consider to be right, as I think about it. Women may, for lack of better company, or lack of company that they think the better, spend an hour, or two, or three, or four, discoursing with their shadow, aka reflection. But surely they have a farther speculation. No woman dressed with so much care and study dresses herself in vain.”

According to Pug, any woman who dressed so well and had such a husband must be looking for a lover.

“I’ll consider this problem a little more before I leave it, surely.”

He exited.

— 2.6 —

Wittipol and Manly appeared together at the window of Manly’s chamber, which was opposite the Fitzdottrels’ house. The two buildings were next to each other. Indeed, these two houses were so close together that two people — each leaning out a window in each house — could touch. The window of the Fitzdottrels’ house was for a long gallery of pictures where Mrs. Frances Fitzdottrel could walk.

Wittipol intended to talk to Mrs. Frances Fitzdottrel.

“This is better luck than I could imagine,” Wittipol said. “This turns out to be thy chamber — I thought that finding a window I could access to get close to the Fitzdottrels’ house would be my greatest trouble!”

Remembering the instructions Mrs. Frances Fitzdottrel had given to him through Pug, he said, “This must be the very window and that must be the very room she talked about.”

The room was the gallery in the Fitzdottrels’ house. Mrs. Frances Fitzdottrel could look out a window of the room and see Manly’s window.

“You are right — it is,” Manly said. “I now remember that I have often seen there in the gallery a woman, but I never noticed her much. I certainly never looked at her closely.”

“Where was your soul, friend?” Wittipol asked.

He could not imagine someone’s seeing Mrs. Frances Fitzdottrel and not wanting to look at her closely.

Manly replied, "In faith, but now and then awake to those objects."

Truly, at times he could notice and be greatly affected by the beauty of a woman.

"You claim to," Wittipol said. "Let me not live if I am not in love more with her intelligence that she showed in giving me her instructions for me to go to this window now than with her bodily form, though I have praised that prettily since I saw her and you today."

Wittipol then gave Manly a paper, on which was the copy of the lyrics of a song.

He then said, "Read those lyrics. They'll go with the air — the tune — you love so well. Try them to the note; maybe the music will call her here sooner."

Mrs. Frances Fitzdottrel appeared at her window.

Wittipol said to Manly, "By God's light, she's here! Sing quickly."

Mrs. Frances Fitzdottrel was worried that her instructions to Wittipol to come to the window had not been understood or properly communicated.

She said to herself, "Either Wittipol did not understand Pug, or else Pug was not faithful in the delivery of what I told him to speak. And I am justly paid, I who might have made my profit from his service, but by mistakenly trying to give him secret instructions I have drawn his ill-will upon and done the worse injury to myself."

Manly sang the lyrics Wittipol had given to him:

"See the chariot at hand here of Love,

"Wherein my lady rides!

*“Each that draws is a swan or a dove,
“And well the car Love guides.
“As she goes, all hearts do duty
“Unto her beauty;
“And enamoured, do wish, so they might
“But enjoy such a sight,
“That they still were to run by her side,
“Through swords, through seas, whither she would ride.”*

Mrs. Frances Fitzdottrel said, “What! Music? Then Wittipol may be there — and there he is, to be sure.”

Hearing the song, Pug entered the scene.

Seeing Mrs. Frances Fitzdottrel and Wittipol, he said, “Oh, is that the way it is? Is this here the interview between these two? Have I drawn close to you at last, my cunning lady? The devil is an ass! Fooled off, and beaten! The devil made an instrument, and could not scent it!

“Well, since you’ve shown the malice of a woman to be no less than her true wit and learning, mistress, I’ll try if little Pug has the malignity to pay you back, and so get out of the danger he is in. It is not the pain, but the discredit of it. The devil would not keep a body unbeaten!”

Pug now occupied a human body, but he feared most — more than the actual beating — being mocked in Hell for not being successful at keeping that body from being beaten.

Pug exited to find Fitzdottrel.

Mrs. Frances Fitzdottrel stepped to the window, which was open.

The window she was at and the window Wittipol was at were very close together. Many buildings in medieval timber-frame building were jettied. The upper floor of a building projected beyond the floor under it. In the days before air conditioning, windows were often open in good weather.

Mrs. Frances Fitzdottrel and Wittipol could easily touch each other.

Wittipol said to Manly, "Away, fall back. She is coming."

"I'll leave you, sir," Manly said. "You will be the master of my chamber. I have business elsewhere."

He exited.

"Mistress!" Wittipol called.

Mrs. Frances Fitzdottrel came over to him and said, "You make me paint my cheeks, sir."

She meant that she was blushing.

"They're fair colors, lady, and they are natural colors, not artificial cosmetics," Wittipol said.

They were very close together — within touching distance.

He added, "I did receive some commands from you lately, gentle lady, but they were so coded and wrapped in the delivery that I am afraid I may have misinterpreted them, but still I must make suit to be near your grace."

"Who is there with you, sir?" Mrs. Frances Fitzdottrel asked.

"There is no one but myself," he said. "It turned out, lady, that this is a dear friend's lodging, and so good fortune is conspiring with your poor servant's blessed affections to make his wishes come true."

"Who was singing?" Mrs. Frances Fitzdottrel asked.

“My friend was singing, lady, but he’s gone because I asked him to leave when I saw you approach the window. You need not fear or doubt him if he were here. He is too much a gentleman to reveal your secrets.”

Mrs. Frances Fitzdottrel said, “Sir, if you judge me by this simple action, and by the outward habit — the way it looks — and appearance of easy conformity with your plan, you may with justice say I am a woman, and a strange woman.”

A strange woman is an immodest woman. Some strange women are prostitutes.

“But when you shall please to bring but that concurrence of my fortune to memory, which today yourself did urge, it may beget some favor like an excuse, though none like reason.”

She meant that if he would remember the words he had spoken to her earlier, he would likely excuse her actions now, even if they seemed out of line with reason.

These are among the words Wittipol had spoken when he was speaking as if he were her:

“But sir, you seem a gentleman of virtue no less than of good birth, and one who in every way looks as he were of too good quality to entrap a credulous woman, or betray her.”

Certainly Wittipol’s actions seemed out of line with the description of his looks: He had been trying to convince her to commit adultery.

Responding to the notion that her actions were out of line with reason, Wittipol said, “Reason has no part in your actions, my tuneful, sweet-voiced mistress? Then surely Love has no reason, and Beauty has no reason, and Nature is not violated in both Love and Beauty. You speak at once with all the gentle tongues of Reason, Love, Beauty, and Nature.”

According to Wittipol, it was completely in accordance with Reason that she commit adultery with him — and also completely in accordance with Love, Beauty, and Nature.

He continued, “I thought I had enough removed already that scruple from your breast, and left you all reason, when, through my morning’s perspective, I showed you a man so beyond excuse that he is the cause for why anything is to be done upon him, and nothing that injures him is to be called a misplaced injury.”

In other words, he had used a perspective — a metaphorical microscope — to help her closely examine her husband and realize that he was such a man that any kind of evil could be done to him and no one could say that it was undeserved.

Wittipol continued, “I rather had hope now to show you how Love by his intimate accesses grows more natural, and what was done this morning with such force was but then devised to serve the present.”

He grew more familiar in his courtship and intimate accesses, playing with her breasts, kissing her hands, etc.

These are liberties indeed, and Mrs. Frances Fitzdottrel’s husband had definitely let her know earlier that she was not to allow Wittipol to touch her. What’s going on here? Possibly 1) she was sexually attracted to Wittipol, 2) she was rebelling against her husband, 3) she was manipulating Wittipol because she wanted him to do something for her, or 4) some combination of the above.

Wittipol continued, “Since Love has the honor to approach these sister-swelling breasts, and touch this soft and rosy hand, he has the skill to draw their nectar forth with kissing, and could make more wanton leaps from this brave promontory down to this valley” — he moved a hand from a nipple toward her vulva — “than the nimble deer could play the hopping sparrow about these nets, and could play the sporting squirrel in these crisped, tightly curled groves” — he was referring to her pubic hair.

Deer can leap, sparrows can hop, squirrels can enjoy entertainment, but Love has its own action that outperforms each of these others.

He continued, “Love can bury himself in every silkworm’s cocoon that is here unraveled.”

In a non-aroused state, the walls of the vagina touch each other. In a sexually aroused state, the clitoris, labia minora, labia majora, and vagina swell as blood rushes to these areas. It is as if the vulva is opening like a flower.

“Love can run into the snare that every hair is.

“Love can cast into a curl to catch a Cupid flying.

“Love can bathe himself in milk and roses here, and dry himself there.

“Love can warm his cold hands to play with this smooth, round, and well-turned chin, as with the billiard ball.

“Love can roll on these lips, the banks of love, and there at once both plant and gather kisses.

“Lady, shall I, with what I have made today here, call all sense to wonder, and all faith to sign the mysteries revealed in your bodily form? And will Love pardon me the blasphemy I uttered when I said a looking-glass could speak this beauty, or that fools had power to judge it?”

He then sang:

“Do but look on her eyes! They do light —

“All that Love’s world comprises!

“Do but look on her hair! It is bright

*“As Love’s star [Venus] when it rises!
“Do but mark [look closely], her forehead’s smoother
“Than words that soothe her!
“And from her arched brows, such a grace
“Sheds itself through the face,
“As alone, there triumphs to the life,
“All the gain, all the good, of the elements’ strife!
“Have you seen but a bright lily grow
“Before rude hands have touched it?
“Have you marked but the fall of the snow
“Before the soil has smutched [smudged] it?
“Have you felt the wool of the beaver?
“Or swan’s down, ever?
“Or have smelt of the bud of the briar?
“Or the nard [aromatic ointment] in the fire?
“Or have tasted the honeybag of the bee?
“Oh, so white! Oh, so soft! Oh, so sweet is she!”*

— 2.7 —

Fitzdottrel appeared behind his wife.

Pug appeared on the street below the two buildings.

Fitzdottrel said to himself, “Is she so, sir?”

He meant: Is my wife attempting to be unfaithful to me?

He added to himself, “And I will keep her so, if I know how, or can.”

He meant that he would keep making her attempts to be unfaithful to him unsuccessful.

He added to himself, “I’ll go no farther than what the wit — intelligence and skill — of man will do.”

He may have meant that the wit — intelligence and skill — of man would be enough to keep his wife from committing adultery.

Or he may have meant that he would attempt to keep her faithful to him, but he would do only what it was possible for him to do. If so, he believed that another woman could replace his wife.

He added to himself, “At this window she shall no more be buzzed at. You can bet on it.”

He then said out loud to his wife, “If you are sweetmeats, wedlock, or sweet flesh, all’s one and the same to me. I do not love this hum about you. A fly-blown wife is not so proper.”

He was comparing his wife — whom he called “wedlock” — to sweets or meat that flies were swarming around.

He ordered her, “Go inside!”

She moved inside the room, away from the window, but Wittipol could still see her and she could still see him.

Fitzdottrel said from his window, “As for you, sir, look to hear from me.”

These words were the way a traditional challenge to a duel began.

“So I do, sir,” Wittipol replied.

Wittipol was ready to fight a duel with Fitzdottrel.

“No, but in other terms,” Fitzdottrel said.

Fitzdottrel was not ready to fight a duel with Wittipol.

Fitzdottrel continued, “There’s no man offers this to my wife unless he pays for it.”

“I have done that, sir,” Wittipol said.

He meant that he had paid with a cloak.

“Nay, then, I tell you, you are —” Fitzdottrel began.

Wittipol asked, “What am I, sir?”

“Why, that I’ll think about, when I have cut your throat!”

“Bah, you are an ass,” Wittipol said.

“I am resolved on it, sir —” Fitzdottrel began.

Fitzdottrel meant that he was resolved on cutting Wittipol’s throat.

“I think you are!” Wittipol interrupted.

Wittipol meant that Fitzdottrel was resolved on being an ass.

Fitzdottrel continued, “— to call you to a reckoning.”

“Go away, you broker’s block, you property!” Wittipol said, hitting him.

A broker’s block or property was a mannequin on which clothing was displayed. Wittipol was referring to Fitzdottrel’s custom of renting fine but used clothing.

Fitzdottrel said, “By God’s light, if you strike me, I’ll strike your mistress.”

He hit his wife, and then he and his wife exited.

Furious, Wittipol said, "Oh! I could shoot my eyes at him for that, now, or leave my teeth in him, if they were cuckold's poison enough to kill him!

"What prodigious, blind, and most wicked change of fortune's this? I have no breath of patience — all my veins swell, and my muscles start at the unfairness of it. I shall break, break!"

He exited.

Alone, Pug said to himself, "This I did for the malice of it, and so that my revenge may pass!"

He had caused Wittipol to become very angry at Fitzdottrel; if Wittipol were to beat Fitzdottrel, then Pug would have revenge for Fitzdottrel's beating him. In addition, Mrs. Frances Fitzdottrel had been responsible for Pug being beaten in the first place, and he had gotten revenge on her by stopping her meeting with Wittipol.

"But now my conscience tells me I have profited the cause of Hell but little in breaking off their loves, which, if some other act of mine doesn't repair this damage, I shall hear ill of in my account."

Pug could get in trouble in Hell for interfering with the love of Mrs. Frances Fitzdottrel and Wittipol. He had interfered in a love that could have led to adultery.

Fitzdottrel and his wife came outside and stood near Pug.

"Oh, bird!" Fitzdottrel said. "Could you do this? Against me? And at this time, now? When I was so employed, wholly for you, drowned in my care — more than the land I swear I have hope that I will win — to make you peerless? I have been working to get footmen for you, fine-paced ushers, and pages to serve you and bend their knees respectfully to you.

“I have been working to decide what knight’s wife will bear your train, and I have been working so that you can sit with your four women in council, and receive news from foreign parts, and I have been working so you can dress yourself perfectly in every detail!

“You’ve almost turned my good affection away from you, soured my sweet thoughts, all my pure purposes. I could now find it in my very heart to make another lady duchess and depose you.

“Well, go inside.”

His wife went inside.

Fitzdottrel said to Pug, “Devil, you have redeemed everything. I forgive you. And I’ll do you good.”

The redemption of a devil from Hell is unusual.

Pug exited.

— 2.8 —

Merecraft and Engine came outside and talked to Fitzdottrel.

Merecraft asked, “Why do you have these excursions away from business? Where have you been, sir?”

“I have been where I have been vexed a little, with a trifle!” Fitzdottrel said.

“Oh, sir!” Merecraft said. “No trifles must trouble your grave head, now that it is growing to be great.”

Fitzdottrel’s head could grow great. He could become big-headed because of pride in his imagined future success. Also, he was in danger of acquiring the horns of a cuckold.

Merecraft continued, “You must be above all those things.”

“So I will,” Fitzdottrel said.

“Now you are moving toward becoming a lord, you must put off the man, sir,” Merecraft said.

“He says the truth,” Engine said.

They were telling Fitzdottrel that he need not act like an ordinary man any more, by which they meant he did not have to observe such things as humility and courtesy.

“You must do nothing as you have done it heretofore,” Merecraft said. “You must not know or greet any man —”

Engine interrupted, “— who was your bedfellow the other month.”

“Bedfellow” here meant “intimate friend,” although unmarried people of the same sex could share a bed without causing gossip in this society.

“The other month?” Merecraft said. “The other week.”

People experiencing a sudden rise in social status often shake off their old friends.

Merecraft continued, “Thou don’t know the privileges, Engine, that follow that title, nor how swiftly they come with the title. Today, when he has put on his lord’s face once, then —”

“Sir, concerning these things I shall do well enough,” Fitzdottrel said. “I can act like a lord — don’t fear that I cannot.

“But then, my wife is such an unpredictable, uncooperative thing! She’ll never learn how to conduct herself like a duchess! I don’t understand her at all.”

“Best have her taught, sir,” Merecraft said.

“Where?” Fitzdottrel said. “Are there any schools for ladies? Is there an academy for women? I do know for men there was; I learned in one myself how to perform courtly bows and military drills.”

Engine whispered to Merecraft, “Sir, do you remember the idea you had — concerning the Spanish gown, at home?”

Merecraft whispered back, “Ha! I thank thee with all my heart, dear Engine.”

Merecraft turned to Fitzdottrel and said, “Sir, there is a certain lady here about the town, an English widow, who has recently travelled, but she’s called the Spaniard, because she came most recently from Spain, and wears Spanish clothing.

“She is such a splendid woman! All our women here who are of spirit and fashion flock to her, as to their president, their law, their canon, more than they ever did to oracle Forman.”

Doctor Forman was a necromancer who claimed, among other things, to be able to find lost treasure. Women especially flocked to him.

Merecraft continued, “Such rare recipes she has, sir, for the face, such oils, such tinctures, such pomades, such perfumes, medicines, essential oils, etc.

“And she is such a mistress of behavior! She knows, from the duke’s daughter to the doxy, what is their just due, and no more than what is their just due.”

A doxy is a slut.

“Oh, sir!” Fitzdottrel said. “You please me in this more than my own greatness. Where is she? Let us have her.”

“Be patient,” Merecraft said. “We must find a means for you to meet her and think about how you two can become acquainted —”

“Good sir, set about it,” Fitzdottrel said.

“We must think about how first,” Merecraft said.

“Oh, I do not love to wait for a thing, when I have a mind to have it,” Fitzdottrel said. “You do not know me if you want me to wait.”

“Your wife must send some pretty token to her, with a compliment, and ask to be received in her good graces,” Merecraft said. “All the great ladies do it —”

“She shall! She shall!” Fitzdottrel said. “What pretty token would be best?”

“Some little trifle,” Merecraft said. “I would not have it be any great matter, sir — a diamond ring of forty or fifty pounds would do it handsomely; and be a gift fit for your wife to send, and fit for the Spanish lady to take.”

“I’ll go and tell my wife about it right now,” Fitzdottrel said.

He exited.

“Why, this is going well!” Merecraft said to Engine. “The Spanish clothes we’ve already got, but where’s this lady? If we could get a witty boy now, Engine, that would be an excellent joke. I could instruct him to the true height. Anything takes this dottrel.”

There was no Spanish lady; this was just another con that seemed to be about to pay off immediately with a diamond ring worth forty or fifty pounds. Fitzdottrel was a dottrel — a foolish bird — whom it was easy to take advantage of.

Engine said, “Why, sir, one of the players will be your best female impersonator.”

The players were theatrical actors. In this society, women did not act in the theater. Boys played the roles of women.

“No, there’s no trusting them to keep it secret,” Merecraft said. “They’ll talk about it, and tell their playwrights.”

“So what if they do?” Engine said. “The jest will suit the stage. But there are some of them who are very honest lads. There’s Dick Robinson, who is a very pretty fellow, and who comes often to the chamber of a gentleman who is a friend of mine.”

Dick Robinson was a boy actor who played women’s roles on stage.

Engine continued, “We had the merriest supper of it there, one night! The gentleman’s landlady invited my friend to a feast for friends. Now my friend, sir, brought Dick Robinson, dressed like a lawyer’s wife, among them all — I lent him the clothes — but to see him act out the role, and lay the law, and act refined, and drink to them, and then talk bawdy, and send frolics! Oh, your laughter would have burst your buttons, or would not have left you with an unsplit seam in your clothing.”

Frolics were humorous or amatory verses written on paper and wrapped around sweetmeats and placed in bowls. During a feast, guests would send frolics to each other.

Sweetmeats are sweet delicacies such as bonbons, candied fruit, sugarplums, sugar-covered nuts, or balls or sticks of candy.

“They say he’s an ingenious youth,” Merecraft said.

“Oh, sir!” Engine said. “And he dresses himself the best! Beyond forty of your real ladies! Have you ever seen him?”

“No, I seldom see those trifles,” Merecraft said. “But do you think that we may have him pretend to be the Spanish lady?”

“Sir, the young gentleman friend I tell you of can get him to perform the role,” Engine said. “Shall I ask my young gentleman friend?”

“Yes, do it,” Merecraft said.

Engine exited.

Fitzdottrel returned and said, “By God’s light, I cannot get my wife to part with a ring on any terms, and yet the sullen monkey has two.”

“It is against reason that you should urge her to give up one of her rings, sir,” Merecraft said. “Send to a goldsmith. Don’t let her lose by giving up a ring.”

“How does she lose by it?” Fitzdottrel asked. “Isn’t it for her?”

By giving up the ring, his wife would gain the friendship of the Spanish lady. This was a gain — so Fitzdottrel thought.

“Make it your own bounty,” Merecraft said. “It will have the better success. What is a matter of fifty pounds to you, sir?”

“I’ve only a hundred pieces to show here, and that I would not break —”

Merecraft interrupted, “You shall have credit, sir. I’ll send a note to my goldsmith.”

Trains, Merecraft’s manservant, entered the room.

Merecraft said, “Here my manservant comes. He can carry my note to my goldsmith.”

He then said, “How are things now, Trains? What birds?”

“What birds?” meant “What’s up?”

Knowing Merecraft, the slang comes from hunting — the birds were prey to be shot just like Fitzdottrel was prey to be cheated.

“Your cousin Everill met me, and he has beaten me because I would not tell him where you were,” Trains answered. “I think he has dogged me and followed to the house, too.”

“Well, you shall go out at the back door, then, Trains,” Merecraft said. “You must get Gilthead the goldsmith here by some means.”

“That is impossible!” Trains said.

“Tell him we have venison,” Fitzdottrel said. “I’ll give him a piece, and send his wife a pheasant.”

Fitzdottrel exited.

“A forest of deer will not persuade him to come until those forty pounds you most recently got from him are paid back,” Trains said. “He makes more noise about that petty sum than he does about your bond of six and statute of eight hundred.”

A statute was a loan whose collateral was land. If the loan were not paid back, the creditor could legally seize the bound land of the debtor.

“Tell him we’ll hedge in that,” Merecraft said.

That meant that he would include the forty pounds he owed in a larger debt that had better security.

He added, “Talk up Fitzdottrel to him. Say that Fitzdottrel’s net worth is twice what it really is; make him a man of metal.”

The metal he had in mind was gold.

“That will not be necessary,” Trains said. “Fitzdottrel’s bond is current enough. He has good credit.”

ACT 3 (The Devil is an Ass)

— 3.1 —

Gilthead the goldsmith and Plutarchus talked together. Plutarchus was Gilthead's son.

“All this is to make you a gentleman,” Gilthead said. “I’ll have you learn, son. Why have I placed you with Sir Paul Eitherside except for the purpose of having you learn enough law that you can keep what is your own? Besides, he is a justice here in the town; and by dwelling, son, with him you shall learn in a single year what shall be worth twenty years of supporting you at Oxford or at Cambridge, or sending you to the Inns of Court or to France.

“I am called for now in haste by Master Merecraft to give credit to Master Fitzdottrel, a (financially) good man — I’ve inquired about him: He has eighteen hundred pounds a year, and his reputation is (financially) good for a diamond ring that costs forty pounds but will not be worth thirty pounds — that’s ten pounds we’ve gained. And this is to make you a gentleman!”

“Oh, but good father, you trust too much!” Plutarchus said. “You give too much credit!”

“Boy, boy, we live by finding fools to be trusted with credit,” Gilthead said. “Our shop-books are our pastures, our corn-grounds. We lay them open for fools to come into, and when we have them there we drive them up into one of our two pounds, the Counters, straightaway. And this is to make you a gentleman!”

The Counters were pounds — prisons — for people who could not pay their debts. Gilthead would get fools to run up debt, bleed them dry with high interest, and send them to prison still owing him money. But the money Gilthead got went for a good cause, he thought: It would make his son a gentleman.

He continued, “We citizens never trust someone with credit but we cheat, for if our debtors pay, we cheat them with our high interest, and if they do not pay, then we cheat ourselves. But that’s a hazard everyone must run who hopes to make his son a gentleman.”

“I do not wish to be a gentleman, truly, father,” Plutarchus said. “In a generation or two, we come to be just in their — the fools’ — state, fit to be cheated like them.

“And I would rather have tarried in your trade, for since the gentry scorn the city so much, I think we should in time, holding together, and marrying in our own tribes, as they say, have gotten an Act of Common Council authorizing us legally to cheat them out of rerum natura.”

“Rerum natura” is Latin for “the nature of things”; Plutarchus was using it to mean “everything.”

The Roman philosopher Lucretius wrote a work he titled De Rerum Natura, or Concerning the Nature of Things.

Gilthead said, “Aye, if we had a legislative act first to forbid the marrying of our wealthy heirs to them, and to forbid daughters from having such lavish portions — that ruins everything.”

Gentry who lacked money could become wealthy again by marrying someone who had much money — for example, rich Jewish daughters.

“And such practices make us a mongrel breed, father,” Plutarchus said. “And when they have your money, then they laugh at you, or kick you down the stairs. I cannot abide them. I would prefer to have them cheated, but not trusted with credit.”

Merecraft and Fitzdottrel entered the room in which Gilthead and Plutarchus, his son, were talking.

“Oh, has he come?” Merecraft said. “I knew he would not fail me.”

He said quietly, “Welcome, good Gilthead. I must have you do a noble gentleman a courtesy here, in a mere trifle, some pretty ring or jewel, of fifty or threescore pounds — make it a hundred, and hedge in the last forty that I owe you, and your own price for the ring.”

Merecraft wanted the most recent forty pounds he owed Gilthead to be made a part of the loan that Fitzdottrel would get from Gilthead. That way, Fitzdottrel would be the guarantor of the loan. If Merecraft were to default on the loan — have no doubt he would — Fitzdottrel would be legally responsible for paying back the loan.

More loudly, Merecraft continued talking to Gilthead, “He’s a good man, sir, and you may perhaps see him become a great man. He is likely to bestow hundreds and thousands of pounds on you, if you can humor him by giving him credit now. A great prince he will be shortly. What do you say?”

“In truth, sir, I cannot,” Gilthead said. “It has been a long vacation with us —”

The Inns of Court took a long vacation from August 13 to October 23. The vacation cut down on profits for many shopkeepers such as Gilthead.

Fitzdottrel interrupted, “A long vacation from what, I ask thee? From wit and intelligence? Or honesty? Those are your citizens’ long vacations.”

Angry at not immediately being granted credit, he walked away and looked out a window, ignoring the others.

Plutarchus whispered to Gilthead, his father, "Good father, do not trust them. "

"Nay, Tom Gilthead," Merecraft said. "Fitzdottrel will not buy a courtesy and beg it; he'll rather pay than beg."

Fitzdottrel had money; he did not need to beg for it.

Merecraft continued, "If you do for him, you must do cheerfully. His credit, sir, is not yet prostitute."

If Fitzdottrel spent enough time with Merecraft and his fellow con artists, Fitzdottrel's credit would become prostitute.

Merecraft then asked Gilthead, "Who's this? Thy son? A handsome youth. What's his name?"

"Plutarchus, sir," Plutarchus answered for his father.

"Plutarchus!" Merecraft said. "How did you get that name?"

Gilthead answered for his son, "The year, sir, that I begot him, I bought Plutarch's Lives, and fell so in love with the book that I called my son by his name, in the hope he would be like Plutarch and write the lives of our great men."

"In the city?" Merecraft asked. "And are you raising him there?"

"His mind, sir, lies much to that way," Gilthead replied.

"Why then, he is in the right way," Merecraft said.

"But now I had rather get him a good wife, and plant him in the country, there to use the blessing I shall leave him," Gilthead said.

"Not a good idea!" Merecraft said. "If thou do that, thou shall lose the laudable means thou have at home, here, to advance him and make him a young alderman!"

Merecraft guessed that he would get in Plutarchus' good graces by advocating that Plutarchus be allowed to stay in the city. Also, if Plutarchus were to live in the country after receiving his father's financial blessing, Merecraft would not be able to borrow money from him.

He continued, "Buy him a military captain's position in the Artillery Company, for shame; and let him go into the world early, and with his military scarlet ostrich-plume and military scarfs worn across his chest march through Cheapside, or along Cornhill, and by the virtue of those military decorations draw down a wife there from a window worth ten thousand pounds! Get him the book for learning military drills and get him some soldier men made of lead to set upon a table, in case his mistress should chance to come by, so that he may draw her in and show her Finsbury battles."

Military training exercises, including mock battles, took place at Finsbury, a London district.

Gilthead said, "I have placed him with Justice Eitherside, to learn as much law —"

"As thou has conscience," Merecraft said. "Come, come, thou are wronging pretty Plutarchus, who has not received his name for nothing, but was born to train the youth of London in the military truth. That way his genius lies."

Hearing a noise, he looked up and said, "My cousin Everill!"

— 3.3 —

Everill entered the room and said, "Oh, are you here, sir? Please, let us whisper together."

He took Merecraft aside so they could talk quietly and privately together.

Plutarchus said to Gilthead, “Father, dear father, trust him, if you love me.”

He had changed his mind about Merecraft. Perhaps the military life appealed to him. Certainly staying in the city did. Merecraft’s description of military life involved staying in the city.

Trusting Merecraft involved trusting Fitzdottrel; Merecraft would do everything possible to make Fitzdottrel responsible for paying back any loans.

“Why, I intend to trust him, boy,” Gilthead said, “but what I do must not come easily from me. We must deal with courtiers, boy, as courtiers deal with us. If I have a business there with any of them, why, I must wait, I’m sure of it, son; and although my lord dispatch me, yet his ‘worshipful’ manservant will keep me for his entertainment a month or two, to show me with my fellow citizens. I must make his train long and full, for one quarter, and help the spectacle of his greatness.”

The “courtier” was Merecraft, and the “lord” was Fitzdottrel. Merecraft did not treat Gilthead well, as could be seen by the way he talked to him. Therefore, although Gilthead was willing to do business with Fitzdottrel, he would hold off a while because Merecraft was the middleman.

Gilthead treated courtiers, including the ones he lent money, the way they treated him. He made them wait to get a loan, and they made him wait to be repaid for the loan. True, he made interest as long as the loan was made, but the courtiers made him jump through metaphorical hoops as he waited to be repaid.

Or, if the lord were the one getting the loan, then the lord’s manservant — the courtier — would make him wait. Gilthead would be joining others in the lord’s retinue as he waited, and the lord — and the courtier — would seem to be a great man because of the retinue.

Gilthead continued, “There nothing is done at once but injuries, boy — and they come headlong! All great men’s good turns don’t move, or they move very slowly.”

“Yet, sweet father, trust him,” Plutarchus said.

“Well, I will think about it,” Gilthead said.

He and his son then talked together quietly.

Meanwhile, Everill said to Mercraft, “Come, you must do it, sir. I’m ruined, otherwise, and your Lady Tailbush has sent for me to come to dinner, and all my clothes are pawned. I had sent out this morning, before I heard you had come to town, some twenty of my epistles, and no one return —”

The epistles were letters begging for money.

Mercraft interrupted and told Everill about his faults:

“Why, I have told you about this. This comes from wearing fancy clothes of scarlet, gold lace, and cut-works. Your fine gartering! With your blown roses on your shoes, cousin! And your eating pheasant and godwit — another fowl that is a delicacy — here in London. And your haunting the Globes and Mermaids — theaters and taverns — and squeezing in with lords always at the table! And affecting lechery in velvet — you consort with expensive whores who wear velvet!

“Instead, you could have contented yourself with cheese, salt-butter, and a pickled herring in the Low Countries — there you could have worn inexpensive cloth such as fustian! You could have been satisfied with a sexual leap on your host’s daughter in the garrison — a wench you could have bought with the small coin that is called a stoler! Or you could have been satisfied with a sexual leap on your sutler’s wife, in the leaguer, whom you could pay with two small coins that are called blanks!”

A sutler sells provisions to the soldiers in a military camp, aka leaguer.

Merecraft continued, “You never then would have run upon this low point that forced you to write your begging letters and send out your privy seals that thus have frightened off all your acquaintances so that they shun you at a distance, worse than you shun the debt collectors!”

Everill grumbled, “A pox upon you! I didn’t come to you for advice. I lack money.”

“You do not think about what you owe me already?” Merecraft asked.

“I?” Everill said. “They owe you who intend to pay you. I’ll be sworn I never meant it.”

This sounds as if he never meant to repay Merecraft the debt he owed him, but perhaps he meant: I never meant to reach this low point. Most likely, he meant the first one.

Everill continued, “Come, you will make money with a project.”

He then said threateningly, “I shall ruin your practice for this month if you don’t help me. You know me.”

Everill could inform people such as Fitzdottrel that Merecraft was a con man.

“Yes, you have a very ‘sweet’ nature!” Merecraft said.

“Well, that’s all one,” Everill said. “Who cares?”

“You’ll leave this empire one day,” Merecraft said. “You will not ever have this tribute paid, despite your scepter of the sword!”

He was saying that he would not be intimidated. Everill was ordering him around as if Everill were an emperor, but he was gaining his power with a sword — threats — instead of with a scepter — rightful rule.

“Tie up your wit,” Everill said, “and don’t provoke me —”

“Will you, sir, help me in doing what I shall provoke another to do for you?” Merecraft asked.

Merecraft did not want to give Everill money, but he was willing to con someone into giving Everill money. To do so, he needed Everill’s help.

“I cannot tell; try me,” Everill said. “I think I am not so utterly of an ore un-to-be-melted, but I can do myself good on occasions.”

“Strike in then, and do your part,” Merecraft said.

Merecraft and Everill then went over to Fitzdottrel.

Merecraft said to him, “Master Fitzdottrel, if I transgress in point of manners, give me your best interpretation of my conduct. I must beg for my freedom from your affairs this day.”

Merecraft began to gather his coat and hat and papers.

“What is it, sir?” Fitzdottrel said.

“I need to leave to help in this gentleman’s affairs. He is my kinsman —”

“You’ll not do me that affront, sir,” Fitzdottrel said.

He was eager to quickly rise in society and to quickly become very wealthy.

“I am sorry you should so interpret my action as an affront,” Merecraft said. “But, sir, it has to do with his being invested in a new office he has stood for a long time: Master of the Dependences!”

A dependence was a quarrel that needed to be settled. Many quarrels were settled through duels, which King James I of England opposed.

As he would now say, Merecraft wanted to set up an Office of Dependency, in which Everill would be the chief official. According to Merecraft, as he would soon say, this was one of his projects: Like other of his projects, it sounded somewhat plausible but had little chance of actually being set up and little chance of actually working.

Merecraft said, “The Office of Dependency is a place of my own design, too, sir, and it has met with much opposition; but the state, now, sees the great necessity of it, as after all their writing and their speaking against duels, they have erected it.”

Merecraft continued, “Everill’s official charter has been drawn up — for since there will be differences daily, between gentlemen, and since the roaring manner has grown offensive, with the result that those few we call the civil men of the sword abhor the vain and foolish bragging, they shall refer now hither for their process. And such as trespass against the rule of court are to be fined —”

Roaring boys were young men — bullies — who engaged in much arguing and dueling. Many roaring boys were in London.

Presumably, rather than settling quarrels through illegal dueling, which King James I had outlawed, gentlemen who had disagreements would go to the Office of Dependency and have their quarrels legally settled there. Fitzdottrel would learn that he must settle his affairs before settling his quarrel, so likely the way to settle quarrels was through legal duels approved by the Office of Dependency.

“Truly, a pretty place!” Fitzdottrel said.

“A kind of arbitrary court it will be, sir,” Merecraft said.

“I shall have a case for it, I believe, before long,” Fitzdottrel said. “I had a distaste.”

His distaste was his quarrel with Wittipol.

“But now, sir,” Merecraft said, “my learned counsel, they must have a feeling — a bribe. They’ll part, sir, with no books — written grants of privileges — unless the hand-gout be oiled, and I must furnish the oil.”

The hand-gout is a tight fist.

Merecraft continued, “If it concerns money, they come to me straightaway: I am a precious-metal mine, mint, and treasury, and I supply all.”

He asked Everill, “How much is it? A hundred pounds?”

It was time for Everill to play his part in conning Fitzdottrel.

He replied, “No, the greedy harpy now insists on a hundred pieces.”

A hundred pieces was ten percent more than a hundred pounds. A pound is twenty shillings; a piece is twenty-two shillings.

“Why, he must have them, if he insists,” Merecraft said.

He then said to Fitzdottrel, “Tomorrow, sir, will equally serve your needs, and therefore let me obtain your consent that you will yield me time to help a poor gentleman in his distresses because of his affairs’ urgency—”

“By no means!” Fitzdottrel said.

“I must get him this money, and will —” Merecraft said.

“Sir, I protest, I’d rather stand as the guarantor for the money myself than you should leave me,” Fitzdottrel said.

“Oh, good sir,” Merecraft said, “do you think so coarsely of our manners that we would, for any need of ours, be pressed to take it, although you would be pleased to offer it?”

He was pretending not to want Fitzdottrel to be the guarantor for the loan.

“Why, by heaven, I mean it!” Fitzdottrel said.

“I can never believe less,” Merecraft said. “But we, sir, must preserve our dignity, as you do publish — make public — yours. By your fair leave, sir.”

He pretended to start to leave.

“As I am a gentleman,” Fitzdottrel said, “if you intend to leave me now, or if you refuse me, I will not think you love and respect me.”

“Sir, I honor you,” Merecraft said. “And with just reason, for these noble notes of the nobility you pretend to.”

The “noble notes” included the offer to be the guarantor of the money that Merecraft said that Everill needed.

The word “pretend” means “has a claim to,” in addition to its regular meaning. Merecraft knew that Fitzdottrel had no real chance of becoming a duke; all he had was a real chance of losing his wealth.

Merecraft continued, “But sir, I would like to know why you would do this — he is a stranger. What is your reason for helping him?”

Everill whispered to Merecraft, “You’ll mar all with your fineness.”

Everill wanted to take the money and run, but Merecraft was prolonging the time that he would accept Fitzdottrel's offer to be the guarantor of the loan.

"Why, sir, that's all one — it wouldn't matter if it were only my fancy," Fitzdottrel said. "But I have a business that perhaps I'd have brought to his office."

"Oh, sir!" Merecraft said. "I have no objections to your being guarantor, then, if he can be made profitable to you."

"Yes, and it shall be one of my ambitions to have it the first business," Fitzdottrel said. "Can I do that?"

"As long as you intend to make it a perfect business," Everill said.

The word "business" meant "a private quarrel."

"I'll do that, I assure you," Fitzdottrel said. "Show me immediately what to do."

"Sir, it is important that the first be a perfect business, for Everill's own honor," Merecraft said.

Everill said, "Yes, and for the reputation, too, of my office."

The legal term "perfect" meant "enforceable by law." The private business, aka enforceable-by-law quarrel, would have to be one that was clearly suitable to be resolved — and would be resolved — by the Office of Dependency. That way, people would see that the Office of Dependency worked, and King James I and other VIPs would support it.

"Why, why do I take this course otherwise?" Fitzdottrel said. "I am not altogether an ass, good gentlemen. Wherefore should I consult you? Do you think to make a song and dance of it? Get to the point. What's your procedure for resolving quarrels? Tell us."

“Do, satisfy him,” Merecraft said to Everill. “Tell him the whole course of action.”

“First,” Everill said, “by request, or otherwise, you offer your business to the court, wherein you crave the judgment of the Master and the Assistants.”

“Well, that’s done,” Fitzdottrel said. “Now what do you do next?”

“We straightaway, sir, have recourse to the source of the business,” Everill said. “We visit the ground — that is, we examine the root causes of the quarrel, and so we see whether or not it is suitable for resolution by the Office of Dependency. If we find by our estimate that it is likely to prove to be a sullen and black business, that it is incorrigible and the parties are unable to negotiate a resolution, then we file it as a dependence.”

Fitzdottrel said, “So, it is filed. What follows? I love the order of these things.”

Everill said, “We then advise the party, if he is a man of means and possessions, that forthwith he settle his estate and put his affairs in order — or if he does not, at least that he says that he intends to do it. For by that the world takes notice that it now is a dependence. And this we call, sir, publication.”

“Publication” means “public notification.” In this society, however, “publication” also meant “confiscation.” Merecraft and Everill would love to confiscate Fitzdottrel’s wealth for their own use.

“Very sufficient!” Fitzdottrel said. “After publication, what’s next?”

Everill said, “Then we begin our legal process, which can be done in different ways: either by chartel, sir, or by ore-tenus — that is, either by written challenge or by word of mouth. Then the challenger and challengee, or — using Spaniard words — your provocador and provocado, have their different courses of action —”

“I have enough information about it,” Fitzdottrel said. “For a hundred pieces? Yes, for two hundred underwrite me, do. Your man will take my bond?”

“That he will, to be sure,” Merecraft said.

Merecraft said quietly to Fitzdottrel, “But these same citizens, they are such sharks! There’s an old debt of forty pounds I gave my word as guarantor — I did it for one who has run away to the Bermudas, and he will hook in that or he will not take your bond.”

The citizen was Gilthead. Merecraft was trying to con Fitzdottrel into being the guarantor of the debt of forty pounds by saying that Gilthead would not lend Fitzdottrel any money unless Fitzdottrel also assumed the debt of forty pounds. This was Merecraft’s way of hedging the debt — Fitzdottrel’s credit was much better than his.

Fitzdottrel said quietly, “Why, let him. That and the ring, and a hundred pieces, will all just make two hundred pounds?”

Merecraft said quietly, “No more, sir.”

In his mind, Merecraft may have thought, No. More, sir. He wanted to take Fitzdottrel for more than two hundred pounds.

He added, “What ready arithmetic you have!”

He then said to Gilthead, “Do you hear? A pretty morning’s work for you, this! Do it. You shall have twenty pounds out of it.”

Twenty pounds would be ten percent interest on a loan of two hundred pounds.

“Twenty pieces?” Gilthead asked.

He wanted more interest.

“Good father, do it,” Plutarchus urged.

“You will hook still?” Merecraft said. “You will fish for more money? Well, show us your ring. You could not have done this now with gentleness at first? If you had, we might have thanked you. But instead of dealing with gentleness, you groan as if you were having a painful defecation, and your courtesies come from you as if you were passing a hard stool, and they stink!

“A man may draw your teeth out easier than your money.

“Come, if little Gilthead here did not have a better nature than you” — he squeezed Plutarchus’ lips, which in this society was a friendly gesture — “I would never love him, I who could squeeze his lips off, now.”

He then asked Plutarchus, “Wasn’t thy mother a gentlewoman?”

“Yes, sir,” Plutarchus replied.

“And she went to the court at Christmas and St. George’s tide? And she lent the lords’ men necklaces?” Merecraft asked.

“Of gold, and pearl, sir,” Plutarchus replied.

“I knew thou must take after somebody other than your father,” Merecraft said. “That could not be otherwise. You don’t look like a shopkeeper. I’ll have thee made Captain Gilthead, and have thee march up and take in Pimlico, and have thee kill the bush at every tavern.”

Pimlico was a resort town. “Take in” meant 1) capture as a soldier, and 2) tour as a tourist.

Tavern signs originally showed ivy plants, and so a tavern sign came to be known as a “bush.” “To kill the bush” meant “to drink heavily.”

Merecraft continued, “Thou shall have a wife if smocks will mount, boy.”

Smocks can mount — that is, be lifted. The word “smock” also meant “woman,” and women can mount men.

Merecraft turned to old Gilthead, the father, and asked, “What do you have? You have there now some Bristol-stone or Cornish counterfeit you’d put upon us?”

Fitzdottrel was in the market for a diamond ring, but Merecraft was asking Gilthead if he had brought a diamond substitute rather than a real diamond.

Gilthead showed him a jewel and said, “No, sir, I assure you that this is a real diamond. Look at its luster! The luster will speak for itself! I’ll give you permission to put it in the mill for grinding.”

Diamond substitutes were softer than real diamonds. Gilthead was saying that this was a real diamond that would survive grinding in a mill.

Gilthead continued, “It is not a great, large stone, but it is a true paragon of a diamond. This has all its corners — it has been perfectly cut. View it well.”

“It’s yellow,” Merecraft said.

The color yellow indicated impurities in the diamond.

“Upon my faith, sir, it is of the right black luster, and very deep,” Gilthead said. “It’s set without a foil, too.”

A foil is a thin sheet of metal placed under the diamond to show off its luster.

Gilthead displayed another jewel and said, "Here's one of the yellow luster that I'll sell cheap."

Merecraft said, "And what do you value this at? Thirty pounds?"

"No, sir," Gilthead said. "It cost me forty before it was set."

Forty what? Pounds? Something else?

"Turnings, you mean?" Merecraft said.

Turnings are actions that chip off the bad parts of the diamond.

Merecraft continued, "I know your equivocations. You're grown the better fathers of them lately."

He meant that Gilthead and other Jews had learned how to equivocate better than the Jesuit fathers.

He continued, "Well, where it must go, it will be judged, and therefore look that it is right. You shall have fifty pounds for it. Not a denier more!"

Earlier, Gilthead had talked to his son about Merecraft's summons: Gilthead would sell a ring for forty pounds that was not worth thirty pounds.

Merecraft then said to Fitzdottrel, "And because you would have things dispatched quickly, sir, I'll go immediately and find and talk to this Spanish lady. If you think it is good, sir, since you have a hundred pieces ready, you may part with those now, to serve my kinsman's turns, so that he may wait upon you at once the freer. And you will then take the hundred pieces when you have signed and sealed the agreement with Gilthead."

“I don’t care if I do,” Fitzdottrel said. “I agree.”

“And dispatch all together,” Merecraft said.

Fitzdottrel handed over the hundred pieces, saying, “There, they’re exactly the right number: a hundred pieces! I have counted them twice a day for the past two months.”

“Well, go and sign your agreement, sir, and then make your return here as speedily as you can.”

He showed Fitzdottrel, Gilthead, and Plutarchus to the door, through which they exited.

Merecraft then began to split the money.

“Come, give it to me,” Everill said.

“Quiet, sir —” Merecraft began.

“Indeed, and fair, too, then!” Everill said. “I’ll permit no delaying in getting my share, sir.”

“But you will listen to me?” Merecraft asked.

“Yes, when I have received my dividend,” Everill said.

“There’s forty pieces for you,” Merecraft said.

“What is this for?” Everill said.

He expected more.

“It’s your half,” Merecraft said. “You know that Gilthead must have twenty pieces.”

“And what about your ring there?” Everill said. “Shall I have none of that?”

“Oh, that’s to be given to a lady,” Merecraft said.

“Is that so?” Everill asked.

“By that good light, it is,” Merecraft said.

“Come, give me ten pieces more, then,” Everill said.

“Why?” Merecraft asked.

“Twenty pieces for Gilthead?” Everill said. “Sir, do you think I’ll allow him to have any such share?”

“You must.”

“Must I?” Everill said. “You do your musts, sir, and I’ll do mine. You will not part with the whole, sir? Will you? Bull! Give me ten more pieces!”

“By what law do you do this?” Merecraft asked.

“Even lion-law, sir, or else I must roar.”

Everill meant that unless he received more money he would tell people about Merecraft’s cons.

“Good!” Merecraft said, meaning that Everill could yell and complain if he wanted to.

“You’ve heard how the ass made his divisions ‘wisely’?” Everill asked.

An ass, a fox, and a lion made a partnership and went hunting. After they had killed prey, the ass divided the prey into three equal shares: one each for the ass, the fox, and the lion. The lion, however, was not happy with an equal share and so it killed the ass and added it to the slaughtered prey and asked the fox to divide the prey. The fox divided the prey into three equal shares and gave the lion two of the shares, making the lion happy so it would not kill the fox.

“And I am he, I thank you,” Merecraft said.

He had equally and fairly divided the money.

“Much good may it do you, sir,” Everill said, meaning that it would not do Merecraft any good.

He took ten extra pieces.

“I shall be rid of this tyranny one day!” Merecraft said.

“Not while you eat and lie about the town here, and cheat in your bullion-hose — your padded trousers,” Everill said, “and not while I stand beside you and give you the benefit of my reputable name, and conduct your business, adjourn your beatings every term by postponing your trials in which you would face your creditors, and find new parties whom you can con with your projects.”

Everill helped Merecraft in his cons by seeming to be a reputable man about town whom people could trust and then introducing them to Merecraft.

He continued, “I have now a pretty task of it, to hold you in with your Lady Tailbush. But the trick will be how we shall both come off without paying for what we will commit?”

“Leave off your doubting,” Merecraft said, “and do your part — do what’s assigned to you. I have never failed yet.”

Everill said, “Give some credit to your aides, such as myself. You’re always unthankful.

“Where shall I soon meet you? You have some feat to do alone now, I see. You wish me to leave. Well, I will find you out, and bring you afterward to the audit — the reckoning.”

He exited.

“By God’s light!” Merecraft said. “There’s Engine’s share, too. I had forgot!”

Engine should have received a share of the hundred pieces. So Merecraft, in fact, had not equally and fairly divided the money.

Merecraft continued, “This reign is too-too-unsupportable! I must relieve myself of this vassalage to Everill.”

He heard a noise, looked up, and said, "Engine! Welcome."

— 3.4 —

Engine and Wittipol entered the room.

Merecraft took Engine aside and asked, "How goes the cry?"

The cry was a hunting cry. Merecraft was asking how the hunt for Dick Robinson was going.

Engine replied, "Excellently well!"

"Will it do?" Merecraft asked. "Where's Robinson?"

"Here is the gentleman, sir, who will undertake the role of the Spanish lady himself," Engine said. "I have acquainted him with the facts of the matter."

"Why did you do that?" Merecraft asked.

The fewer people who know about a con, the better.

"Why, Robinson would have told him — he's his friend — anyway, you know," Engine said. "And he's a pleasant wit; he will not hurt anything you purpose. Also, he's of the opinion that Robinson might lack the audacity to perform the part, the Spanish lady being such a gallant — such a fashionable lady. Now he has been in Spain, and knows the fashions there, and can discourse; and being but mirth, he says, leave it to his care — he can handle the part well."

"But he is too tall to play the Spanish lady!" Merecraft objected.

"As for that, he has the most splendid solution — you'll love him for it! He will say that he — that is, the Spanish lady — is wearing cioppinos, that is, soles worn under shoes to give extra height. And he will say that they do so in Spain. And Robinson is as tall as he is."

“Is that true?” Merecraft asked.

“Completely,” Engine said.

“I had rather trust a gentleman with the part, of the two,” Merecraft said.

Wittipol was a gentleman.

“I ask you to go to him then, sir, and greet him,” Engine said.

They went over to Wittipol, and Merecraft said to him, “Sir, my friend Engine has acquainted you with a strange business here.”

“A merry one, sir,” Wittipol said. “The Duke of Drowned-land and his Duchess?”

“Yes, sir,” Merecraft said. “Now that the conjurers have laid him by, I have made bold to borrow him a while —”

The conjurers were lying low because King James I had ordered that the laws against conjuring be enforced more rigorously. This gave con men such as Merecraft a chance to con Fitzdottrel.

“With the purpose still to put him out, I hope, to his best use?” Wittipol asked.

The conjurers and Merecraft believed that the best use of Fitzdottrel was to get as much money as possible from him. As of now, Wittipol had no objections.

“Yes, sir,” Merecraft said.

“Don’t worry about that small part that I am entrusted with,” Wittipol said. “I would not miss out on doing it because of the mirth that will follow from it; and well, I have a fancy to do it.”

His fancy was to get close to Fitzdottrel’s wife.

“Sir, that will make it well,” Merecraft said.

“You will say that it is so,” Wittipol said.

He knew very well that Merecraft was a con man.

Wittipol then asked, “Where must I put on my costume so I can play the Spanish lady?”

“At my house, sir,” Engine said.

“You shall have a guaranteed share, sir, in what Fitzdottrel yields to the sixpence,” Merecraft said.

Wittipol did not want the money.

“You shall pardon me,” he said. “I will share, sir, in your sports only; I am here for entertainment. I want nothing of your profits. But you must furnish me with the trappings of the Spanish lady: my coach, my guarda-duennas —”

Guarda-duennas are the Spanish lady’s attendants.

“Engine’s your provedor,” Merecraft said.

Engine would provide those trappings.

Merecraft then said, “But sir, I must — now that I’ve entered trust with you thus far, and now that I have confidence in your quality — acquaint you with some additional information.

“The place designed to be the scene for this our merry matter, because it must have the support of women to draw conversation, and offer it, is nearby here, at the Lady Tailbush’s.”

Fitzdottrel and the Spanish lady would meet in a group of other people where conversation between the two could take place. A respectable woman would not meet privately a man to whom she was not married or related or who was not her trusted — and preferably elderly — servant. Of course, not all women are respectable, but even the women lacking respectability usually want to keep up appearances.

“I know her, sir,” Wittipol said, “and her gentleman usher.”

“You know Master Ambler?” Merecraft asked.

“Yes, sir,” Wittipol answered.

“Sir, it shall be no shame to me to confess to you that we poor gentlemen who lack acres must for our needs turn fools up and plow ladies sometimes to try what glebe — quality of soil — they are; and this woman is no unfruitful piece. She and I now are on a project for the manufacture and selling of a new kind of fucus — makeup, for ladies — to benefit the kingdom, wherein she herself has travailed especially, by way of service to her sex, and hopes to get a monopoly for this product from King James I as the reward for her invention.”

“What is her end in this?” Wittipol asked. “What is it she wants?”

“Merely ambition, sir, to grow great, and court it — act as a court lady — with those who have secrets, although she pretends to have some other more altruistic end.

“She’s dealing already upon security for the shares, and Master Ambler has been named examiner for the ingredients and the register of what is sold, and he shall keep the office.

“Now, if she speaks confidentially with you about this — as I must make the leading thread to your becoming acquainted with her that your experience gotten through your being abroad will help our business — think of some pretty additions just to keep her floating, by which I mean just to keep her interested. It may be she will offer you a part. Any strange names of —”

“Sir, I have my instructions,” Wittipol said. “Isn’t it high time to be getting ready?”

Wittipol did not want to help Merecraft in his cons, although he was willing to play the Spanish lady in order to get close to Fitzdottrel’s wife.

“Yes, sir,” Merecraft said.

“The fool’s in sight — Dottrel,” Engine said, seeing Fitzdottrel coming.

“Leave, then,” Merecraft said.

Wittipol and Engine exited.

— 3.5 —

Fitzdottrel entered the room.

“Returned so soon?” Merecraft said.

“Yes, here’s the ring” — Fitzdottrel held it up — “I have signed for it and for the loan. But there’s not so much gold in all the Goldsmith’s Row in Cheapside, Gilthead says, until it comes from the Mint.”

Fitzdottrel had given Merecraft a hundred pieces, and he was supposed to get a hundred pieces from Gilthead after signing for the ring and for the loan, but Gilthead had said that the hundred pieces were not available.

Fitzdottrel said, “The gold has been taken up for the gamblers.”

“There’s a shopkeeper’s-trick!” Merecraft said. “A plague on them.”

“He swears that it is true,” Fitzdottrel said.

“He’ll swear, and forswear, too,” Merecraft said. “It is his trade. You should not have left him.”

“By God’s eyelid, I can go back and beat him, yet,” Fitzdottrel said.

“No, now let him alone,” Merecraft said.

“I was so earnest after the main business,” Fitzdottrel said. “I wanted to get this ring and go.”

“True, and it is time for the ring,” Merecraft said. “I’ve learned, sir, since you went to see Gilthead, that Her Ladyship the Spanish lady will eat soon with the Lady Tailbush, who is close by here.”

“In the lane here?” Fitzdottrel asked.

“Yes,” Merecraft said. “If you have a servant now of good appearance, well dressed, and with a lively and voluble tongue, neither too big nor too little for his mouth, who could deliver your wife’s compliment, to send along with —”

Fitzdottrel interrupted, “I have such a servant, sir, a very handsome, gentleman-like fellow, whom I intend to make my duchess’ usher — I employed him just this morning, too. I’ll call him to you. The worst thing about him is his name.”

“She’ll take no note of his name, just of his message,” Merecraft said.

Fitzdottrel called, “Devil!”

Pug entered the room.

Fitzdottrel pointed to Pug and asked Merecraft, “How do you like him, sir?”

He said to Pug, “Walk around a little. Let’s see you move.”

Pug walked around a little.

“He’ll serve, sir,” Merecraft said. “Give the ring to him, and let him go along with me. I’ll help to present him, and it.”

Fitzdottrel gave Pug the ring and said, “Sirrah, look that you discharge this task well, if you expect to keep your job here. Do you hear, go on, acquit yourself with all honors.”

He said to Merecraft, “I would like to see him do it.”

He would like to see Pug meet the Spanish lady and give the ring to her.

“Trust him with it,” Merecraft said.

Fitzdottrel gave Pug some instructions: “Remember kissing of your hand, and answering with the French-time, in flexure of your body.”

Kissing one’s own hand was part of the courtly etiquette of the time. The French-time was a fancy low bow.

He continued, “I could now so instruct him! And for his words —”

Merecraft interrupted, “I’ll put them in his mouth.”

“Oh, but I have learned the words from the very academies,” Fitzdottrel said.

“Sir, you’ll have use for them yourself soon, I promise you, after dinner, when you are called,” Merecraft said.

“By God’s light, that’ll be just play-time,” Fitzdottrel said. “It cannot be! I must not miss the play!”

Many people customarily ate dinner at midday, which was sometimes followed by seeing a play that began at 3 p.m.

“Sir, but you must go to the Spanish lady, if she wants to sit and talk after dinner,” Merecraft said. “She’s the president.”

“By God’s eyelid, the play is The Devil!” Fitzdottrel said.

He really wanted to see the play — or at least part of it — because it had a devil in it.

“Even if it were The Devil and His Dam, too, you must now apply yourself, sir, to this wholly, or lose all,” Merecraft said.

Fitzdottrel began, “If I could but see a part of the play —”

“Sir, don’t even think about doing it,” Merecraft said.

“If I could see only one act, I would not care — I want only to be seen to rise, and to go away, in order to vex the actors, and to punish their playwright — and keep him in awe!” Fitzdottrel said.

“But what if he is one who will not be awed, but will instead laugh at you?” Merecraft asked. “What then?”

“Then he shall pay for his dinner himself,” Fitzdottrel said.

Audience members often treated playwrights to a late dinner.

“Perhaps he would do that twice rather than thank you,” Merecraft said. “Come, get The Devil out of your head, my lord — I’ll call you so in private still — and remember this: You were, sweet lord, talking about bringing a business to the Office of Dependency.”

“Yes,” Fitzdottrel said.

“Why shouldn’t you, sir, carry it on yourself, before the Office of Dependency be up and running? You would show the world that you had no need of any man’s direction, in point, sir, of sufficiency? I speak against a kinsman, but I speak as one who tenders Your Grace’s good.”

He was speaking against a kinsman because, supposedly, he was taking business away from Everill.

“I thank you,” Fitzdottrel said. “To proceed —”

Merecraft interrupted, "To publications. Have your deed drawn up immediately, and leave a blank to put in your beneficiaries: one, two, or more, as you see cause —"

Merecraft was hoping to have his name put in the deed as a beneficiary: He wanted to take control of Fitzdottrel's estate.

"I thank you heartily, I do thank you," Fitzdottrel said. "Not a word more, I ask you, as you love and respect me. Let me alone."

He was angry with himself and thought, That I could not think of this as well as he! Oh, I could beat my infinite blockhead! I should have thought of doing that!

He exited.

Merecraft said to Pug, "Come, we must go this way."

They began walking to the building where Lady Tailbush lived.

"How far is it?" Pug asked.

"Close by here over the way," Merecraft said.

He thought, Now, I need to gain possession of this ring from this same fellow, Fitzdottrel's servant. I need to secure the ring before he gives it to the Spanish lady. Although my Spanish lady is a young gentleman of means, and scorns to share in the profits, as he has said, I do not know but that such a toy as this ring may tempt his "Ladyship," and therefore, I think best that the ring be safe and secure and in my possession.

Pug asked, "Sir, are the ladies we are going to see pretty and splendidly dressed?"

"Oh, yes," Merecraft said.

"And shall I see them, and speak to them?" Pug asked.

“What else?” Merecraft answered.

Trains arrived, carrying a cloak and bag.

Merecraft privately asked him, “Do you have your false beard with you, Trains?”

“Yes,” Trains replied.

“And is this one of your double cloaks?” Merecraft asked.

A double cloak was a reversible cloak that had two sides in different colors and styles, making a quick change in appearance easy when it was needed.

“It is the best of them,” Trains said.

“Be ready then,” Merecraft said.

Trains exited.

Seeing Pitfall coming, Merecraft greeted her: “Sweet Pitfall!”

— 3.6 —

Pitfall, who was Lady Tailbush’s female attendant, entered the scene.

Merecraft said to her, “Come, I must kiss —”

He attempted to kiss her, but she said, “Get away from me!”

“I’ll set thee up again,” Merecraft said. “Never fear that. Can thou never get a bird? No thrushes hungry? Stay until cold weather comes, and I’ll help thee to an ouzel or a fieldfare.”

Merecraft would set Pitfall up again after she had trapped a bird. In this society, one meaning of “bird” was “young woman,” but a few years earlier, another meaning was “young man.” Quite possibly, Pitfall made extra money by having sex with young men. Merecraft would set her up again after a session in bed.

A pitfall is a trap; in this society, it is especially a trap for birds. Ouzels and fieldfares are kinds of birds that arrive in England in the autumn, when the weather gets colder.

Merecraft asked her, “Who’s within, with Madam Tailbush?”

“I’ll tell you straightaway,” she said.

She quickly went inside the building where Lady Tailbush lived.

Merecraft said to Pug, “Please stay here a while, sir. I’ll go in.”

He went inside.

Pug, who had heard enough to guess that Pitfall was a prostitute, at least part-time, said to himself, “I do so long to have a little lechery, while I am in this body! I would taste of every sin a little, if it might be after the manner of man!”

Pitfall returned, and Pug said to her, “Sweetheart!”

“What do you want, sir?” Pitfall said.

“Nothing but to fall into you,” Pug said.

He, or a certain part of his body, would like to fall into her “pit.”

He continued, “I want to be your blackbird, my pretty pit. As the gentleman said, I want to be your song thrush. I want to lie tame and taken with you.”

One meaning of the word “taken” is “captured.” One meaning of “taken with” is “attracted by or charmed by.”

He continued, “Here is gold! Use it to buy yourself so much new dress material from the shop — as long as I may take the old dress up —”

He wanted to pay her to allow him to lift her old dress up for sex.

Trains, wearing a false beard and the other side of his reversible cloak, arrived and using a disguised voice said to Pug, “Sir, you must send the gentleman the ring.”

Intent on having sex with Pitfall and so not paying enough attention to the disguised Trains, Pug handed over the ring and said, “There it is.”

The disguised Trains exited with the ring.

Pug said to Pitfall, “Look, will you be foolish, Pit?”

He meant: Would you like to fool around?

“This is strange rudeness,” Pitfall said.

Pug began, “Dear Pit —”

Pitfall interrupted, “I’ll call for help, I swear!”

She quickly exited.

Merecraft returned and said to Pug, “Where are you, sir? Is your ring ready? Go with me.”

“I sent the ring to you,” Pug said.

Acting surprised, Merecraft said, “To me? When? By whom?”

“A fellow was here, just now,” Pug said. “He came for it in your name.”

“I sent no one for the ring, to be sure,” Merecraft said. “My intention was always that you should deliver it to the Spanish lady yourself. That was your master's order to you, you know. What fellow was it? Do you know him?"

"Here, just now, he got it!" Pug said.

Trains returned, wearing the other side of the reversible cloak and no longer wearing a false beard as a disguise.

"Have you seen anyone, Trains?" Merecraft asked.

"No, not I," Trains replied.

"The gentlewoman saw him," Pug said, referring to Pitfall.

"Ask her about it," Merecraft ordered Trains.

Trains exited.

Pug said to himself, "I was so focused upon Pitfall that I paid no attention to the man! My devilish chief has put me here in flesh to shame me! I perceive nothing with this dull body I am in! I attempt nothing that will succeed!"

Trains returned and said, "Sir, she saw no one, she says."

Pug said to himself, "Satan himself has taken a shape and disguise to abuse me. It could not be otherwise!"

"This is more than strange, that you should be so reckless!" Merecraft said to Pug. "What'll you do, sir? How will you answer when you are questioned about this?"

Pug said to himself, "I would run away from my flesh if I could; I would take off this body of mankind. This is such a scorn! And it will be a new exercise for my archduke — Satan! He will get exercise by punishing me! Woe to the several cudgels that must suffer on this back of mine!"

He asked Merecraft, "Do you know of anything that might help me, sir?"

"Alas!" Merecraft said. "The need for help is so immediate."

“I ask, sir, credit for another ring, only until tomorrow!” Pug said.

Pug would be back in Hell tomorrow.

“There is not enough time to get another ring, sir,” Merecraft said. “But, however, the lady is a noble lady, and will, to save a gentleman from rebuke, be entreated to say that she has received the ring.”

“Do you think so?” Pug asked. “Will she agree to say that she has received the ring?”

“No doubt, for such a reason,” Merecraft said. “It will be a lady’s bravery and her pride. She will take pride in doing a good deed.”

“And not let the good deed be known later in case Fitzdottrel learns about it?” Pug asked.

“That would be treacherous!” Merecraft said. “Upon my word, be confident.

“Tell this to your master: My lady president — the Spanish lady — sits this afternoon and will receive guests. She has accepted the gift of the ring, and she commends her services to your lady duchess: Mrs. Frances Dotterel.

“You may say that she’s a civil lady, and she gives to your lady duchess all her respects already. She also wants you to tell her that she lives but to receive her wished commandments and have the honor here to kiss her hands, for which reason she’ll stay here for yet another hour.

“Hasten to your prince. Leave!”

Doubtful, Pug asked, “And, sir, you will take care that the excuse is perfect?”

“You confess your fears too much,” Merecraft said.

“I am more worried about the shame,” Pug said.

He would be shamed in Hell for having fallen victim to a con.

“I’ll rid you of either,” Mercraft said.

But not rid Pug of both fear of Fitzdottrel and shame by Satan?

ACT 4 (The Devil is an Ass)

— 4.1 —

In her home, Lady Tailbush and Merecraft talked about the project they were working on together.

“A pox upon referring the project to commissioners!” Lady Tailbush said. “I’d rather hear that it were past the seals.”

To get the monopoly, projects were submitted to commissioners who would recommend that some projects be granted a monopoly. If the recommendation were accepted, the monopoly would be granted with a document bearing the privy seal.

To get a project submitted to the commissioners, various courtiers were used. Some courtiers were more effective than others.

“Your courtiers move so snail-like in your business,” Lady Tailbush complained. “I wish I had not begun to do business with you.”

“We must move, madam, in order, by degrees,” Merecraft replied. “We must not jump.”

“Why, there was Sir John Moneyman — he could jump a business quickly,” she replied.

“True, he had great friends,” Merecraft said. “But although some, sweet madam, can leap ditches, we must not all shun going over bridges. The harder parts, I reckon, are done. Now the project has been referred to the commissioners.”

He then flattered her: “You are infinitely bound to the ladies — they have so sung the praises of your new brand of makeup.”

“Do they like it, then?” Lady Tailbush asked.

“They have sent the Spanish lady to congratulate you.”

“I must send them thanks, and some remembrances,” Lady Tailbush said.

“That you must, and you must visit them,” Merecraft said. “Where’s Ambler?”

“Lost,” Lady Tailbush said. “Today we cannot hear of him.”

“We cannot, madam?” Merecraft asked.

“No, in good faith,” Lady Tailbush said. “They say he did not sleep at home last night. And here has fallen a business between your cousin and Master Manly that has disquieted us all.”

“So I hear, madam,” Merecraft said. “Please tell me, what happened?”

“Truly, it appears completely ill on your kinsman Everill’s part,” Lady Tailbush said. “You may have heard that Manly is a suitor to me, I am sure —”

“I guessed it, madam,” Merecraft said.

“And it seems he entrusted your cousin Everill to let fall some fair reports of him to me,” Lady Tailbush said. “Manly wanted Everill to talk him up to me.”

“Which he did,” Merecraft said.

“Which he did not,” Lady Tailbush said. “So far from it, as Manly learned when he came in and heard Everill saying bad things about him.”

“What!” Merecraft said. “And what did Manly say to him?”

“Enough, I assure you,” Lady Tailbush said, “and with such scorn of him and the injury he did that I wonder how Everill bore it — but that guilt undoes many men’s valors.”

Many behind-the-back slanderers lack courage.

Manly entered the room.

Merecraft said, "Here comes Manly."

Preparing to leave, Manly said to Lady Tailbush, "Madam, I'll take my leave —"

"You shall not go, truly," Lady Tailbush said. "I'll have you stay and see this Spanish miracle of our English lady."

The Spanish lady, of course, was supposed to be an English lady who dressed in Spanish clothing.

"Let me ask Your Ladyship to lay your commands on me some other time," Manly said.

"Now, I protest," Lady Tailbush said, "and I will have all pieced together, and all made friends again."

"It will be but ill soldered," Manly said.

He and Everill could not be friends although possibly they might be civil to each other.

"You are too much affected by it," Lady Tailbush said.

"I cannot, Madam, but think about it because of the injustice," Manly said.

"Sir, his kinsman — Merecraft — here is sorry," Lady Tailbush said.

Merecraft said, "Not I, madam, I am no kin to him — we just call each other cousins."

He then said to Manly, "And even if we really were cousins, sir, I have no relation to his crimes."

The word "crime" also meant "sin."

“You are not charged with his crimes,” Manly said. “I can accuse, sir, none but my own judgment, for although it were his crime so to betray me, I’m sure it was more my own at all to trust him. But he therein used his old manners, and his savor was strongly what he was before.”

“His old tricks” consisted of unethical behaviors, and his savor was that of a stink.

“Come, he will change!” Lady Tailbush said.

“Indeed, I must never think that he will change,” Manly said. “Nor would it be reasonable of me to expect that for my sake he should put off a nature he sucked in with his milk.”

Everill had been bad since he was a baby, according to Manly. It was his nature. He had sucked evil into him while sucking his mother’s milk.

Of course, Manly was also criticizing Everill’s mother.

Manly continued, “It may be, madam, deceiving trust is all he has to trust to. If so, I shall be loath that any hope of mine should take away his means of making a living.”

Yes, Everill’s sole means of making a living was by deceiving those who trusted him: He was a con man.

“You’re sharp, sir,” Lady Tailbush said.

Manly was sharp in his criticism of Everill. Although Lady Tailbush did not mean to say it, he was also intelligent in his criticism of Everill.

Yet Manly was tolerant of bad behavior in others. He did not attempt to get his friend Wittipol to not try to seduce another man’s wife, and he said openly now that he did not want to take away Everill’s way of making a living, even if that way were unethical. He was a forgiving — perhaps, or definitely, too forgiving — man.

Lady Tailbush added, “This act may make him honest.”

The act was being reconciled with Manly.

Manly replied, “If he were to be made honest by an act of Parliament, I would not alter in my lack of faith in him.”

Seeing Lady Eitherside enter the room, Lady Tailbush said, “Eitherside! Welcome, dear Eitherside! How are you, good wench? Thou have been a stranger! I have not seen thee all this week.”

Manly and Merecraft began to talk together quietly.

— 4.2 —

“I am always your servant, madam,” Lady Eitherside said.

“Where have thou been?” Lady Tailbush said. “I did so long to see thee.”

“Visiting, and I am so tired!” Lady Eitherside said. “I protest, madam, visiting is a monstrous trouble.”

Engaging in social activities such as visiting others can be exhausting, but many people who actually enjoy visiting complain about visiting.

“And so it is,” Lady Tailbush said. “I swear I must begin my visits tomorrow — I wish that they were over — at court. It tortures me to think about them.”

“I hear you have a reason for your visits, madam,” Lady Eitherside said. “Your suit goes on.”

The suit was to get a monopoly for the production of the new makeup.

“Who told thee?” Lady Tailbush asked.

“One who can tell: Master Eitherside.”

“Oh, thy husband,” Lady Tailbush said, “Yes, indeed, there’s life in it now; the suit has been referred to the commissioners. If we once see it receive the Privy Seal and the monopoly, wench, then we can compete with the rich set. We’ll have the great coach, six horses, and the two coachmen, with my Ambler bareheaded, and my three women-servants; we will live, truly, as the examples of the town, and govern it. I’ll lead the fashion always.”

“You do that now, sweet madam,” Lady Eitherside said.

“Oh, but then I’ll every day bring up some new project,” Lady Tailbush said. “Thou and I, Eitherside, will first be in it; I will give it thee, and they shall follow us. Thou shall, I swear, wear every month a new gown out of it.”

“Thank you, good madam.”

“I ask thee to call me Tailbush, as I call thee Eitherside,” Lady Tailbush said. “I don’t love this ‘madam.’”

Lady Tailbush had greater social status than Lady Eitherside, who used the respectful “you” when talking to her. Lady Tailbush used “thou” and “thee” when talking to Lady Eitherside.

“Then I protest to you, Tailbush, that I am glad your business so succeeds,” Lady Eitherside said.

“I thank thee, good Eitherside,” Lady Tailbush said.

“But Master Eitherside tells me that he likes your other business better.”

“Which business is that?” Lady Tailbush asked.

“The business of the toothpicks,” Lady Eitherside said.

“I have never heard about it,” Lady Tailbush said.

“Ask Master Mercraft about it,” Lady Eitherside said.

Merecraft, who was still talking quietly with Manly, overheard and said, “Madam?”

He then said to Manly about Everill, “He’s one — in a word, I’ll trust his malice with any man’s credit I would have abused.”

Merecraft was saying that he could count on Everill to undermine another man’s reputation — Everill could be counted on to slander another man.

“Sir, if you think you please me in this, you are deceived,” Manly said.

“No,” Merecraft said, “but because my lady named him as my kinsman, I want to let you know what I think about him, and I ask you to judge me by my opinion of him!”

“So I do,” Manly said. “Ill men’s friends are as unfaithful as themselves.”

Ill men speak ill about others, and Manly was saying that judging by Merecraft’s words, the friends of ill men also spoke ill about others.

“Do you hear me?” Lady Tailbush asked Merecraft. “Do you have a business about toothpicks?”

“Yes, madam,” Merecraft said. “Didn’t I ever tell you about it? I meant to have offered it to Your Ladyship once the patent was perfected.”

“What is it?” Lady Tailbush asked.

“The business is for serving the whole state with toothpicks,” Merecraft said. “It’s somewhat an intricate business to discourse, but I show how much the subject is abused, first, in that one commodity: The toothpicks are badly made. Then I show what diseases and putrefactions in the gums those toothpicks that are made of adulterated and false wood breed!

“My plot for reformation of these abuses is as follows:

“To have all toothpicks brought to an office, there to receive a seal of approval.

“Such people who counterfeit the toothpicks and make bad ones, however, shall be fined.

“And last, for selling them, to have a book printed to teach their proper use, which every child who can read shall have throughout the kingdom. By reading the book, they will learn how to properly pick their teeth.

“Beginning early to practice the proper procedure of picking, and practicing some other rules, such as never sleeping with the mouth open, and chewing some gum, will preserve the breath and make it pure, and so free from taint —”

Seeing Trains arrive, Merecraft stopped and asked him, “What do you have to tell me?”

Trains whispered to him.

“In good faith, it sounds like a very pretty business!” Lady Tailbush said.

“So Master Eitherside says, madam,” Lady Eitherside said.

Merecraft said, “The Spanish lady has come.”

“Has she?” Lady Tailbush said. “Good, show her in.”

Merecraft exited.

“My Ambler was never so unfortunately absent,” Lady Tailbush said. “Eitherside, how do I look today? Am I not dressed smartly?”

She looked in her mirror.

“Yes, you are, truly, madam,” Lady Eitherside said.

“A pox on the word ‘madam’!” Lady Tailbush said. “Won’t you stop saying that?”

“Yes, good Tailbush,” Lady Eitherside said.

“So? Doesn’t that sound better?” Lady Tailbush asked.

She then asked, “What vile fucus — makeup — is this thou have got on?”

“It is pearl,” Lady Eitherside said.

“Pearl?” Lady Tailbush said. “Oyster shells! As I breathe, Eitherside, I know it.

“Here comes, they say, a wonder, sirrah, who has been in Spain, and who will teach us all. She’s been sent to me from court to congratulate me. Please, let’s observe her and see what faults she has, so that we may laugh at them when she has gone.”

“That we will heartily, Tailbush,” Lady Eitherside said.

“Oh, me!” Lady Tailbush said, seeing Wittipol dressed as the Spanish lady. “She is the very infanta of the giants!”

An “infanta” is a daughter of a Spanish noble family, but the word was also used to describe a woman, particularly one of pompous display.

Wittipol was tall to begin with, but he was also wearing cioppinos.

— 4.3 —

Merecraft and Wittipol, who was dressed as the Spanish lady, walked over to Lady Tailbush.

Merecraft said to Lady Tailbush, "Here is a noble lady, madam, come from your great friends at court to see Your Ladyship and have the honor of your acquaintance.

"Sir, she does us honor," Lady Tailbush said.

To help preserve his disguise, Wittipol (the Spanish lady) said to Merecraft, "Please, say to Her Ladyship that it is the manner of Spain to embrace only, and never to kiss. She will excuse the custom!"

"Your use of it is law," Lady Tailbush said. "If it pleases you, sweet madam, take a seat."

"Yes, madam," Wittipol (the Spanish lady) said. "I have had the favor, through a world of fair reporting about you, to know your virtues, madam, and in that name have desired the happiness of presenting my service to Your Ladyship."

"Your love, madam — not your service!" Lady Tailbush said. "Otherwise, I cannot accept it."

"Both my service and my love for you are due, madam, to your great undertakings," Wittipol (the Spanish lady) said.

"Great?" Lady Tailbush said. "Truly, madam, they are my friends who think my undertakings to be anything. If I can do my sex any service by my undertakings, I've achieved my aims, madam."

"And they are noble ones, which make a multitude beholden to you, madam," Wittipol (the Spanish lady) said. "The commonwealth of ladies must acknowledge you."

"Except some who are envious and malicious, madam," Lady Tailbush said.

"You're right in that, madam," Wittipol (the Spanish lady) said. "Some of that race I encountered just recently, who, it seems, have worked to find reasons to discredit your business.”

“Who, sweet madam?” Lady Tailbush asked.

“Nay, the parties will not be worth your pause — they are most ruinous things, madam, that have put off all hope of being recovered to a degree of attractiveness and decency,” Wittipol (the Spanish lady) said.

“But what are their reasons, madam?” Lady Tailbush said. “I would like to hear what they are.”

“Some, madam, I remember,” Wittipol (the Spanish lady) said. “They say that painting — using makeup — quite destroys the face —”

“Oh, that’s an old criticism, madam,” Lady Tailbush said.

“There are new ones, too,” Wittipol (the Spanish lady) said. “They say that makeup corrupts the breath. They say that makeup has left so little sweetness in kissing that kissing is now used only for fashion, and shortly will be taken for a punishment. They say that makeup decays the front teeth that should guard the tongue and keep it from saying bad things — because of the use of makeup, the front teeth decay and from the mouth come words that run everlasting riot. And — which is worse — they say that because of makeup some ladies when they meet cannot be merry and laugh but instead they spit in one another’s faces!”

Manly looked closely at the Spanish lady and began to recognize Wittipol.

Manley thought, I should know this voice, and I should know this face, too.

Wittipol (the Spanish lady) said, “Then they say that makeup is dangerous to all the fallen yet well-disposed mad-dames who are industrious and desire to earn their living with their sweat. For any distemper of heat and motion may displace the colors, and if the paint once runs about their faces, twenty to one, they will appear so ill-favored and ugly that their servants will run away, too, and leave the pleasure imperfect, and the reckoning also unpaid.”

These “mad-dames” were madams and/or prostitutes. When their makeup ran, they looked ugly and lost all their “servants” — their lovers, aka customers, who left and did not pay.

“Pox, these are poets’ reasons!” Lady Eitherside said.

“Some old lady who keeps a poet has devised these scandals,” Lady Tailbush said.

“Truly, we must have the poets banished, madam, as Master Eitherside says,” Lady Eitherside said.

One person who wanted the poets banished was Plato, or so one of his books advocated. In Plato’s Republic, poets were banished for lying about the gods. Poets such as Homer showed the gods to be far from benevolent to human beings. According to Homer’s Iliad, the gods were often petty.

Trains entered and whispered to Merecraft.

“Master Fitzdottrel!” Merecraft said. “And his wife! Where?”

He said to Wittipol (the Spanish lady), “Madam, the Duke of Drowned-land, who will be shortly, has arrived.”

Wittipol (the Spanish lady) asked, “Is this my lord?”

“The same,” Merecraft said.

— 4.4 —

Fitzdottrel, Mrs. Frances Fitzdottrel, and Pug walked over to them.

“I am your servant, madam,” Fitzdottrel said.

Wittipol whispered to Manly, “How are you now, friend? Offended that I have found your haunt here?”

Manly whispered back, “No, but I am wondering at your strangely dressed venture here.”

“My purpose is to show you what they are whom you so pursue,” Wittipol whispered.

He intended to say things that would encourage Lady Tailbush, whom Manly was pursuing, and her friends to expose themselves as bad people.

Manly, who disliked Everill and Merecraft — two friends or associates of Lady Tailbush — whispered back, “I think it will prove a medicine against marriage to know their manners.”

“Stay and profit, then,” Wittipol whispered.

Merecraft said to Wittipol (the Spanish lady), “This is the lady, madam, whose prince has brought her here to be instructed.”

Supposedly, she would be instructed in the manners of a higher social class than her and her husband’s.

Merecraft presented Mrs. Frances Fitzdottrel to Wittipol (the Spanish lady).

“Will it please you to sit with us, lady?” Wittipol (the Spanish lady) asked.

Referring to Wittipol (the Spanish lady), Merecraft said to Fitzdottrel, “That’s the lady-president.”

“She is a goodly woman!” Fitzdottrel said.

“Goodly” meant both 1) good-looking and 2) large.

“I cannot see the ring, though,” Fitzdottrel added.

“Sir, she has it,” Merecraft said.

Continuing her earlier conversation with Wittipol (the Spanish lady), Lady Tailbush said, “But, madam, these are very feeble reasons for being against the use of makeup.”

Wittipol (the Spanish lady) replied, “Therefore, I urged, madam, that the new complexion now to come forth in the name of Your Ladyship’s fucus had no ingredient —”

“— but those I dare to eat, I assure you,” Lady Tailbush interrupted.

“So do they in Spain,” Wittipol (the Spanish lady) said.

“Sweet madam, be so liberal to give us the ingredients of some of your Spanish fucuses,” Lady Tailbush said.

“They are infinite, madam,” Wittipol (the Spanish lady) said.

Many ingredients were used in Spanish makeup.

“So I hear,” Lady Tailbush said.

Wittipol (the Spanish lady) began to list the many ingredients. Lady Tailbush knew what some of them were and pretended to know what the others were. Readers are advised to do the same.

Wittipol (the Spanish lady) said, “They have water of gourds, water of radish, the white beans, flowers of glass [powdered glass], powdered thistles, rosmarine [rosemary], raw honey, mustard-seed, and improperly baked doughy bread, the crumbs of bread, goat’s milk, and whites of eggs, camphor, and lily roots, the fat of swans, marrow of veal, white pigeons, and pine-kernels, the seeds of nettles, purslane [a kind of herb], and hare’s gall, lemons, thin-skinned —”

Lady Eitherside interrupted, “How Her Ladyship has studied all excellent things!”

Wittipol (the Spanish lady) said, “These are only ordinary ingredients, madam. No, the true rarities are the alvagada [white lead] and argentata [white ceruse] of Queen Isabella!”

“Yes, what are their ingredients, gentle madam?” Lady Tailbush asked.

Wittipol (the Spanish lady) said, “Your allum scagliola [flaked gypsum], or pol di pedra [rock alum], and zuccharino [sugar paste]; turpentine of Abezzo [pitch-pine sap], washed in nine waters; soda di levanter [sodium carbonate], or your fern ashes; benjamin di gotta [a tree resin], grasso di serpe [snake’s fat], porcelletto marino [sturgeon]; oils of lentisco [mastic gum], zucche [turnip], mugia [a kind of fish] make the admirable varnish for the face and give the right luster; but two drops rubbed on with a piece of scarlet make a lady of sixty look at sixteen. But, above all, the water of the white hen, of the Lady Estifania’s!”

“Oh, yes, that same, good madam, I have heard of,” Lady Tailbush said. “How is it done?”

Wittipol (the Spanish lady) replied, “Madam, you take your hen, pluck it, and skin it, and cleanse it of the innards. Then chop it, bones and all; add to four ounces of carravicins, pipitas, soap of Cyprus, make the decoction, and strain it. Then distill it, and keep it in your galley-pot [apothecary’s jar] well sealed. Three drops will preserve skin from wrinkles, warts, spots, moles, blemish, or sun-burnings, and keep the skin in decimo sexto, forever bright and smooth as any mirror; and indeed, it is called the virgin’s milk for the face, oglio reale. A ceruse that neither cold nor heat will hurt, when mixed with oil of myrrh, the red gillyflower called cataputia, and flowers of rovistico makes the best muta, or dye, of the whole world.”

Wittipol, of course, was satirizing the making of beauty products. Keeping “the skin in decimo sexton” sounds as if the beauty product would keep the skin looking like that of a 16-year-old girl, but in decimo sexton actually refers to a small book whose leaves are each one-sixteenth of a full sheet of paper.

“Dear madam, will you let us be familiar?” Lady Tailbush asked. “Shall we be friends?”

Wittipol (the Spanish lady) replied, “I am Your Ladyship’s servant.”

Merecraft asked Fitzdottrel, “How do you like her?”

“She is admirable!” Fitzdottrel said. “But still I cannot see the ring.”

He was mistrustful about his ring.

Ready to confess that he had been conned out of the ring, Pug said, “Sir!”

Hearing Pug, Merecraft said to himself, “I must deliver the ring, or everything will be ruined. This fool Fitzdottrel is so mistrustful.”

He said to Wittipol (the Spanish lady), “Madam —”

He surreptitiously handed over the ring and whispered, “Sir, wear this ring, and please know that it was sent to you by Fitzdottrel’s wife. And be sure to give her thanks.”

He then whispered to Pug, “Don’t dwindle, sir. Bear up.”

“I thank you, sir,” Pug, who had witnessed the handing over of the ring, said.

“But for the manner of Spain!” Lady Tailbush said. “Sweet madam, let us be bold, now we are friends. Are all the ladies there in the fashion?”

“None but grandees, madam, of the clasped train, which may be worn at length, too, or like this, upon my arm,” Wittipol (the Spanish lady) said.

“And do they all wear cioppinos?” Lady Tailbush asked.

Cioppinos were soles that were worn under shoes to add height.

“Yes, if they are dressed in punto, madam,” Wittipol (the Spanish lady) said.

“In punto” meant “in their best.”

“Gilt as those are, madam?” Lady Tailbush asked.

Wittipol (the Spanish lady), who was wearing golden soles, replied, “Of goldsmith’s work, madam, and set with diamonds; and their Spanish pumps of perfumed leather.”

“Pumps” are shoes.

“I should think it hard to walk in them, madam,” Lady Tailbush said.

“At first it is, madam,” Wittipol (the Spanish lady) said.

“Do you ever fall in them?” Lady Tailbush asked.

“Never,” Wittipol (the Spanish lady) replied.

“I swear, I should fall six times an hour!” Lady Eitherside said.

“But you have men at hand always to help you if you fall?” Lady Tailbush said.

“Only one, madam — the guarda-duennas, who is such a little old man as this man is,” Wittipol (the Spanish lady) said, pointing to Trains.

“Alas!” Lady Eitherside said. “He can do nothing! This man!”

“Let me tell you, madam,” Wittipol (the Spanish lady) said. “I saw in the court of Spain once a lady fall in the King’s sight. She was stretched out on the ground, and there she lay, flat spread as an umbrella, with the hoop of her petticoat cracked here.” — He pointed to a place on the hoop of the petticoat he was wearing. — “No man dared reach out a hand to help her, till the guarda-duennas came. A guarda-duenna is the only person allowed to touch a lady there; and he only by this finger.”

“Haven’t they any servants, madam, there?” Lady Eitherside asked. “Haven’t they any friends?”

“An escudero or so, madam, who waits upon them in another coach, at a distance, and when they walk, or dance, nearby holds a handkerchief, and never presumes to touch them,” Wittipol (the Spanish lady) said.

An escudero is a Spanish squire.

“This is scurvy!” Lady Eitherside said. “And a forced gravity — an unnatural formality! I do not like it. I like our own much better.”

“It is more French and courtly, ours,” Lady Tailbush said.

“And tastes more of liberty,” Lady Eitherside said. “We may have our dozen of visitors at once make love to us.”

This kind of making love was flirting — mostly. Perhaps.

“And in front of our husbands!” Lady Tailbush said.

“Husband?” Lady Eitherside said. “As I am honest, Tailbush, I think that if nobody should love me but my poor husband, I would just hang myself.”

“Fortune forbid, wench, that so fair a neck should have so foul a necklace as a noose!” Lady Tailbush said.

“What I said is true, as I am handsome!” Lady Eitherside said.

Wittipol (the Spanish lady) said to Mrs. Frances Fitzdottrel, “I received, lady, a token from you, which I would not be so rude as to refuse, it being your first remembrance — gift to remember you by — to me.”

Seeing the ring, Fitzdottrel whispered to Merecraft, “Oh, I am satisfied now!”

Merecraft whispered back, “Do you see the ring, sir?”

“But since you come to know me nearer and better, lady, I’ll beg the honor that you will wear it for me,” Wittipol (the Spanish lady) said. “It must be so.”

Wittipol (the Spanish lady) gave the ring to Mrs. Frances Fitzdottrel.

Mrs. Frances Fitzdottrel said to herself, “Surely I have heard this voice before.”

Merecraft whispered to Wittipol (the Spanish lady), “What are you doing, sir?”

“Would you have me be mercenary?” Wittipol (the Spanish lady) said. “We’ll recompense it soon, in something else.”

He meant that Merecraft would soon be able to get money from Fitzdottrel in some other way.

Merecraft and Trains exited.

“I do not love to be gulled, even in a trifling matter,” Fitzdottrel said, satisfied now that he saw the ring. “Wife, do you hear? You’re come into the school, wife, where you may learn — I know — anything! How to be fine, or fair, or great, or proud, or whatever you want, indeed, wife; here it is taught. And I am glad that you may not say, another day, when honors come upon you, you lacked means.”

He then let his wife know about his costs: “I have done my parts. Today I have been at fifty pounds charge, first, for a ring to get you entered here where you can learn the manners of this social class. Then I left my new play to wait upon you here, to see your entry into this society confirmed, so that I may say, both to my own eyes and ears — senses, you are my witness — she has enjoyed all helps that could be had, for love, or money —”

Mrs. Frances Fitzdottrel finished the sentence for him: “— to make a fool of her.”

“Wife, that’s your malice, the wickedness of your nature to interpret your husband’s kindness thus,” Fitzdottrel said. “But I’ll not stop trying always to do good despite your depraved disposition. Take note of it. Bend this stubborn will of yours; be great in society.”

Lady Tailbush asked Wittipol (the Spanish lady), “Good madam, whom do the Spanish grandees use in carrying messages?”

“They commonly use their slaves, madam,” Wittipol (the Spanish lady) said.

“And does Your Ladyship think that so good, madam?” Lady Tailbush asked.

“No, indeed, madam,” Wittipol (the Spanish lady) said. “In such matters I prefer the fashion of England by far. I prefer the use of your young delicate page, or discreet usher, to carry messages.”

“And I go with Your Ladyship in opinion directly for your gentleman-usher,” Fitzdottrel said. “There’s not a finer officer who goes on ground.”

“If he is made and broken in to his place, once,” Wittipol (the Spanish lady) said.

“I presuppose him to be so,” Fitzdottrel said.

“And they are fitter managers, too, sir, but I would have them called our escuderos,” Wittipol (the Spanish lady) said.

“Good,” Fitzdottrel said.

“Let’s say that I would send to Your Ladyship who, I presume, has gathered all the dear secrets to know how to make pastillos of the Duchess of Braganza, coquettas, almojavanas, mantecadas, alcorças, mustaccioli,” Wittipol (the Spanish lady) said.

All of the foreign words were for various kinds of sweets.

Wittipol (the Spanish lady) continued, “Or say it were the peladore [depilatory] of Isabella, or balls [pills] against the itch, or aqua nanfa [orange water], or oil of jessamine [jasmine] for gloves of the Marquess Muja. Or for the head, and hair; why, these are offices —”

Fitzdottrel interrupted, “— fit for a gentleman, not a slave.”

Wittipol (the Spanish lady) said, “They only might ask for your piveti, aka Spanish coal, an aromatic substance, to burn, and sweeten a room; but the arcane secrets of ladies’ cabinets —”

Fitzdottrel interrupted, “— should be elsewhere trusted.”

He then said to Wittipol (the Spanish lady), “You’re much about the truth — you’re absolutely right.”

He then said, “Sweet honored ladies, let me fall in with you.”

He walked into the midst of the ladies and said, “I have my female wit, as well as my male wit. And I know what suits a lady of spirit, or a woman of fashion!”

By saying that he had “my female wit, as well as my male wit,” Fitzdottrel was identifying himself as a womanish man, something that many people in this society disliked.

Wittipol (the Spanish lady) said, “And you would have your wife be a lady of spirit, or a woman of fashion!”

“Yes, madam,” Fitzdottrel replied. “I would have her be airy, somewhat light — not to plain dishonesty, I mean, but somewhat on this side.”

A “light” woman was a promiscuous woman. Fitzdottrel wanted his wife to be flirtatious enough to fit in with this society, but he did not want her to cuckold him.

“I understand you, sir,” Wittipol (the Spanish lady) said.

He then said, “He has reason, ladies.”

Just that morning, Wittipol had spoken to Fitzdottrel’s wife and attempted to persuade her to commit adultery with him.

He kicked at a rush lying on the floor and said, “I’ll not give this rush for any lady who cannot be honest within a thread.”

A rush is a stalk or a leaf from plants called, yes, rushes. Rush mats were often placed on the floor. Wittipol was saying that he would not give a rush, which is something worthless, for a woman who did not know what she could get away with — that is, for a woman who could flirt and flirt and perhaps do more than flirt yet keep her reputation.

He was also referencing the rush mat that lay between him and Mrs. Frances Fitzdottrel that morning.

Lady Tailbush said, “Yes, madam, and yet venture as far for the other, in her reputation —”

Wittipol (the Spanish lady) interrupted, “— as can be.”

Sneaky women could keep their reputations, yet still do many, many things that respectable women ought not to do.

Wittipol (the Spanish lady) listed some of those things:

“Coach it to the resort town of Pimlico.

“Dance the scandalous dance called the saraband.

“Hear bawdy language and talk bawdy language.

“Laugh as loudly as an alarm clock.

“Squeak, spring, do anything —”

Squeaking could be done in bed.

The verb “spring” has some meanings that could refer to the act of sex or what can follow the act of sex: 1) moving energetically and changing position, 2) undergoing flushing of the skin, 3) causing water to rise (sweating), 4) being covered with water (semen), and 5) suffering the spreading of a rumor.

Or perhaps “squeak, spring” simply meant “sing, dance.”

Lady Eitherside interrupted, “— in young company, madam.”

Lady Tailbush added, “Or before gallants. If they are splendid, or lords, a woman is bound to do so.”

“I say so, ladies,” Fitzdottrel said. “It is civility to deny us nothing.”

Pug, the devil from Hell, admired Fitzdottrel. He said to himself, “You talk of a university! Why, Hell is a grammar school compared to this!”

Lady Eitherside said, “But then she must not lose a look on stuffs, or cloth, madam.”

“Stuffs” refers to materials for dresses, but readers may be forgiven for at first thinking that it refers to male parts that can be stuffed into lady parts.

“Nor no coarse fellow,” Lady Tailbush said.

“She must be guided, madam, by the clothes he wears, and the company he is in,” Wittipol (the Spanish lady) said. “Whom to salute, how far —”

Fitzdottrel interrupted, “I have told her — my wife — this. And I have told her that bawdy language, too, upon the point, is in itself as civil a discourse —”

Wittipol (the Spanish lady) interrupted, “— as any other affair of flesh, whatever.”

To be a member of this particular crowd of people, you needed to speak bawdily and flirt outrageously, and perhaps do worse things. Fitzdottrel wanted his wife to be a member of this particular crowd of people.

Fitzdottrel continued, “But she will never be capable; she is not so much as coming, madam.”

This can be interpreted in two ways:

- 1) “But she will never be capable of understanding that; she is not so much as coming around to understand that, madam.”
- 2) “But she will never be capable of having such evil and effrontery; she is not so much as cumming, madam.”

Fitzdottrel continued, “I don’t know how she loses all her opportunities with hoping to be forced.”

The word “forced” means “raped,” but lesser kinds of force may include “seduced” or “persuaded.”

Fitzdottrel was a jealous husband who was afraid that Wittipol would seduce his wife — and afraid that his wife wouldn’t mind being seduced — and so he probably meant that he couldn’t understand why his wife did not want to fit in with this particular crowd of people when she, herself, would not mind being seduced.

Fitzdottrel continued, “I’ve entertained a gentleman, a younger brother, here” — he pointed to Pug — “whom I would like to breed up as her escudero, in anticipation of some expectations that I have, and she’ll not countenance him.”

“What’s his name?” Wittipol (the Spanish lady) asked.

“His name is Devil, and he’s from Derbyshire,” Fitzdottrel said.

Because of Pug’s name, Lady Eitherside said, “Bless us from him!”

This meant: May God protect us from him.

“Devil?” Lady Tailbush said. “Call him De-vile, sweet madam.”

“Call him whatever you please, ladies,” Mrs. Frances Fitzdottrel said.

“De-vile’s a prettier name!” Lady Tailbush said.

“And the name sounds, I think, as if it came in with William the Conqueror in the Norman Conquest,” Lady Eitherside said.

Referring to Lady Tailbush and Lady Eitherside, a disgusted Manly said, “They are worse than smocks — prostitutes! What things they are! That nature should be at leisure ever to make people like them! My wooing is at an end. I will no longer woo Lady Tailbush.”

Indignant, he exited.

Referring to Pug, Wittipol (the Spanish lady) asked, “What can he do?”

“Let’s hear him,” Lady Eitherside said.

“Can he manage?” Lady Tailbush asked.

One meaning of “manage” is “perform,” perhaps meaning sexually. Another meaning of “manage” could be “manage an affair” — that is, be a good go-between for a lady and her lover.

“If it would please you to test him and ask him questions, ladies, do so,” Fitzdottrel said.

He ordered, “Stand forth, Devil.”

Pug said to himself, “Was all this but the preface to my torment?”

“Come, let Their Ladyships see your honors,” Fitzdottrel said. “Let them see you bow.”

Pug bowed.

“Oh, he makes a wicked leg,” Lady Eitherside said.

A “wicked leg” is a badly performed bow.

“As wicked as ever I saw!” Lady Tailbush said.

“Fit for a Devil,” Wittipol (the Spanish lady) said.

“Good madam, call him De-vile,” Lady Tailbush requested.

They began a catechism — a question-and-answer test — of Pug.

Wittipol (the Spanish lady) asked Pug, “De-vile, what property is there most required in your opinion, now, while in service as a Spanish squire — an escudero?”

Pug hesitated.

Fitzdottrel asked him, “Why don’t you speak?”

Pug then answered Wittipol (the Spanish lady), “Most required is a settled discreet pace, madam.”

Wittipol (the Spanish lady) replied, “Most required, I think, is a barren head, sir, mountain-like, to be exposed to the cruelty of weathers —”

Many servants in the position of squire were required to be bareheaded. High mountains are bareheaded in the sense that trees will not grow above a certain elevation.

“Aye, for his valley is beneath the waste, madam, and to be fruitful there, it is sufficient,” Fitzdottrel said.

According to Fitzdottrel, Pug’s head was barren — a waste. Below Pug’s waist was a valley, but it was a valley in back. What came out there would be fruitful if used to fertilize fruit trees.

Fitzdottrel then said to Pug, “Dullness upon you! Couldn’t you hit this?”

“Hit this” meant “hit on the right answer.”

Fitzdottrel hit Pug, who began, “Good sir —”

Wittipol (the Spanish lady) said, “If he had hit on the right answer, then he would have had no barren head! You torment him too much, indeed, sir.”

Fitzdottrel said to Pug, "I must walk with a French stick, like an old verger, on account of you."

A French stick is a walking stick, and a verger is a public official who carried a rod as a symbol of his authority.

Fitzdottrel believed that because of Pug's ignorance, he had to carry a walking stick so he could use it to beat Pug.

Pug quietly prayed to Satan, "Oh, chief, call me back to Hell again, and free me!"

"Do you murmur now?" Fitzdottrel asked Pug.

"Not I, sir," Pug replied.

"What do you take to be, Master De-vile, the height of your employment in the true perfect service of the escudero?" Wittipol (the Spanish lady) asked Pug.

Again, Pug hesitated.

"When will you answer?" Fitzdottrel asked. "What do you answer?"

Pug answered Wittipol (the Spanish lady), "To be able, madam, first to inquire about and then to report the efficacy of any lady's medicine, using sweet phrases."

Some kinds of medicines are laxatives. Pug would be asking ladies whether their laxatives had worked.

Wittipol (the Spanish lady) said, "Yes, that's an act of elegance and importance. But what is above that? What is truer and more perfect service than that?"

"Oh, I wish that I had a goad to use on Pug!" Fitzdottrel said.

"To find a good cutter of ladies' corns," Pug said.

Insulted, Lady Tailbush said, "He can get out right now!"

“Most barbarous!” Lady Eitherside said.

“Why did you give this answer, now?” Fitzdottrel said to Pug. “On purpose to discredit me? You damned Devil!”

Pug said to himself, “Sure, if I am not yet a damned devil, I shall be. All my days in Hell were holy-days compared to this!”

“This is labor lost, madam,” Lady Tailbush said.

“He’s a dull fellow of no intellectual capacity,” Lady Eitherside said.

“And of no discourse,” Lady Tailbush added. “Oh, if my Ambler would have been here!”

“Yes, madam,” Lady Eitherside said. “When you talk about Ambler, you talk about a man. Where is there such another?”

Wittipol (the Spanish lady) said, “Master De-vile, suppose that one of my ladies here had a fine bitch, and she wanted to employ you to go forth to entreat about a convenient match for her.”

In other words, suppose that one of the ladies here had a female dog and was seeking a mate for it.

Wittipol (the Spanish lady) continued, “What would you observe that would help you to find a fine mate for it?”

“The color, and the size, madam,” Pug said.

“And nothing else?” Wittipol (the Spanish lady) asked.

“The moon, you calf, the moon!” Fitzdottrel said.

He was calling Pug a mooncalf, aka a monster.

“Yes, the moon, and the astrological sign of the bitch,” Pug said.

“Yes,” Lady Tailbush said, “and recipes for aphrodisiacs.”

“Then when the puppies came, what would you do?” Wittipol (the Spanish lady) asked.

“Get their nativities — horoscopes — cast,” Pug answered.

“This is well,” Wittipol (the Spanish lady) said. “What else?”

“Consult the almanac-man about which would be the smallest? And which would be the cleanliest?” Pug answered.

“And which the silentest?” Wittipol (the Spanish lady) asked.

Lady Tailbush said, “This is well, madam!”

Wittipol (the Spanish lady) asked Pug, “And what would you do while she were pregnant with puppies?”

Pug answered, “Walk her outside, and air her every morning.”

“Very good!” Wittipol (the Spanish lady) said. “And be industrious to kill her fleas?”

“Yes,” Pug said.

“He will make a pretty student,” Wittipol (the Spanish lady) said.

Pug said to himself, “Who, coming from Hell, could look for such catechizing? The devil is an ass. I do acknowledge it.”

Which devil? Possibly, Pug himself. He had acted foolishly in wishing to leave Hell in order to visit earth.

Fitzdottrel, impressed by Wittipol (the Spanish lady), said to himself, “The top of woman! All her sex in abstract! I love each syllable that falls from her!”

Referring to Pug, Lady Tailbush requested, “Good madam, give me permission to go aside with him and test him a little.”

“Do, and I’ll withdraw, madam, with this fair lady — and teach her the while,” Wittipol (the Spanish lady) said.

Lady Tailbush said to Pug, “Come with me, sir.”

Pug prayed quietly, “Dear chief, relieve me, or I perish!”

“Lady, we’ll follow you two,” Wittipol (the Spanish lady) said.

Lady Tailbush and Lady Eitherside exited with Pug.

Wittipol (the Spanish lady) asked Fitzdottrel, “You are not jealous of me being with your wife, sir?”

Because Fitzdottrel thought that Wittipol (the Spanish lady) was a woman, he replied, “Oh, madam! You shall see.”

He said to his wife, “Stay, wife.”

Mrs. Frances Fitzdottrel had disliked the company and she had disliked Pug’s being teased and beaten, and she wanted to leave and go to her home. She had no desire to be taught to behave like Lady Tailbush and Lady Eitherside.

Fitzdottrel said to Wittipol (the Spanish lady), “Behold, I give her up here absolutely to you. She is your own. Do with her what you will.”

He put his wife’s arm in the arm of Wittipol (the Spanish lady).

Using a metaphor from metalworking, Fitzdottrel added, “Melt, cast, and form her as you shall think good. Set any stamp on her. I’ll receive her from you as a new thing, by your own standard!”

He exited.

“Well, sir!” Wittipol (the Spanish lady) said.

Wittipol (the Spanish lady) and Mrs. Frances Fitzdottrel exited.

— 4.5 —

Merecraft and Fitzdottrel talked together.

“But what have you done in your dependence, since we last talked about it?” Merecraft asked.

The dependence was Fitzdottrel’s quarrel with Wittipol.

“Oh, it goes on,” Fitzdottrel said. “I met your cousin, the Master —”

“You did not acquaint him, sir, with what you are now doing?” Merecraft asked.

He had advised Fitzdottrel to put his financial affairs in order and decide on a beneficiary, without consulting Everill.

Fitzdottrel replied, “Indeed, I did acquaint him with the facts, sir.

“And upon better thought, not without reason! He being chief officer might have taken it ill, if I had not. He might have taken it as an act of contempt against his office, and that in time, sir, might have drawn on another dependence — he and I might have had a quarrel.”

Merecraft had told Fitzdottrel that Everill was going to be Master of the Dependences, and so Fitzdottrel had thought it best to keep Everill informed about his dependence.

Fitzdottrel continued, “I did find him in good terms, and ready to do me any service.”

“So he said to you!” Merecraft said. “But sir, you do not know him.”

Fitzdottrel said, “Why, I presumed because this business of my wife’s required me to act, I could not have done better than consult Everill; and he told me that he would go immediately to your counsel, a knight, here, in the lane —”

“Yes, Justice Eitherside,” Merecraft said.

Fitzdottrel continued, “And get the deed of feoffment drawn, with a letter of attorney for livery and seisin.”

A deed of feoffment is a deed of freehold. “Livery and seisin” is a legal term for the delivery of property.

With these documents, an unscrupulous person could gain possession of Fitzdottrel’s entire estate. More than one con man wanted to gain possession of Fitzdottrel’s entire estate.

“That I know is the course of action.” Merecraft said. “But sir, you don’t mean to make him feoffee, do you?”

In other words: Do you intend to give Everill control of your entire estate?

Fitzdottrel said, “Nay, that I’ll pause on.”

Pitfall, Lady Tailbush’s female attendant, entered the room.

“What is it now, little Pitfall!” Merecraft asked.

“Your cousin Master Everill wants to come in — but he wants to know first whether Master Manly is here,” Pitfall said.

“No, tell Everill that Manly is not here,” Merecraft said. “Tell Everill that if Manly were here, I have made his peace.”

Actually, Manly still greatly disliked Everill — and Merecraft.

Pitfall exited.

Merecraft said quietly to Fitzdottrel about Everill, “He’s one, sir, who has no estate, and a man doesn’t know how such a trust may tempt him.”

“I understand what you are saying,” Fitzdottrel said.

Everill might be — make that definitely would be — tempted to misuse Fitzdottrel’s estate to benefit himself if he were to get control of it.

Everill and Plutarchus entered the room.

Everill said, “Sir, this same deed is done here.”

The deed was the deed of feoffment — the deed of freehold.

“Pretty Plutarchus!” Merecraft said. “Have thou come with it? And has Sir Paul Eitherside viewed it?”

“His signature is on the draft,” Plutarchus said.

Merecraft asked Fitzdottrel, “Will you step in, sir, and read it?”

“Yes,” Fitzdottrel said.

“Please, let me have a word with you,” Everill said to Fitzdottrel.

He took him aside and whispered, “Sir Paul Eitherside wanted me to tell you to be cautious about whom you will make feoffee, for this is the trust of your whole estate; and although my cousin here is a worthy gentleman, yet his valor — his ability to pay his debts — has at the gambling board been questioned, and we believe any man so impeached to be of doubtful honesty. I will not confirm the truth of this information, but I give it to you to make your profit of it. If you utter it, I can forswear it and deny that I ever told this to you.”

Fitzdottrel replied, "I believe you, and I thank you, sir."

Everyone exited.

— 4.6 —

Wittipol and Mrs. Frances Fitzdottrel talked together.

Although Wittipol was still dressed as the Spanish lady, he had revealed his true identity to her.

He said, "Don't be afraid, sweet lady. You're entrusted to love, not violence here: I am no ravisher, just one whom you, by your fair trust again, may of a servant make a most true friend."

A ravisher is a rapist.

In this context, a servant is an admirer, and a friend is a lover.

"And such a one I need, but not in this way," Mrs. Frances Fitzdottrel said.

She meant that she needed a most true friend but not a most true lover.

Manly snuck into the room, unnoticed, and hid.

Mrs. Frances Fitzdottrel continued, "Sir, let me confess to you that the splendid manner of your attempting this morning to persuade me to commit adultery with you intrigued me, and I acknowledge that my ability to devise plans and my manners were both engaged to give it a response — but not the response that you wanted. I never considered committing adultery.

"My hope was then — although it was interrupted before it could be uttered — that you whom I found to be the master of such language, that you who had the brain and the spirit for such an enterprise, could not but, if those good things were demanded to be used in a morally right cause, employ them virtuously, and make that profit of your noble qualities that they would yield.”

In other words, although Wittipol had been using his great gifts to attempt to do evil, she believed that he was capable of using his great gifts to do good.

She continued, “Sir, you have now the ground and cause to exercise them in — you can use your great gifts to do good.

“I am a woman who cannot speak more wretchedness of myself than you can read in my features and my life. I am matched — married — to a mass of folly — my husband — who every day hastens to his own ruin.

“The wealthy portion — my dowry — that I brought to him, he has spent, and, through my friends’ neglect, no jointure has been made for me.”

The jointure she meant was shared control of their estate, with the proviso that if she became a widow, she would have wealth enough to support herself. She wanted to be able to restrain her husband’s foolish losses of money. His wasteful spending and loss of money to astrologers and con men were threatening to impoverish them.

Mrs. Frances Fitzdottrel continued, “My fortunes standing in this precipice, it is counsel that I want, and honest aides. And in this way, I need you for a friend, never in any other meaning of the word — I don’t need a lover. My husband’s ill — his evil — must not make me, sir, worse.”

Manly, who had been eavesdropping while hidden, now revealed himself to Mrs. Frances Fitzdottrel and his friend Wittipol.

“Oh, friend, don’t forsake the splendid occasion virtue offers you to keep you innocent!” Manly said. “I have feared for both of you, and I have been watching you so I could prevent the ill I feared. But since the weaker side — the woman — has so assured me, let not the stronger fall by his own vice, or be the less a friend because virtue needs him.”

Manly was a good man, and he had been worried because his friend Wittipol wanted to commit adultery, which meant corrupting another man’s wife. Now Wittipol had a chance to do good for the woman he had been trying to persuade to do evil, and Manly wanted Wittipol to take advantage of the opportunity to do good.

Wittipol, although he had been tempted to do evil, was basically a good man. He said, “Virtue shall never ask for my help twice. Most friend, most man, your counsels are commands.”

Wittipol had been looking out for Manly by showing him that the woman he was wooing — Lady Tailbush — was not a morally good woman. Manly was looking out for Wittipol by advising him to act virtuously and help Mrs. Frances Fitzdottrel.

Both men appreciated the true friendship of the other.

Wittipol said to Mrs. Frances Fitzdottrel, “Lady, I can love the goodness in you more than I loved your beauty, and I here entitle your virtue to the power upon a life you shall engage in any fruitful service, even if it means forfeiting my life.”

He would help her, even if it meant losing his life.

Merecraft entered the room and said, “Madam.”

Mrs. Frances Fitzdottrel curtsied and then exited.

Merecraft took aside Wittipol, who was still dressed as the Spanish lady, and whispered to him, “Listen, sir. We have another leg strained — another plot activated — for this Dottrel. He has a quarrel to carry, and he has caused a deed of feoffment of his whole estate to be drawn yonder. He has the deed of feoffment within; and he intends to make feoffee only you: the Spanish lady. He's fallen so desperately in love with you, and talks almost like a madman — you have never heard a frantic lunatic so in love with his own fancy! Now, as you know, the deed of feoffment will have no validity if it is in the Spanish lady's name; therefore, I want you to advise Fitzdottrel to put the deed of feoffment in my name and give me control of his estate — here he comes — you shall have a share of his estate, sir.”

— 4.7 —

Fitzdottrel, Everill, and Plutarchus entered the room. Plutarchus was holding the deed of feoffment. No one had yet been named the feoffee: A blank space had been left in the document for the name or names to be entered later.

One might think that Fitzdottrel would name his wife as feoffee and let her have control of their estate rather than signing legal control of the estate over to a guardian, but Fitzdottrel did not consider this. Apparently, he did not love or respect — or trust — his wife enough for him to do this.

Fitzdottrel said to Wittipol (the Spanish lady), “Madam, I have a request to make to you, and before I make the request I say this to you: You must not deny me; I will be granted what I request.”

In other words: I won't take no for an answer.

“Sir, I must know what you are asking me to do, though,” Wittipol (the Spanish lady) said.

“No, lady, you must not know it,” Fitzdottrel said, “Yet you must know it, too, for the trust of it, and the fame indeed, which otherwise would be lost to me. I want to use your name in a deed of feoffment — I want to make my whole estate over to you: My whole estate is a trifle, a thing of nothing, some eighteen hundred pounds a year in income.”

“Alas!” Wittipol (the Spanish lady) said. “I don’t understand those things, sir. I am a woman, and I am most loathe to embark myself —”

“You will not slight me, madam?” Fitzdottrel asked.

“Nor will you quarrel with me?” Wittipol (the Spanish lady) asked.

“No, sweet madam, I have already a dependence — a quarrel — which is the reason I am doing this. Let me put you in the deed of feoffment, dear madam. As a result of my quarrel, I may be fairly killed.”

The quarrel could result in a duel and yes, Fitzdottrel might die in the duel, and so he needed to settle his estate and find a guardian for it before fighting the duel.

“You have your friends, sir, around you here,” Wittipol (the Spanish lady) said. “You may choose one of them as the feoffee.”

Hoping to be named the feoffee, Everill said to Fitzdottrel, “She tells you right, sir.”

Fitzdottrel replied, “By God’s death, so what if she does — what do I care for that? Tell her that I want her to tell me wrong.”

Wittipol (the Spanish lady) said, “Why, sir, if you want a recommendation for the trust, you may let me have the honor to name you whom I recommend.”

“It is you who do me the honor, madam,” Fitzdottrel said. “Who is it whom you recommend?”

“This gentleman,” Wittipol (the Spanish lady) said, pointing to Manly.

“Oh, no, sweet madam,” Fitzdottrel said. “He’s a friend to the man with whom I have the dependence — the quarrel.”

Wittipol (the Spanish lady) asked, “Who might he be?”

“He is named Wittipol,” Fitzdottrel replied, “Do you know him?”

“Alas, sir, he is just a toy, a trifle — you think that this gentleman is a friend to him?” Wittipol (the Spanish lady) said. “He is no more a friend to Wittipol than I am, sir!”

“But will Your Ladyship vouch for that, madam?” Fitzdottrel asked.

“Yes, and whatever else for him you will engage me,” Wittipol (the Spanish lady) said.

“What is his name?” Fitzdottrel asked.

“His name is Eustace Manly,” Wittipol (the Spanish lady) said.

“From where does he write himself?” Fitzdottrel asked.

“He is Eustace Manly of Middlesex, Esquire,” Wittipol (the Spanish lady) said.

“Say no more, madam,” Fitzdottrel said.

He then said to Plutarchus, “Clerk, come here. Write ‘Eustace Manly, squire of Middlesex’ as the feoffee on the deed of feoffment.”

Plutarchus wrote the name on the document and then gave it to Manly.

Merecraft whispered to Wittipol, “What have you done, sir?”

Wittipol whispered back, “I have named a gentleman for whom I’ll be answerable to you, sir. Had I named you, it might have raised suspicions. This way, all is safe.”

Fitzdottrel said, "Come, gentlemen, write your signatures as witnesses."

"What is this?" Manly asked. He disliked both Merecraft and Everill, who would sign the deed of feoffment as witnesses.

Everill said to Fitzdottrel, "You have made election of a most worthy gentleman."

He was pretending to approve of Manly's being selected as the feoffee on the deed of feoffment.

"I wish that a worthy man had said that!" Manly said to Everill. "Considering the man from whom it comes, it is rather a shame to me than a praise."

"Sir, I will give you any satisfaction," Everill said.

The satisfaction could be a duel, but Manly preferred silence.

"Be silent then," Manly said. "Falsehood does not commend the truth."

Plutarchus said to Fitzdottrel, "Do you deliver this, sir, as your deed to the use of Master Manly? Do you want him to be the feoffee on the deed of feoffment?"

"Yes," Fitzdottrel said.

He then said to Manly, "And sir, when did you see young Wittipol? I am ready for process now; sir, this is publication of my quarrel. He shall hear from me; he would necessarily be courting my wife, sir."

Manly said, "Yes, his cloak, which you are wearing, witnesses that what you say is true."

This remark made Fitzdottrel suspicious of Manly, and he said to him, "Nay, good sir."

Fitzdottrel then said to Wittipol (the Spanish lady), “Madam, you did assert —”

Wittipol (the Spanish lady) interrupted, “What?”

Fitzdottrel finished, “— that he was not Wittipol’s friend.”

“I have heard, sir, no confession of it,” Wittipol (the Spanish lady) replied.

He had not heard Manley confess that he was not Wittipol’s friend.

Fitzdottrel said to himself, “Oh, she doesn’t know the facts of the matter!”

He then said to Wittipol (the Spanish lady), “Now I remember, madam! This young Wittipol would have debauched my wife and made me a cuckold through a window; he did pursue her to her home to my own window; but I think I swooped on him, and violently moved her away from out of his claws. I have sworn to have him by the ears; I fear the toy will not do right by me.”

He was saying that he wanted to meet Wittipol in a duel, but he was afraid that Wittipol would not fight him.

“He won’t do right by you?” Wittipol (the Spanish lady) replied. “That would be a pity! What right do you ask, sir? Here is the man who will do right by you.”

Wittipol revealed his real identity; he no longer pretended to be the Spanish lady.

“Ha?” Fitzdottrel said. “Wittipol?”

“Aye, sir,” Wittipol said. “I am a lady no more now, nor am I a Spaniard.”

“No, indeed,” Manly said. “This is Wittipol.”

“Am I the thing I feared you would make me?” Fitzdottrel asked.

“A cuckold?” Wittipol said. “No, sir, but you were recently in possibility, I’ll tell you so much.”

He meant that he had recently had a possible opportunity to make Fitzdottrel a cuckold.

Good man that he was, Manly clarified, “But your wife’s too virtuous to make you a cuckold.”

“We’ll see her, sir, safely to her home, and leave you here to be made the Duke of Shoreditch with a project,” Wittipol said.

“Duke of Shoreditch” was a joke title; no real such Duke existed.

“Thieves! Ravishers!” Fitzdottrel said.

“Cry just one more note, sir, and I’ll mar the tune of your pipe,” Wittipol said.

Fitzdottrel said, “Give me my deed of feoffment, then.”

Wittipol told him, “No. That shall be kept for the good of your wife, who will know better than you how to use it.”

Manly would not use the deed of feoffment to benefit himself; it would be used to benefit Mrs. Frances Fitzdottrel. Doing so would also benefit Fitzdottrel, although he did not believe that.

Fitzdottrel thought about how he believed his wife would better know how to use it: “To feast you with my land?”

“Sir, be quiet, or I shall gag you before I go,” Wittipol said. “Consult your Master of Dependences about how to make this a second quarrel. You have time, sir.”

Wittipol shoved Fitzdottrel out of the way, and he and Manly exited.

“Oh!” Fitzdottrel said. “What will the ghost of my wise grandfather, my learned father, and my worshipful mother think about me now, they who left me in this world in state to be their heir? They will think that I have become a cuckold, and an ass, and my wife’s ward, and they will think that I am likely to lose my land and have my throat cut, all by her scheming!”

“Sir, we are all abused,” Merecraft said.

“And continue to be so!” Fitzdottrel said. “Who hinders you? Please, let me alone. I would ‘enjoy’ myself and be the Duke of Drowned-land you have made me.”

“Sir, we must play an after-game concerning this,” Merecraft said.

An after-game was a second game played to make up the losses suffered in the first game.

“But I am in no condition to be a gambler,” Fitzdottrel said. Because of the deed of feoffment, he had no money, no possessions, and no land.

He continued, “I tell you once again —”

Merecraft interrupted, “You must be ruled by me and take some counsel.”

He would advise Fitzdottrel about how to recover his estate.

Fitzdottrel replied, “Sir, I hate counsel, as I hate my wife, my wicked wife!”

“But we may think of a way for you to recover all your estate, if you will act,” Merecraft said.

“I will not think, nor act, nor yet recover,” Fitzdottrel said.
“Do not talk to me! I’ll run out of my wits rather than listen to you. I will be what I am, Fabian Fitzdottrel, although all the world say nay to it.”

He exited.

Merecraft said to Everill, “Let’s follow him.”

ACT 5 (The Devil is an Ass)

— 5.1 —

Outside Lady Tailbush's house, Ambler and Pitfall talked together. Ambler, Lady Tailbush's manservant, had been missing all day, and he was worried about losing his job.

"But has my lady missed me?" Ambler asked.

"Beyond telling!" Pitfall said. "Here has been that infinity of strangers! And then she would have had you to have used you as a good model compared with one inside whom they are now teaching, and who is ambitious to be of your rank."

"Good fellow-servant Pitfall, tell Master Merecraft that I entreat a word with him."

Pitfall exited.

Alone, Ambler said to himself, "This most unlucky accident will go near to be the loss of my job, I fear!"

Merecraft entered the scene.

"A word with me?" Merecraft said. "What do you want to say to me, Master Ambler?"

"Sir, I would beseech Your Worship to protect me from my Lady Tailbush's displeasure at my absence," Ambler said.

"Oh, is that all?" Merecraft said. "I promise you that I will."

"I want to tell you, sir, just how it happened," Ambler said.

"Be brief, good Master Ambler, put yourself to your rack and exert yourself to be brief, for I have work of more importance to attend to."

"Sir, you'll laugh at me," Ambler said. "But — it is the truth — a true friend of mine, finding by conversation with me that I lived too chastely for my health, and indeed too honest for my place, sir, advised me that if I loved myself — as I do, I must confess —”

“Spare me your parenthetical remarks,” Merecraft said. “Get to the point.”

“That I should give my body a little evacuation —”

Occasionally, testicles ought to be emptied of semen.

“Well, and you went to a whore?” Merecraft asked.

“No, sir,” Ambler said. “I dared not, for fear gossip might arrive at somebody’s ear. I would not entrust myself to a common whorehouse.”

He then spoke this rapidly:

“But I got the gentlewoman to go with me and carry her bedding to a conduit-head close by the place toward Tyburn that they call my Lord Mayor’s Banqueting House.

“Now, sir, this morning there was a public execution at Tyburn, and I never dreamt of it until I heard the noise of the people and the horses, and neither I nor the poor gentlewoman dared to stir until all was done and past, so that in the interim we fell asleep again.”

The conduit brought drinking water to London. The conduit-head had places where a couple could hide and have sex.

Out of breath, he stopped speaking.

“Nay, if you fall from your gallop, I am gone, sir,” Merecraft said.

Ambler rapidly continued, “But when I waked to put on my clothes — a suit I had had made for the occasion — it was gone, and so was all my money, with my purse, my seals, my notebooks, my studies, and a fine new device I had to carry my pen and ink, my civet perfume, and my toothpicks, all in one case. But that which grieved me most was the thefts of the gentlewoman's shoes, with a pair of roses and garters I had given her for the business."

Ambler continued, "So that made us stay until it was dark, for I was obliged to lend her my shoes, and walk in a rug by her, barefoot to Saint Giles' church."

"A kind of Irish penance!" Merecraft said.

Some impoverished Irish wore clothing made out of rug cloth.

Merecraft then asked, "Is this all, sir?"

"I want you to satisfy Lady Tailbush that I deserve to keep my job," Ambler replied.

"I promise you that I will, sir," Merecraft said.

"I have told you my true disaster," Ambler said.

"I cannot stay with you, sir, to console you, but I rejoice in your return," Merecraft said.

He went inside.

"He is an honest gentleman!" Ambler said. "But he's never at leisure to relax and be himself because he has such tides of business."

He went inside.

— 5.2 —

Alone, Pug said to himself, "Oh, call me home again, dear chief, and put me to work yoking foxes, milking he-goats, pounding water in a mortar, emptying the sea dry with a nutshell, gathering all the leaves that have fallen this autumn, drawing farts out of dead bodies, making ropes out of sand, catching the winds together in a net, mustering ants, and numbering atoms — all that Hell and you thought exquisite torments, rather than keep me here for the length of time it takes to think a thought! I would sooner keep fleas within a circle and keep track for a thousand years which of them out-leaped the other and by how far, than endure a minute more of such torment as I have suffered within this house. There is no Hell compared to a lady of fashion — all your tortures in Hell are enjoyable pastimes compared to spending time with a lady of fashion! It would be refreshing for me to be in hellfire again and away from here!”

Ambler entered the scene, looked at him, and said to himself, “This man is wearing my suit, and those are the gentlewoman’s shoes and roses!”

Apparently, Pug had small feet, and so he had stolen the gentlewoman’s shoes rather than Ambler’s shoes. Small feet may be a cause of the myth saying the devils have cloven hooves rather than feet.

“They have such impertinent vexations that a general council of devils could not hit on,” Pug continued.

He noticed Ambler and said to himself, “Ha! This is the man I took asleep with his wench and borrowed his clothes. What might I do to frustrate him?”

“Do you hear me, sir?” Ambler asked.

Pug said to himself, “Answer him, but not to the purpose.”

“What is your name, I ask you, sir?” Ambler asked.

“Is it so late, sir?” Pug said, deliberately not answering the question.

“I ask you not for the time, but for your name, sir,” Ambler said.

“I thank you, sir,” Pug said. “Yes, it does hold, sir, certainly.”

“Hold, sir?” Ambler said. “What holds? I must both hold and talk to you about these clothes you are wearing.”

“A very pretty lace!” Pug said. “But the tailor cheated me.”

“No, I am cheated by you!” Ambler said. “Robbed!”

“Why, when you please, sir, I am ready for the game of threepenny gleek,” Pug said. “I am your man for that.”

“A pox on your gleek and threepence!” Ambler said. “Give me an answer.”

“Sir, my master is the best at it,” Pug said.

“Your master!” Ambler said. “Who is your master?”

“Let it be Friday night,” Pug said.

“What should be then?” Ambler asked.

“Your best song’s ‘Tom o’ Bedlam,’” Pug said.

A Tom o’ Bedlam was a lunatic who had been released from Bethlem Royal Hospital and licensed so he could beg.

“I think you are he,” Ambler said to Pug.

He then asked himself, “Does he mock me on purpose, I wonder? Or am I not speaking to him what I mean?”

He then said to Pug, “Good sir, what is your name?”

“Only a couple of cocks, sir,” Pug said. “If we can get a widgeon, it is in season.”

Widgeons were a species of bird that was in season in England during autumn.

Ambler said to himself, “He hopes to make one of these Sciptics of me — I think I got their name right — and he does not flee from me. I wonder at that! It is a strange confidence!”

By “Sciptics” he meant Skeptics — philosophers who did not think that knowledge was objective.

Ambler continued saying to himself, “I’ll try another way to draw a real answer from him.”

Ambler exited.

— 5.3 —

Merecraft, Fitzdottrel, and Everill entered the scene. Pug withdrew to a space where he could hear but was unlikely to be seen. He listened to everything the newcomers said.

Merecraft was trying to convince Fitzdottrel to say that his wife was a witch who had caused him to become possessed by a demon. If his wife was brought to trial and convicted as a witch, she would be unable to control her husband’s property.

Who would then control Fitzdottrel’s property? If Fitzdottrel were thought to be bewitched, he would not be able to. Both Merecraft and Everill, of course, were eager to control Fitzdottrel’s property. At this time, Fitzdottrel still did not know that Merecraft and Everill were con men.

“It is the easiest thing, sir, to be done,” Merecraft said to Fitzdottrel. “It is as simple as farting silently.”

This is not always easy to do. So the author of the book you are reading has heard.

Merecraft continued, “Roll your eyes, and foam at the mouth. A little Castile soap will do for foam — rub it on your lips. And then get a nutshell with inflammable fibers and tinder in it so you can spit fire.”

Presumably, the “possessed” person would be able to secretly get the finely ground fibers and tinder from the nutshell to his lips, and then spray them into a fireplace or over the flame of a candle, creating a fireball and conveying the impression to bystanders that he had spit fire.

Merecraft continued, “Did you never read, sir, about little Darrel’s tricks, the boy of Burton, the seven in Lancashire, and Sommers at Nottingham? All these people’s histories teach these tricks. And we’ll say, sir, that your wife has bewitched you —”

These people had faked or convinced others to fake being bewitched.

John Darrel had performed exorcisms on people and had caused a man to be executed. In 1599 he was accused of being an imposter and was imprisoned.

The boy of Burton was Thomas Darling, who had pretended to be bewitched and had claimed that a mouse had come out of his mouth.

Seven children in Lancashire were supposedly bewitched when a man named Edward (or perhaps Edmund) Hartley kissed them and breathed evil spirits in them.

William Sommers of Nottingham was also supposed to have been bewitched. John Darrel exorcized him.

Everill said, “And we’ll say that your wife conspired with those two, as sorcerers.”

“Those two” were Wittipol and Manly.

Merecraft said, “And we’ll say that they gave you potions, by which means you were not compos mentis — of sound mind — when you made your feoffment. There's no recovery of your estate unless you do this. This, sir, will sting; it will be fatal."

The punishment for being found guilty of witchcraft was death.

Everill added, "And it will move in a court of equity."

Such a court could overrule both common law and statute law — as well as common sense.

"For it is more than manifest that this was a plot of your wife's to get your land," Merecraft said.

"I think that is true," Fitzdottrel said.

"Sir, so it appears," Everill said.

Merecraft said, "Indeed, and my cousin has known these gallants in these shapes —"

Everill finished the sentence: "— to have done strange things, sir. One as the lady, the other as the squire."

They were referring to Wittipol and Manly. They were saying that Wittipol had dressed as a lady, and Manly had been her squire.

The squire could be a personal servant or a lover.

"How a man's honesty may be fooled!" Merecraft said. "I thought that he was a real lady."

"So did I — renounce me and cast me aside if I did not," Fitzdottrel said.

"But this way, sir, you'll be revenged in full," Merecraft said.

"Upon them all," Everill added.

“Yes, indeed,” Merecraft said, “and since your wife has run the way of woman thus, even give her —”

Fitzdottrel interrupted, “— she is lost, I swear by this hand of mine, to me. She is dead to all the joys of her dear Dottrel! I shall never pity her who could pity herself. I cannot pity a woman who puts her own interests first because she pities herself.”

“That is princely resolved, sir,” Merecraft said, “and like yourself still, in potentia.”

Fitzdottrel was still not a duke; he was only potentially a duke. According to Merecraft, Fitzdottrel was acting like the duke he would soon be.

Pug, standing hidden, had overheard the plot.

— 5.4 —

Gilthead, Plutarchus (Gilthead’s son), the constable Sledge, and some sergeants of the law arrived on the scene.

Merecraft asked, “Gilthead, what is the news?”

Fitzdottrel, who was in need of money, asked for the hundred pieces Gilthead was supposed to have given him earlier: “Oh, sir, my hundred pieces. Let me have them yet.”

“Yes, sir,” Gilthead replied.

He then said, “Officers of the law, arrest him.”

“Me?” Fitzdottrel asked.

“I arrest you,” a sergeant said.

“Keep the peace, I order you, gentlemen,” the constable Sledge said.

“Arrest me?” Fitzdottrel said. “Why?”

“For better security, sir,” Gilthead said. “My son Plutarchus assures me you’re not worth a groat. Your net worth is not even a small coin of little value.”

“Pardon me, father,” Plutarchus said. “I said His Worship had no foot of land left, and that I’ll justify, for I wrote the deed of feoffment.”

Gilthead had placed Plutarchus, his son, with Sir Paul Eitherside so that he could learn law.

“Do you have these tricks in the city?” Fitzdottrel asked. He was a squire of Norfolk and so was not a citizen of London.

“Yes, and more,” Gilthead said.

Pointing at Merecraft, he then said to the officers of the law, “Arrest this gallant, too, here, at my suit.”

“Aye, and at mine,” Sledge said. “He owes me for his lodging rent two years and a quarter.”

Apparently, being a con man doesn’t pay well, or if it does, it does so only occasionally.

Merecraft said, “Why, Master Gilthead, and landlord . . . thou are not mad, though thou are constable. Thou are not puffed up with the pride of the place. Isn’t that right? Do you hear me, sirs? Have I deserved this from you two for all my pains at court to get you each a patent — a monopoly?”

Gilthead asked, “A patent for what?”

“A patent concerning my project of the forks,” Merecraft replied.

Forks were not yet widely in use in London and England.

“Forks?” Sledge asked. “What are forks?”

Instead of saying what forks were, Merecraft mentioned some of the advantages of forks: Less food would be spilled, and so less linen and less washing would be needed.

Merecraft said, “The laudable use of forks, brought into custom here, as they are in Italy, to the sparing of napkins. Sledge, this project would have made your bellows go at the forge, as it would have made Gilthead’s go at the furnace. I had procured it, had the signet for it, dealt with the linen-draper in private because I feared they were the likeliest to ever stir against it and to cross it, for it will be a mighty saver of linen through the kingdom — as that is one of my reasons for promoting the project, and to spare washing — now, on you two I had laid all the profits. Gilthead would have the making of all those forks made of gold and silver for the better personages, and you would have the making of those forks made of steel for the common sort. And both of you would have monopolies by patent. I would have brought you your seals in. But now you have prevented me from doing that, and I ‘thank’ you.”

Sledge was persuaded by Merecraft’s words that Merecraft was trying to help Sledge — and Gilthead — make money.

“Sir, I will provide bail for you at my own risk,” Sledge said.

Merecraft said to Gilthead, “Choose what you will do.”

Plutarchus said to Gilthead, “You do the same thing as Sledge, too, good father.”

“I like the fashion of the project well,” Gilthead said. “The forks! It may be a lucky project! And it is not complicated and intricate, as one would say, but fit for plain heads as ours to deal in.”

He then said, “Listen to me, officers — we discharge you.”

The officers of the law exited. Sledge stayed.

Merecraft said, "Why, this shows a little good nature in you, I confess, but do not tempt your friends thus."

He then said to Plutarchus, "Little Gilthead, advise your sire, great Gilthead, to avoid such courses of action as this action he almost did, and such courses of action as troubling a great man in reversion — a great man who is about to reclaim all his wealth — over a matter of fifty pounds on a false alarm. Away with such courses of action! They do not show him in a good light. Let him get the hundred pieces and bring them here. You'll hear more else."

Plutarchus said, "Father!"

Gilthead and Plutarchus exited.

— 5.5 —

Ambler entered the scene. Seeing Pug, he dragged him out of hiding, and then he said, "Oh, Master Sledge, are you here? I have been to seek you. You are the constable, they say. Here's one whom I charge with felony, on account of the suit he is wearing, sir."

"Who?" Merecraft said. "Master Fitzdottrel's manservant? Beware what you are doing, Master Ambler."

"Sir, these clothes that he is wearing, I'll swear, are mine," Ambler said, "and he has on the shoes of the gentlewoman I told you of, and I will have him before a justice of the law."

"My master, sir, will pass his word for me," Pug said. "He will vouch for me."

"Oh, can you speak to the purpose now?" Ambler said sarcastically. "Now you can talk sense."

Fitzdottrel did not vouch for Pug; instead, he said to him, "Not I. If you are such a thief, sir, I will leave you to your godfathers-in-law. Let twelve men work."

The twelve godfathers-in-law were jurists. Fitzdottrel was willing for Pug to be brought to trial. If he were found guilty, he would be sentenced to death.

“Listen to me, sir,” Pug said. “Please, let’s talk in private.”

They moved away from the others and talked quietly.

“Well, what do you say?” Fitzdottrel said. “Be brief, for I have no time to lose.”

Pug replied, “The truth is, sir, I am truly a devil, and I had permission to take this body I am in to serve you, which belonged to a cutpurse who was hanged this morning. And it is likewise true that I stole this suit in order to clothe myself. But, sir, don’t let me go to prison for it. I have hitherto lost time and done nothing; I have shown, indeed, no part of my devil’s nature. Now I will so help your malice against these parties. Now I will so advance the business that you have at hand of witchcraft and your possession, as if I myself were in you. Now I will teach you such tricks as how to make your belly swell and how to make your eyes turn, and how to foam, to stare, to gnash your teeth together, and to beat yourself, to laugh loud, and to feign six voices —”

“Get out, you rogue!” Fitzdottrel said. “You most infernal counterfeit wretch! Get out! Do you think to gull me with your Aesop’s fables?”

He did not believe that Pug was a real devil.

He said to the constable Sledge, “Here, take him into your custody; I want no part of him.”

Pug began, “Sir —”

“Go away!” Fitzdottrel said. “I disclaim you. I will not listen to you.”

Sledge led Pug away to take him to prison.

“What did he say to you, sir?” Merecraft asked.

“Like a lying rascal, he told me he was the devil,” Fitzdottrel said.

“What!” Merecraft said. “A good jest!”

“And he said that he would teach me very fine devils’ tricks for our new resolution,” Fitzdottrel said.

“Oh, pox on him!” Everill said. “It was excellently wisely done, sir, not to trust him.”

“Why, even if he were the devil, we shall not need him, if you’ll be advised,” Merecraft said.

Merecraft and Everill would teach Fitzdottrel very fine devils’ tricks for their new resolution.

Merecraft then laid out the plot:

“Fitzdottrel, go throw yourself on a bed, sir, and feign that you are ill. We’ll not be seen with you until after you have a fit, and that is confirmed within.

“Everill, stay with the two ladies — Lady Tailbush and Lady Eitherside — and persuade them to assist us.

“I’ll go to Justice Eitherside and tell him all about the ‘bewitchment.’ I mean that I will tell him that Fitzdottrel is bewitched.

“Trains shall seek out Engine, and the two of them will fill the town with the news of Fitzdottrel’s ‘bewitchment.’”

Using a nautical metaphor, Merecraft said, “Every cable is to be paid out. We must employ all our emissaries to spread the news now.”

He meant that they must use every means to spread the news of the “bewitchment.”

Merecraft then said to Fitzdottrel, “Sir, I will send you bladders and bellows.”

The bellows would blow up the bladders, which Fitzdottrel would use to make it seem as if his belly were distended by a demon or demons within him.

“Sir, be confident,” Merecraft added. “This is no hard thing to outdo the devil in. A thirteen-year-old boy made him an ass just the other day.”

A boy named John Smith claimed to have been bewitched; this resulted in the executions of nine women in July 1616. King James I then exposed the boy as a faker.

“Making the devil an ass” means “doing more evil than the devil.” Today, we might call such a person “the devil’s asshole.”

Fitzdottrel said, “Well, I’ll begin to practice, and escape the imputation of being made a cuckold by my own act.”

“You’re right,” Merecraft said. “You will.”

Fitzdottrel exited.

Now that Everill and Merecraft were alone, they could talk openly.

“Come,” Everill said, “admit that you have put yourself and your friends into a complete mess here, by dealing with new agents in new plots. Your complications have muddled everything up.”

“Speak no more about that, sweet cousin,” Merecraft said. He was embarrassed.

“What had you to do with this Wittipol and his pretending to be a lady?” Everill asked.

“Don’t ask about that,” Merecraft said. “It is over and done.”

“You had some strain above E-la?” Everill asked.

“E-la” is a high note in music.

Merecraft admitted, “I had indeed.”

“And now you crack because of it,” Everill said.

To crack on a note means to attempt — but fail — to sing it. Merecraft had attempted to get all rather than part of Fitzdottrel’s wealth, and now he was in danger of getting none of it unless this new plot worked.

“Don’t upbraid me,” Merecraft said. “Don’t criticize me.”

“Come, you must be criticized about it,” Everill said. “You are so greedy always to grab more than you are able to get that you lose everything.”

“That is right,” Merecraft admitted. “What more do you want me to do than to admit that I am guilty? Now, give me your aid.”

They exited.

Shackles, the jail keeper of Newgate Prison, brought Pug into a cell.

He said, “Here you are lodged, sir; you must send your garnish, if you’ll be private.”

The garnish was a bribe to the jail keeper for private accommodations.

Pug gave him some money and said, “There it is, sir. Leave me.”

Shackles exited.

“To Newgate brought?” Pug said. “How the name of ‘devil’ is discredited in me! What a lost fiend shall I be on my return to Hell! My chief will roar in triumph, now that I have been on earth for a day and have done no notable deed except bring back here the body that was hanged this morning.

“Well! I wish that it were midnight so that I knew my fate.”

At midnight, Pug was supposed to return to Hell and make his report to Satan, who would sentence him for accomplishing no notable evil while he was in the Land of the Living.

Pug continued, “I think that Time is drunk and sleeps. He is so still, and he doesn’t move! I glory now in my torment. Neither can I expect it; I have it with my fact.”

He was already being tormented even before returning to Hell. He was tormented by his lack of success among the living, and he was tormented by the fact that he had ended up in Newgate Prison although he was a devil. He also was tormented by the knowledge that Satan would punish him when he returned to Hell. What’s worse, Time was moving so slowly that it dragged out his torment.

Iniquity the Vice entered the scene and said to Pug, “Child of Hell, be merry! Put a look on as round, boy, and as red as a cherry. Cast care behind thee and dance in thy fetters; They are ornaments, baby, that have graced thy betters.

“Look at me, and listen,” Iniquity the Vice said. “Our chief salutes thee, and, lest the cold iron of your fetters should chance to confute thee, he has sent thee grant-parole by me to stay a month longer here on earth, so you can learn to welcome cold and hunger, child —”

“What?” Pug said. “Shall I stay here a month longer?”

“Yes, boy, until the legal Session, so that thou may be found guilty and have a triumphal egression,” Iniquity the Vice said.

“A triumphal egression in a cart, to be hanged!” Pug said.

Theft was a capital crime, and those found guilty were taken in a cart to the place of execution, where they were hanged.

Iniquity the Vice said, “No, child, in a car — the chariot of triumph, which most of them are.”

“Car” and “chariot” were fancy words for “cart.”

Iniquity the Vice continued, “And in the meantime, you will be greasy and boozy and drunken, and nasty and filthy, and ragged and louse-y, with ‘damn me,’ ‘renounce me,’ and all the fine phrases that bring to Tyburn the plentiful gazes.”

Thieves were taken in a cart from Newgate Prison to Tyburn to be hung. Often, many people lined the route to see the condemned prisoner.

“He is a devil!” Pug said. “And he may well be our chief devil! The great superior devil! On account of his malice, he may well be Arch-devil! I acknowledge him. He knew what I would suffer when he tied me up thus in a rogue’s body, and he has — I thank him — his tyrannous pleasure on me, to confine me to the unlucky carcass of a cutpurse, wherein I could do nothing.”

Satan entered the scene and upbraided Pug with his day’s work:

“Impudent fiend, stop thy lewd mouth.

“Don’t thou shame and tremble to lay thine own dull damned defects upon an innocent carcass there? Why, thou miserable slave, the spirit that possessed that flesh before you took it over put more true life in a finger and a thumb than thou have in the whole mass! Yet thou rebel and complain?

“What one attempt have thou made that is wicked enough, this day, that might be called worthy of thine own name, much less worthy the name of Satan, who sent thee?

“First, thou did help thyself get a beating from Fitzdottrel promptly, and with it thou also endangered thy tongue. You were afraid that you would have your tongue cut out. You are a devil, and yet you could not keep a body unbeaten for even one day! So much for that being for our credit.

“And to get revenge for it, you stopped, for anything thou know, a deed of darkness, which was an act of that egregious folly as no one sympathetic toward the devil could have thought of.”

Pug had informed Fitzdottrel about the meeting at the windows of his wife and Wittipol. By doing that, he had possibly stopped an act of adultery.

Satan continued, “So much for your acting! But now for your suffering! Why, a man wearing a false beard and a reversible cloak cheated thee. Indeed, would your predecessor the cutpurse, do you think, have been taken advantage of like that? Damn thee! Thou have done much harm: Thou have let men know their strength and that they’re able to out-do a devil that has been put in a body — this will forever be a scar upon our name!

“Whom have thou dealt with, woman or man, this day, but they have outdone thee in some way, and most have proved to be the better fiends?

“Yet you would be employed? Yes, Hell shall make you the spiritual leader of the cheaters with false dice!

“Or Hell shall make you the bawd-ledger — the resident ambassador for the pimps and whores — for this side of the town!

“No doubt you’ll render a splendid account of things. Bane of your itch, and scratching for employment! I’ll have brimstone — sulphur — to relieve it, to be sure, and I’ll have fire to singe your fingernails off.”

Devils prefer to keep their fingernails long.

Satan continued, “Except that I would not have such a damned dishonor stick on our state — the dishonor that a devil were hanged and could not save a body that he took from Tyburn, but that body must go there again — you would ride the cart to the gallows.”

Satan then said to The Vice named Iniquity, “But up, away with him —”

Iniquity the Vice put Pug upon his back so he could carry him away, saying to him, “Mount, darling of darkness. My shoulders are broad; he that carries the fiend is sure of his load. The Devil was accustomed to carry away the Evil, but now the Evil carries away the Devil.”

In the morality plays of the Middle Ages, the Devil carried away on his back the Vice or Evil.

They exited.

— 5.7 —

A great noise was heard in Newgate Prison. Frightened, Shackles the jail keeper and some other jail keepers came into Pug’s jail cell. The body that Pug had occupied was lying on the floor.

“Oh, me!” Shackles said.

“What’s this?” the first jail keeper asked.

“A piece of Justice Hall has broken down,” the second jail keeper said.

“Phew!” the third jail keeper said. “What a steam of brimstone is here!”

“The prisoner who came in just now is dead!” the fourth jail keeper said.

“Ha?” Shackles said. “Where?”

“Look here,” the fourth jail keeper said, pointing.

“By God’s eyelid, I should know his face!” the first jail keeper said. “It is Gill Cutpurse, the thief who was hanged this morning!”

“It is him!” Shackles said.

“The devil surely has a hand in this!” the second jail keeper said.

“What shall we do?” the third jail keeper said.

“Carry the news of it to the sheriffs,” Shackles said.

“And to the Justices,” the first jail keeper said.

“This is strange!” the fourth jail keeper said.

“And smells strongly of the devil!” the third jail keeper said.

“I have the sulphur of Hell-coal in my nose,” the second jail keeper said.

“Phew!” the first jail keeper said.

“Carry him in,” Shackles said.

“Let’s go,” the first jail keeper said.

“How rank it is!” the second jail keeper said.

They exited, carrying the body.

Sir Paul Eitherside, Merecraft, Everill, Trains, Fitzdottrel, Lady Eitherside, Lady Tailbush, Pitfall, Ambler, and some attendants had assembled in the courtroom. Fitzdottrel was lying in a bed.

Sir Paul Eitherside, who was the Justice, was wondering about and marveling at the case as the others told him about it.

“This is the most notable conspiracy that I ever heard of,” Sir Paul Eitherside said.

Merecraft said, “Sir, they had given Fitzdottrel potions that made him fall in love with the counterfeit lady —”

Everill interrupted, “— right up to the time of the delivery of the deed —”

Merecraft interrupted, “— and then the witchcraft began to appear, for immediately he fell into his fit —”

Everill interrupted, “— of rage at first, sir, which since has much increased.”

“Good Sir Paul,” Lady Tailbush requested, “see Fitzdottrel, and punish the impostors.”

“That is the reason for why I came here, madam,” Sir Paul Eitherside said.

“Let Master Eitherside alone, madam,” Lady Eitherside said. “He knows what to do.”

“Do you hear?” Sir Paul Eitherside said. “Call in the constable; I will have him by us. He’s the King’s officer! And let’s have some citizens of credible reputation by us! I’ll discharge my conscience clearly. I’ll perform my duty as according to my conscience.”

“Yes, sir,” Merecraft said.

An attendant exited to carry out Sir Paul Eitherside’s orders.

Merecraft added, “And send for Fitzdottrel’s wife.”

“And for the two sorcerers, by any means necessary!” Everill said.

Another attendant exited.

“I thought one a true lady,” Lady Tailbush said. “I would have sworn he was a lady.”

She said to Lady Eitherside, “So did you, Lady Eitherside! You thought that he was a lady!”

“Yes, I did. I swear by that light, and I wish that I might never stir if I am lying, Lady Tailbush.”

“And I thought that the other one was a civil gentleman,” Lady Tailbush said.

“But, madam, you know what I told Your Ladyship,” Everill said.

Manly had asked Everill to say nice things about him to Lady Tailbush when he was courting her, but instead Everill had said bad things about him.

“I now see the truth of it,” Lady Tailbush said. “I was providing a banquet for them, after I had finished instructing the fellow De-vile, who was the gentleman’s manservant.”

“The fellow De-vile has been found to be a thief, madam,” Merecraft said. “He robbed your usher Master Ambler this morning.”

“What!” Lady Tailbush said.

“I’ll tell you more soon,” Merecraft said.

Fitzdottrel began to act as if he were having a fit.

He shouted, "Give me some garlic! Garlic! Garlic! Garlic!"

Garlic is supposed to be good at protecting oneself from demons.

"Listen to the poor gentleman," Merecraft said. "How he is tormented!"

"My wife is a whore," Fitzdottrel shouted at Sir Paul Eitherside. "I'll kiss her no more, and why? Mayn't thou be a cuckold, as well as I? Ha! Ha! Ha! Ha! Ha! Ha! Ha!"

Devils and cuckolds have horns.

Was Sir Paul Eitherside a cuckold? Perhaps. Earlier, when Wittipol was pretending to be the Spanish lady, Lady Eitherside had said, "As I am honest, Tailbush, I think that if nobody should love me but my poor husband, I would just hang myself."

Trying to understand the words and sounds, Sir Paul Eitherside said, "That is the devil who speaks and laughs in him."

"Do you think so, sir?" Merecraft asked.

"I discharge my conscience," Sir Paul Eitherside said. "On my conscience, I believe that."

"And isn't the devil good company?" Fitzdottrel shouted. "Yes, certainly."

As part of his "possession," Fitzdottrel was speaking at various times with different voices: that of a man, that of a woman, that of a child. More than one demon can possess a human being.

"How he changes, sir, his voice!" Everill said.

Of course, both Merecraft and Everill were trying to convince Sir Paul Eitherside — the Justice — that Fitzdottrel was bewitched.

Fitzdottrel shouted, “And a cuckold is wherever he puts his head with a vengeance if his horns are forth — the devil’s companion! Look, look, look, else.”

“How he foams at the mouth!” Merecraft said.

“And how his belly swells!” Everill said.

“Oh, me!” Lady Tailbush said. “What’s that there, rising in his belly?”

The swelling resembled that of an erection.

“A strange thing!” Lady Eitherside said. “Hold it down.”

Trains and Pitfall both said, “We cannot, madam.”

“It is too apparent, this!” Sir Paul Eitherside said. “What I am seeing cannot be doubted.”

Wittipol and Manly and Mrs. Frances Fitzdottrel entered the room.

“Wittipol!” Fitzdottrel cried. “Wittipol!”

“What is this?” Wittipol asked. “What play have we here?”

He knew immediately that Fitzdottrel was acting.

“What fine new matters?” Manly asked.

“The Coxcomb and the Coverlet,” Wittipol said, making up a title for the “play.”

A coxcomb is a fool. People who pretended to be bewitched covered themselves with a coverlet in order to hide their paraphernalia, such as bladders and bellows to make it appear that their belly was swelling.

“Oh, strange impudence!” Merecraft said. “That these should come to face their sin!”

He had been one of the people calling for them to be forced to come.

“And to outface — defy — justice and the Justice,” Everill said. “They are the parties, sir. They are responsible for the witchcraft.”

“Say nothing,” Sir Paul Eitherside said.

“Did you notice, sir, upon their coming in, how Fitzdottrel called out ‘Wittipol’?” Merecraft asked.

“And he never saw them come in,” Everill said.

“I promise you that I did notice that,” Sir Paul Eitherside said. “Let them play a while.”

He wanted to see what would happen.

Fitzdottrel hummed, “Buzz! Buzz! Buzz! Buzz.”

“It’s a pity — the poor gentleman!” Lady Tailbush said. “How he is tortured!”

“For shame, Master Fitzdottrel!” his wife said, going over to him. “What do you mean by counterfeiting being bewitched like this?”

“Oh!” Fitzdottrel said. “Oh! She comes with a needle, and thrusts it in, she pulls out that, and she puts in a pin, and now, and now! I don’t know how and I don’t know where, but she pricks me here, and she pricks me there. Oh! Oh!”

Sir Paul Eitherside said to Mrs. Frances Fitzdottrel, “Woman, stop doing that!”

“What, sir?” Wittipol asked.

“A practice that is foul for one so fair,” Sir Paul Eitherside said.

Wittipol asked Sir Paul Eitherside, “Do you really believe this playacting?”

Manly also asked Sir Paul Eitherside, “Do you believe in it?”

“Gentlemen, I’ll discharge my conscience,” Sir Paul Eitherside said. “This is clearly a conspiracy! A dark and devilish practice! I detest it!”

“The justice surely will prove to be the merrier man!” Wittipol said.

According to Wittipol, Sir Paul Eitherside was funnier and more to be laughed at than Fitzdottrel — Sir Paul was the bigger fool.

“This is very strange, sir,” Wittipol said.

“Don’t confront authority with impudence,” Sir Paul Eitherside said. “I tell you, I detest it.”

Gilthead and Sledge entered the room.

Sir Paul Eitherside said, “Here comes Sledge — the King’s constable — and with him is a very honorable commoner and my good friend, Master Gilthead. I am glad that before such witnesses I can profess my conscience and my detestation of it. Horrible! Most unnatural! Abominable!”

He had misspoken: “I am glad that before such witnesses I can profess my conscience and my detestation of it” sounded as if he detested his conscience.

No doubt Wittipol and Manly did.

While the others were paying attention to the new arrivals, Merecraft and Everill advised Fitzdottrel.

Everill whispered to Fitzdottrel, “You do not contort your body enough.”

Merecraft whispered to him, “Wallow! Gnash your teeth!”

Fitzdottrel redoubled his efforts.

“Oh, how he is vexed!” Lady Tailbush said.

“It is very manifest,” Sir Paul Eitherside said.

Everill whispered to Merecraft, “Give him more soap to foam with.”

He whispered to Fitzdottrel, “Now lie still.”

Once Fitzdottrel stopped thrashing around in bed, Merecraft was able to secretly slip some soap to him.

Merecraft whispered, “And act a little.”

Fitzdottrel began to mime smoking tobacco.

Lady Tailbush asked Sir Paul Eitherside, who had been interpreting Fitzdottrel’s actions and words, “What is he doing now, sir?”

Sir Paul Eitherside said, “He is showing the taking of tobacco, with which the Devil is so delighted.”

“Hum!” Fitzdottrel shouted.

“And he is calling for hum — strong ale,” Sir Paul Eitherside said. “You takers of strong waters and tobacco, look closely at this.”

Fitzdottrel shouted as he clapped his hands, “Yellow! Yellow! Yellow! Yellow!”

“That’s yellow starch,” Sir Paul Eitherside said. “The devil’s the idol of that color. He ratifies it with clapping of his hands. The proofs are pregnant — they are convincing.”

“How the devil can act!” Gilthead said.

“He is the master of actors, Master Gilthead, and of playwrights, too!” Sir Paul Eitherside said. “You heard him talk in rhyme! I forgot to mention it to you, a while ago.”

Earlier, the play-acting Fitzdottrel had said, “My wife is a whore. I’ll kiss her no more!”

He had also said, “She comes with a needle, and thrusts it in, she pulls out that, and she puts in a pin, and now, and now! I don’t know how and I don’t know where, but she pricks me here, and she pricks me there.”

Fitzdottrel used the finely ground fibers he had put in a walnut shell to create a fireball.

“See, he spits fire,” Lady Tailbush said.

“Oh, no! He plays at figgum,” Sir Paul Eitherside said. “The devil is the author of wicked figgum.”

A figgum is a juggler’s trick.

Earlier, Fitzdottrel or Merecraft or Everill had prepared a walnut to enable him to spit fire. The walnut shell had been filled with a flammable substance that would enable him to appear to spit fire. For example, fire-breathers today may use cornstarch or alcohol. They put some in their mouth and then spray it over a small flame, producing a burst of fire.

Apparently, Sir Paul Eitherside had seen Fitzdottrel fill his mouth with the flammable substance in the walnut shell — finely ground sawdust or flour, perhaps? — and then seen him spray it over a lit candle, producing a burst of fire.

Rather than recognizing it as an impostor’s trick, he interpreted it as a juggler’s trick. Since “the devil is the author of wicked figgum,” according to Sir Paul Eitherside, this was more evidence that Fitzdottrel was truly bewitched.

Manly asked Wittipol, “Why don’t you speak to Sir Paul Eitherside?”

Manly thought that perhaps Wittipol could talk sense into him.

Wittipol replied, “If I had all innocence of man to be endangered, and he could save, or ruin it, I’d not breathe a syllable in request to such a fool as he makes himself.”

Suppose Humankind was put on trial, and Sir Paul Eitherside was the judge who could save Humankind or have Humankind executed. Further suppose that Sir Paul Eitherside asked Wittipol to speak. Wittipol would say nothing to such a fool as Sir Paul Eitherside was making himself out to be.

Presumably, Wittipol would be OK with whatever decision Sir Paul Eitherside would make. If Humankind were judged innocent and so would survive, that would be OK with Wittipol; after all, good people such as Manly exist. If Humankind were judged guilty and so would be executed, that would be OK with Wittipol; after all, foolish people such as Fitzdottrel and Sir Paul Eitherside exist.

Or, perhaps, Wittipol would not be OK with whatever decision Sir Paul Eitherside would make. If Humankind were judged innocent and so would survive, that would not be OK with Wittipol; after all, foolish people such as Fitzdottrel and Sir Paul Eitherside exist. If Humankind were judged guilty and so would be executed, that would not be OK with Wittipol; after all, good people such as Manly exist.

“Oh, they whisper, whisper, whisper,” Fitzdottrel said about Wittipol and Manly. “We shall have a score more of devils to come to dinner in me the sinner.”

“Alas, poor gentleman!” Lady Eitherside said.

Sir Paul Eitherside said about Wittipol and Manly, “Separate them. Keep them each away from the other.”

Wittipol would not talk to Sir Paul Eitherside, but Manly was willing.

“Are you insane, sir, or what grave foolishness moves you to take the side of so much villainy?” Manly asked Sir Paul Eitherside. “We are not afraid either of law or trial; let us be examined what our objectives were, what the means we had to work by, and the feasibility of those means. Do not make a decision against us before you hear us.”

“I will not hear you,” Sir Paul Eitherside said, “yet I will make a decision based on the circumstances.”

The circumstances included circumstantial evidence.

“Will you do so, sir?” Manly asked.

“Yes, the circumstances are obvious,” Sir Paul Eitherside said.

“Not as obvious as your folly!” Manly said.

“I will discharge my conscience, and do all things necessary to the meridian — the highest point — of justice,” Sir Paul Eitherside said.

“You do well, sir,” Gilthead said.

“Provide for me three or four dishes of good meat to eat,” Fitzdottrel said. “I’ll feast on them and their tricks; a Justice’s head and brains shall be the first dish I will eat.”

“The devil loves not justice,” Sir Paul Eitherside said. “You may see that from the way the possessed man talks.”

Fitzdottrel added, “Give me a spare rib of my wife, and a whore’s innards! Give me a whole Gilthead.”

Sir Paul Eitherside whispered to Gilthead, “Don’t be troubled, sir; the devil speaks it.”

The devil’s speaking such a thing might very well trouble the person the devil was talking about.

Fitzdottrel shouted, “Yes, wis; knight, shite; Paul, jowl; owl, foul; troll, bowl.”

He pronounced the words in such a way that each pair of words rhymed.

Sir Paul Eitherside said, “This is crambe, another of the devil’s games!”

In the game of crambe, players had to come up with rhymes for a certain word.

Merecraft whispered to Fitzdottrel, “Speak, sir, some Greek, if you can.”

The devil knows many languages; sinners speak many languages.

Merecraft then whispered to Everill, “Isn’t the justice Sir Paul Eitherside a solemn gamester?”

For someone who regarded games as evil, the serious Sir Paul Eitherside certainly knew a lot about them.

“Quiet!” Everill whispered back.

Fitzdottrel said, “Οἴμοι κακοδαίμων, Και τρισκακοδαίμων, και τετράκις, και πεντά κίς, και δωδεκαικίς, και μυριακίς.”

Translated: “Alas! alas! I am a lost man. Ah! thrice, four, five, twelve times, or rather ten thousand times unhappy fate!”

Sir Paul Eitherside said, “He curses in Greek, I think.”

Everill whispered to Fitzdottrel, "Use your Spanish that I taught you."

Fitzdottrel said, "Quebrémos el ojo de burlas."

Fitzdottrel, who had learned the Spanish poorly, had said, "Let's break his eye in jest."

Everill tried to cover up the mistaken Spanish: "What? Your rest? Let's break his neck in jest, the devil says."

Fitzdottrel then said in Spanish, "Di grátia, Signòr mio, se havete denári fataméne parte."

Translated: "If you please, sir, if you have money, give me some of it."<sup>[L]</sup><sub>[SEP]</sub>

Merecraft said, "What! Would the devil borrow money?"

Fitzdottrel said in French, "Oui, Oui, monsieur, un pauvre diable! Diabletin!"

Translated: "Yes, yes, sir, a poor devil! A poor little devil!"<sup>[L]</sup><sub>[SEP]</sub>

"It is the devil speaking, judging by his several languages," Sir Paul Eitherside said.

Carrying Ambler's possessions, Shackles, the jail keeper of Newgate Prison, entered the room, and asked, "Where's Sir Paul Eitherside?"

"Here I am," he said. "What's the matter?"

"Oh!" Shackles said. "Such an accident has happened at Newgate, sir. A great piece of the prison is torn down! The devil has been there, sir, in the body of the young cutpurse who was hanged this morning, but he was wearing new clothes, sir. Every one of us recognized him. These things were found in his pocket."

“Those are mine, sir,” Ambler said.

“I think he was committed on your charge, sir, for a new felony,” Shackles said.

“Yes,” Ambler confirmed.

“He’s gone, sir, now,” Shackles said, “and left us the dead body. But he also left, sir, such an infernal stink and steam behind that you cannot see St. Pulchre’s steeple yet. They smell the stink as far as the market town of Ware, as the wind lies by this time, I am sure.”

St. Pulchre’s steeple was the church of St. Sepulchre, which was close to Newgate Prison.

“Is this the truth, friend?” Fitzdottrel asked. “Do you give your word that it is true?”

“Sir, you may see it for yourself, and satisfy yourself that it is true,” Shackles said.

Realizing that Pug — whom he called Devil, and who had told him that he had possessed the body of a cutpurse who was hanged this morning — really was a devil, Fitzdottrel immediately said, “Then it is time to stop counterfeiting that I am possessed.”

He said to Sir Paul Eitherside, “Sir, I am not bewitched, nor do I have a devil inside me — no more than you do. I defy the devil by telling the truth, I do, and I admit I did abuse you with my counterfeiting.

“These two gentlemen — Merecraft and Everill — put me up to it. I have faith against the devil. These two gentlemen taught me all my tricks. I will tell the truth and shame the fiend. See here, sir, are my bellows, and my false belly, and my mouse that I would have pretended to come out of my mouth, and everything else that I would have pretended to have come out of my mouth!”

Manly said to Sir Paul Eitherside, “Sir, aren’t you ashamed now of your solemn, serious vanity?”

“I will make honorable amends to truth,” Sir Paul Eitherside said.

“And so will I,” Fitzdottrel said. “But these two men — Wittipol and Manly — are still cheaters, and they have my land, as plotters with my wife, who, although she is not a witch, is worse — she is a whore!”

“Sir, you misrepresent her,” Manly said. “She is chaste and virtuous, and we are honest men. I know of no glory a man would hope to acquire by proclaiming his own follies, but you’ll still be an ass, in spite of providence and God’s gifts.”

He then said to Sir Paul Eitherside, “Please go in, sir, and hear the truth, and then judge these men, and make amends for your late rashness, when you shall hear about the pains and care that were taken to save from ruin this fool: his Grace of Drowned-land!”

“My land is drowned indeed,” Fitzdottrel said.

“Be quiet!” Sir Paul Eitherside ordered Fitzdottrel.

Manly added, “And you shall hear how much his modest and too worthy wife has suffered being misunderstood by him; you will blush, first for your own belief in what you thought were her faults, but you will blush more for his actions.

“His land is his, and never, by my friend or by myself, was it meant to be put to any other use except to benefit her — his wife — who has equal right to the land. If any other had worse counsels regarding Fitzdottrel’s land —”

Manly looked at Merecraft and Everill and said, “I know I speak to those who can understand me.”

He then continued, “— let them repent their sins, and be not detected. It is not manly to take joy or pride in human errors; we all do ill things. They do them worst who love them, and dwell there until the plague comes. The few who have the seeds of goodness left will sooner make their way to a true life by shame, than by punishment.”

THE PROLOGUE AND THE EPILOGUE (The Devil is an Ass)

The Prologue (Original Language, Modern Spelling)

The Devil Is an Ass. That is today

The name of what you are met for, a new play.

Yet, grandees, would you were not come to grace

Our matter with allowing us no place.

Though you presume Satan a subtle thing,

And may have heard he's worn in a thumb-ring,

Do not on these presumptions force us act

In compass of a cheese-trencher. This tract

Will ne'er admit our vice because of yours —

Anon, who, worse than you, the fault endures

That yourselves make, when you will thrust and spurn,

And knock us o' the elbows, and bid, turn;

As if, when we had spoke, we must be gone,

Or, till we speak, must all run in to one,

Like the young adders at the old one's mouth?

Would we could stand due north; or had no south,

If that offend; or were Muscovy glass,

That you might look our scenes through as they pass.

We know not how to affect you. If you'll come

To see new plays, pray you afford us room,

And show this but the same face you have done
Your dear delight, The Devil of Edmonton.
Or if, for want of room, it must miscarry,
'Twill be but justice that your censure tarry
Till you give some. And when six times you ha' seen 't.
If this play do not, the devil is in 't.

The Prologue (Modern English)

The Devil Is an Ass. That is today
The name of what you are met for, a new play.
Yet, grandees, I wish you had not come to grace
Our play by sitting on stools placed on the stage and cramping the acting space and allowing us no space to do our work.
Though you presume Satan a subtle thing,
And may have heard he's worn in a thumb-ring,
[Note: Some members of this society thought that familiar spirits — supernatural entities that assist witches, warlocks,
etc. — were sometimes kept in a thumb-ring.]
Do not on these presumptions force us to act
In a space the size of a cheese-platter. This space
Will never admit our Vice because of yours —
Our Vice who, worse than you, soon endures the fault — the vice —
That you yourselves make, when you will thrust and kick,

And knock us on the elbows, and tell us to turn and when someone calls to you, you turn and face them;

As if, once we had spoken, we must be gone,

Or, until we speak, must all run in to one,

Like the young adders at the old one's mouth?

[The Prologue is complaining that the gallants on stage take up so much room that the actors have to leave unless they are delivering their lines — sometimes the gallants even push the actors away!

[The Prologue also is complaining that the vice of the audience — their bad behavior — will soon cause the Vice, a character in the play, to suffer.

[Note: This society believed that the mother adder would protect her young adders by letting them run in her mouth and down to her belly: a safe place. The actors who are pushed away have to gather together for protection.]

I wish we actors could stand due north and always face the audience; or had no south — no backs,

If that offend; or I wish that we actors were transparent like mica,

So that you might look through us at our scenes as we actors pass by in front of you people on stage.

We don't know how to influence you. If you'll come

To see new plays, please give us room to act,

And show this play just the same face you have shown to

Your dear delight, The Devil of Edmonton.

[Note: The Merry Devil of Edmonton was a popular play whose author is not known.]

Or if, for lack of room for us actors to act in, this play must miscarry and fail,

It will be but justice that you delay making a critical judgment

Until you give us some room. And when six times you have seen it,

If this play does not please you, the devil is in it.

The Epilogue

Thus the projector here is overthrown.

But I have now a project of mine [my] own,

If it may pass: that no man would invite

The poet from us to sup forth tonight,

If the play please. If it displeasent [unpleasant] be,

We do presume that no man will; nor we.

***

Note: The actor who played Wittipol may speak the Epilogue. In it, he is saying that if the play is a success, he wishes that the audience members will not invite the playwright, Ben Jonson, to dine with them because the actors will want to treat him. But if the play is a failure, he presumes that the audience members will not invite the playwright, Ben Jonson, to dine with them — and neither will the actors.

Below is the entry on “Richard Vennar” by Edward Irving Carlyle in the Dictionary of National Biography, Volume 88:

VENNAR or VENNARD, RICHARD (d. 1615?), author, was the younger son of John Vennar of Salisbury, a commissioner of the peace. He was educated by Adam Hill [q. v.], prebendary and succentor of Salisbury Cathedral, proceeding about 1572 to Balliol College, Oxford, where he studied for two years as a fellow commoner. He crossed to France towards the close of 1574, visited the court of Henri III, and procured letters of commendation to the emperor, Maximilian II. After some stay in Germany he returned home, and became a member of Barnard's Inn. He was admitted to Lincoln's Inn on 10 June 1581, receiving the privileges of a special admission on 25 July 1587 (Records of Lincoln's Inn, 1896, i. 93). On the death of his father he found himself involved in a lawsuit with the husband of his elder brother's widow for the possession of his patrimonial estates, and was ultimately compelled to take a younger brother's portion. In 1600 he proceeded to Scotland, and injudiciously solicited the intervention of James VI with the lords of the council. He had a favourable reception, and composed a thanksgiving for the delivery of James from the Gowrie conspiracy, which was presented to the king. His good reception aroused Elizabeth's anger, and on his return to England he was promptly arrested and imprisoned for a short time 'as a dangerous member to the state.' In 1601 appeared 'The Right Way to Heaven: and the true testimonie of a faithfull and loyall subject. Compiled by Richard Vennard of Lincolnes Inne. Printed by Thomas Este,' London, 4to, a work of a religious character, but abounding in adulation of Queen Elizabeth. The first part was reprinted in the following year with several alterations and additions, with the title, 'The Right Way to Heauen, and a good presedent for Lawyers and all other good Christians.' It was reprinted in Nichols's 'Progresses of Queen Elizabeth' (iii. 532–43). An undated reprint of the second part, 'The True Testimonie,' is preserved in the Bridgwater Library. It is prefaced by a dedication to James I, and contains a thanksgiving for the deliverance of the kingdom from the gunpowder plot (Collier, Cat. of Bridgwater Libr. p. 321). Not realising much by the sale, Vennar, who had in contemplation a second journey to Scotland, proclaimed his intention of representing England's triumphs over Spain in a masque entitled 'Englands Ioy.' The broadside of the plot is in possession of the Society of Antiquaries, and has been reprinted in their 'Miscellanies' (x. 196). He announced that it would be represented at the Swan on 6 Nov. 1602, and a large company, including many noblemen, assembled to witness it. After taking the entrance money, however, Vennar disappeared, and the audience revenged themselves by breaking up the furniture. Vennar himself states that he was arrested by bailiffs when the masque was about to begin, but Chamberlain relates that he fled on horseback, was pursued, captured, and brought before Sir John Popham, who treated the affair as a jest, and bound him over in five pounds to appear at the sessions (Chamberlain, Letters, Camden Soc. p. 163; Hazlitt, Shakespeare Jest Books, 1864, i. 145). The episode caused much amusement. Vennar was universally regarded as an impostor and dubbed 'England's Joy,' a name which gave him peculiar annoyance. In 1614 he wrote a vehement protest, entitled 'An Apology: written by Richard Vennar of Lincolnes Inne, abusively called Englands Joy. To repress the contagious ruptures of the infected multitude. ... London. Printed by Nicholas Okes.' The work is divided into two parts, of which the first is autobiographical, and the second relates Vennar's exertions to obtain the abolition of imprisonment for debt in England. The only perfect copy extant is in the British Museum Library, but it has been reprinted in Collier's 'Illustrations of Old English Literature' (vol. iii.). Collier inaccurately claims that it is the 'oldest piece of prose autobiography' in English. Several allusions to 'England's Joy' occur in contemporary literature, particularly in Ben Jonson's 'Love Restored' (1610–11), in his 'Masque of Augures' (1622), and in Sir John Suckling's comedy, 'The Goblins' (1646). A poem entitled 'Englands Joy,' commemorating the defeat of the Irish in 1600 under Hugh O'Neill, second earl of Tyrone [q. v.], by R. V., published without date, place, or printer's name, is sometimes attributed to Vennar, but may quite as well be the work of Richard Rowlands alias Verstegen [q. v.]

In 1606 Vennar was arrested on suspicion of an intention to defraud Sir John Spencer of 500l. on pretence of preparing a masque under the patronage of Sir John Watts [q. v.], the lord mayor. After that he avoided London, and lived chiefly in Essex and Kent. In spite of the exertions on behalf of debtors of which he speaks in his 'Apology,' Vennar himself perished before 1617 in 'the black hole' of Wood Street counter, in the most abject misery, the victim of his keeper's resentment (Fennor, Compters Commonwealth, 1617, p. 64). Taylor in his 'Cast over the Water. ... Given gratis to William Fennor, the Rimer,' 1615, accused one Fennor of passing off as his own some manuscripts in reality written by

Poor old Vennor, that plaine dealing man,

Who acted Englands Ioy first at the Swan.

*Fennor's theft was probably committed while Vennar was confined in Wood Street counter. Fitzdottrel says:

Well, begin, sir,

There is your bound, sir. Not beyond that rush.

(1.6.72-73)

Many people think that loose rushes were strewn on the floor, but C. M Stone states that that makes no sense; instead, rush mats were placed on the floor:

What are rushes? They're herbaceous plants that bare a superficial resemblance to grasses or sedges. Their leaves are typically rounded or flat. They grow in a wide variety of moisture conditions and have evergreen leaves, which would make them very useful for a fiber plant to gather year round for domestic purposes. The soft rush, called igusa in Japanese, is woven as a covering for tatami mats. [...]

The cloth Medieval Europeans were wearing was woven. The tapestries they hung on their walls were woven. The braids in long hair were woven. And yet many writers would have us believe that these people were so gross that they just threw rush leaves on the ground and walked on them instead of weaving mats? And while being this disgusting, they also had the sense to never display this unhygienic practice in any works of art? [...]

Fresh mats would be woven and laid down. Fragrant herbs were strewn on top so that when they were pressed between the foot and mat beneath they'd release their scent. (This same effect wouldn't work with a pile of loose rushes.) As the mats dried out (and can you imagine what a ridiculous fire hazard piles of loose rushes would be?), they'd absorb unpleasant odors from foot traffic and whatever was dropped on them. At the end of the season they'd be hauled out and replaced with new mats, bringing fresh scents and a clean floor once again. For special occasions, mats might be stacked up somewhere with storage, leaving clean and unworn floors for receiving company, which could then have decorative rugs instead. Removing loose material every time you received company, on the other hand, would be a lengthy, labor-intensive project with a lot of bits always left behind. [...]

The thing that I find so baffling about the loose rushes myth authors keep repeating is the fact that medieval/apple matting is not some obscure secret. It currently covers the floors in Elizabethan Hardwick Hall and many other National Trust properties in the UK. You can go see it in the environment it would have been used in historically right now.

However, rushes were also strewn on the floor as well as made into mats. The Cottage Gardener (1849) quotes Dr. Bulleyn, who was born early in the reign of King Henry VIII:

In speaking of Rushes, he [Dr. Bulleyn] gives us this incidental notice of the customs of his time : — "Of rushes growing in running streams there be great plenty round about the Isle of Ely, my native country, whereof the plain people make mats and horse-coliars of the greater rushes, and of the smaller they make lights or candles for the winter. Rushes that grow upon dry ground be good to strew in halls, chambers, and galleries, to walk upon, defending apparel, as trains of gowns and kirtles, from dust. Rushes be old courtiers, and when they be nothing worth then they be cast out of doors — so be many that do tread upon them."

Act 3, Scene 4 contains an in-joke. Dick Robinson was a famous boy actor who played the role of a woman in plays. After he grew up, he continued to act and played the role of a man in plays. Scholars think that he originated the role of Wittipol, so when Engine says that Dick Robinson and Wittipol are exactly the same height, he is telling the literal truth.

CHAPTER 7: George Chapman, Ben Jonson, and John Marston's *Eastward Ho!

CAST OF CHARACTERS (Eastward Ho!)

TOUCHSTONE: a goldsmith of Cheapside. Touchstones — dark quartz — were used to test the quality and purity of gold and silver alloys. His catchphrase is “Work upon that now!” It means, “You had better think about that!”

MISTRESS TOUCHSTONE: his wife, a gentlewoman.

GERTRUDE: his elder daughter. Touchstone says that she has a “proud ambition and nice — lascivious — wantonness.” She wants to become a lady. She can do that by marrying a knight.

MILDRED: his younger daughter. The name includes the word “mild.” The name also includes the word “red,” which people in this society sometimes used for the color of gold. Touchstone says that she has a “modest humility and comely soberness.”

FRANCIS “FRANK” QUICKSILVER: Touchstone's prodigal apprentice. Quicksilver is mercury. In this society, quicksilver was used to treat venereal disease. The Roman god Mercury was the god of thieves. Touchstone says that this apprentice has a “boundless prodigality.”

GOLDING: Touchstone's dutiful apprentice. Touchstone says that this apprentice has a “most hopeful industry.” Golding is as good as gold.

SINDEFY: Quicksilver's lover, later employed as Gertrude's gentlewoman-attendant. Her name is ambiguous: 1) one who defies sin, or 2) one who defiantly sins.

SIR PETRONEL FLASH: a “thirty-pound knight,” engaged to Gertrude. In this society, a “petronel” is a large pistol, aka carbine. He is a newly made knight, and he has purchased his knighthood at a low cost.

CAPTAIN SEAGULL: a ship's captain employed by Sir Petronel to sail to Virginia. "Virginia" was the word then used for the North American coast north of Florida.

SPENDALL, SCAPETHRIFT: adventurers with Captain Seagull. The names suggest "spendthrift."

DRAWER: of the Blue Anchor Tavern in Billingsgate. A drawer is a bartender.

SECURITY: an elderly usurer; bawd to Quicksilver. "Security" is property used to get a loan.

WINIFRED: Security's young wife.

BRAMBLE: a lawyer. "Bramble" is a thorny shrub. Lawyers can get people into or out of thorny entanglements.

SCRIVENER: a writer of contracts.

POLDAVY: a tailor. "Poldavy" is canvas that can be used to make sails.

BETTRICE: a lady's maid.

MISTRESS FOND, MISTRESS GAZER: city women. The word "fond" can mean "foolish." "Gazer" can mean "snoop."

COACHMAN: to Gertrude.

HAMLET: a footman to Gertrude.

POTKIN: a tankard bearer.

FIRST GENTLEMAN, SECOND GENTLEMAN: at the Isle of Dogs.

WOLF: the keeper, aka jailer, of the Counter, a prison for debtors.

HOLDFAST: a prison guard.

FIRST PRISONER.

SECOND PRISONER: His name is Toby.

FRIEND: of the first and second prisoners.

SLITGUT: a butcher's apprentice.

PAGE.

MESSENGER.

CONSTABLE.

OFFICERS.

THE SCENE: LONDON AND VICINITY

NOTES:

Customers wanting to be ferried on the Thames River called "eastward ho!" or "westward ho!" to indicate the direction they wanted to travel.

In the play, eastward is towards Cuckold's Haven, and westward is towards the gallows at Tyburn and Virginia in North America.

East of Goldsmiths' Row was the Wood Street Counter.

Also eastward were Sir Petronel's "land" and "castle."

The play contains allusions to William Shakespeare's Hamlet. The names "Gertrude" and "Hamlet" are from Shakespeare's play. This book identifies only some of those references.

This society believed that the mixture of four humors in the body determined one's temperament. One humor could be predominant. The four humors are blood, yellow bile, black bile, and phlegm. If blood is predominant, then the person is sanguine (active, optimistic). If yellow bile is predominant, then the person is choleric (angry, bad-tempered). If black bile is predominant, then the person is melancholic (sad). If phlegm is predominant, then the person is phlegmatic (calm, apathetic, indolent).

Humors are dominant personality characteristics. For example, a person could be optimistic, or angry, or melancholic, or calm, or something else.

A humor can also be a fancy or a whim.

The word "humor" was an in-vogue word in Ben Jonson's day.

In Ben Jonson's society, a person of higher rank would use "thou," "thee," "thine," and "thy" when referring to a person of lower rank. (These terms were also used affectionately and between equals.) A person of lower rank would use "you" and "your" when referring to a person of higher rank.

"Sirrah" was a title used to address someone of a social rank inferior to the speaker. Friends, however, could use it to refer to each other.

The word "wench" in Ben Jonson's time was not necessarily negative. It was often used affectionately.

A "gossip" is a friend or companion or neighbor.

The word "cousin" can mean 1) relative (not necessarily what we call a cousin today), or 2) friend.

A page is a boy-servant.

“Ay me!” is an expression of regret: Alas! Woe is me! Oh!
Ah!

PROLOGUE (Eastward Ho!)

“Not out of envy, for there’s no effect

“Where there’s no cause [nothing to envy]; nor out of imitation,

“For we have ever [always] more been imitated;

“Nor out of our contention to do better

“Than that which is opposed to ours in title,

[Westward Ho! — a play by Thomas Decker and John Webster — was performed in 1604.]

“For that was good, and better cannot be.

“And [as] for the title, if it seems affected

“We might as well have called it, ‘God you good even’

[May God give you a good evening],

“Only that eastward westwards still exceeds —

“Honor the sun’s fair rising, not his setting.

“Nor is our title utterly enforced,

[That is, the action of this play does not always move toward the east.]

“As by the points we touch at you shall see.

“Bear with our willing pains, if dull or witty;

“We only dedicate it to the city.”

***

Notes on Prologue:

The line about being always imitated is a reference to other “city comedies.” These are citizen comedies: comedies about the citizens of London.

The line about titling this play God You Good Even is a reference to plays that have commonplace sayings as titles: As You Like It, All’s Well That Ends Well, etc.

The young general Pompey achieved notable victories in Africa, but the aging dictator Sulla did not allow him to have a triumph in Rome. Pompey said in response, “Honor the sun’s fair rising, not his setting.”

ACT 1 (Eastward Ho!)

— 1.1 —

Master Touchstone and Francis “Frank” Quicksilver entered the scene from different directions and met each other.

Quicksilver was carrying pumps (dancing shoes), a short sword, a dagger, and a tennis racket under his cloak. These were items that a gallant — a fashionable young gentleman — would wear or carry.

Golding entered the scene and paced back and forth before a goldsmith’s shop.

Touchstone was a goldsmith, and Frank Quicksilver and Golding were his apprentices.

Touchstone asked Quicksilver, “And where are you going now? What loose action are you bound for? Come, what comrades are you to meet with? Where’s the supper? Where’s the rendezvous?”

“Indeed, and in very good sober truth, sir —” Quicksilver began.

Touchstone interrupted:

“‘Indeed, and in very good sober truth, sir!’”

These were words that a Puritan might use.

Touchstone continued:

“Behind my back thou will swear faster than a French footboy and talk more bawdily than a common midwife, and now ‘indeed, and in very good sober truth, sir!’”

French footboys — pages — were known for their excessive swearing.

Touchstone continued:

“But if a privy search should be made, with what furniture — what equipment and clothing — are you rigged now? Sirrah, I tell thee that I am thy master, William Touchstone, goldsmith, and thou are my apprentice, Francis Quicksilver, and I will see to where you are running. Work upon that now!”

“Why, sir, I hope a man may use his recreation consistent with his master’s profit,” Quicksilver said.

Touchstone said:

“Apprentices’ recreations are seldom in keeping with their masters’ profit. Work upon that now — you had better think about that!

“You shall give up your cloak, though — you are no alderman.”

Aldermen were allowed to wear red cloaks. Craftsmen and apprentices wore flat caps. Apprentices wore a cap and gown. Touchstone was dressing like a man of higher social class than his own.

Touchstone removed Quicksilver’s cloak, revealing the items that Quicksilver was carrying underneath.

Touchstone then said:

“Heyday, Ruffians’ Hall! Sword, pumps, here’s a racket indeed.”

Ruffians’ Hall was a field where much fighting occurred.

“Racket” can, of course, mean “noise” as well as a tennis racket.

Quicksilver said:

“Work upon that now!”

“Thou shameless varlet, do thou jest at thy lawful master contrary to thy indentures?” Touchstone said.

“Indentures” are “articles of apprenticeship.”

Quicksilver replied:

“Why, by God’s blood, sir, my mother’s a gentlewoman and my father a Justice of Peace and of Quorum.”

A Justice of Peace heard complaints, and a Justice of Quorum was necessary to have a sitting court and to make determinations about guilt or innocence.

Quicksilver continued:

“And though I am a younger brother and an apprentice, yet I hope I am my father’s son; and by God’s eyelid, it is for your worship and for your commodity — your profit — that I keep company.

“I am entertained among gallants, true. They call me cousin Frank, right. I lend them moneys, good. They spend it, well. But when they are spent, must not they strive to get more? Must not their land fly? Must not they have to sell their land for cash money? And to whom? Shall not Your Worship have the refusal — the right of first option to buy or not buy?

“Well, I am a good member of the city, if I were well considered. How would merchants thrive, if gentlemen would not be unthrifths? How could gentlemen be unthrifths if their humors — their whims and fancies — were not fed? How should their humors be fed but by white meat and cunning secondings?”

“White meat” is food made from milk, such as cheese.

“White” can mean “having a weak or cowardly character,” and “meat” can mean 1) a prostitute or 2) a penis, or 3) a light-skinned person.

According to the Oxford English Dictionary, “meat for a person’s master” means “someone or something intended for a person’s betters, esp. as a source of sexual gratification; someone or something too good to be wasted on a person.”

“White” is the lightest color possible, and “light” can mean promiscuous, and so “light meat” may mean the most promiscuous sex partners.

Many gallants visited brothels and contracted syphilis.

“Cunning secondings” are 1) well-prepared second courses, or 2) flattering comments made by yes-men.

Quicksilver continued:

“Well, the city might consider us.

“Suppose that I am going to an ordinary now: The gallants begin to gamble; I carry light gold with me.”

An ordinary is an eating place.

“Light gold” is debased coinage. Gold coins had a circle inscribed on them. If the edges of the coin were clipped so much that the circle was broken, the coin was no longer legal tender.

“Light gold” is also counterfeit money.

Quicksilver continued:

“The gallants call, ‘Cousin Frank, some gold for silver!’ I change, gain by it; the gallants lose the gold and then call, ‘Cousin Frank, lend me some silver.’

“Why —”

Quicksilver had been lending money to gallants.

Touchstone interrupted:

“ — why? I cannot tell.

“Seven score pounds are thou out in the cash, but look to it, I will not be gallanted out of my moneys.”

Quicksilver had been lending Touchstone’s money to the gallants, and the gallants had not been paying Quicksilver back.

Touchstone continued:

“And as for my rising by other men’s fall, God shield and protect me!

“Did I gain my wealth by ordinaries — eating houses? No.

“By exchanging of gold? No. [That is: By lending money at interest, aka usury? No.] By keeping the company of gallants? No. I hired a little shop, fought low, took small gains, kept no debt book [that is, Touchstone gave no credit], garnished and decorated my shop, for want of plate, with good wholesome thrifty sentences, such as these:

“‘Touchstone, keep thy shop and thy shop will keep thee.’

“‘Light gains make heavy purses.’

“‘It is good to be merry and wise.’”

To “fight low” is a wrestling term, meaning to attack the legs to overthrow opponents and avoid being overthrown oneself.

Touchstone continued:

“And when I was wived, having something to stick to, I had the horn of suretyship ever before my eyes.”

Hmm. The word “thing” can mean “pudendum.” The word “stick” has another meaning. So does the word “horn.”

Also, however, the “something” could be a dowry.

Touchstone continued:

“You all know the device — the illustration — of the horn, where the young fellow slips in at the butt end and comes squeezed out at the buccal.”

The buccal is the narrow end: the mouthpiece of the horn.

Hmm. “Slips in at the butt end.” Say no more.

The device illustrated the danger of signing or co-signing documents: the danger of guaranteeing that another person’s debt would be paid (by you, if need be), or the danger of not paying one’s own debt.

Because Touchstone was married, he wanted to support his wife financially, and so he worked at his trade of goldsmithing and he avoided co-signing documents that could make him pay others’ debts.

Touchstone continued:

“And I grew up, and, I praise Providence, I bear my brows now as high — I am as important — as the best of my neighbors. But thou — well, look to the accounts; your father’s bond lies for you; seven score pounds are yet in the rear — in arrears.”

Yeah, unpaid debts can be a pain in the butt.

Quicksilver’s father had given his word to pay for Quicksilver’s apprenticeship. The bond — written contract — was deposited where it would be kept safe.

Quicksilver said:

“Why, by God’s eyelid, sir, I have as good and as proper gallants’ words for it [their debt] as any are in London, gentlemen of good phrase, perfect language, surpassingly well-behaved, gallants who wear socks — that is, light shoes or slippers — and clean linen and call me ‘kind cousin Frank’ and ‘good cousin Frank,’ for they know my father.

“And by God’s eyelid, shall not I trust them? Not trust?”

A page entered. He was looking for Touchstone’s shop.

A page is a boy-servant.

“What do you lack, sir?” Golding said. “What is it you’ll buy, sir?”

Golding, the good apprentice, was on the lookout for possible customers.

Watching Golding, Touchstone said:

“Aye, by the Virgin Mary, sir, there’s a youth of another piece. There’s thy fellow apprentice, as good a gentleman born as thou are, nay, and better meant — from a family that is financially better off.

“But does he pump it or racket it? Does he wear expensive pumps or play tennis? Well, if he thrive not, if he outlast not a hundred such crackling bavins — showy lightweights — as thou are, then may God and men neglect industry.”

“Bavins” are “bundles of kindling.”

In 3.2, we read that “rash bavin wits, [are] soon kindled and soon burnt.”

The page had asked Golding about the location of Touchstone’s shop.

Golding now replied, “Here is his shop, and here my master walks.”

“Do you have business with me, boy?” Touchstone asked the page.

“My master, Sir Petronel Flash, recommends his love to you and he will quickly visit you,” the page said.

Touchstone said:

“He comes here to make up the match with my eldest daughter, my wife’s dilling — her darling — whom she longs to call madam. He shall find me unwillingly ready, boy.”

Touchstone was ready to meet Sir Petronel Flash, but he did not approve of a marriage between him and one of his daughters.

The page exited.

Touchstone continued:

“There’s another affliction, too. Just as I have two apprentices, the one of a boundless prodigality, the other of a most hopeful industry, so I have only two daughters, the eldest of a proud ambition and nice — lascivious — wantonness, the other of a modest humility and comely soberness. The one must be ladified, indeed, and she must be attired just to the court cut and long tail.”

The “court cut” is the “court fashion.”

“Cut and long tail” also refers to the tails of dogs and horses: docked and undocked.

The words can also refer to dresses with short or long trains.

“... she must be attired just to the court cut and long tail” may mean that Gertrude thinks that she must be attired like a court lady wearing a gown with a long train.

“Cut” also means “vulva,” and “long tail” means what you think it means.

If “cut” refers to circumcision, then “cut and long tail” may mean that Gertrude will be attracted to any man at court and she will dress accordingly to get one or more of them.

Touchstone continued:

“So far is she ill-natured and antipathetic to the place and means of my preferment and fortune — my occupation as a tradesman — that she throws all the contempt and spite that hatred itself can cast upon it.

“Well, a piece of land she has, it was her grandmother’s gift: Let her, and her Sir Petronel, flash out that. But as for my substance, she who scorns me as I am a citizen and tradesman shall never pamper her pride with my industry, shall never use me as men do foxes: Keep themselves warm in the skin and throw the body that bare it to the dunghill.”

Readers will find out later that the land was worth two thousand pounds and produced one hundred pounds of income each year.

“I must go and entertain this Sir Petronel.”

Touchstone then said to his good apprentice:

“Golding, my utmost care’s for thee, and my only trust is in thee. Look to the shop.”

Touchstone then said to his bad apprentice:

“As for you, Master Quicksilver, think of husks, for thy course is running directly to the prodigal son’s hogs’ trough. Husks, sirrah! Work upon that now.”

The prodigal son received his inheritance early, spent it, and was so impoverished that he envied hogs their swill. See Luke 15:11–32.

Touchstone exited.

Quicksilver said:

“By the Virgin Mary, faugh — yuck! — goodman flat cap!”

Merchants wore flat caps.

Quicksilver continued:

“By God’s foot, although I am an apprentice I can give arms — show a coat of arms, aka armorial bearings — and my father’s a justice of the peace by descent, and by God’s blood —”

“Bah, how you swear!” Golding complained.

Quicksilver said:

“By God’s foot, man, I am a gentleman, and I may swear by my pedigree, God’s my life. Sirrah Golding, will thou be ruled by a fool? Turn good fellow [a thief, or a jolly fellow], turn swaggering gallant, and ‘let the welkin roar, and Erebus also.’”

Quicksilver saw a lot of plays and sometimes quoted or misquoted them.

Another literary character who does this is Pistol in Shakespeare’s 2 Henry IV, who says, “damn them with King Cerberus, / And let the welkin roar” (Act 2, Scene 4).

Cerberus is the three-headed guard dog of the Land of the Dead.

Quicksilver continued:

“Look not westward to the fall of Don Phoebus [the sun], but to the east — eastward ho!

“‘Where radiant beams of lusty Sol appear, and bright Eoüs [Eös, goddess of the dawn] makes the welkin — the sky — clear.’”

“We are both gentlemen, and therefore should be no coxcombs. Let’s be no longer fools to this flat cap Touchstone.

“Eastward, bully [good fellow]! This satin-belly and canvas-backed Touchstone — by God’s life, man, his father was a maltman — a seller of brewers’ malt — and his mother sold gingerbread in Christ Church.”

Merchants wore clothing that had velvet in the front and inexpensive canvas in the back. They also wore flat caps.

“What do you want me to do?” Golding asked.

Quicksilver said:

“Why, do nothing; be like a gentleman, be idle. The curse of man is labor. Wipe thy bum with testons — sixpences — and make ducks and drakes with shillings.”

“Make ducks and drakes with shillings” means to throw shillings and skip them over the water like flat stones: It metaphorically means to waste money.

Quicksilver continued:

“What, eastward ho! Will thou cry, ‘What is it you lack?,’ stand with a bare pate — head — and a dropping — dripping — nose under a wooden penthouse, and yet thou are a gentleman?”

A penthouse is a projecting roof that provides some protection from rain for people in front of a shop.

Golding could still occasionally get wet, or have a cold, and drops of water would fall from his nose.

Quicksilver continued:

“Will thou bear tankards of water to thy master’s house and may thou bear arms? Be ruled by my advice, turn gallant, eastward ho!”

He sang:

“Ta lirra, lirra, ro.”

The Oxford English Dictionary defines “talio” as “A requiting of like for like, retaliation.”

It also defines “talion law” as “the principle of exacting compensation, ‘eye for eye, tooth for tooth’; also, the infliction of the same penalty on the accuser who failed to prove his case as would have fallen upon the accused if found guilty.”

Chances are, both Touchstone and Quicksilver believed in talion law: Each believed that the other will get what’s coming to him, and each believed that he himself would be rewarded.

The Latin rarus, -a, -um means “rare, uncommon.”

In Elizabethan English, “rare” can also mean “splendid.”

Prodigals can end up like the Prodigal Son, envying hogs their swill, but their stories can still, but perhaps rarely, have happy endings: The Prodigal Son’s father welcomes him when the son returns. This is a rejection of talion law. This parable celebrates splendid forgiveness.

Quicksilver declaimed:

““Who calls Jeronimo? Speak, here I am.””

The quotation is from Thomas Kyd’s Spanish Tragedy (2.5.4).

Quicksilver then said:

“God’s so, how like a sheep thou look!”

“God’s so” can mean 1) By God’s soul, or 2) catso, aka Italian slang for “penis.”

Quicksilver concluded:

“On my conscience, some cowherd begot thee. Thou Golding of Golding Hall, huh, boy?”

He was mocking Golding and calling him a yokel rather than a gallant.

Golding replied, “Go, you are a prodigal coxcomb — a prodigal fool. Am I a cowherd’s son because I will not turn into a drunken whore-hunting rakehell — rascal — like thyself?”

“Rakehell?” Quicksilver said. “Rakehell?”

Quicksilver attempted to draw his sword, but Golding tripped up his heels and held him.

“Pish! Bah!” Golding said. “In soft terms — the softest words I can use to describe you — you are a cowardly bragging boy. I’ll have you whipped.”

“Whipped?” Quicksilver said. “That’s good, in faith. Untruss me?”

“Untruss” means 1) release, or 2) undo the fastenings that keep one’s breeches up (once his breeches were down, he could be whipped).

Golding said:

“No, thou will undo thyself.”

“Undo” can mean “ruin.”

Golding continued:

“Alas, I behold thee with pity, not with anger. Thou common shot-clog, gull of all companies.”

A “slot-clog” is a fool who is tolerated because he picks up and pays the bill for all.

Golding continued:

“I think I see thee already walking in Moorfields without a cloak, with half a hat, without a band [collar], a doublet [jacket] with three buttons [at least one button is missing], without a girdle, a hose with one point [points were laces that geld up the hose] and no garter, with a cudgel — because you cannot afford a sword — under thine arm, borrowing and begging threepence.”

Quicksilver said:

“Nay, by God’s life, take this and take all.

“If you take my sword, you may as well take everything I have.

“As I am a gentleman born, I’ll be drunk, grow valiant, and beat thee.”

He exited.

Alone, Golding said:

“Go, thou most madly vain, whom nothing can recover — can cure — but that which reclaims atheists and makes great persons sometimes religious: calamity.

“As for my place and life, thus I have read:

“Whatever some vainer youth may term disgrace,

“The gain of honest pains is never base.

“From trades, from arts, from valor honor springs;

“These three are founts of gentry, yea, of kings.”

He closed the shop and exited.

— 1.2 —

Gertrude, Mildred, Bettrice, and Poldavy the tailor talked together inside Touchstone’s house. Gertrude was Touchstone’s elder daughter, and Mildred was his younger daughter. Bettrice was a lady’s maid.

Poldavy was holding a pretty gown, a Scotch farthingale [hooped petticoat], and a French fall [flat collar] in his arms. These were items of clothing.

Gertrude was wearing a French head attire [a French hood] and a citizen’s gown. Mildred was sewing; and Bettrice was leading a monkey after her.

In this scene, Gertrude will change her middle-class city attire for courtly dress.

Like Quicksilver, she curses a lot. Quicksilver often quotes short passages from plays, and Gertrude often sings short snatches of bawdy songs.

Gertrude said:

“For the passion of patience, look and see if Sir Petronel approaches, that sweet, that fine, that delicate, that — for love’s sake tell me if he comes.

“Oh, sister Mil, although my father is a low-capped tradesman, yet I must be a lady, and, I praise God, my mother must call me ‘Medam.’”

“Medam” is an affected pronunciation of “madam.”

“Medam” is also “Me damn.”

In other words: “[...] and, I praise God, my mother must call me ‘me damned.’”

Or: “[...] and, I praise God, my mother must tell me that I am damned.”

Or: “[...] and, I praise God, my mother must call me the one who was damned.”

Gertrude continued:

“Is he coming?”

“Off with this gown, for shame’s sake, off with this gown! Don’t let my knight see me in the city fashion by any means.

“Tear it! A pax on it!”

She wanted the gown taken off her quickly, even if it had to be torn off.

The Latin word pax means “peace,” and it can mean a depiction of the Crucifixion on a gold or a silver tablet that the priest kisses, and it can mean a kiss of peace, but Gertrude was willing to burn her bridges behind her.

“Pax” is an affected pronunciation of “pox.”

“A pox on it” is an oath.

Gertrude continued:

“Does he come? Tear it off.”

She removed her gown and sang:

“Thus whilst she sleeps I sorrow for her sake,” etc.

The title of the song is “Sleep, Wayward Thoughts,” and it is about lustful thoughts.

Mildred, Gertrude’s sister, said, “Lord, sister, with what an immodest impatience and disgraceful scorn do you put off your city attire! I am sorry to think you imagine to right yourself in wronging that which has made both you and us.”

Gertrude was ashamed that her father made his money as a shopkeeper. It was much more classy to get one’s money income from owning land.

Gertrude said:

“I tell you I cannot endure it. I must be a lady.

“You can wear your city attire: coif [hoodlike cap] with a London licket [latchet, aka string that fastens the coif under the chin], your stammel [red wool] petticoat with two guards [ornamental borders], the buffin [a type of fabric] gown with the tuftaffety [taffeta] cape and the velvet lace.

“I must be a lady, and I will be a lady.

“I like some humors [whims] of the city dames well: to eat cherries [a luxury] only at an angel a pound, good; to dye rich scarlet black, pretty; to line a grogram [a type of fabric] gown clean through with velvet, tolerable. Their pure [clean white] linen, their smocks of three pounds a smock [chemise, undergarment] are to be borne with.

“But your mincing niceries — affected niceties — your taffeta pipkins [small hats], durance [a type of fabric worn by city ladies] petticoats, and silver bodkins [long hair pins] — as God is my life, as I shall be a lady I cannot endure it.

“Has he come yet? Lord, what a long knight it is!”

She sang:

“And ever she cried, ‘Shoot home!’”

She then said:

“— and yet I knew one longer —”

She then sang:

“and ever she cried, ‘Shoot home!’

“Fa, la, ly, re, lo, la.”

“Fa ly” and “Fa lo ly” are both “folly.” “La re” is “lare,” aka a bird, possibly a seagull. “Fa-la” is a kind of madrigal (a song for more than one voice). “Fallow” is a piece of plowed but unseeded land.

Sir Petronel was, according to Gertrude, long overdue.

A “long knight” may be a sexually well-endowed knight.

“Shoot home” means what you think it means.

As will become known, Gertrude is not a virgin, and she is not pregnant.

“Well, sister,” Mildred said, “those who scorn their nest often fly with a sick wing.”

A proverb states, “It is a foul bird that defiles its own nest.”

“Bow-bell!” Gertrude said. “Cockney!”

Cockneys were born within hearing of the bell at St Mary-le-bow. They tended to be lower-class.

Mildred said:

“Where titles presume to thrust before fit means to second them, wealth and respect often grow sullen and will not follow.”

In other words: People who buy titles should first have the means to live in the manner expected of those who have such titles. If they don’t first have those means, they lose wealth, grow poor, and lose respect.

Mildred continued:

“For sure, in this I wish for your sake that I was not speaking the truth.

“Where ambition of place goes before fitness of birth, contempt and disgrace follow.”

A proverb stated, “Pride goeth before and shame cometh after.”

Mildred continued:

“I heard a scholar once say that Ulysses, when he counterfeited himself mad, yoked cats and foxes and dogs together to draw his plow, while he followed and sowed salt.”

Ulysses, aka Odysseus, did not want to fight at Troy, so he thought up a trick that he hoped would keep him out of the fighting. He pretended to be insane, and he yoked an ox and an ass to his plow and sowed his fields with salt. A Greek man named Palamedes knew that Ulysses was faking insanity, and he placed Ulysses’ infant son, Telemachus, in front of the plow. If Ulysses were insane, he would kill his son. But, of course, he was faking insanity and he turned the plow aside and did not kill his son. Ulysses then had to go to Troy and fight. He fought well, and he thought up the idea of the Trojan Horse: the trick that led to the sack of Troy.

The team that pulls a plow ought to consist of evenly matched animals. An ox is stronger than an ass.

Mildred continued:

“But to be sure, I judge truly mad those who yoke citizens and courtiers, tradesmen and soldiers, a goldsmith’s daughter and a knight. Well, sister, pray to God that my father does not sow salt, too.”

Mildred believed that people ought to marry within their social class.

Gertrude said:

“Alas, poor Mil! When I am a lady, I’ll pray for thee yet, in faith, and I’ll vouchsafe to call thee sister Mil still, for although thou are not likely to be a lady as I am, yet to be sure thou are a creature of God’s making, and may perhaps be saved as soon as I.”

As a prefix, “mil” can be a thousandth, or a thousand. A milliliter is one-thousandth of a liter, but a millennium is a thousand years. A “mil” can be small or big, low or high.

Currently, Gertrude regarded Mil — Mildred — as a lowly person.

She then asked about Sir Petronel:

“Does he come?”

She then sang:

“And ever and anon she doubled in her song.”

“Double” means to repeat a note but in a different octave.

Another kind of doubling is coupling.

Gertrude then said:

“Now lady’s my comfort, what a profane ape’s here! What a profane fool!”

“Now lady’s my comfort” means “The Virgin Mary’s my comfort.”

Gertrude then said:

“Tailor, Poldavy, please fit it! Fit it! Is this a right Scot? Does the farthingale clip close and bear up round?”

The farthingale was an item of clothing that fit tightly around a woman’s waist. It extended outward from the waist, and the skirt hung from it. Because the farthingale extended outward from the waist, women could not let their arms and hands freely hang down.

“Bear up round” is something that erect penises do.

Poldavy the tailor said, “Fine and stiffly, in faith. It will keep your thighs so cool and make your waist so small!”

A woman would find it difficult to have sex while wearing a farthingale. This would help keep her waist small.

“Here was a fault in your body, but I have supplied the defect with the effect of my steel instrument, which, although it has just one eye, can see to rectify the imperfection of the proportion.”

A “fault” is 1) a defect, or 2) a vagina.

A “steel instrument” with one eye is 1) a needle, or 2) an erect penis.

He put the farthingale and new gown on her.

Gertrude said:

“Most edifying tailor! I declare, you tailors are most sanctified members and make many crooked things go upright. How must I bear my hands?”

The Puritans used the word “sanctified” for saintly and the word “crooked” for sinful.

Hmm. “Members.” “Things go upright.” Say no more.

She continued:

“Light? Light?”

Poldavy replied:

“Oh, aye, now you are in the lady fashion you must do all things light.

“Tread light, light. Aye, and fall so; that’s the court amble.”

The word “light” means 1) gracefully, or 2) wantonly.

A lady with light heels is a promiscuous lady: one whose heels are easily spread and raised into the air. The lady would fall backward into the missionary position.

Gertrude skipped about the stage and asked, “Has the court never a trot?”

“No, but it has a false gallop, lady,” Poldavy said.

The courtiers, because of their bad characters and many seductions, are galloping toward eternal damnation.

Gertrude sang, “And if she will not go to bed —”

Bettrice looked up and said, “The knight’s come, indeed.”

Sir Petronel, Master Touchstone, Mistress Touchstone, and Golding entered the scene.

Gertrude said:

“Has my knight come?”

“Oh, the lord, my band! My collar!

“Sister, do my cheeks look well? Give me a little box on the ear — a little slap on the cheek — so that I may seem to blush.

“Now, now! So, there, there, there! Here he is.

“Oh, my dearest delight! Lord, lord, and how does my knight?”

She kissed him.

Shocking, that, in this society.

Her father, Touchstone, said, “Bah, act with more modesty!”

“Modesty!” Gertrude said. “Why, I am no citizen now. Modesty! Am I not to be married? You would do best to keep me modest now I am to be a lady.”

Her last sentence was sarcastic, but events will reveal its truth.

“Boldness is good fashion, and court-like,” Sir Petronel said.

Gertrude said:

“Aye, in a country lady — a lady of the county aristocracy — I hope it is, as I shall be.”

Knowing Gertrude, she wanted to be a member of the county aristocracy.

Gertrude then asked:

“And how does it happen that you came no sooner, knight?”

Sir Petronel said:

“Indeed, I was so entertained in the progress with one Count Epernoum, a Welsh knight.”

A “progress” is a visit of the royal court to places in the countryside.

Sir Petronel continued:

“We had a match at the game of balloon, too, with my Lord Whachum, for four crowns.”

Sir Epernaum was not likely to exist, and Sir Petronel was unlikely to have played the game of balloon he mentioned.

Epernaum, however, resembles the words “Keep her now” — ’eep ’er nau — and “Capernaum,” and it has the same number of syllables as “Petronel.”

Sir Petronel has come to marry Gertrude and therefore be able to keep her now — that is, after the wedding.

Or “’eep ’er nau” could mean “Keep her nah.” Touchstone would very much prefer that Gertrude not marry Sir Petronel.

Capernaum is an ancient fishing village that was located on the shore of the Sea of Galilee.

Capernaum was humble, but knights are often proud. Knights can be big balls of wind.

Sir Petronel and Epernaum supposedly played a game with a big ball of wind.

The game of balloon was played with a large, inflated leather ball that players hit with their arms, which were protected with a wooden armguard.

Lord Whachum is What-You-Call-Him.

“At baboon?” Gertrude said, mishearing the word “balloon.”
“Jesu! You and I will play at baboon in the country, knight.”

In this society, baboons had a reputation for lechery.

The game of baboon can lead to a baby-boon and a baby-boom.

“Oh, sweet lady, it is a strong play with the arm,” Sir Petronel said.

Gertrude said:

“With arm, or leg, or any other member, if it be a court sport.”

Hmm. “Any other member.” Say no more.

She then asked:

“And when shall we be married, my knight?”

“I come now to consummate it, if your father may call a poor knight his son-in-law,” Sir Petronel said.

Touchstone said:

“Sir, you have come.”

He did NOT say, “Sir, you are welcome.”

In Ben Jonson’s society, as well as in our own, the verb “come” can mean “ejaculate.”

He continued:

“What is not mine to keep, I must not be sorry to forego. Land worth a hundred pounds in annual rent her grandmother left her; it is yours. She herself (as her mother’s gift) is yours.

“But if you expect anything from me, know, my hand and my eyes open together; I do not give blindly.

“Work upon that now.”

“Sir, you don’t mistrust my means, do you?” Sir Petronel said. “I am a knight.”

Knights tended to have means. They needed at least to own a horse, weapons, and armor.

“Sir, sir, what I don’t know, you will give me permission to say I am ignorant of,” Touchstone said.

Mrs. Touchstone said:

“Yes, you act ignorant that he is a knight!”

She was happy that a knight wanted to marry Gertrude, and she wanted her husband to also be happy about that.

She continued:

“I know where he had money to pay the gentlemen ushers and the heralds their fees.

“Aye, that he is a knight, and so might you have been, too, if you had been anything else than an ass, as well as some of your neighbors.

“If I thought you would not have been knighted, as I am an honest woman I would have dubbed you myself. I praise God I have wherewithal.”

King James I often made grants of knighthood in return for money. This was a scandal. Sir Petronel had bought his knighthood.

To “dub” someone is to give that person a new title. Touchstone’s wife, if she thought that he would decline to become a knight, could dub him with the title of cuckold. As a woman, she has the wherewithal to do it.

But she could buy for him the title of knight, perhaps, if it is true that she has the wherewithal — the independent income to do it. Later, however, she complains about not being able to get money for Gertrude.

Mrs. Touchstone then said:

“But as for you, daughter —”

“Aye, mother,” Gertrude said. “I must be a lady tomorrow, and by your leave, mother — I speak it not without my duty to you, but only in the right of my husband — I must take place of you, mother.”

By marrying a knight, Gertrude would rank socially higher than her mother. She would take precedence of her mother:

She would do such things as enter a room first. Society people entered rooms in order of social standing.

“That you shall, lady-daughter, and have a coach as well as I, too,” Mrs. Touchstone said.

“Yes, mother,” Gertrude said. “But by your leave, mother — I speak it not without my duty that I owe to you, but only in my husband’s right — my coach horses must take the wall of your coach horses.”

To “take the wall” means to “take the best position.” A person walking at the side of a street would walk close to the wall to avoid being splashed with mud or dirty water from the street and to avoid the muck in the gutter. When two people going in opposite directions passed each other, the higher-ranking person would take the wall.

Horses tend to be unaware of such societal niceties, but these are court horses.

Touchstone said:

“Come, come, the day — the sun — grows low, it is supper time. Use my house; the wedding solemnity is at my wife’s cost. Thank me for nothing but my willing blessing, for — I cannot feign and lie — my hopes are faint.

“And sir, respect my daughter; she has refused for you wealthy and honest — honorable — matches, known good men, well monied, better traded [better established in trade, and with better skills], and best reputed.”

Gertrude said:

“Body of truth, chitizens, chitizens!”

She was mocking citizens.

“Chitizens” rhymes with “shitizens.”

She continued:

“Sweet knight, as soon as ever we are married, take me to thy mercy out of this miserable chitty; immediately carry me out of the scent of Newcastle coal and the hearing of Bow-bell. I beseech thee, down with me, for God’s sake!”

She wanted him to take her down into the country to a better-smelling home and to lay her down in a bed and sleep with her — and to stay awake for a while before sleeping.

Touchstone said:

“Well, daughter, I have read that old wit who sings:

“The greatest rivers flow from little springs.

“Though thou art full, scorn not thy means at first;

“He that’s most drunk may soonest be athirst.”

“Work upon that now!”

Everyone except Touchstone, Mildred, and Golding exited.

Touchstone said:

“No, no; yonder stand my hopes.”

He was referring to his other daughter, Mildred, and to Golding.

He then said:

“Mildred, come hither, daughter. And how do you approve of your sister’s fashion? How do you fancy her choice? What do thou think?”

“I hope, as a sister, that all is and will be well,” Mildred said.

“Nay, but, nay, but, how do thou like her behavior and her humor?” Touchstone said. “Speak freely.”

“I am loath to speak ill, and yet — I am sorry about this — I cannot speak well,” Mildred replied.

Touchstone said:

“Well, very good. As I would wish, a modest answer.”

He then said:

“Golding, come hither; hither, Golding.”

Golding stepped forward.

Touchstone then said:

“How do thou like the knight, Sir Flash? Doesn’t he look big and self-important? How do thou like the elephant? He says he has a castle in the country.”

“Pray to heaven that the elephant carry not his castle on his back,” Golding said.

In other words, the elephant’s wealth may be solely in his clothes. The elephant — a symbol of pretensions to greatness — is the knight: Sir Petronel.

In India, war elephants sometimes carried a fortification on their back.

“Before heaven, very well said!” Touchstone said. “But seriously, how do thou repute him?”

“The best thing I can say about him is, I don’t know him,” Golding said.

Some people are well worth not knowing.

Touchstone said:

“Ha, Golding! I commend thee, I approve thee, and I will make it appear and make it apparent that my affection is strong to thee.

“My wife has her humor, and I will have mine.

“Do thou see my daughter here? She is not fair, well-favored and pretty, or so — her beauty is only indifferent — which modest measure of beauty shall not make it thy only work to watch her, nor sufficient mischance to suspect her.”

In other words: Mildred was not so pretty that men were constantly trying to seduce her, nor was she so ugly that she was forced to constantly look to find a lover.

Touchstone continued:

“Thou are towardly and outgoing, and she is modest and bashful; thou are provident, and she is careful.”

“Provident” means “providing for the future,” and “careful” means “being frugal now.”

Touchstone continued:

“She’s now mine. Give me thy hand; she’s now thine.

“Work upon that now!”

A man and a woman could join hands and become engaged in a ceremony called hand-fasting.

Holding hands fastened the couple together. Holding hands confirmed the agreement to marry.

“Sir, as your son-in-law I honor you, and as your servant I obey you,” Golding said.

Touchstone said:

“Do thou say so?”

He then said:

“Come here, Mildred.”

She came.

Her father then said:

“Do you see yonder fellow? He is a gentleman, although he is my apprentice, and he has somewhat to take to — he has some financial resources and some personal qualities worth having.

“He is a youth of good hope and good promise, well friended and related to people with good connections, and he is well parted — he is a man of skill and good qualities. Are you mine? You are his.

“Work you upon that now!”

“Sir, I am all yours,” Mildred said. “Your body gave me life, and your care and love gave me happiness of life. Let your virtue still direct it, for to your wisdom I wholly dispose myself.”

Touchstone said:

“Do thou say so? Be you two better acquainted.”

He then said to Golding:

“Lip her, lip her, knave! Kiss her!”

Golding kissed Mildred.

Touchstone then said:

“So, shut up shop; let’s go in. We must make holiday.”

Golding and Mildred exited.

Alone, Touchstone said to himself:

“This match shall go on, for I intend to find out and test and prove which thrives the best, the mean and lowly love, or the lofty love. I will find out and test and prove whether fit wedlock vowed between like and like, or prouder hopes, which daringly overstrike their place and means, thrives the best.”

A proverb stated, “Like blood, like good, like age make the happiest marriage.”

A marriage between Golding and Mildred was a marriage of social equals and a marriage of people with similar good personal qualities and similar ages.

A marriage between Sir Petronel and Gertrude was a marriage based on social climbing.

Touchstone said:

“It is honest time’s expense when seeming lightness bears a moral sense.”

Gertrude’s apparent lightness is likely to give readers a moral lesson. This is a good use of time.

Touchstone concluded:

“Work upon that now!”

ACT 2 (Eastward Ho!)

— 2.1 —

The time was morning. The previous day, Sir Petronel and Gertrude had been married.

Outside his shop, Touchstone called, “Quicksilver! Master Francis Quicksilver! Master Quicksilver!”

Quicksilver, who was drunk and hiccupping, walked over to him and said, “Here, sir. (Hic!)”

Touchstone said:

“So, sir, nothing but flat Master Quicksilver, without any familiar addition, will fetch you.”

“Master Quicksilver” was formal address.

“Francis” in “Master Francis Quicksilver” was a familiar addition.

Touchstone then asked:

“Will you truss my points, sir?”

He wanted Quicksilver to help him tie his hose to his doublet.

A doublet is a jacket.

Quicksilver said, “Aye, indeed. (Hic!)”

Quicksilver tied Touchstone’s points, aka laces.

“How are you now, sir?” Touchstone asked. “The drunken hiccup so soon this morning?”

“It is only the coldness of my stomach, indeed,” Quicksilver said.

In this society, doctors believed that a cold stomach caused hiccups, one cure for which was drinking wine.

Touchstone said:

“What! Have you the cause natural for it? You’re a very learned drunkard. I believe I shall miss some of my silver spoons with your learning.”

Quicksilver could steal and then sell Touchstone’s silver spoons to get money to spend in taverns.

Touchstone continued:

“The nuptial night will not moisten your throat sufficiently, but the morning likewise must rain her dews into your gluttonous weasand.”

A weasand is a throat.

“If it shall please you, sir, we did but drink (hic!) to the coming off of the knightly bridegroom,” Quicksilver said.

“To the coming off of him?” Touchstone said.

“Aye, indeed,” Quicksilver said. “We drunk to his coming on (hic!) when we went to bed, and now that we are up, we must drink to his coming off. For that’s the chief honor of a soldier, sir, and therefore we must drink so much the more to it, indeed. (Hic!)”

In this society, family and friends would escort the bride and groom to their bedroom and often would cause music to be played the next morning to awaken them.

The chief honor of a soldier is to come off victoriously from the battlefield.

The phrases “coming on” and “coming off” have sexual overtones and undertones.

“A very capital reason,” Touchstone said. “So that you go to bed late and rise early to commit drunkenness? You fulfill the scripture very sufficient wickedly, indeed.”

Isaiah 5:11 states, “Woe unto them that rise up early in the morning, that they may follow strong drink; that continue until night, till wine inflame them!” (King James Version).

“The knight’s men, indeed, are still on their knees at it (hic!), and because it is for your credit, sir, I would be loath to flinch,” Quicksilver said.

The knight’s men were kneeling as they proposed toasts.

Quicksilver, to honor Touchstone, would not flinch while drinking a toast but would instead drain the cup.

“I pray, sir, even to them again then,” Touchstone said. “You’re one of the separated crew, one of my wife’s faction, and my young lady’s, with whom and with their great match I will have nothing to do.”

Touchstone’s house was divided into two factions. In one faction were Mrs. Touchstone and Gertrude and Sir Petronel, and in the other faction were Touchstone and Mildred and Golding.

“So, sir,” Quicksilver said. “Now I will go keep my (hic!) credit with them, if it shall please you, sir.”

“In any case, sir, lay one cup of sack more on your cold stomach, I implore you,” Touchstone said.

“Yes, indeed,” Quicksilver said.

He exited.

Touchstone said:

“This is for my credit! Servants always maintain drunkenness in their master’s house ‘for their master’s credit.’ It is a good idle serving-man’s reason.”

The wedding of a daughter was an occasion to celebrate, and so servants celebrated it for the master’s honor.

Touchstone continued:

“I thank Time the night is past; I never stayed awake to such cost. I think we have stowed more sorts of flesh in our bellies than ever Noah’s ark received.”

During the Great Flood, Noah and his family survived in their ark, which they had filled with two — male and female — of every kind of animal.

“And as for wine, why, my house turns giddy with it, and there is more noise in it than at a water conduit, aka public fountain.”

Servants got water from conduits and carried the water to their employers and their employers’ families. Water conduits were a place of much gossip.

Touchstone sighed and said:

“Even beasts condemn our gluttony. Well, it is our city’s fault, which, because we commit seldom, we commit the more sinfully. We lose no time in our sensuality, but we make amends for it.”

He was using “commit” in the sense of “commit one of the Seven Deadly Sins.” Think of Exodus 20:14: “Thou shalt not commit adultery” (King James Version).

The Seven Deadly Sins are lust, gluttony, avarice, sloth, wrath, envy, and pride. These sins are deadly because they can “kill” the soul — the divine spirit — that is present in each human being.

Touchstone continued:

“Oh, that we would do the same in virtue negligence and religious negligence!”

In other words: We don't get drunk and overeat often, but when we do, we really get drunk and we really overeat. By “we” is meant “Londoners.”

Also in other words: It's a pity that we don't greatly indulge in being virtuous and religious after a period during which we neglect virtue and religion.

Golding and Mildred opened the shop and sat on either side of the stall, which was a table on which were wares for sale.

Touchstone said about them:

“But see, here are all the sober parcels — sober individuals — my house can show.

“I'll eavesdrop and hear what thoughts they utter this morning.”

He walked to the side, where he could not be easily seen.

Golding said to Mildred, “But is it possible that you, seeing your sister preferred to the bed of a knight — that is, advanced in social class by being married to a knight — should contain and confine your affections in the arms of an apprentice?”

Mildred replied, “I had rather make up the garment of my affections in some of the same piece than like a fool wear gowns of two colors or mix sackcloth with satin.”

Mildred preferred to marry someone of her own social status. She felt that marrying above her social class was like wearing a coat made of a lower-class material such as sackcloth and a higher-class material such as satin. Jesters — Fools — wore clothing made of different colors and of different pieces of cloth.

Leviticus 19:19 states, “Ye shall keep my statutes. Thou shalt not let thy cattle gender with a diverse kind: thou shalt not sow thy field with mingled seed: neither shall a garment mingled of linen and woollen come upon thee” (King James Version).

Golding said, “And do the costly garments — the title and fame of a lady, the fashion, and the observation and reverence [deference and respect] proper to such preferment — no more inflame you than such convenience [small comforts] as my poor means and industry can offer to your virtues?”

In other words: Don’t you prefer the luxuries of the higher social classes to the small comforts that I can give you?

Mildred answered:

“I have observed that the bridle given to those violent flatteries of fortune is seldom recovered. They bear one headlong in desire from one novelty to another, and where those ranging appetites reign, there is always more passion than reason; no support and no restraint, and so no happiness.

“These hasty advancements are not natural. Nature has given us legs to walk to our objects, not wings to fly to them.”

In other words: People who desire rapid social advancement are driven more by strongly felt desires than by reason, which is needed to control desires.

In Plato’s Phaedrus, 253ff. appears the allegory of the chariot, which represents Humankind’s tripartite soul. A charioteer drives a chariot drawn by two horses, which represent passions, aka desires. The white horse represents positive desires, such as the desire to achieve honor. The dark horse represents negative desires, such as the desire for drunkenness. The charioteer represents reason, which is needed to control the desires.

A man may desire to become King, but if his desires are not restrained by reason, he could attempt to become the new King by assassinating the old King. This would be a mistake. Ask Macbeth.

Golding said:

“How dear an object you are to my desires I cannot express, with whose fruition, if my master’s absolute consent and yours would grant me, I should be absolutely happy.

“And although it would be a grace so far beyond my merit that I should blush with unworthiness to receive it, yet thus far both my love and my means shall assure your requital: You shall want nothing fit for your birth and education — what increase of wealth and advancement the honest and orderly industry and skill of our trade will afford to any person, I don’t doubt will be aspired by me; I will forever make your contentment the end of my endeavors; I will love you above all; and only your grief shall be my misery, and your delight, my felicity.”

Touchstone said to himself:

“Work upon that now!

“By my hopes, he woos honestly and orderly; he shall be the anchor of my hopes. Look, see the ill-yoked monster, his fellow.”

Quicksilver entered the scene. He was drunk, his laces were untied, he was wearing the flat cap of a tradesman, and he had a towel around his neck.

Touchstone called Quicksilver unyoked because the laces of his clothing were not fastened, and because he was not using reason to control his desires.

Quicksilver said:

“Eastward ho!

“Holla, ye pampered jades of Asia!”

He was quoting Christopher Marlowe’s 2 Tamburlaine, 4.3.1.

“Drunk now downright, on my fidelity!” Touchstone said to himself.

Quicksilver said, “(Hic!) Pulldo, pulldo! ‘Showse,’ quoth the caliver.”

“Pull dough” means “knead dough so that it will rise.”

Pulling on a soft, doughy penis can also make it rise.

“Showse” is a portmanteau word joining “shoot” and “owse,” aka “ooze.”

A penis can shoot a kind of ooze.

A caliver is a light gun and shooting a gun can be compared to ejaculation.

There’s a reason why a British punk rock band named themselves The Sex Pistols.

“Bah, fellow Quicksilver, what a pickle you are in!” Golding said.

Quicksilver said:

“Pickle? Pickle in thy throat!

“Zounds, pickle? Wa ha ho!”

Quicksilver was drunk because he was celebrating the marriage of Gertrude and Sir Petronel.

“Pickle in thy throat!” may be a reference to fellatio.

“Zounds” means “By God’s wounds.”

“Wa ha ho!” is the cry of a falconer.

Quicksilver said:

“Good morning, Knight Petronel.

“G’morning, lady goldsmith.”

Quicksilver was so drunk that he thought he was talking to Sir Petronel and to Gertrude.

“Come off, knight, with a counterbuff, for the honor of knighthood.”

A counterbuff is a counter-blow. When a knight was struck by another person, the knight would lose honor if he did not return the blow.

To a soldier, to “come off” meant to leave the field of battle.

To a lover, to “come off” meant to get off (from on top of) the loved one.

If oral sex by Gertrude can be considered a strike, aka blow, in a battle, the counter-blow would be for Sir Petronel to perform oral sex on her.

Wedding nights can be a comic battle in which the participants compete in giving each other sirrahsexual pleasure.

“Why, how are you now, sir?” Golding asked. “Do you know where you are?”

“Where I am?” Quicksilver said. “Why, by God’s blood, you jolthead, where I am?”

A “jolthead” is a blockhead.

Golding said, “Go to! Go to! Come! Come! For shame, go to bed and sleep out this immodesty — this lack of moderation; thou shame both my master and his house.”

Quicksilver said:

“Shame? What shame? I thought thou would show thy bringing up. If thou were a gentleman as I am, thou would think it no shame to be drunk. Lend me some money; save my credit.”

“Credit” can mean reputation.

Quicksilver continued:

“I must dine with the serving-men and their wives — and their wives, sirrah!”

Quicksilver was the clod-pate: the fool who was tolerated because he picked up the check and paid for all.

“Dine with who you will,” Golding said. “I’ll not lend thee threepence.”

Quicksilver said:

“By God’s foot, lend me some money.

“Hast thou not Hiren here?”

“Hiren” is a character in George Peele’s lost play The Turkish Mahomet and Hiren the Fair Greek.

The word also means “hirin’,” aka “hiring or employment.” Yes, Golding had a job, and therefore he must have money that he could lend Quicksilver.

Touchstone came forward and asked, “Why, how now, sirrah? What vein’s this, huh? What style of speech is this? What mood is this?”

Quicksilver quoted a line from another play:

“Who cries on murder? Lady, was it you?”

This is a line from George Chapman’s The Blind Beggar of Alexandria, 9.49.

Quicksilver continued:

“How does our master?”

“I request thee, cry, ‘Eastward ho!’”

“Sirrah, sirrah, you’re past your hiccup now,” Touchstone said. “I see you’re drunk.”

“It is for your credit, master,” Quicksilver said.

“And I hear you keep a whore in town,” Touchstone said.

“It is for your credit, master,” Quicksilver said.

This kind of credit was money Quicksilver took from Touchstone to support her.

“And what you are out in cash — what you lack in cash — I know,” Touchstone said.

“So do I,” Quicksilver said. “My father’s a gentleman; work upon that now! Eastward ho!”

Touchstone replied:

“Sir, ‘Eastward, ho!’ will make you go ‘Westward, ho!’”

East of Goldsmiths’ Row was the Wood Street Counter.

West of the city of London was Tyburn, famous for its gallows.

Touchstone continued:

“I will no longer dishonest” — he meant ‘dishonor’ — “my house nor endanger my stock — my property — with your license. There, sir, there’s your indenture.”

He handed Quicksilver a document.

By giving Quicksilver his contract of indenture, Touchstone was formally firing him.

Touchstone continued:

“All your apparel — that I must know — is on your back, and from this time my door is shut to you. From me be free, but for other freedom and the moneys you have wasted, ‘Eastward ho!’ shall not serve you.”

Touchstone knew about some of Quicksilver’s clothing: the clothing that Touchstone was obligated to give his apprentice. But Quicksilver had other clothing, as shown by his pumps in 1.1.

Apprentices who completed their apprenticeships were given certain freedoms that Quicksilver would not now get because he was fired.

Quicksilver said:

“Am I free of my fetters? Rent [Wages], fly with a duck in thy mouth!”

The phrase “to come home with a duck in the mouth” meant “to make a profit.”

Quicksilver had lost his employment, and therefore he had lost his rent (wages) and his board (food, such as duck), which Touchstone paid for. His wages and room and board were flying away from him.

Quicksilver continued:

“And now I tell thee, Touchstone —”

Normally, he would call Touchstone “Master Touchstone.”

“Good sir,” Touchstone began.

Quicksilver recited a line from a play: “When this eternal substance of my soul —”

“Well said and well done,” Touchstone said. “Change your gold ends for your play ends.”

In other words: Instead of working as a goldsmith, go ahead and quote fragments of lines from the plays you love so much.

Also in other words: Exchange bits of gold for bits of plays.

“Gold ends” are fragments of gold.

Quicksilver continued: “Did live imprisoned in my wanton flesh —”

“What then, sir?” Touchstone asked.

The next line was this:

“Each in their function serving other’s need,”

Quicksilver skipped that line and recited:

“I was a courtier in the Spanish court,

“And Don Andrea was my name.”

The lines Quicksilver had recited were adapted from Thomas Kyd’s The Spanish Tragedy, 1.1.1-2, 4-5. He had skipped line 3. He did not want to serve the need of Touchstone, and Touchstone did not want to serve the need of Quicksilver.

“Good master Don Andrea, will you march?” Touchstone asked.

“Sweet Touchstone, will you lend me two shillings?” Quicksilver asked.

“Not a penny,” Touchstone said.

Quicksilver said:

“Not a penny?”

“I have friends, and I have acquaintance. I will piss at thy shop posts and throw rotten eggs at thy sign.

“Work upon that now!”

Staggering, he exited.

Touchstone then said to Golding:

“Now, sirrah, you! Listen, you! You shall serve me no more neither, not an hour longer.”

“What do you mean, sir?” Golding asked.

Touchstone said:

“I mean to give thee thy freedom, and with thy freedom my daughter, and with my daughter a father’s love. And with all these, I will give thee such a marriage portion — a dowry — as shall make Knight Petronel himself envy thee.

“You’re both agreed, are you not?”

Golding would no longer be an apprentice.

Golding was now a journeyman — a skilled worker — in his profession of goldsmithing. In time, he might become a master.

With the dowry, Golding and Mildred could begin their life together.

Golding and Mildred knelt and said, “With all submission, both of thanks and duty.”

Touchstone took their hands and helped them rise to their feet, and then he said:

“Well, then, may the great power of heaven bless and confirm you!

“And, Golding, so that my love to thee may not show less than my wife’s love to my eldest daughter, thy marriage feast shall equal the knight’s and hers.”

Golding said:

“Let me beseech you, no, sir. The superfluity and cold meat left at their nuptials will with bounty furnish ours.”

In Shakespeare’s Hamlet 1.2.180-1, appear these words:

“Thrift, thrift, Horatio. The funeral baked meats

“Did coldly furnish forth the marriage tables.”

Golding continued:

“The grossest prodigality is superfluous cost of the belly.”

Gluttony is one of the Seven Deadly Sins.

Golding continued:

“Nor would I wish any invitement of statesmen and dignitaries or friends; only your reverend presence and witness shall sufficiently grace and confirm us.”

Touchstone replied:

“Son to my own bosom, take her and my blessing!”

He then said about Gertrude:

“The nice fondling, my lady sir-reverence, that I must not now presume to call daughter, is so ravished with desire to hansel — to begin using — her new coach and see her knight's eastward castle that the next morning will sweat with her busy setting forth."

A "fondling" is a little fool.

"Sir-reverence" means "saving your reverence." It is an apology for vulgar language (which Gertrude used frequently). "Sir-reverence" also meant "excrement."

Touchstone continued:

"Away she and her mother will go, and while their preparation is making, we ourselves, with some two or three other friends, will consummate the humble match we have in God's name concluded."

Golding and Mildred exited.

Alone, Touchstone said to himself:

"It is to my wish, for I have often read

"Fit birth, fit age, keeps long a quiet bed.

"It is to my wish, for tradesmen, well it is known,

"Get with more ease than gentry keeps his own."

The gentry — at least the gallants Quicksilver spent time with — tended to be spendthrifts; the tradesmen tended to be frugal. Lack of money problems often leads to better sleep.

He exited.

— 2.2 —

Alone, Security, an elderly usurer and bawd to Frank Quicksilver, talked to himself outside his house:

"My privy — intimate and familiar — guest, lusty and vigorous Quicksilver, has drunk too deep of the bride-bowl, but with a little sleep he has much recovered and I think is making himself ready to be drunk in a gallanter likeness. He is ready to get drunk like a gallant.”

A bride-bowl was a large cup of alcoholic drink passed around to wedding guests.

Security continued:

“My house is, as it were, the cave where the young outlaw hoards the stolen vails — the stolen profits — of his occupation; and here, when he will revel and party in his prodigal similitude and similarity, he retires to his trunks and — I may say softly — his punks.”

Punks are prostitutes.

Security continued:

“He dares trust me with the keeping of both, for I am security itself; my name is Security, the famous usurer.”

Quicksilver entered the scene, wearing his apprentice’s coat and cap and his gallant’s breeches and stockings, and pulling on his garters.

Quicksilver’s top half was appareled like an apprentice, and his bottom half was appareled like a gallant.

Quicksilver said:

“Come, old Security, thou father of destruction.”

The Devil is the father of lies. As a usurer, Security causes destruction for those who cannot pay their debts.

Quicksilver continued:

“The indented sheepskin is burned wherein I was wrapped and confined, and I am now loose to get more children of perdition into thy usurious bonds.”

Documents such as contracts of indenture were written on sheepskin.

The sheepskin was a kind of disguise for Quicksilver. As an apprentice, he encouraged gallants to gamble and lose money, thus making them prey for Security. Quicksilver had been a wolf in sheep's clothing.

Although Quicksilver was no longer an apprentice, he still intended to profit from other people's vices.

Quicksilver continued:

“Thou feed my lechery, and I feed thy covetousness; thou are pandar to me for my wench, and I am pandar to thee for thy cozenages and cheats.

“‘Ka me, ka thee’ runs through court and country.”

“‘Ka me, ka thee’ means ‘Help me, and I’ll help you,’ or ‘You scratch my back, and I’ll scratch your back,’ or ‘One good turn deserves another.’”

Considering the moral characters of these two characters, readers may want to add, “One bad deed deserves another.”

Security replied:

“Well said, my subtle Quicksilver. These K’s open the doors to all this world’s felicity; the dullest forehead — brain — sees it.”

The word “keys” was pronounced “kays.”

Security continued:

“Let not master courtier think he carries all the knavery on his shoulders. I have known poor Hob in the country, who has worn hobnails on his shoes, have as much villainy in his head as he who wears gold buttons in his cap.”

“Hob” was a stereotypical name for a rustic.

“Why, man, it is the London highway to thrift — the quickest way to profit,” Quicksilver said. “If virtue would be used, it is used just as a scrap — just as bait — to the net of villainy. They who use virtue simply and sincerely, thrive simply and poorly, I promise. Weight and fashion make goldsmiths cuckolds.”

Goldsmiths became cuckolds — men with unfaithful wives — because so much of their time was spent making money: weighing gold and fashioning it into jewelry or other objects.

According to Quicksilver, honest goldsmiths get rich slowly through hard work. If they were to get rich fast through villainy, their wives would be faithful.

Sindefy, Frank Quicksilver’s punk and lover, entered the scene, carrying Quicksilver’s doublet (jacket), cloak, rapier, and dagger. These were fine items of clothing that were worn by a gallant, not by an apprentice.
