Lovel continued, “It is the likeness of affections that is both the parent and the nurse of love.

“Love is a spiritual coupling of two souls, so much more excellent as it least relates to the body.

“Love is circular and perfect and complete, eternal, not feigned or made, but born.

“Love is so precious that nothing can value it but itself.

“Love is so free that nothing can command it but itself.

“And in itself love is so round and liberal that where it favors, it bestows itself.”

Lord Beaufort said, “And that do I.”

Lovel and Lord Beaufort both loved, but they loved in different ways. Lovel loved spiritually; Lord Beaufort loved physically.

Lord Beaufort said to the disguised Frank, “Here my whole self I tender, according to the practice of the court.”

The Nurse said, “Ay, ’tish a naughty practish, a lewd practish. Be quiet, man, dou shalt not leip her here.”

[The Nurse said, “Aye, it is a naughty, sinful practice, a lewd, sexually sinful practice. Be quiet, man. You shall not leap on her and have sex with her here.”]

Lord Beaufort said to the Nurse, “Leap her? I lip her — I kiss her. Foolish queen at arms, your blazon — your description — is false. Will you blaspheme your office?”

Lovel said, “But we must take and understand this love at length and in full still as a name of dignity, not pleasure.”

The Host said to Lord Beaufort, “Do you note that, my light young lord?”

In this culture, the word “light” can mean “lascivious.”

Lovel said, “True love has no unworthy thought.

“True love has no light, loose, unbecoming appetite or strain.

“Instead, true love is fixed, constant, pure, immutable.”

Lord Beaufort said, “I don’t relish these philosophical feasts.

“Give me a banquet of sense like that of Ovid.”

In 1595, George Chapman wrote a poem titled “Ovid’s Banquet of Sense.”

Lord Beaufort continued, “Give me a form to take the eye; a voice to take my ear; pure aromatics to go to my sense of smell; a soft, smooth, dainty hand to touch; and for my taste give me ambrosiac kisses to melt down the palate.”

Ambrosia is the food of the Greek and Roman gods. Aphrodisiacs are food and drink that inspire lust. “Ambrosiac” is a portmanteau word.

Lovel said, “The earthly, lower form of lovers are taken only with what strikes the senses, and they love by that loose scale.”

In this context, a scale is a ladder. A virtuous soul can scale a metaphorical ladder and reach Absolute Beauty. The earthly, lower forms of lovers are on that ladder, but they have much higher to climb.

A scale is also equipment that weighs. The earthly, lower form of lovers are taken with light love. A woman with light heels is a promiscuous woman whose heels are frequently up in the air as she lies on her back. Such a woman can be beautiful and can give delight, but there is a higher form of love.

Lovel continued:

“I grant that we like what’s fair and graceful in an object, and I grant that it is true that we would use it — our liking of what’s fair and graceful — in the all-perfection we desire in both our civil and our domestic deeds.

“Those civil and our domestic deeds include the ordering of an army (a multitude of people), and they include our style and manner of expression, apparel, gesture, building, or what not.

“It is true that all arts and actions do aspire to their beauty.”

In other words, the earthly, lower form of lovers are seeking beauty, and it is true that the beauty they seek is all-perfection. But they have higher to climb. They are like someone who can see a beautiful landscape from a height but if they were to climb higher, they would see much more beauty. They also are like people who see the beautiful exterior of a house, but if they were to go inside the house they would see much more beauty, including the beauty of the owner of the house. The house cannot love, but the owner of the house can love. The earthly, lower form of lovers are those who see the physical beauty of a lover without seeing the lover’s beautiful soul.

Love continued:

“But let me put the case:

“In travel I may meet some gorgeous structure, with a brave frontispiece — an aesthetically pleasing entrance. Shall I stay captive in the outer court, surprised and overwhelmed with that, and not advance to know who dwells there and inhabits the house?

“There is my friendship to be made, within, with what can love me in return; not with the walls, doors, windows, architraves [molding around doorways and windows], the

In this society, the word “friend” can mean “lover.”

Lovel continued:

“My end is lost in loving of a face, an eye, lip, nose, hand, foot, or other part, whose all is only a statue, if the mind does not move and affect me — only the mind can love in return.

“The end of love is to have two made one in will and in affection.

“The end of love is that the minds be first joined, not the bodies.”

Lord Beaufort said, “Give me the body, if it is a good one.”

He kissed the disguised Frank, who said, “Nay, my lord, I must appeal to the sovereign Prudence for better treatment, if you continue your practice — your kissing.”

Trundle shouted, “Silence, on pain of imprisonment! Hear the court.”

Lovel continued explaining what love is:

“The body’s love is frail, subject to change, and alters still with it.

“The mind’s love is firm, one and the same, and proceeds first from weighing and well examining what is fair and good, and then weighing and well examining what is fair and good in reason and fit in manners.

“That breeds good will, and good will breeds desire of union.

“So knowledge first begets benevolence, benevolence breeds friendship, and friendship breeds love.

“And where love serves and steps aside from this, it is a mere degenerate appetite. It is lost, morally perverse, depraved affection, and it bears no mark or character of true love.”

“How I am changed!” Lady Frampul said. “By what alchemy of love or language am I thus translated and changed in form! Lovel’s tongue is tipped with the philosopher’s stone, and that has touched and transformed me through every vein!”

The philosopher’s stone was supposed to be able to transform base metals into gold or silver.

The word “vein” can refer to 1) veins of blood, and 2) veins of metal ore.

Lady Frampul continued, “I feel that transmutation of my blood, as if I have quite become another creature, and all he speaks, it is projection!”

Projection is the final step in the creation of a philosopher’s stone: It is a test of the stone’s power. After the philosopher’s stone was created, a small part of it would be cast onto molten base metal; the philosopher’s stone would then transmute — turn — the base metal to gold.

Lady Frampul was saying that Lovel’s words had metaphorically transformed her from base metal into gold.

Queen Prudence said, “Well feigned, my lady; now her parts begin!”

These parts were acting parts.

Queen Prudence believed that Lady Frampul was like an actress acting a part — a role — in this play-court.

Lord Latimer said, “And she will act them subtly and artfully.”

“She fails me if she does not,” Queen Prudence said.

Level continued his discourse on love:

“Nor do they trespass within bounds of pardon — those people who, giving way and license to their love, divest him — the soul — of his noblest ornaments, which are his modesty and shamefacedness.

“And so they do who have unfit designs upon the parties — the persons — they pretend to love.

“For what’s more monstrous, what’s more an unnatural monstrosity, than to hear me protest truth of affection to a person whom I would dishonor?

“And what’s a greater dishonor than defacing another’s good while simultaneously forfeiting my own, and drawing on a fellowship of sin?

“From the stigma and reproach of which, though for a while we both may be kept safe by caution and avoiding public notice, yet the conscience cannot be cleansed.

“For what was hitherto called by the name of love becomes destroyed then with the fact of sin. The innocency once lost, the abating of affection soon will follow; and love is never true that is not lasting, no more than any love can be pure or perfect that entertains more than one object.

“Dixi.”

Dixi is Latin for “I have spoken.” In the law courts, it means, “I rest my case.”

Lady Frampul said, “Oh, speak and speak forever! Let my ear be always feasted and filled with this banquet! No sense can ever surfeit and overindulge on such truth. It is the marrow — the essence — of all lovers’ tenets!

“Who has read Plato, Heliodore, or Tatius, Sidney, d’Urfé, or all Love’s fathers, like him?

“He’s there the Master of the Sentences, their school and doctrine, their commentary, text, and gloss, and he breathes the true divinity of Love!”

All of the authors she mentioned had written about love.

Plato, of course, is the author of such dialogues as the Symposium.

Heliodore of Syria wrote a romance titled Aethiopica.

Achilles Tatius wrote The Loves of Leucippe and Cleitophon.

Sir Philip Sidney wrote Arcadia.

Honoré d’Urfé wrote a pastoral novel titled L’Astrée.

Peter Lombard wrote Sententiae.

When Lady Frampul called Lovel “the Master of the Sentences,” she was complimenting his speaking ability and ability to compose sentences orally. Of course, she was also praising his knowledge of love literature.

“Excellent actor!” Queen Prudence said. “How she hits a bull’s-eye and exactly imitates this passion!”

Lady Frampul said, “Whereas I have lived in heresy so long out of the congregation of Love, and stood irregular and outside and not in conformity with Love, by all Love’s canons.”

Lord Latimer, who was not sure that Lady Frampul was playing a part, asked, “But do you think she is acting?”

Queen Prudence replied, “Upon my sovereignty, pay close attention to her now.”

Prudence, a chambermaid, was playing the part of a Queen. Why couldn't Lady Frampul be playing the part of a woman newly in love with Lovel?

"I shake, and I am half jealous," Lord Latimer said.

Lord Latimer apparently had a crush on Lady Frampul.

Lady Frampul said, "What penance shall I do, to be received into and reconciled to the Church of Love?"

"Shall I go in procession barefoot as a pilgrim to his image and say some hundred penitential verses there, out of Chaucer's Troilus and Cressid?"

In Troilus and Creseyde, Troilus' love is betrayed. Such a choice of texts can make Lovel believe that Lady Frampul is playing a role instead of revealing her true feelings. On the other hand, Troilus loves sincerely, and so perhaps Lady Frampul loves Lovel sincerely.

Lady Frampul continued, "Or to Cupid's mother's shrine shall I vow a wax candle as large as the town maypole is, and pay for it?"

"Order me to do anything this court thinks fit, for I have trespassed against, offended against, and blasphemed against Love.

"I have, indeed, despised his deity, whom, until this miracle wrought on me, I knew not.

"But now I adore Love, and I would kiss the rushes that bear this reverend gentleman, Lovel, Love's priest, if that would expiate and atone and make amends — but I fear it will not."

In this society rushes were strewn on the floor. Lovel was standing on some rushes. Lady Frampul was saying that she would kiss the ground — that is, the rushes — beneath his feet.

Lady Frampul said, “For although he is somewhat struck in years and old enough to be my father, he is wise, and only wise men love; the others covet.

“I could begin to be in love with him, but I will not tell him yet because I hope to enjoy the other hour with more delight, and test him farther.”

Lovel may or may not have heard this last paragraph. When he heard Lady Frampul talk about his age, he may have turned away.

Queen Prudence said to Lady Frampul, “Most Socratic lady! Or if you will, most ironic and dissembling lady.”

Queen Prudence then said to Lovel, “May God give you joy of your Platonic love here, Master Lovel.”

She then said to Lady Frampul, “But pay him his first kiss yet, in the court, which is a debt and due, since the hour has run its course.”

Lady Frampul said, “How swift is time, and how slyly it steals away from them who would hug it, value it, embrace it! I would have thought it had run scarcely ten minutes, when the whole hour has fled.”

She then said to Lovel, “Here, take your kiss, sir, which I most willingly tender you in court.”

She kissed him.

Lord Beaufort said, “And we do imitate —”

He kissed the disguised Frank.

Lady Frampul said, “And I could wish it had been twenty kisses — provided that Queen Prudence’s poor narrow nature had decreed it so. But that is past and irrevocable, now. She did what her nature allows according to her latitude —”

Queen Prudence said, “Beware you do not conjure up a spirit you cannot lay.”

She was in part being bawdy. The “spirit” that would be conjured up could be a penis. The expression, however, also means “Don’t start something you can’t finish.”

“I dare you!” Lady Frampul said. “Do your worst. Show me just such an injustice; I would thank you to alter your award.

She was saying that she wanted Queen Prudence to order that she — Lady Frampul — must kiss Lovel twenty times.

“Surely, she is serious!” Lord Latimer said. “I shall have another fit of jealousy. I feel a grudging vexation and secret desire!”

The Host said to Lovel, “Cheer up, noble guest! We cannot guess what this may come to yet. The brain of man or woman is uncertain.”

“Tut, Lady Frampul dissembles!” Lovel replied. “She is acting! All that comes from her is feigned and counterfeit. If it were not, the Spanish monarchy, with both the East and West Indies, could not buy off the treasure of this kiss, or half give balance for my happiness.”

The Host said, “Why, as it is yet, it gladdens my Light Heart to see you roused thus from a sleepy humor of drowsy, non-essential melancholy, and it gladdens my Light Heart to see all those brave parts of your soul awake that did before seem drowned and buried in you, so that you express yourself as if you had ridden the muse’s horse, or got Bellerophon’s weapons!”

Bellerophon was a warrior who captured and rode the winged horse Pegasus, which was the Muses’ horse. Bellerophon, however, attempted to ride Pegasus to the top of Mount Olympus so he could join the gods — an act of hubris that motivated Jupiter, king of the gods, to send a gadfly to sting Pegasus. This caused Bellerophon to fall off Pegasus.

Fly entered the room.

The Host asked, “What is the news with Fly?”

Fly answered, “I bring news of a newer lady, a finer, fresher, braver, bonnier beauty, a very bona-roba — a showy woman — and a bouncer in yellow, glistening, golden satin!”

The showy woman could bounce while on top of a man in bed. Or she could simply be a loud woman and bounce her words around.

Lady Frampul said, “Pru, adjourn the court.”

Queen Prudence ordered, “Cry, Trundle!”

Trundle cried:

“Oyez, any man or woman who has any personal attendance to give to the court.

“Keep the second hour, and may Love save the Sovereign!”

ACT 4 (The New Inn, or The Light Heart)

— 4.1 —

Jug, Barnaby, and Jordan talked together. Barnaby was a hired coachman.

“Oh, Barnaby!” Jug said.

“Welcome, Barnaby!” Jordan said. “Where have you been?”

“In the foul weather,” Barnaby said.

“Which has wet you, Ban,” Jug said.

Barnaby said, “I’m as dry as a woodchip!”

He was referring to being thirsty.

He said, “Good Jug, a cast of your name, as well as your office; bring in two jugs!”

The word “cast” means “a couple,” but it is normally used when speaking of hawks. The word “cast” also means a quantity of ale — the amount made at one time.

“By and by,” Jug said.

He exited.

“What lady’s this you have brought here?” Jordan asked.

“She’s a great lady!” Barnaby said. “I know no more. She is one who will test you, Jordan. She’ll find your gauge, your circle, your capacity.”

A great lady can be well born, and a great lady can be a very big lady.

He was joking about the capacity of a jordan, aka chamber pot, but perhaps he was also joking about the size of Jordan’s sexual equipment.

Barnaby then asked, “How are old Stagers the blacksmith and Tree the saddler? Do they still keep their penny-club?”

In this society, friends who were members of the lower class would often contribute a penny for an entertainment, such as the drinking of alcohol.

Jordan answered, “And they keep the old catch — tune — too, of ‘Whoop Barnaby.’”

“Do they sing at me?” Barnaby asked.

“They’re rioting and reeling at it in the parlor now,” Jordan said.

Stagers and Tree were drinking and singing now.

Jug returned with the wine.

“I’ll go to them,” Barnaby said. “Give me a drink first.”

Jordan handed Barnaby a drink and asked, “Where’s your hat?”

“I lost it by the way as I was driving the carriage,” Barnaby said.

He drank and then said, “Give me another.”

“Another hat?” Jug asked.

“Another drink,” Barnaby said.

“Take heed of taking cold, Ban,” Jug said.

“Ban” was a nickname for Barnaby.

Barnaby said, “The wind blew my hat off at Highgate, and my lady would not allow me to alight to pick it up, but made me drive bare-headed in the rain.”

“So that she might be mistaken for a Countess?” Jordan asked.

In this society, the fashion was for the drivers of great personages such as Countesses to wear no hats.

“Truly, that is likely enough!” Barnaby said.

The lady he had driven was not a Countess, but she wished to appear to be a Countess.

Barnaby added, “She might be an over-grown Duchess, for all I know.”

As would soon become apparent, she was a very big woman.

“What, with one man?” Jug said.

He meant a single serving-man. A real Duchess would have more than one servant. This particular serving-man was not Barnaby, who was the woman’s hired driver.

Barnaby said, “At a time — they carry no more, the best of them.”

Barnaby was talking bawdily. In the missionary position, a woman carries the weight of a man. According to Barnaby, the best women carry no more than the weight of one man at a time.

Jordan said, “Nor do the splendidly dressed.”

“And she is very splendidly dressed!” Barnaby said about the woman he had driven.

Jordan said, “She has on a stately gown and petticoat!”

“Have you spied her petticoat, Jordan?” Barnaby said. “You’re a notable peerer, an old rabbi at a smock’s hem, boy.”

Rabbis have much knowledge. Barnaby was teasing Jordan by saying that Jordan’s specialized knowledge was about women.

Jug said, “As he is chamberlain, he may do that by his place.”

Chamberlains were in charge of bed-chambers and chamber-pots.

“What’s her squire?” Jordan asked.

The squire was her single serving-man: He was a personal attendant.

Barnaby answered, “Her squire is a toy, a plaything, to whom she gives an allowance of eight-pence a day. He is a slight mannet — a little man — to transport and squire her up and down.

“Come, show me to my playfellows: old Staggers and father Tree.”

“Here, this way, Barnaby,” Jordan said.

They exited.

— 4.2 —

Tiptoe, Bat Burst, Master Huffle, and Fly talked together in the courtyard of the inn.

Tiptoe said, “Come, let’s take in fresco — in the open air — here one quart.”

“Two quarts, my man-of-war, my warrior,” Bat Burst said. “Let’s not be stinted!”

Master Huffle called, “Advance three jordans, varlet of the house.”

He was ordering three pots of wine. Apparently, Fly would not get a pot.

Tiptoe whispered to Fly, “I do not like your Burst, bird; he is saucy. He was some shopkeeper?”

“Yes, sir,” Fly answered.

Tiptoe whispered, “I knew it. He was a broken-winged, bankrupt shopkeeper! I nose — detect — them immediately. He had no father, I am sure, who dared to acknowledge that Bat Burst was his son. He was some foundling in a stable, or the church porch, brought up in Christ’s Hospital for poor children, and so bound to be an apprentice. Then he was master of a shop, and then one of the Court of Inquest, which judges cases involving debts of under forty shillings. Then he went bankrupt, or leapt to the position of an alderman. The original — the origin — of both bankrupts and aldermen is a church porch.”

Bat Burst was probably a defendant in the Court of Inquest, not one of the jurors.

Unwanted babies were left on church porches.

Aldermen are civil officers, or they are the head, master, or warden of a trade guild.

“The original of some, my colonel,” Fly said.

Tiptoe said, “In good faith, a church porch is the original of most of your shop citizens; they’re rude animals! And let them get but ten miles out of town, they will out-swagger all the wapentake.”

Tiptoe had little respect for the aldermen whom he called shop citizens.

“What’s that?” Fly asked.

Tiptoe answered, “A Saxon word to signify the hundred.”

They were referring to sub-divisions of English counties.

According to the Oxford English Dictionary, another kind of alderman is “The senior judicial person in an English hundred.”

Some aldermen of a lower status such as those in trade guilds would pretend to be aldermen of a different, higher-status kind once they were among people who did not know them.

Pierce Anon came over to them, set down three pots of wine, and exited.

Bat Burst said, “Come, let us drink, Sir Glorious, some brave health upon our tiptoes.”

His words were ambiguous. They could mean: 1) Let’s drink a health — draught — to the Tiptoes, or 2) While we drink, let’s stand on our tiptoes.

Tiptoe raised his jug and said, “To the health of the Bursts!”

His words were ambiguous. They could mean: 1) Let’s drink a health — draught — to the Bursts, or 2) Let’s drink a health — draught — to the bankrupts.

One meaning of “burst” is “bankrupt.”

“Why Bursts?” Bat Burst asked.

“Why Tiptoes?” Tiptoe asked.

“Oh, I beg your mercy!” Bat Burst said, apologizing.

“It is sufficient,” Tiptoe said.

“What is so sufficient?” Master Huffle asked.

“To drink to you is sufficient,” Tiptoe said.

“On what terms?” Master Huffle asked.

He was suspicious.

Tiptoe replied, “That you shall give security to pledge me.”

In some circumstances, a man who was going to drink would ask someone to pledge him — to guard him while he was drinking — because a man who is drinking is in a vulnerable position if enemies are near him. A drinking man's throat is exposed.

Tiptoe, however, should have been among friends. By asking Master Huffle to pledge — to guard — him, he was implying that Bat Burst was his — Tiptoe's — enemy.

Master Huffle said, "As long as you will name no Spaniard, I will pledge you."

In England, the Spanish were in bad repute because of the Spanish Armada, which attempted to escort an army from Flanders to England in 1588.

Master Huffle disliked the Spaniards; Tiptoe loved the Spaniards.

Master Huffle did not want Tiptoe to drink to any Spaniard.

Tiptoe said, "I rather choose to thirst, and will thirst forever, than leave that cream of nations unpraised. Perish all wine and liking for wine!"

He spilled his drink on Master Huffle. Deliberately doing this, of course, was an insult.

Master Huffle said, "What, spill it? Spill it at me?"

He was asking if the spill was deliberate.

"I care not, but I spilt it," Tiptoe said.

He did not care for Master Huffle, but he was not quite saying that he spilled the drink on Master Huffle on purpose.

"Nay, please be quiet, noble bloods," Fly said.

He did not want them to fight.

Bat Burst said, "No Spaniards I cry, with my cousin Huffle."

Bat Burst was another person who did not like the Spaniards.

“Spaniards?” Master Huffle said. “They are pilchers!”

Pilchers are thieves.

“Do not provoke my patient blade,” Tiptoe said with his hand on the hilt of his sword. “It sleeps and would not hear you; Huffle, you are rude and do not know the Spanish mental and physical constitution.”

“What is the recipe?” Bat Burst asked. “Name the ingredients.”

Tiptoe said, “Valor —”

“Two ounces of valor!” Bat Burst said.

Tiptoe said, “Prudence —”

“Half a dram!” Bat Burst said.

A dram is one-eighth of an ounce in Apothecaries’ weight, and one-sixteenth of an ounce in Avoirdupois weight. The Apothecaries’ grain equals the troy.

Tiptoe said, “Justice —”

“A pennyweight of justice!” Bat Burst said.

A pennyweight is one-twentieth of an ounce.

Tiptoe said, “Religion —”

“Three scruples of religion!” Bat Burst said.

A scruple is one twenty-fourth of an ounce.

Tiptoe said, “And of a gravedàd —”

Gravedàd is Spanish for gravity and dignity.

“A face-full of gravedàd!” Bat Burst said.

He meant that Spaniards had only the appearance of gravedàd.

Tiptoe said, “The typical Spaniard carries such a dose of it in his looks, actions, and gestures that it breeds respect to him even from savages, and reputation with all the sons of men.”

Bat Burst asked, “Will it give him credit with gamblers, courtiers, citizens, or tradesmen?”

“He’ll borrow money on the stroke of his beard, or the twist of an end of his mustaccio [mustache]!” Tiptoe said. “His mere cuello, or ruff about his neck, is a bill of exchange in any bank in Europe! Not a merchant who sees his gait but will immediately furnish him upon his pace!”

A glance at a well-dressed Spaniard as he walked would be enough to show that he deserved credit.

Master Huffle said, “I have heard that the Spanish name is terrible to children in some countries, and it is used to make them eat their bread and butter, or take their wormseed — their extract of wormwood.”

In other words: Children, eat your food and take your medicine, or the Spanish boogeyman will get you.

Supposedly, wormseed aided digestion.

“Huffle, you do shuffle,” Tiptoe said. “Your arguments are shifty.”

Pinnacia and a squire arrived and walked over to them. They were the “Countess” and her servant who had arrived with the hired driver Barnaby.

Pinnacia was much bigger than her squire: her personal servant. She was well dressed indeed — like a high-born lady.

“By God’s eyelid, here’s a lady!” Bat Burst said.

“And a lady gay!” Master Huffle said.

A pinnacle is a boat, and Tiptoe, Huffle, and Bat Burst used nautical words to talk about Pinnacia.

“A well-trimmed lady!” Tiptoe said.

“Well-trimmed” meant “well-dressed,” but to trim someone was to cheat that person.

“Let’s lay her aboard,” Master Huffle said.

“Lay her aboard” meant “approach her,” but the words also have a sexual meaning.

“Let’s hail her first,” Bat Burst said.

Tiptoe said to Pinnacia, “By your sweet favor, lady —”

Pinnacia’s squire said, “Good gentlemen, be civil; we are strangers. We are visitors.”

Bat Burst said, “We will treat you as if you were Flemings, sir!”

Bat Burst was saying that they would be welcome. The Dutch had an international reputation for heavy drinking, and so they were very welcome at an inn.

“Or Spaniards!” Master Huffle said.

“There are people here who have been at Seville in their days, and at Madrid, too!” Tiptoe said.

Pinnacia said about her squire, “He is a foolish fellow. I ask you to ignore him: He is my Protection.”

“In your protection he is safe, sweet lady,” Tiptoe said. “So shall you be in mine.”

Pinnacia was much larger than her squire.

“A share, good colonel,” Master Huffle said.

“A share of what?” Tiptoe asked.

“Of your fine lady!” Master Huffle said.

He then said to Pinnacia, “I am Hodge; my name is Huffle.”

“Huffle” means “bluster.” “Hodge” is a nickname for someone named Roger.

Tiptoe said, “Huffling Hodge, be quiet.”

“And I ask you to also be quiet, glorious colonel,” Bat Burst said. “Hodge Huffle shall be quiet.”

Master Huffle immediately began to sing:

“For she’s a lady gay.”

Angry, Tiptoe said, “Bird of the vespers, vespertilio Burst, you are a gentleman of the first head, but that head may be broken, as all the body is, Burst, unless you tie up your Huffle, quickly.”

A bird of the vespers is a bird of the evening. A bird of night is a thief.

Vespertilio is Latin for “bat.”

A “gentleman of the first head” is a social upstart; it means the first gentleman in a family, as opposed to a family with many ancestors who were gentlemen.

Master Huffle said, “Tie up dogs. Do not tie up a man.”

“Nay, please, Hodge, be still,” Bat Burst said.

“This steel here rides not on this thigh in vain,” Tiptoe said about his sword.

Master Huffle said, “Do you show your steel and thigh, you vain-glorious excrement? Then Hodge sings the ballad ‘Samson,’ and no ties shall hold.”

In Judges 16:6-14, Samson had Delilah tie him up, and then he broke the bonds.

Tiptoe and Master Huffle fought.

Hearing the noise, Pierce Anon, Jug, and Jordan entered the scene.

Pierce Anon said, “Keep the peace, gentlemen. What do you mean by fighting?”

“I will not discompose myself — ruin my composure — for Huffle,” Tiptoe said.

Fighting, or attempting to stop the fighting, everyone exited, except Pinnacia and her squire.

Pinnacia said to her squire, “You see what your entreaty and pressure still of gentlemen to be civil brings on?”

True, her squire had asked the gentlemen to be civil, but they had ended up fighting.

Pinnacia continued, “A quarrel, and perhaps manslaughter! You will carry your goose about you still, your planing-iron, your tongue to smooth everything! Is not here fine stuff?”

A “goose” is 1) a smoothing-iron (the handle resembled a goose), and 2) a swelling caused by venereal disease.

“Why, wife —” her squire said.

Pinnacia interrupted, “— your wife! Haven’t I forbidden you that? Do you think I’ll call you husband in this gown, or anything in that jacket but Protection? Here, tie my shoe and show my velvet petticoat and my silk stocking! Why do you make me a lady if I may not act like a lady in fine clothes?”

Her squire wore the velvet jacket of a footman; his wife was dressed like a fine lady. She was playing the role of a fine lady, and her husband was playing the role of a servant.

“Sweetheart, you may do what you will with me,” her squire said.

“Aye, I knew that at home,” Pinnacia said. “I knew what to do with you. But why was I brought here? To see fashions?”

“To see fashions” meant “to learn people’s ways.”

Her squire replied, “And wear them, too, sweetheart, but this wild company —”

“Why do you bring me in wild company?” Pinnacia asked. “You’d have me tame and civil in wild company? I hope I know wild company are fine company, and in fine company, where I am fine myself, a lady may do anything, deny nothing to a fine party. I have heard you say it.”

Pierce Anon entered the room, walked over to them, and said, “There is a company of ladies above — on the upper floor of the inn — who desire Your Ladyship’s company, and to take the safety of their lodgings away from the attack of these half-beasts, which were here even now, the Centaurs.”

When Pirithous, the King of the Lapiths, married Hippodamia, he invited the half-man, half-horse Centaurs to the wedding feast. The Centaurs got drunk and tried to rape Hippodamia and carry away the Lapith women. Pirithous and the Lapiths fought back and defeated the Centaurs.

“Are they fine ladies?” Pinnacia asked.

“Some very fine ladies,” Pierce Anon answered.

“As fine as I?” Pinnacia asked.

Pierce Anon replied, “I dare not make any comparisons because I am a servant, sent —”

Pinnacia interrupted, “Spoken like a fine fellow! I wish you were one; I’d not then deny you, but thank your lady.”

By “one,” she meant “servant,” aka male admirer of a lady.

Pierce Anon exited, and the Host entered the room and walked over to them and said, “Madam, I must request that you afford a lady a visit — a lady who wishes to excuse some harshness of the house you have received from the brute guests.”

Some of the things the men had said about her were not complimentary, and they had quarreled in her presence.

“This is a fine old man!” Pinnacia said. “I’d go with him if he were a little finer!”

She may have meant that she would have an affair with the Host if he were of a higher social class.

“You may, sweetheart,” her squire said. “It is my Host.”

He meant that she could go with the Host as he escorted her to the ladies on the upper floor of the inn.

“My Host!” Pinnacia said.

She was surprised that he was the Host of the inn.

“Yes, madam,” the Host said. “I must bid you welcome.”

“Do, then,” Pinnacia said.

“But do not stay,” her squire said.

“I’ll be advised by you, yes!” Pinnacia said.

She meant: I’ll be advised by you — fat chance!

They went into the inn.

Lord Latimer, Lord Beaufort, Lady Frampul, Prudence, the disguised Frank, and the Nurse talked together.

Referring to the fight between Tiptoe and Master Huffle that had recently ended, Lord Latimer asked, “What more-than-Thracian barbarism was this?”

The Thracians worshipped Bacchus, god of wine, and they worshipped Mars, god of war. Tiptoe and Master Huffle had been drinking and fighting.

“The battle of the Centaurs with the Lapiths!” Lord Beaufort said.

“There is no taming of the monster drink,” Lady Frampul said.

Drinking leads to many unnecessary fights.

“But what a glorious beast our Tiptoe showed!” Lord Latimer said. “He would not discompose — ruin his composure — himself, the Don! Your Spaniard never does discompose himself.”

“Don” is a Spanish title.

“Yet how Tiptoe talked and roared in the beginning!” Lord Beaufort said.

Prudence said, “And ran as fast as a knocked marrowbone —”

People knocked bones sharply to get the marrow to run out.

“So they all did at last, when Lovel went down and chased them around the court,” Lord Beaufort said.

Lord Latimer said, “For all Tiptoe’s Don Luis, or fencing after Euclid!”

Lovel had showed himself to be a good fencer. Tiptoe had not.

Lady Frampul said, “I never saw a lightning-bolt shoot so as my servant Lovel did. His rapier was a meteor, and he waved it over them like a comet as they fled from him!”

Comets and meteors were bad omens. Lovel was a bad omen for Tiptoe and Master Huffle.

Lady Frampul continued, “I noted Lovel’s manhood! Every stoop he made was like an eagle’s at a flight of cranes (as I have read somewhere).

Sophocles’ Ajax has a speech that describes how a flock of chattering birds react with terror and silence when the birds see an eagle.

“Splendidly expressed,” Lord Beaufort said about Lady Frampul’s words.

“And like a lover!” Lord Latimer said.

“Of Lovel’s valor, I am!” Lady Frampul said. “He seemed to be a body rarified to air, or it seemed that his sword and arm were of one piece — they went together so!”

The Host and Pinnacia entered the room.

“Here comes the lady, ” Lady Frampul said.

“A bouncing bona-roba, as the Fly said,” Lord Beaufort said.

“She is some giantess!” the disguised Frank said. “I’ll stand off to the side for fear she will swallow me.”

Lady Frampul looked over the silk gown that Pinnacia was wearing and asked, “Isn’t this our gown, Pru, that I ordered from my tailor?”

“It is the fashion you ordered!” Prudence said.

“Aye, and the same silk!” Lady Frampul said.

She felt the silk gown and said to Prudence, “Feel it! Surely, it is the same silk!”

Prudence felt the silk and saw the bottom of the petticoat that Pinnacia was wearing under the gown.

She said, “And it is the same petticoat, lace and all!”

When Lady Frampul had ordered the gown and petticoat from Stuff, she had supplied Stuff with the materials needed to make the clothing. Now she and Prudence recognized the silk cloth and the lace.

“I’ll swear it is mine,” Lady Frampul said. “How did it come to be here? Make a bill — a writ — of inquiry.”

Prudence said to Pinnacia, “You’ve a fine suit of clothing on, madam, and a rich one!”

“And of a skillful making!” Lady Frampul said.

“And it’s new!” Prudence said

Pinnacia replied, “As new as day.”

Lord Latimer said to the others, “She answers like a fishwife.”

Fishwives advertised their fish as being “As new — fresh — as day.”

“I put it on since noon, I assure you,” Pinnacia said.

“Who is your tailor?” Prudence asked.

“I tell you to tell me, what is your fashioner’s name?” Lady Frampul said.

A fashioner is a tailor.

“My fashioner is a certain man of my own,” Pinnacia said. “He’s in the house; his name doesn’t matter.”

The Host said, “Oh, but to satisfy this bevy of ladies, of whom a pair here longed to bid you welcome, tell them his name.”

The pair of ladies who had asked Pinnacia to visit them were Lady Frampul and Prudence.

“He’s one, in truth, I tittle my Protection,” Pinnacia said.

She then said to the Host, “Tell him to come up here.”

The Host called downstairs, “Our new lady’s Protection!”

He asked Pinnacia, “What is Your Ladyship’s title?”

She replied, “Countess Pinnacia.”

The Host called downstairs, “Countess Pinnacia’s manservant, come to your lady!”

Her squire entered the room.

He was immediately recognized.

Prudence said to Lady Frampul, “This is your Ladyship’s tailor: Master Stuff!”

“What!” Lady Frampul said. “Stuff? He is the Protection?”

Stuff was a small man; bodyguards tend to be large.

The Host said, “Stuff looks like a remnant — a scrap — of clothing.”

Stuff was very small compared to the size of his wife.

Falling to his knees, Stuff said, “I am ruined. I have been discovered!”

Prudence said to Lady Frampul, “It is the suit of clothing you ordered, madam, now without doubt. And this is some device to bring it home with.”

“To bring it home” means to complete the task. Completing the task meant delivering the gown to Lady Frampul, who had ordered it.

Pinnacia asked Stuff the tailor, “Why are you upon your knees? Is this your lady godmother?”

“Mum, Pinnacia, be quiet,” Stuff said. “It is the Lady Frampul, my best customer.”

“What dramatic show is this that you present us with?” Lady Frampul asked. “What do you mean by this?”

“I beg Your Ladyship, forgive me,” Stuff said. “She did but assay — try — the suit of clothing on.”

“Who?” Lady Frampul said. “Which she?”

“My wife, indeed,” Stuff said.

Pinnacia was Stuff’s wife.

“What? Mistress Stuff? Your wife!” Lady Frampul said. “Is that the answer to the riddle?”

The riddle was this: Who is Pinnacia?

Prudence said, “We all looked for a lady — a Duchess or a Countess at the least — to be the answer to the riddle.”

Stuff said, “She is my own lawfully begotten wife in wedlock. We have been coupled now seven years.”

He meant “lawfully gotten,” not “lawfully begotten.”

“And why is she thus disguised?” Lady Frampul said. “You are dressed like a footman, ha? And she is your Countess?”

A Countess would ride in the coach, while the footman would run alongside the coach.

Answering the question why she was dressed like a lady and her husband was dressed like a footman or squire, Pinnacia said, “To make a fool of himself, and of me, too.”

“I beg you, Pinnace, be quiet,” Stuff said.

Pinnacia replied, “Nay, it shall all come out, since you have called me your wife and openly dis-ladied me! Although I am dis-countessed, I am not yet dis-countenanced. These shall see.”

“Silence!” the Host said.

Ignoring the Host, Pinnacia said, “It is a foolish trick, madam, he has. For although he is your tailor, he is my beast.”

Ben Jonson’s Epigram 25 is titled “Sir Voluptuous Beast.” It is about a husband who has sex with his wife while she is dressed in various outfits.

Pinnacia continued, “I may be bold with him and tell his story. When he makes any fine garment that will fit me, or any rich thing that he thinks of worth, then I must put it on and be his Countess before he carries it to the owners.

“He hires a coach and four horses, and he runs in his velvet jacket thus to the towns of Romford, Croydon, Hounslow, or Barnet, the next bawdy road, and he takes me out of the carriage, carries me upstairs, and throws me upon a bed —”

Stuff’s fetish was having sex with his wife while she was pretending to be a great lady.

Shocked, Lady Frampul said, “Be silent, you immodest woman!”

Lady Frampul then said to the others, “She glories in the bravery of the vice.”

“It is a quaint vice!” Lord Latimer punned.

In this society, the word “quaint” can also mean “cunt.”

Lord Beaufort said, “A fine species — kind — of fornicating with a man’s own wife, found out by — what’s his name?”

“Master Nick Stuff,” Lord Latimer said.

This was a way of committing adultery without committing adultery: Have the wife pretend to be another woman.

The Host said, “The very figure of preoccupation in all his customers’ best clothes.”

Pinnacia occupied the clothing before Stuff’s customers received it, while Stuff occupied — that is, stuffed — his wife’s vagina before his customers received the clothing.

Lord Latimer said, “He lies with his own succuba in all your names.”

Stuff could pretend that Pinnacia was Lady Frampul.

A succuba is a female demon that has sex with men while they are sleeping.

Lord Beaufort said, “And all your credits.”

“Credits” meant 1) cloth that had been provided to the tailor to make clothing from, and 2) reputations.

“Aye, and at all their costs,” the Host said.

They were scandalized. They regarded it as immoral for a person to dress above his or her station. Pinnacia was NOT a countess. In some times and places, dressing above one’s station in life was illegal.

Lord Latimer asked, "This gown was then bespoken for the sovereign?"

The sovereign was "Queen" Prudence. Lady Frampul had ordered the gown so that Prudence could wear it as she played the role of Queen of the Festivities at the Light Heart Inn.

"Aye, by the Virgin Mary, it was," Lord Beaufort said.

Lady Frampul said, "And it is a main offence committed against the sovereignty, being not brought home to me in the time appointed; beside the profanation, which may call on the sentence of the court."

The profanation was Pinnacia's wearing the gown.

Such an offence and a profanation ought to be punished.

The Host said, "Let him be blanketed. Call up the quartermaster. Deliver him over to Fly."

If Nick Stuff were to be blanketed, he would be tossed in a blanket.

"Oh, my good lord!" Stuff said.

"Pillage the pinnace," the Host said.

"Let his wife be stripped," Lady Frampul said.

"Blow off her upper deck!" Lord Beaufort said.

"Tear all her tackle!" Lord Latimer said.

"Pluck the polluted robes over her ears, or cut them all to pieces," Lady Frampul said. "Make a fire of them!"

Prudence said, "To rags and cinders burn the idolatrous vestures!"

Fly and some other servants entered the room. Having heard the commotion, they had been listening outside the room.

The Host said, “Fly and your fellows, see that the whole sentence is thoroughly executed.”

“We’ll toss him bravely until the stuff stink again,” Fly said.

Fly was threatening to toss Stuff in the air until he soiled his clothing.

The Host added, “And send her home, divested to her flannel, in a cart.”

Lord Latimer said, “And let her footman beat the basin before her.”

In this culture, prostitutes were stripped and sometimes whipped, and then they walked behind or stood in a cart as they were paraded around town while someone beat on a basin to attract notice. People rented basins from barbers or used their own basins to beat on and make noise.

“The court shall be obeyed,” Fly said.

“Fly and his officers will do it fiercely,” the Host said.

“Merciful Queen Pru!” Stuff said, appealing to her good nature.

“I cannot help you,” Prudence said.

Fly exited with Stuff and Pinnacia.

“Go on your ways, Nick Stuff,” Lord Beaufort said. “You have nicked it for a fashioner of venery.”

For a long time, Stuff had nicked — stolen — the use of the clothing. He had also “nicked it” — that is, hit the target. In this case, the target was his wife’s vagina.

Lord Latimer said, “For his own hell, though he run ten miles for it.”

In this culture, the word “hell” could mean “vagina.”

“Oh, here comes Lovel for his second hour,” Prudence said.

She would be Queen Prudence again.

Lord Beaufort said, “And after him comes the type and image of Spanish valor.”

He was referring to Tiptoe.

— 4.4 —

Carrying a paper, Lovel entered the room. Tiptoe followed him.

Lady Frampul asked Lovel, “Servant, what have you there?”

This kind of servant was a man who loved and served a woman.

Lovel replied, “A meditation, or rather a vision and revelation, madam, and it is about beauty, our former subject.”

In their first hour together in Queen Prudence’s Court of Love, Lovel and Lady Frampul had talked about love and beauty.

“Please let us hear it,” Lady Frampul said.

Lovel read out loud:

“It was a beauty that I saw,

“So pure, so perfect, as [that] the frame

“Of all the universe was lame [defective]

“To [Compared to] that one figure, could I draw

“Or give least line of it a law!

“A fair march [gait] made without a halt [without limping]!

“A curious [artful] form without a fault!

“All beauty, and without a spot.”

Lady Frampul said, “They are noble words, and they deserve a note — music — set to them as noble as the words.”

Lovel, the author of the lines, replied, “I have tried my skill to close the second hour, if you will hear them. My boy by that time will have got it perfect.”

His serving-boy would have learned the lines by then, and he would sing them at the close of the second hour in the Court of Love.

Lady Frampul said to Lovel, “Yes, gentle servant. I would like to hear the lines sung.”

She then said to herself, “With what calm he speaks after this noise and tumult, so unmoved, with that serenity of countenance as if his thoughts did acquiesce and rest satisfied in that which is the object of the second hour and nothing else!”

The topic of the second hour would be valor — courage. Lady Frampul knew that because she was the person who would propose that topic.

Queen Prudence said, “Well, then, summon the court.”

Lady Frampul said, “I have a suit to the sovereign of Love, if it may stand with and be consistent with the honor of the court, to change the topic from love to valor, in order to hear it said what true valor is, which often begets true love.”

For the first hour, they had talked about love. Now they would talk about courage. A man who shows that he is courageous, as Lovel had done, often deserves — and gets — love.

Lord Latimer said, “It is a question fit for the court to take true knowledge and cognizance of, and the change to this topic of valor has my just assent.”

“I am content,” Queen Prudence said, agreeing with Lord Latimer.

“I am content,” Lord Beaufort said.

“Content,” the disguised Frank said. “I am content. Give him his oath.”

The Host said, “Herbert Lovel, you shall swear upon The Testament of Love to make answer to this question propounded to you by the court: What is true valor?”

The Testament of Love is a medieval romance by Thomas Usk. Medieval romances were about both love and valor. Hero-knights followed the Code of Chivalry, performed daring deeds, and idealized women.

The Host continued, “And therein you shall swear to tell the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth. So help thee, Love, and your bright sword at need.”

Lovel put his hand on the book and swore, “So help me, Love, and my good sword at need!”

He then began to explain what true valor is:

“It is the greatest virtue, and the safety and safeguard and confidence of all mankind; the object of it is danger. It is a certain mean in between fear and over-confidence.”

He was referring to Aristotle's ethical theory of the mean between extremes. Valor (true courage) is the mean (middle) between too much courage (rashness) and too little courage (cowardice).

Lovel continued, "True valor is no inconsiderate rashness. It is no vain appetite and rashness of wrongly encountering formidable things.

"But true valor is a true science of distinguishing what's good or evil. It springs out of reason and tends to perfect honor; the end goal of true valor is always honor and the public good.

"An act is not valorous if it is done for a private cause or reason."

"It isn't?" Lord Beaufort asked. "Not for a reputation?"

He believed that a man could choose to be courageous in order to get a good reputation.

For example, a man who fought duels could get a reputation for valor.

Lovel replied, "Reputation is man's idol set up against God, the maker of all laws, who has commanded us that we should not kill, and yet we say we must kill for reputation."

Dueling for honor sometimes resulted in a death.

Lovel continued, "What honest man can either fear for his own reputation, or else will hurt another's reputation?"

"Fear to do base, unworthy things is valor. If base, unworthy things are done to us, to suffer and endure them is valor, too.

"The duty of a man who is truly valiant is worthy of consideration in three ways:

“The first is in respect of matter and cause, which always is danger.

“The second is in respect of form, wherein he must preserve his dignity.

“And the third is in the end, which must be always lawful.”

A valiant man who takes action must do so in a dangerous situation (if valor is to be involved), must do so in a way that preserves and protects his dignity, and must do so to accomplish a lawful end or goal — he must take action for a good reason and a good cause.

Lord Latimer objected, “But men, when they are heated and in passion, cannot consider.”

He was saying that sometimes when a man is angry, the man must act in a dangerous situation without first taking the time to think things through.

“Then it is not valor,” Lovel replied. “I never thought an angry person valiant. Virtue is never aided by a vice. What need is there of anger and of violent, tumultuous emotion, when reason can do the same things, or more?”

Lord Beaufort objected, “Oh, yes, it — anger — is profitable, and of use. It makes us fierce and fit to undertake an enterprise.”

Lovel replied, “Why, so will alcoholic drinks make us both bold and rash, and so will frenzy and madness, if you will. But do these make us valiant?”

“They are poor helps, and virtue does not need them.

“No man is made more valiant by being angry, except he who could not be valiant without anger; so that it comes not in the aid of virtue but in the stead of it.”

“He holds the right,” Lord Latimer said.

Lovel held the right opinion: He was making sense.

Lovel continued, “And it is an odious kind of remedy to owe our health to a disease.”

Tiptoe said, “If man should follow the dictamen — order or pronouncement — of his passion, he could not avoid or escape —”

Lord Beaufort finished Tiptoe’s sentence, “— discomposing himself.”

“Discomposing himself” meant “ruining his composure.”

Tiptoe had been angry at Bat Burst and Master Huffle. They had fought, but when Lovel had drawn his rapier and chased them Tiptoe had been discomposed — he had run away instead of showing valor.

Lord Latimer said, “According to Don Luis!”

“Or Carranza!” the Host said.

Don Luis and Carranza were two of Tiptoe’s favorite Spanish authorities on fencing.

Lovel said to Tiptoe, “Good Colonel Glorious, while we discuss valor, dismiss yourself.”

“You are not concerned,” Lord Latimer said.

Tiptoe had not shown valor, and so he ought not to participate in a discussion of true valor.

Lovel said to Tiptoe, “Go drink, and gather together the ostlers and the tapsters, the under-officers of your regiment; compose — make — your peace with them, and be not angry-valiant!”

Tiptoe, who had been angry but who had not been valiant in the recent fight, exited. In his case, anger was in the stead of valor and virtue.

“How does angry-valor differ from true valor?” Lord Beaufort asked.

Lovel said:

“Thus:

“First, it differs in the efficient, or that which makes it, for it proceeds from passion, not from judgment.

“Second, it differs in that brute beasts have it, and wicked persons — there it differs in the subject.

“Third, it differs in the form. It is carried out rashly and with violence.

“Fourth and finally, it differs in the end, where it does not respect and regard truth or public honor, but only pure revenge.

“Now, over-confident and undertaking — rebuking — valor sways from the true valor in two other ways:

“First, as being a trust in our own faculties, skill, or strength, and not a trust in the right or conscience (sense of right and wrong) of the cause that works it.

“And second, in the end, which is the victory and not the honor.”

Lord Beaufort said, “But the ignorant valor that knows not why it undertakes, but does it to escape the infamy and bad reputation merely —”

Lovel interrupted and finished Lord Beaufort’s sentence, “— is worst of all.”

He then said, “That kind of valor lies in the eyes of the on-lookers, and it is called valor with a witness — and it is valor with a vengeance.”

“Right,” Lord Beaufort said.

Lovel said, “The things true valor is exercised about are poverty, restraint, captivity, banishment, loss of children, and long disease. The least thing it is concerned about is death.”

True valor is used in the fight against poverty, restraint, captivity, banishment, loss of children, and long disease.

For example, health-care workers show valor when they take care of people who are ill with a contagious disease. The health-care workers may catch the disease.

“Here valor is beheld, properly seen; about these it is present.

“Valor is not beheld in trivial things, which merely require our confidence. Valor is more than confidence.

“And yet to those bad things — poverty, restraint, captivity, banishment, loss of children, and long disease — we must object and we must subject and expose ourselves, only for honor; if any other consideration be mixed with honor, we quite put out valor’s light.”

This kind of honor is gained through taking action.

“And as all knowledge, when it is removed or separated from justice, is called craft rather than wisdom, so a mind affecting or undertaking dangers for ambition or any personal pretext, not for the public, deserves the name of daring, not the name of valor, and over-daring is as great a vice as over-fearing.”

“Yes, and often greater,” Lord Latimer said.

Lovel said, “But as it is not the mere punishment, but the cause that makes a martyr, so it is not fighting or dying, but the manner of it that renders a man himself.

“A valiant man ought not to undergo or test a danger except worthily, and by selected ways: He undertakes the dangerous venture with reason, not by chance.

“His valor is the salt to his other virtues; they are all unseasoned without it. The waiting-maids, or the concomitants — ancillary effects — of it, are his patience, his magnanimity, his confidence, and his constancy, calmness, and peace of mind.

“He can assure himself against all rumor, he despairs of nothing, and he laughs at insults because he knows himself to be advanced in a height where injury cannot reach him nor aspersion touch him with disgrace!”

Lady Frampul said, “This is the most manly uttered of all!

“It is as if Achilles had the chair in valor, and Hercules were only a lecturer!”

Lady Frampul was rating Achilles, the greatest warrior of the Trojan War, above Hercules, the great PanHellenic hero.

Achilles became angry at Agamemnon, the leader of the Greek forces arrayed against Troy, and so Achilles stopped fighting. Many Greek warriors died because their best fighter was staying in his camp and was not on the battlefield. Later, Hector, the greatest warrior of the Trojans, killed Patroclus, Achilles’ best friend, in battle. Out of anger, Achilles killed Hector and desecrated his body.

Hercules sometimes became insane (due to the machinations of the goddess Juno, who hated him), and he sometimes became drunk. In a fit of insanity he killed his wife and children. Hercules was a formidable killing machine, and he fought and killed monsters.

Both Achilles and Hector are thought of as men of valor, yet both sometimes acted out of anger or insanity, and so in those cases they were not measuring up to Lovel's definition of true valor.

Perhaps Lady Frampul was acting and so she was not really in love with Lovel.

And yet, at the end of the Iliad, Achilles gives up his anger, accepts the death of Patroclus, and allows Hector's father, King Priam, to ransom Hector's corpse so that he can give his son a decent burial and allow Hector's soul to enter the Land of the Dead. Achilles begins to fight again, not out of anger, but out of belief that he is fighting for a just cause: It was the Trojan prince Paris who ran away with the lawfully wedded wife of King Menelaus of Sparta — a violation of xenia, aka hospitality.

Perhaps Achilles is more valiant than Hercules.

And perhaps Lady Frampul was not acting and so she was really in love with Lovel.

Lady Frampul said, "Who would not hang upon those lips forever — those lips that strike such music? I could discourse about them, but modesty is such a schoolmistress that it keeps our sex in awe."

Queen Prudence said, "Or you can feign, my subtle and dissembling lady mistress!"

She thought that Lady Frampul was acting a role.

"I fear she means it, Pru, in too good earnest!" Lord Latimer said.

Lovel continued his discourse on true valor:

“The purpose of an injury or insult is to vex and trouble me. Now, nothing can do that to a man who is valiant.

“He who is affected with the least injury is less than it. It is but reasonable to conclude that that which hurts should be stronger still than that which is hurt.

“Now, no wickedness is stronger than what opposes it: Even Lady Fortune’s self, when she encounters virtue, leaves the field of battle both lame and less.”

Say that every day a bully beats up a smaller child. Every day the smaller child fights back but is defeated. Which person shows valor? Which person shows virtue? The bully who picks the fight, knowing that he will win, or the smaller child who fights back, knowing that he will lose? Should the smaller child feel worthless because he lost, or should he feel worthy because he resisted injustice? If the smaller child is worthy and the bully is unworthy, should we say that the bully is stronger?

Of course, the bully is physically stronger, but other kinds of strength exist. For example, strength of character exists.

Is it stronger to be valiant and virtuous or is it stronger to be a bully and unvirtuous?

Level continued:

“Why should a wise man, then, confess himself the weaker, by the feeling of a fool’s wrong?”

“There may an injury or insult be meant me. I may choose if I will accept it.”

In some societies, master fighters — such as samurai — decline to fight someone whom they think is unworthy. They will fight only people whom they respect. Bullies, however, fight those they do not respect — they fight those whom they are sure they can defeat.

If a fool insults you, should you be insulted? Or should you ignore the insult because it comes from a fool and you don't care what fools think?

Tiptoe, as well as Bat Burst and Master Huffle, were all fools who insulted each other and fought each other.

Lovel continued, "But we are now come to that delicacy and tenderness of sense that we think an insolence worse than an injury — we bear words worse than deeds. We are not so much troubled with the wrong as with the opinion of the wrong. Like children, we are made afraid with visors and masks and disguises."

In Homer's Iliad, Hector returns to Troy to ask his mother to pray to the gods, and while he is there, he is able to see his wife and his young son, who screams with fear when he sees Hector wearing his helmet. When Hector takes off his helmet, his son recognizes him and stops crying.

Lovel continued, "Such poor sounds as is the lie or common words of spite, wise laws thought never worthy a revenge. And it is the narrowness of human nature, our poverty and beggary of spirit, to take exception at these things.

"He laughed at me! He made a joke at my expense! A third took place of me!"

This society took social position seriously. For example, people of the upper classes entered a room in order of precedence. The person of highest social position entered the room first, followed by the others in order of descending social position. People sometimes argued about who should go before the other. In fact, heralds of the College of Heralds decided who had precedence over another person.

Lovel continued:

"How so very ridiculous are all these quarrels!

“They are signs of a queasy and sick stomach, laboring with lack of a true injury. The main part of the wrong is our vice of taking it.”

“Or our interpreting it to be such,” Lord Latimer said.

Lovel replied, “You take it rightly.

“If a woman or child should call me a liar, would I be angry?

“No, not if I were in my wits. Surely, I would think it no kind of a disgrace. No more is theirs a disguise, if I will think it, if given by those who are to be held in as contemptible a rank or worse.

“I am kept out of a masque, sometimes thrust out of one, or I am made to wait a day, two, three, for a word from a person of great social position, a word that, when it comes forth, is all frown and impudence.”

In this culture, sometimes a masque — an entertainment featuring masked performers — would have too many people attending it, and the people of greater social rank would throw out people of lower social rank.

“What laughter should this breed, rather than anger, out of the tumult of so many vexations, to feel with contemplation my own quiet!

“If a great person, a giant of the time, should do me an affront, surely I will bear it either out of patience or necessity.

“Shall I do more for fear than for my judgment?

“For me now to be angry with Hodge Huffle, or Burst, his bankrupt dependent, if he should be saucy, or our own type of Spanish valor, Tiptoe — who, if he were now necessitated to beg, would ask an alms like Conde Olivares, the Prime Minister of Spain — would be just to make myself such a vain animal as one of them.

“If light wrongs don’t touch me and make me angry, no more shall great wrongs; if a few wrongs don’t touch me and make me angry, many wrongs shall not touch me and make me angry.

“There’s nothing so sacred with us but may attract a sacrilegious person, yet the thing is no less divine because the profane can reach it.

“The man who is not hurt in battle is the man who is shot-free in battle — not the man who is not hit.”

Apparently, Lovel meant not hurt mentally as well as physically. A person who is not hit by shot can yet be hurt by shot. Think of a shell-shocked soldier.

Lovel continued:

“So he who does not yield to wrongs is valiant, not he who escapes them.

“They who pull down churches and deface the holiest altars cannot hurt the godhead.

“A calm, wise man may show as much true valor amid these popular provocations as can an able captain show confidence by his bravely making his way through an enemy’s country.

“A wise man never goes the people’s way, but, as the planets always move contrary to the world’s motion, so does he to opinion.

“He will examine if those accidents, which common fame calls injuries, happen to him deservedly or not.

“If they come to him deservedly, they are not wrongs, then, but his punishments.

“If they come to him undeservedly, and he is not guilty, then the doer of them first should blush, not he.”

“Excellent!” Lord Latimer said.

“Truth, and right!” Lord Beaufort said.

“An oracle could not have spoken more truthfully!” the disguised Frank said.

“Or been more believed!” Lady Frampul said.

Queen Prudence said, “The whole court endorses your meaning, sir! And look, your second hour has almost ended.”

“It cannot be!” Lady Frampul said. “Oh, clip the wings of Time, good Pru, or make Time stand still with a magic spell. Distil the gout into Time, cramps, all diseases to arrest Time in the foot and fix Time here.

“Oh, for a way to keep back all clocks, or make the sun forget his motion!

“If I only knew what drink the Time now loved, I would set my Trundle at him, my own Barnaby!”

Trundle was a drinker and could get Time drunk. Barnaby was also a drinker.

Queen Prudence said, “Why, I’ll consult our Shelee-nien Thomas.”

She shook the Nurse, who was asleep.

The Nurse awoke and said, “Er grae Chreest!”

[The Nurse awoke and said, “For the love of Christ!”]

“Don’t wake her,” Lord Beaufort said.

When the Nurse was asleep, she was not keeping an eye on Lord Beaufort and the disguised Frank.

The Nurse said, "Tower een cuppan d'usque bagh doone."

[The Nurse said, "Give us a cup of whiskey."]

Queen Prudence said, "Usque bagh's her drink. But it will not make the Time drunk."

"As it has her," the Host said, referring to the Nurse, who was already asleep again.

He then said to Lord Beaufort, "Away with her, my lord, but marry her first."

"Her" was Laetitia: the disguised Frank.

Lord Beaufort and the disguised Frank exited.

Queen Prudence said, "Aye, that'll be entertainment soon, too, for my lady: Lady Frampul."

She was referring to Lord Beaufort's marrying a boy: Frank.

Queen Prudence continued, "But she has other game to fly at yet. The end of the hour has come."

She said to Lady Frampul, "Your kiss."

Lady Frampul was supposed to kiss her servant, Lovel, a second time to mark the end of the second hour.

"My servant's song, first," Lady Frampul said.

"I say the kiss, first," Queen Prudence said, "and I so enjoined it. At your own peril, commit contempt of the court by not kissing your servant."

Lady Frampul said to Lovel, "Well, sir, you must be paid, and legally."

She kissed him.

Queen Prudence said to Lovel, "Nay, nothing, sir, beyond that kiss."

Lovel said, “One more kiss! I take exception! I object! This was but half a kiss, and I would reciprocate it.”

“The court’s dissolved, removed, and the play ended,” Queen Prudence said. “No sound or breath of love more; I decree it.”

Lovel complained, “From what a happiness has that one word thrown me into the gulf of misery! To what a bottomless despair! How like a court removing or an ended play shows my abrupt, unrestrained, and precipitate condition.”

Lovel was quoting from John Donne’s poem “The Storm”:

“And all our beauty, and our trim, decays,

“Like courts removing, or like ended plays.”

The poem is about the calm or peace that follows a war. We might expect that such calm would be welcome, but Donne’s speaker finds no relaxation in the calm:

“In calms, Heaven laughs to see us languish thus.”

People can be worn out by war and be unable to enjoy peace. Or people can find that being in danger makes them feel vibrantly alive, and they can find peace boring.

Lovel and Lady Frampul had been contestants in the Court of Love, and now the contest — which had been in part a parody of two jousts in a tournament — was over.

Queen Prudence’s Court of Love had removed (her authority was ending, and so the court was no longer in existence) and the “play” that she, Lovel, and Lady Frampul had performed had now ended. Lovel had won the contest — all had agreed with his views on love and valor — and yet he now was enjoined from being with Lady Frampul. This kiss was supposed to be his last. For Lovel the calm was not welcome.

The Court of Love may also have removed from Queen Prudence's jurisdiction to Lady Frampul's jurisdiction, but that did not help Lovel because he felt that she had been only acting a role when she had publicly professed love for him. Lovel felt that actually Lady Frampul disdained him.

“By how much more my vain hopes were increased by these false hours of conversation! Didn't I prophesy this of myself, and didn't I give the true prediction?”

“Oh, my brain, how are you turned, and my blood congealed, my sinews slackened, and my marrow melted, so that I can't remember where I have been, or what I am?”

“Only my tongue's on fire, and, burning downward, it hurls forth coals and cinders to say this temple of love will soon be ashes!”

“Come, Disdain of Love, now, and be my mistress. No more of Love's ingrateful and ungrateful and harsh tyranny, his wheel of torture and his pits of bird-lime, his nets of nooses, whirlpools of vexation, his mills to grind his servants into powder.”

The wheel of torture was an implement of torture: A criminal was tied to a wheel, and then torturers broke the criminal's bones.

Bird-lime was used to catch birds.

Small birds were caught in nets, and the holes in the nets were like nooses that strangled the birds.

Lovel continued, “I will go catch the wind first in a sieve, weigh smoke and measure shadows, plow the water and sow my hopes there, before I stay in love.”

In other words: Rather than stay in love — a love that was not reciprocated — Lovel preferred to do things that are impossible to do.

“My jealousy is off,” Lord Latimer said. “I am now secure.”

Was he in love with Lady Frampul?

Lovel said:

“Farewell the craft of crocodiles, woman’s piety and their practice of it, in this art of flattering and fooling men!

“I have not lost my reason, although I have lent myself out for two hours, thus to be disgraced by a chambermaid, Prudence, and the good actor, her lady, before my Host of the Light Heart here, who has laughed at all —”

“Who, I?” the Host said.

“Laugh on, sir,” Lovel said. “I’ll go to bed and sleep, and dream away the whim of love, if the house and your sly, underhanded drunkards let me.”

Everyone exited except Lady Frampul, Prudence, and the Nurse.

Lady Frampul said, “Pru.”

Prudence answered, “Sweet madam?”

“Why would you let him go away like this?” Lady Frampul asked.

She was talking about Lovel.

Prudence answered, “In whose power was it to make him stay, more proper than my lady’s power?”

“Why in your lady’s?” Lady Frampul asked. “Aren’t you the sovereign?”

“Would you in conscience, madam, have me vex his patience more?” Prudence said.

“No, but I would have you apply the cure,” Lady Frampul said, “now that his patience is vexed.”

“That’s but one person’s work,” Prudence said. “Two cannot do the same thing handsomely and fitly.”

When a man is lovesick because of a woman, only that woman can cure his lovesickness.

Lady Frampul asked, “But didn’t you have the absolute authority?”

Queens are powerful.

“And weren’t you in rebellion, Lady Frampul,” Prudence asked, “from the beginning?”

“I was somewhat obstinate, I must confess,” Lady Frampul said, “but obstinateness sometimes becomes and graces a beauty, being only a visor — a mask — put on. You’ll let a lady wear her mask, Pru! You’ll let a lady disguise her true feelings!”

“But how do I know when Her Ladyship is pleased to leave the mask off, unless she tells me so?” Prudence asked.

“You might have known that by my looks and language, had you been either watchful or observant,” Lady Frampul said. “One woman reads another’s character without the tedious trouble of deciphering, if she but gives her mind to it.

“You knew well it could not befit any reputation of mine to submit first, having stood aloof so long, without conditions for my honor.”

Prudence replied, “I thought you expected none, you so jeered him, and put him off with scorn —”

“Who, I, with scorn?” Lady Frampul said. “I did express my love to idolatry rather, and so I am justly plagued, not understood.”

Lady Frampul believed that she had expressed her love of Lovel so strongly that her love was idolatrous.

Prudence said, “I swear I thought you had dissembled, madam, and I suspect you are doing so yet.”

Prudence thought that Lady Frampul had been putting on an act when she said she loved Lovel.

“Dull, stupid wench!” Lady Frampul said. “Stay in your state of ignorance still, be damned, an idiot chambermaid! Has all my care, my breeding you in fashion, your rich clothes, honors, and titles wrought no brighter effects on your dark soul than thus?”

“Well! Go your ways. If the tailor’s wife weren’t to be demolished, ruined, and stripped, you should be the she who would be demolished, ruined, and stripped, I vow.”

Prudence had pride.

Tearing off her gown, which had been given to her by Lady Frampul, she said, “Why, take your spangled articles of clothing, your costumes, your gown, and your scarves!”

“Pru, Pru, what do you mean?” Lady Frampul said.

“I will not buy this play-actor-boy’s bravery at such a price, to be upbraided for it, thus, every minute,” Prudence said.

In this society, women did not act on stage. Instead, boys performed the roles of the women in plays. The rich gowns of upper-class women sometimes were sold and became stage costumes.

“Don’t take it so to heart,” Lady Frampul said.

She had spoken out of anger, without thinking first.

“The tailor’s wife?” Prudence said. “There was a word of scorn!”

“It was a word that fell from me, Pru, by chance,” Lady Frampul said.

“Good madam, please to undeceive yourself,” Prudence said. “I know when words do slip and when they are darted with all their bitterness. Stripped? Demolished? An idiot chambermaid, stupid and dull? Be damned for ignorance? I will be so, and think I do deserve it, that and more, much more I do.”

She wept.

The Host entered the room.

“Here comes my Host!” Lady Frampul said. “No crying, good Pru.”

She then asked, “Where is my servant Lovel, Host?”

“You have sent him up to bed,” the Host said. “I wish that you would follow him, and make my house amends!”

“Would you advise it?” Lady Frampul said.

“I wish that I could command it,” the Host said. “My Light Heart should leap until midnight.”

One kind of leaping is dancing; another kind is leaping on someone and having sex.

“I ask you not to be sullen and melancholy,” Lady Frampul said. “I yet must have your counsel and advice.”

She said to Prudence, “You shall wear, Pru, the new gown yet.”

“After the tailor’s wife?” Prudence asked.

“Come, don’t be angry or grieved,” Lady Frampul said. “I have a plan.”

Lady Frampul and Prudence exited.

The Host said to the Nurse, who was still asleep, “Wake, Shelee-nien Thomas!”

He shook the Nurse awake and asked, “Is this your heraldry and keeping of records, to lose the main — to miss out on the important thing? Where is your charge?”

Her charge — her responsibility — was Frank. She was supposed to watch over him.

“Gra Chreest!” the Nurse said.

Gra means “love” in Gaelic.

“Go ask the oracle of the bottle at your girdle,” the Host said. “There you lost it.”

The Nurse had a small bottle of whiskey attached to her belt instead of the keys or small Bible many women carried. The whiskey had made her fall asleep and give Lord Beaufort the opportunity to run off with the disguised Frank.

The Host then said sarcastically, “You are a sober setter of the watch!”

The Nurse exited.

ACT 5 (The New Inn, or The Light Heart)

— 5.1 —

Fly entered the room, and he and the Host talked together.

The Host said, “Come, Fly, and legacy, the bird of the Heart; the prime insect of the inn, professor, quartermaster, as ever you deserved your daily drink, paddling in sack and licking in the same, now show that you are an implement — tool — of value and help raise a nap to us out of nothing.”

Sack is white wine. Insects can fall into the wine, paddle around in the wine, and use their proboscis to suck up the wine.

The Host wanted Fly’s help in weaving together all the various actions going on in the inn. The surface of cloth is called nap, and it gets worn away with age. The Host wanted the events happening in his inn to be good. Lots of people were gloomy, and the Host wanted them to be merry.

He then asked Fly, “You saw them married?”

Fly replied, “I do think I did, and I heard the words, ‘I, Philip, take you, Laetice.’”

“I gave her away, too. I was then the father Fly, and I heard the priest do his part as far as five nobles would lead him in the lines of matrimony.”

Nobles are gold coins.

“Where were they married?” the Host asked.

“In the new stable,” Fly said.

“Ominous!” the Host said. “I have known many a church that has been made a stable, but not a stable made a church until now.”

He was referring to churches that after the Reformation had been desecrated. Apparently, the Host was OK with that particular kind of churches being desecrated, and he did not want them to return to being churches.

The Host continued, “I wish them joy. Fly, was he a full priest?”

Fly, punning on “full” as meaning “with his belly full,” said, “He had the belly for it. He also had his velvet sleeves and his branched — embroidered — cassock; a long, sweeping gown; and all his formalities — insignia of office. He was a good crammed divine!”

The priest was dressed like a doctor of divinity, and he was crammed with theological knowledge — and with food.

Fly continued, “I went not far to fetch him — the next inn, where he was lodged — for the action of performing the marriage.”

“Had they a marriage license?” the Host asked.

Fly answered, “They had a license of love, I saw no other; and they had a purse to pay the dues both of church and house. The angels flew about.”

They needed a marriage license to get married, but Lord Beaufort had money and the angels — gold coins — flew about as he paid the priest to marry them without a license. Lord Beaufort also paid all other necessary fees.

About the flying angels, the Host said, “Those birds send luck, and mirth will follow.”

He thought about bad events and said, “I had thought to have sacrificed to merriment tonight in my Light Heart, Fly, and like a noble poet to have had my last act best, but all fails in the plot.”

He had thought that the Light Heart Inn would enjoy much merriment this night, but things were not working out for the most part.

The Host continued, “Lovel has gone to bed; the Lady Frampul and sovereign — Queen — Pru have fallen out; Tiptoe and his regiment of mine-men” — miners, because they worked in the cellar of the inn — “are all drunk dumb, from his whoop Barnaby to his hoop Trundle. They are his two tropics: the Tropic of Cancer and the Tropic of Capricorn.”

Barnaby and Trundle were the kind of people Tiptoe now associated with and by implication felt most comfortable around.

“Whoop Barnaby” is a song, and hoops are the bands on a quart pot of an alcoholic beverage.

The Host continued, “There is no project to rear laughter on but this: the marriage of Lord Beaufort with Laetitia.”

Seeing Lady Frampul and Prudence approaching, the Host said, “Wait, what’s here? The satin gown redeemed, and Pru restored in it to her lady’s grace!”

At one point, Lady Frampul was intending to burn the gown that Pinnacia had been caught wearing, but Lady Frampul had obviously decided not to do that because Prudence was now wearing it.

Fly said, “She is set forth in it, rigged for some employment!”

“An embassy at least!” the Host said.

“Some conference of state!” Fly said.

The Host said, “It is a fine tack about — a reversal of course — and worth the observing.”

The Host and Fly stood to the side and watched.

— 5.2 —

Lady Frampul and Prudence, who was magnificently dressed in the gown that Pinnacia had worn, entered the room.

“Sweet Pru, aye, now you are a Queen indeed!” Lady Frampul said. “These robes do royally and you become them, and just so they become you. Rich garments are fit only for the parties they are made for; they shame others.

“How did they look when they were on Goody — Goodwife — Tailor’s back? Like a caparison for a sow, God save us!”

Usually, caparisons are cloths that are put on a horse’s back, not on a pig’s back.

Lady Frampul said, “Your putting them on has purged and hallowed them from all the pollution intended by the mechanics — the artisans who labor with their hands.”

Stuff the tailor was the mechanic meant.

She continued, “Hang him, poor snip, a secular — unlearned — shop-wit!”

Stuff the tailor was “poor snip.”

Lady Frampul continued, “He has nothing but his shears to assert a claim by, and his measures. His apprentice may as well put in for his needle and plead a stitch.”

Stuff the tailor’s dignity was no more than that of his apprentice, who got all his dignity from wielding a needle and making stitches.

Lady Frampul continued, “The clothes have no taint in them now of the tailor.”

Prudence said, “Yes, they do. They have the taint of his wife’s haunches, which are thick of fat. I smell his wife’s haunches on the fabric.”

Prudence had smelled Pinnacia’s grease — sweat — when putting on the gown. In fact, she still smelled Pinnacia’s grease on the clothing.

Lady Frampul said, “It is restorative, Pru! With your but chafing — warming — it, a barren hind’s grease may work miracles.”

The word “but” meant “just” or “only,” but in fact Prudence’s butt would chaff the gown.

Lady Frampul referred to a “barren hind.” “Barren” means “childless.” “Hind” can mean 1) deer, 2) behind, aka butt, or 3) menial.

Lady Frampul continued, “Just find Lovel’s chamber door, and he will rise to you!”

Lady Frampul believed that Pinnacia’s sex pheromones, which were in her sweat, could cause Lovel to end his renunciation of love. He would “rise” — that is, 1) rise out of bed, and 2) get an erection.

She continued, “Or, if you please, feign to be the wretched party herself — Pinnacia — and come to him in forma pauperis to crave the aid of his knight-errant valor to the rescue of your distressed robes! Name just your gown and he will rise to that.”

In forma pauperis means “as a pauper.” In courts of law, paupers were able to sue or to defend themselves without cost.

Her distressed robes were the gown that Pinnacia had sweated in.

Prudence said, "I'll fire the charm first."

She would burn the costume first before she would pretend to be Pinnacia. She was not interested in giving Lovel an erection — at least not when the erection was caused solely by the clothing she was wearing.

Prudence continued, "I had rather die in a ditch with Mistress Shore, without a smock, as the pitiful story has it, than owe my wit to clothes, or have my wit beholden."

Elizabeth "Jane" Shore, who was the mistress of King Edward IV of England, was supposed to have died in a ditch. People thought that the place was named Shoreditch because of this, but the story is apocryphal.

The Host said quietly to Fly, "Prudence still has the spirit of Pru!"

"And smelling of the sovereign!" Fly quietly replied.

Prudence said to Lady Frampul, "No, I will tell him the truth as it is indeed. I come from the fine, froward, frampul lady, one who was run mad with pride and who was wild with self-love."

The word "frampul" is a variant of the adjective "frampold," which means "bad tempered, cross, and peevish." But applied to a horse, it means "spirited, fiery, and mettlesome."

Prudence continued:

"I will tell him that I come from the fine, froward, frampul lady, who after recently encountering a wise man who scorned her, and knew the way to his own bed without borrowing her warming pan — that is, without taking her with him to warm his bed — she has recovered part of her wits, so much as to consider how far she has trespassed, upon whom, and how."

Really, if Lovel were to have an erection, Prudence believed, it ought to be caused by Lady Frampul. It ought not to be caused by the clothing Prudence was wearing.

Prudence continued, “And now she sits penitent and solitary like the forsaken turtledove, in the volary — large bird-cage — of the Light Heart, the cage she has abused, mourning her folly, weeping at the height she measures with her eye from whence she has fallen since she did branch it — flourish — on the top of the wood.”

Turtledoves mate for life; they are symbols of faithfulness.

Lady Frampul said, “I tell you, Pru, to abuse me enough — that is, to treat me as you think fit — any coarse way to humble me.

“But either bring me home again or bring me Lovel again.

“You do not know my sufferings — what I feel. My fires and fears are met; I burn and freeze.”

In this society, burning and freezing were considered to be symptoms of lovesickness.

Lady Frampul continued, “My liver’s one great coal, and my heart has shrunk up with all the fibers and the mass of blood.”

We think of the heart as being the seat of love; this society thought of the liver as being the seat of love.

She continued:

“Within me is a still lake of fire curled with the cold wind of my gelid — ice-cold — sighs, which drive a drift of sleet through all my body and shoot a cold February through my veins.

“Until I see him, I am drunk with thirst and surfeited with hunger of his presence.

“I don’t know whether I exist or not, or whether I speak, or whether you hear me.”

“Stop your expressions,” Prudence said. “I’ll once more venture for and help Your Ladyship, provided that you will use your fortunes reverently.”

Lady Frampul said, “I will use my fortunes religiously, dear Pru.

“Love and his mother — Cupid and Venus — I’ll build them separate churches, shrines, and altars, and overhead I’ll have, in the stained-glass windows, the story of this day painted round for the poor laity — ordinary worshippers — of love to read.”

Some stained-glass windows are round, and her story would be told around the area because she would build more than one church that would have a round stained-glass window devoted to telling her story.

Lady Frampul continued, “I’ll make myself their book, nay, their example, to bid the viewers of the stained-glass windows to take occasion — opportunity — by the forelock and play no after-games of love hereafter.”

One must seize Opportunity by the forelock when she runs near you. If you are late in grabbing her forelock, you will lose Opportunity because the back of her head is bald.

An after-game is a second game played to improve one’s outcome after a bad outcome from the first game.

The Host now came forward with Fly, revealing their presence to Lady Frampul and Prudence.

The Host said, “And here your Host and his Fly witness your vows. And like two lucky-omened birds, we bring the presage of a loud jest: Lord Beaufort has been married.”

Lord Beaufort had shown great interest in Frank, the Host's son, who had been disguised as a woman.

Lady Frampul responded, "Ha!"

Fly said, "They are all-to-be-married."

This meant: They are completely married.

"To whom?" Prudence said. "Not your son?"

"The same, Pru," the Host said. "If Her Ladyship could make truce a little with her passion, and give way to their mirth now running —"

Lord Beaufort's marrying a boy could very well be mirthful.

"Runs it mirth, let it come," Lady Beaufort said, "It shall be well received and much made of it."

Prudence said, "We must make much of this; it was our own conception."

It had been their plan to disguise Frank as a woman.

— 5.3 —

Lord Latimer entered the room and said, "Strew the room with green rushes! Raise the fiddlers, chamberlain! Call up the house in all readiness!"

Green rushes were strewn on floors for celebrations of such events as weddings.

"This will rouse Lovel," the Host said.

"And bring him on, too," Fly said.

Lord Latimer said, "Shelee-nien Thomas — the Nurse — runs like a heifer bitten with a gadfly about the court, crying against Fly and cursing."

"For what, my lord?" Fly said.

Lord Latimer replied, "It is best that you hear that from her. It is not an office, Fly, suitable for my narration."

Seeing Lord Beaufort and the disguised Frank approaching, Lord Latimer said, "Here comes the happy couple!

"Joy to you, Lord Beaufort!"

"And to my young lady, too!" Fly said about the disguised Frank.

"May God give you much joy, my lord!" the Host said.

— 5.4 —

Lord Beaufort, the disguised Frank, Ferret, Jordan, Pierce Anon, Jug, some fiddlers, and a servant walked over to them.

"I thank you all," Lord Beaufort said. "I thank you, Father Fly."

He then said to Madam Frampul, "Madam, my cousin, you look discomposed. I have been bold with a salad after supper of your own lettuce here."

He was punning on the name "Lettice," which is a nickname for women named "Laetitia."

"You have, my lord," Lady Frampul said. "But laws of hospitality and fair rites would have made me acquainted."

Lord Beaufort was a guest of Lady Frampul at the inn. As such, he should have let her know that he was going to marry the disguised Frank, whom he thought was a female friend of hers.

"In your own house, I do acknowledge that," Lord Beaufort said. "If I had not let you know in that case, I would have much trespassed against you."

“But in an inn, and a public inn, where there is license of all fellowship, a pardon by regular process of law may be applied for in court: the Court of Love.”

The Court of Love would allow people to marry suddenly, and in this case, to marry without informing Lady Frampul in advance.

“A pardon will be applied for, my lord, and it will be granted,” Lady Frampul said. “I do not see how any storm or tempest can help it now.”

A fit of anger would not annul the marriage.

Prudence said to Lady Frampul, “The thing being done and past, you bear it wisely and like a lady of judgment.”

“She is that, Secretary Pru,” Lord Beaufort said.

“Why do you call me Secretary Pru, my wise lord?” Prudence said. “Is your brain lately married?”

She was asking why he didn’t call her Queen Pru. Was his brain addled because of his marriage?

“Your reign is ended, Pru,” Lord Beaufort said. “You are no sovereign now. Your term is out, and your dignity of office has expired.”

“I am annulled,” Prudence said to Lady Frampul. “How can I negotiate with Lovel without a new commission?”

“Your gown is your commission,” Lady Frampul said.

Prudence was Queen Prudence once more.

“Have patience, Pru,” the Host said. “Wait. Bid the lord joy.”

This meant: Wait for a while before you begin exercising your royal authority. First, wish Lord Beaufort joy.

“And this brave lady, too,” Queen Prudence said. “I wish both of them joy.”

It was traditional to wish joy to a newly married couple.

“Joy!” Pierce Anon said

“Joy!” Jordan said.

“All joy!” Jug said.

“Aye, the house full of joy!” the Host said.

Fly said, “Play the bells; fiddlers, crack your strings with joy!”

Music played.

Queen Prudence said to the disguised Frank, “But Lady Lettice, you showed a neglect un-to-be-pardoned — not to be pardoned — towards my lady, your kinswoman, because you did not consult with her before you married.”

Lord Beaufort said, “Good politic Pru, urge not your state-advice, your after-wit — wisdom after the event, aka hindsight — it is close to upbraiding.”

He was recognizing Prudence as Queen at the Light Heart Inn.

Lord Beaufort then said, “Get our marriage bed ready, chamberlain, and, Host, get a bride-cup ready. You have splendid delicacies and good ingredients; an old host upon the road always has his provocative drinks.”

Provocative drinks either encouraged lust (they were aphrodisiacal) or appetite (they were medicinal).

Lord Latimer whispered to Lord Beaufort about the Host, “He is either a good bawd or a physician.”

Lord Beaufort whispered back, “It was well he didn’t hear you; his back was turned.”

He then said loudly, “A bed, the genial bed, the marriage bed! Tonight I play for a brace — a pair — of boys.”

He hoped to get the disguised Frank pregnant with twin boys this night.

“Give us points, my lord,” Queen Prudence said.

Points are laces. For example, laces connected the doublet (jacket) to the breeches. Bridegrooms would tear off some of their laces to show their impatience to go to bed.

Tearing off his laces, Lord Beaufort said, “Here, take them, Pru, my codpiece point and all.”

A codpiece is a bag — a piece of clothing — which covered a man’s genitals.

He then said, “I have clasps: my Lettice’s arms.”

He was punning. Clasps are other kinds of fastenings for clothing, as well as embraces from a beloved.

Lord Beaufort said to the servants, “Here, take the laces, boys.”

He took off his doublet — his jacket.

He then said to the servants, “What? Is the chamber ready? Speak! Why do you stare at each another?”

“No, sir,” Jordan said.

“And why not?” Lord Beaufort asked.

“My master has forbid it,” Jordan answered. “He yet doubts that you are married.

“Ask his vicar general, his Fly here,” Lord Beaumont said.

“I must make that good,” Fly said. “I can verify it. They are married.”

“But I must make it bad, my hot young lord,” the Host said. “Give him his doublet again; the air is piercing.”

The Host then said to Lord Beaufort, “You may take cold, my lord. See whom you have married — your Host’s son, and a boy!”

He pulled off Frank’s headdress, revealing that Frank had been in disguise.

“You are deceived,” Fly said to Lord Beaufort.

“Much joy, my lord!” Lady Frampul said.

Queen Prudence said, “If this is your Laetitia, she’ll prove a counterfeit mirth and a clipped lady.”

Gold coins were sometimes clipped. Bits of gold were shaved from the edges of the coins, making them less valuable. If too much gold was clipped from the coins, they were no longer legal currency.

“A boy! A boy!” a servant said. “My lord has married a boy!”

“Raise all the house in shout and laughter: a boy!” Lord Latimer said.

Lord Beaufort had loved physically without first knowing spiritually the person he loved.

“Wait, who is here?” the Host said, seeing the Nurse approaching. “Peace, rascals, stop your throats! Quiet!”

The Nurse entered the room and said, “That maggot, that worm, that insect! Oh, my child, my daughter! Where’s that Fly? I’ll fly in his face, the vermin. Let me come to him.”

“Why, Nurse Shelee?” Fly asked.

“Hang you, you parasite, you son of crumbs and leftovers!” the Nurse said. “You have ruined me and my child, my daughter, my dear daughter.”

The Host asked, “What does this mean?”

Daughter? What daughter?

“Oh, sir, my daughter, my dear child is ruined by this your Fly here,” the Nurse said. “My dear child was married in a stable and given to a husband.”

Frank was married in a stable and given to a husband. Isn’t Frank the Host’s son, and isn’t Frank a boy?

The Host said, “Stint your crying, Harlot, if that is all. Didn’t you sell him — Frank — to me for a boy? And brought him in boy’s rags here to my door to beg an alms of — charity from — me?”

“I did, good master, and I crave your pardon,” the Nurse said. “But she is my daughter, and she is a girl.”

The Host asked, “Why did you say that it was a boy and why did you sell him then to me with such entreaty for ten shillings, Carline?”

A carline is a witch.

The Nurse answered, “Because I heard you were a charitable man, good master, and would raise him well. I would have given him to you for nothing gladly. Forgive the lie of my mouth! It was to save the fruit of my womb. A parent’s needs are urgent, and few know as well as I that tyrant over good natures.

“But you relieved her and me, too, the mother, and took me into your house to be the nurse, for which may Heaven heap all blessings on your head for as long as there is still one blessing that can be added!”

The Host said, “Surely you speak quite like another creature than you have lived here in the house, a Shelee-nien Thomas, an Irish beggar.”

The Nurse was not speaking with a heavy Irish accent.

“So I am, God help me,” the Nurse said.

True, she was speaking differently.

“Who are you?” the Host asked. “Tell me.”

He added, “The match is a good match for anything I see.”

If Frank was a girl, then the marriage was a real marriage. Real marriages ought to be celebrated.

The Host ordered, “Ring the bells once again.”

The musicians began to play.

Lord Beaufort yelled, “Stint, I say, fiddlers! Stop playing!”

They stopped playing, and he started to leave.

“No going off, my lord,” Lady Frampul said. “You can’t leave now.”

Lord Beaufort responded, “Nor coming on, sweet lady, things thus standing!”

He was punning. His words had a bawdy meaning. A thing is a penis, and a stand is an erection. “Coming on” means what you think it means.

He did not want to consummate the marriage.

Fly said to the Host, “But what’s the heinousness of my offence, or the degrees of wrong you suffered by it, in having your daughter matched — married — thus happily into a noble house, by marrying a brave young blood and a prime peer of the realm?”

The Host’s son — uh, daughter — had married a lord.

“Was that your plot, Fly?” Lord Beaufort asked.

He thought that this had been a plot to make him marry an impoverished girl, someone of lesser social class than even the daughter of an innkeeper.

“Give me a cloak,” Lord Beaufort said.

He was intent on leaving.

He then said, “Take her again among you. I’ll have none of your Light Heart fosterlings — foster children — no inmates or inn-mates or lodgers, supposititious fruits of a Host’s brain and his Fly’s hatching, to be put upon me.”

“Supposititious” can mean “founded on false suppositions.” Lord Beaufort had thought that he had married the daughter of the Host, but now it seemed to him that he had been mistaken. To him it seemed that the Host and Fly had conspired to make him marry someone to whom he now did not wish to be married.

Lord Beaufort said, “There is a royal court of the Star Chamber that will scatter all these mists, disperse these vapors, and make clear the truth. Let beggars match with — marry — beggars.

“The royal court of the Star Chamber shall decide this; I will try it there.”

The Star Chamber was a judicial body that was feared because of its power.

This society had laws against providing lodging for paupers, and Lord Beaufort was threatening to turn in the Host for providing lodging to the Nurse and her child. Lord Beaufort was also threatening to turn in the Host and Fly for arranging a marriage under false pretenses.

The Nurse said, “Nay, then, my lord, I see it’s not enough for you to be licentious, but you will also be wicked.

“You’re not content just to take my daughter against the law” — they had not had a marriage license — “but, having taken her, you would repudiate and cast her off now at your pleasure, like a beast of power, without all cause or any semblance of a cause that either a noble or an honest man should dare to except against: her poverty.”

The poverty of the Nurse’s daughter was the ignoble reason why Lord Beaufort did not want to be married to her.

The Nurse asked, “Is poverty a vice?”

Lord Beaufort said, “The age counts it so.”

Many people regard poverty as a vice.

The Nurse said, “God help Your Lordship, and your peers who think so, if there are any who think as you do! If not, God bless them all, and help the number of the virtuous, if poverty should be a crime. You may say that our beggary is the result of an accident of birth, but you cannot say there is a deeper cause such as a lack of character; our poverty is no inherent baseness.

“And I must tell you now, young lord of dirt, as an incensed mother, she — my daughter — has more and better blood running in those small veins than all the race of Beauforts have in mass, although they distill their drops from the left rib of John of Gaunt.”

Lord Beaufort was a “young lord of dirt.” He owned much land, but he was not now a good person. “Dirt” can mean 1) land, or 2) excrement.

John of Gaunt and his mistress Catherine Swynford were the ancestors of the Beauforts. In 1397 the two married, and in 1398 King Richard II legitimized their children. Eve was made from Adam’s left rib, and without legitimization the Beauforts would have descended from the female line.

The Host asked the Nurse, who was a student of heraldry, “Old mother of records, you know her pedigree, then. Whose daughter is she?”

The Nurse answered, “She is the daughter and co-heir to the Lord Frampul, this lady’s sister!”

“My sister!” Lady Frampul said. “What is her name?”

“Laetitia,” the Nurse answered.

“She is the girl who was lost?” Lady Frampul asked.

“The true Laetitia,” the Nurse answered.

“Sister! Oh, gladness!” Lady Frampul said.

She then asked the Nurse, “Then you are our mother?”

“I am, dear daughter,” the Nurse answered.

Lady Frampul kneeled and said, “On my knees, I bless the light I see you by.”

The Nurse replied, “And to the Author of that blest light, I open my other eye, which has now for almost seven years been shut dark, as my vow was, never to see light until such a Light restored it as It restored my children or your dear father, who, I hear, is no longer living.”

The Nurse took off her eye patch, and Lady Frampul stood up.

“Give me my wife,” Lord Beaufort said. “I own her now, and I will have her.”

By “own,” he meant that he recognized their marriage. Frank — uh, Laetitia — was a member of the wealthy Frampul family, not the impoverished son of an innkeeper or impoverished daughter of a beggar.

“But you must ask my leave first, my young lord,” the Host said. “Leave is but light.”

“Leave is but light” means “It is easy to ask permission.” The Host was claiming that it was his prerogative to give Frank (Laetitia) to whomever he wanted.

The Host then ordered, “Ferret, go bolt your master, Lovel. Here’s events that will startle him.”

Ferrets made animals such as rabbits bolt from their lairs.

Ferret exited.

“I cannot keep the passion in me,” the Host said. “I am even turned into a child, and I must weep.”

He then ordered, “Fly, take away my Host.”

The Host removed his disguise — his hat and false beard — and gave the items to Fly.

He then said, “Take my beard and cap here away from me, and fetch my Lord.”

“Fetch my Lord” meant “Fetch me the clothing that will make me look like a lord again.”

Fly exited.

The Host said to Lord Beaufort, “I am Laetitia’s father, sir, and you shall now ask for my consent before you have her.”

The Host said to the Nurse, “Wife, my dear and loving wife! My honored wife! Who here has gained but I? I am Lord Frampul, the cause of all this trouble. I am he who has measured — traveled — all the shires of England over, Wales and her mountains, seen those wilder nations of people in the Peak and Lancashire; their pipers, fiddlers, strewers of rushes, puppet-masters, jugglers, and gypsies, all the sorts of vagabonds who use the cant or language of thieves, and colonies of beggars, tumblers, traveling entertainers with performing apes, for to these savages I was addicted, wanting to search their natures and make odd discoveries and explorations!

“And here my wife, like a she-Mandeville, ventured in diligent search after me.”

Sir John Mandeville was a man who wrote about his travels.

Fly returned, carrying Lord Frampul’s robes, which Lord Frampul — the Host — put on.

“I may look up and wonder,” the Nurse (Lord Frampul’s wife) said. “I cannot speak yet to my lord and husband.”

“Take heart and breath,” the Host (Lord Frampul) said. “Recover yourself. You have recovered me, who here had coffined myself alive in a poor hostelry in penance of my wrongs done to you, whom I long since gave up as lost.”

“So did I give you up for lost,” the Nurse (Lord Frampul’s wife) said. “Until, stealing my own daughter from her sister, I lighted on this error that has cured all.”

Lord Beaufort said, “And in that cure include my trespass, mother, and father, for my wife —”

He was referring to the Host (Lord Frampul) and the Nurse (Lord Frampul's wife) as his father-in-law and his mother-in-law.

The Host (Lord Frampul) said, "No, the Star Chamber."

Lord Beaufort had threatened to sic the Star Chamber on the Host.

"Away with that!" Lord Beaufort said. "Never mention that! You sour the sweetest lettuce that was ever tasted."

"May God give you joy, my son," the Host (Lord Frampul) said. "Don't cast her off again."

He was acknowledging Lord Beaufort as his son-in-law.

Lovel entered the room.

The Host (Lord Frampul) said to him, "Oh, call me father, Lovel, and call the Nurse your mother if you like. But take your mistress first, my child. I have power to give her now, with her consent; her sister has been given already to your brother Beaufort."

Lovel took Lady Frampul by the hand; this was a handfast — a marriage contract. Her father — seemingly the Host, but actually Lord Frampul — would be his father-in-law. In addition, the Nurse — actually Lord Frampul's wife — would be his mother-in-law. Lord Beaufort, who had married Frank — actually Laetitia — would be his brother-in-law.

"Is this a dream now, after my first sleep?" Lovel asked. "Or are these fantasies made in the Light Heart and sold in the New Inn?"

In this society, some people thought that morning dreams were true, but this was not morning. Lovel was having a hard time believing these new developments.

“Best go to bed and dream it over, all,” the Host (Lord Frampul) said. “Let’s all go sleep, each with his turtledove, aka mate.”

He ordered, “Fly, provide us lodgings, get beds prepared; you’re master now of the inn. You are now the Lord of the Light Heart. I give it to you.”

The Host (Lord Frampul) then said to the others, “Fly was my fellow gypsy. All my family — that is, my inn employees — indeed, were gypsies, tapsters, ostlers, chamberlains, reduced and impoverished vessels of citizenship.”

Earlier, the Host (Lord Frampul) had said that Fly was a legacy that came with the inn. Now, he was saying that Fly was a gypsy. Apparently, he was now telling the truth.

The Host (Lord Frampul) continued, “But here stands Pru neglected, who is the most deserving of all who are in the house or in my Heart. Although I cannot help her to a fit husband, I’ll help her to that which will bring her one: a just portion — a good dowry. I have two thousand pounds in bank for Pru. She may call for it whenever she will.”

“And I have as much,” Lord Beaufort said.

He would also give Prudence two thousand pounds.

“There’s somewhat yet: four thousand pounds!” the Host (Lord Frampul) said. “That’s better than sounds the proverb ‘Four bare legs in a bed.’”

The full proverb is “More belongs to marriage than four bare legs in a bed.” A good and happy marriage is more likely when financial security is present.

Lovel said, “Prudence has the power to coin her mistress and me up to whatever amount she will.”

In other words, Prudence could rely on Lovel and Lady Frampul for financial assistance. She could get any amount of money from them at any time.

“Infinitely powerful Pru!” Lady Frampul said.

“But I must do the crowning act of bounty!” Lord Latimer said.

“What’s that, my lord?” the Host (Lord Frampul) asked.

“Give her myself, which here, by all the holy vows of love, I do,” Lord Latimer said. “Spare all your promised portions; she is a dowry so all-sufficient in her virtue and her manners that fortune cannot add to her.”

Lord Latimer wanted to marry Prudence.

Previously, he had seemed to be interested in Lady Frampul. Perhaps Pinnacia’s pheromones were affecting him.

“My lord,” Prudence said to Lord Latimer, “your praises are instructions and lessons to my ears, whence you have made your wife to live your servant.”

She would be his wife and servant — in this context, “his wife and servant” meant that she would be his loving wife.

The Host (Lord Frampul) called, “Lights! Get us all individual lights!”

They would get candles and lamps to light their ways to their rooms.

“Wait,” Lovel said. “Let my mistress — Lady Frampul — just first hear my vision sung, my dream of beauty, which I have brought, prepared, to bid us joy and light us all to bed; it will be in the stead of airing of the sheets with a sweet odor.”

There would not be time to air the sheets, but they could hear the air — the tune — of the song he had written.

The Host (Lord Frampul) said, “It will be an incense to our sacrifice of love tonight, where I will woo afresh, and, like Maecenas, having but one wife, I’ll marry her every hour of life hereafter.”

Maecenas, the patron of Virgil, author of the Aeneid, and his wife quarreled frequently, but he loved her and always made up with her. Each reconciliation was like a new marriage.

They exited, with a song — Lovel’s song:

“It was a beauty that I saw,

“So pure, so perfect, as [that] the frame

“Of all the universe was lame [defective]

“To [Compared to] that one figure, could I draw

“Or give least line of it a law!

“A fair march [gait] made without a halt [without limping]!

“A curious [artful] form without a fault!

II. That Crassus never laughed but once, and that was at an Ass eating Thistles, seems strange to the Doctor, yet he gives no reason for this, but only that the object was unridiculous, & that laughter is not meerly voluntary. But these are no reasons: for a more ridiculous object there cannot be, then to see such a medley of pleasure and pain in the Asses eating of Thistles;<sup>o</sup> for whilst he bites them, they prick him, so that his tongue must needs be pricked, though perhaps his lips may be hard, and not so easily penetrable; when arose the Proverb, Like lips, like lettice. But there was something else in this that moved Crassus to laugh: For he saw here the vanity both of most men taking pleasure in those things which are accompanied with much pain and sorrow: Besides, he saw here the folly of the Roman rich men, who held Thistles for such a dainty dish, that they would not suffer poor men to eat thereof, engrossing them with great summes of money to themselves, which notwithstanding the Asses did eat on free cost. Was it not then a ridiculous thing to see rich men pay so dear for Asses food, and to debarre poore men from that meat which they permitted to Asses?

It should usually be curdled with rennet obtained from a lamb or a kid, though it can also be coagulated with the flower of the wild thistle or the seeds of the safflower, and equally well with the liquid which flows from a fig-tree if you make an incision in the bark while it is still green. Thistles—in the form of artichokes and cardoons—have been on the human table since at least the days of ancient Greece and Rome.

of north Africa and Sicily. Pliny the Elder mentions two types of edible thistles known to first-century Romans: one which “throws out numerous stalks immediately it leaves the ground,” which sounds like a cardoon; the other “thicker, and having but a single stem” and purple flowers, which may be a progenitor of the modern globe artichoke. This last, according to Pliny, had a number of beneficial medicinal effects, among them curing baldness, strengthening the stomach, freshening the breath, and promoting the conception of boys. Though Pliny doesn’t mention it, it was also purportedly an aphrodisiac. The Roman ate them pickled in honey and vinegar, and seasoned with cumin.

Similarly, wild thistles—the atrociously spiny stuff Winnie-the-Pooh’s doleful donkey Eeyore munches in his Gloomy Place—are said to have edible (even delicious) leaf ribs. I personally can’t attest to this, but even devoted wild-food aficionados agree that wild thistle is a challenge to gather, unless you happen to be wandering through the woods wearing elbow-length leather gloves.

Terentia

2. Also called TERENTILLA, the wife of Maecenas. Dio Cassius (54.3) speaks of her as a sister of Murena and of Proculeius. The full name of this Murena was A. Terentius Varro Murena: he was perhaps the son of L. Licinius Murena, who was consul B. C. 62, and was adopted by A. Terentius Varro. Murena would thus have been the adopted brother of Terentia: Proculeius was probably only the cousin of Murena. [See Vol. III. p. 540b.]

We know nothing of the early history of Terentia, nor the time of her marriage with Maecenas. She was a very beautiful woman, and as licentious as most of the Roman ladies of her age. She was one of the favourite mistresses of Augustus; and Dio Cassius relates (54.19) that there was a report at Rome that the emperor visited Gaul in B. C. 16, simply to enjoy the society of Terentia unmolested by the lampoons which it gave occasion to at Rome. The intrigue between Augustus and Terentia is said by Dio Cassius to have disturbed the good understanding which subsisted between the emperor and his minister, and finally to have occasioned the disgrace of the latter. Maecenas however had not much right to complain of the conduct of his wife, for his own infidelities were notorious. But notwithstanding his numerous amours, Maecenas continued to his death deeply in love with his fair wife. Their quarrels, which were of frequent occurrence, mainly in consequence of the morose and haughty temper of Terentia, rarely lasted long, for the natural uxoriousness of Maecenas constantly prompted him to seek a reconciliation ; so that Seneca says (Ep. 114) he married a wife a thousand times, though he never had more than one. Once indeed they *were divorced, but Maecenas tempted her back by presents (Dig. 24. tit. l. s. 64). Her influence over him was so great, that in spite of his cautious temper, he was on one occasion weak enough to confide to her an important state secret respecting the conspiracy of her brother Murena. The below information comes from Suetonius: The Lives of the Twelve Caesars:

C. Clinius Maecenas

But though seemingly in possession of all the means and appliances of enjoyment, Maecenas cannot be said to have been altogether happy in his domestic life. We have already alluded to an intrigue between Augustus and his wife Terentia; but this was not the only infringement of his domestic peace; Terentia, though exceedingly beautiful, was of a morose and haughty temper, and thence quarrels were continually occurring between the pair. Yet the natural uxoriousness of Maecenas as constantly prompted him to seek a reconciliation; so that Seneca remarks that he married a wife a thousand times, though he never had more than one. Her influence over him was so great, that in spite of his cautious and taciturn temper, he was, on one occasion, weak enough to confide an important state secret to her, respecting her brother Murena, the conspirator. Maecenas himself, however, was probably in some measure to blame for the terms on which he lived with his wife, for he was far from being the pattern of a good husband. His own adulteries were notorious. Plutarch relates of him the story of the accommodating husband, Galba, who pretended to be asleep after dinner in order to give him an opportunity with his wife.

CHAPTER 14: Ben Jonson's *Sejanus' Fall

THE ARGUMENT (Sejanus' Fall)

[Summary of Subject Matter]

Sejanus' Early History and Disgrace by Drusus Senior

Aelius Sejanus was the son of Seius Strabo, a gentleman of Rome, and he was born at Vulsinium.

After his long service in court, first under Augustus, and afterward under Tiberius, Sejanus grew into such favor with Tiberius, and won him by his arts, that there lacked nothing but the name to make him a co-partner of the Empire.

Drusus Senior, the Emperor's son, did not like and did not tolerate this greatness of Sejanus. After many smothered dislikes, his dislike one day broke out, and Drusus Senior struck Sejanus publicly on the face.

To revenge this disgrace and to learn Drusus Senior's plans and secrets, Sejanus conspired and plotted with Livia, the wife of Drusus Senior. Livia was seduced by Sejanus to her dishonor before the plot to kill Drusus Senior proceeded, Sejanus also plotted together with her physician, who was called Eudemus, and with a man called Lygdus, who was a eunuch, to poison Drusus Senior.

Sejanus Grows Ambitious to Become Emperor

Their inhuman act had successful and not-suspected passage — the death of Drusus Senior aroused no suspicion — and it emboldened Sejanus to farther and more insolent projects, leading even to his ambition of becoming Emperor.

Finding the obstacles and hindrances he must encounter to be many and hard, in respect of the descendants of Germanicus (who were next in line for the succession), Sejanus devised to make Tiberius' self his means, and instilled into his ears many doubts and suspicions both against the princes and against their mother, Agrippina.

Tiberius jealously hearkening to these things, he as ardently as Sejanus consented to their ruin and to their friends' ruin.

Sejanus Plots to Marry Livia and Plots Against Tiberius

In this time, the better to mature and strengthen his design, Sejanus labored to marry Livia, and worked with all his ingenuity and cunning to remove Tiberius from the knowledge of public business, with allurements of a quiet and retired life, the latter of which Tiberius (out of a proneness to lust and a desire to hide those unnatural pleasures that he could not so publicly practice) embraced.

Sejanus' Downfall

Sejanus' desire to marry Livia enkindled Tiberius' fears and gave him the first reason to fear and be suspicious of Sejanus. Against Sejanus, Tiberius raised in private a new instrument to do his bidding, one Sertorius Macro, and by use of Macro, Tiberius took clandestine measures and worked against Sejanus, discovered the other's plots and secrets, his means and his ends, and sounded the affections of the Senators, who were divided into factions, and distracted them.

At last, when Sejanus least looked for trouble and was most secure, Tiberius decoyed and enticed him away from his guards with the pretext of doing him an unwonted honor in the Senate; and with a long, ambiguous, and equivocal letter, in one day he had Sejanus suspected, accused, condemned, and torn into pieces by the rage of the people.

Ben Jonson Gives His Reason for Writing This Tragedy

This play we advance as a mark of terror to all traitors and treasons, to show how just the heavens are in pouring and thundering down a weighty vengeance on their unnatural intents, even to the worst princes; much more to those for guard of whose piety and virtue the angels are in continual watch, and God himself miraculously working.

CAST OF CHARACTERS (Sejanus' Fall)

MALE CHARACTERS

Tiberius. Second Roman Emperor. Successor to Caesar Augustus, who was his step-father and adoptive father. Ruled from 14-37 C.E. He was the father of Drusus Senior and the uncle of Germanicus. At birth he was named Tiberius Claudius Nero. After becoming Emperor, he was known as Tiberius Caesar Augustus. Tiberius is often referred to as Caesar.

Drusus Senior. He was the son of Tiberius and his first wife: Vipsania. He was the second husband of Livia. First in line of succession to Tiberius.

Sejanus. He was Consul in the first half of 31 C.E. Sejanus' father was a knight, and so Sejanus was a member of the equestrian (knight) class of citizens, which were ranked just below the noble class. He was executed in 31 C.E.

Nero. He was the oldest son of Germanicus, who was Tiberius' nephew and adopted son, and Agrippina. Sejanus plotted against him. Second in line of succession to Tiberius. This Nero is NOT the Nero who became the fifth Roman Emperor. That Nero was born in 54 C.E., well after the events of Jonson's play, which ends in 31 C.E.

Latiaris. Supporter of Sejanus. Betrayer of Sabinus.

Drusus Junior. Second son to Germanicus and Agrippina. Third in line of succession to Tiberius. Drusus "Junior" means Drusus "the Younger." When Germanicus died, however, Drusus Senior took care of Drusus Junior.

Varro. Follower of Sejanus.

Caligula. Youngest son of Germanicus and Agrippina. Fourth in line of succession to Tiberius. "Caligula" is a nickname that means “Little Military-Boot.” He succeeded Tiberius and became the third Roman Emperor.

Macro. Vigiles (Watch, Night Watch, Police, Firefighters) Prefect. Enemy to Sejanus. Sertorius Macro.

Arruntius. A Senator of good character. Lucius Arruntius.

Cotta. A man without scruples.

Silius. A general under Germanicus. Caius Silius.

Afer. An excellent orator with excessive ambition.

Sabinus. A knight. Close to Agrippina, the widow of Germanicus, who had been his friend. Titus Sabinus.

Haterius. An orator well noted for the style of his orations. Noted for the content of his orations? Not so much.

Lepidus. A Senator of integrity and capability. Marcus Lepidus.

Sanquinius. A Senator.

NOTES:

In this retelling, I use the scene divisions that appear in this book: Ben Jonson, Sejanus his Fall. W. F. Bolton, editor. A New Mermaid Dramabook. New York: Hill and Wang, 1966. I, however, did add a scene division — scene 4 — to Act 2, and a scene division — scene 3 — to Act 3 and a scene division — scene 5 — to Act 4. I also added two scene divisions to Act 5. In making scene divisions, I followed the practice of starting a new scene after everyone has exited.

Germanicus, having died in 19 C.E., does not appear in the play. He was the nephew and adopted son of Tiberius.

Tiberius, the second Roman Emperor, was born in 42 B.C.E. and died in 37 C.E. He ruled from 14 C.E. to 37 C.E. and was succeeded by Caligula.

Sejanus was born in 20 B.C.E. and died in 31 C.E.

Sejanus wanted to succeed Tiberius as Emperor, but some of Tiberius' relatives were in his way. These men were eligible to succeed Tiberius:

- Drusus Senior. The son of Tiberius and his first wife: Vipsania. First to be expected to succeed.
- Nero. First son to Germanicus and Agrippina. Nero was Tiberius' nephew and adopted son. Second to be expected to succeed.
- Drusus Junior. Second son to Germanicus and Agrippina. Third to be expected to succeed.
- Caligula. Third son to Germanicus and Agrippina. He would eventually succeed Tiberius.

In Ben Jonson's society, a person of higher rank would use "thou," "thee," "thine," and "thy" when referring to a person of lower rank. (These terms were also used affectionately and between equals.) A person of lower rank would use "you" and "your" when referring to a person of higher rank.

"Sirrah" was a title used to address someone of a social rank inferior to the speaker. Friends, however, could use it to refer to each other.

The word "wench" at this time was not necessarily negative. It was often used affectionately.

Roman Offices

Consuls: The office of Consul was the highest political office of the Roman Republic. Two Consuls were elected each year and served for one year.

Praetors: A Praetor can be 1) the commander of an army, or 2) a magistrate. The office of Praetor (magistrate) was the second highest political office of the Roman Republic. They were subject only to the veto of the Consuls. Praetors could take the auspices, the performance of which was a religious rite.

Lictors: Lictors served the Consuls and carried rods and axes as symbols of the Senators' authority. Rods were symbols of the Consuls' power to inflict corporal punishment, and axes were symbols of their power to inflict capital punishment. Lictors executed punishments on people who had been convicted of serious crimes.

Tribunes: Tribunes were administrative officers. Some were judicial Tribunes, and some were military Tribunes.

Aediles: An Aedile was a Roman magistrate who was in charge of maintaining public buildings. They also organized public festivals and were in charge of weights and measures.

Censors: They supervised public morality and maintained the census.

Prefects: They had civil or military power, but that power was delegated to them from others.

Praecones: Heralds. Criers in meetings of the Senate. They cry loudly things during a trial, such as "Silence!"

ACT 1 (Sejanus' Fall)

— 1.1 —

Sabinus and Silius met each other.

Silius had been a general under Germanicus, the nephew and adopted son of Tiberius, who was currently the Roman Emperor, after having succeeded Caesar Augustus.

Sabinus, a knight, was close to Agrippina, the widow of Germanicus, who had been his friend.

“Hail, Caius Silius!” Sabinus greeted his friend.

“Titius Sabinus, hail!” Silius replied. “You’re rarely — seldom and splendidly — met in court.”

“Therefore, we are well met,” Sabinus replied.

“It is true; indeed, this place — the court — is not our sphere,” Silius said.

Neither man liked the court or the politics that occurred in the court.

Sabinus said:

“No, it isn’t, Silius. We are no good at being plotters and schemers.

“We lack the ‘fine’ arts of conspiring and their thriving use that should make us graced or favored of the times.

“We have no successive changes of faces to use in duplicity, no cleft tongues, no soft and glutinous bodies that can stick like snails on painted walls, or on our breasts creep up like a snake, to fall from that proud height to which we did climb by slavery, not by service.”

One way to climb to wealth and office is through slavery: being servile to those men who are in high office. When

Caesar Augustus assumed power, the boldest men opposing him had died, and those who were willing to be subservient to him were rewarded.

Sabinus continued:

“We are no guilty men, and therefore we are no great men.

“We have no place in court, no office in state that we can say we have due to our crimes.”

Another way to climb to wealth and office is through committing crimes, a word that can also mean sins.

Sabinus continued:

“We burn with no black secrets —”

Black secrets can make one susceptible to being servile to the man who knows one’s black secrets. And if you are the one who knows black secrets, it can make other men — the ones with black secrets — servile to you.

One wonders what black secrets Vladimir Putin (killer of Ukrainian pregnant women and babies) knows about Donald Trump.

Sabinus continued:

“— black secrets that can make us dear to the pale authors —”

“Dear” can mean “costly.” Paying blackmail to the man who knows one’s black secrets can be costly. Buying someone’s silence is expensive. The pale authors of the black secrets would pay much money and/or render other services to Silius and Sabinus — if Silius and Sabinus knew any black secrets.

In addition, the people paying the blackmail can treat the blackmailers well out of fear of arousing their anger — anger that could result in making black secrets known.

Sabinus and Silius neither had nor knew any black secrets.

Sabinus continued:

“— or make us live in fear of the still-waking anger of those being blackmailed, to raise ourselves a fortune by subverting and destroying theirs.”

One way to raise and advance oneself is by causing someone else to fall.

Sabinus continued:

“We stand not in the lines that advance to that so courted point.”

Lines of people seek a point — a goal — that points to the court.

Satrius and Natta entered the scene. Both men were clients of Sejanus, who was their patron. Sejanus supported them, and in return, the clients were bound to serve him and protect his life.

Silius said, “But yonder lean a pair who do.”

The pair leaned toward the side of doing bad deeds to advance themselves. Satrius and Natta were not morally upright. They leaned on Sejanus for support. They supported Sejanus, and in turn he supported them. But clearly they knew that Sejanus was the alpha male.

Latiaris entered the scene. He supported Sejanus.

“Good cousin Latiaris,” Sabinus greeted him.

In this society, the word “cousin” meant “kinsman.”

Silius and Sabinus talked together at the side as Latiaris joined Satrius and Natta.

Silius said:

“Satrius Secundus and Pinnarius Natta, the great Sejanus’ clients: There are two men who know more than honest counsels.

“Their close breasts and secret hearts, if they were ripped up and opened to light, would show that it would be a poor and idle sin to which their trunks had not been made fit organs.”

In other words: Closely examine their hearts, and you will hardly find a sin that they have not committed.

Silius continued:

“These two men can lie, flatter, and swear, forswear [swear falsely], defame and disparage, inform on traitors or ‘traitors,’ smile, and betray; make men ‘guilty,’ and then beg the forfeit lives to get the livings.”

People could grow wealthy by informing on traitors or “traitors.” As a reward for their information, they would acquire some of the convicted man’s property as a reward. These informers would “beg” to get wealth and property. The penalty for treason was usually a horrible death.

Silius continued:

“These two men can cut men’s throats with whisperings; they can sell to gaping suitors the empty smoke — empty promises — that flies about the palace.”

The Roman proverb fumum vendere means literally “to sell smoke” and figuratively “to make empty promises.”

Silius continued:

“These two men can laugh when their patron laughs, sweat when he sweats, be hot and cold with him, and change every mood, demeanor, and garb, as often as he varies.

A soldier of the Night Watch could be observing the time, or a man could be checking the time on his watch against a public clock. In other words, Satrius and Natta observe Sejanus — their patron — closely and often.

“And, true as turquoise in the dear lord’s ring, these two men look well or ill, according to how their patron, Sejanus, looks.”

Turquoise was believed to change color according to the health of its wearer.

Silius continued:

Satrius and Natta are ready to praise his Lordship — Sejanus — if he spits, or simply pisses fair, if he should have an indifferent stool, or if he breaks wind well.

“Nothing can escape their notice.”

Sabinus said:

“Alas, these things deserve no note, compared with other vile and filthier flatteries that corrupt the times, when not alone the great personages of the state are eager to make their safety and security by doing such sordid acts, but all our Consuls, and no little part of such as have been Praetors — yea, the most of Senators, who otherwise do not use their voices, start up in public Senate, and there strive who shall propound the most abject, despicable, and base things, so much that often Tiberius has been heard, while leaving the court, to cry, ‘O race of men, prepared for servitude!’

“This showed that he, who least the public liberty could like, as loathly brooked their abject servility.”

To advance themselves, highly ranked bad men would flatter the Emperor Tiberius, who knew that they were flattering him and who loathed — or appeared to loath — such flattery and such bad men.

Silius said:

“Well, all is deserved by us — and we deserve more — who with our riots and debauches, pride, and civil hate have so provoked the justice of the gods.

“We who within these fourscore years were born free, equal lords of the conquered world, and knew no masters but passions, to which, betraying first our liberties, we since became the slaves to one man’s lusts, and now to many.”

Not too long ago, the Romans had enjoyed a republic. Julius Caesar had fought a civil war and seemed to be on the verge of becoming a King or an Emperor, but Brutus and Cassius had assassinated him. A new civil war had broken out, and Caesar Augustus had become the first Roman Emperor. When he died, Tiberius succeeded him.

Sabinus and Silius mourned the loss of the old Roman Republic. They believed that they had lost much freedom in the new Roman Empire.

Silius continued:

“Every ministering spy who will accuse and swear is lord of you, of me, of all, and of all our fortunes and our lives.

“Our looks are called into question, and our words, howsoever innocent, are made crimes.

“We shall shortly not dare to tell our dreams, or think, but it will be treason.”

Greedy men would closely listen to other people’s words, hoping that those other people would say something that could be twisted and interpreted as treasonous. Greedy men could turn in traitors and “traitors” and profit by so doing.

Sabinus said:

“Tyrants’ arts are to give flatterers grace, accusers power,

“So that those [flatterers and accusers] may seem to kill whom they [tyrants] devour.”

Cordus and Arruntius entered the scene.

Cordus was a historian and a defender of free speech, and Arruntius was a Senator of good character.

Sabinus said, “Now here is good Cremutius Cordus.”

Cordus replied to Sabinus, “Hail to Your Lordship!”

Silius, Sabinus, Cordus, and Arruntius walked aside and whispered together.

Natta asked, “Who is that man who greets your cousin Sabinus?”

Latiaris answered, “He is named Cordus, a gentleman of Rome. He has written historical annals recently, they say, and very well.”

“Annals?” Natta said. “Of what times?”

“I think of Pompey’s, and Caius Julius Caesar’s, and so down to these,” Latiaris replied.

Pompey was a general whom Julius Caesar defeated in a civil war.

Natta asked, "How stands he inclined to the present state? Is he either Drusian, or Germanican? Or ours, or neutral?"

Tiberius' time was marked by factionalism. Political factions supported Drusus Senior, or Germanicus' relatives, or Sejanus.

"I don't know him well enough to know that," Latiaris replied.

"Those times are somewhat hazardous and unsettled to be touched," Natta said. "Have you either seen or heard part of his work?"

"No," Latiaris said. "He intends that they shall be public shortly."

"Oh," Natta said. "Do you call him Cordus?"

"Aye," Latiaris said.

Satrius, Natta, and Latiaris exited.

Sabinus said, "But these our times are not the same, Arruntius."

Arruntius replied:

"These our times?"

"The men, the men are not the same; we are base, poor, and degenerated from the exalted strain of our great fathers.

"Where is now the soul of god-like Cato the Younger? — he who dared to be good when Julius Caesar dared to be evil; and who had the power not to live as Julius Caesar's slave, but instead to die as his master.

"Or where is now the loyal Brutus, who being proof against all the charm and allurements of benefits and favors did strike so brave a blow into the monster's heart that sought unnaturally to make captive and enslave his country?

“Oh, they have fled the light.”

Cato the Younger had fought against Julius Caesar. When Cato's side was defeated, he committed suicide rather than live on in what he considered would be a tyranny under Julius Caesar.

Brutus and Cassius led the plot that led to the assassination of Julius Caesar.

Arruntius continued:

“Those mighty spirits lie raked up with their ashes in their urns, and not a spark of their eternal fire glows in a present bosom; all's but a momentary blaze of brightness, flashes, and smoke, wherewith we labor so, there's nothing Roman in us, nothing good, gallant, or great.

“What Cordus says is true: ‘Brave Cassius was the last of all that race.’”

“Stand aside!” Sabinus said. “Lord Drusus is coming.”

Drusus Senior and Haterius entered the scene.

“The Emperor's son!” Haterius shouted. “Give place! Make room!”

Arruntius, Silius, Cordus, and Sabinus stood to the side as Drusus Senior and Haterius walked around.

Drusus Senior was expected to succeed Tiberius, and Haterius was an orator.

“I like the prince well,” Silius said.

Drusus Senior and Haterius exited.

“Drusus Senior is a riotous youth,” Arruntius said. “There’s little hope of him.”

“His age will, as it grows, correct that fault of being riotous,” Sabinus said. “I think he bears himself each day more nobly than the previous day; and he wins no less on men’s affections than his father loses. Believe me, I love him, and I love him chiefly for his opposing Sejanus.”

Silius said, “And I love him for gracing his young kinsmen so, the sons of Prince Germanicus; it shows a gallant clearness in him, a straight and upright mind that does not maliciously envy their father’s name in them.”

Drusus Senior, who opposed Sejanus, had a reputation for partying, but most Roman citizens forgave him that because of his youth and good deeds.

Drusus Senior had acted as a father to the sons of the deceased general Germanicus. Drusus Senior was the son of Tiberius, and Germanicus had been the adopted son of Tiberius, and so Drusus Senior and Germanicus had been step-brothers.

Germanicus’ sons were Nero, Drusus Junior, and Caius, who was nicknamed Caligula and would eventually succeed Tiberius.

“The name of Germanicus was, while he lived, above and superior to all malicious envy; and now that he is dead, is without all malicious envy,” Arruntius said. “Oh, that man! If there were seeds of the old moral virtue and valor left, they lived in him.”

Silius said:

“He had the fruits, Arruntius, more than the seeds.”

The fruits of virtue include justified fame and good reputation.

Dead or alive, Germanicus was respected.

Silius continued:

“Sabinus and I myself had the means and opportunity to know him inside and out, and we can report on him and his true character.

“We were his followers, but he would call us his friends.

“Germanicus was a man most like to virtue in all and every action.

“He was nearer to the gods than men in nature, of a body as fair as was his mind, and no less worthy of reverence in face than fame.

“He could so use his state and high rank, tempering his greatness with his gravity, so that it banished and sent away all self-love in him and spite in others.

“What his funerals lacked in images and pomp, they had supplied with honorable sorrow — soldiers’ sadness — a kind of silent mourning, suitable for such men who know no tears except those that their captives are accustomed to show in very great losses.”

The soldiers remained silent while mourning because they associated tears with their captives.

Cordus said, “I thought once, considering their outward forms and appearances, age, manner of deaths, the nearness of the places where they died, to have paralleled him with great Alexander, for both were of the best features and appearance, of high race and exalted heritage, aged but to thirty at their deaths, and in foreign lands, by their own people, alike made away.”

Plutarch’s Lives paired one Greek biography with one Roman biography.

Cordus had thought of pairing the biography of the Roman Germanicus with the biography of the Greek Alexander the Great. Both were remarkable men, and both were rumored to have died young after being poisoned.

Plutarch was born in 46 C.E. and so was not yet born at the time Ben Jonson's play was set. Plutarch did write about Alexander the Great, but he paired Alexander with Julius Caesar.

Sabinus disagreed that Germanicus should be compared to Alexander the Great, who was from Macedon and who died after a drinking bout:

“I don't know about Germanicus' death, how you might wrest and interpret it. But as for his life, it did as much disdain comparison with that voluptuous, rash, giddy, and drunken Macedonian's life as mine does with my bondman's — my slave's.

“All the good in Alexander — his valor and his fortune — Germanicus made his. But he had other touches of late Romans that more did describe and proclaim who Germanicus was.

“He had Pompey's dignity; the innocence, blamelessness, and uprightness of Cato; Caesar's spirit; wise Brutus' temperance.

“Every virtue that, imparted to others, gave them good name and good reputation, flowed mixed all together in him.”

In other words: Virtues that went singly and individually to some great men, had all grouped together and had all gone to Germanicus.

Sabinus continued his praise of Germanicus:

“He was the soul of goodness, and all our praises of him are like streams drawn from a spring that still rise full and leave the part remaining greatest.”

All their praises of Germanicus could not do justice to his goodness.

Arruntius said, “I am sure that he was too great for us, and that they knew who did remove him hence.”

These words can mean 1) the people who poisoned Germanicus knew how good a man he was, and/or 2) important people knew who were the people who had poisoned Germanicus.

Tiberius was rumored, influenced by his mother, to have had Germanicus poisoned because of malicious envy of him. To do that, he had Germanicus serve far from Rome. Germanicus died in Antioch, which is near the modern city of Antakya in Turkey.

Sabinus said:

“When men grow securely and deeply honored and loved, there is a trick in state, which jealous princes never fail to use, how to deflect and thwart that growth with fair pretext and honorable appearances of employment, either by embassy, the war, or such, to shift them forth into another air, where they may purge, and lessen; so was Germanicus securely and deeply honored and loved, and he had his seconds — his secondaries — there, sent by Tiberius and his more subtle dam — his mother, Livia, the wife of Caesar Augustus — to discontent him, to breed and cherish mutinies, detract his greatest actions, give audacious check to his commands, and work to put him out in open act of treason.”

Thee seconds were Gnaeus Calpurnius Piso and his wife Plancina, who were thought to have poisoned Germanicus and killed him. Piso was governor of Syria when Germanicus was reorganizing Rome's Asian provinces and kingdoms.

Sabinus continued:

“When his wise cares prevented all of these snares, a fine poison was thought on to mature their practices.”

“Here comes Sejanus,” Cordus said.

“Now observe the stoops, the bendings, and the falls,” Silius said.

The followers of Sejanus were obsequious and frequently bended the knee and bowed to him. One or both knees would fall to the ground.

A fall can also be a moral decline or a trap to ensnare others.

“Most creeping base!” Arruntius said.

Sejanus' base, aka followers, were base.

Sejanus, Satrius, Terentius, and some other followers of Sejanus entered the scene.

Terentius was a friend to Sejanus, and Satrius was one of Sejanus' clients. Satrius pointed to the group of men who admired Germanicus and did not admire Sejanus: Arruntius, Cordus, Sabinus, and Silius.

Sejanus said to Satrius, “I note them well. No more. What do you have to say to me?”

Satrius began, “My lord, there is a gentleman of Rome who would buy —”

“What do you call the man whom you talked with?” Sejanus interrupted.

“Please Your Lordship, he is Eudemus, the physician to Livia, the wife of Drusus Senior,” Satrius said.

Livia was Germanicus’ sister and Tiberius’ niece.

Sejanus said, “Continue on with your suit. He would buy, you said —”

“A Tribune’s place, my lord,” Satrius said.

Eudemus wanted to buy the political position of Tribune. He could do that by bribing Sejanus.

“What will he give?” Sejanus asked.

Satrius answered, “Fifty sestertia.”

“Livia’s physician, you say, is that fellow?” Sejanus asked.

“He is, my lord,” Satrius said. “What is your Lordship’s answer?”

“Answer to what?” Sejanus said.

“The place, my lord,” Satrius said. “It is for a gentleman whom your Lordship will well like when you see him, and one you may make yours by the grant.”

By making him a Tribune, Sejanus could make a follower of Eudemus, the physician to Livia, the wife of Drusus Senior.

“Well, let him bring his money and his name,” Sejanus said.

The word “name” can mean “reputation.”

Satrius said, “I thank Your Lordship. He shall, my lord.”

“Come closer,” Sejanus said.

He asked quietly, “Do you know this same Eudemus? Is he learned?”

Satrius answered, “He is reputed to be learned, my lord, and of deep practice.”

“Deep practice” can mean 1) learned medical practice, and/or 2) treacherous practices.

Sejanus said quietly, “Bring him in to me, in the gallery [a long, narrow apartment], and find a reason to leave him and me there, together. I want to confer with him about an ailment.”

He then said out loud, “Let’s continue on our way.”

Sejanus, Satrius, Terentius, and some other supporters and clients of Sejanus exited; a few other supporters and clients of Sejanus remained.

Arruntius said:

“So, yet another? Yet? Oh, desperate state of groveling honor!”

They had just witnessed a bribe.

Because such honors as Tribuneships could be purchased with groveling bribes, they were groveling honors.

Arruntius continued:

“See thou this, O sun, and do we see thee after?

“I think that day should lose its light when men do lose their shames and for the empty circumstance — trivial details — of life betray their cause of living, aka their reason for living.”

Juvenal in his eighth Satire, wrote, in G.G. Ramsay’s translation, “[...] count it the greatest of all sins to prefer life to honor, and to lose, for the sake of living, all that makes life worth having” (lines 83-84).

Freedom makes life worth having. Why give up your freedom to bribe your way into a political office? Bribing someone demonstrates that that person is your superior.

Eudemus was going to both give money to Sejanus and become beholden to him.

Silius said in reply to Arruntius:

“Not so.”

Men do evil, and the day keeps its light. The natural world does not necessarily punish evil men. Indeed, Sejanus now appeared to have more power than the natural world.

Silius continued:

“Sejanus can repair, if Jove — Jupiter, the King of the gods — should ruin.

“Sejanus is the now — current — court-god; and well applied to and supplicated by the sacrifice of knees, of crooks, and cringe — the knees bend and kneel to him — he will do more than all the house of heaven can, for a thousand hecatombs.”

Hecatombs of 100 oxen per hecatomb are public sacrifices to the gods. A thousand hecatombs would require the sacrifice of 100,000 oxen.

“It is he who makes us our day, or night; hell and Elysium are in his look; we talk of the judge Rhadamanth in the Land of the Dead, the avenging spirits known as the Furies, and fire-brands — those already burning or destined to burn in hell — but it is his frown that is all these, where on the adverse part — the opposite side — his smile is more than poets ever yet feigned, aka invented, of bliss and cool, leafy shades, the gods’ drink that is called nectar —”

Arruntius said about Sejanus:

“A serving boy!

“I knew him at Caius Caesar’s table, when for hire he prostituted his abused body to that great gourmand, fat Apicius, and was the noted pathic — boy prostitute — of the time.”

Caius Caesar was the grandson of Caesar Augustus, who adopted him in hopes that he would be his heir, but Caius died in 4 C.E. and Augustus died in 14 C.E.

Apicius spent his fortune on pleasure; when he had spent most of his money, he committed suicide.

Sabinus said:

“And now, the second face of the whole world, the partner of the Empire, has his image reared equal with the image of Tiberius, borne in ensigns — military standards.”

Sejanus’ effigy was displayed in the center of military camps, where the ensigns were stored.

Sabinus continued:

“Sejanus commands and disposes every important, dignified office.

“Centurions, Tribunes, heads of provinces, Praetors, and Consuls, all that heretofore Rome’s general suffrage — collective vote — gave, is now his to sell.”

A Centurion was a military officer who commanded a century: a unit of Roman soldiers.

Sabinus continued:

“The gain, or rather spoil, of all the earth, one man, and his family, receives.”

Silius said, “He has recently made him a strength, too, in an exceptional way, by reducing all the Praetorian bands into one camp, which he commands, after alleging that the soldiers, because of living loose and scattered, fell to debauchery, and that if any sudden attack should be attempted, their united strength would be far more than if the bands of guards were severed and divided into smaller bands, and their life more strict if they were more removed and distant from the city.”

From 14 C.E. until a little before his death, Sejanus was Prefect of the Praetorian Guard, aka the Roman imperial bodyguard, which also policed the city of Rome. They had been stationed in various places, but he consolidated them into one camp, which gave him many soldiers to quickly command. His excuses were that the soldiers were prone to dissolute behavior when in widely separated locations, and there would be more discipline if they were consolidated; in addition, he said that they would be a more powerful force if they were all together. The new camp was located outside, but near, Rome.

Sabinus said:

“Where now he builds what kind of forts he pleases, is heard to court the soldier by his name, woos, feasts the chiefest men of action, whose needs, not loves, compel them to be his.

“And, although he never has been liberal by nature, yet to his own dark ends he’s most profuse and lavish and letting fly he does not care what toward his ambition.”

“Does he yet have ambition?” Arruntius asked. “Is there any step in state that can make him higher? Or more? Or is there anything that he is, except less?”

“Nothing, but Emperor,” Silius said.

Sejanus was the second most important man in the Roman Empire. The only higher man and position was Emperor.

“I hope that Tiberius will keep the name of Emperor, howsoever he has foregone the dignity and power,” Arruntius said.

Tiberius preferred a quiet life to the burdens of being Emperor.

“To be sure, while he lives,” Silius said.

“And when Tiberius is dead, the Emperorship comes to Drusus Senior,” Arruntius said. “Should he fail, aka die, the Emperorship comes to the brave offspring of Germanicus, and they are three: Is that too many for him to have a plot upon?”

The three sons of Germanicus were Nero, Drusus Junior, and Caligula. When Tiberius died, the four men in line to succeed him were his son, Drusus Senior, and the three sons of Tiberius’ nephew and adopted son: Germanicus.

In order for Sejanus to succeed Tiberius as Emperor, he would have to kill the four men in line ahead of him. If he wanted the deaths to appear to be natural, they would have to be spaced out.

“I do not know the heart of Sejanus’ designs; but surely the face — the outward appearance — of his designs and plans looks farther than the present,” Sabinus said.

Arruntius said:

“By the gods, if I could guess he had but such a thought, my sword should cleave him down from head to heart, but I would find it out; and with my hand I’d hurl his panting brain about the air, in mites as small as atoms, to undo the knotted bed —”

The “knotted bed” was Sejanus’ immoral plans.

A knot is a jumble of ropes. Arruntius may be comparing Sejanus’ thoughts to a nest of snakes or to the intricately woven threads of plots.

“You’re observed, Arruntius,” Sabinus said. “You’re being watched.”

Some of Sejanus’ clients were watching him.

Arruntius said, “Death! I dare tell him so, and all his spies.”

He turned to Sejanus’s clients and said, “You, sir, I would — do you look? And you?”

Sabinus said to Arruntius, “Forbear. Don’t do this.”

Satrius and Eudemus entered the scene. They stood apart from the Germanicans: Sabinus, Arruntius, Silius, and Cordus.

Satrius was a follower of Sejanus, and he was the go-between for Eudemus and Sejanus. Eudemus was the physician of Livia, the wife of Drusus Senior. Eudemus was bribing Sejanus in order to become a Tribune.

Satrius said to Eudemus, “Sejanus will quickly be here. Let’s walk a turn. You’re musing, Eudemus?”

Cautious, Eudemus said to Satrius, “Not I, sir.”

He said to himself, “I wonder why Sejanus should mark me out for attention so! Well, may Jove and Apollo form it for the best.”

Jove (aka Jupiter) and Apollo were Roman gods.

Satrius said:

“Your fortune’s made for you now, Eudemus, if you can just lay hold upon the means.”

The means is service.

Satrius continued:

“Do but observe his mood, and — believe it — he’s the noblest Roman, where he takes —”

Sejanus entered the scene, and Satrius said, “Here comes His Lordship.”

“Now, good Satrius,” Sejanus said.

“This is the gentleman, my lord,” Satrius said.

“Is he?” Sejanus asked.

He said to Eudemus, “Give me your hand. We must be more acquainted. Report, sir, has spoken out about your skill and learning, and I am glad I have so needful cause (however in itself painful and hard) to make me known to so great ability.”

He then said to Satrius, to get him out of the way, “Look, who’s that, Satrius?”

Taking the hint, Satrius exited.

Sejanus then said to Eudemus, “I have a grief — an injury — sir, that will desire your help. Your name’s Eudemus?”

“Yes,” Eudemus said.

“Sir?” Sejanus said.

Sejanus wanted Eudemus to be more respectful to him, which Eudemus immediately recognized and obliged.

Eudemus said, “It is, My Lord.”

“I hear that you are the physician to Livia, the princess?” Sejanus said.

“I minister unto her, my good lord,” Eudemus replied.

“You minister to a royal lady, then,” Sejanus said.

“She is royal, my lord, and fair,” Eudemus replied.

Sejanus said:

“Being fair — beautiful — is understood of all their sex, who are, or would be so.

“Those who would be fair, cosmetic treatment soon can make them so.

“For those who are fair, their beauties fear no colors.”

Colors are 1) makeup, and 2) battle flags.

“Your Lordship is conceited,” Eudemus said.

In this context, the word “conceited” means “full of conceits, aka ideas,” aka “witty.”

Sejanus said:

“Sir, you know it. And I can, if necessary, deliver a learned lecture on this and other secrets.

“Please tell me, what other ladies, besides Livia, do you have as your patients?”

Eudemus answered, “Many, my good lord. The great Augusta, Urgulania, Mutilia Prisca, and Plancina, many different —”

Augusta was the mother of Tiberius.

Urgulania was one of Augusta’s best friends.

Mutilia Prisca was another intimate friend of Augusta’s.

Plancina, another of Augusta’s friends, was the wife of Gnaeus Calpurnius Piso. Plancina and Piso were thought to have poisoned Germanicus and killed him.

Sejanus interrupted, “— and all of these tell you the particulars of every different grief? How first it grew, and then increased? What action caused that? What passion caused that? And they answer to each point — each question — that you will put to them?”

“If they did not, my lord, we doctors would not know how to prescribe the remedies,” Eudemus said.

“Bah, you’re a subtle, cunning nation of persons, you physicians! And you are grown to be the only cabinets — the only repositories— in court of ladies’ privacies and secrets.”

“Cabinets” are private apartments or boudoirs.

“Privacies” can be “intimacies” and/or “private parts.”

Sejanus then asked, “Indeed, which of these is the most pleasant and amusing lady, in her physic?”

“Physic” is “medicine.” It can include such practices as taking cathartics or purgatives. “Physic” can also mean “healthy practices.”

Eudemus hesitated. Physicians know things that their patients would not like to be made public knowledge.

Sejanus said, “Come, you are modest now.”

“It is fitting for me to be modest, my lord,” Eudemus said.

Sejanus said:

“Why, sir, I do not ask you about their urines.

“I do not ask you whose urine smells most like violets as a result of using violets in herbal medicines, or whose excrement is best, or who makes the hardest faces on her toilet-stool during a difficult defecation.

“I do not ask you which lady sleeps with her own face a-nights, which lady takes her teeth off with her clothes, in court, or which lady takes off her hair, or which lady takes off her complexion, and in which box she puts it.

“These would be questions that might, perhaps, have put your gravity to some defense of blush. But I inquired, which was the wittiest, merriest, most wanton?”

The word “wanton” can mean 1) “playful,” or 2) “lustful.”

Sejanus continued:

“I made harmless interrogatories and asked questions that are simply harmless whims.”

Manipulative people will often test other people in small ways to see if those people can be manipulated in big ways.

He then asked:

“I think Augusta should be most perverse and unreasonable by temperament?”

“She’s so, my lord,” Eudemus said.

Yes, Eudemus can be manipulated.

“I knew it,” Sejanus said. “And Mutilia is the most jocund?”

“It is very true, my lord,” Eudemus said.

Sejanus said:

“And why would you conceal this from me, now?”

“Come, what about Livia? I know she’s quick and quaintly spirited, and she will have strange thoughts when she’s at leisure.

“She tells them all to you?”

“Quaintly” can mean “elegantly” or “cleverly,” but in Ben Jonson’s society, the word “quaint” also meant “cunt.”

A “strange woman” can be a promiscuous woman.

Eudemus said, “My noblest lord, there is no man alive and breathing in the Empire or on earth whom I would be ambitious to serve in any act that may preserve my honor before Your Lordship.”

If Eudemus were to answer Sejanus’ prying questions, Eudemus would NOT be preserving his own honor.

Sejanus said:

“Sir, you can lose no honor by trusting anything — any information — to me. The coarsest act done to my service I can so reward in such a way that all the world shall style it honorable.

“People’s idle, foolish, virtuous definitions keep honor poor, and are as scorned as vain;

“Those deeds breathe honor that do suck in gain.”

According to Sejanus, honorable deeds are those that bring you wealth.

Eudemus objected: “But, my good lord, if I should thus betray the private counsels of my patient, and the private counsels of a lady of her high place and worth, what might Your Lordship — who soon are to trust me with your own private counsels — judge about my trustworthiness?”

Soon, if Sejanus were to make Eudemus his physician, Sejanus would entrust Eudemus with his own secrets. If Eudemus were to tell Sejanus the secrets of Eudemus’ patients, wouldn’t Sejanus think that Eudemus would tell other people the secrets of Sejanus?

Sejanus said:

“I would judge your trustworthiness to be only the best, I swear.

“Say now that I should utter to you my illness, and with it the true cause: that my illness is love, and love for Livia; if you should tell her this, should she suspect your faith? I wish you could tell me as much from her; see if my brain could be turned mistrustful.”

Sejanus was claiming to be lovesick for Livia, a married woman.

Eudemus said, “Happily, my lord, I could in time tell you as much, and more, as long as I might safely promise but the first to her from you.”

The word “happily” can mean “perhaps.”

Sejanus said, “You may tell it as safely, my Eudemus (I now dare call thee so) as I have put the secret into thee.”

Sejanus had been using the formal “you” to refer to Eudemus, but now he used the familiar “thee,” indicating that he was regarding Eudemus as a friend.

Eudemus said, “My lord —”

“Don’t protest,” Sejanus said. “Thy looks are vows to me; use only speed, and, if you just move and persuade her with Sejanus’ love, thou art a man made to make Consuls. Go.”

A man made to make Consuls is a powerful man: He can decide who is to be Consul, which in itself is an important position.

“My lord, I’ll promise you a private meeting this day, together with her,” Eudemus said.

“Can thou?” Sejanus asked.

“Yes,” Eudemus said.

“The place?” Sejanus asked.

“My gardens, to where I shall fetch Your Lordship,” Eudemus said.

Sejanus said:

“Let me adore my Aesculapius!”

Aesculapius is the god of medicine.

Sejanus continued:

“Why, this indeed is physic, and outspeaks — is more significant than — the knowledge of cheap drugs, or any use that can be made out of it! More comforting than all your opiates, juleps, apozems, magistral syrups, or —”

Opiates, juleps, apozems, and magistral syrups are different kinds of medicine.

Sejanus broke off his words and then continued:

“Begone, my friend, not barely styled, but created so. Expect things greater than thy largest hopes to overtake thee. Fortune shall be taught to know how ill she has deserved, thus long to come behind thy wishes. Go, and be successful.”

Lady Fortune had been slow in answering Eudemus’ prayers, but Sejanus would make sure that Eudemus’ wishes were now quickly answered. Sejanus was promising that he was not making an empty promise but would do what he said he would do.

Eudemus, who had just agreed to arrange a meeting between Sejanus and a married woman, exited.

People who arrange such meetings are sometimes called panders.

Sejanus, who had just manipulated Eudemus, said to himself:

“Ambition makes more trusty slaves than does need. These fellows — doctors — by the favor of their art and skill, have always the means to tempt, and they have often the power.”

Sejanus was going to use Eudemus to tempt Livia. As a doctor, Eudemus knew Livia’s secrets, and so he had inside information on what would tempt her.

Eudemus was ambitious, as shown by his wanting to be a Tribune, and so he would make a trusty slave to Sejanus.

Sejanus continued:

“If Livia will be now corrupted, then thou have the way, Sejanus, to work out the secrets of him, who, thou know, endures and tolerates thee not. I mean to find out the secrets of her husband, Drusus Senior, and to work against them.

“Prosper it, Pallas, thou who betters wit;

“For Venus has the smallest share in it.”

Pallas Athena is a warrior goddess, while Venus is the goddess of sexual passion. Sejanus was more concerned about killing Drusus Senior than he was about getting an orgasm. Seducing Livia was simply a means to a more immoral end.

Because Pallas Athena is also the goddess of wisdom, she can better wit, aka intelligence. Venus, as the goddess of sexual passion, has much less to do with reason.

Tiberius and Drusus Senior, attended by Haterius, Latiaris, Satrius, Natta, etc., entered the scene.

A man knelt before Tiberius, who said:

“We will not endure and tolerate these flatteries.

“Let him stand.

“Our empire, ensigns, axes, rods, and state don’t take away our human nature from us.

‘Look up at us like a man, and fall before the gods.’”

Axes and rods make up the fasces, symbol of the Emperor’s power.

Tiberius wanted his followers to look at him as the man — not god — he was, but also to look up to him.

Suetonius wrote about Tiberius’ aversion to flattery. In Alexander Thomson’s translation:

He had such an aversion to flattery, that he would never suffer any senator to approach his litter, as he passed the streets in it, either to pay him a civility, or upon business. And when a man of consular rank, in begging his pardon for some offence he had given him, attempted to fall at his feet, he started from him in such haste, that he stumbled and fell. If any compliment was paid him, either in conversation or a set speech, he would not scruple to interrupt and reprimand the party, and alter what he had said. Being once called “lord,” by some person, he desired that he might no more be affronted in that manner. When another, to excite veneration, called his occupations “sacred,” and a third had expressed himself thus: “By your authority I have waited upon the senate,” he obliged them to change their phrases; in one of them adopting persuasion, instead of “authority,” and in the other, laborious, instead of “sacred.”

“How like a god speaks Caesar!” Sejanus said.

This, of course, was flattery. One way to flatter someone is to say that that person does not like flattery. And, of course, Sejanus was comparing Tiberius to the gods.

Arruntius said to Cordus, Silius, and Sabinus:

“There, observe! Tiberius can endure that second supporter who flatters him secondly — that’s no flattery — ha!

“Oh, what is it proud slime will not believe of his own worth, to hear it equally praised thus with the gods!”

“He did not hear what Sejanus said, sir,” Cordus said.

Arruntius said:

“He did not?”

“Tut, he must not; we think meanly and ignobly.

“It is your most courtly, known confederacy to have your private parasite redeem what he in public subtlety will lose to making him a name.”

In other words: It is most courtly to have a flatterer restore a name privately that the Emperor or other high-ranking person declines publicly in order to please the citizens. Tiberius was saying that he was not a god, but Sejanus was comparing him to the gods.

Silius will soon say that Tiberius has a secret love of flattery although he rejects flattery publicly.

Haterius gave Tiberius some letters and began, “Right mighty lord —”

Using the majestic plural, Tiberius interrupted and said, “We must stop up our ears against these assaults of charming and enchanted tongues; we ask that you use no longer these contumelies to us; don’t call us either ‘lord,’ or ‘mighty.’ We profess ourself to be the servant of the Senate, and we are proud to enjoy them as our good, just, and favoring lords.”

The noun “contumely” means “insulting language.” Tiberius considered flattery directed toward himself to be insulting language.

Cordus said to Arruntius, Sabinus, and Silius, “Splendidly dissembled!”

The word “dissimulation” means “concealment of one’s thoughts.”

Earlier, Sabinus had said about Tiberius: “Often Tiberius has been heard, while leaving the court, to cry, ‘O race of men, prepared for servitude!’”

Tiberius did not highly regard all of the Senators and other members of the court.

Tiberius was very capable of saying one thing but doing the opposite.

Arruntius said, “Princelike, to the life.”

Sabinus said:

“When power, which may command, so much descends,

“Their bondage, whom it stoops to, it intends.”

Sabinus believed that Tiberius was manipulating the Senators and the people listening to him.

Tiberius asked Haterius, “From where come these letters?”

“From the Senate,” Haterius answered.

“I see,” Tiberius said.

Latiaris gave him more letters.

Tiberius asked, “From where come these?”

“From the Senate, too,” Latiaris said.

“Are the Senators sitting now?” Tiberius asked.

“They await thy answer, Caesar,” Latiaris said.

The Senators were waiting for his answer to the letters.

Silius and the other Germanicans continued to talk privately among themselves.

Silius said:

“If this man just had a mind allied to his words, how blest a fate it would be to us, and Rome! We could not imagine that state for which we would exchange Tiberius’ state, although the aim were our old liberty.”

In other words: If Tiberius’ actions matched his words, we cannot imagine another government that we would exchange for his government, even if the new government were to give us back our old liberty.

Silius continued:

“The ghosts of those who fell for that would grieve that their bodies lived not now, so that they could again serve. Men are deceived who think there can be thrall — bondage — beneath a virtuous prince. Wished-for liberty never looks lovelier than that which is under such a crown.

“But when his grace is merely only lip-good — and not good in deeds — and that no longer than he airs himself abroad in public, there to seem to shun the strokes and stripes of flatterers, which within his true character are lechery unto him —”

To some people, the strokes and stripes of flattery are sexually pleasurable.

Silius continued:

“— and so feed his brutish sense with their afflicting sound, as, dead to virtue, he permits himself to be carried like a pitcher, by the ears, to every act of vice.”

In other words: He can be easily manipulated by flattery to do evil.

Silius continued:

“This is a case that deserves our fear and presages the close and secret approach of blood and tyranny.

“Flattery is midwife to princes’ rage, and nothing sooner helps bring forth a tyrant than that, and whisperers’ grace, who have the time, the place, the power to make all men offenders.”

Arruntius said:

“Tiberius should be told this, and he should be advised to dissemble with fools and blind men. We who know the evil should hunt the palace-rats, or give them poison, frighten away from here these worse than ravens. Flatterers devour the living, where ravens just prey upon the dead.

“Tiberius shall be told it.”

A proverb stated, “Flatterers are worse than crows.”

Sabinus said:

“Wait, Arruntius, we must wait for our opportunity, and practice what is fitting, as well as what is needful.

“It is not safe to approach by force a sovereign’s ear;

“Princes hear well, if they at all will hear.”

Arruntius replied:

“Ha! Do you say so? Well.

“In the meantime, Jove — don’t say that I am doing this, but I am calling upon thee now —

“Of all wild beasts, preserve me from a tyrant.

“And of all tame beasts, preserve me from a flatterer!”

“It is well prayed,” Silius said.

Tiberius said to Haterius:

“Deliver to the lords this voice and message:

“We are their servant, and it is fitting that a good and honest prince, whom they, out of their bounty, have instructed and provided with so enlarged and absolute a power should owe the performance of it to their service, and to the good of all and the good of every citizen.

“Nor shall it ever make us regret to have wished the Senate just and favoring lords to us, since their free loves yield no less defense to a prince’s state than his own innocence.

“Say then, there can be nothing in their thought that shall fail to please us, which has pleased them. Our suffrage shall rather anticipate and come before than stay behind their wills.

“It is empire — supreme power — to obey where such, so great, so grave, so good, determine.”

Tiberius explained why he had allowed one temple to be erected to him but would not allow another temple to be erected to him:

“Yet for the suit of Spain to erect a temple in honor of our mother and ourself, we must (with pardon of the Senate) not assent to.

“Their Lordships may object that we did not deny the same recent request to the Asian cities. We desire that our defense for allowing that should be known in these brief reasons, with our after-purpose — our intention for the future.

“Since deified Augustus did not stop a temple to him from being built at Pergamum in honor of himself and sacred Rome, we, who have all observed all the deeds and words observed of Augustus always in place of laws, we rather followed that pleasing precedent because, with our own reverence, the Senate's reverence also there was joined.

“But as to have once received it may deserve the winning of pardon, so to be adored with the continued style and note — reputation or name — of gods through all the provinces would be wild ambition, and no less pride. Yea, even Augustus' name should early vanish, should it be profaned with such promiscuous flatteries.”

Tiberius then explained how he wished to be regarded:

“As for our part, we here protest it, and we desire that posterity should know this: We are mortal, and we can do only the deeds of men. It would be glory enough if we could be truly a prince. And they shall add abounding grace to our memory who shall report us worthy of our forefathers, taking care of your affairs, constant and standing firm in dangers, and not afraid of any private frown when acting for the public good. These things shall be to us temples and statues, reared in your minds, the fairest and most enduring imagery.

“For those of stone or brass, if they become odious in judgment of posterity, are more contemned as dying sepulchers than taken for living monuments.”

Tiberius then explained what he wanted from the gods and men:

“We then make here our suit, alike to gods and men.

“Our suit to the gods is to, until the end of our life, inspire us with a free and quiet mind, discerning both divine and human laws.

“Our suit to men is to vouchsafe us after death an honorable mention, and fair praise to accompany our actions and our name.

“The rest of greatness princes may command, and therefore may neglect; they should, without being satisfied, pursue only a long, lasting, high, and happy memory.

“Contempt of fame — reputation — begets contempt of virtue.”

“Splendid!” Natta said.

“Most divine!” Satrius said.

“The oracles have ceased to speak, so that only Caesar might speak with their tongue,” Sejanus said.

Oracles were believed to speak with the voice of gods. For example, the oracle at Delphi spoke with the voice of Apollo.

The oracles, including the oracle at Delphi, were said to have ceased speaking after the birth of Christ.

Sejanus said blasphemously that now the oracles are said to have stopped speaking on account of Tiberius, who speaks god-like words.

Arruntius said to Cordus, Silius, and Sabinus, “Let me be gone! This is most perceived and open!”

He did not like the flattery of Tiberius that he was hearing. He also did not like what he considered to be manipulative words by Tiberius.

Cordus said to Arruntius, “Stay.”

Arruntius said to Cordus, Silius, and Sabinus, “Why? To hear more cunning, and to hear more fine words with their sound flattered, before their sense is meant?”

Tiberius said:

“Their choice of Antium, there to place the gift vowed to the goddess for our mother’s health, we want the Senate to know we fairly like.”

The gift was a statue of Fortuna Equestris, which was donated by the Roman equestrian order and placed in Fortuna’s temple at Actium. The gift was an offering to Lady Fortune asking for Augusta to have good health.

Tiberius continued:

“We also like the Senate’s permission to Marcus Lepidus to repair the Aemilian place, and to restore those monuments.”

Lepidus wanted to improve the Basilica of Paulus at his own expense.

Tiberius continued:

“We like their grace, too, in the confining of Silanus to the other isle Cythera, at the suit of his religious sister. This grace much commends their wisdom and policy, being so tempered with their mercy.”

Silanus was supposed to be exiled on an island that was barren, but his religious sister had asked that he instead be exiled on the island of Cynthus (called Cythera here).

Tiberius continued:

“But, for the honors that they have decreed to our Sejanus, to raise his statue in Pompey’s Theater — whose ruining fire his vigilance and labor kept restrained in that one loss —”

Pompey’s Theater had been destroyed by a fire. Tiberius gave credit to Sejanus for keeping the destruction restricted to one place instead of spreading through the city, and the Senators voted for a statue of Sejanus to be placed in the restored theater.

Tiberius praised both the Senate and Sejanus:

“— they have therein outgone their own great wisdoms by their skillful choice and placing of their generous bounties on a man whose merit more adorns the dignity than that dignity can adorn him, and gives a benefit in taking, greater than it can receive.

“Blush not, Sejanus, thou great aid of Rome, associate of our labors, our chief helper.

“Let us not do violence to thy unfeigned modesty by attempting to give thee thy deserved praise, for we cannot do more than attempt to do so, since there’s no voice that can undertake it.

“No man here receive our speeches as hyperboles, for we are as far from flattering our friend, let malicious envy know, as from the need to flatter.

“Nor let them ask the reasons of our praise.

“Princes have always their grounds reared with themselves, above the poor low flats of common men, and whoever will search the reasons of their acts must stand on equal bases.”

High princes stand on high grounds, while common men stand on a lower firmament. The “high grounds” can be justifying motives.

Tiberius concluded:

“Lead, let’s go! Our loves will go to the Senate.”

Tiberius, Sejanus, Haterius, Latiaris, Satrius, Natta, etc., exited.

Arruntius shouted at the departing Tiberius, “Caesar!”

Holding Arruntius back, Sabinus said, “Peace! Be quiet!”

Cordus said, “Great Pompey’s Theater was never ruined until now that proud Sejanus has a statue reared on its ashes.”

Arruntius said, “Place the shame of soldiers above the best of generals? Crack the world, and bruise and crush the name of Romans into dust, before we behold it!”

According to Arruntius, the best of generals is Pompey, and the shame of soldiers is Sejanus.

“Check your passion,” Silius said. “Lord Drusus carries.”

Drusus Senior approached Arruntius, Cordus, Satrius, and Sabinus.

Drusus Senior, who greatly disliked Sejanus, said:

“Is my father mad?”

“Weary of life and rule, lords? Thus to heave an idol up with praise? Make him his mate? His partner in the Empire?”

“O good prince!” Arruntius said.

Drusus Senior said, “Allow him statues? Titles? Honors? Such as he himself refuses?”

“Bravo, brave Drusus!” Arruntius said.

Drusus Senior said, “The first ascents to sovereignty are hard, but once entered, there never lacks either means or ministers to help the aspirer on.”

“True, gallant Drusus,” Arruntius said.

Drusus Senior said, “We must shortly pray to Modesty that he — Sejanus — will rest contented —”

Modesty is the goddess Pudicitia.

“Aye, where he is, and not write Emperor,” Arruntius said.

Sejanus, Satrius, Latiaris, and some of Sejanus’ clients entered the scene. They took no notice at first of Drusus Senior and the Germanicans.

Sejanus said to his clients, “There is your bill, and yours. Bring your man. I have interceded for you, too, Latiaris.”

Bills are official documents. Apparently, these bills were letters of appointment to positions.

Sejanus then walked into and bumped Drusus Senior.

“What!” Drusus Senior said, “Is your vast greatness grown so blindly bold that you will walk over us?”

“Why, then give way,” Sejanus said.

Drusus Senior said, “Give way, Colossus?”

The Colossus of Rhodes was a huge statue. Drusus Senior was accusing Sejanus of carelessly walking as if he were a mobile but blindly bold huge statue. Sejanus’ hugeness lay in his ambition and power.

“Do you lift your hand against us?” Drusus Senior said. “Do you advance yourself against us? Take that!”

Drusus Senior struck Sejanus.

“Good! Splendid! Excellent brave prince!” Arruntius said.

Drusus Senior said to Sejanus, “Nay, come, approach.”

He then drew his sword and said:

“What! Do you stand away from us? Do you gaze at us with wonder? It looks too full of death for thy cold spirits.

“Avoid my eye, dull camel, or my sword shall make thy bravery and finery fitter for a grave than for a triumph. I’ll raise a statue of your own bulk; but it shall be on the cross, where I will nail your pride at breadth and length, and crack those sinews, which are yet but stretched with your swollen fortune’s rage.”

Crucifixion was an ignominious death.

“A noble prince!” Arruntius said.

The spectators who supported Drusus Senior all cried, “A Castor, a Castor, a Castor, a Castor!”

Castor was a famous gladiator.

Everyone except Sejanus exited.

Sejanus said to himself:

“He who is moved with such wrong but can bear it through with patience and an even mind knows how to turn it back.

“Wrath, covered, carries fate and achieves revenge.

“Revenge is lost, if I express my hate.

“What was my intrigue recently, I’ll now pursue as my deadly justice. This has changed my intrigue and made its goal a deadly revenge.”

At this point in Ben Jonson’s play, a Chorus of Musicians performed.

— 2.1 —

Sejanus, Livia, and Eudemus talked together.

Sejanus said to Eudemus, “Physician, thou are worthy of a province for the great favors done to our loves. And, except that Livia — greatest among the great — bears a part in the requital of thy services, I should alone despair of any adequate way to give them worthy satisfaction.”

Livia said, “Eudemus, I will see to it that you shall receive a fit and full reward for your large merit.”

She then said, “But for this potion we intend to give to Drusus Senior — who is no longer our husband now — whom shall we choose as the most apt and capable instrument to administer it to him?”

The potion was poison.

“I say Lygdus,” Eudemus said.

“Lygdus?” Sejanus asked. “Who’s he?”

Livia answered, “He is a eunuch whom Drusus Senior loves and respects.”

“Aye, and he is his cup-bearer,” Eudemus said.

In Ben Jonson’s society, the words “Ganymede” and “cup-bearer” were then-slang for “catamite,” aka the “bottom” in gay anal sex. In mythology, Jupiter, the king of the gods, may have had a homosexual relationship with Ganymede, who was Jupiter’s cupbearer.

Sejanus said, “Don’t name a second person to do this. If Drusus loves and respects him, and he has that position of cup-bearer, we cannot think of a fitter person to administer the poison.”

Eudemus said, "True, my lord, for free access and trust are two main aids."

Lygdus had access to the presence of Drusus Senior, and Drusus Senior trusted him.

"Skillful physician!" Sejanus said.

Livia said, "But he must be wrought and persuaded to the undertaking with some elaborate art."

"Is he ambitious?" Sejanus asked.

"No," Livia said.

"Or covetous?" Sejanus asked.

"Neither," Livia answered.

"Yet gold is a good general charm," Eudemus said.

"What is he, then?" Sejanus asked.

"Indeed, only wanton, light," Livia answered.

"What! Is he young? And fair?" Sejanus asked.

"He is a delicate youth," Eudemus answered.

Sejanus said: "Send him to me. I'll work on him."

He then worked on Livia:

"Royal lady, though I have loved you long, and with that height of zeal and duty (like the fire, which the more it mounts, the more it trembles), thinking nothing could add to the fervor that your eye had kindled, yet, now I see your wisdom, judgment, strength, quickness, and will to apprehend the means to your own good and greatness, I protest myself thoroughly purified, and I have turned into all flame because of my affection and love for you.

“Such a spirit as yours was not created to be the idle second, aka follower, to a poor flash — fop — as Drusus, but to shine bright as the moon among the lesser lights and share the sovereignty of all the world.

“Then Livia triumphs in her proper sphere, when she and her Sejanus shall divide the name of Caesar, and Augusta’s star should be dimmed by the glory of a brighter beam.

“At that time Agrippina’s fires will be quite extinct, and the scarcely seen Tiberius will borrow all his little light from us, whose folded arms — mutual embrace — shall make one perfect orb.”

Augusta was the mother of Tiberius, and Agrippina was the widow of Germanicus.

Knocking sounded on the door.

Sejanus said:

“Who’s that? Eudemus, look. Isn’t it Drusus Senior?”

“Lady, do not fear.”

“Not I, my lord,” Livia said. “My fear and love of him left me at once.”

Sejanus said, “Illustrious lady! Wait —”

Eudemus entered while saying to someone, “I’ll tell His Lordship.”

“Who is it, Eudemus?” Sejanus asked.

Eudemus answered, “One of Your Lordship’s servants, who brings you word that the Emperor Tiberius has sent for you.”

“Oh!” Sejanus said. “Where is he?”

He then said to Livia, “With your fair permission, dear princess. I’ll just ask a question, and return.”

He went out.

Eudemus said to Livia, “Fortunate princess! How you are blest in the fruition — the possession and enjoyment — of this unequalled man, this soul of Rome, the life of the Empire, and the voice of Caesar’s world!”

Livia responded, “So blessed, my Eudemus, as to know the bliss I have, with what I ought to owe the means — that is you, Eudemus — that wrought it. How do I look today?”

“Excellently clear, believe it,” Eudemus said. “This same fucus was well laid on.”

Fucus is a kind of face makeup.

“I think it is not white here,” Livia said, looking in a mirror.

“Lend me your scarlet cloth, lady,” Eudemus said. “It is the sun that has given some little taint unto the ceruse.”

Ceruse is white lead (or another foundation cream), used as a cosmetic. It was sensitive to light.

Painting her cheeks, Eudemus said, “You should have used some of the white oil I gave you.”

Eudemus was a cosmetician as well as a medical doctor.

He then said, “Sejanus, for your love! His very name commands above Cupid, or his shafts —”

The god Cupid shot arrows that caused people to fall in love, but according to Eudemus, Sejanus had more power than Cupid and his arrows.

“Nay, now you’ve made it worse,” Livia said.

Did her words refer only to the makeup?

Eudemus said:

“I’ll fix it right away —

“And, Sejanus’ name, just pronounced, is a sufficient charm against all rumor; and of absolute power to satisfy for any lady’s honor.”

Eudemus prepared more cosmetic.

“What are you doing now, Eudemus?” Livia asked.

Eudemus said:

“Making a light fucus, to give you a touch-up.

“Honored Sejanus! What act (though never so abnormal, and immoderate) exists but that a title will at least carry it off, if it does not expiate and atone for it?”

If you are a VIP like Sejanus is, you can get away with any act. So said Eudemus.

“Here, good physician,” Livia said.

Eudemus said:

“I like this undertaking to preserve the love of such a man, who does not come every hour to greet the world. It is now well, lady, that you should use some of the dentifrice I prescribed you, too, to clear and clean your teeth, and the prepared pomatum, to smooth the skin.”

A pomatum is a scented ointment for the skin.

“A lady cannot be too careful of her shape and beauty, who always would hold the heart of such a person, made her captive, as you have his — who, to endear him more in your clear eye, has put away his wife, the trouble and vexation of his bed and your delights, fair Apicata, and made spacious room to your new pleasures.”

One reason for Sejanus to divorce Apicata, his wife and the mother of his three children, and then marry Livia is that Livia was the sister of Germanicus, and Germanicus was the nephew and adopted son of Tiberius. Such a marriage could increase Sejanus' chances of becoming Emperor.

Livia responded, "Haven't we given Sejanus a sufficient return for that, with our hatred of Drusus Senior, and by revealing all of Drusus' secrets?"

Eudemus said:

"Yes, and wisely, lady.

"The ages that succeed and stand far off to gaze at your high prudence shall admire and reckon it an act beyond the comprehension of your sex. It has that rare — splendid and remarkable — appearance.

"Some will think your fortune could not yield a deeper sounding than mixed with Drusus Senior; but when they shall hear that and the thunder of Sejanus meet — Sejanus, whose high name strikes the stars, and rings about the concave — the vault of heaven — great Sejanus, whose glories, style, and titles are appropriate to himself, the often iterating of Sejanus — they then will lose their thoughts and be ashamed to take acquaintance of them."

Sejanus returned and said, "I must make a rude departure, lady. Caesar sends to me to come to him with all his haste both of command and prayer."

Hmm. It seems that Caesar's high name strikes the stars, and rings about the concave — the vault of heaven. It is certain that Sejanus quickly obeys Tiberius' command to come to him.

Sejanus continued saying to Livia, "Be resolute in our plot; you have my soul, as certainly yours as it is my body's."

He then said to Eudemus:

“And, wise physician, so prepare the poison in such a way that you may blame the subtle operation upon some natural disease of his.

“Send your eunuch to me.”

The poison Eudemus would prepare would be intended to make Drusus Senior’s death look as if it were due to natural causes.

Sejanus said to Livia, “I kiss your hands, glory of ladies, and I commend my love to your best faith and memory.”

Livia responded:

“My lord, I shall but repeat and return your words to you.

“Farewell.

“Yet, remember this for your heed: Drusus Senior does not love you. You know what I have told you: His designs and plans are full of grudge and danger.

“We must use more than a common speed.”

“Excellent lady, how you do set my blood on fire!” Sejanus said.

Livia said:

“Well, you must go?

“The thoughts that are best are least set forth to show.”

Sejanus exited.

“When will you take some medicine, lady?” Eudemus asked.

The medicine may be makeup.

“When I shall have a mind to, Eudemus,” Livia said, “but let Drusus’ drug be prepared first.”

Eudemus said:

“If Lygdus were prepared to act, that’s already done: I have it ready.

“And tomorrow morning I’ll send you a perfume, first to dissolve and procure sweat, and then prepare a bath to cleanse and clear the skin; in preparation for when, I’ll have an excellent new fucus made, resistant against the sun, the rain, or the wind, which you shall blow on your skin in powder form or rub on your skin after the powder is mixed with oil, as you like best, and the fucus will last some fourteen hours.

“This change came timely, lady, for your health, and for restoring your complexion, which Drusus’ choler — his hot anger — had almost burnt up. In this, your fortune has prescribed you better medicine than the medical art could do.”

Livia said:

“Thanks, good physician. I’ll use my fortune — you shall see — with reverence.

“Is my coach ready?”

Eudemus said, “It attends Your Highness.”

— 2.2 —

While waiting to see Tiberius, Sejanus said to himself:

“If this is not revenge, when I have finished and made it perfect, then let Egyptian slaves, Parthians, and barefoot Hebrews brand my face and print my body full of injuries.”

Sejanus then addressed Drusus Senior, who was not present, in an apostrophe:

“Thou lost thyself, child-prince Drusus, when thou thought thou could outskip my vengeance, or withstand the power I had to crush thee into air.”

Sejanus was using the word “thou” to contemptuously mean Drusus Senior.

Sejanus continued:

“Thy follies now shall taste what kind of man they have provoked, and this thy father’s house shall crack in the flame of my incensed and kindled rage whose fury shall admit no shame or moderation.

“Adultery? It is the lightest ill I will commit.”

Matthew 5:32 states, “But I say unto you, That whosoever shall put away his wife, saving for the cause of fornication, causeth her to commit adultery: and whosoever shall marry her that is divorced committeth adultery.” (King James Version)

Matthew 19:9 states, “And I say unto you, Whosoever shall put away his wife, except it be for fornication, and shall marry another, committeth adultery: and whoso marrieth her which is put away doth commit adultery.” (King James Version)

Mark 10:11-12 ((King James Version) states:

11. And he saith unto them, Whosoever shall put away his wife, and marry another, committeth adultery against her.

12. And if a woman shall put away her husband, and be married to another, she committeth adultery.

Sejanus had put away his wife, although she had not committed fornication.

Sejanus continued his apostrophe to Drusus Senior:

“A race of wicked acts shall flow out of my anger and overspread the world’s wide face, which no posterity shall ever approve, nor yet keep silent — things that for their cunning, close, and cruel mark, thy father — Tiberius — would wish his — and shall, perhaps, carry the empty name, but we the prize.”

“Emperor” can be an empty name if someone else has the power of an Emperor.

Sejanus then addressed his soul:

“Onward then, my soul, and don’t flinch and swerve from thy course. Though heaven drop sulphur — lightning — and hell belch out fire, laugh at the idle terrors.

“Tell proud Jove that between his power and thine there is no odds.

“It was only fear first in the world made gods.”

Tiberius and some attendants entered the room.

“Has Sejanus come yet?” Tiberius asked an attendant.

Sejanus said, “He’s here, dread Caesar.”

Tiberius sat on his throne and ordered his attendants, “Let all depart that chamber, and the next.”

He did not want this conversation to be overheard.

His attendants exited, leaving Tiberius and Sejanus alone.

The two would hold a Machiavellian conversation. Possibly, each person was trying to manipulate the other person.

Tiberius said to Sejanus:

“Sit down, my comfort.

“When the master prince of all the world, Sejanus, says he fears, is it not fatal?”

Tiberius was saying that he feared some people and he was asking, Isn't such a fear fatal?

His words, however, could be interpreted as saying that Sejanus was “the master prince of all the world.”

Sejanus answered, “Yes, to those whom the master prince fears.”

One way not to fear someone was to kill that person.

“And not to him?” Tiberius asked.

“Not if he wisely turns that part of fate he holds first on them,” Sejanus said.

“Nature, blood, and laws of kinship forbid that,” Tiberius said.

Killing relatives is unnatural and there are laws against murder.

“Do state policy and state concerns forbid it?” Sejanus asked.

State policy and state concerns are often cynical and cunning.

“No,” Tiberius said.

“Let the rest of poor scruples and considerations go by, then. Ignore them,” Sejanus said. “Statecraft is enough to make the act just, and it is enough to make them guilty.”

“Long hate pursues such acts,” Tiberius said.

Other people may — make that will — want to avenge an unjust killing.

“Whom hatred frightens, let him not dream on sovereignty,” Sejanus said.

Want to remain an Emperor? Kill your enemies, and don't worry about the hatred of the friends and family of those whom you kill.

“Are rites of faith, love, piety, to be trodden down?” Tiberius asked. “Forgotten? And made vain?”

What about love and morality? Should they be trodden down in the service of ambition?

Sejanus said:

“All of them should be, for a crown.”

He meant the crown of an Emperor, but a crown is also a piece of money.

Sejanus continued:

“The prince who is ashamed to bear the name of tyrant shall never dare do anything but fear.

“All the command of scepters quite perishes if command begins to cherish religious thoughts:

“Whole empires fall, swayed by those fine, delicate, fastidious respects.

“It is the lawlessness of dark deeds that protects even the most hated states, when no laws resist the sword, and the sword enacts what it wishes.”

If you wish to be an Emperor, be prepared to be called a tyrant and be prepared to do the things a tyrant does.

“Yet in that way we may do all things cruelly, not safely,” Tiberius said.

“We can do them safely if we do them thoroughly,” Sejanus said.

Tiberius asked, “Does Sejanus know yet at whom we point?”

Sejanus replied, “Aye, or else my thought, my sense, or both do err: Is it Agrippina?”

Agrippina was the widow of Germanicus and the granddaughter of Caesar Augustus.

“She, and her proud race,” Tiberius said.

He feared not only her, but some of her family members. Her sons could replace him as Emperor before his time.

Sejanus said, “Proud? They are dangerous, Caesar. For in them the father’s spirit quickly shoots up. Germanicus lives in their looks, their gait, their form, to upbraid us with his close — secretly arranged — death, if not to revenge the same.”

Tiberius was suspected of having arranged the death by poison of Germanicus, his nephew and adopted son.

“The act’s not known,” Tiberius said.

Tiberius was suspected, but there was no proof.

Sejanus said:

“The act’s not proved. But whispering rumor gives ‘knowledge and proof’ to the jealous — the suspicious — who, rather than admit their ignorance, would believe their own imagination.”

A proverb stated, “Jealousy is no judge — nor is suspicion proof.”

Sejanus continued:

“It is not safe for the children to draw long breath and live a long time, when they are provoked by a parent’s death.”

Aristotle’s Rhetoric, Book 1, ACT 15, section 14, states, “Foolish is he who, having killed the father, suffers the children to live.”

Aristotle was quoting from Cypria, a lost epic.

Tiberius said:

“It is as dangerous to make them hence,

If the only thing against them is that they are the children of a foe, then it would be dangerous to remove them.

Sejanus said, “Wait until they strike at Caesar: Then their crime will be enough, but late, and out of time for him to punish.”

The alternative would be to let them strike first, but then it will be too late — Tiberius will no longer be Emperor.

“Do they purpose it?” Tiberius said.

Do they intend to depose Tiberius?

Sejanus answered:

“You know, sir, thunder speaks not until it hits.”

Lightning strikes first, and then we hear the thunder. Light travels faster than sound.

Tiberius’ opponents can strike first, and after they strike, Tiberius will know the outcome.

Sejanus continued:

“Don’t be free from anxiety over your safety; none are more swiftly oppressed than they whom over-confidence betrays to rest.

“Let not your daring make your danger such.

“All power’s to be feared, where it is too much. The youths are, of themselves, hot, violent, full of great thought; and that male-spirited — ambitious — dame, their mother, Agrippina, neglects no means to promote their interests, by large allowance and approbation, public appearances, increase of train and state, suing for titles. She has them commended with like prayers, like vows, to the same gods, with Caesar.”

Tiberius became angry when the high priests added prayers for Nero and Drusus Senior — Agrippina’s two oldest sons — to those prayers said for himself.

Sejanus continued:

“Agrippina spends days and nights in banquets and ambitious feasts for the nobility, where Caius Silius, Titus Sabinus, old Arruntius, Asinius Gallus, Furnius, Regulus, and others of that discontented list are the prime guests.

“There, and to these, Agrippina tells whose niece [the Latin neptis, which Ben Jonson is translating, means ‘granddaughter’; in Ben Jonson’s day, the word ‘niece’ still meant ‘granddaughter’] she was, whose daughter she is, and whose wife she was.”

Agrippina was the granddaughter of Caesar Augustus, the daughter of Julia (Augustus’ daughter), and the wife — now widow — of Germanicus (Tiberius’ nephew and adopted son).

Sejanus continued:

“And then she insists that they compare her with Augusta, aye, and prefer her, too, commend her form, and extol her fruitfulness.”

Agrippina had three daughters and three sons. The three sons were Nero, Drusus Junior, and Caligula.

In mythology, Niobe was proud of her fruitfulness. She had given birth to six sons and six daughters, and she boasted aloud, “I am more worthy of respect than the goddess Leto, who has given birth to only two children: the twins Apollo and Artemis.” Leto’s children were angry at the disrespect shown to their mother, and with the anger of the gods, they killed all of Niobe’s children in one day by shooting them with arrows. Because of Niobe’s pride, Apollo and Diana turned her to stone. Even when she was stone, she grieved for the deaths of her children, and tears trickled down her marble cheeks. Niobe was so proud that she thought she was a better mother than the goddess mother of the god Apollo and the goddess Diana.

Sejanus continued:

“At which speech of hers, a shower of tears falls for the memory of Germanicus, a memory that they blow over and rekindle immediately with windy praise and puffing — puffed-up — hopes of her aspiring, ambitious sons, who, with these hourly gratifications, grow so pleased, and wantonly conceited of themselves that now they do not hesitate to believe they’re such as these flatterers give them out to be; and they would be thought to be — more than competitors — the immediate heirs to Tiberius.”

Tiberius’ Emperorship was not legally hereditary; however, certain people related to him were expected to succeed him.

Sejanus continued:

“While to their thirst of rule they win the rabble, who are always the friend of political change, with hope of future freedom, which on every political change, that rabble greedily, though emptily, expects.

“Caesar, it is age that in all things breeds neglects, and princes who will keep old dignity must not admit too youthful heirs to stand close by — not even their own descendants, except so darkly and humbly, because not in public, set as shadows are in picture, to give height and luster to the princes themselves.”

Using the royal plural, Tiberius said, “We will command their rank and haughty thoughts down, and, with a stricter hand than we have yet put forth, we must abate — reduce in size — their retinues, their titles, feasts, and factions.”

Sejanus said, “Or else your state — your power — will be abated. But how, sir, will you work?”

“Confine them,” Tiberius said. “Imprison them.”

Sejanus objected:

“No. They are too great and powerful, and that is too faint a blow to give them now. It would have served at first, when, with the weakest touch, their knot — their tight-knit group — had burst.”

A knot is a jumble of ropes. Sejanus may be comparing the knot of enemies to a nest of snakes.

Sejanus continued:

“But now your care and concern must be not to expose and reveal the smallest cord or line — the snares — of your suspicion. For such who know the weight of princes’ fear will, when they find themselves discovered, rear their forces, like seen snakes, which otherwise would lie rolled in their circles, close.

“Nothing is more wrathful, daring, or desperate than offenders who have been found out. Where guilt is, rage and courage both abound.

“The course must be to let them still swell up, riot, and surfeit on blind Fortune’s cup.”

Lady Fortune was often depicted as blindfolded and holding a cornucopia.

Sejanus continued:

“Give them more status and standing, more dignities, more style. Call them to court, to Senate.

“Meanwhile, take from their strength some one or two, or more of the main supporters and partisans — it will frighten the rest — when you have some incidental pretext or side opportunity.

“Thus, with slight sleight you shall disarm them first, and they, in night of — that is, blinded by — their ambition, shall not perceive the lure until, in the trap, they are caught and slain.”

Tiberius said:

“We would not kill them if we knew how to save.

“Yet, rather than a throne, it is cheaper to give them a grave.”

He then asked:

“Is there no way to bind them by deserts?”

In other words: Is there any way to bind them in loyalty to me by giving them rewards? Can’t I do things that deserve their gratitude?

Sejanus said:

“Sir, wolves do change their hair, but not their hearts. While thus your thought is tied to a mean, you neither dare enough, nor act with foresight.”

Sejanus was arguing against a middle course on the grounds that it meant not being brave enough and not having foresight enough.

Sejanus continued:

“All modesty is fond; that is, all moderation is foolish. And chiefly where the subject is no less compelled to bear than praise his sovereign’s acts.”

Tyrants should be tyrants: They need not observe moderation.

Tiberius said:

“We can no longer keep on our mask to thee, our dear Sejanus.

“Thy thoughts are ours, in all things, and we just tested your thoughts’ voice, in our designs, which thou has more confirmed us by thy assenting than if heartening Jove had, from his hundred statues, bid us strike, and at the stroke clicked all his marble thumbs.”

Tiberius was saying that he had tested Sejanus, and finding that their thoughts were in accord, he would now speak openly to him.

Many marble statues were erected to Jove, aka Jupiter, King of the gods. Imagine Jove’s marble thumbs clicking as he judged thumbs-down to all of Tiberius’ enemies. In today’s popular opinion, thumbs-down in gladiatorial contests meant death.

The thumbs-down sign, however, may mean something different.

Turnebus, in his Turnebi adversariorum tomi (1591), a book in Ben Jonson's library, wrote, "To hold the thumb down was, among the Romans, a sign of the greatest approbation." Using this interpretation of the thumbs-down sign, Jupiter would be expressing approval of the working together of Tacitus and Sejanus.

Tiberius continued:

"But who shall first be struck down?"

Sejanus advised:

"First, Caius Silius. He is the most outstanding and most remarkable, and the most dangerous: In power and in reputation, he is equally strong, having commanded an imperial army seven years together, vanquished Sacrovir in Germany, and thence obtained the right to wear the triumphal ornaments."

A triumph — a triumphal procession in Rome — was at this time reserved for the royal family, but victorious generals could be given and wear triumphal ornaments — devices and clothing — that conferred honor on them.

Sejanus continued:

"His steep fall, by how much it does give the weightier crack of sound, will send more wounding terror to the rest, and command them to stand aloof and give more way to our ambushing of the principal actor."

Tiberius asked, "But what about Sabinus?"

Sejanus advised:

"Let him grow a while; his fate is not yet ripe. We must not pluck at all together, lest we catch ourselves.

"And there's Arruntius, too; he only talks.

“But Sosia, Silius’ wife, a friend to Agrippina, should be wound in and ensnared now, for she has one Fury in her breast more than hell ever knew; and she should be sent thither — to hell — in time.

“Then there is one Cremutius Cordus, a writing fellow they have got to gather notes of the precedent times and make them into annals — a most tart and bitter spirit, I hear, who, under color — pretense — of praising those precedent times, taxes and accuses the present state, criticizes the men, the actions, leaves no trick, no practice unexamined, draws parallels between the times and the governments. He is a professed champion for the old liberty —”

Tiberius interrupted:

“— a perishing, destructive wretch!

“As if there were that chaos bred in things that laws and liberty would not rather choose to be quite broken and taken hence by us than to have the stain of disgrace to be preserved by such men as the Germanicans.

“Have we the means to make these guilty first?”

Did they have evidence — real or trumped up — to make these people either known to be guilty or seem to be guilty?

Sejanus said:

“Entrust that to me.

“Let Caesar, by his power, just call and cause a formal meeting of the Senate, and I will have substance — evidence or ‘evidence’ — for an indictment and I will have accusers ready.”

“But how?” Tiberius said. “Let us consult.”

Sejanus replied:

“We shall misspend the time of action. We should take action rather than talk now.”

A proverb stated: “Take not counsel in time of combat.”

Sejanus continued:

“Counsels are unfit in business, where all rest is more pernicious than rashness can be. Acts of this close kind thrive more by execution than by advice and consultation.

“There is no lingering in that work begun,

“Which cannot be praised until thoroughly done.”

Tiberius replied:

“Our edict shall forthwith command a Senate court of adjudication. While I can live, I will prevent earth’s fury.

“Εμου θανοντος γαια μιχθητω πυρι.”

The Greek, translated by W.R. Paton, means, “When I am dead, may earth be overwhelmed with fire.”

Tiberius exited.

Postumus entered the scene.

Julius Postumus, who was one of Sejanus’ supporters, knew Agrippina well. He was a spy for Sejanus.

He began, “My lord Sejanus —”

“Julius Postumus, come with my wish!” Sejanus said. “I was just wishing for you! What is the news from Agrippina’s household?”

“Indeed, there is none,” Postumus said. “The members of Agrippina’s household all lock up themselves late, and they talk in code. I have not seen a company so changed. Perhaps they had intelligence by augury of our scheming.”

Perhaps a fortune teller had told them about Sejanus' plot, which included Postumus.

"When were you there?" Sejanus asked.

"Last night," Postumus said.

"And what guests did you find there?" Sejanus asked

Postumus answered, "Sabinus, Silius — the old list — Arruntius, Furnius, and Gallus."

"Wouldn't these talk?" Sejanus asked.

"They talked only a little, and yet we offered them their choice of topic," Postumus said. "Satrius was with me."

Satrius was a client of Sejanus.

"Well, their often meeting is guilt enough," Sejanus said. "You forgot to extol the hospitable lady?"

"To extol" means "to raise too high" and "to exaggeratively praise."

People bursting with pride may say things that they would not otherwise say.

Postumus answered, "No, that trick was well put fully to use, and it would have succeeded, too, except that Sabinus coughed a caution out, for Agrippina began to swell with pride."

Sejanus said:

"And may she burst!

"Julius Postumus, I would have you go instantly to the palace of the great Augusta, and, by your kindest friend, get swift access.

“Acquaint her with these meetings. Tell her the words of Silius that you brought me, the other day. Add somewhat to them. Make her understand the danger of Sabinus, and the danger of the times, out of his secretiveness. Attribute to Arruntius words of malice against Caesar; the same, attribute to Gallus. But, above all, attribute words of malice against Caesar to Agrippina.

“Say, as you may truly, that Agrippina’s infinite pride, propped with the hopes of her too-fruitful womb, with the devotion of the people opens her mouth wide to swallow sovereignty and have absolute power, and threatens Caesar.

“Stress to Augusta, then, that for her own, great Caesar’s, and the public safety, she should stress to Tiberius the urgency of these dangers.

“Caesar is too over-confident, he must be told, and he’ll take it best from a mother’s tongue.

“Alas! What is it for us to sound and investigate, to explore, watch, oppose, plot, practice, or prevent,

“If he for whom it is so strongly labored shall, out of greatness and free spirit, be supinely negligent?

“Our city’s now divided as it was in time of the civil war, and men don’t stop themselves from declaring themselves a part of Agrippina’s faction.”

Civil wars had occurred: one between Julius Caesar and Pompey, and one between Mark Antony/Octavian and Brutus/Cassius. Octavian had then fought Mark Antony. After becoming Emperor, Octavian became Caesar Augustus.

Sejanus continued:

“Every day the faction multiplies, and it will do more if it is not resisted. You can best enlarge and embroider it as you find suitable for your audience.

“Noble Postumus, commend me to your Prisca, and request that she will solicit this great business to earnest and most present execution, with all her utmost credit with Augusta.”

Prisca was a woman with whom Postumus was committing adultery. Prisca was close to Augusta.

“I shall not fail in my instructions,” Postumus said.

He exited.

Alone, Sejanus said to himself:

“This assistance from Augusta, Tiberius’ mother, will well urge our recent design and plot, and spur on Caesar’s rage, which otherwise might grow slack.

“The way to put a prince in an alert state of full vigor is to present the shapes of dangers greater than they are, like late or early shadows of the evening or morning, and, sometimes, to feign dangers where there are none, only to make him fear.

“His fear will make him cruel; and once entered into cruelty, he does not easily learn to stop, or spare where he may doubt.

“This have I made my rule, to thrust Tiberius into tyranny, and make him toil to turn aside those blocks and obstacles that I, working alone, could not remove with safety.

“Drusus Senior once gone, Germanicus’ three sons would clog my way, but their guards have too much faith to be corrupted, and their mother is known to have too, too unproved a chastity to be attempted and seduced, as light Livia was.”

Sejanus wanted to get rid of Drusus Senior and of Agrippina’s three sons (fathered by Germanicus) because they were ahead of him in the expected line of succession to the throne. Her servants, however, were too loyal and honest to be bribed, and Agrippina was a completely chaste woman who could not be seduced.

Sejanus continued:

“I will work then my art on Caesar’s fears, as they work on those they fear, until all my obstacles be cleared, and he buries his own state and high position in the ruins of his family and the hatred of all his subjects.”

Sejanus wanted to make Tiberius and Agrippina fear each other.

Sejanus continued:

“Then, with my peace and safety, I will rise by making him the public sacrifice.”

Sejanus exited.

— 2.3 —

Satrius and Natta talked together in the house of Agrippina. Both men were clients of Sejanus, who was their patron.

Satrius said, “The Germanicans have grown exceedingly circumspect and wary.”

As Postumus had said, the Germanicans had grown cautious.

“They have us in the wind — they smell us,” Natta said. “And yet Arruntius cannot contain himself and restrain his tongue.”

Arruntius was a Senator of good character.

“Tut, he’s not yet sought after and desired,” Satrius said. “There are others more desired, who are more silent.”

That is, more desired to be gotten rid of.

Those others were Silius and Sabinus.

“Here he comes,” Natta said. “Away! Let’s leave!”

Satrius and Natta exited the scene just as Sabinus, Arruntius, and Cordus entered the scene.

Seeing Satrius and Natta leaving, Sabinus asked Arruntius and Cordus, “How is it that these beagles haunt the house of Agrippina?”

In Ben Jonson’s society, being called a beagle was an insult.

Arruntius said, “Oh, they hunt, they hunt. There is some game here lodged, which they must rouse, to make the great ones sport.”

Cordus asked, “Did you observe how they inveighed against Caesar?”

Arruntius said, “Aye, baits, baits for a trap for us to bite at. If I were to have my flesh torn by the public hook, these qualified hangmen should be my company.”

The corpses of executed criminals were dragged with a hook — the uncus — to the Gemoniae, aka Gemonian stairs, a flight of stairs in a corner of the Roman Forum, and displayed for three days. They were then dragged to the Tiber River and either left on the river bank or thrown into the river.

Sejanus wanted his obstacles to be executed and treated in this way.

“Here comes another,” Cordus said.

Afer the orator walked by them and then exited.

Arruntius said:

“Aye, there’s a man — Afer the orator!”

“He is one who has phrases, figures of speech, and metaphorical fine flowers to strew his rhetoric with, and he is in a hurry to get himself a notable reputation or name by any proposal or opportunity where blood or gain are objects. He steeps his words, when he would kill, in artificial tears — he is the crocodile of Tiber!

“Him I love, that man is mine. He has my heart, and voice, when I would curse, he, he!”

Arruntius loved to curse Afer the orator.

“Afer” means “African,” and crocodiles come from Africa.

Sabinus said:

“Contemn and heap scorn on the slaves;

“Their present lives will be their future graves.”

Sabinus, Arruntius, and Cordus exited.

— 2.4 —

Silius, Agrippina, Nero, and Sosia talked together.

Sosia was Silius’ wife. She was also a friend to Agrippina.

Nero was Agrippina’s oldest son. If Drusus Senior, Tiberius’ son, were to die, Nero would be expected to become Emperor when Tiberius died.

Silius said to Agrippina, “May it please Your Highness not to forget yourself — I dare not, without detriment to my manners, trouble you farther.”

“Farewell, noble Silius,” Agrippina said.

“Most royal princess,” Silius replied.

“Sosia stays with us?” Agrippina asked.

“She is your servant, and she owes Your Grace an honest but unprofitable love,” Silius said.

“How can that be, when there’s no gain but virtue’s?” Agrippina asked.

Silius replied:

“You take the moral, not the politic sense.

“I meant, as she is bold, and free of speech, earnest to utter what her zealous thought labors with, in honor of your house, which act, as it is simply born in her and done without calculation, partakes of love and honesty, but may, by the over-often and untimely use, turn to your loss and danger — for your state and high rank is waited on by as many envies as there are eyes; and every second guest your tables take is a paid-for spy, to observe who goes, who comes, what conference you have, with whom, where, when, what the discourse is, what the looks, the thoughts of every person there, and they take these things out of context, and make a different substance out of it.”

Sosia was honest but outspoken, and her being outspoken was politically dangerous to Agrippina when spies were watching her and her household and were willing to misinterpret words to put Agrippina and her associates in the worst possible light.

Agrippina said:

“Hear me, Silius.

“If all Tiberius’ body were stuck with eyes, and every wall and hanging in my house as transparent as this fine linen I wear, or as transparent as air; yea, and if Sejanus had both his ears as long as to reach into my inmost private room, I would hate to whisper any thought, or change an act, even to be made Juno’s rival.

“Virtue’s forces show always noblest in conspicuous courses of action.”

According to Virgil’s Aeneid: “Rumor has wings and many feathers. Her many eyes never sleep, and she has many tongues and many ears. By night she flies, and by day she watches and listens. She values lies as much as she values truths.”

Juno was the wife of Jupiter, King of the gods, and so she was Queen of the gods. One kind of rival of hers would be someone who wanted to be Queen. Another kind of rival would be someone who wanted to sleep with her husband.

Juno was a jealous wife with an often-adulterous husband, and she hated her sex rivals and often punished them. For example, she punished Io, one of the many mortal women with whom Jupiter slept, by changing her into a cow. One of Juno’s servants was Argus Panoptes, who had one hundred eyes, which never slept all at the same time. He was given the job of always keeping an eye on Io, so that she could not be rescued. Jupiter sent Mercury, the swift messenger of the god, to charm Argus asleep and then kill him. After the act was performed, Jupiter changed Io back into a human woman.

Apollo was once challenged to a music contest by a satyr. Midas judged the contest, and he declared that the satyr had won the contest. Angry, Apollo gave Midas donkey ears. Midas kept his long ears hidden; no one knew about them except his barber, who was forbidden to tell anyone Midas’ secret. The barber, wanting to tell the secret, dug a hole in the ground, whispered the secret into the hole, and then filled it up again. Reeds grew in that spot, and when wind blew through the reeds, they whispered, “Midas has the ears of an ass.” Soon, everyone knew the secret.

Agrippina was a strong woman who did not want to restrict her freedom of speech and of actions in order to be safe.

Silius responded:

“It is great, and bravely spoken, like the spirit of Agrippina; yet Your Highness knows that there is neither loss nor shame in careful foresight.

“Few can do what all should do: Beware enough.

“You may perceive with what officious and eagerly attentive face Satrius and Natta, Afer and the rest, visit your house recently, to inquire the secrets, and with what bold and privileged art they rail against Augusta, yea, and at Tiberius, tell tricks of Livia, and Sejanus, all to excite and call your indignation on, so that they might hear it at more liberty.”

The confederates of Sejanus were deliberately speaking in such a way that could get Agrippina overly emotional and cause her to say things that she would not say if she were calm. She could be overly emotional because of anger or because of pride.

In his conversation with Sejanus, Postumus had spoken of an attempt to make Agrippina overly emotional with excessive praise. Sabinus, however, had put a stop to it.

“You’re too suspicious, Silius,” Agrippina said.

Silius responded:

“I pray to the gods that I am so, Agrippina, but I fear some subtle intrigue.

“They who dared to strike at so example-less — unparalleled — and unblamed a life as that of the renowned Germanicus will not rest content with that exploit alone.

“He who has injured one person, threatens many.”

Nero, Agrippina's oldest son, said, "It would be best to rip out their tongues, sear and burn out their eyes, when next they come."

"That is a fit reward for spies," Sosia said.

Drusus Junior, Agrippina's middle son, entered the room and said, "Have you heard the rumor?"

"What rumor?" Agrippina asked.

"Drusus Senior is dying," Drusus Junior said.

Drusus Senior was the son of Tiberius. "Drusus Senior" means "Drusus the Older," and "Drusus Junior" means "Drusus the Younger." After the boys' father, Germanicus, had died, however, Tiberius had given the boys into the care of his — Tiberius' — son: Drusus Senior.

"Dying?" Agrippina said.

"That's strange!" Nero said.

"You were with him last night," Agrippina said.

Drusus Junior said, "Someone met Eudemus the physician who was sent for just now. Eudemus thinks that Drusus Senior cannot live."

Silius said, "Thinks? If he has arrived at that opinion, he knows, or no one knows."

"This is quick!" Agrippina said. "What is said to be his disease?"

Silius said quietly to himself, "Poison, poison —"

Hearing him, but not clearly, Agrippina said, "What, Silius!"

"What's that?" Nero asked.

“Nay, nothing,” Silius said. “There was, recently, a certain blow given on the face.”

“Aye, to Sejanus?” Nero asked.

“True,” Silius said.

“And what of that?” Drusus Junior asked.

“I’m glad I’m not the person who gave Sejanus that blow,” Silius said.

“But there is something else?” Nero asked.

Silius answered, “Yes, private meetings, with a great lady, at a physician’s, and a wife turned away and divorced —”

“Ha!” Nero said.

“Trifles, mere trifles,” Silius said.

He was unwilling to clearly state what he believed was the truth.

He then asked, “What wisdom’s now in the streets? What’s in the common mouth?”

Drusus Junior said, “Fears, whisperings, tumults, noise, I don’t know what. They say the Senate is meeting.”

“I’ll go there, immediately, and see what’s in the forge,” Silius said. “I’ll see what’s cooking.”

“Good Silius, do,” Agrippina said. “Sosia and I will go in.”

Silius said:

“Make haste, my lords, to visit the sick prince. Tender your loves and sorrows to the people.

“This Sejanus, trust my divining soul, has plots on all;

“No tree that stops his view but must fall.”

In other words, Sejanus was out to get rid of everyone who stood between him and his becoming Emperor.

Everyone exited.

At this point in Ben Jonson's play, a Chorus of Musicians performed.

— 3.1 —

Heralds, Lictors, Varro, Sejanus, Latiaris, Cotta, and Afer entered the Senate.

In meetings of the Senators, the Heralds were criers.

Lictors held the fascēs — a bundle of rods and an axe that served as a symbol of power — as they preceded magistrates through the streets.

Varro was one of the current Consuls. His father and Silius had been enemies, and Varro was hostile toward Silius. In this society, that animus, aka hostility, was a sign that Varro's motives were honest.

Latiaris was a supporter of Sejanus.

Cotta was a man without scruples.

Sejanus said to Varro:

“It is only you who must make the case against Silius, Varro. Neither I nor Caesar may appear therein, except in your defense, who are the Consul, and under the color — the pretense — of late enmity between your father and his [actually, should be him — Silius, not Silius' father], may better do it, as free from all suspicion of a plot and machination.”

He handed Varro some notes and then continued:

“Here are your notes, showing you what points to touch on. Read them. Be cunning in them. Afer has them, too.”

“But is he — Silius — summoned to come to the Senate for trial?” Varro asked.

“No,” Sejanus said. “It was considered by Caesar and concluded as most fitting to take him unprepared.”

Afer added, “And prosecute all under the name of treason.”

“I understand,” Varro said.

Sabinus, Gallus, Lepidus, and Arruntius entered the scene and conferred privately. They were Germanicans.

Gallus was the husband of Vipsania, who had been Tiberius’ first wife.

Like Arruntius, Lepidus was a Senator of integrity.

Sabinus said, “His son, Drusus Senior, being dead, Caesar will not be here.”

“What should the business of this Senate be?” Gallus asked.

Arruntius said:

“That is something the subtle whisperers can tell you. We, who are the good-dull-noble lookers-on, are called on only to keep the marble benches warm.

“What should we do with those deep mysteries, proper to these fine heads? Let them alone.

“Our ignorance may, perchance, help us be saved from whips and Furies.”

Furies, who were often depicted holding a whip of scorpions in one hand and a torch in the other, were avenging spirits from the Land of the Dead. They especially punished those who killed relatives.

“See, see, see, their action and operation!” Gallus said.

The Germanicans watched the followers of Sejanus in action and commented on what they saw. No followers of Sejanus overheard them.

Arruntius said, "Aye, now their heads do travail, now they work. Their faces run like shuttles used in weaving; they are weaving some skillfully intricate cobweb to catch flies."

"Watch," Sabinus said. "They take their places."

"What, so low!" Arruntius said.

The Senators were sitting on lower benches, not in their usual higher benches, as a sign of mourning for the death of Drusus Senior.

"Oh, yes," Gallus said. "They must be seen to flatter Caesar's grief, though but in sitting."

Varro said to the Heralds, "Bid silence for us. Bring the Senate to order."

"Silence!" the First Herald shouted.

Varro said, "Fathers conscript, may this our present meeting turn fair and fortunate to the commonwealth."

"Fathers conscript" are Senators.

Silius and some other Senators entered the scene.

"Look, Silius enters," Sejanus said.

"Hail, grave fathers!" Silius said.

A Lictor said loudly:

"Stand! Stay where you are!

"Silius, forbear thy place. Don't sit among the Senators."

The Senators, surprised, said, "What!"

The First Herald said, "Silius, stand forth. The Consul Varro has to charge thee."

A Lictor shouted, “Make way for Caesar! Make room for Caesar!”

Arruntius said to Sabinus, “Has he come, too? In that case, then, expect a trick.”

Sabinus replied, “Silius accused? Surely he will answer nobly.”

Tiberius and some attendants entered the scene.

Because his son, Drusus Senior, had just died, Tiberius had not been expected to show up in the Senate. Tiberius was showing that he was made of sterner stuff. He also would say that he expected the Senators not to allow themselves to droop because of the death of Drusus Senior.

Tiberius said:

“We stand amazed, fathers, to behold this general dejection. For what reason sit Rome’s Consuls thus weeping, as if they had lost all the remembrance both of style and place?

“It is not becoming.”

As a sign of grieving, the Senators were not sitting in their usual places of high honor.

Tiberius continued:

“No woes are of fit weight to make the honor of the Empire stoop —

“Though I, in my private self, may meet just reprehension, that so suddenly, and in so fresh a grief following the death of Drusus Senior, would greet the Senate, when private tongues of kinsmen and allies, inspired with comforts, loathly are endured, the face of men not seen, and scarcely the day, to thousands who communicate our loss.”

Tiberius acknowledged that he could be criticized for showing up in the Senate after the death of his son, while thousands of others would communicate and share their grief at the kind of loss he had suffered by loathly enduring seeing other men and hearing their comforting words and by scarcely even enduring the sight of day.

Tiberius continued:

“Nor can I accuse these people of weakness, since they take but natural ways, yet I must seek for stronger aids and draw out those fair helps from warm embraces of the commonwealth — the Roman people.

“Our mother, great Augusta, is old and struck with time, ourself impressed with aged characters — the marks of time.

Drusus Senior had two children who lived to adulthood: Livia Julia and Tiberius Julius Caesar Nero Gemellus, who was co-heir with Caligula. When Tiberius died in 37 C.E., Caligula either had Drusus Senior’s son killed or forced him to kill himself.

A meeting of the Senate took place in 23 C.E., after the death of Drusus Senior. The trial of Silius took place in 24 C.E. The trial of Cordus took place in 25 C.E. Ben Jonson conflated these three events into this one event you are reading about now. Such telescoping of time is common in history plays of the time.

Tiberius continued:

“Our aims must now reflect on and consider those who may give timely succor to these present ills and are our only glad-surviving hopes: the noble issue of Germanicus: Nero and Drusus Junior.

“Might it please the Consul to bring them in with honor — they both wait outside this meeting place —

“I would present them to the Senate’s care and raise those suns — and sons — of joy, which should drink up these floods of sorrow in your drowned eyes.”

Arruntius said to Sabinus, “By Jove, I am not Oedipus enough to understand this Sphinx.”

The Sphinx is a mythological creature with the head of a woman and the body of a lion. In Sophocles’ tragedy Oedipus Rex, the Sphinx asks Oedipus this riddle: What goes on four legs in the morning, two legs at noon, and three legs in the evening? If Oedipus cannot answer this riddle correctly, the Sphinx will kill him. Fortunately, Oedipus does answer the riddle correctly: Man, who goes on hands and knees as a crawling baby, two legs as a healthy adult, and two legs and a cane as an old person.

Sabinus replied, “The princes come.”

Nero and Drusus Junior and some attendants entered the scene.

Tiberius said to Nero and Drusus Junior:

“Approach, noble Nero, noble Drusus Junior.”

Tiberius then said to the Senators:

“These princes, fathers, when their parent died, I gave to their uncle, with this prayer:

“That, though he’d proper, legitimate, and admirable children of his own, he would bring up and foster these boys no less than he would bring up that self-blood — his own children — and by that act confirm their worths to him and to posterity.”

When Germanicus had died, Tiberius had given his — Germanicus' — boys, Nero and Drusus Junior, into the care of their uncle: Drusus Senior. But now Drusus Senior had died.

Drusus Senior and the boys' father, Germanicus, had been step-brothers. Germanicus was the nephew of Tiberius, who adopted him. Tiberius will call Germanicus Augustus' nephew, but Ben Jonson's society used the word "nephew" loosely. Germanicus was Augustus' great-nephew.

Tiberius continued speaking to the Senators:

"Drusus Senior having died and been taken away from here, I turn my prayers to you, Senators, and, before our country and our gods, I beseech you to take, and rule, Augustus' nephew's sons — the sons of Germanicus — sprung of the noblest ancestors; and so accomplish and fulfill both my duty and your own."

Tiberius then said:

"Nero and Drusus Junior, these Senators shall be to you in place of parents, these Senators shall be your fathers, these shall be, and not unfitly; for you are so born as all your good or ill is the commonwealth's."

Tiberius said to the Senators:

"Receive them, you strong guardians."

Tiberius prayed to the gods:

"And, blest gods, make all their actions answer to their bloods.

"Let their great titles find increase by them, and let they not find increase by titles. Set them, as in place and rank, so in example, above all the Romans, and may they know no rivals but themselves.

“Let Fortune give them nothing they don’t deserve but attend upon their virtue — and let virtue always come forth greater than hope, and better than their fame.”

Tiberius said to the Senators:

“Relieve and support me, fathers, with your general and collective voice.”

The Senators answered, “May all the gods consent to Caesar’s wish, and add to any honors that may crown the hopeful issue — promising children — of Germanicus!”

Tiberius said, “We thank you, reverend fathers, on their behalf.”

Tiberius had said all the right words regarding Germanicus’ children.

Arruntius, Sabinus, and Gallus, seated together, whispered among themselves.

Arruntius said, “If this were true now! But the space, the space between the breast and lips — Tiberius’ heart lies a thought farther than another man’s.”

Arruntius believed that there was a difference between Tiberius’ private thoughts and his public words.

Tiberius said:

“My comforts are so flowing in my joys as, in them, all my streams of grief are lost, no less than are land waters in the sea, or showers in rivers, although their cause was such as might have sprinkled even the gods with tears.

“Yet since the greater does embrace the less, we covetously — eagerly — obey.”

Tiberius was not crying. His comforts — the Senators' support of Nero and Drusus Junior — outweighed his grief. So said Tiberius.

“Well acted, Caesar,” Arruntius said.

Tiberius said:

“And now I am the happy witness made of your so-much-desired affections to this great issue, Nero and Drusus Junior, I could wish the Fates would here set a peaceful period — end — to my days.

The three Fates determined the length of mortal lives. Clotho spun the thread of life, Lachesis measured it, and Atropos cut it. When a mortal's thread of life was cut, the mortal died.

Tiberius continued:

“However, to my labors, I entreat, and beg some fit ease of this Senate.”

“Laugh, fathers, laugh!” Arruntius said. “Have you no spleens about you?”

In Ben Jonson's time, the spleen was regarded as the source of laughter — and of melancholy.

Tiberius now spoke about his desire or supposed desire to delegate his authority to others and so lessen the burden that rested on his own shoulders:

“The burden is too heavy that I sustain on my unwilling shoulders; and I pray that it may be taken off, and conferred from me to the Consuls, or some other Roman, more able and more worthy than I.”

“Laugh on, still,” Arruntius said.

“Why, this renders suspect all the rest!” Sabinus said.

“It poisons all,” Gallus said.

“Oh, do you taste — perceive — it then?” Arruntius said.

“It takes away my faith in anything that he shall hereafter speak,” Sabinus said.

They did not believe that Tiberius wished to delegate authority. Not believing that, they did not believe what Tiberius had said earlier about the care of Germanicus’ children — nor would they believe whatever Tiberius would say hereafter.

Arruntius said, “Aye, to pray for that which would be to his head as hot as thunder — against which he wears that charm — should but the court receive him at his word.”

According to Suetonius, Tiberius was afraid of thunder and lightning and wore a laurel wreath during lightning storms because of a folk belief that laurel was a protection against lightning.

“Hear!” Gallus shouted.

Gallus wanted everyone to pay attention to and listen to Tiberius.

Tiberius said, “For myself, I know my weakness, and I so little covet — like some others gone past — the weight that will oppress me. My ambition is the counterpoint.”

Ambition was the counterpoint — the opposite — to what Tiberius said he really wanted: seclusion.

Rather than power and responsibility, Tiberius was saying that he wanted peace, quiet, and seclusion.

“Finely maintained,” Arruntius said. “It is good still.”

Sejanus said, “But Rome, whose blood, whose nerves, whose life, whose very frame relies on Caesar’s strength, no less than heaven relies on Atlas, cannot admit it except with general ruin.”

Atlas held up the sky on his shoulders.

Allowing Tiberius to go into seclusion would ruin Rome. So said Sejanus.

Arruntius said about Sejanus, “Ah! Are you there, to bring him off and aid and rescue him?”

And take his place? And then ruin Rome?

Sejanus said, “Let Caesar no more, then, urge a point so contrary to Caesar’s greatness, the grieved Senate’s vows, or Rome’s necessity.”

Sejanus was saying that Tiberius ought not to go into seclusion.

“He comes about,” Gallus said.

“More nimbly than Vertumnus,” Arruntius said.

Vertumnus was the god of seasons, and of changes.

Tiberius said:

“For the benefit of the public, I may be persuaded to show I can neglect all private aims, although I desire my rest.

“But if the Senate still commands me to serve, I must be glad to practice my obedience.”

“You must, and will, sir,” Arruntius said. “We do know it.”

In other words: You, Tiberius, will continue to be Emperor. All these words that you are speaking now are part of an act.

The Senators shouted:

“Caesar!

“Live long, and happy, great and royal Caesar!

“The gods preserve thee, and thy modesty [your moderation], thy wisdom, and thy innocence!”

“Where is it?” Arruntius said. “The prayer’s made before the subject.”

Arruntius was saying that the Senators were praying for the preservation of qualities that Tiberius did not have. If he did not have them, how could they be preserved?

The Senators shouted, “Guard his meekness, Jove, his piety, his care, his bounty —”

Arruntius said quietly, “And his tricky subtlety, I’ll put in — yet he’ll keep that himself, without the help of the gods. All prayers are vain for him.”

Tiberius said:

“We will not hold your patience, fathers, with long answer, but shall still contend to be what you desire, and work to satisfy so great a hope.

“Proceed to your affairs.”

The trial of Silius was about to begin.

Afer came forward.

“Now, Silius, guard thee,” Arruntius said. “The curtain’s drawing. Something’s about to happen. Afer advances.”

The First Herald shouted, “Silence!”

“Cite Caius Silius,” Afer said.

“Caius Silius!” the First Herald shouted.

Silius came forward and said, “Here.”

Afer began his speech by mentioning a revolt led by Julius Sacrovir of the Aedui in Gaul in 21 C.E., a revolt that Silius, then the governor of upper Germany, had put down with two Roman legions.

Afer said:

“The triumph that thou had in Germany for thy recent victory over Sacrovir, thou have enjoyed so freely, Caius Silius, that no man maliciously envied thee it; nor would Caesar or Rome permit and allow that thou would be then defrauded of any honors that thy deserts could claim in the fair service of the commonwealth.

“But now, if after all their loves and graces, thy actions and their courses being discovered and made known, it shall appear to Caesar, and this Senate, thou have defiled those glories with thy crimes —”

Silius interrupted, “ — crimes?”

“Patience, Silius,” Afer said.

Silius replied:

“Tell thy mule about patience! I am a Roman.

“What are my crimes? Proclaim them.

“Am I too rich? Too honest for the times? Have I treasure, jewels, land, or houses that some informer gapes for?”

People could bring unjustified charges against someone in the hope that the accused person’s property would be seized and the accuser would get a part of it. These people’s mouths gape — open wide — with greed.

Silius continued:

“Is my strength too much to be admitted? Or my knowledge?

“These now are crimes.”

Afer said, “Silius, if the name of crime makes you so angry and irritates thee, with what impotence — inability to defend yourself, and inability to restrain your passions — will thou endure the matter to be searched?”

Silius replied:

“I tell thee, Afer, with more scorn than fear: Employ your mercenary — hired — tongue and art.

“Where’s my accuser?”

Varro came forward and said, “Here.”

Arruntius said, “Varro? The Consul? Is he thrust in the plot?”

Varro said:

“It is I who accuse thee, Silius.

“Against the majesty of Rome and Caesar, I do pronounce and declare thee here a guilty cause and guilty agent, first, of beginning and occasioning, and next, of drawing out the war in Gallia, for which thou recently enjoyed a triumph in Germany.

“Thou falsely pretended a long time that Sacrovir was an enemy, only to make thy provisions and revenue for fighting the war from the state more, while thou, and thy wife Sosia, plundered the province.

“Wherein, with sordid-base desire of gain, thou have discredited thy actions’ worth and been a traitor to the state.”

According to Varro, Silius had done good service in defeating Sacrovir, but he had made the war last longer than it needed to in order to get money from Rome to fight the war. Also, Silius and his wife had plundered Gaul, where the war took place.

“Thou lie,” Silius said.

“I thank thee, Silius,” Arruntius said quietly. “Speak so still, and often.”

Varro said to Tiberius, “If I do not prove my allegations, Caesar, but unjustly have called Silius into trial, here I bind myself to suffer what I claim against him, and yield to have what I have spoken confirmed by judgment of the court, and all good men.”

Silius said to Tiberius, “Caesar, I crave to have my case deferred until this man’s Consulship is over.”

Tiberius said, “We cannot, nor may we grant it.”

“Why?” Silius asked. “Shall he appoint my day of trial? Shall he impeach me? Is he my accuser? And must he be my judge?”

Tiberius said:

“It has been usual, and it is a right that custom has allowed the magistrate, to call forth private men and to appoint their day.

“This privilege we may not in the Consul see infringed, by whose deep watches and industrious care it is so accomplished with labor and managed that the commonwealth receives no loss by any oblique, evil course.”

Silius said, “Caesar, thy fraud is worse than violence.”

The fraud was pretending that the Consul Varro had the moral authority to be both the accuser and one of the judges of Silius. Tiberius had just referred to custom, by which he meant extraordinary privileges given to Consuls in times of crisis, but there was now no time of crisis.

Tiberius said:

“Silius, don’t mistake us.

“We dare not use the credit and authority of the Consul to thy wrong, but we only preserve and protect his place and power so far as it concerns the dignity and honor of the state.”

“Believe him, Silius,” Arruntius said.

He was sarcastic.

Overhearing him, Cotta said, “Why, so he may, Arruntius.”

“I say so,” Arruntius said. “And he may choose to.”

He may choose to believe Tiberius. But Arruntius will not choose to believe Tiberius.

Tiberius said, “By the Capitol, and all our gods, except for when the dear Republic, our sacred laws, and just authority are interested — involved and have an interest in — therein, I should be silent.”

Afer said, “May it please Caesar to give permission to hold his — Silius’ — trial. He shall have justice.”

Silius said, “Nay, I shall have law. Shall I not, Afer? Speak.”

“Would you have more?” Afer asked.

Silius replied:

“No, my well-spoken man, I would have no more.

“Nor would I have less as long as I might enjoy it natural — by which I mean uncontrived — and not taught to speak unto your present ends.

“And as long as it is free from thine, his, and all your unkind — unnatural — handling, furious enforcing, most unjust presuming, malicious and manifold applying, foul wresting, and impossible construction and interpretation of the law.”

Yes, he wanted law, but he wanted law that was justly applied.

“He raves, he raves,” Afer said.

Silius replied, “Thou would not dare to tell me so, if thou didn’t have Caesar’s permission. I can see whose power condemns me.”

“This betrays his spirit,” Varro said. “This does enough declare what he is.”

“What am I?” Silius said. “Speak.”

“An enemy to the state,” Varro said.

Silius said, “Because I am an enemy to thee, and such corrupted ministers of the state who here are made a present instrument to gratify it with thine own disgrace.”

“This, to the Consul, is most insolent!” Sejanus said. “And impious!”

The Consuls performed religious as well as civic duties, and so Sejanus was saying that criticizing a Consul was impious.

Silius said:

“Aye, take part. Take sides. Reveal yourselves.

“Alas, don’t I scent your confederacies, your plots and combinations? Don’t I know that minion — that darling — sSejanus hates me, and that all this boast of law, and law, is just a form, a net of Vulcan’s making, a complete trap, to take that life by a pretext of justice that you pursue in malice?”

Venus had an affair with Mars, the god of war. The two had fallen in lust although Venus, the goddess of sexual passion, was married to Vulcan, the gifted blacksmith god. Vulcan learned of the affair, so he set a trap for the illicit lovers. He created a fine net that bound tightly, he placed the net above his bed, and then he pretended to leave his mansion to journey abroad. Mars ran to Venus, and together they ran to bed. Mars and Venus lay down in bed together, and then the fine net snared them, locked in lust.

Silius' reference to Vulcan's net, however, is unhappy because Vulcan's net caught a guilty — not innocent — couple.

Silius continued:

“Do I lack brain or nostril — to smell a rat — to persuade me that your ends and purposes are made to what they are, before my answer?

“O you impartial gods, a world of wolves-turned-into-men shall not make me accuse your justice, however they provoke me.

“Have I for this so often engaged myself, stood in the heat and fervor of a fight, when Phoebus the sun-god sooner has forsaken the day than I the battlefield against the blue-eyed Gauls and curly-haired Germans, when our Roman eagles — legionary standards — have fanned the fire with their laboring wings, and there was no blow dealt that left not death behind it?

“And have I for this so often engaged myself when I have charged, alone, into the troops of curly-haired Sicambrians, routed them, and came off the battlefield not with the backward ensigns of a slave, but forward marks, wounds on my breast, and face, wounds that were intended for thee, O Caesar, and thy Rome?”

Silius' scars were on the front of his body, not on the back. He had gotten his scars while fighting, not while running away.

Because Silius and his troops had remained loyal to Rome during a period of unrest, they had saved Rome and had taken the wounds that would have been Rome's had they had not remained loyal.

Silius boasted about this when he returned to Rome, and his boastfulness may have been a cause of his downfall. His enemies believed or said they believed that Silius' boastfulness made Tiberius look weak.

Silius continued:

“And have I this return? Did I, for this, perform so noble and so brave defeat on Sacrovir?”

“O Jove, let it become me to boast about my deeds, when he, whom they concern, shall thus forget them!”

Afer said:

“Silius, Silius, these are the common customs and traits of thy blood and temper, when it is high with wine, as now with rage.

“This well agrees with that intemperate boast thou recently made at Agrippina's table, that when all other of the troops were prone to fall into rebellion, only thine remained in their obedience. Thou boasted that thou were the man who saved the Empire, which would have then been lost, had but thy legions, there, rebelled, or mutinied.

“Thou boasted that thy virtue met and fronted every peril.

“Thou boasted that thou gave to Caesar and to Rome their safety.

“Thou boasted that their name, their strength, their spirit, and their state, and even their being was a donative — a gift — from thee.”

“Well worded, and most like an orator,” Arruntius said.

“Is this true, Silius?” Tiberius asked.

“Save thy question, Caesar,” Silius said. “Thy spy, of infamous reputation, has confirmed it.”

Indeed, Afer had spied on Agrippina and her household.

“Excellent Roman!” Arruntius said.

“He does answer stoutly,” Sabinus said.

“If this is so, there needs no farther ground for charges against him,” Sejanus said.

Varro said, “What can more impeach the royal dignity and state of Caesar than to have pressed upon his attention a benefit that he cannot pay for?”

“In this, all Caesar’s fortune is made unequal to the courtesy,” Cotta said.

In other words: If Silius’ claims are true, then Tiberius would never be able to reward him as he deserves.

“His means are clean destroyed, who should requite,” Latiaris said.

“Nothing is great enough for Silius’ merit,” Gallus said.

Arruntius asked Sabinus, “Is Gallus on that side, too?”

Silius said:

“Come, do not hunt and labor so about for circumstantial evidence to make the man — me — guilty whom you have foredoomed and pre-judged.

“Take shorter ways; I’ll fall in with your purposes.

“The words were mine; and more I now will say:

“Since I have done thee that great service, Caesar, thou always have feared me, and, in place of grace, returned me hatred. So soon, all best services, with fearful princes, turn into deep injuries in estimation, when they greater rise than can be repaid. Benefits, with you, are of no longer pleasure than you can with ease recompense them; that transcended once, your studies are not how to thank, but kill.

“It is your nature to have all men slaves to you, but you acknowledging to none. The means that make your greatness must not be mentioned when speaking about your greatness. If it is mentioned, it takes so much away, you think; and that which helped shall soonest perish, if it stand within eyesight and is seen, where it may affront and confront or just upbraid the high.”

“Allow him to speak no more,” Cotta said.

“Just note his spirit,” Varro said.

To Varro, Silius was being arrogant.

“This reveals him in the rest,” Afer said. “If he is guilty in this, then he is guilty in all.”

“Let him be judged,” Latiaris said.

“He has spoken enough to prove that he is Caesar’s foe,” Sejanus said.

“His thoughts look through his words,” Cotta said.

“A censure,” Sejanus said. “A judgment.”

Silius said:

“Wait, wait, most officious Senate!

“I shall immediately cheat thy fury. Silius has not placed his guards within himself, against Fortune’s spite, so weakly but he can escape your grasp.

“You Senators are only hands of Lady Fortune. She herself, when virtue does oppose, must lose her threats.

“All that can happen in human life, the frown of Caesar, proud Sejanus’ hatred, base Varro’s spleen, and Afer’s bloodying tongue, the Senate’s servile flattery, and these mustered to kill, I’m fortified against, and can look down upon; they are beneath me.

“It is not life that I stand enamored of, for my end shall make me accuse my fate.

“The coward and the valiant man alike must fall; only the cause, and manner how, distinguishes them, which then are gladdest when they cost us dearest.

“Romans, if any are here in this Senate who would like to know how to mock Tiberius’ tyranny, look upon Silius, and so learn how to die.”

He stabbed himself.

“Oh, desperate act!” Varro said.

“An honorable hand!” Arruntius said.

“Look and see if he is dead,” Tiberius ordered.

“It was nobly struck, and home,” Sabinus said.

Arruntius said, “My thought did prompt him to it. He read my mind. Farewell, Silius! Be famous forever for thy great example.”

Tiberius said, “We are not pleased in this sad accident that thus has forestalled and abused our mercy. We had intended to preserve thee, noble Roman, and to anticipate thy hopes.”

Silius had killed himself so that Tiberius and the Romans could not execute him, but now that Silius was dead, Tiberius was saying that he would have shown mercy to Silius.

Arruntius did not believe Tiberius.

“Excellent wolf!” Arruntius said. “Now that he is full, he howls.”

Sejanus said, “Caesar does wrong his own dignity and safety, thus to mourn the deserved end of so professed a traitor, and he does, by this lenience of his, instruct others as factious to the like offence.”

“The confiscation merely of his estate would have been enough,” Tiberius said.

“Oh, that was gaped for, then?” Arruntius said.

The accusers’ mouths had gaped wide open in anticipation of swallowing Silius’ estate. When an estate was confiscated, informers received part of it.

“Remove the body,” Varro said to the Lictors.

They carried the body out.

“Let a summons go out for Sosia,” Sejanus said.

Sosia was the wife of Silius.

“Let her be proscribed,” Gallus said. “And for the goods, I think it fitting that half go to the public treasury, half to the children.”

Silius and Sosia had children.

When Sosia was proscribed, she would be exiled and lose her estate.

By committing suicide before being proscribed, Silius had avoided proscription.

By law, one quarter of the confiscated wealth would go to the accusers.

Lepidus said:

“With the leave of Caesar, I would think that a fourth part, which the law does cast on the informers, should be enough; the rest go to the children —

“By doing this, the prince — Tiberius — shall show humanity and bounty, not to force them by their want, which in their parents’ trespass they deserved, to take ill courses.”

“It shall please us,” Tiberius said.

Arruntius said:

“Aye, out of necessity.

“This Lepidus is grave and honest, and I have observed a moderation always in all his judgments.”

Sabinus said, “And inclining to the better course of action —”

Cordus, guarded by Lictors, Satrius, and Natta, entered the scene.

Arruntius said:

“Wait, who’s this?

“Cremutius Cordus? What! Is he brought in? More blood to the banquet?

“Noble Cordus, I wish thee good. Be as thy writings: free, open, candid, and honest.”

Arruntius was talking quietly. Cordus did not hear him.

“Who is he?” Tiberius asked.

“He is here because of the annals, Caesar,” Sejanus said.

Annals are history books that cover years in chronological order.

“Cremutius Cordus!” the first Herald shouted.

“Here,” Cordus said.

“Satrius Secundus, Pinnarius Natta, you are his accusers,” the First Herald said.

Arruntius said, “They are two of Sejanus’ bloodhounds, whom he breeds with human flesh, to bay at citizens.”

Afer said to Satrius and Natta, “Stand forth before the Senate, and confront him.”

Satrius said, “I do accuse thee here, Cremutius Cordus, to be a man factious and dangerous, a sower of sedition in the state, a turbulent and discontented spirit, which I will prove from thine own writings here, the annals thou have published, where thou bite the present age, and with a viper’s tooth, being a member of it, dare to do that ill which never yet degenerate and unworthy-of-family bastard did upon his parent.”

Vipers were said to give birth by the process of the progeny biting their way out of the parent.

Natta said, “To this I subscribe, and, out of a world of more particulars, cite only one instance as proof: Comparing men and times, thou praise Brutus, and affirm that ‘Cassius was the last of all the Romans.’”

“What!” Cordus said. “What are we, then?”

The answer, of course, is: We are Romans.

“What is Caesar?” Varro asked. “Nothing?”

Afer said:

“My lords, this strikes at every Roman’s private, personal interest, in whom reigns gentry and rank and nobility and grandeur of spirit and mettle, to have a Brutus brought in parallel — a parricide, an enemy of his country — ranked and preferred to any real worth that Rome now holds.”

Brutus was a parricide in that he had helped kill the father of his country: Julius Caesar. In Latin Brutus was patriae parentis parricida.

Afer continued:

“This is most strangely abusive, vituperative, most full of spite and insolent upbraiding.

“Nor is it the time alone that is here dispraised and held in contempt, but the whole man of time, yea, Caesar’s self, brought into disvalue; and he — Caesar — is aimed at most by oblique glance — covert allusion — of his licentious pen.

“Caesar, if Cassius were the last of the Romans, thou have no name, no reputation, no status.”

“The whole man of time” is praise of Tiberius: He is “the whole man” produced by the processes of time.

“Let’s hear him answer,” Tiberius said. “Silence.”

Cordus said:

“So innocent I am of any evil deed, my lords, that only the words I have written are argued to be evidence; yet those words do not affect either prince or prince’s parent — either Tiberius or his father, Caesar Augustus.

“Your law of treason comprehends and includes only malicious words directly affecting princes to be treason.

“I am charged to have praised Brutus and Cassius, whose deeds, when many more besides myself have written about them, not one has mentioned them without honoring them.

“Great Titus Livius, aka Livy, a Roman historian great for eloquence and authority among us, in his History, with so great praises did extol Pompey that often Caesar Augustus called Livy a Pompeian — yet this did not hurt their friendship.

“In his book Livy often names Metellus Scipio, Lucius Afranius, yea, the same Cassius, and this same Brutus, too, as worthiest men; not thieves and parricides, which negative titles and stigma are now imposed upon their reputations.”

Metellus Scipio and Lucius Afranius fought against Julius Caesar and were defeated.

Cassius and Brutus assassinated Julius Caesar and then fought against Octavian (later named Caesar Augustus) and were defeated.

Cordus continued:

“Asinius Pollio’s writings on the civil war quite throughout give them a noble memory.

“Similarly, Messalla gave a noble memory about and gave renown to his general Cassius — yet both of these men lived with Augustus, full of wealth and honors.”

Messalla fought under Cassius and then wrote a history about the civil wars.

Cordus continued:

“To Cicero’s book, where Cato was heaved up equal with heaven, what else did Caesar answer, being then dictator, but with a penned oration, as if before the judges?”

Cicero wrote a book titled Cato, which praised Cato the Younger, and Julius Caesar wrote an opposing book in response titled Anticato.

Cordus continued:

“Do but see Antonius’ letters; read but Brutus’ pleadings, what vile reproach they hold against Augustus — false, I confess, but with much bitterness.

“The epigrams of Roman authors Bibaculus and Catullus are read, although they are fully stuffed with spite of both the Caesars; yet deified Julius, and no less Augustus, both endured them and regarded them with contempt — I don’t know readily enough to speak it, whether it was done with more equanimity or wisdom; for such obloquies, if they are quietly despised, they die suppressed, but if with rage acknowledged, they are confessed.”

Julius Caesar and Augustus Caesar ignored some writings that insulted them. They may have done it with equanimity, not caring about the insults. Or they may have done it with wisdom, knowing that acknowledging the insults and being enraged by them can be interpreted as a confession that the insults are true.

Cordus continued:

“The Greeks I slip by, whose license not alone, but also lust did escape unpunished. Or where someone, by chance, took exception, he revenged the words with words — not deeds.

“But in my work, what could be aimed more free from, or farther off from the time’s scandal, than to write of those whom death had exempted from grace or hatred?”

Cordus was writing about dead — not living — people.

Cordus continued:

“Did I, with Brutus and with Cassius, armed, and possessed of the Philippi fields, incense the people in the civil cause of the state with dangerous speeches? Or do they, being slain seventy years ago, as by their images — which the conqueror has not defaced — appears, retain that guilty memory with writers?”

Plutarch wrote an anecdote about Caesar Augustus coming across a statue of his enemy, Brutus, in a town. Rather than defacing or tearing down the statue, he ordered it kept in place.

Cordus continued:

“Posterity pays every man his honor, nor shall there lack, though I am condemned, those who will not only well approve Cassius, and be mindful of great Brutus’ honor, but who will, also, make mention of me.”

“Freely and nobly spoken,” Arruntius said.

“With good temper,” Sabinus said. “I like him because he is not moved with passion and strong emotion.”

Tiberius and his followers conferred privately.

The Germanicans talked quietly among themselves.

Arruntius said, “Cordus puts them to their whisper.”

Speaking out loud, Tiberius said, “Take him away from here. We shall make a decision about him at the next sitting of the Senate.”

A Lictor exited with Cordus in his custody.

Ben Jonson does not write about this, but Cordus committed suicide by starving himself.

“In the meantime, order the Aediles to burn his books,” Cotta said.

“You have well advised,” Sejanus said.

“It is not fitting that such licentious things should live to upbraid the age,” Afer said.

“If the age were good, they might,” Arruntius said.

The writings might continue to live, at least for a while, as in fact they did. Some copies of his writings were hidden, and they later circulated.

“Let them be burnt,” Latiaris said.

“All sought, and burnt, today,” Gallus said.

“The court is over,” the First Herald said. “Lictors, resume the fasces.”

The Lictors carried the fasces as they led the magistrates away.

Everyone except Arruntius, Sabinus, and Lepidus exited.

Lepidus was a Senator of integrity and capability.

“Let them be burnt!” Arruntius said. “Oh, how ridiculous appears the Senate’s brainless diligence, whose members think they can, with present power, extinguish the memory of all succeeding times!”

Sabinus said:

“It is true that the book burners look ridiculous, when, contrary to their intention, the punishment of genius makes the authority of the genius increase.

“Nor do they anything, who practice this cruelty of interdiction and prohibition, and this rage of burning, but purchase to themselves rebuke and shame, and to the writers an eternal name.”

Lepidus said, “It is an argument that the times are sore and distressed when virtue cannot safely be advanced and promoted, nor vice reprov’d.”

Arruntius replied, “Aye, noble Lepidus. Augustus well foresaw what we should suffer under Tiberius, when he pronounced the Roman race most wretched that should live between so slow jaws, and so long a-bruising.”

Suetonius, in his “Life of Tiberius” in Lives of the Twelve Caesars (III.21), wrote, in Alexander Thomson’s translation, “I know, it is generally believed, that upon Tiberius’s quitting the room, after their private conference, those who were in waiting overheard Augustus say, ‘Ah! unhappy Roman people, to be ground by the jaws of such a slow devourer!’”

The devouring caused the bruising.

They exited.

—3.2—

Tiberius and Sejanus talked together.

Tiberius said:

“This business has succeeded well, Sejanus — and quite removed all jealousy of practice — all suspicion of a conspiracy — of us against Agrippina and our nephews.

“Now we must think how to plant our traps for the other pair: Sabinus and Arruntius.

“And Gallus, too — however much he flatters us, we know his heart.”

Sejanus said:

“Give it some respite, Caesar.”

He may have meant for Tiberius to spare Gallus for a while. Or he may have meant to be slow in bringing down the next enemy. Too many enemies being removed too quickly can cause suspicion. Best to let things rest for a while and then go into action again.

Sejanus continued:

“Time shall mature and bring to perfect crown — bring to perfection what we with so good vultures have begun.”

At the founding of Rome, vultures appeared to its founders: Romulus and Remus. Tiberius and Sejanus are perhaps attempting to found a new kind of Rome.

Vultures are birds of omen. Good vultures can perhaps mean that good omens predict that the snares Tiberius and Sejanus will set will be successful.

Sejanus continued:

“Sabinus shall be next.”

Tiberius objected: “Rather Arruntius.”

Sejanus said, “By any means preserve him. His frank tongue, being lent the reins, will take away all thought of malice in your course against the rest. We must keep him to stalk with.”

A stalking horse is a horse behind which hunters hide. Sejanus wanted to use Arruntius as a screen behind which he and Tiberius could hunt their prey. Arruntius’ tongue would divert attention to himself while Tiberius and Sejanus secretly set their snares.

Tiberius replied, “Dearest head — dearest person — I yield to thy most auspicious plan.”

Sejanus said:

“Sir — I’ve been so long trained up in grace and favor, first with your father, great Augustus, and since then with your most happy bounties so familiar, that I would not sooner commit my hopes or wishes to the gods than to your ears.

“Nor have I ever yet been covetous of overbright and dazzling honors; instead, I have been covetous to watch and work hard for great Caesar’s safety, like the most common soldier.”

“I concede that what you say is true,” Tiberius said.

Sejanus said:

“The only gain, and which I count most fair of all my fortunes, is that mighty Caesar has thought me worthy his alliance.

“Hence begin my hopes.”

Tiberius said, “Hmm?”

In other words: What are you getting at, Sejanus?

Sejanus said:

“I have heard that Augustus, in the bestowing of his daughter in marriage, thought without prejudice of equestrian gentlemen of Rome.”

Sejanus meant that Caesar Augustus had thought that members of the noble class and members of the equestrian class were worthy of marrying his daughter.

Caesar Augustus’ daughter was Julia. Her first husband was Marcus Claudius Marcellus, a nephew of Augustus. Marcellus was not born a noble. He died when she was sixteen, and she then married Tiberius and became his second wife.

Sejanus was a member of the equestrian class of citizens, which were ranked just below the noble class. Marriages could be arranged between the children of the two social classes to strengthen alliances. Sejanus' daughter had been betrothed to a son of the future emperor Claudius, who was a nephew of Tiberius, but a few days after the betrothal, Claudius' son died, according to Suetonius, by choking to death on a pear he had thrown into the air and caught in his mouth.

Sejanus continued:

“If this is so — I don't know how to hope for so great a favor — but if a husband should be sought for Livia, and I should be had in mind, as Caesar's friend, I would but properly use the glory of the familial relationship.”

Livia was the widow of Drusus Senior and the sister of Germanicus. A marriage to her would be a politically wise move for Sejanus. Germanicus had two younger siblings: Livia and Claudius, the future Roman Emperor.

Sejanus continued:

“It should not make me slothful, or less caring about Caesar's state; it would be enough to me if it did confirm, establish, and strengthen my weak house — family — against the now unequal opposition of Agrippina; and for dear regard to my children, this I wish.

“I myself have no ambition farther than to end my days in service of so dear a master.”

Tiberius replied:

“We cannot but commend thy piety — filial duty and grateful devotion — most loved Sejanus, in acknowledging those bounties, which we, faintly, remember.

“But to thy suit.

“The rest of mortal men, in all their designs and counsels, pursue profit. Princes, alone, are of a different destiny, directing their main actions always to fame and reputation.

“We therefore will take time to think, and answer.

“As for Livia, she can best, herself, decide if she will marry after Drusus, or continue to live in the family as a widow; besides, she has a mother, and a grandam yet, whose nearer counsels she may guide herself by —

“But I will simply deal with this matter straightforwardly.”

Livia’s grandmother was Augusta (Tiberius’ mother), and Livia’s mother was Antonia the Younger, the daughter of Marc Antony and Octavia.

Tiberius continued:

“That enmity that thou fear in Agrippina would burn more if Livia’s marriage should, as it would, divide in parts the imperial house.

“A rivalry between the women might break forth, and discord might ruin the sons and nephews on both hands.

“What if it causes some immediate quarreling?”

“Thou are not safe, Sejanus, if thou attempt and try and test it. Can thou believe that Livia, first the wife to Caius Caesar, then to my Drusus, now will be contented to grow old with thee, who was born not noble but only a private gentleman of Rome, and raise thee with her — Livia’s — loss, if not her shame?”

Livia had been married to Caius Caesar, Augustus’ grandson and his possible successor. After his death, she then had been married to Drusus Senior, Tiberius’ son and his possible successor.

Tiberius continued:

“Or say that I should wish it, can thou think that the Senate, or the people, who have seen her brother Germanicus, her father, and our ancestors in the highest place of empire, will endure it?”

“The state and high office thou hold already is talked about.

“Men murmur at thy greatness; and the nobles do not hesitate, in public, to upbraid thy climbing above our father’s — Augustus’ — favors, or above thy own degree — and these nobles dare accuse me because of their hate to thee.

“Be wise, dear friend.

“We would not hide these things out of friendship’s dear respect.

“Nor will we stand adverse to thine or Livia’s designments.

“What we had purposed to thee, in our thought, and with what near degrees of love to bind thee and make thee equal to us, for the present we will forbear to — we will not — speak.

“Only believe thus much, our loved Sejanus: We do not know that height in blood, or honor, which thy virtue, and thy favorable mind toward us, may not aspire to with merit.

“And this we’ll proclaim, on all suitable and watched-for public occasions that the Senate or the people shall present to us.”

Sejanus replied:

“I am restored, and I have regained my sense, which I had lost in this so blinding suit. Caesar has taught me better to refuse than I knew how to ask.”

Sejanus was saying that he had been blinded when making his request to marry Livia, but Tiberius’ words had restored his sight — and his sense.

Sejanus realized that Tiberius did not want to be closely related to him.

Sejanus changed the subject:

“How does it please Caesar to embrace my recent advice for leaving Rome?”

“We are resolved to do so,” Tiberius said.

Giving him a piece of paper, Sejanus said, “Here are some more motives, which I have thought on since, that may more confirm your decision.”

The motives were reasons for leaving Rome.

Tiberius said:

“Careful and solicitous Sejanus!

“We will immediately peruse them.

“Go forward in our main design and prosper.”

The main design was the plot to get rid of Sabinus.

Tiberius exited, leaving Sejanus alone.

Sejanus said to himself:

“If those but take — that is, if the motives motivate — I shall prosper, indeed. Dull, heavy Caesar!

“Would thou tell me that thy favors were made crimes — that thy favors to me have been characterized as crime?

“And would thou tell me that my fortunes were esteemed as thy faults for favoring me?

“And would thou tell me that thou, because of me, were hated?

“And would thou not think I would with winged haste anticipate and prevent that change, when thou might win all to thyself again by the sacrifice of me?”

“Did those foolish words fly swifter from thy lips than this my brain, this sparkling forge, created me an armor to encounter chance, and thee?”

“Well, read my charms — my motives for you to leave Rome — and may they lay that hold upon thy senses as if thou had snuffed up powder of poison hemlock, or drunk the narcotic juice of poppy and of mandrakes.

“Sleep, voluptuous Caesar, and let complacency and carelessness seize on thy stupefied powers, and leave them dead to public cares, awake only to thy lusts — the strength of which makes thy libidinous soul itch to leave Rome; and I have thrust it on, with blaming of the city business, the multitude of suits to thee, the confluence of suitors, and then their importunacies in asking for favors — the manifold distractions he must suffer, besides ill rumors, envies, and reproaches.

“A quiet and retired life, larded and garnished with ease and pleasure, would avoid all of these things.

“And yet, for any weighty and great affair, it — Rome — would be the fittest place to give the soundest counsels.

“By means of this, I shall remove him both from thought and knowledge of his own dearest, most important affairs. I will draw all dispatches through my private hands, and I will know his designments.”

Sejanus was the Prefect of the Praetorian Guard, and since the dispatches Sejanus mentioned were carried on horseback by members of the Praetorian Guard, Sejanus could intercept all these important communications and intimately learn their contents.

If Tiberius were away from Rome, he would not intimately know the political affairs going on in Rome.

Sejanus continued:

“And I shall pursue my own designments, make my own strengths, by giving suits and places, conferring dignities and offices on people who will follow me. And these who hate me now, lacking access to him, Tiberius, will make their envy none, or less. For when they see me arbiter of all, they must treat me with honor — or else, with Caesar, fall.”

Sejanus exited.

— 3.3 —

Alone, Tiberius said to himself:

“To marry Livia? Will no less, Sejanus, content thy aims?
No lower object?”

“Well! Thou know how thou are wrought into our trust, woven in our design; and thou think we must now use thee, whatsoever thy projects are.

“It is true. But yet with caution, and fit care.

“And, now we better think —

He called for a servant:

“Who’s there, within?”

A servant entered the room.

“Caesar?” the servant asked.

Still thinking, Tiberius said:

“To leave our journey off would be to sin against our decreed delights, and it would appear to be doubt — or, what still less becomes a prince, low fear.

“Yet, doubt has its own law, and fears have their excuse, where princes’ states plead necessary use and vital benefit, as ours does now — more because of Sejanus’ pride than all fierce Agrippina’s hates beside.

“Those are the dreadful, to-be-feared enemies we raise with favors and make dangerous with praise.

“Those injured by us may have the same desire to harm us, but it is the favorite who has the power to strike us.”

The people a highly placed man like Tiberius either rewards or punishes may both want to harm him, but the people whom Tiberius rewards are those who can get close to Tiberius and have the opportunity to harm him.

Tiberius continued:

“And fury ever boils more high and strong,

“Heated with ambition, than revenge of wrong.

“It is then a part of supreme skill to grace

“No man too much, but hold a certain space “Between the ascender’s rise and thine own level, lest, when all the rungs of the ladder are reached, his aim be that: to strike us.

“It is thought —”

Realizing that a servant was in the room, Tiberius said to him, “Is Macro in the palace? Find out. If he is not, go seek him and tell him to come to us.”

The servant exited to carry out the errand.

Tiberius said to himself:

“Macro must be the organ we must work by now, though no one is less apt for trust.”

Macro was a bad man. Tiberius wanted to pit him against another bad man: Sejanus.

Tiberius continued:

“Need does allow what choice would not. I’ve heard that the poisonous herb aconite, being timely taken, has a healing might against the scorpion’s stroke. We’ll give that idea a trial — so that, while two poisons wrestle, we may live.

“Sejanus has a spirit too energetic to be used except to the encounter of his like. We must fight his evil with another evil.

“Excused are wiser sovereigns then, who raise one ill “Against another, and both safely kill.

“The prince who feeds great natures, they will sway him.

“He who nourishes a lion must obey him.”

The servant returned with Macro.

“Macro, we sent for you,” Tiberius said.

“I heard so, Caesar,” Macro replied.

Tiberius said to the servant, “Leave us for a while.”

The servant exited.

Tiberius said, “When you shall know, good Macro, the causes of our sending to you, and the ends, you then will listen more closely — and be pleased that you stand so high, both in our choice and trust.”

Macro said, “The humblest place in Caesar’s choice or trust may make glad Macro proud, without ambition — except to do Caesar service.”

Tiberius said:

“Put aside your courting of us. Let’s talk straightforwardly.

“We intend, Macro, to depart the city for a time, and see Campania — not for our pleasures, but to dedicate a pair of temples, one to Jupiter at Capua, the other at Nola, to Augustus. In this great work, perhaps, our stay will be extended beyond our will.

“Now, since we are not ignorant what danger may be born out of even our very shortest absence in a state so subject to envy, and embroiled with hate and faction, we have thought on thee, among a field — a large number — of Romans, worthiest Macro, to be our eye and ear, and to keep a strict watch on Agrippina, Nero, Drusus Junior — aye, and on Sejanus.

“Not that we distrust his loyalty, or that we repent one grace and favor of all that heap we have conferred on him — for that would be to disparage our election of him and call that judgment now in doubt which then seemed as unquestioned as an oracle of a god — but greatness has its cankers and sores.

“Worms and moths breed out of too fit matter in the things that they afterward consume, transferring quite the substance of their makers into themselves.”

In other words, Sejanus is ambitious and wants to replace Tiberius as Emperor.

Tiberius continued:

“Macro is sharp and understands. Besides, I know him to be subtle, close, wise, and well-read in man and his large nature. He has studied affections, feelings, and passions, and he knows their springs, their ends, and which way and whether they will work.

“It is proof enough of his great merit that we trust him.

“Then let us get to the point — because our conference cannot be long without suspicion.”

People keep a close eye on Emperors, and if they knew that Tiberius and Macro had had a long conversation, they would wonder what they had talked about.

Tiberius continued:

“Here, Macro, we assign thee, both to spy, inform, and chastise. Think, and use thy means, thy ministers, what, where, on whom thou will. Explore, plot, practice underhanded schemes.

“All that thou do in this shall be as if the Senate or the laws had given it privilege, and thou thence styled and given the title of the Savior both of Caesar and of Rome.

“We will not take thy answer except in act — whereto, as thou proceed, we hope to hear by trusted messengers sent from thee to us.

“If it be inquired why we called you, say that you have been given the responsibility to see that our chariots and our horses are ready.

“Be always our loved and — shortly — honored Macro.”

Tiberius exited.

Alone, Macro said to himself:

“I will not ask why Caesar bids me to do this, but I will take joy in the fact that he bids me to do this. It is the bliss of courts to be employed, no matter how.

“A prince’s power makes all his actions virtue. We, whom he works by, are dumb instruments, to do, but not inquire about why we do something; Tiberius’ great purposes are to be served, not searched into and questioned.

“Yet, as that bow is most in hand and used whose owner best knows how to effect, obtain, and accomplish his aims, so let that statesman hope to be of most use and most price, that statesman who can hit his prince’s target and scope.

“Nor must he look at what or whom to strike but let loose and shoot our metaphorical arrows at everyone; each mark and target must be alike.

“If the mark were to plot against the fame, the life of one with whom I am like a twin; remove a wife from my warm side, a wife as loved as is the air; do away with each parent; draw my heir in the compass of my plots, though I have only one heir; work all my kin to swift perdition; leave no trap unset, for friendship or for innocence; nay, make the gods all guilty, I would undertake this, which is being imposed on me, both with gain and ease.

“The way to rise is to obey and please.

“He who will thrive in state must neglect the trodden paths that truth and right respect, and trod and try new, wilder ways.”

Macro then said something that sounds much like Nietzsche’s concept of master morality versus slave morality. In doing so, Macro used “in state” to mean “in high government.”

“Virtue, there — in state — is not that narrow thing that she is elsewhere.”

In other words: Virtue has a different meaning in state — in high government — than it has elsewhere.

Macro continued:

“Men’s fortune there — in state — is virtue; reason there — in state — is their will.”

In other words: In high government, virtue is whatever will bring oneself good fortune. And whatever one wills — whatever one desires — is their rational reason for acting.

Macro continued:

“Their license there — in state — is their law; and their observance [deferential service to a superior], there — in state — is their skill [ability to accomplish something].”

In other words: In high government, one’s law is their license: One does whatever one wants. And one’s ability to accomplish something rests in their deferential service to a superior.

Macro continued:

“Occasion there — in state — is their foil; conscience there — in state — is their stain.”

In other words: In high government, opportunity and opportunism are one’s attractive adornment. And one’s conscience is their disgrace. (Of course, in high government, conscience is to be avoided.)

Macro continued:

“Profit there — in state — is their luster; and whatever else there is, is there — in state — their vain.”

In other words: In high government, profit gives oneself luster. And anything other than profit has no value.

In summary: The man who wants to rise in high government must have the morality of a master: What is right is what will benefit himself. This is a reversal of conventional morality — what Nietzsche would call slave morality.

Macro continued:

“If then it is the lust and pleasure of Caesar’s power to have raised Sejanus up, and in an hour to overturn him, tumbling him down from the height of all, we are Caesar’s ready instrument; and Sejanus’ fall may be our rise.

“It is no uncouth, aka unfamiliar, thing

“To see fresh buildings from old ruins spring.”

Macro exited.

At this point in Ben Jonson’s play, a Chorus of Musicians performed.

ACT 4 (Sejanus' Fall)

— 4.1 —

Gallus and Agrippina talked together in Agrippina's house.

Gallus was the husband of Vipsania, who had been Tiberius' first wife.

Agrippina was upset because Tiberius and Sejanus had attacked friends of hers.

"You must have patience, royal Agrippina," Gallus said.

Agrippina replied:

"I must have vengeance first — and that would be nectar to my famished spirits."

Nectar is the drink of the gods.

Agrippina continued:

"O my Fortune, let what thou prepares against me be sudden! Strike all my powers of understanding blind and let me be ignorant of my destiny to come!

"Let me not fear, I who cannot hope."

Gallus said, "Dear princess, these tyrannies you place on yourself are worse than Caesar's."

Agrippina said:

"Is this the happiness of being born great?

"Always to be aimed at by my enemies? Always to be suspected? To live the subject of all jealousies? To be at least the color — the pretext — made, if not the ground — the cause and reason — to every painted — to every made-up — danger?"

“Who would not choose at once to fall, rather than thus to hang forever?”

Gallus began, “You might be safe, if you would —”

Agrippina interrupted:

“— if I would what, my Gallus?

“Be lewd Sejanus’ strumpet? Or the bawd to Caesar’s lusts now that he has gone to practice lust?”

One well-believed reason for Tiberius’ leaving Rome was to find a place where he could indulge his lusts.

Agrippina continued:

“Not even doing these things would make me safe, here where nothing is safe.

“You yourself, while thus you stand but by me, are not safe.

“Was Silius safe? Or the good Sosia safe? Or was my niece, dear Claudia Pulchra, safe? Or innocent Furnius?

“They who very recently have, by being made guilty, added reputation to Afer’s eloquence?”

Silius, Sosia, Claudia Pulchra, and Furnius were all found guilty, and their being found guilty advanced the reputation of Afer the orator, who spoke against them.

Claudia Pulchra died in exile in 26 C.E.

Furnius was put to death in in 26 C.E. after being found guilty of committing adultery with Claudia Pulchra.

Agrippina continued:

“O foolish friends, could not such fresh examples warn your loves, but you must buy my favors with that loss to yourselves — and when you might perceive that Caesar’s cause of raging must forsake him before his will?”

In other words: Tiberius will cease his raging only when the objects of his rage — his perceived enemies — have been found guilty and disposed of.

Agrippina continued:

“Go away, good Gallus, leave me.

“Here it is dangerous to be seen; to speak is treason; to pay me the least duty is called faction.

“You are unhappy in me, and I am unhappy in everything.

“Where are my sons, Nero and Drusus Junior? We are those who are shot at. Let us fall alone, away from others, and not, in our ruins, sepulcher our friends.

“Or shall we do some action, like the offence they charge us with, to mock their efforts that would make us seem to be guilty by actually becoming guilty? Shall we frustrate practice by anticipating it?

“The danger’s equal, whether we are innocent or guilty, for whatever they can contrive, they will make good. No innocence is safe when power contests and challenges that innocence. Nor can they trespass more greatly, whose very being was all crime before.”

Nero, Drusus Junior, and Caligula entered the scene.

“Have you heard that Sejanus has come back from Caesar?” Nero asked.

“No. How has he come back? Disgraced?” Gallus asked.

“He is now more graced by Tiberius than ever,” Drusus Junior said.

“By what mischance?” Gallus asked

“By a chance occurrence that seemed likely enough at one time to be bad,” Caligula said.

“But turned too good, to both,” Drusus Junior said.

“What chance occurrence was it?” Gallus asked.

Nero said:

“While Tiberius was sitting at his meal in a farmhouse they call Spelunca, sited by the seaside, among the Fundane Hills, within a natural cave, part of the grotto about the entry fell and overwhelmed some of the waiters; others ran away.

“Only Sejanus, with his knees, hands, face, overhanging Caesar, did oppose himself to the remaining ruins, and was found in that so laboring posture by the soldiers who came to help him.

“With which adventure he has so fixed himself in Caesar’s trust that thunder cannot move him, and he has come, with all the height of Caesar’s praise, to Rome.”

Part of a cave ceiling had fallen, and Sejanus had protected Tiberius by standing over him.

Agrippina said:

“And he has come with the power to turn all those ruins on us and bury whole posterities beneath them.

“Nero, and Drusus Junior, and Caligula, your places are the next in line to succeed Tiberius, and therefore you are most resented by them.”

“Them” were Tiberius and Sejanus.

Agrippina continued:

“Think on your birth and blood, awake your spirits, encounter their violence; it is princely when a tyrant does oppose you, and it is a fortune sent to exercise your virtue, as the wind does try and test strong trees, which by vexation grow more sound and firm.”

Trees that are buffeted by wind are forced to grow strong roots to survive.

Agrippina continued:

“After your father’s fall, and your uncle’s fate — the deaths of Germanicus and Drusus Senior — what can you hope for but all the change of stroke and variety of blows and attacks that force or sleight can give?”

“So then stand upright; and although you do not act, yet suffer nobly.

“Be worthy of my womb, and take strong cheer.

“What we do know will come, we should not fear.”

They exited.

— 4.2 —

Macro, alone, considered his situation.

Tiberius had made it clear to him that he wanted Sejanus watched and gotten rid of, but now Macro was hearing news that Sejanus was again favored by Tiberius. What should Macro do? What would keep him safe? Was Sejanus really reconciled to Tiberius?

Alone, Macro said to himself:

“Has Sejanus returned so soon? And he is renewed in trust and grace!

“Is Caesar then so weak? Or has the place but wrought this alteration with the air, and Caesar, on the next part of his journey, will all repair and make things as they were before?”

“Macro, thou art engaged, committed, and involved; and what before was public, now must be thy private, more than before.

“The weal of Caesar fitness did imply, but thine own fate confers necessity on thy employment; and the thoughts borne nearest unto ourselves move swiftest still, and dearest.

“If Sejanus recovers Tiberius’ favor, thou art lost: Yea, all the weight of preparation for Sejanus’ fall will turn on thee and crush thee.

“Therefore, strike before Sejanus settles, to prevent the like strike against thyself.

“He who knows his advantage is he who presses it home and gives the foremost blow.”

He exited.

— 4.3 —

Latiaris, Rufus, and Opsius talked together.

They were Senators who supported Sejanus, and they were enemies to Sabinus, although Sabinus trusted Latiaris.

Latiaris said:

“It is a service great Sejanus will see well requited and will accept nobly.

“Here place yourselves, at a height between the roof and the ceiling, and when I bring him — Sabinus — to utter words of danger that can be used against him, reveal yourselves and take him.”

In his Annals IV.69, translated by Alfred John Church and William Jackson Brodribb, Tacitus wrote, “Three senators thrust themselves into the space between the roof and ceiling, a hiding-place as shameful as the treachery was execrable.”

In real life, this would be an attic. In theatrical practice, this would be the upper stage, which is between the roof and the upper-stage floor that forms a ceiling for part of the lower stage.

“Has he come?” Rufus asked.

“I’ll now go fetch him,” Latiaris said.

He exited.

“With good speed,” Opsius said. “I long to merit from the state in such an action.”

“I hope it will obtain the Consulship for one of us,” Rufus said.

“We cannot think of less as a reward to bring in one as dangerous as Sabinus,” Opsius said.

Rufus said:

“He was a follower of Germanicus, and he still pays dutiful attention and is a client to Germanicus’ wife — the widow Agrippina — and children, though they have declined in favor.

“He is a daily visitant, keeps them company in private and in public, and is noted to be the only client of the house.

“Pray Jove that Sabinus will be free and frank of speech to Latiaris!”

“He’s allied to him and trusts him well,” Opsius said.

“And he’ll return his trust?” Rufus asked.

Opsius answered, “To do an office so welcome to the state, I know no man but would strain nearer bands than kindred —”

According to Opsius, Latiaris and Sabinus were kindred, but that would not stop Latiaris from betraying Sabinus in order to do Tiberius and Sejanus a favor.

“Listen, I hear them coming,” Rufus said.

“Let’s shift to our hiding holes with silence,” Opsius said.

They hid.

Latiaris and Sabinus entered the scene.

Latiaris said:

“It is a noble constancy you show to this afflicted house.

“Unlike the others — the friends of season, aka fair weather friends — you do not follow Fortune. And unlike the others, you do not in the winter of their fate forsake the place whose glories warmed you.

“You are just, and worthy of such a princely patron’s love as was the world’s renowned Germanicus.

“When I remember his ample merit and see his wife and children made objects of so much envy, jealousy, and hate, it makes me ready to accuse the gods of negligence, as men of tyranny.”

Sabinus said, “Germanicus’ wife and sons must be patient; so must we.”

Latiaris said:

“O Jove! What will become of us, or of the times, when to be high, or noble, are made crimes?”

“When having land and treasure are most dangerous faults?”

Having land and treasure can be dangerous; evil men may accuse you of treason in hopes of getting that land and treasure even if it causes the real owner’s death.

Sabinus replied:

“When our table, even our bed, assaults our peace and safety?”

During evil times, guests at the table, and spouses in bed, can be spies and informers. Some of Agrippina’s guests at the table were spies and informers. Her son Nero’s wife told her mother about him, and Nero’s wife’s mother told Sejanus.

Nero’s wife’s mother was Livia, who had been seduced by Sejanus.

Sabinus continued:

“When our writings are, by any ill-willed agents who dare apply them to the guilty, made to speak what Tiberius and Sejanus will have, to fit their tyrannous revenge and vengeance?”

“When ignorance is scarcely innocence, and knowledge is made a capital offence?”

“When not so much but the bare empty shade of liberty is taken away from us by force?”

“And when we are made the prey to greedy vultures and vile spies who first transfix us with their murdering eyes?”

In fact, Latiaris, Opsius, and Rufus were right now transfixing Sabinus with their murdering eyes.

Latiaris said:

“I think the genius of the Roman race should not be so extinct but that bright flame of liberty might be revived again, which no good man except with his life should lose, and we should not sit like spent and patient fools, still puffing in the dark at one poor ember, held on by hope, until the last spark is out.”

A person should lose his liberty only at the same time he loses his life.

Latiaris said:

“The cause is public, and the honor, the reputation, the immortality of every soul who is not a bastard or a slave in Rome is therein concerned.

“Whereto, if men would change the wearied arm, and, for the weighty shield so long sustained, employ the ready sword, we might have some assurance of our vows, desires, and prayers.

“This ass’ fortitude — Sejanus’ persistence — does tire us all.

“Active valor must redeem our loss, for nothing else will. The rock and our hard steel — our swords — should meet, to enforce those glorious fires again whose splendor cheered the world, and heat gave life no less than does the sun’s.”

The image was flint hitting steel and creating sparks to light tinder and start a fire.

Sabinus said:

“It would be better to stay in lasting darkness, and despair of day.

“No ill should force the subject to undertake revolution against the sovereign, any more than hell should make the gods do wrong.

“A good man should and must sit down with loss rather than rise unjustly in rebellion — although when the Romans first did yield themselves to one man’s power, they did not mean their lives, their fortunes, and their liberties should be his absolute spoil, as if purchased by the sword.”

Latiaris said:

“Why, we are worse, if to be slaves and bondsmen to Caesar’s slave — the proud Sejanus — is to be worse!

“He who is all, does all — Sejanus gives Caesar leave to hide his ulcerous and covered-with-ointment face, with his bald crown, at Rhodes, while he here stalks upon the heads of Romans and their princes, free to absolutely rule an empire.”

Oops! Ben Jonson made a historical error here. Tiberius was at Rhodes years before this time; he was at Rhodes during part of the reign of his adoptive father: Caesar Augustus. Tiberius was not at Rhodes at the time of this play.

Sabinus said, “Now you touch a point, indeed, wherein he shows his art as well as his power.”

“And villainy in both,” Latiaris said. “Do you observe where Livia lodges? How Drusus Senior came to be dead? What men have been cut off?”

Sabinus said:

“Yes, those are things distant in time.

“I nearer looked into Sejanus’ later practice, where he stands declared a master in his profession.

“First, before Tiberius went, Sejanus wrought his fear and made him think that Agrippina sought his death.

“Then he put those fears in her; he sent her often word, under the show of friendship, to beware of Caesar, for Caesar had laid plots to poison her.

“Sejanus drove them — Tiberius and Agrippina — to frowns, to mutual suspicions, which now in visible hatred have burst out.”

Because of Sejanus’ machinations, Tiberius and Agrippina each feared that the other was trying to poison him or her.

Sabinus continued:

“Since then, Sejanus has had his hired agents work on Nero, and heave him up and exalt him and feed his pride and his ambition.

“They tell him that Caesar’s old.

“They tell him that all the people, yea, all the army have their eyes on him — Nero.

“They tell him that both the people and the army long to have him undertake something of worth, to give the world a hope.

“Through his hired agents, Sejanus bids Nero to court the grace of both the people and the army.

“The easy youth perhaps gives ear, and immediately Sejanus writes this comment about Nero to Caesar:

“‘See yonder dangerous boy. Note but the practice of the mother, there. She’s linking him, for purposes soon to be revealed, with men of the sword.’

“Here’s Caesar put in fright against son and mother — against Nero and Agrippina.

“Yet Sejanus does not stop at this.

“The second brother, Drusus Junior, has a fierce nature and is fitter for Sejanus’ snare because Drusus Junior is ambitious and full of malicious envy.

“Sejanus clasps and hugs him, poisons him with praise, tells him what hearts Drusus Junior wears — that is, who is devoted and loyal to him — how bright he stands in popular expectation, that Rome suffers with him in the wrong his mother does him by preferring and promoting Nero.

“Thus Sejanus sets Nero and Drusus Junior asunder, each against the other, devises the course of action that enables him to condemn the two brothers, and he keeps the reputation of being a friend to all, while driving all on to ruin.”

Latiaris asked, “Caesar sleeps, and nods at this?”

Sabinus said, “I wish that he might always sleep, bogged in his filthy lusts!”

Opsius and Rufus revealed themselves.

“Treason to Caesar!” Opsius shouted.

“Lay hands upon the traitor, Latiaris, or take the name of traitor thyself,” Rufus said.

“I am for Caesar,” Latiaris said. “I am on Caesar’s side, not on the side of traitors.”

They apprehended Sabinus.

“Am I then caught?” Sabinus said.

“What do you think, sir?” Rufus said. “You are.”

Sabinus said:

“Spies of this head!”

The word “head” can mean 1) category, or 2) white-haired.

Sabinus continued:

“So white! So full of years! Well, my most reverend monsters, you may live to see yourselves thus snared.”

“Reverend” can mean 1) venerable, or 2) old.

“Away with him!” Opsius said.

“Hale him away,” Latiaris said.

“To be a spy for traitors is honorable vigilance,” Rufus said.

His words were ambiguous. They could mean that 1) he was spying on behalf of a traitor (Sejanus), or that 2) he was spying out traitors on behalf of a legitimate ruler.

Sabinus said:

“You do well, my most officious instruments of state, men of all uses. Drag me away from here.

“The year is well begun, and I fall fit to be an offering to Sejanus. Go.”

Sabinus was referring to himself as a New Year’s sacrifice to Sejanus. Normally, no executions were held on the Kalends — the first day — of January.

“There is no need for that,” Sabinus said. “Forbear your rude assault. The fault’s not shameful that villainy makes a fault.”

They exited.

— 4.4 —

Macro and Caligula talked together.

Macro said:

“Sir, just observe how thick your dangers meet in his — Sejanus’ — clear and obvious schemes!

“Your mother and your brothers are now cited to the Senate!

“Their friend Gallus, feasted today by Caesar, has since been committed to prison!

“We met Sabinus here, being hurried to fetters!

“The Senators are all struck with fear and silence, except those whose political hopes depend not on good means but force their private prey from public spoil!

“And you must know that if you stay here, your property and position are sure to be the subject of his hate, as now they are the object.”

Now Caligula’s property and position are targeted by Sejanus; soon they will belong to Sejanus.

“What would you advise me to do?” Caligula asked.

Macro replied:

“I advise you to go to Capri immediately; and there give up yourself, entirely, to your great-uncle Tiberius.

“Tell Caesar, since your mother is accused, rather than to fly for succors to Augustus’ statue, and to the army, with your brethren, you have instead chosen to place your trust in him than to live suspected, or to live in fear each hour that you will be thrust out by bold Sejanus’ plots — which you shall confidently state to be most full of peril to the state and Caesar, as the plots are being laid to achieve Sejanus’ particular, private ends.

“And you will persuade Tiberius that these plots are not to be allowed to run with common safety.”

Emperors were always surrounded by plots as people tried to advance themselves at the expense of others. This plot, however, was different: Sejanus was trying to advance himself at the expense of Tiberius.

Sejanus continued:

“All of this, in support of you, I’ll make plain,

“So both shall love and trust with Caesar gain.”

Caligula said, “Let’s go away, then! Let’s prepare ourselves for our journey.”

They exited.

— 4.5 —

Alone, Arruntius, a Senator of good character, prayed:

“Still do thou suffer and tolerate this, heaven? Will no flame, no heat of sin make thy just wrath boil in thy distempered bosom, and overflow the pitchy blazes — smoky fires — of impiety kindled beneath thy throne?

“Can thou still sleep, patient, while vice does make an antic — grotesquely grinning face — at thy dread power, and blow dust and smoke into thy nostrils? Jove, will nothing wake thee?

“Must vile Sejanus pull thee by the beard before thou will open thy black-lidded eye, and kill him with a look?”

Pulling someone’s beard was a major insult.

Arruntius continued:

“Well, snore on, dreaming gods, and let this last of that proud giant race heave mountain upon mountain against your state.”

Two twin-brother giants — Ephialtes and Otus — attempted to put one mountain on top of another mountain in order to reach the Olympian gods and make war on them. Ephialtes and Otus were Titans: pre-Olympian gods. According to Arruntius, Sejanus is the last of this race of rebelling giants.

Seeing Lepidus, another Senator of integrity, coming toward him, Arruntius said:

“Be good to me, Lady Fortune, and you powers whom I, complaining about you, have profaned.

“I see something that is equal to a prodigy: a great, a noble, and an honest Roman who has lived to be an old man!”

Lepidus walked over to Arruntius.

Arruntius said:

“O Marcus Lepidus, when is our turn to bleed?

“Thyself and I, without our boast — even if we were not the ones to say this — are almost all the few left to be honest in these impious times.”

Lepidus replied, “What we are left to be, we will be, Lucius, although tyranny did stare as wide as death to frighten us from it.”

“Tyranny has in fact stared as wide as death on Sabinus!”
Lucius Arruntius said.

Lepidus was returning from the Gemonian stairs — a staircase — upon the Aventine hill, where the bodies of some executed people were displayed for a few days (and subjected to desecration) before being thrown into the Tiber River or displayed on the bank of the river. The corpse was dragged with a hook and moved from place to place. Lepidus had witnessed the corpse of Sabinus being treated in this way.

Lepidus said about Sabinus, “I saw him now drawn from the Gemonian stairs, and, what increased the direness of the crime, his faithful dog, upbraiding all us Romans, never forsook the corpse, but, seeing it thrown into the stream, leaped in, and drowned with it.”

Arruntius said:

“Oh, an act to be envied him by us men!

“We are the next the hook lays hold on, Marcus Lepidus.

“What are thy arts — good patriot, teach them to me — that have preserved thy hairs to this white dye, and kept so reverend and so dear a head safe on its comely shoulders?”

Lepidus replied:

“Arts, Arruntius?

“None but the plain and passive fortitude to suffer and be silent; never stretch these arms against the torrent; live at home, with my own thoughts and innocence about me, not tempting the wolf’s jaws: These are my arts.”

Lepidus’ arts were effective: He lived to be old.

Arruntius said:

“I would begin to study those arts, if I thought they would secure me.

“May I pray to Jove in secret, and be safe? Aye, or aloud? With open wishes? So long as I do not mention Tiberius, or Sejanus?

“Yes, I must mention Tiberius and Sejanus, if I speak out. It is hard, that.

“May I think, and not be tortured by having my limbs pulled out of joint on the rack? What danger is it to dream? Talk in one’s sleep? Or cough? Who knows the law?

“May I shake my head, without a comment being made about it?

“May I say that it rains, or that the fair weather continues, and not be thrown upon the Gemonian stairs?

“These now are things on which men’s fortune, yea, their fate depends.

“Nothing has privilege against the violent ear that twists the meanings of words. No place, no day, no hour, we see, is free — not even our religious and most sacred times — from one kind of cruelty or another.”

New Year’s Day was a sacred day, but Sabinus was put to death on that day.

Arruntius continued:

“All matter, nay, any occasion and any pretext will serve to please evil men. Madmen’s rage, the idle comments of drunkards, women’s meaningless talk, jesters’ simplicity — all, all is good that can be seized on.

“Nor is now the end of any person, or for any crime, in doubt; for it is always one and the same: Death, with some little difference of place, or time.”

Seeing some people coming toward him, he said, “What’s this? Prince Nero? Guarded?”

Laco, the commander of the Night Watch, arrived with Nero, who was guarded by Lictors.

Laco said, “On, Lictors, keep on your way.”

He then said to Arruntius and Lepidus:

“My lords, don’t speak to him.

“On pain of Caesar’s wrath, no man attempt speech with the prisoner.”

Nero said to Lepidus and Arruntius:

“Noble friends, be safe. To lose yourselves for words would be as vain hazard to you as it would be small comfort to me.

“Fare you well.

“I wish that all Rome’s sufferings in my fate did dwell!”

“Lictors, away!” Laco said.

“Where does Nero go, Laco?” Lepidus asked.

“Sir, he’s banished into Pontia, by the Senate,” Laco answered.

Arruntius said, “Do I see, and hear, and feel? May I trust my senses? Or does my fantasy — imagination — form it?”

Lepidus asked Laco, “Where’s Nero’s brother?”

“Drusus Junior is prisoner in the palace,” Laco answered.

Nero died in 31 C.E. while in exile on the island of Ponza. Drusus Junior died in prison in 33 C.E. Both Nero and Drusus Junior were starved to death.

Arruntius said:

“Huh. I smell it now; it is rank.

“Where’s Agrippina?”

“The princess is confined, at Pandataria, one of the Pontine islands in the Tyrrhenian Sea,” Laco said.

Arruntius said:

“Bolts, Vulcan — thunderbolts for Jove! Phoebus, thy bow. Stern Mars, thy sword, and you blue-eyed maiden, thy spear. Thy club, Alcides.”

He was swearing.

Vulcan, the blacksmith god, made thunderbolts for Jupiter.

The blue-eyed maiden is Pallas Athena, who is a virgin goddess, and Alcides is another name for Hercules. Alcides means “grandson of Alcaeus.” Alcaeus’ father was Perseus, so Hercules’ great-grandfather is Perseus.

Arruntius continued:

“All the armory of heaven is too little!”

Too little to oppose Sejanus?

Aware that what he said could be used against him, he said:

“To guard the gods, I meant.”

He then said:

“Fine, rare dispatch! This same was swiftly borne!
Confined? Imprisoned? Banished? Most tripartite!”

In February 1405, Owain Glyndower, Edmund Mortimer, and Henry Percy, 1st Earl of Northumberland signed the Tripartite Indenture, which divided Britain among them if they succeeded in their rebellion against King Henry IV of England.

Arruntius then asked Laco, “What is the reason for Nero’s arrest, sir?”

“Treason,” Laco answered.

“Oh?” Arruntius said. “The complement of all accusings? That will hit the target, when all else fails.”

Lepidus said:

“This turn is strange!

“Just yesterday, the people would not allow even a far less serious crime than treason to be alleged against Nero and Agrippina, but instead they cried out that Caesar’s letters accusing Nero and Agrippina were false and forged; that all these plots were malice; and that the ruin of the prince’s house — Tiberius' family — was practiced against his knowledge.

“Where are their voices now that they behold his heirs locked up, disgraced, led into exile?”

Arruntius said:

“Their voices are hushed. Drowned in their bellies.

“Wild Sejanus' breath has, like a whirlwind, scattered that poor dust — the people — with this rude blast.”

The belly, which feels hunger, is more insistent in its demands than the head is.

Dust is that to which we return after we die.

Arruntius turned to Laco and the others and said:

“We'll talk no treason, sir, if that is what you wait for. Fare you well. We have no need of horse-leeches.”

Horse-leeches are literally very large leeches; metaphorically, they are very greedy people.

Arruntius continued:

“Good spy, now that you are spied, begone.”

Laco, Nero, and the Lictors exited.

“I fear you wrong him,” Lepidus said. “He has the reputation of being an honest Roman.”

Arruntius answered:

“And entrusted to this work?”

“Lepidus, I'd sooner trust Greek Sinon than a man our state employs.”

To end the Trojan War, Ulysses came up with the idea of the Trojan Horse. The Trojan War had been fought for 10 years, and the forces of Agamemnon and the other Greeks had not been able to conquer Troy by might, and so Ulysses had the idea of using trickery to conquer Troy. The Greeks built a huge wooden horse and left it outside Troy, and then they seemed to sail away in their ships and return home. However, the Trojan Horse was hollow and filled with Greek soldiers, including Ulysses and Diomedes, and the ships sailed behind an island so that the Trojans could not see them. A lying Greek named Sinon stayed behind and pretended that he had escaped from Ulysses, who had wanted to kill him. Sinon told the Trojans that if the Trojans were to take the Trojan Horse inside the walls of Troy, then Troy would never fall. Amid great rejoicing, the Trojans took the Trojan Horse inside the walls of Troy. That night, the Greek warriors came out of the Trojan Horse, went to the gates of Troy, killed the Trojan guards, and opened the gates of Troy. Agamemnon and his troops were outside the gates, after returning from hiding behind the island. The Greeks then conquered Troy, killing many, many Trojans, including Trojan women and children.

Arruntius continued:

“He’s gone; and since he is gone, I dare tell you — whom I dare better trust — that our night-eyed Tiberius does not see his minion’s drifts; or if he does, he’s not as arrant subtle — thoroughly cunning — as we fools take him to be, to breed a mongrel up in his own house with his own blood, and, if the good gods please, encourage him with his own flesh to take a leap at his own throat.”

Tiberius had the reputation of being able to see at night immediately after waking up, although his night vision soon faded.

Dogs were encouraged to hunt by being given a piece of the flesh of the animals they hunted. This was called being “fleshed.” Sejanus was being “fleshed” with members of Tiberius’ own family. Arruntius believed that soon Sejanus could hunt Tiberius.

Arruntius continued:

“I do not beg it, heaven; but if the Fates grant it to these eyes, they must not close.”

He would not close his eyes if Sejanus metaphorically tore out Tiberius’ throat.

“They must not see it, Lucius Arruntius,” Lepidus said.

“Who should prevent them?” Arruntius asked.

“Zeal and duty, with the thought that Tiberius is our prince,” Lepidus said.

Arruntius said:

“He is our monster: forfeited to vice so far that no racked — forced out of him — virtue can redeem him.

“His loathed person is fouler than all crimes. He is an emperor only in his lusts; he has retired from all regard of his own reputation, or Rome’s, to an obscure island, Capri, where he lives, acting his tragedies while wearing a comic face like a mask appropriate to comedy, amid his rout of Chaldees — that is, astrologers.”

Tiberius is thought to have had many sores on his face in his old age.

Arruntius continued:

“Tiberius is spending hours, days, weeks, and months in the unnatural abuse of grave and serious astrology, to the bane — the woe — of men, casting the scope of men’s nativities, and, having found anything worthy in their fortune, he kills them, or throws them precipitately in the sea, and boasts that he can mock fate!

“Nay, don’t wonder; these are far from the limits of his evil, they are scarcely steps toward the end limit.

“Tiberius has his slaughterhouse at Capri, where he studies murder as an art; and they are dearest in his grace who can devise the deepest tortures.

“Thither, too, he has his boys and beautiful girls taken up out of our noblest houses, the best formed, best nurtured, and most modest. What is good in them serves to provoke his bad. Some are allured, some are threatened; others, detained by their relatives and held back in an attempt to protect them, are kidnapped and taken away by force like captives, and, in sight of their most grieved parents, dealt away to his spintries, sellaries, and slaves, masters of strange and newly invented lusts, for which wise nature has not left a name.”

Spintries and sellaries are male prostitutes.

Slaves are servants.

Arruntius continued:

“In addition to this — what most strikes and pierces us and bleeding Rome to the heart — he has, with all his craft, become the ward to his own vassal, a stale catamite, whom he upon our low and suffering necks, has raised from excrement to stand beside the gods, and be sacrificed to in Rome as if he were a god, which Jove beholds, and yet will sooner rive a senseless oak with thunder than his trunk — his body.”

According to Arruntius, Tiberius had metaphorically become the ward of Sejanus, who had been a catamite: a boy used for homosexual sex. Arruntius may also be saying that Tiberius is now Sejanus’ catamite.

One can wonder whether Trump is Putin's catamite.

Although Jupiter has witnessed this and has witnessed Sejanus' rise to power and misuse of that power, Jupiter still refrains from striking Sejanus with a lightning bolt.

Laco, Pomponius, and Minutius entered the scene.

Pomponius and Minutius were followers of Sejanus.

Laco, Pomponius, and Minutius talked among themselves, while Arruntius and Lepidus observed them from some distance away and commented privately on them.

"These letters make men doubtful what to expect, whether Tiberius' coming back to Rome, or his death," Laco said.

Tiberius' letters sometimes said that he was well and would soon return to Rome, and they sometimes said that he was deathly ill and unable to return to Rome.

Pomponius said, "True, both — and whichever comes soonest, thank the gods for it."

Arruntius said quietly to Lepidus, "Listen, their talk is about Caesar. I would hear all voices."

Minutius said, "One day, he's well, and will return to Rome. The next day, he is sick, and does not know when to hope for his return."

Laco said, "True, and today, one of Sejanus' friends was honored by special writ; and on the next morning another of Sejanus' friends was punished —"

"— by more special writ," Pomponius said.

Minutius said:

"One man receives Tiberius' praises of Sejanus. A second man receives a letter with only slight mention of Sejanus. A third man receives a letter with no mention of Sejanus. A fourth man receives a letter with rebukes of Sejanus.

“And thus Tiberius leaves the Senate divided and suspended, all uncertain.”

Laco said:

“These forked — saying one thing and then saying the opposite thing — tricks, I don’t understand them.

“I wish that he would tell us whom he loves or hates, so that we might follow, without fear or doubt!”

Arruntius said quietly to Lepidus, “Good heliotrope! Is this your honest man? Let him be yours so still. To me, he is a knave and a scoundrel.”

Literally, a heliotrope is a plant that turns its flowers to face the sun. Figuratively, a heliotrope is a person who serves people who are waxing and deserts people who are waning.

Pomponius said:

“I cannot tell whom to follow.

“Sejanus still goes on, and mounts higher, we see. New statues of Sejanus are proposed, fresh pages of titles, large inscriptions read, his fortune is sworn by, he himself newly gone out as Caesar’s colleague in the fifth Consulship. More altars smoke to him than all the gods.

“What more would he wish for?”

Arruntius said to himself, “That the dear smoke of the altars would choke him. That is what I would wish more for Sejanus.”

“Peace, good Arruntius,” Lepidus said quietly.

“But there are letters come, they say, even now, which do forbid that last,” Laco said. “The letters forbid sacrifices to any human being.”

“Do you hear so?” Minutius asked.

“Yes,” Laco said.

“By Pollux, that’s the worst,” Pomponius said.

“By Hercules, that’s the best!” Arruntius said to himself.

“I did not like the sign, when Regulus, whom we all know is no friend to Sejanus, did, by Tiberius’ so precise command, succeed a fellow in the Consulship. It boded somewhat,” Minutius said.

Pomponius said, “Not a mote. Regulus’ partner, Fulcinus Trio, is Sejanus’ own follower, and loyal to him.”

Tiberius and Sejanus were Consules ordinarii who were appointed at the beginning of the year.

Regulus and Fulcinus Trio were Consules suffecti who held office during the second part of 31 C.E. They took office when, as became the custom during the reign of Caesar Augustus, the Consules ordinarii resigned their office partway during their Consulships so that others could share the honor of being Consul.

Regulus, who was not friendly to Sejanus, was appointed to office at the command of Tiberius.

Fulcinus Trio was a follower of Sejanus.

Seeing Terentius coming toward them, Pomponius said, “Here comes Terentius. He can give us more information.”

Terentius walked over to them.

Pomponius, Minutius, and Laco talked quietly with Terentius.

Lepidus and Arruntius, still standing apart, conversed together.

Lepidus said:

“I’ll never believe anything except that Caesar has some scent of bold Sejanus’ footing [dancing, established place]. These cross-points [crossing the feet in dancing, devious plots] of varying letters and opposing Consuls, mingling his honors and his punishments, feigning now ill, now well, raising Sejanus and then depressing him, as now of late in all reports we have it, cannot be empty of scheming.

“It is Tiberius’ art.

“Tiberius has found his favorite grown too great, and, with his greatness, strong, so that all the soldiers of the Praetorian Guard have been, with their leaders, made devoted and loyal to him, so that almost all the Senate are his creatures or are mainly dependent on him, either by reason of benefit, or hope, or fear.

“Tiberius has lost much of his own patronage by sharing his power with Sejanus.

“Tiberius, by the increase of his rank lusts and rages has quite disarmed himself of love or other public means to dare an open contestation.

“Therefore, Tiberius’ subtlety has chosen this doubling line — manipulating Sejanus this way and then that — to hold Sejanus always in check: not so much to frighten Sejanus as to wholly put him out and make him uncertain, and yet check his farther boldness.

“In the meantime, by his employments of Sejanus, Tiberius makes him odious to the staggering, fickle crowd, whose aid in the end Tiberius hopes to use, as dependable, who, when they hold sway, bear down, and overturn all objects in their way.”

Tiberius was able to withdraw support from Sejanus by being fickle in his praise and dispraise of him. Since the Romans did not know whether Sejanus was in or out of favor with Tiberius, many Romans did not openly support or not support him but waited until they could find out whether or not Tiberius supported him. Tiberius also gave Sejanus tasks to perform that made him unpopular.

Arruntius said, “You may be a Lynceus, Lepidus, yet I can see no reason why a politic tyrant, who can so well disguise it, should not have taken a nearer way: pretended to be honest and loyal to Sejanus, and come home to cut Sejanus’ throat, by law.”

Lynceus was a sharp-sighted Argonaut of Jason and the Argonauts fame. He was reputed to be able to see objects that were underground.

Lepidus said, “Aye, but Tiberius’ fear would never be masked, although his vices were.”

The clients of Sejanus had been whispering among themselves. Now their voices became louder.

Lepidus and Arruntius listened to them.

“His Lordship then is still in grace?” Pomponius said.

“I assure you, he had never been in more, either of grace or of power,” Terentius said.

“The gods are wise and just,” Pomponius said.

Arruntius said to himself, “The fiends they are, to suffer thee to belie them!”

Arruntius was cynical, and he wondered why the gods had not punished such an evil person as Pomponius for saying that they were wise and just.

If the gods were wise and just, would Sejanus have so much power?

Terentius showed Pomponius, Minutius, and Laco some letters and said, "I have here his last and present letters, where Tiberius writes and calls him the 'partner of his cares' and 'his Sejanus' —"

Laco asked, "But is it true that it is prohibited to sacrifice to Sejanus?"

Terentius answered, "Some such thing Caesar makes scruple of, but he does not forbid it, no more than to himself; he says that he could wish that making sacrifices to human beings were desisted from by all."

"Is it no other?" Laco said. "Is that how it is?"

"No other, on my trust," Terentius said. "For your better assurance, here is that letter, too."

He showed them that letter from Tiberius.

Arruntius said quietly:

"How easily do wretched men believe what they would have! When men really want to believe something, they will believe it on little evidence."

He then asked Lepidus, "Does this look like a plot by Tiberius?"

Lepidus said quietly, "Noble Arruntius, wait."

Laco looked at the letter and said, "Tiberius names Sejanus here without adding Sejanus' titles."

As a mark of respect, people would mention other people's titles.

Lepidus said quietly to Arruntius, "Note that."

Arruntius replied quietly, "Yes, and if I take note of what Laco says, I will come off — turn out to be — a notable fool. I will, indeed."

"Tiberius addresses him as no other than Sejanus," Laco said. "No titles are mentioned at all."

"That's but haste in him who writes," Pomponius said. "Here Tiberius gives large amends."

He showed the others another letter from Tiberius.

"And with his own handwriting?" Minutius asked.

"Yes," Pomponius said.

"Indeed?" Laco said.

Terentius replied, "Believe it, gentlemen, Sejanus' breast has never received more full contentments than in this letter at this present time."

Pomponius asked, "Does Sejanus take well the escape of young Caligula with Macro?"

Caligula was on the island of Capri with Tiberius.

Terentius replied, "Indeed, at the first airing of that escape — when the escape first became known — it somewhat troubled him."

Lepidus said quietly to Arruntius, "Do you see this?"

Arruntius replied quietly, "This is nothing. Riddles. Until I see Sejanus struck down, no rumor about his downfall strikes — affects — me."

Some of us have said the same thing about Trump and Putin.

Arruntius and Lepidus exited.

“I don’t like it,” Pomponius said. “I wonder why Sejanus would not attempt something — a rebellion — against Tiberius during Sejanus’ Consulship, seeing the people begin to favor Caligula.”

Terentius said, “He now repents not rebelling then, but he’s employed Pagonianus to follow Caligula; and he holds that correspondence — that communication — there with all who are near and close around Caesar, in such a way that no thought — no scheme — can pass without his knowledge from there to become an act to confront and threaten him.”

“I welcome the news,” Pomponius said.

“But how did Macro come to be so trusted by and in favor with Caligula?” Laco asked.

Pomponius answered, “Oh, sir, Macro has a wife, and the young prince Caligula has an appetite. Macro can look up and spy flies in the roof when there are fleas in bed, and he has a learned nose to assure his sleeps.”

Macro can ignore things near him and keep an eye on things that are away from him. He can sleep soundly because he has a nose that scents what he needs to know to sleep soundly. Such skills ensure that he will ignore the affair of his wife with Caligula.

Pomponius continued, “Who, to be favored of the rising sun, would not lend a little of the waning moon? It is the safest ambition.”

The rising sun is Caligula, and Macro’s wife is the waning moon.

Pomponius then said, “Noble Terentius!”

Terentius said, “The night grows fast upon us. At your service.”

All present exited.

At this point in Ben Jonson’s play, a Chorus of Musicians performed.

ACT 5 (Sejanus' Fall)

— 5.1 —

Alone, Sejanus said to himself:

“Swell, swell, my joys, and don’t be afraid to declare yourselves as ample as your causes are.

“I did not live until now, this my first hour, wherein I see my power reach my thoughts. Just this one final thing, and I will seize my wishes.

“Great, and high, the world knows only two. That’s Rome, and I. My roof does not receive me — I have risen above it; it is air I tread — and, at each step, I feel my advanced — raised high — head knock out a star in heaven!”

Sejanus had risen above his house: his family. He was not a member of the highest social class, but he had grown to be the second most important person in the Roman world, and he believed that he soon would be the first most important person in that world.

Sejanus continued:

“Reared to this height, all my desires now seem modest, poor, and slight, which previously sounded impudent. It is place, not blood, that discerns and distinguishes the noble and the base.

“Isn’t there something more than to be Caesar?”

Using the royal plural, Sejanus continued:

“Must we rest there? It irks to have come so far, to be so near a standstill.

“Caligula, we wish that thou would stand steadfast and resolute, and many of you, in our way!

“Winds lose their strength when they fly empty, unmet by woods or buildings; great fires die when they lack matter to withstand them.

“So it is our grief, and it will be our loss, to know our power shall lack opponents, unless the gods, by mixing in the cause, would bless our fortune with our conquest of them.

“That would be worth Sejanus’ strife, if the Fates dared but bring it forth.”

Sejanus wanted the gods to oppose him because he would gain great glory by defeating them.

Terentius and a servant entered the scene.

“May great Sejanus be safe!” Terentius said.

“What is it now, Terentius?” Sejanus asked.

“Hasn’t my lord heard the wonder?” Terentius asked.

“No,” Sejanus said. “Tell me what it is.”

“The news is violent in the mouths of people I meet who run, in mobs, to Pompey’s Theater to view your statue, which, they say, sends forth a smoke as from a furnace, black and dreadful,” Terentius said.

“Some traitor has put fire in the statue,” Sejanus replied.

He then said to a servant, “You, go and see. And let the head of the statue be taken off, to see what is inside.”

The servant exited.

Sejanus said, “Some slave has practiced an imposture and deception to stir up and excite the people.”

Satrius, Natta, and the servant entered the scene. Satrius and Natta were clients of Sejanus.

“What is it now?” Sejanus asked.

He asked the servant, “Why do you return?”

Satrius said, “The head, my lord, already has been taken off. I saw it; and, at the opening, there leapt out a great and monstrous serpent!”

“Monstrous!” Sejanus said. “Why? Did it have a beard? And horns? No heart? A tongue as forked as flattery? Did it have the hue of such men as live in great men’s bosoms — who live under the protection of great men? Was the spirit of it Macro’s?”

Natta answered, “May it please the most divine Sejanus, in my days — and by his sacred Fortune I affirm it — I have not seen a more extended and reached-out, grown, foul, spotted, venomous, ugly —”

“Oh, the Fates!” Sejanus said. “What a wild muster’s here of attributes, to describe a worm, a snake!”

“But how should that come there, my lord!” Terentius said.

“What!” Sejanus said. “And you, too, Terentius? I think you mean to make it a prodigy — an ill omen — in your reporting.”

“Can the wise Sejanus think that heaven has meant it to mean less?” Terentius replied.

“Oh, superstition!” Sejanus said. “Why, then the falling of our couch, which broke this morning because it was burdened with the populous weight of our clients waiting to salute and greet us, or the running of the cat between our legs, as we set forth to go to the Capitol, were also prodigies.”

Terentius said:

“I think that they are ominous, and I wish that they had not happened!

“As, today, the fate of some of your servants, who, diverting from their way, not able to follow you because of the throng of people, slipped down the Gemonian stairs and broke their necks.

“Besides, in taking your last augury, no prosperous, auspicious bird appeared, but croaking ravens — birds of ill omen — flew unsteadily, and from the sacrifice flew to the prison, where they sat, all night, beating the air with sounds from their obstreperous and noisy beaks.

“I dare not counsel, but I could entreat great Sejanus to try to move the gods, once more, with sacrifice.”

Sejanus said:

“What excellent fools religion makes of men!

“Does Terentius believe that if these were dangers, as I shame to think them to be, that the gods could change the certain course of fate?

“Or, if they could, that they would — now, in a moment — for the sacrificial fat from an ox, or less, be bribed to invert those old decrees?

“If so, then think that the gods, like flies, are to be captivated with the steam of flesh or blood diffused about their altars; think that their power is as cheap as I esteem it small.

“Of all the throng of gods who fill the hall of Mount Olympus, and, without pity, lade the back of poor Atlas, who holds up the sky, I don’t know even one deity other than Fortune to whom I would throw up, in begging smoke, even one grain of incense, or whose ear I’d buy with thus much oil.

“Lady Fortune I indeed adore, and I keep her pleasing image in my house, an image previously belonging to a Roman King, but now called mine, as by the better style.”

Sejanus believed that he had a better style — title — than the old Roman Kings, and so he was a better owner of the statue of Lady Fortune.

Sejanus continued:

“I don’t care if, just for satisfying your scrupulous — distrustful and anxious — fantasies, I offer a sacrifice to Lady Fortune.

“Tell our priest to prepare for us honey, milk, and poppy, his masculine — strong — incense on the altar, and his night vestments. Say that our rites are pressing and are to be performed immediately.

“Once these rites are performed, you’ll see how vain, and how worthy of laughter, your fears are.”

They exited.

— 5.2 —

Cotta and Pomponius met each other and talked together.

Pomponius was a follower of Sejanus, and Cotta was a man without scruples.

“Pomponius! Where are you going so speedily?” Cotta asked.

Pomponius replied, “I go to give my lord Sejanus notice —”

“Notice of what?” Cotta asked.

“Of Macro,” Pomponius answered.

“Has he come back to Rome?” Cotta asked.

“He entered just now the house of Regulus,” Pomponius answered.

“The Consul opposing Sejanus?” Cotta asked.

“Some half-hour ago,” Pomponius said.

“And by night, too!” Cotta said. “Wait, sir. I’ll bear you company.”

“Come along, then,” Pomponius said.

They exited.

— 5.3 —

Macro and Regulus talked together. A servant was present.

Macro said to Regulus, “It is Caesar’s will to have a fully attended Senate, and therefore your edict must lay a deep mulct — a heavy fine — on such as shall be absent.”

“So my edict does,” Regulus said.

He told the servant, “Bear it to my fellow Consul to subscribe and add his name to it.”

Macro said to the servant, “And tell him it must be proclaimed early; the place is Apollo’s temple.”

The servant exited.

“That’s remembered,” Regulus said.

“And the edict must say at what hour,” Macro said.

“Yes,” Regulus said.

Macro asked, “Did you forget to send someone for the Provost of the Watch — for Laco?”

“I have not,” Regulus said. “Here he comes.”

Laco entered the scene.

Macro said, “Gracinus Laco, you are a friend most welcome. By and by I’ll speak with you.”

He then said to Regulus, “You must procure for me this list of the Praetorian cohorts, with the names of the Centurions, and their Tribunes.”

Tiberius had secretly placed these soldiers under the command of Macro.

“Aye,” Regulus replied.

Macro said to Laco, “I bring you letters and a wish for your good prosperity from Caesar. “

“Sir, both are welcome,” Laco said.

Macro said to Regulus, “And listen, with your note, find for me those men who are the eminent men, and the men most of action.”

“That shall be done for you, too,” Regulus said.

Macro turned to Laco and said, “Most worthy Laco, Caesar salutes you.”

Regulus, the Consul, exited.

Turning back to where Regulus had been, Macro said, “Consul! Death and Furies! Gone now?”

He said to Laco, “The theme of my conversation will please you, sir.”

He called, “Ho! Regulus?”

He then said, “May the anger of the gods follow his diligent legs and overtake them in the likeness of the gout!”

Gout is a disease that causes acute pain, especially in the feet.

Regulus returned.

Macro said to him, “Oh, my good lord, we lacked your presence. I want you to send another man to Fulcinius Trio, who supports Sejanus, straightaway, to tell him you will come and speak with him — the content of what you will speak to him about we’ll devise — to keep him there and out of the way, while I, with Laco, survey the soldiers of the Watch.”

While Macro turned to Laco, Regulus exited again.

Macro asked Laco, “What are your strengths in soldiers, Gracinus?”

Gracinus Laco answered, “Seven cohorts.”

Cohorts are military units of a Roman legion. Cohorts today would be called battalions.

Turning back to where Regulus had been, Macro said:

“You see what Caesar writes, and — gone again?

“Regulus surely has a vein of swift-winged Mercury in his feet.”

He asked Laco, “Do you know what store of the Praetorian soldiers Sejanus holds about him for his bodyguard?”

Laco answered, “I don’t know the exact number — but I think three centuries.”

A century is a unit originally of 100 soldiers, but at this time the usual number was 80 soldiers.

“Three?” Macro said. “Good.”

“Three at most, not four,” Laco said.

“And who are those Centurions?” Macro asked.

“That the Consul Regulus can best inform you,” Laco said.

“When he’s away?” Macro said sarcastically. “A spite on his nimble industry!”

He then asked, “Gracinus, do you find in these letters what place you hold in the trust of royal Caesar?”

Gracinus Laco answered, “Aye, and I am —”

Macro interrupted, “Sir, the honors there proposed are but beginnings of his great favors.”

Laco began, “They are more —”

Macro interrupted, “I heard him when he did study what to add.”

Laco said, “— my life, and all I hold —”

Macro interrupted, “You were his own first choice, which does confirm as much as you can speak; and this plan of action will, if we succeed, make more.”

He then asked, “Your guards are seven cohorts, you say?”

“Yes,” Laco answered.

“Those we must hold still in readiness, and undischarged,” Macro said.

“I understand so much,” Laco said. “But how can it —”

Macro interrupted, “— be done without suspicion, you’ll object?”

Regulus returned and asked, “What’s that?”

Laco answered, “The keeping of the Night Watch in arms when morning comes.”

Macro said, “The Senate shall be met, and shall be set so early in the temple, that all notice of the Night Watch in arms will be avoided.”

Regulus said, “If we need to, we have the commission to possess the palace, free Prince Drusus, and make him our chief.”

Drusus Junior was imprisoned in the palace. If Sejanus were to summon armed men, then Drusus Junior would be freed and placed at the head of Tiberius’ armed men.

Macro said to himself, “That secret would have burnt his reverend mouth, had he not spit it out now.”

Regulus had said something that Macro wished he had not said.

Macro said to Regulus:

“By the gods, you carry things, too. You have responsibilities.

“Let me borrow a man or two, to bear these —”

Regulus exited.

Macro said to Laco, “That idea of freeing Drusus Caesar is projected as the last, and utmost — the last resort; it is not otherwise to be remembered.”

Regulus returned with some servants.

“Here are servants,” he said.

Giving letters to the servants, Macro said:

“Carry these to Arruntius, these to Lepidus, this letter bear to Cotta, this one to Latiaris.

“If they ask you about me, say that I have taken a fresh horse and departed.”

The servants exited.

Macro said to Regulus:

“You, my lord, go to your colleague the Consul Fulcinius Trio, and be sure to hold him there with a long narration of the new fresh favors meant to be given Sejanus, his great patron.

“I, with trusted Laco here, will go to the guards.

“So then, let us separate from each other.

“For night has many eyes,

“Whereof, although most do sleep, yet some are spies.”

— 5.4 —

Trumpeters, flautists, Heralds, a Priest, Attendants, Sejanus, Terentius, Satrius, Natta, etc., met together in Sejanus’ house.

The First Herald said loudly, “Everything profane be far from here! Fly, fly far off. Be absent a far distance. Far from here be all profane.”

Heralds preceded the Priest to keep away all profane things from him and the sacrifice. Participants in the ritual were also supposed to keep away all profane thoughts.

The trumpeters and flautists sounded while the Priest washed as part of the ritual.

The Priest said, “We have been faulty, but we repent us now, and we bring pure hands, pure vestments, and pure minds.”

As part of the ritual, the Priest repented his sins.

“Pure vessels,” the First Minister said.

“And pure offerings,” the Second Minister said.

“Pure garlands,” the Third Minister said.

The Priest said, “Bestow your garlands, and, with reverence, place the vervin on the altar.”

Vervin are branches of such trees as laurel, myrtle, olive, and cypress.

“Favor your tongues!” the First Herald said loudly. “Be silent!”

One reason for silence was to avoid saying any words of ill omen.

The Priest prayed to Lady Fortune: “Great mother Fortune, Queen of human state, rectress — female ruler — of action, arbitress of fate, to whom all sway, all power, all empire bows, be present, and be propitious to our vows!”

“Favor it with your tongues!” the First Herald said loudly. “Be silent!”

“Be present, and be propitious to our vows!” the First Minister said.

The trumpeters and the flautists sounded again.

The Priest took up some of the honey with his finger and tasted it, and then he ministered to all the rest. He did the same with the milk; in an earthen vessel, he dealt the milk around him.

This done, he sprinkled milk upon the altar, then imposed the honey, and kindled and inflamed his aromatic gums, and after swinging his censer about the altar to perfume it, he placed his censer thereon, into which they put several branches of poppy.

“Gums” are aromatic substances — incense — that are burned in the censer.

The music ceased, and the Priest said, “Accept our offering, and be pleased, great goddess.”

“See, see, the image stirs!” Terentius said.

“And it turns away!” Satrius said.

“Lady Fortune averts her face!” Natta said.

The statue of Lady Fortune had turned her face away from the sacrifice.

The Priest said:

“Avert, you gods, the bad omen.”

Lady Fortune continued to look away from the sacrifice.

The Priest continued:

“Still! Still! We have neglected some pious rite.”

Lady Fortune continued to look away from the sacrifice.

“Yet!

“Heaven, be appeased, and let all the tokens — the divine signs — be false, or void, that speak thy present wrath!”

Sejanus said:

“Be thou dumb, fearful Priest. Be silent, and gather up thyself, with these thy wares, which I, in spite of thy blind mistress, or thy juggling mystery and cheating, deceiving trade, religion, throw thus, scorned, on the earth.”

Sejanus swept the altar clean.

He addressed the statue:

“Nay, hold thy look averted, until I woo thee to turn again; and thou shall stand to all posterity the eternal object of mockery and laughter, with thy neck writhed to thy tail and turned backwards like a ridiculous cat.

He ordered:

“Clear away these fumes, these superstitious lights, and all these cozening, duping ceremonies — you, your pure and spiced — over-scrupulous and over-delicate — conscience!”

The Priest, trumpeters, flautists, Heralds, attendants, etc. picked up the sacrificial items and exited.

Sejanus, Terentius, Satrius, and Natta remained.

Sejanus said:

“I — the slave and mock of fools who scorn my worthy head — I have been titled and adored as a god, yea, and been sacrificed unto, myself, in Rome, no less than Jove — and I am brought to do rites to a peevish giglot — a peevish wanton woman?”

“Perhaps the thought and shame of that made Fortune turn her face, knowing herself the lesser deity, and only my servant.

“Bashful Queen, if that is so, Sejanus thanks thy modesty.”

Seeing some men coming he asked, “Who’s that?”

Pomponius and Minutius entered the scene.

Pomponius said to Minutius, “His fortune suffers until he hears my news. I’ve waited here too long.”

He then said to Sejanus, “Macro, my lord —”

Sejanus said, “Speak lower, and withdraw with me.”

Sejanus took Pomponius aside. The others conversed while Sejanus and Pomponius conferred privately.

“Are these things true?” Terentius asked.

“Thousands are gazing at it, in the streets,” Minutius answered.

Returning from his conference with Pomponius, Sejanus asked, “What’s that?”

Terentius said, “Minutius tells us here, my lord, that, a new head being set upon your statue, a rope has since been found wreathed about it; and, just now, a fiery meteor, in the form of a great ball, was seen to roll along the troubled air, where yet it hangs, its flight unfinished, the amazing wonder of the multitude!”

“No more,” Sejanus said. “That Macro’s come is more ominous than all these other things!”

“Has Macro come?” Terentius asked.

“I saw him,” Pomponius said.

“Where?” Terentius asked. “With whom?”

“With Regulus,” Pomponius said.

Sejanus said, “Terentius —”

“My lord?” Terentius said.

Sejanus ordered, “Send for the military Tribunes. We will immediately have more of the soldiers sent up for our bodyguard.”

Terentius exited.

Sejanus said, “Minutius, we want you to go for Cotta, Latiaris, Trio the Consul, and whatever other Senators you know are sure and are on our side.”

Minutius exited.

Sejanus ordered, “You, my good Natta, go for Laco, Provost of the Watch.”

Natta exited.

Sejanus said, “Now, Satrius, the time of proof comes on. Arm all our servants, and do it without tumult.”

Satrius exited.

Sejanus ordered, “You, Pomponius, hold some good conversation with the Consul Regulus. Attempt to influence him to be on our side, noble friend.”

Pomponius exited.

Alone, Sejanus said to himself:

“These things begin to look like dangers, now, that are worthy of my fates.

“Lady Fortune, I see thy worst. Let doubtful states of affairs and uncertain things hang upon thy will. Surest death shall render me a certain accounting still.

“Yet why is now my thought turned toward death, when I am a man whom the Fates have let go on so far in breath, unchecked and unproved?

“I am the man who helped to fell the lofty cedar of the world: Germanicus.

“I am the man who, at one stroke, cut down Drusus Senior, that upright elm; withered his vine — his wife, Livia; laid Silius and Sabinus, two strong oaks, flat on the earth; besides those other shrubs — insignificant people — Cordus and Sosia, Claudia Pulchra, Furnius and Gallus, which I have grubbed up and uprooted; and since have set my axe so strong and deep into the root of spreading Agrippina; lopped off and scattered her proud branches, Nero, Drusus Junior, and Caius Caligula, too, although replanted —”

Caligula was replanted on the island of Capri, where was the Emperor Tiberius.

Sejanus continued:

“If it is your will, Destinies — the three Fates — that, after all this, I faint now, before I touch my goal, you are just cruel; and I already have done things great enough.”

The three Fates determined the length of mortal lives.

Sejanus continued:

“All Rome has been my slave. The Senate sat and was an idle onlooker and witness of my power, when I have blushed and was ashamed more to command it than to suffer it.”

The Senate had approved whatever Sejanus wanted. Sejanus could have asked for more things for the Senate to approve, but he was ashamed to ask for more, having gotten so much already.

Sejanus continued:

“All the Senate fathers have sat ready and prepared to give me empire, temples, or their throats, when I would ask for them. And, what crowns the top, Rome, Senate, people, all the world have seen Jove as just my equal, Caesar as just my second.

“It is then your malice, Fates, who, except your own,

“Envy and fear to have any power long known.”

— 5.5 —

Terentius and some Tribunes stood together.

Terentius said to the Tribunes, “Stay here. I’ll tell His Lordship that you have come.”

“His Lordship” was Sejanus.

Minutius, Cotta, and Latiaris, all of whom were carrying letters from Tiberius, entered the scene.

Latiaris supported Sejanus. Cotta was a Senator without scruples.

Minutius said, "Marcus Terentius, please tell my lord that here are Cotta and Latiaris."

"Sir, I shall," Terentius said.

He exited.

Cotta and Latiaris conferred over and compared their letters.

Cotta said, "My letter is the very same as yours; it only requires me to be present there, and to give my voice — my vote — to strengthen Tiberius' design."

"Doesn't he name what it is?" Latiaris asked.

"No, nor does he name it to you," Cotta said.

"It is strange, and singularly ambiguous!" Latiaris said.

"So it is!" Cotta said. "It may be the case that all has been left to Lord Sejanus."

Natta and Laco entered the scene.

"Gentlemen, where's my lord?" Natta asked.

"We await him here," a Tribune said.

"The Provost Laco?" Cotta said. "What's the news?"

Latiaris began, "My lord —"

He was interrupted by the arrival of Sejanus and Terentius.

Sejanus said:

"Now, my right dear, noble, and trusted friends. How much I am a captive to your kindness!

"Most worthy Cotta, Latiaris; Laco, give me your valiant hand; and gentlemen, give me your loves.

“I wish I could divide myself unto you; or I could wish that it lay within our” — he was using the majestic plural — “narrow powers to give satisfaction to you for your so enlarged bounty to me.

“Gracinus Laco, we much ask you, hold your guards undischarged when morning comes.”

He then asked Minutius:

“Did you see the Consul?”

“Trio will very quickly be here, my lord,” Minutius answered.

“They are just giving orders for the edict to officially summon the Senate,” Cotta said.

The two Consuls were telling the Senators to assemble.

“What! The Senate?” Sejanus said.

Normally, he would know all the doings of the Senate.

“Yes,” Latiaris said. “This morning, in Apollo’s temple.”

“We are ordered by letter to be there, my lord,” Cotta said.

“By letter?” Sejanus said. “Please let me see the letter.”

Latiaris whispered to Cotta, “Doesn’t His Lordship know about this?”

“His Lordship” was Sejanus.

Cotta whispered back, “It seems that he doesn’t!”

“A Senate ordered to assemble?” Sejanus said. “Without my knowledge? And this suddenly? Senators by letters required to be there! Who brought these?”

“Macro,” Cotta answered.

“My enemy!” Sejanus said. “And when?”

“This midnight,” Cotta said.

Sejanus said, “Time, along with every other circumstance, shows that it has some strain of plot in it!”

Seeing Satrius coming, he said, “What is the news now?”

Satrius entered the scene, and Sejanus and he talked together privately.

Satrius said to Sejanus, “My lord, Sertorius Macro is outside, alone, and he requests to have a private conference about business of high nature with Your Lordship, he says to me. This business much regards and affects you.”

“Let him come here,” Sejanus said.

“It is better, my lord, to withdraw,” Satrius advised. “You will betray what number and strength of friends are now about you, which information he comes here to spy and learn.”

“Isn’t he armed?” Sejanus asked.

“We’ll search him,” Satrius said.

Sejanus ordered, “No, but take and lead him to some room where you, concealed, may keep a guard upon us.”

Satrius exited.

Sejanus then said, “Noble Laco, you are our trust, and until our own cohorts can be brought up, your strengths must be our guard.”

He then spoke humbly to his supporters: “Now, good Minutius, honored Latiaris, most worthy, and my most unwearied friends, I will return very quickly.”

He exited.

“Most worthy lord!” Latiaris said.

“His Lordship has suddenly turned kind, I think,” Cotta said.
“I have not observed it in him heretofore.”

“It is true, and it becomes him nobly,” the First Tribune said.

“I am enraptured with it,” Minutius said.

“By Mars, he has my lives, even if they were a million, for this single grace,” the Second Tribune said.

“Aye, and to call a man by some title!” Laco said.

Sejanus had called them “good Minutius, honored Latiaris, most worthy, and my most unwearied friends.”

“As he did me!” Latiaris said.

“And me!” Minutius said.

“Who would not spend his life and fortunes to purchase but the look of such a lord?” Latiaris said.

Laco said to himself, “He who would be neither a lord’s fool nor the world’s.”

— 5.6 —

Sejanus, Macro, and Satrius were in a room together.

Sejanus said, “Macro! Most welcome, as my most desired and wished-for friend! Let me enjoy my longings. When did you arrive?”

“About the noon of night,” Macro said.

Sejanus said, “Satrius, allow us to speak alone.”

Satrius exited and then concealed himself in a place where he could watch and guard Sejanus.

Macro said, "I have been, since I came, with both the Consuls, Regulus and Trio, on a private mission from Caesar."

"How fares it with our great and royal master?" Sejanus asked.

Macro answered:

"Right plentifully well, as with a prince who still extends the great proportion of his large favors to the man whom his judgment has already made once divine choice — like the god who does not fail nor is wearied to bestow his bounty on the man whose merit deserves it, as merit does in you, already the most happy, and, before the sun shall climb the south, the most high Sejanus.

"Let not my lord be amazed. For to this end was I by Caesar sent for, to come to the isle of Capri, where he is, with special caution to conceal my journey; and from there I had my dispatch as privately again to Rome. I was ordered to come here by night, and only to the Consuls make narration of his great purpose, so that the benefit might come fuller and more striking by how much it was less looked for or aspired by you, or least given form in the common thought."

"What may this be?" Sejanus asked. "You are part of myself, my soulmate, dear Macro! If it is good, speak out and share it with your Sejanus."

Macro said:

"If it were bad, I should forever loathe myself to be the messenger to so good a lord.

"I exceed my instructions by acquainting your Lordship with thus much; but I am willing to rely on your wise secrecy and prudent silence, and I do this because I would have no apprehensive fear molest or rack your peace of thought.

“For I assure you, my noble lord, that no Senator yet knows the business meant, though all, by separate letters, are told to be there and give their votes, only to add to the state and grace — dignity and favor — of what is purposed.”

“You take pleasure, Macro, like a coy wench, in torturing your devoted friend,” Sejanus said. “What can be worth this suffering?”

Macro said, “That which follows, the tribunicial power that you, Sejanus, are to have this day conferred upon you, and by public Senate.”

Macro was saying that Sejanus would get the tribunicia potestas, which would mark him as the heir to Tiberius. A person with the tribunicial power could veto Senatorial decrees and could propose laws, and his person was inviolable.

“Lady Fortune, be mine again!” Sejanus said. “Thou have answered sufficiently and given satisfaction for thy imagined disloyalty.”

“My lord, I have no longer time,” Macro said. “The day approaches, and I must go back to Caesar.”

“Where’s Caligula?” Sejanus asked.

Most people would have assumed that Caligula would be the successor to Tiberius.

Macro said:

“That I forgot to tell Your Lordship.

“Why, he lingers yonder, about Capri, disgraced. Tiberius has not seen him yet.

“Caligula would have insisted on thrusting himself to go with me, against my wish and will, but I have repaid his presumptuous trouble with as reluctant a response as my neglect or silence could afford him.

“Your Lordship cannot now command me anything because I take no knowledge that I saw you, but I shall boast to live to serve Your Lordship, and so I take my leave.”

“Honest and worthy Macro, your love and friendship,” Sejanus said.

He called, “Who’s there?”

Satrius showed himself.

Sejanus said, “Satrius, attend my honorable friend as he goes forth.”

Macro and Satrius exited, leaving Sejanus alone.

Sejanus said to himself:

“Oh, how vain and vile a passion is this fear! What base, uncomely things it makes men do!

“Suspect their noblest friends, as I did this man, Macro, flatter poor enemies, entreat their servants, stoop, court, and catch at the benevolence of creatures to whom, within this hour, I would not have vouchsafed a quarter-look — a contemptuous sidelong glance — or the sight of a piece of my face!

“You, whom fools call gods, hang all the sky with your prodigious signs, fill earth with monsters, drop the Scorpion down out of the zodiac, or the fiercer Lion — Leo — shake off the loosened globe from her long hinge — the long axle of the earth — roll all the world in darkness, and let loose the enraged winds to turn up groves and towns!

“When I fear again, let me be struck with forked fire — lightning — and unpitied die.

“He who fears, is worthy of calamity.”

— 5.7 —

Terentius, Minutius, Laco, Cotta, Latiaris, some Tribunes, and others met Pomponius and the two Consuls: Regulus and Trio.

“Isn’t my lord here?” Pomponius asked about Sejanus.

“Sir, he will be here very soon,” Terentius answered.

Cotta asked Trio the Consul quietly, “What is the news, Fulcinius Trio?”

They held a hushed conversation.

Trio answered:

“Good, good tidings, but keep it to yourself.

“My lord Sejanus is to receive this day, in open Senate, the tribunicial power.”

“Is it true?” Cotta asked.

“No words — do not give voice to your thought — but sir, believe it,” Trio answered.

Latiaris joined in this hushed conversation.

“What does the Consul say?” Latiaris asked.

“Don’t tell anyone,” Cotta said. “He tells me that today my lord Sejanus —”

Trio interrupted, “— I must entreat you, Cotta, on your honor not to reveal it.”

“On my life, sir,” Cotta said.

“Say it,” Latiaris said.

Cotta did:

“— is to receive the tribunicial power.

“But as you are an honorable man, let me conjure you not to utter it, for that information was entrusted to me with that condition.”

“I am Harpocrates,” Latiaris said.

Harpocrates was the Egyptian god of silence. Images show him holding a finger to his lips.

“Can you guarantee that it is true?” Terentius asked.

“The Consul told it to me, but he told me to keep it secret,” Pomponius said.

“Lord Latiaris, what’s the news?” Minutius asked.

Latiaris said, “I’ll tell you, but you must swear to keep it secret —”

He was interrupted by the arrival of Sejanus.

Sejanus said, “I knew the Fates had on their distaff left more of our thread, than so.”

The Fates spun the thread of life of each man. Sejanus had been afraid that his life would be cut short, but now he was reassured that he would live long and prosper.

The then-current proverb “to have more tow [flax] on one’s distaff than one can spin” means “to have trouble waiting for one.”

“Hail, great Sejanus!” Regulus said.

“Hail, the most honored!” Trio the Consul said.

“Happy Sejanus!” Cotta said.

“High Sejanus!” Latiaris said.

“Do you bring prodigies, too?” Sejanus asked.

A prodigy is 1) an omen, or 2) a monster, or 3) a marvel.

Trio said, “May all omens turn to those fair effects, whereof we bring our Lordship news!”

“May it please my lord to withdraw?” Regulus asked.

Sejanus replied, “Yes.”

He then said to some people who were standing nearby, “I will speak with you soon.”

“My lord, what is your pleasure for the Tribunes?” Terentius asked.

“Why, let them be thanked, and sent away,” Sejanus said.

The Tribunes were his bodyguards, whom Sejanus did not think he needed now.

Minutius, Sejanus’ friend, began to object, “My lord —”

Laco interrupted, “Will it please Your Lordship to command me?”

“No,” Sejanus said. “You’re troublesome.”

“The mood has changed,” Minutius said.

Earlier, Sejanus had been respectful to other people, including Laco.

“Not speak?” the First Tribune asked.

“Nor look?” the Second Tribune asked.

Laco said:

“Aye. He is ‘wise’ and will make him friends

“Of such who never love but for their ends.”

Sejanus would be friends only with people who thought he could help them in some way.

Arruntius and Lepidus stood together.

Some other Senators, including Sanquinius and Haterius, passed by them on their way to see Sejanus.

Arruntius made a commentary on the Senators, who did not overhear him:

“Aye, go, make haste. Take heed that you are not the last person to tender your ‘All hail!’ in the wide hall of huge Sejanus.”

“All hail” was a greeting. The wide hall was where Sejanus met his clients.

Arruntius continued:

“Run a Lictor’s pace.”

Lictors were quick-footed. They cleared the way for magistrates and made arrests.

Arruntius continued:

“Don’t wait to put your robes on, but go, with the pale troubled ensigns — signs — of great friendship stamped in your face!”

Arruntius said:

“Now, Marcus Lepidus, you still believe your former augury?”

“Sejanus must go downward? You perceive his wane approaching fast?”

Sejanus seemed to be approaching the highest mark of his life.

“Believe me, Lucius,” Lepidus said. “I wonder at this rising of Sejanus!”

Lucius Arruntius replied:

“Aye, and that we must give our vote to it? You will say that it is to make his fall steeper and more grievous?”

“It may be so. But those who think that way try with idle wishes to bring back time.

“In desperate cases, all hope is crime.

“See, see! What troops of his officious friends flock to salute my lord! And they appear before my great proud lord, to get a lord-like nod!

“See what they do:

“Attend my lord as he goes to the Senate house!

“Bring back my lord!

“Like servile ushers, make way for my lord!

“Proclaim his idol Lordship, more than ten criers, or a band of six trumpets!

“Bend legs and make bows, kiss hands, and brush a scattered hair from my lord’s eminent shoulder!

“See Sanquinius, with his big belly that slows him, and his dropsy! Look what toiling haste he makes! Yet here’s another, retarded with and slowed by the gout, who will crowd in front of Sanquinius!

“Get thee Liburnian porters, thou gross fool, to bear thy obsequious fatness, like thy peers.

“They’re met! The gout returns, and his great carriage.”

He was referring to the gout-ridden Haterius and the overweight Sanquinius.

Some Lictors, the two Consuls, and Sejanus passed by them.

A Lictor called, "Give way! Make place! Room for the Consul!"

"Hail, hail, great Sejanus!" Sanquinius said.

"Hail, my honored lord!" Haterius said.

Everyone except Arruntius and Lepidus exited.

"We shall be noticed and marked soon for our not-hail to Sejanus," Arruntius said.

"That has already been done," Lepidus said.

"It is a note of upstart greatness to observe and watch for these poor trifles, which the noble mind neglects and scorns," Arruntius said.

The poor trifles were the hails to Sejanus.

Lepidus said, "Aye, and they think themselves deeply dishonored where they are omitted, as if they were necessities that helped to the perfection of their dignities and hate the men who just withhold them from them."

Arruntius replied, "Oh, there is a farther cause of hate. Their breasts are guilty that we know their obscure origins and base beginnings. Thence the anger grows. Let's go on and follow them!"

They exited.

Macro and Laco talked together.

Marco said, “When all have entered, shut the temple doors, and bring your guards up to the gate.”

“I will,” Laco said.

“If you hear commotion in the Senate, present yourself — and charge on any man who attempts to come forth.”

“I understand my instructions,” Laco said.

They exited.

— 5.10 —

The Senate assembled in the temple of Apollo Palatine.

Present were Heralds, Lictors, Regulus, Sejanus, Trio, Haterius, Sanquinius, Cotta, Pomponius, Latiaris, Lepidus, and Arruntius, along with Natta, a Praetor, and other Senators.

“How well His Lordship looks today!” Haterius said.

“As if he had been born or made for this hour’s state,” Trio said.

“This hour’s state” was “this hour’s greatness”: The rumor was that Sejanus would be invested with tribunicial power.

“Your fellow Consul’s come about, I think?” Cotta said.

The fellow Consul was Regulus, who had been an enemy to Sejanus. Cotta meant that Regulus had come about and was now on the side of Sejanus.

“Aye, he’s wise,” Trio said.

“Sejanus trusts him well,” Sanquinius said.

“Sejanus is a noble, bounteous lord,” Trio said.

“He is, indeed, and he is most valiant,” Haterius said.

“And most wise,” Latiaris said.

“He’s everything,” the First Senator said.

“He’s worthy of all, and more than bounty can bestow,” Latiaris said.

“This dignity will make him worthy,” Trio said.

“Above Caesar,” Pomponius said.

“Tut, Caesar is only the rector — ruler — of an isle,” Sanquinius said. “Sejanus is the ruler of the Empire.”

“Now he will have power more to reward than ever,” Trio said.

Sejanus would have more power than ever to reward those who were loyal to him.

“Let us make sure that we will not be slack in giving him our votes,” Cotta said.

“I won’t be slack,” Latiaris said.

“Nor I,” Sanquinius said.

“The readier we seem to propagate his honors and make them grow, the more we will bind his thought to ours,” Cotta said.

They wanted to keep what honors they had — and get more — by being followers of Sejanus.

“I think right with Your Lordship,” Haterius said. “It is the way to have us hold our places.”

“Aye, and get more,” Sanquinius said.

“More official positions, and more titles,” Latiaris said.

“I would not lose the part I hope to share in these fortunes of his, for my inheritance,” Pomponius said.

“See how Arruntius sits, and Lepidus,” Latiaris said.

Other Senators, but not Arruntius and Lepidus, were sitting as close as possible to Sejanus.

Arruntius and Lepidus were definitely not followers of Sejanus.

“Let them alone,” Trio said. “They will be marked soon.”

“I’ll do the same as the others,” the First Senator said.

“So will I,” the Second Senator said.

“And I,” the Third Senator said. “Men grow not in the state except as they are planted warm in his favors.”

“Noble Sejanus!” Cotta said loudly so that Sejanus would hear him.

“Honored Sejanus!” Haterius said loudly.

“Worthy and great Sejanus!” Latiaris said loudly.

Noticing this, Arruntius said quietly to Lepidus:

“Gods! How the sponges open and take in! And shut again!

“Look, look!

“Isn’t he blest who gets a seat within eye-reach of Sejanus?

“Isn’t he more blessed who comes within ear- or tongue-reach?

“Oh, but most blest of all is he who can claw his crafty, cunning elbow, or with a buzz flyblow Sejanus’ ears!”

The Praetor said to the Heralds, “Proclaim the Senate’s silence, and read out loud the final summons by the edict.”

The First Herald shouted, “Silence! In the name of Caesar and the Senate, silence!”

The First Herald then read out loud the final summons:

“Memmius Regulus and Fulcinius Trio, Consuls, these present kalends of June with the first light, shall hold a Senate in the temple of Apollo Palatine.”

The kalends of June is June 1, and the year was 31 C.E., but Ben Jonson has the wrong date: Sejanus was actually condemned on 18 October 31 C.E.

The First Herald then continued to read out loud the final summons:

“All who are fathers and are registered fathers who have the right of entering the Senate, we tell you to be in full number present.

“Take knowledge that the business is the commonwealth’s.

“Whosoever is absent, his fine or mulct will be taken. His excuse will not be taken.”

“Note who are absent, and record their names,” Trio ordered.

Regulus the Consul said:

“Fathers conscript, may what I am to utter turn good and happy for the commonwealth.

“And thou, Apollo, god of light and truth, in whose holy house we here are met, inspire us all with truth and with liberty of judgment to our thought.

“The majesty of great Tiberius Caesar propounds to this grave Senate the bestowing upon the man he loves, honored Sejanus, the tribunicial power.

“Here are his letters, signed with his signet.

“What please now the fathers to be done?”

The Senators said, “Read, read them, openly and publicly, read them.”

“Caesar has honored his own greatness much in thinking of this act,” Cotta said loudly.

“It was a happy thought, and worthy of Caesar,” Trio said loudly.

“And the lord as worthy it, on whom it is directed!” Latiaris said loudly.

“Most worthy!” Haterius said loudly.

Sanquinius said loudly, “Rome did never boast the virtue that could give envy bounds, but his: the virtue of Sejanus —”

“Honored and noble!” the First Senator said loudly.

“Good and great Sejanus!” the Second Senator said loudly.

Arruntius said to himself, “Oh, most tame slavery, and ardent flattery!”

The First Herald ordered, “Silence!”

The First Herald then read Tiberius Caesar’s epistle — letter — out loud:

“Tiberius Caesar to the Senate, greeting.

“If you conscript fathers, with your children, are in health, it is abundantly well. We with our friends here are so.

“The care of the commonwealth, howsoever we are removed in person, cannot be absent to our thought, although, often, even to princes most present, the truth of their own affairs is hidden, than which nothing falls out more miserable to a state, or makes the art of governing more difficult.

“But since it has been our easeful happiness to enjoy both the aids and industry of so vigilant a Senate, we profess to have been the more indulgent to our pleasures, not as being careless of our office, but rather secure of the necessity.”

Tiberius meant that he felt confident that he did not need to be present in Rome because the Senate was capable of handling things in his absence.

The First Herald continued to read Tiberius Caesar’s epistle out loud:

“Neither do these common rumors of many and infamous libels published against our retirement at all afflict us, being born more out of men’s ignorance than their malice; and will, neglected, find their own grave quickly, whereas too feelingly acknowledged and reacted to, it would make their obloquy ours.

“Nor do we desire that their authors, though found, be censured, since in a free state (as ours) all men ought to enjoy both their minds and tongues free.”

Arruntius said to himself, “The lapwing! The lapwing!”

Lapwings are birds that nest on the ground, and they are loudest when away from their nest to keep enemies away from their nestlings. Sometimes they pretend to have an injured wing and cry while leading enemies away from the nest. When the enemy is a safe distance from the nest, the lapwing takes flight. A group of lapwings is called a deceit of lapwings.

The First Herald continued to read Tiberius Caesar’s epistle out loud:

“Yet, in things which shall worthily and more nearly concern the majesty of a prince, we shall fear to be so unnaturally cruel to our own fame and reputation as to neglect them.

“True it is, conscript fathers, that we have raised Sejanus from obscure and almost unknown gentry and birth —”

“Hear! Hear!” the Senators said.

The expression means to pay attention to the speaker and implies approval of what is being said.

The First Herald continued to read Tiberius Caesar’s epistle out loud:

“— to the highest and most conspicuous point of greatness, and, we hope, deservedly; yet not without danger — it being a most bold hazard in that sovereign who, by his personal love to one, dares risk the hatred of all his other subjects.”

Arruntius said to himself, “This touches; this wounds; the mood changes.”

The First Herald continued to read Tiberius Caesar’s epistle out loud:

“But we have faith in your loves and understandings, and do in no way suspect the merit of our Sejanus to make our favors offensive to any —”

“Oh! Good, good!” the Senators said.

The First Herald continued to read Tiberius Caesar’s epistle out loud:

“— though we could have wished his zeal had run a calmer course against Agrippina and our nephews, howsoever the openness of their actions declared them delinquents; and that he would have remembered no innocence is so safe, but it rejoices to stand in the sight of mercy — the use of which in us he has so completely taken away toward them by his loyal fury, as now our clemency would be thought but wearied cruelty, if we should offer to exercise it.”

Tiberius Caesar was now openly criticizing Sejanus.

He was obliquely saying that there would be no clemency — mercy — for Sejanus.

Is weariness of cruelty mercy? No.

What is weariness of cruelty? Being so tired of committing cruelty that one stops being cruel. E.g., whipping someone until one's arm grows so tired that one cannot whip that someone any more.

Recognizing what was happening, Arruntius said to himself, "I thank him; there I looked for it. A good fox!"

A proverb of the time stated, "A fox may grow grey but never good."

The First Herald continued to read Tiberius Caesar's epistle out loud:

"Some there are who would interpret Sejanus' public severity to be personal ambition, and that under a pretext of service to us he does but remove his own hindrances; citing the strengths he has made to himself by the Praetorian soldiers, by his faction in court and Senate, by the offices he holds himself and confers on others, his practice of courting popularity and dependents, his urging (and almost driving) us to this our unwilling retirement, and lastly, his aspiring to be our son-in-law."

"This is strange!" the Senators said.

Arruntius said quietly to himself about Marcus Lepidus, "I shall soon believe your vultures, Marcus."

Vultures are birds of omen. Lepidus had speculated about a coming downfall for Sejanus.

The First Herald continued to read Tiberius Caesar's epistle out loud:

“Your wisdoms, conscript fathers, are able to examine and judge these suggestions. But, were they left to our acquitting verdict, we dare to pronounce them, as we think them, most malicious.”

“Oh, he has restored all!” the Senators said. “Listen!”

It sounded as if Tiberius were still on the side of Sejanus.

The First Herald continued to read Tiberius Caesar’s epistle out loud:

“Yet are they offered to be averred and proven true, and on the lives of the informers.

“What we should say, or rather what we should not say, lords of the Senate, if this should be true, our gods and goddesses confound us if we know!

“Only, we must think we have placed our benefits ill; and conclude that in our choice, either we were lacking to the gods, or the gods to us.”

Now it definitely sounded as if Tiberius were NOT on the side of Sejanus.

The Senators shifted uneasily in their places.

Arruntius said to himself, “The place grows hot; they shift.”

The First Herald continued to read Tiberius Caesar’s epistle out loud:

“We have not been desirous, honorable fathers, to change; neither is it now any new lust that alters our affection, or old loathing, but those needful concerns of state, which warn wiser princes, hourly, to provide for their safety, and teach them how learned — deeply read in history — a thing it is to beware of the humblest enemy, much more of those great ones whom their own employed favors have made fit for their fears.”

“Let’s leave!” the First Senator said.

“Let’s sit farther away,” the Second Senator said.

“Let’s remove ourselves,” Cotta said.

They suddenly wanted to move away from Sejanus.

Arruntius said to himself, “Gods! How the leaves drop off, even in this little wind!”

The First Herald continued to read Tiberius Caesar’s epistle out loud:

“We therefore desire that the offices he holds be first seized by the Senate and himself suspended from all exercise of place or power —”

“What!” the Senators said.

Getting up to leave his place near Sejanus, Sanquinius said, “By your leave.”

Arruntius said quietly to himself about Sanquinius, “Come, porpoise.”

A proverb stated, “The porpoise plays before a storm.” In other words, the activity — dancing — of a porpoise was thought to foretell a storm.

“Where’s Haterius?” Arruntius asked. “His gout keeps him most miserably constant — in one place.”

That place was near Sejanus.

Speaking of Sanquinius, Arruntius said, “Your dancing shows a tempest.”

“Read no more,” Sejanus said to the First Herald.

“Lords of the Senate, keep your seats,” Regulus the Consul said.

He then ordered the First Herald, “Read on.”

“These letters, they are forged,” Sejanus said.

Regulus called, “A guard!”

Then he ordered everyone, “Sit still.”

Laco entered with the guards.

Arruntius said to himself, “Here’s change!”

Regulus the Consul said to the First Herald, “Bid the others to be silent, and read forward. Continue to read the epistle out loud.”

The First Herald shouted, “Silence!”

The First Herald then continued to read Tiberius Caesar’s epistle out loud:

“— and himself suspended from all exercise of place or power, but until due and mature trial be made of his innocency, which yet we can faintly apprehend the necessity to doubt.”

One meaning of the word “doubt” at this time is “fear.”

The First Herald continued to read Tiberius Caesar’s epistle out loud:

“If, conscript fathers, to your more searching wisdoms there shall appear farther cause — or of farther proceeding, either to seizure of lands, goods, or more — it is not our power that shall limit your authority, or our favor that must corrupt your justice. Either would be dishonorable in you, and both would be uncharitable to ourself.

“We would willingly be present with your counsels in this business, but the danger of so potent a faction, if it should prove so, forbids our attempting it, unless one of the Consuls would be entreated for our safety to undertake the guard of us as we return home; then we should most readily risk the journey back to Rome.

“In the meantime, it shall not be fitting for us to importune and urge so judicious a Senate, who know how much they hurt the innocent by sparing the guilty, and how grateful a sacrifice to the gods is the life of an ingrateful and ungrateful person.

“We reflect not in this on Sejanus — notwithstanding, if you keep an eye upon him — and there is Latiaris, who is a Senator, and Pinnarius Natta, who are two of Sejanus’ most trusted ministers, and so professed, whom we desire not to have apprehended, except as the necessity of the cause exacts it.”

Regulus the Consul said to a guard, “Put a guard on Latiaris!”

“Oh, the spy!” Arruntius said. “The reverend spy is caught! Who pities him?”

Latiaris was a Senator, and therefore he was reverend.

Arruntius said to Latiaris, “Reward, sir, for your service. Now that you have done your property — your function — you see what use is made of you? And you see how you are treated?”

Under guard, Latiaris and Natta exited.

Arruntius said, “Hang up the instrument.”

An instrument is a tool; it can be a person who is made use of.

The image here is of a musical instrument that has been played and is then being hung on a wall.

Attempting to leave, Sejanus said, “Give me leave.”

Brandishing his weapon, Laco said, “Stand, stand! He comes upon his death who does advance an inch toward my point.”

“Have we no friend here?” Sejanus asked.

“Hushed,” Arruntius said. “Where are now all the hails and acclamations?”

Macro entered the scene.

He said, “Hail to the Consuls and to this noble Senate!”

Sejanus said to himself, “Is Macro here? Oh, thou are lost, Sejanus.”

The Senators began to rise.

Macro said to the Senators:

“Sit still, and unfrightened, reverend fathers.

“Macro, by Caesar’s grace the new-made Provost [Commander of the Praetorian Guard], and now in charge of the Praetorian bands — an honor that recently belonged to that proud man —”

He pointed to Sejanus.

Macro continued, “— bids you to be safe; and to your constant doom — your loyal and firm judgment — of his deservings, offers you the surety — the safety — of all the soldiers, Tribunes, and Centurions received in our command. They will guard and keep you safe.”

Regulus the Consul said, “Sejanus! Sejanus!”

Sejanus appeared not to hear.

Regulus called, “Stand forth, Sejanus!”

“Am I called?” Sejanus asked.

Macro said, “Aye, thou, thou insolent monster, are ordered to stand.”

Macro used the word “thou” to refer to Sejanus, a word that he would use to speak to an inferior.

Sejanus replied, more courteously than Macro had spoken to him, “Why, Macro, it has been otherwise between you and me! This court, who knows us both, has seen a difference, and can, if it is pleased to speak, confirm whose insolence is most.”

Macro said:

“Come down, Typhoeus.”

Typhoeus, who had 100 snake heads on his shoulders, was a Titan who attempted but failed to overthrow Jupiter, the King of the gods.

Macro continued:

“If my insolence be most, lo, thus I make it more:

“I kick up thy heels in air, tear off thy robe, and play with thy beard and nostrils.”

As Macro mentioned all these actions, he performed them.

Macro continued:

“Thus it is fitting — and let no man take compassion on thy state — let them treat the ingrateful and ungrateful viper as deserved and tread his brains into the earth.

Regulus the Consul said, “Forbear from acting that way. Stop.”

Macro replied:

“If I could lose all my humanity now, it would be well to torture so deserving a traitor.”

He meant that if he lost all his humanity, he could torture Sejanus as harshly as Sejanus deserved.

Macro continued:

“Wherefore, fathers, do you sit amazed and silent, and do not censure this wretch, who in the hour he first rebelled against Caesar’s bounty, did condemn himself?”

“Phlegra, the field where all the sons of earth mustered against the gods, never acknowledged so proud and huge a monster.”

Phlegra is the battlefield where Jupiter defeated the Titans, aka the sons of earth.

Regulus the Consul ordered, “Take Sejanus away from here. And may all the gods guard Caesar!”

Trio the Consul said to the Lictors, “Take him away from here.”

“Hence!” Haterius said.

“To the dungeon with him!” Cotta said.

“He deserves it,” Sanquinius said.

“Crown all our doors with laurel wreaths!” the First Senator said.

Laurel wreaths were a sign of victory.

“And let an ox with gilded horns and garlands immediately be led to the Capitol!” Sanquinius said.

“And sacrificed to Jove for Caesar’s safety!” Haterius said.

“May all our gods be present still to Caesar!” Trio said.

“Phoebus Apollo!” Cotta said.

“Mars!” Sanquinius said.

“Diana!” Haterius said.

“Pallas Athena!” Sanquinius said.

“Juno, Mercury, all guard him!” the Second Senator said.

Macro said to Sejanus, “Go forth, thou prodigy — monster — of men!”

Under guard, Sejanus exited.

“Let all the traitor’s titles be defaced,” Cotta said.

“Let his images and statues be pulled down,” Trio the Consul said.

“Let his chariot wheels be broken,” Haterius said.

Arruntius said sardonically, “And the legs of the poor horses, which have deserved no punishment, let them be broken, too.”

They were talking about the chariot wheels and the legs of the horses that were part of the statues of Sejanus.

“O violent change and whirl of men’s affections!” Lepidus said.

Arruntius said, “It is as if both their bulks — bodies — and souls were bound on Fortune’s wheel and must act only with her motion.”

When the wheel of Lady Fortune raises Sejanus high, people treat him one way.

When the wheel of Lady Fortune lowers Sejanus, people treat him a different way.

Macro, Regulus, Trio, Haterius, Sanquinius, etc., exited.

Lepidus, Arruntius, and a few Senators remained behind.

Lepidus said:

“Who would depend upon the shifting popular air and favor, or voice of men, who have today beheld that which, even if all the gods had foredeclared it, would not have been believed: Sejanus’ fall?”

“He who this morning rose as proudly as the sun, and, breaking through a mist of clients’ breath, came on as gazed at and admired as he — the sun — when superstitious Moors salute his light!

“He who had our servile nobles waiting upon him as common servants, and hanging on his look, no less than human life hangs on destiny!

“He who had men’s knees bow to him as frequently as they bow to the gods, and who had more sacrifices than Rome had altars —

“And yet this man fall!

“Fall? Aye, without a look who dared to appear his friend, or lend so much of vain relief to his changed state as pity!”

Arruntius said:

“They who before, like gnats, played in his beams, and thronged to encircle him, now not seen! Nor deign to share a bench with him!

“Others, who waited on him and escorted him as he went to the Senate, now inhumanely seize and carry him off to the prison!

“Him whom, just this morning, they followed as their lord, now they guard through the streets, bound like a captured runaway slave!

“Instead of wreaths, they give him fetters; they give him strokes instead of stoops and bows; they give him blind shame instead of honors; and they give him black taunts instead of titles!

“Who would trust slippery chance?”

Lepidus said:

“They who would make themselves her plunder, and foolishly forget that when Lady Fortune flatters, she then comes to prey.

“Lady Fortune, thou would have no deity if men had wisdom. We have placed thee so high because of our foolish belief in thy felicity.”

The Senators shouted outside, “The gods guard Caesar! All the gods guard Caesar!”

Macro, Regulus the Consul, and some Senators entered the scene.

Macro said:

“Now, great Sejanus, you who awed the state and sought to bring the nobles to your whip.

“You who would be Caesar’s tutor and dispose of dignities and offices; you who had the public always deferential — as shown by their heads being uncovered and bare of hat — to your designs and plots; and you who made the general voice to echo yours, who looked for salutations twelve score off — 240 paces — and would have pyramidal monuments, yea, temples reared to your huge greatness!”

What were called pyramids in this society were often obelisks.

The distance of 240 paces was that of a typical shot of an arrow.

Macro concluded:

“Now you lie as flat as was your pride advanced.”

“Thanks to the gods!” Regulus the Consul said.

The Senators said, “And praise to Macro, who has saved Rome! Liberty, liberty, liberty! Lead on! And praise to Macro, who has saved Rome!”

Macro, Regulus, and the Senators exited.

Arruntius and Lepidus remained behind, alone.

Arruntius said, “I prophesy, due to this Senate’s flattery, that this new fellow, Macro, will become a greater prodigy — monster — in Rome than he who now has fallen.”

Terentius entered the scene and said:

“O you whose minds are good, and have not forced all mankind — all human feeling — from your breasts, who yet have so much stock of virtue left to pity guilty highly-ranked people, when they are wretched:

“Lend your soft, compassionate ears to hear and eyes to weep deeds done by men beyond the acts of Furies.

“The eager multitude, who never yet knew why to love or hate, but only pleased to express their rage of power, no sooner heard the murmuring rumor of Sejanus in decline but, with that speed and heat of appetite with which they greedily run and devour the way to some great sports event or a new theatre —

“They — the eager multitude — filled the Capitol and Pompey’s Cirque — his Theater; where, like so many mastiffs, biting stones, as if his statues now were grown sensitive to their wild fury, first they tore the statues down; then fastening ropes to them, they dragged them along the streets, crying in scorn, ‘This, this was that rich head that was crowned with garlands and with odors — the smoke of incense — this head that was in Rome so revered!

“Now that the furnace and the bellows shall go to work, the great Sejanus shall crack and piece by piece shall drop in the founder’s pit.”

They were melting the metal of Sejanus’ statues so it could be recast as different objects in the founder’s pit, which held the molds.

“O popular rage!” Lepidus said.

Terentius said:

“All this while, the Senators, at the temple of Concord, make haste to meet again, and thronging they cry:

“Let us condemn him, tread him down in water, while he lies upon the bank of the Tiber River. Away!”

Terentius continued:

“Where some, more tardy, cry unto their bearers — the people carrying them:

“He will be judged and censured before we come. Run, knaves!”

“And they use that furious diligence, for fear their bondmen should inform against their slackness, and bring their quaking flesh to the hook.

“The rout of men follow with confused voices, crying that they’re glad, and they say they could never abide him.

“They inquire: What man was he? What kind of face? What beard did he have? What nose? What lips? They protest that they always did presage he’d come to this.

“They never thought him wise or valiant; they ask after his garments; they ask when he dies? What kind of death?”

“And not a beast of all the herd demands: What was his crime? Or, who were his accusers? Under what proof or testimony he fell?”

“‘There came,’ says one, ‘a huge, long, worded letter from Capri against him.’”

“‘Did there so? Oh!’”

“They are satisfied with no more evidence than that.”

“Alas!” Lepidus said. “They follow Fortune, and hate men who are condemned, whether they are guilty or not.”

Arruntius said, “But had Sejanus thrived in his plot, and successfully oppressed the old Tiberius, then, in that same minute, these same rascals in the rabble, who now rage like Furies, would have proclaimed Sejanus Emperor.”

“But what has followed these events?” Lepidus asked.

Terentius said:

“He was sentenced by the Senate to lose his head — which was no sooner off, but that head and Sejanus’ unfortunate trunk were seized by the rude and ignorant multitude. They, not content with what the eager justice of the state officiously had done, with violent rage have rent his corpse limb from limb.

“A thousand heads, a thousand hands, ten thousand tongues and voices, were employed at once in several different acts of malice!

“Old men were not staid by age, virgins were not staid by shame, recent wives (new widows) were not staid by loss of husbands, mothers were not staid by loss of children.”

The word “staid” meant 1) “made sober,” and 2) “stayed,” aka “held back.”

Terentius continued:

“All of them losing all grief in joy of his sad fall, ran quite transported with their cruelty:

“These mounting and jumping at his head and pulling it off the end of a spear, and then these attacking his face, these digging out his eyes, and those with parts of his brain sprinkling themselves, their houses, and their friends.

“Others are met who have ravished thence an arm and deal small pieces of the flesh for favors. These men with a thigh; this man has cut off his hands. And this man has cut off his feet, these men have cut off his fingers, and these men have cut off his toes. That one has his liver; this one has his heart.

“There lacks nothing but room for wrath and place for hatred. Both wrath and hatred are overfilling room and place.

“What cannot often be done is now overdone.

“The whole, and all of what was great Sejanus, and next to Caesar did possess the world, is now torn and scattered, as if he needs no grave.

“Each little part of him is covered by a small amount of dirt and dust.

“So he lies nowhere, and yet he is often buried.

A messenger entered the scene.

“Do you have more information about Sejanus?” Arruntius asked.

“Yes,” the messenger said.

“What can be added?” Lepidus asked. “We know that he is dead.”

The messenger replied:

“Then there begin your pity.

“There is enough still to come to melt even Rome and Caesar into tears — since never slave could yet so highly offend, but tyranny, in torturing him, would make him worth lamenting.

“A son and daughter to the dead Sejanus, of whom there is not now so much remaining as could be fastened to the hangman’s hook, have they drawn forth for farther sacrifice.

“The children’s tenderness of knowledge, unripe years, and childish simple innocence was such as scarcely would give them feeling or knowing the danger they were in.

“The girl so simple, as she often asked, Where would they lead her? For what cause did they drag her? She cried that she would do no more wrong. That she could take warning with beating.

“And because our laws allow no immature virgin to die, the cleverly and strangely — unnaturally — cruel Macro delivered her to be deflowered and spoiled by the rude lust of the licentious hangman, then to be strangled with her harmless brother.”

The law stated that no immature virgin should be executed. The emphasis was on maturity versus immaturity rather than virginity versus lack of virginity. Sejanus’ daughter was immature and suggested that she be spanked as a punishment. Instead, she was given to the executioner, who raped her and then strangled her and her brother.

Lepidus said, “Oh, act most worthy hell and lasting night, so they can hide it from the world!”

The messenger continued:

“Their bodies were thrown onto the Gemonian stairs.

“I don’t know how or by what accident she returned to Rome, but the children’s mother, the divorced Apicata, found them there.

“When she saw them lying spread on the steps, she unleashed a world of fury on herself, tearing her hair, defacing her face, beating her breasts and womb, kneeling distraught, crying to heaven, and then crying to her children.

“At last her drowned voice got up above her woes, and despite her grief, she was able to speak, and with such black and bitter execrations as might frighten the gods and force the sun to run backward to the east — nay, make the old deformed Chaos rise again, to overwhelm them, us, and all the world — she fills the air, upbraids the heavens with their unfair dooms, defies their tyrannous powers, and demands to know what she and those poor innocents have transgressed with the result that they must suffer such a share in vengeance, while Livia, Lygdus, and Eudemus live, who, as she says, and firmly vows to prove it to Caesar and the Senate, poisoned Drusus Senior!”

“Were they confederates with her husband?” Lepidus asked.

“Aye,” the messenger answered.

“Strange and unnatural act!” Lepidus said.

“And strangely revealed,” Arruntius said. “What says now my monster, the multitude? They reel now after being intoxicated with anger, don’t they?”

“Their gall is gone, and now they begin to weep for the evil they have done,” the messenger answered.

“I thank them for weeping, the rogues!” Arruntius said.

The messenger said:

“Part are so stupid, or so flexible and easily persuaded, that they believe Sejanus to be innocent. All grieve, and some, whose hands yet reek with his warm blood, and grip the part that they did tear off him, wish that he could be collected and created new.”

Lepidus said, “How Fortune plies her sports, when she begins to practice them! Pursues, continues, adds! Confounds and ruins, with varying her impassioned moods!”

Arruntius said:

“Do thou hope, Lady Fortune, to redeem thy crimes? To make amends for thy ill-placed favors with these strange punishments? Forbear, you things that stand upon the pinnacles of state, to boast your slippery height.

“When you do fall, you smash yourselves in pieces, never to rise.

“And he who lends you pity is not wise.”

Terentius said:

“Let this example move the insolent man not to grow proud and careless of the gods. It is an odious wisdom — exercise of intelligence — to blaspheme, much more to slighten or deny their powers.

“For whom the morning saw so great and high,

“Thus low and little, before the evening, does lie.”

Suetonius wrote about Tiberius' aversion to flattery. In Alexander Thomson's translation:

He had such an aversion to flattery, that he would never suffer any senator to approach his litter, as he passed the streets in it, either to pay him a civility, or upon business. And when a man of Consular rank, in begging his pardon for some offence he had given him, attempted to fall at his feet, he started from him in such haste, that he stumbled and fell. If any compliment was paid him, either in conversation or a set speech, he would not scruple to interrupt and reprimand the party, and alter what he had said. Being once called "lord," by some person, he desired that he might no more be affronted in that manner. When another, to excite veneration, called his occupations "sacred," and a third had expressed himself thus: "By your authority I have waited upon the senate," he obliged them to change their phrases; in one of them adopting persuasion, instead of "authority," and in the other, laborious, instead of "sacred."

The below information is an excerpt from an article titled
“THE TRUTH ABOUT GLADIATORS AND THE THUMBS UP”:

The fate of a gladiator, in terms of whether the audience was voting for a kill, was decided with what is known as “pollice verso”, a Latin term which roughly translates to “turned thumb”. More precisely what this means isn’t known and there are no accounts that have survived to this day that describe it in any real detail. As such, we’re unable to say for sure which way the thumb was supposed to be pointed if the audience wanted a given gladiator to be killed or if they could just wave their thumbs around at random, which it seems may well have been the case.

So that’s voting for death, what about life? The gesture to spare a given gladiator’s life seems to have been neither a thumbs up nor a thumbs down. Instead, you had to hide your thumb inside your fist, forming a gesture known as pollice compresso, “compressed thumb”.

Note by David Bruce: Sejanus was a member of the equestrian class of citizens, which were ranked just below the noble class. Marriages could be arranged between the children of the two classes to strength alliances. Sejanus' daughter had been betrothed to a son of the future emperor Claudius, but a few days later, Claudius' son died, according to Suetonius, by choking to death on a pear he had thrown into the air and caught in his mouth.

At Rome meanwhile, besides the shocks already sustained by the imperial house, came the first step towards the destruction of Agrippina, Claudia Pulchra, her cousin, being prosecuted by Domitius Afer. Lately a praetor, a man of but moderate position and eager to become notorious by any sort of deed, Afer charged her with unchastity, with having Furnius for her paramour, and with attempts on the emperor by poison and sorcery. Agrippina, always impetuous, and now kindled into fury by the peril of her kinswoman, went straight to Tiberius and found him, as it happened, offering a sacrifice to his father. This provoked an indignant outburst. "It is not," she exclaimed, "for the same man to slay victims to the Divine Augustus and to persecute his posterity. The celestial spirit has not transferred itself to the mute statue; here is the true image, sprung of heavenly blood, and she perceives her danger, and assumes its mournful emblems. Pulchra's name is a mere blind; the only reason for her destruction is that she has, in utter folly, selected Agrippina for her admiration, forgetting that Sosia was thereby ruined." These words wrung from the emperor one of the rare utterances of that inscrutable breast; he rebuked Agrippina with a Greek verse, and reminded her that "she was not wronged because she was not a queen." Pulchra and Furnius were condemned. Afer was ranked with the foremost orators, for the ability which he displayed, and which won strong praise from Tiberius, who pronounced him a speaker of

The men whom I have named now consulted how these conversations might fall within the hearing of more persons. It was necessary that the place of meeting should preserve the appearance of secrecy, and, if witnesses were to stand behind the doors, there was a fear of their being seen or heard, or of suspicion casually arising. Three senators thrust themselves into the space between the roof and ceiling, a hiding-place as shameful as the treachery was execrable. They applied their ears to apertures and crevices. Latiaris meanwhile having met Sabinus in the streets, drew him to his house and to the room, as if he was going to communicate some fresh discoveries. There he talked much about past and impending troubles, a copious topic indeed, and about fresh horrors. Sabinus spoke as before and at greater length, as sorrow, when once it has broken into utterance, is the harder to restrain. Instantly they hastened to accuse him, and having despatched a letter to the emperor, they informed him of the order of the plot and of their own infamy. Never was Rome more distracted and terror-stricken. Meetings, conversations, the ear of friend and stranger were alike shunned; even things mute and lifeless, the very roofs and walls, were eyed with suspicion.

In real life, “the space between the roof and ceiling” would be an attic, but what would that space be on the stage?

I think it would be the upper stage, which is under the roof and whose floor forms a ceiling for part of the lower stage.

According to the Oxford English Dictionary, spintries and sellaries are male prostitutes. Suetonius wrote about spintries and sellaries in his The Lives of the Twelve Caesars, “Life of Tiberius,” section 43, but frequently some of what he wrote is not translated in older books out of modesty. Sometimes the most salacious parts are left in Latin, untranslated, and put in an appendix.

This is section 43 of Suetonius, Lives, “Life of Tiberius,” uncensored:

On retiring to Capri he devised a pleasure for his secret orgies: teams of wantons of both sexes, selected as experts in deviant intercourse and dubbed analysts, copulated before him in triple unions to excite his flagging passions. Its bedrooms were furnished with the most salacious paintings and sculptures, as well as with an erotic library, in case a performer should need an illustration of what was required. Then in Capri's woods and groves he arranged a number of nooks of venery where boys and girls got up as Pans and nymphs solicited outside bowers and grottoes: people openly called this "the old goat's garden," punning on the island's name.

CHAPTER 15: Ben Jonson's *The Staple of News

CAST OF CHARACTERS (The Staple of News)

PENNYBOY JUNIOR: the son. The heir and suitor. In some ways, he is a prodigal son. He has long legs.

PENNYBOY SENIOR: the uncle, a usurer.

CANTER: a beggar. A user of cant, specialized language used by people such as beggars and thieves. A canter can also be a singer, aka chanter. The Canter wears ragged clothing. Pennyboy Junior calls him his “founder.” In a way, the Canter is the founder of Pennyboy Junior’s fortune. He brought Pennyboy Junior the news that his father had died. Pennyboy Junior becomes wealthy through inheritance.

CYMBAL: Master of the Staple of News Office. He deals with empty gossip and is named after a tinkling cymbal.

Note: A Staple is an export commodities market. Also, it is a warehouse full of the commodity, or it is the commodity itself.

FITTON: Emissary Court and jeerer. The rare word “fitten” means “lie.” He dresses ostentatiously.

Note: Emissaries are news seekers. Emissary Court means that the person seeks news at Court.

ALMANAC: Doctor in physic (medicine) and jeerer. Also he compiles almanacs. He is a small man.

SHUNFIELD: Sea-captain and jeerer. A person who shuns the field of battle is not a brave person.

MADRIGAL: Poetaster and jeerer. A madrigal is a form of poetry. A poetaster is a petty and poor poet.

Note: Jeerers are sneerers.

PICKLOCK: Man of Law and Emissary Westminster. The Courts of Law were held at Westminster Hall. Someone who picks locks unethically engages in subterfuge.

PIEDMANTLE: Pursuivant-at-arms and heraldet. Pursuivant-at-arms is the lowest grade of heralds. This lowest grade has four members, which are named Rouge Dragon, Rouge Croix, Portcullis, and Blue Mantle, the name which Jonson burlesques in the name Piedmantle. A heraldet is a petty herald. “Pied” means “motley,” and “mantle” means “coat,” so Piedmantle is wearing the motley clothing of a fool.

REGISTER: Of the Staple of News Office. A register is a senior book-keeper or clerk.

Note: The Staple of News Office is also called the Staple of News and the News Office and the News Staple and the Staple Office and the Office. It is a business place that gathers and publishes news. In addition, it has a residential section where Cymbal and others can live. This author of this retelling usually calls it the Staple of News Office or the News Office to avoid confusion.

NATHANIEL: First Clerk of the Staple of News Office. Nathaniel Butter published the first edition of Shakespeare’s King Lear, and he was one of the first publishers of a newspaper in English. The Nathaniel in this book is not Nathaniel Butter, but Ben Jonson is playing with the idea that Butter has become a lowly clerk instead of being a big-shot publisher.

THOMAS BARBER: Second Clerk of the Staple of News Office. Physically, he is a little man.

AURELIA CLARA PECUNIA: Infanta of the Mines. Pecunia is Latin for “money.” She is wealthy. The word “Infanta” loosely means “great lady.” Throughout the play, she is literally a woman and figuratively money. Sometimes, she plays an allegorical role in the play.

MORTGAGE: Lady Pecunia's nurse. A nurse takes care of children or takes care of and chaperons young women.

STATUTE: Lady Pecunia's first serving-woman.

BAND: Lady Pecunia's second serving-woman. A band is a bond, aka security. Bands were also ribbons used to tie official documents.

ROSE WAX: Lady Pecunia's chambermaid. Wax often becomes pliant with little effort; the same is true of some chambermaids.

BROKER: Secretary and gentleman-usher to Her Grace (Lady Pecunia). A secretary is a knower of secrets: a trusted attendant who attends to the personal business of the employer. A gentleman-usher acts as an usher to a gentlewoman. He escorts her to places she needs to go. The word "broker" means a person who acts as a middleman in business deals between other people. To gain access to Lady Pecunia, some people attempt to bribe Broker. He has a beard.

LICKFINGER: A master-cook. A good cook is able to lick his fingers.

FASHIONER: The tailor. A fashioner is a tailor.

LINENER: A shirt-maker and dealer in linen goods.

HABERDASHER: A hatter.

LEATHERLEG: A shoemaker.

SPURRIER: A maker of spurs.

CUSTOMERS: Male and female (including DOPPER, a she-Anabaptist).

PORTER.

DOGS: Two, named LOLLARD and BLOCK, belonging to Pennyboy Senior.

Musicians.

NICHOLAS (NICK): A boy singer.

PROLOGUE: One who speaks the prologue of the play.

GOSSIP MIRTH.

GOSSIP TATTLE.

GOSSIP EXPECTATION.

GOSSIP CENSURE, or Curiosity.

Note: Gossips are godmothers. The word “gossip” when applied to a person may be a term of endearment used by women, or it may mean “an idle chatterer.” A gossip can be a confidante.

BOOKHOLDER: A stage prompter.

A COUNTRY WOMAN.

TIREMEN: Stagehands.

The Scene: LONDON

NOTES:

An intermean is a passage of dialogue between acts.

Ben Jonson often regards the word “news” as plural.

THE INDUCTION (The Staple of News)

The scene is a stage in London in 1626, and the King of England is Charles I.

The Prologue steps on stage. Following him are audience members Gossip Mirth, Gossip Tattle, Gossip Expectation, and Gossip Censure. All four are gentlewomen, and they are dressed like ladies. At this time, audience members were sometimes seated on the stage. Sometimes, badly behaved (and loud) audience members caused problems.

The Prologue began to address the audience: “For your own sake, not ours —”

Gossip Mirth said loudly to Gossip Tattle, “Come, gossip, don’t be ashamed. The play is The Staple of News, and you are the mistress and lady of Tattle; let’s have your opinion of it.”

Gossip Tattle had been hanging back, a little abashed.

Gossip Mirth then said to the Prologue, “Do you hear me, gentleman? Who are you? Gentleman-usher to the play? Please, help us to some stools here.”

The Prologue was not an usher, but the speaker of the prologue of the play. Nevertheless, he wanted the women to be seated quickly so that he could do his job.

He answered, “Where do you want some seats? On the stage, ladies?”

“Yes, on the stage,” Gossip Mirth said. “We are persons of quality, I assure you, and women of fashion, and we have come to see and to be seen — my Gossip Tattle here, and Gossip Expectation, and my Gossip Censure, and I am Mirth, the daughter of Christmas and spirit of Shrovetide. They say, ‘It’s merry when gossips meet.’ I hope your play will be a merry one!”

People often go to the theater to see and to be seen. Many people wear their best clothing at such times.

Shrovetide is a period of revelry before Lent.

“Or you will make it such, ladies,” the Prologue said.

He then said to a stagehand, “Bring a bench here.”

The stagehand brought a bench and placed it on stage, and the ladies sat down.

The Prologue said to them, “But what will the noblemen think, or the grave wits here, to see you seated on the bench thus?”

Usually men, not women, had seats on stage.

“Why, what should they think?” Gossip Mirth said. “But that they had mothers, as we had, and those mothers had gossips, aka godmothers (if their children were christened), as we are, and such as had a longing to see plays and sit upon and judge them, as we do, and arraign and censure both them and their poet-playwrights.”

“Oh, is that your purpose?” the Prologue said. “Why, Mistress Mirth and Madam Tattle, enjoy your delights freely.”

“See that your news is new and fresh, Master Prologue, and untainted,” Gossip Tattle said. “I shall find them to be otherwise, if they are stale or fly-blown, quickly!”

The Prologue began, “We ask no favor from you, only we would entreat of Madam Expectation —”

Gossip Expectation interrupted, “— what, Master Prologue?”

“That Your Ladyship would expect no more than you understand,” the Prologue answered.

“Sir, I can expect enough!” Gossip Expectation said.

“I fear too much, lady,” the Prologue said, “and do you teach others to do the like?”

“I can do that, too, if I have cause,” Gossip Expectation said.

“I beg your mercy,” the Prologue said. “You never did wrong, but with just cause.”

Ben Jonson believed that if a play of his failed, the cause was the lack of understanding of the audience.

The Prologue then asked, “Who’s this lady?”

“She is Curiosity, my Lady Censure,” Gossip Mirth answered.

“Oh, Curiosity!” the Prologue said. “You come to see who wears the new suit today? Whose clothes are best feathered, whatever the part may be? Which actor has the best leg and foot? What king plays without cuffs and his queen without gloves? Who rides post in stockings and dances in boots?”

Feathers were decorations for hats.

“To ride post” meant “to ride on horseback quickly.” Post-riders wore more than stockings on their feet.

Dancing in boots can be clumsy.

“Yes, and which amorous prince makes love in drink, or does overact prodigiously in embroidered satin and, having got the trick of it, will be monstrous still, in despite of counsel!” Gossip Censure said.

“Makes love” meant woos or flirts.

Looking at and criticizing actors’ costumes and actions were part of seeing and being seen.

The book-holder, aka prompter, entered the scene and said, “Mend your lights, gentlemen. Master Prologue, begin.”

The tiremen, aka stagehands, entered and attended to the lights, which were candles whose wicks needed to be trimmed.

“Ay me!” Gossip Tattle said.

“Ay me” is an expression indicating concern.

“Who’s that?” Gossip Expectation asked.

They were a little worried about the tiremen. Some plays used firecrackers and other such effects to excite the audience.

“Nay, don’t be startled, ladies,” the Prologue said. “These men carry no fireworks to frighten you, but a torch in their hands, to give light to the business. The truth is, there are a set of gamesters within in travail — in labor — of a thing called a play, and they are eager to be delivered of it, and they have entreated me to be their man-midwife, the Prologue, for they are likely to have a hard labor of it.”

Giving birth to a play can be difficult, indeed.

“Then the poet-playwright has abused himself, like an ass, as he is,” Gossip Tattle said.

“No, his actors will abuse him enough by acting badly, or I am deceived,” Gossip Mirth said.

She began to talk about Ben Jonson, the writer of the play they were about to see:

“Yonder he is within (I was in the tiring-house — dressing room — for a while to see the actors dressed), rolling himself up and down like a large barrel in the midst of them, and he was foaming with sweat. Never did a vessel of unfermented beer or wine work and begin to ferment so! His sweating put me in mind of a good shroving dish (and I believe it would be taken up for a service of state somewhere if it were known) — a stewed poet!”

A good shroving dish is rich food for Shrovetide. A service of state is a rich banquet.

“He sits like an unbraced drum — a drum with no tension on the drumhead — with one of his heads beaten out. For that you must note: A poet has two heads, as a drum has, one for creating, the other for reciting, and his reciting head is all to pieces — they may gather it up in the dressing room — for he has torn the play’s script in a poetical fury and put himself to silence with bad wine, which, even if there were no other vexation, would be sufficient to make him the most miserable emblem of Patience.”

Gossip Censure said, “The Prologue. Quiet!”

THE PROLOGUE FOR THE STAGE (The Staple of News)

(AND READERS OF THIS BOOK)

For your own sakes, not his, he bade me say,
Would [The playwright Ben Jonson wishes] you were come to hear, not see, a play.
Though we his actors must provide for those
Who are our guests, here, in the way of shows,
The maker hath [poet-playwright has] not so; he'd have you wise
Much rather by your ears than by your eyes,
And prays you'll not prejudge his play for ill,
Because you mark it not and sit not still,
But have a longing to salute [greet] or talk
With such[-and-such] a female, and from her to walk [move on]
With your discourse to what is done, and where,
How, and by whom, in all the town — but here.
Alas! What is it to his scene [dramatic design, play] to know
How many coaches in Hyde Park did show [appear]
Last spring, what fare today at Medley's [a fashionable tavern that also served meals] was,
If Dunstan [the Devil and St. Dunstan Tavern, whose sign showed St. Dunstan twisting the Devil's nose] or the Phoenix [another tavern] best wine has?
They are things — but yet, the stage might stand as well

If it did neither hear these things, nor tell.
Great noble wits, be good unto yourselves,
And make a difference 'twixt [between] poetic elves [petit poets]
And poets; all that dabble in the ink,
And defile quills, are not those few [who] can think,
Conceive, express, and steer the souls of men,
As with a rudder, round thus [the Prologue demonstrated this with a quill] with their pen.
He [The real poet] must be one that [who] can instruct your youth,
And keep your acme [maturity, high point] in the state of truth,
Must enterprise [undertake] this work; mark but his ways,
What flight he makes, how new. And then he says,
If that not like you [If you don't like] that [play which] he sends tonight,
It is you have left [ceased] to judge, not he to write. [It is your judgment that is lacking, not the poet-playwright's
(Jonson's) skill.]

THE PROLOGUE FOR THE COURT (The Staple of News)

(IF THE PERSON READING THIS IS KING CHARLES III, THIS IS YOUR PROLOGUE)

A work not smelling of the lamp [A work that is new],
tonight,

But fitted for Your Majesty's disport [amusement],

And writ to the meridian [written to suit the taste] of your court,

We bring; and hope it may produce delight —

The rather, being offered as a rite [solemn offering]

To scholars, that [who] can judge and fair report

The sense they hear above the vulgar sort

Of nut-crackers, that [who] only come for sight.

Wherein, although our title, sir, be News,

We yet adventure here to tell you none,

But show you common follies, and so known

That though they are not truths, th'innocent [the innocent]
Muse

Hath [Has] made so like as Fancy could them state,

Or Poetry, without scandal, imitate.

Note: Audience members in Ben Jonson's day used to crack nuts, thus making much distracting noise. Artists still have such problems:

Soprano Frances Alda once was scheduled to give a concert at Versailles in the home of the Marquise de Brou. However, the audience was very noisy, and so she did not start singing even when her accompanist began to play. The Marquise asked her what was the matter, and Ms. Alda replied, "I know I am supposed to have a very strong voice, but even so it would be impossible for me to make myself heard above all this tohu-bohu." This shocked the audience into silence, and she sang without distractions. By the way, Mary Garden once told Ms. Alda, "I am always having to explain you to people. Half of them think you're a grand person, and the rest think you're a b*tch." Ms. Alda replied, "They're both right."

ACT 1 (The Staple of News)

— 1.1 —

In the lodging of Pennyboy Junior were Pennyboy Junior himself and Leatherleg the shoemaker.

The shoemaker had just helped Pennyboy Junior pull on a new pair of boots, and now Pennyboy Junior was walking in his gown, waistcoat, and breeches, awaiting his tailor.

“Many thanks, Leatherleg,” Pennyboy Junior said. “Get me the spur-maker, and then your part of helping to outfit me will be done.”

“I’ll do it immediately,” Leatherleg the shoemaker said as he exited.

Pennyboy Junior said to himself, “Look to me, wit, and look to my wit, land.”

His land was his inheritance, but “land” also meant “compatriots.”

“Look to my wit, land” therefore meant “Compatriots, admire my wit,” and unintentionally by Pennyboy Junior, “Inheritance, make up for whatever intelligence I lack.”

He continued, “That is, look upon me, and look upon me with all your eyes — male, female, and yes, hermaphroditic eyes — and in addition to those bring all your helps and magnifying lenses to see me at best advantage and augment my form as I come forth, for I do feel that I will be one worth looking at, shortly.

“By ‘shortly,’ I mean now, by and by.”

A succession of people were coming in by and by to outfit Pennyboy Junior in new, expensive, fine clothing.

He heard a noise and said, “It strikes!”

Pennyboy Junior drew out of a pocket his watch, which was striking the hours, and he set it on a table.

“One, two, three, four, five, six,” he counted. “Enough, enough, dear watch. Your pulse has beaten enough.”

The day was starting.

He continued, “Now sleep, and rest. I wish that you could make the time to rest, too. I’ll wind you up no more. The hour has come that I have awaited for so long!”

Pennyboy Junior had just attained his maturity: He was now twenty-one years old and had come into his inheritance.

He took off his gown that he had been wearing that night. In this society, such a gown could be informal dress for during the day.

But now that Pennyboy Junior had attained maturity, he would dress differently, and better. He would no longer be a ward, or dependent. He would dress like a great man.

He dropped his gown and said:

“There, there, drop my wardship, my pupil age, and my vassalage and my being in a state of servitude all together with you.

“Liberty and full rights, come, throw yourself about me, in a rich suit, cloak, hat, and band of linen for a collar, for now I’ll sue out no man’s livery but my own.”

The kind of suing he had in mind was a lawsuit as an heir to gain possession of his inheritance: his land and income. But he was also punning: Livery is the distinctive clothing worn by a great man’s servants. A glance at the livery would reveal for whom the servant worked. Pennyboy Junior was now no longer a dependent: He had figuratively thrown off that status when he threw off his gown: a nightgown in which he slept. He had come into his inheritance. He would have his own servants.

“I stand on my own feet,” Pennyboy Junior said. “I have so much income a year, right, round, and sound, the lord of my own ground, and (to rhyme to it) threescore thousand pounds!”

“Threescore thousand pounds” are 60,000 pounds. Pennyboy Junior was a rich young man. This gave him an income of over 2,000 pounds per year.

Still waiting for his tailor, he went to the door and looked out.

“Not come?” he said. “Not yet? Tailor, you are a vermin, worse than the same you prosecute and prick in subtle — narrow — seam. Bah, I say no more —”

Tailors were traditionally regarded as lecherous, and many people made jokes about a tailor’s needle being a tailor’s penis, but a real needle could be used to kill lice hidden in seams.

Pennyboy Junior continued, “Thus to retard my longings, on the day I reach manhood, to beat you.”

One longing was to be finely dressed on this day of achieving his maturity, and another longing was to beat his tailor — or so he said.

He believed that great men had the prerogative of beating their tailor, and he was looking forward to doing it — or so he said.

Pennyboy Junior continued, “One-and-twenty years of life, since the clock struck, completed! And you will feel it, you foolish animal! I could pity him (if I were not heartily angry with him now) for this one piece of folly he bears about him:

to dare to tempt the fury of an heir with an income above two thousand pounds a year, yet hope to have his custom!

“Well, Master Fashioner, there’s some must break — a head — for this your breaking your appointment.”

One kind of breaking is going bankrupt. A tailor who does not keep his appointments could go bankrupt — or get his head broken.

Seeing the tailor enter the room, he said, “Have you come, sir?”

— 1.2 —

Carrying a suit of clothing, the tailor walked over to Pennyboy Junior and said, “May God give Your Worship joy.”

“Joy of what?” Pennyboy Junior asked. “Of your tardiness? And joy of your leaving me to stalk here in my breeches, like a tame heron, for you?”

Hérons have long legs, and so did Pennyboy Junior. He was “tame” because he could not leave his house without wearing the proper clothing that his tailor was bringing him.

The tailor said, “I just waited below until the clock struck.”

“Why, if you had come a quarter of an hour earlier, would it so have hurt you in reputation to have waited here?” Pennyboy Junior asked.

“No, but Your Worship might have pleaded nonage, if you had got the suit of clothing on, before I could make just affidavit of the time,” the tailor replied.

To “plead nonage” meant to plead that one was not responsible for paying a debt because one was underage at the time the debt was incurred.

“That jest has gained your pardon,” Pennyboy Junior said. “You would have lived condemned to your own hell otherwise, and you would have never wrought even one stitch more for me or any Pennyboy.”

The “jest” was not a jest; it can be regarded as an insult.

Despite Pennyboy Junior’s words about beating his tailor, he was good-natured.

“Hell” was a place where tailors kept scraps of clothing. Without Pennyboy Junior’s custom, the tailor would have no reason to leave his shop and deliver clothing to Pennyboy Junior.

“I could have hindered your career, but now you are mine,” Pennyboy Junior said, “for one-and-twenty years, or for the longest length of one of three persons’ lives, choose whichever three persons you will. I’ll make you a copyholder of land, and I’ll pay your first bill without questioning its details.”

Pennyboy Junior was promising the tailor to give him his custom for 21 years, or for as long as the longest lived of any three people the tailor named lived.

A copyholder holds land with the permission of the land owner.

He then said, “Help me get this on.”

“Immediately, sir,” the tailor said. “I am bound to Your Worship.”

He helped Pennyboy Junior put on the suit of clothing.

“You shall be, when I have sealed for you a lease of my custom and guaranteed that I will be your customer,” Pennyboy Junior said.

“Your Worship’s barber is outside, waiting,” the tailor said.

“Who?” Pennyboy Junior asked. “Tom?”

He called, “Come in, Tom.”

Thomas Barber entered the room.

Pennyboy Junior said to him, “Set your things upon the table and spread your cloths and lay all forth in procinctu — in readiness — and tell us what’s the news.”

“Oh, sir, a Staple of News!” Thomas Barber said. “Or the New Staple, whichever you please.”

A Staple of News is a center for news. In this culture, newspapers were just now coming into existence.

“What’s that?” Pennyboy Junior asked.

“It is an office, sir, a fine young office set up,” the tailor said. “I forgot to tell Your Worship.”

“An office set up for what?” Pennyboy Junior asked.

Thomas Barber said, “To enter all the news, sir, of the time —”

The tailor interrupted, “— and vent — publish — it as occasion serves! A place of huge commerce it will be! News will be vended as well as vented.”

“Please, be quiet,” Pennyboy Junior said to the tailor. “I cannot abide a talking tailor. Let Tom — he’s a barber — by his place relate it.”

Barbers are known for being talkative. Because they talk so much with their customers, they are purveyors of news — and gossip.

Pennyboy Junior then asked, “What is it? An office, Tom?”

Thomas Barber answered, “Newly erected here in the house you are staying, almost on the same floor, it is a place where all the news of all sorts shall be brought, and there be examined, and then registered, and so be issued under the seal of the Office, as Staple News. No other news will be current.”

The Staple of News Office would determine which news was current — that is, authentic.

Pennyboy Junior said, “I say, you are speaking of a splendid business, Tom.”

The tailor said, “Nay, if you knew the brain that hatched it, sir —”

“I know you well enough,” Pennyboy Junior said to the tailor.

He then said, “Give him a loaf, Tom.”

Not only were tailors stereotypically lecherous, they also stereotypically loved bread.

Pennyboy Junior added, “The loaf will quiet his mouth; that oven will be venting otherwise.”

The tailor’s mouth needed to be closed because what would be coming from it was hot air.

Pennyboy Junior then said to Thomas Barber, “Proceed.”

“The tailor is telling you the truth, sir,” Thomas Barber said. “Master Cymbal is Master of the Staple of News Office; he came up with the idea of it. He resides here in the house, and the great rooms he has taken for the Office and to set up his desks and bookcases, tables, and his shelves —”

The tailor interrupted, “— he’s my customer and a wit, sir, too. But he has splendid wits under him —”

Thomas Barber interrupted, “— yes, four emissaries —”

“— emissaries?” Pennyboy Junior interrupted. “Wait, there’s a fine new word, Tom! Pray God it signify anything. What are emissaries?”

Thomas Barber answered, “Men employed outward who are sent abroad to fetch in the commodity.”

Emissaries are men sent on a mission to gather information. These particular emissaries were reporters.

The tailor said, “From all regions where the best news are made —”

Thomas Barber interrupted, “— or vented forth —”

The tailor interrupted, “— by way of exchange, or trade —”

Pennyboy Junior interrupted, “— nay, you insist on speaking —”

“— my share, sir,” the tailor finished the sentence. “There’s enough to say for both the barber and me.”

Pennyboy Junior nodded, giving the tailor permission to speak: “Go on, then; speak all you know. I think the ordinaries should help them much.”

By “ordinaries,” he meant fashionable eating places: upscale taverns.

Misunderstanding what Pennyboy Junior meant by “ordinaries,” the tailor said, “Sir, they have ordinaries and extraordinaries, as many changes and variations as there are points in the compass.”

In this society, post ordinary and post haste were speeds of delivering messages and letters. Post ordinary were regular letter carriers, while post haste were very quick letter carriers. These letter carriers rode very quickly on horseback.

Thomas Barber began, “But the four cardinal quarters —”

Pennyboy Junior interrupted, “— aye, those, Tom —”

Thomas Barber interrupted, giving the four main places news could and would be gathered: “— the Court, sir, St. Paul’s, the Exchange, and Westminster Hall.”

The center aisle of St. Paul’s Cathedral was a center of gossip.

The Courts of Common Law and of Chancery were located at Westminster Hall, and much gossip occurred there.

The Court and the Royal Exchange were also places of gossip.

“Who is the chief?” Pennyboy Junior asked. “Who has the precedence?”

“The governor of the Staple of News Office, Master Cymbal,” Thomas Barber answered. “He is the chief; and after him are the emissaries.

“He’s a jeerer, too” is ambiguous. It can mean, 1) “Cymbal is a jeerer, and so is Fitton,” or 2) “Fitton is an emissary, and he is also a jeerer.”

“A jeerer?” Pennyboy Junior asked. “What’s that?”

“A wit,” the tailor answered.

One kind of “wit” is to jeer at and mock other people.

“Or half a wit,” Thomas Barber said. “Some of them are half-wits, two to a wit; there are a set of them.

“Master Ambler is the Emissary at St. Paul’s. He is as fine-paced a gentleman as you shall see walk the middle aisle.

“And then my froy — that is, handsome — Hans Buzz, a Dutchman, is Emissary at the Exchange.”

The tailor said, “I had thought Master Burst, the merchant, had been made Emissary at the Exchange.”

“No,” Thomas Barber said. “He has a rupture; he has sprung a leak — he has gone bankrupt.”

In fact, the word “burst” meant bankrupt.

Thomas Barber continued, “The Emissary at Westminster Hall is undisposed of yet. That emissary has not yet been named.

“Then the other positions are the examiner, the register, and two clerks — they manage all at home, and sort, and file, and seal the news, and issue them.”

Pennyboy Junior said, “Tom, dear Tom, what may my means and wealth do for you? Ask, and have it. I would like to be doing some good — it is my birthday — and I’d do it promptly. I feel a secret longing to be bountiful and generous, and I would not long lie fallow.

“I ask you to think, and speak, and wish for something.”

Thomas Barber said, “I wish that I had just one of the clerks’ places in this Staple of News Office.”

“You shall have it, Tom, if silver or gold will fetch it,” Pennyboy Junior said. “What’s the rate? At what is it set in the market?”

Masters received payment to take on a new apprentice.

“Fifty pounds, sir,” Thomas Barber said.

“Even if it were a hundred pounds, Tom, you shall not lack it,” Pennyboy Junior said.

The tailor leapt at and hugged him, saying, “Oh, noble master!”

“What is this now, Aesop’s ass!” Pennyboy Junior said.

One of Aesop’s fables is about an ass that observed its master favoring a lap dog. Wanting similar attention, the ass decided to act like a lap dog, and it jumped up on its master’s lap. Of course, the ass’ hooves and weight hurt its master, and the master’s servants drove the ass back to its stable with many blows.

Tom Barber was a little man; the tailor was much larger.

Pennyboy Junior continued, “Because I play with Tom, must I necessarily run into your rude embraces? Stand still, sir. Clown’s fawnings are like a horse attempting a salutation by curtsying.”

He then asked Thomas Barber, “How do you like my new suit of clothing, Tom?”

“Master tailor has hit your measures, sir,” Thomas Barber said. “He’s molded you and made you, as they say.”

Clothes and a tailor make a man.

“No, no, not I,” the tailor said. “I am an ass, old Aesop’s ass.”

“Nay, tailor,” Pennyboy Junior said. “I can do you a good turn, too. Don’t be musty and peevish, although you have molded me, as little Tom says. I think you have put me in moldy pockets.”

He pulled out his pockets.

“Your pockets are perfumed,” the tailor said, “with good and right Spanish perfume — the Lady Estifania’s. The cost is twelve pounds for a pair of perfumed pockets.”

“Your bill will say so,” Pennyboy Junior said, drily. “Please tell me, tailor, what authors you read to help your invention? Italian prints? Or tapestries? They are tailors’ libraries.”

Much English fashion was copied from the fashions of other countries.

“I scorn such helps,” the tailor said.

He relied on his own invention for his fashions.

Pennyboy Junior said, “Oh, though you are a silkworm, and deal in satins and velvets and rich plushes, you cannot spin all forms out of yourself; they are quite other things.

“I think this suit of clothing has made me wittier than I was.”

“Believe it, sir,” the tailor said. “Clothes do much to improve the wit, as weather does on the brain; and thence comes your proverb: ‘The tailor makes the man.’”

The right kind of weather can affect the brain and make it alert and sharp, and the wrong kind of weather can affect the brain and make it dull and drowsy. Modern operating rooms are kept at the cold temperature proven to keep surgeons alert and sharp.

Clothes can make the man. Think of the king in Mark Twain’s Adventures of Huckleberry Finn:

The king’s duds was all black, and he did look real swell and starchy. I never knowed how clothes could change a body before. Why, before, he looked like the orneriest old rip that ever was; but now, when he’d take off his new white beaver and make a bow and do a smile, he looked that grand and good and pious that you’d say he had walked right out of the ark, and maybe was old Leviticus himself.

The tailor continued, “I speak by experience of my own customers. I have had gallants, both court and country, who would have fooled you completely into believing while they were wearing a new suit of clothing that they were the best wits in being. They kept their social acceptability up as long as their clothes lasted and were handsome and neat; but then as their elbows wore out again, or their clothes had a stain or spot, these gallants sank in social respectability most wretchedly.”

Pennyboy Junior said, “What you report is but the common calamity, and seen daily. And therefore you’ve another, answering proverb: ‘A broken sleeve keeps the arm back.’”

A person with a broken sleeve would like to keep that fact hidden and so would not move that arm and would avoid drawing attention to the broken sleeve.

“It is true, sir,” the tailor said. “And thence we say that such a one plays at peep-arm.”

If a sleeve had a tear in it or is worn through, one could peep at the arm inside. Therefore, the person wearing the broken sleeve tried to cover up the tear or worn-through spot.

“Do you say that?” Pennyboy Junior said. “It is wittily said. I wonder that gentlemen and men of means will not maintain themselves fresher in wit — I mean in clothes — to the highest point possible.

“For he who is out of clothes is out of fashion, and to be out of fashion is to be out of countenance, and to be out of countenance is to be out of wit.”

A person who is out of countenance is flustered. The word “countenance” refers to appearance, such as the expression on one’s face.

He then asked, “Hasn’t rogue haberdasher come?”

The haberdasher, the linener, and Leatherleg the shoemaker entered the room. They were carrying apparel and bills. The haberdasher was primarily a hat-maker, and the linener was primarily a shirt-maker.

“Yes, here I am, sir,” the haberdasher said. “I have been waiting outside the door this half-hour.”

“Give me my hat,” Pennyboy Junior said.

Everyone became busy, helping him.

Pennyboy Junior continued, “Put on my belt. Rascal, does my ruff sit well?”

The ruff was a frilled collar.

“In print,” the linener said.

“In print” meant “perfectly.”

“Slave,” Pennyboy Junior said.

He believed that great men could be rude, and he believed that he was a great man. To him, a great man was a rich man.

The linener gave him a mirror and said, “Look at yourself.”

Scrutinizing himself, Pennyboy Junior asked, “Is this same hat of the block passant?”

He was asking if his hat was in the latest style.

He then said, “Do not answer me; I cannot stay for an answer. I do feel the powers of one-and-twenty like a tide flow in upon me, and I perceive that an heir can conjure up all spirits in all circles.

“Rogue, rascal, slave — give tradesmen their true names, and they appear to them immediately.”

By saying the correct name of a spirit along with other words, a conjurer can summon the spirit and keep it safely contained within a protective circle.

“For profit,” the linener said.

“Come, cast my cloak about me,” Pennyboy Junior said.

He was punning on “casting a spell.”

He continued. “I’ll go see this Staple of News Office, Tom, and be trimmed afterwards.”

“Trimmed” means 1) barbered, and 2) cheated, as in excessive billing for services rendered.

Pennyboy Junior continued, “I’ll put you in possession of the clerk’s office, my prime work!”

His spur-maker then came into the room, carrying spurs.

“By God, my spurrier!” Pennyboy Junior said. “Put them on me, boy, quickly. I was about to have lost my spurs with too much speed.”

The spurrier helped Pennyboy Junior put on his spurs.

Pennyboy Junior had not actually done anything to win his spurs; he had merely purchased them with inherited money.

— 1.3 —

Singing, the Canter walked over to them. He was wearing a patched cloak, and he was carrying a bag of money. In his song and conversation, he compared Pennyboy Junior and the tradesmen to a military officer and his troops. In his conversation, Pennyboy Junior continued the same comparison.

The Canter sang:

“Good morning to my joy, my jolly Penny-boy!

“The lord and the prince of plenty!

“I come to see what riches you bear in your breeches,

“The first of your one-and-twenty.

“What, do your pockets jingle? Or shall we need to mingle

“Our strength both of foot and horses?

“These fellows look so eager as if they would beleaguer

“An heir in the midst of his forces!

“I hope they are sergeants who hang upon your margents!”

“Sergeants” were 1) officers who arrested debtors, or 2) military personnel.

“Margents” were 1) margins, or 2) military flanks.

Looking at the spurrier, the Canter said, “This rogue has the jowl — jaw — of a jailor!”

The young Pennyboy Junior sang in response:

“Oh, founder, no such matter, my spurrier, and my hatter,

“My linen-man, and my tailor —”

He then said in his normal conversational voice, “You should have been brought in, too, shoemaker, if the time had been longer, and Tom Barber.”

He then asked, “How do you like my company, old Canter? Don’t I muster a brave troupe? All are billmen —”

A bill is a weapon — half-ax and half-spear — that is also known as a halberd. Another kind of bill is a document of a debt that must be paid.

Pennyboy Junior said to the tradesmen, “Present your arms before my founder here. This is my founder, this same learned Canter!”

The Canter was a pseudo-father for Pennyboy Junior.

Pennyboy Junior continued, “He brought me the first news of my father’s death. I thank him, and ever since I have called him my founder.

“Worship him, boys.”

The word “worship” means adore.

Pennyboy Junior then took the bills from the tradesmen and said, “I’ll read only the sums, and pass them immediately.”

Leatherleg the shoemaker said, “Now ale!”

All the other tradesmen said a toast: “And strong ale bless him!”

Pennyboy Junior said, “By God, some ale and sugar for my founder!”

In this society, people used sugar to sweeten ale, which was also often warmed.

Putting the tradesmen’s bills in his pockets, Pennyboy Junior said, “They are good bills, sufficient and properly drawn-up bills; these bills may pass.”

He meant that he would pay them without challenging any of the items on the bills.

The Canter said, “I do not like those paper squibs, good master.”

“Squibs” are firecrackers.

This kind of “master” is a man who has come of age.

The Canter continued, “They may undo your store — I mean, your store of credit — and fire your arsenal, if perhaps you do not in time make good those outer works, your pockets, and take a garrison in of some two hundred to beat these pioneers off who carry a mine that would blow you up at last.”

Pioneers are under-miners. They would dig a tunnel — a mine — under a city wall and plant bombs to blow it up.

The bills could be like a bomb that would blow up Pennyboy Junior’s line of credit if he could not pay them off in good time. It would be wise for him to have two hundred or so coins in reserve so that he could pay his bills in a timely manner, and it would be wise for him not to spend the two hundred or so coins quickly.

The Canter advised, “Secure your casemates.”

Casemates are vaulted chambers used by soldiers defending a fortification. Pennywise Junior could defend his line of credit by keeping money in reserve — and not spending it quickly.

The Canter, who was holding a bag of money, continued, “Master Picklock, sir, your man of law and learned attorney, has sent you a bag of munitions.”

Taking the bag, Pennyboy Junior asked, “What is it?”

“Three hundred pieces,” the Canter said.

The pieces were figuratively bullets and literally gold coins.

“I’ll dispatch them,” Pennyboy Junior said.

“Do that,” the Canter said. “I would have your strengths lined and perfumed with gold as well as ambergris.”

The strengths were strongholds. In this case, they were Pennyboy Junior’s pockets.

Pennyboy Junior's pockets were already perfumed — ambergris is used in the making of perfume — but he also needed gold coins as a line of defense against becoming impoverished.

A young man who has recently come into a lot of money can be a big spender and too soon discover that he has no money left to spend.

The Canter understood “dispatch” to mean “stow away” (a rare meaning), but Pennyboy Junior meant that he would dispense the gold coins right away.

“Godamercy,” Pennyboy Junior said to the Canter. “May God reward you.”

He then said to the tradesmen, “Come; ad solvendum, boys! Settling-up time! There, there, and there, etc.”

He paid all the tradesmen what he owed them.

As he dispensed the coins, Pennyboy Junior said, “I look on nothing but totalis.”

He did not examine the individual items of the bills to check for inaccuracies, but simply paid their totals.

The Canter said to himself, “Look! See the difference between the covetous and the prodigal: The covetous man never has money, and the prodigal man will have none shortly!”

Misers say that they have no money to spend, give, or lend, and prodigious spenders soon have no money to spend.

“Ha, what does my founder say?” Pennyboy Junior said.

He then said to the tradesmen, “I thank you. I thank you, sirs.”

The tradesmen replied, “God bless Your Worship, and Your Worship’s chanter.”

A chanter is a singer: The Canter had entered the scene singing.

Leatherleg the shoemaker, the linerer (shirt-maker), and the haberdasher (hatter) exited.

The Canter said, “I say that it is nobly done to cherish shopkeepers, and pay their bills without examining them, as you have just done.”

Chances are, he was being sarcastic. It is good to pay bills in a timely manner, but it is also good to make sure that the bills are accurate.

“Alas!” Pennyboy Junior said. “They have had a pitiful hard time of it, a long vacation from their cheating.”

The Inns of Court had a long summer vacation, making tradesmen complain about lack of custom because so many of their customers had left London. In addition, in early 1626, London was still recovering from the plague.

Pennyboy Junior continued, “Poor rascals, I do it out of charity. I want to advance their trade again, and I want to have them make haste to be rich, swear, and forswear wealthily.”

One way to become wealthy — many people believe — is to swear and forswear. That is, to swear and then commit perjury, or to make and then break promises.

Pennyboy Junior then asked the spurrier, “Why are you staying here, sirrah?”

“Sirrah” was used to address a man of lower social standing than the speaker. The use of the word by a gentleman to refer to a tradesman was not regarded as impolite.

“I stay because of my box, sir,” the spurrier said.

He kept his tips in a money box.

“Your box?” Pennyboy Junior said. “Why, there’s an angel.”

An angel was a coin worth ten shillings; Pennyboy Junior was a generous tipper.

Pennyboy Junior then said, “If my spurs are not true Ripon —”

Ripon was a town that had the reputation of making very good rowels — pointed spur-wheels.

The spurrier interrupted, “— never give me a penny if I don’t strike through your bounty with the rowels.”

Ripon rowels were reputed to be so good that they could pierce a coin such as an angel.

The spurrier exited.

Pennyboy Junior asked the Canter, who was wearing a patched cloak, “Do you want any money, founder?”

“Who, sir, I?” the Canter said. “Didn’t I tell you I was bred in the mines, under Sir Bevis Bullion?”

These were gold and silver mines.

“That is true,” Pennyboy Junior said. “You did tell me, but I quite forgot. You mine-men lack no money; your streets are paved with it. There the molten silver runs out like cream on cakes of gold.”

“And rubies grow like strawberries,” the Canter said.

“It would be splendid being there!” Pennyboy Junior said.

He then said to Thomas Barber, “Come, Tom, we’ll go to the office now.”

“What office?” the Canter asked.

“The News Office, the New Staple,” Pennyboy Junior said. “You shall go, too. It is here in the house, on the same floor, Tom says.”

Actually, Thomas Barber had said it was “almost on the same floor.”

Pennyboy Junior continued, “Come, founder, let us indulge in ale and nutmegs.”

In this society, ale was sometimes flavored with nutmegs.

— 1.4 —

The register and Nathaniel, a clerk, were in the Staple of News Office, which was located in the same building in which Pennyboy Junior lodged. A country woman entered the room through another door and stood there.

The register asked Nathaniel the clerk, “Are those desks fit now? Set forth the table, the carpet, and the chair. Where are the news that were examined last? Have you filed them up?”

“Not yet,” Nathaniel the clerk said. “I had no time.”

The register then asked, “Are those news registered that Emissary Buzz sent in last night? The news of Spinola and his eggs?”

Marquis Ambrosio Spinola was the commander of the Spanish forces in the Netherlands. The eggs were weapons: incendiary egg-grenades.

“Yes, sir, and they are filed,” Nathaniel the clerk said.

“What are you working on now?” the register asked.

“The news that our new Emissary Westminster gave us about the Golden Heir,” Nathaniel the clerk answered.

The Golden Heir was Pennyboy Junior, who was now a rich young man.

“Dispatch that speedily!” the register said. “That’s news indeed, and of importance.”

The country woman approached them.

“What would you have, good woman?” the register asked.

“I would have, sir, a groatsworth of any news, I don’t care what, to carry down into the country this Saturday to our vicar,” the country woman said.

A groat was worth four pence.

“Oh, you are a butter-woman,” the register said. “Ask Nathaniel the clerk, who is standing there.”

A butter-woman sells butter, but Nathaniel Butter was one of the first news-publishing figures in London.

Nathaniel the clerk said, “Sir, I tell her that she must wait until Emissary Exchange or Emissary St. Paul’s send their news in, and then I’ll fix her up with what she wants.”

“Good woman, have patience,” the register said. “It is not now as when the captain lived.”

The country woman exited.

The captain was a reference to Thomas Gainsford, who had assisted Nathaniel Butter. Both the register and Nathaniel the clerk wanted to publish reputable news and not just produce “news” to make a buck.

Nathaniel the clerk said, “You’ll blast the reputation of the office now, in the bud, if you dispatch these groats so soon.”

In other words: If you send out fake news, quickly you will ruin the reputation of the Staple of News Office, almost before the News Office has started its work.

Nathaniel the clerk continued, “Let the customers wait, in the name of policy — it’s a good idea to keep them waiting until we have real news to give them.”

— 1.5 —

Cymbal and Fitton ushered Pennyboy Junior into the room. Following them were Thomas Barber and the Canter, both of whom stood to the side.

“Truly, they are pleasant rooms,” Pennyboy Junior said. “What place is this?”

“This is the outer room, where my clerks sit and keep their sides,” Cymbal said. “That is, they look after their own sections. The register is in the midst; the examiner sits in a private office there, within; and here I have my various rolls and files of news by the alphabet, and all put up under their heads.”

One function of the Staple of News Office was to examine news and determine its worth and believability.

“But are those various rolls and files of news, too, subdivided?” Pennyboy Junior asked.

“Into authentical and apocryphal,” Cymbal replied.

Fitton added, “Or news of doubtful believability, such as barbers’ news.”

Cymbal and Fitton often interrupted each other and finished each other’s sentences.

“And tailors’ news, porters’ news, and watermen’s news,” Cymbal added.

Watermen are people who work on the river and do such things as row customers from one side of the Thames to the other.

Fitton said, “Whereto, beside the coranti and gazetti —”

The coranti and gazetti are sheets of news.

Cymbal interrupted, “— I have the news of the season.”

Fitton added, “Such as vacation-news, term-news, and Christmas-news.”

These were news at various times in London, such as when the Inns of Court were in session (term-news).

“And news of the faction,” Cymbal added.

Factions can be of various kinds, including religious.

Fitton explained, “Such as the Reformed news, Protestant news —”

Reformed equals Calvinist, Protestant equals Lutheran, and Pontifical equals Catholic.

Cymbal interrupted, “— and Pontifical news. For each of these, the day-books, characters and ciphers, and precedents (from which copies are made) are kept, together with the names of special friends —”

Day-books were records of the day’s events.

Fitton interrupted, “— and men of correspondence in the country —”

Cymbal interrupted, “— yes, of all ranks and all religions —”

Fitton interrupted, “— representatives and factors —”

“Factors” are agents.

Cypher interrupted, “— liegers who lie throughout all the shires of the kingdom.”

“Liegiers” are resident agents. “Lie” can mean 1) reside, or 2) tell falsehoods.

“This is fine and bears a brave relation!” Pennyboy Junior said. “It is worth hearing! But what says Mercurius Britannicus to this?”

Some of Butter’s newsbooks of the time contained the phrase “printed for Mercurius Britannicus.”

The Latin name means the British Mercury. Mercury was a Roman god who was the messenger of the gods, and so a “mercury” is a person who brings news.

Cymbal and Fitton began to talk about and criticize the news endeavors of Mercurius Britannicus and other pioneers of the conveying of news.

Cymbal said, “Oh, sir, he gains by it half in half.”

In other words, his profits have greatly improved.

“Nay, more,” Fitton said. “I’ll vouch for it. For where he was accustomed to get in hungry captains, obscure statesmen —”

Cymbal interrupted, “— fellows to drink with him in a dark room in a tavern, and eat a sausage —”

Fitton interrupted, “— we have seen it —”

Cymbal interrupted, “— as obliged to keep so many politic and crafty pens going, to feed the press —”

To get news that would make a profit, rival news publishers used such “sources” as hungry military captains and obscure statesmen. Such sources would tell a tale — often a false tale — to get a meal and a pint.

Fitton interrupted, “— and dish out ‘news,’ whether true, or false —”

Cymbal interrupted, “— now all that charge is saved the public chronicler —”

The Staple of News Office would use reliable sources and dispense with the cost of paying bad sources.

Fitton interrupted, “— how do you call him there? —”

A man named Edmund Howes was a then-contemporary public chronicler who continued the historian John Stow’s Annals of England — a series of chronicles of England — after Stow died.

Cymbal interrupted and continued his sentence, “— and gentle reader —”

The newsbooks of the time used this phrase in their prefaces.

Fitton interrupted, “— he who has the maidenhead of all the books.”

Cymbal added, “Yes, dedicated to him —”

Fitton interrupted, “— or rather prostituted —”

News purveyors can pander to their readers. Pandering is literally sexual in nature, but Cymbal and Fitton were referring to a metaphorical pandering.

“You are right, sir,” Pennyboy Junior said.

Cymbal said, “The gentle readers no more shall be abused.

“Nor shall country parsons of the Inquisition and busy justices trouble the peace, and both torment themselves and their poor ignorant neighbors with inquiries after the many and most innocent monsters that never came in the counties they were charged with.”

Sometimes rumors of monsters in the rural areas circulated and were written about in the news-sheets.

“Why, I think, sir,” Pennyboy Junior said, “if the honest common people will willfully be hoodwinked, why shouldn’t they have their pleasure in believing the lies that are made for them, just as you yourselves in the Staple of News Office take pleasure in making up the lies?”

If people wish to believe made-up stories about Bigfoot and alien abductions, why interfere with that?

“Oh, sir, it is the printing of such made-up stories that we oppose!” Fitton said.

One purpose of the Staple of News Office was to print only real news.

“We do not forbid that any news be made up, but we do forbid that it be printed,” Cymbal said, “for when news is printed, it ceases, sir, to be news.”

Cymbal seemed to be saying that old news is no news. Once new news is printed, it becomes old news. New news must take its place.

Cymbal continued, “While the news is but written and not printed —”

Fitton interrupted, “— though it be never so false, it runs news still.”

News that is not printed but continues to be spread through gossip will remain current although it is false. The same tales about Bigfoot and alien abductions will continue to spread.

“See diverse men’s opinions!” Pennyboy Junior said. “To some people the very printing of tales makes them news. Some people don’t have the heart to believe anything but what they see in print.”

Fitton said, “Aye, that’s an error that has abused many; but we shall reform it, as we hope to reform many things besides that have crept among the popular abuses.”

It is an error to believe everything you read, and Fitton and Cymbal wanted to reform people so that they would not make that error.

Hmm. One way to reform people so that they would not believe everything they read would be to print news that was unbelievable.

If Fitton and Cymbal were to print news that was completely reliable and believable, they would be training people to believe everything they read.

Cymbal said, “Nor shall the publisher and bookseller cheat upon the time, by uttering over again —”

Fitton interrupted, “— in seven years, as the age dotes —”

Cymbal interrupted, “— and grows forgetful of them, his antiquated pamphlets, with new dates.”

Old pamphlets of sensational news stories about such topics as marauding headless bears were sometimes slightly altered and reissued years later as new news.

Cymbal continued, “But all shall come from the mint —”

Fitton interrupted, “Fresh and new stamped —”

Cymbal interrupted, “— with the office seal: Staple Commodity.”

Fitton said, “And if a man wants to feel certain of his news, he may. For twopence a sheet he shall be warranted, and have a policy — a written guarantee — for it.”

The Staple of News Office would guarantee the certainty and reliability of its news.

“Sir, I admire the method of your place,” Pennyboy Junior said. “All things within it are so digested, fitted, and composed that it shows that here Wit has married Order.”

Fitton said, “Sir —”

Cymbal interrupted, “— we did the best we could to invite the times and attract contemporary taste.”

Fitton said, “It has cost sweat and freezing —”

Cymbal interrupted, “— and some broken sleeps before it came to this.”

They had put in much thought and effort before starting their Staple of News Office.

“I easily think it,” Pennyboy Junior said.

Fitton said, “But now it has the shape —”

Cymbal interrupted, “— and has come forth.”

“It is a most polite — fine — neat thing!” Pennyboy Junior said. “It has all the limbs that sense can taste!”

The Staple of News Office had all the parts that the mind can savor.

Cymbal said, “It is, sir, although I myself am saying it, as well-begotten a business, and as fairly helped into the world.”

“You must be a midwife, sir!” Pennyboy Junior said. “Or else the son of a midwife, please pardon me, to have helped it forth so fortunately!

“What news do you have? News of this morning? I would like to hear some fresh from the forge, as new as day, as they say.”

“And such we have, sir,” Cymbal said.

The register said, "Show him the last roll of Emissary Westminster's: 'The Heir.'"

"Come nearer, Tom," Pennyboy Junior said.

Thomas Barber, who had been standing to the side with the Canter, came forward.

Nathaniel the clerk read the news roll out loud:

"There is a brave, young heir who has come of age this morning: Master Pennyboy."

Pennyboy Junior, pleased that he had made the news, said, "That's I!"

Nathaniel the clerk continued reading out loud:

"His father died on this day seven nights ago."

"True!" Pennyboy Junior said.

Nathaniel the clerk continued reading out loud:

"At six of the clock in the morning, just a week before Pennyboy Junior was one-and-twenty."

"I am here in the news roll, Tom!" Pennyboy Junior said.

He then said to Nathaniel the clerk, "Proceed, please."

Nathaniel the clerk continued reading out loud:

"An old canting beggar first brought him the news. Pennyboy Junior has employed the beggar to follow him since."

"Why, you shall see him!" Pennyboy Junior said.

He called to the Canter, "Founder, come here!"

The Canter stepped forward.

Pennyboy Junior said, “He is no follower; instead, he is my companion.”

He then said to Cymbal, “Please put my companion in the news roll, friend.”

He then said to Nathaniel the clerk, “There’s an angel.”

Pennyboy Junior gave an angel — a coin — to Nathaniel the clerk.

He said to Cymbal, “You do not know he’s a wise old fellow, although he seems patched thus and made up of pieces.”

The Canter’s clothing was patched.

Pennyboy Junior said to the Canter, “Founder, we are in, here, in the Staple of News Office!”

Nathaniel the clerk exited.

Pennyboy Junior continued, “We are in this day’s news roll, already!”

He then said to Cymbal and Fitton, “I wonder how you came by this information about us, sirs.”

Cymbal explained, “A Master Picklock, a lawyer, who has purchased here a place, this morning, of an emissary under me —”

Fitton interrupted, “— Emissary Westminster —”

Cymbal continued, “— gave the news to the Staple of News Office —”

Fitton interrupted, “— for his essay, his masterpiece.”

The lawyer had demonstrated his ability to get news by giving the Staple of News Office the news about Pennyboy Junior.

To become a master, apprentices had to demonstrate their mastery of the skill they were studying by creating a master piece of work, aka masterpiece. “Essay” is another word for “masterpiece.”

“My man of law!” Pennyboy Junior said. “He’s my attorney, and my solicitor, too.”

Attorneys do legal work requiring appearances in court, while solicitors do legal work that does not require appearances in court.

He continued, “He’s a fine pragmatic man of business! What’s his place worth?”

Cymbal said, “A nemo-scit, sir.”

Nemo scit means “Nobody knows.” The job holder would be paid according to the news brought in and printed.

Fitton said, “It depends on the news that come in —”

Cymbal interrupted, “— and as they are issued. I have the just moiety — exactly half — for my part; then the other moiety is parted into seven shares. The four emissaries — whereof my cousin Fitton here’s for Emissary Court, Ambler for Emissary St. Paul’s, and Buzz for the Emissary Exchange, Picklock for Emissary Westminster, with the examiner and register — they have full parts, and then one part is underparted — subdivided — to a couple of clerks. And there’s the just and exact division of the profits!”

“Have you hired those clerks, sir?” Pennyboy Junior asked.

One of the two clerk positions had been filled; Nathaniel had it.

“There is one desk empty, but it has many suitors,” Cymbal said.

“Sir, may I present one more suitor for the position and carry — win — it, if his qualities, or gifts, whatever you will call them —”

If Pennyboy Junior were to carry — win — the position of clerk for Thomas Barber, he would carry — bear — the cost.

Cymbal finished the sentence: “— be sufficient, sir.”

“What are your present clerk’s abilities?” Pennyboy Junior asked. “How is he qualified?”

The present clerk was Nathaniel.

“He was a decayed stationer,” Cymbal replied, “but he knows news well and can sort and rank them.”

A decayed stationer is a bankrupt publisher or book seller.

Fitton added, “And he can make news when necessary.”

Cymbal said, “He’s true St. Paul’s bred, in the churchyard.”

Many booksellers’ and publishers’ shops could be found at the courtyard of St. Paul’s. On the west door of St. Paul’s, people posted advertisements for employment.

Pennyboy Junior said, “And this one is true bred at the west door, on the other side. He’s my barber, Tom, an apt scholar, and a Master of Arts — he was made, or went out, Master of Arts in a throng at the university, as before, one Christmas, he got into a masque at court by his wit, and the good means of his cittern, holding it up like this” — he pantomimed strumming a cittern — “as he pretended to be one of the musicians.”

Barbers often had citterns in the shops for customers to play.

In 1615, King James I of England paid a visit to Cambridge University, which conferred Master of Arts degrees on his entire retinue. Some people, including apothecaries and barbers, got degrees because they crowded in among the members of the entourage when they received degrees.

A cittern is a stringed instrument that is an early forerunner of a guitar.

Pennyboy Junior continued, “Tom’s a nimble fellow, and alike skilled in every liberal science, as having certain snaps of all.”

Barbers snapped their fingers while plying their trade. The word “snaps” also meant oddments or scraps: Tom Barber knew a little about a lot.

Pennyboy Junior continued, “He has a neat, quick vein in forging news, too.”

“Forging” can mean 1) creating, making, or gathering, or 2) counterfeiting.

“I do love him, and I promised him a good turn, and that I would do it.

“What’s your price? What’s the value?”

“Fifty pounds, sir,” Cymbal said.

Thomas Barber had earlier stated that exact sum: He was a news gatherer, in fact.

Pennyboy Junior said to Thomas Barber, “Get in, Tom; take possession; I install you.”

He paid Cymbal the fifty pounds so that Tom could become the second clerk in the Staple of News Office.

Pennyboy Junior said to Cymbal, “Here, count your money.”

He then said to Thomas Barber, “May God give you joy, good Tom, and let me hear from you every minute of news while the New Staple stands or the News Office lasts, which I wish may never be less for your sake.”

Nathaniel the clerk returned and said to Cymbal, “The Emissaries, sir, want to speak with you and Master Fitton; they have brought in news, three bales altogether.”

A bale is a big bundle.

Cymbal said to Pennyboy Junior, “Sir, you are welcome here.”

“So is your creature,” Fitton said.

The word “creature” meant “creation.” Pennyboy Junior had created Tom the Barber’s new prosperity by buying for him his position as clerk of the Staple of News Office.

Cymbal and Fitton now said their goodbyes.

“Business calls us off, sir, business that may concern the News Office,” Cymbal said to Pennyboy Junior.

“Keep me in your good graces, sir, always in your Staple of News Office,” Pennyboy Junior said. “I am here your friend, and I am on the same floor.”

“We shall be your servants,” Fitton said.

Everyone exited except Pennyboy Junior and the Canter.

“How do you like it, founder?” Pennyboy Junior asked.

“All is well,” the Canter said, “except that your man of law, I think, isn’t appearing at the time appointed for him to come.”

He heard a noise, looked up, saw the man of law approaching, and said, “Oh, here comes Master’s Worship.”

Picklock entered the room and asked, "How is the heir, bright Master Pennyboy? Is he awake yet in his one-and-twenty?"

Seeing Pennyboy Junior's new clothes, he said, "Why, this is far better than to wear cypress, dull smutting gloves, or melancholy blacks, and have a pair of twelvepenny broad ribbons laid out like labels."

Cypress was a gauzy fabric that was used in mourning veils and other mourning garments after being dyed black. "Smutting" meant "black." "Labels" were strips of cloth that hung from the sides of a bishop's mitre.

Pennyboy Junior's outfit was much different from the clothing that he would have worn at a funeral.

Pennyboy Junior said, "I should have managed to have laughed as heartily in my mourner's hood as in this suit of clothing, if it had pleased my father to have been buried with the trumpeters."

"The heralds of arms, you mean," Picklock said.

Pennyboy Junior said, "I mean, all noise that is superfluous!"

Burial with trumpeters in attendance was expensive, and burial by heralds was very expensive. Fortunately for Pennyboy Junior, his father was frugal and against such expense.

"All that idle pomp and vanity of a tombstone your wise father did, by his will, prevent," Picklock said. "Your Worship had —"

Pennyboy Junior finished the sentence: "— a loving and obedient father of him, I know it: He was a right, kind-natured man, to die so opportunely."

Children should be obedient, more so than fathers.

Did Pennyboy Junior mean that he wanted his father to die, or did he just mean that his father had arranged things so that his death would cause him as little trouble as possible?

“Opportune” can mean 1) convenient, 2) fitting, or 3) advantageous.

Picklock added, “And to settle all things so well, compounded for your wardship the week before, and left your estate entire without any charge upon it.”

Pennyboy Junior’s father had made sure that Pennyboy Junior would be able to inherit his entire estate without becoming a ward whose estate was managed by someone else. The word “compounded” meant both “arranged” and “made a payment.” Pennyboy Junior’s father had apparently paid any necessary legal fees before he died.

Pennyboy Junior said, “I must say that I lost an officer of him, a good bailiff, and I shall miss him.”

Pennyboy Junior’s father had been a good administrator of the estate. A bailiff is a steward or manager of an estate.

He added, “But all peace be with him. I will not wish him alive again, not I, for all my fortune.”

He planned to enjoy his new wealth.

Pennyboy Junior continued, “May God give Your Worship joy of your new place, your emissaryship, in the Staple of News Office!”

Picklock was Emissary Westminster. The Courts of Law were held at Westminster Hall.

“Do you know you why I bought it, sir?” Picklock asked.

“No, I don’t,” Pennyboy Junior said.

“To work for you, and carry a mine — carry out a stratagem — against the master of it, Master Cymbal, who has a plot upon a gentlewoman who was once designated for you, sir,” Picklock said.

“For me?” Pennyboy Junior asked.

“Your father, old Master Pennyboy, of happy memory, and wisdom, too, as any in the county, being careful to find a fit marriage match for you in his own lifetime (but he was prevented from doing so), left it in writing in a codicil — an addition — here to be annexed to his will” — he showed the document — “that you, his only son, upon his charge, and blessing, should take due notice of a gentlewoman, sojourning with your uncle, Richer Pennyboy.”

Pennyboy Junior’s father wanted his son, Pennyboy Junior, to marry well.

Pennyboy Junior’s uncle, Richer Pennyboy, was also known as Pennyboy Senior, a miser.

“A Cornish gentlewoman,” Pennyboy Junior said. “I know her: Mistress Pecunia Do-all.”

A proverb states, “Money can do anything.”

“Do-all” can mean “Have sex with all.”

Picklock said, “A great lady indeed she is, and not of mortal race. She is Infanta of the Mines. Her Grace’s grandfather was duke and cousin to the King of Ophir, the Subterranean, but let that pass.”

In 1 Kings 2:28 King Solomon acquires gold from Ophir: “And they came to Ophir, and fetched from thence gold, four hundred and twenty talents, and brought it to king Solomon” (King James Version).

Much wealth is subterranean; it comes from mines.

Picklock continued, “Her name is, or, rather, her three names are (for such she is) Aurelia Clara Pecunia, a great princess, of mighty power, although she lives in private with a contracted family — a diminished entourage.”

Aurelia Clara Pecunia means “Golden Bright Money.”

In this society, the word “family” often meant one’s household servants.

Picklock continued, “Her secretary —”

The Canter interrupted, “— who is her gentleman-usher, too —”

Picklock interrupted, “— his name is Broker.”

He then listed the rest of Aurelia Clara Pecunia’s entourage: “And then two gentlewomen, Mistress Statute and Mistress Band, with Wax, the chambermaid, and Mother Mortgage, the old nurse; two grooms — Pawn and his fellow.”

Grooms are man-servants.

Picklock continued, “You have not many to bribe, sir.”

Pennyboy Junior could bribe Aurelia Clara Pecunia’s entourage in order to gain access to Aurelia Clara Pecunia.

Picklock continued, “The work is feasible, and the approaches easy, by your own kindred.”

Because of his late father, and his wealth, Pennyboy Junior could easily find a way to approach Aurelia Clara Pecunia.

Picklock continued, “Now, sir, Cymbal — the master here and governor of the Staple of News Office — thinks by his fine arts and pomp of his great place to attract her. He concludes she is a woman, and that as soon as she hears of the Staple of News Office she’ll come to visit it, as women all have longings to see new sights and shows. But your bounty, person, and finery must achieve her.”

Pennyboy Junior and Cymbal would be rivals for Aurelia Clara Pecunia.

“She is the talk of the time!” the Canter said. “She is the adventure — and venture — of the age!”

She was a financial venture — whoever married her would marry her fortune, too.

“You cannot put yourself upon an action of more importance,” Picklock said.

He felt that Pennyboy Junior could do nothing more important than marry a very rich woman.

“All the world are suitors to her,” the Canter said.

“All sorts of men and all professions!” Picklock said.

“You shall have stall-fed doctors, crammed divines pay court to her, and with those studied and perfumed flatteries as no room can stink more elegantly than where they are,” the Canter said.

Stall-fed doctors can mean 1) manger-fed or trough-fed (that is, overfed — think of pigs at a trough) doctors, or 2) doctors who have fed their minds with books from the book-stalls.

Divines — preachers — can be crammed with knowledge and/or with food.

“Well chanted, old Canter!” Picklock said. “You sing truly.”

“And, by your leave,” the Canter said, “good Master’s Worship, some of your velvet coat — well-dressed lawyers — make corpulent curtsies to her until they crack for it.”

They bowed so low that 1) their backs cracked, and/or 2) they farted.

The Canter said, “Your sea-captain, Shunfield, says that he’ll attack head-on the cannon for her —”

Picklock interrupted, “— although his loud mouthing — hot air — gets him little credit.”

The Canter said, “Young Master Piedmantle, the fine herald, professes to trace her heritage through all ages, from all the kings and queens who ever were.”

Picklock added, “And Master Madrigal, the crowned poet of these our times, offers to her praises as fair as any, when it shall please Apollo, god of poetry, that wit and rhyme may meet both in one subject.”

The Canter added, “And for you to bear her from all these, it will be —”

Picklock interrupted, “— a work of fame.”

The Canter continued, “— a work of honor.”

Picklock said, “It will be a celebration —”

The Canter interrupted, “— worthy your name.”

Picklock said, “The Pennyboys to live in it.”

The Pennyboys would live in fame.

The Canter said, “It is an action you were built for, sir.”

Picklock said, “And none but you can do it.”

“I’ll undertake it,” Pennyboy Junior said.

“And carry it,” the Canter said.

“Don’t worry about me,” Pennyboy Junior said, “for since I came of mature age, I have had a certain itch in my right eye, this corner, here — do you see? — to do some work that is worthy of a chronicle.”

Chronicles recorded noteworthy events. In this case, the noteworthy event would be the courting of a rich woman.

THE FIRST INTERMEAN: AFTER THE FIRST ACT
(The Staple of News)

Gossip Mirth said to Gossip Censure, “How are you now, Gossip Censure! How does the play please you?”

“Very scurvily, I think, and sufficiently naught,” Gossip Censure said.

“Naught” can mean 1) nothing, or 2) naughty, or evil.

Gossip Expectation said, “As naught as a body would wish. Here’s nothing but a young prodigal come of age, who makes much of the barber, buys him a place in a new office — in the air, I know not where — and his man of law to follow him, with the beggar to boot, and those two help him to a wife.”

Gossip Mirth said, “Aye, she is a proper piece that such creatures can broke for! With two such scoundrels acting as her agents, she must be quite the woman!”

“Piece” can mean 1) piece of money, aka a coin, 2) woman, or 3) piece of ass. Gossip Mirth does not think that Lady Pecunia is a respectable woman.

Gossip Tattle said, “I cannot abide that nasty fellow, the beggar. If he had been a court-beggar in good clothes, a beggar-in-velvet, as they say, I could have endured him.”

The Canter was a beggar who wore patched clothing.

Many courtiers wear velvet and beg for favors from the King.

Gossip Mirth said, “Or a begging scholar in black, or one of these beggarly poets, Gossip Tattle, who would hang upon a young heir like a horse-leech.”

Many kinds of beggars and parasites — hangers-on — exist in the world.

Gossip Expectation said, "Or a threadbare doctor of medicine, a poor quacksalver."

A quacksalver is a quack.

"Or a sea-captain, half-starved," Gossip Censure said.

Some ships were shipwrecked or lost their cargo or profit in some way.

"Aye, these were tolerable beggars, beggars of fashion!" Gossip Mirth said. "You shall see some such soon."

They began to talk about what they would like to see in the play.

Gossip Tattle said, "I would like to see the fool, Gossip Mirth; the fool is the finest man in the company, they say, and he has all the wit. He is the very Justice of the Peace of the play, and he can commit whom he will, and he can commit what he will, such as error and absurdity, as the whim takes him, and no man will say black is his eye, but they will laugh at him."

"No man will say black is his eye" meant "No man will impugn his character."

Gossip Mirth said, "But they have no fool in this play, I am afraid, Gossip Tattle."

"It's a wise play, then," Gossip Tattle said.

"They are all fools the rather, in that," Gossip Expectation said.

"That is likely enough," Gossip Censure said.

Gossip Tattle said:

“My husband, Timothy Tattle (God rest his poor soul), was accustomed to say there was no play without a fool and a devil in it; he was for the devil always, God bless him.

“The devil for his money, he would say: ‘I would like to see the devil.’

“‘And why would you so like see the devil?’ I would say.

“‘Because he has horns, wife, and may be a cuckold, as well as a devil,’ he would answer.

“‘You are even such another, husband,’ I would say. ‘Was the devil ever married? Where do you read that the devil was ever so honorable to commit matrimony?’

“‘The play will tell us that,’ he would say. ‘We’ll go see it tomorrow: The Devil Is an Ass. He is an errant learned man who made it and can write, they say, and I am foully deceived unless he can read, too.’”

Ben Jonson, the poet-playwright of The Devil is an Ass, which featured fools and devils, was an errant — erring — learned man, who could read as well as write. He killed a fellow actor in a duel, and he escaped the likely punishment of being executed by pleading benefit of clergy: He proved that he could read Latin, something that the clergy were able to do. The Vulgate Bible is written in Latin.

Gossip Mirth said, “I remember The Devil is an Ass, Gossip Tattle; I went with you. By the same token, Mistress Trouble-Truth discouraged us from going, and told us he — Ben Jonson — was a profane poet, and all his plays had devils in them; that he kept school upon the stage, could conjure there above the school of Westminster, and the astrologer Doctor Lamb, too. Not a play he made but had a devil in it; and that he would teach us all to make our husbands cuckolds at plays; by another token, that a young married wife in the company said she could find in her heart to steal thither and see a little of the vanity through her mask, and come practice at home.”

One criticism of plays of the time is that by having immoral characters in them, they taught the audience to practice immorality.

Gossip Tattle said, “Oh, it was Mistress —”

Gossip Mirth interrupted, “Nay, Gossip Tattle, I name nobody. It may be it was myself.”

Gossip Expectation asked, “But was the devil a proper man, Gossip Mirth?”

“As fine a gentleman of his inches as ever I saw trusted to the stage, or anywhere else, and he loved the commonwealth as well as ever a patriot of them all,” Gossip Mirth answered.

“A gentleman of his inches” meant “a gentleman from head to toe.” But perhaps Gossip Mirth was referring to the inches of the devil’s penis.

Some members of Parliament who were critics of the Crown were called patriots.

She continued, “He would carry away the Vice on his back, quick to Hell, in every play where he came, and reform abuses.”

Some old-fashioned plays had a riotous character called the Vice, which the Devil carried off to Hell in a noisy, action-packed scene at the end of the play.

Gossip Expectation said, “There was The Devil of Edmonton, no such man, I warrant you.”

Gossip Censure said, “The conjurer cozened him with a candle’s end. He — the Devil — was an ass.”

The Merry Devil of Edmonton was a very popular play (and folktale) in which the conjuror Peter Fabel makes a deal with the Devil. In one version of the tale, in return for granting Fabel certain privileges, the Devil will get his soul when a certain candle burns out. Fabel puts the candle in his pocket so he can keep it safe. The version of the play that has come down to us does not have that incident, but it does contain a comic character named Smug.

Gossip Mirth said, “But there was one Smug, a blacksmith, who would have made a horse laugh and break his halter, as they say.”

“Oh, but the poor man had an unfortunate mischance one day,” Gossip Tattle said.

Gossip Expectation asked, “How, Gossip Tattle?”

Gossip Tattle said, “Smug the Blacksmith had dressed a rogue jade in the morning that had the staggers, and Smug had got such a dose of the staggers himself by noon that they would not go away but continued all the playtime, do what he could, for his heart.”

A jade is a bad horse. The jade described has the disease called the staggers, which made the horse stagger. Dressing a horse means to curry and groom it.

Smug enjoyed drinking to excess. This gave him a case of a different kind of staggers, which made him stagger throughout the play.

A dose is a medicinal drink; many people consider alcohol to be a medicinal drink.

Gossip Mirth said, “It was his part, Gossip Tattle; he was to be drunk, by his part.”

“Do you say so?” Gossip Tattle said. “I didn’t understand it that way.”

Apparently, she thought the comic actor playing Smug had really gotten drunk.

Gossip Expectation said, “I wish we had such another part and such a man in this play! I fear that this play will be an excellent dull thing.”

Seeing the actors come back on stage, Gossip Censure said, “Wait. Pay attention to the play.”

— 2.1 —

Pennyboy Senior was Pennyboy Junior's uncle, and he was a miser and a usurer. He talked now outside his house with Aurelia Clara Pecunia, Mortgage (Pecunia's nurse), Statute (Pecunia's first serving-woman), Band (Pecunia's second serving-woman), and Broker (Pecunia's secretary and gentleman-usher). They were outside breathing the fresh air.

Pennyboy Senior was an old miser who loved Lady Pecunia and wished to be her minion — her favorite, her lover. Lady Pecunia, however, to her credit, did not wish to romantically enslave such old men.

Pennyboy Senior said to Lady Pecunia, “Your Grace is sad, I think, and melancholy. You do not look upon me with that face as you were accustomed to, my goddess, bright Pecunia.

“Although Your Grace has fallen by two in the hundred in vulgar estimation, yet I am Your Grace's servant still, and I teach this body of mine to bend, and these my aged knees to buckle in adoration and just worship of you.”

The Latin word pecunia means money. The face of pecunia is a coin, and gold is a bright color that does not tarnish. To be “fallen of two in the hundred” refers to a then-recent law against usury that lowered the legally allowed interest rate from ten percent to eight percent.

Pennyboy Senior continued, “Indeed, I confess, I have no shape to make a minion of — that is, I'm not handsome enough to be a lover — but I'm your martyr, Your Grace's martyr.

“I can hear the rogues, as I walk the streets, whisper and point: ‘There goes old Pennyboy, the slave of money, rich Pennyboy, Lady Pecunia's drudge, a sordid rascal, one who never made a good meal in his sleep, but sells the delicacies that are sent to him — fish, fowl, and venison — and preserves himself, like an old hoary rat, with moldy pie-crust.”

A proverb stated, “Beggars and misers may feast in their dreams.” Another proverb stated, “Golden dreams make men wake hungry.” Pennyboy Senior, however, is so much a miser that he does not feast even in his dreams.

Pennyboy Senior continued, “This I do hear, rejoicing I can suffer this and much more for your good Grace’s sake.”

“Why do you so, my guardian?” Lady Pecunia said. “I don’t bid you to do that. Cannot my grace and favor be gotten, and held, too, without your self-tormentings and your staying up at night, your wasting of your body thus with cares and scantings of your diet and rest?”

Lady Pecunia much preferred that Pennyboy Senior not dote on her and instead enjoy his life.

Misers prefer to have money rather than the good things of life. They will eat inexpensive, not-so-good food rather than spend money to buy much better food.

Pennyboy Senior replied, “Oh, no, your services, my princely lady, cannot with too much zeal of rites be done because they are so sacred.”

“But my reputation may suffer, and the respect of my family, when by so servile means they both are sought,” Lady Pecunia said.

Money can be a good thing when used correctly. One should avoid the extremes of being a miser like Pennyboy Senior and a prodigal like Pennyboy Junior. An excessive love of money — either for the money itself or for the things that money can buy — gives the love of money a bad reputation.

1 Timothy 6:10 states, “For the love of money is the root of all evil: which while some coveted after, they have erred from the faith, and pierced themselves through with many sorrows” (King James Version).

Pennyboy Senior said, “You are a noble, young, generous, gracious lady, and you would be bountiful to everybody, but you must not be so. Only a few know your merit, lady, and can value it.

“You yourself scarcely understand your proper, inherent powers. They are almighty, and we your servants, who have the honor here to stand so near you, know them and can use and exploit them, too.”

One way to use and exploit money is usury: to lend it out at an excessive rate of interest.

Pennyboy Senior continued, “All this nether world — world beneath the heavens — is yours. You command it and sway it. You command the honor of it and the honesty, the reputation, aye, and the religion (I was about to say, and I would not have erred) is Queen Pecunia’s — for that title is yours, if mortals knew Your Grace, or their own good.”

Money does have its gifts. Horace, in his Epistles, wrote, “Of course a wife and dowry, credit and friends, birth and beauty, are the gift of Queen Cash.” Horace, in his Satires, wrote, “Indeed, all things, divine and human, serve the beauty of riches — virtue, reputation, honor; and he who hoards it up will be famous, strong, and just.”

Pennyboy Senior also thought that Pecunia and pecunia — money — could be adored like the god of a religion. The verb “worship” means adore.

Some people trust in God. Other people trust in money.

Mortgage, who was Lady Pecunia's nurse, and Band, who was one of Lady Pecunia's serving-women, attempted to get her to retire inside.

"May it please Your Grace to retire," Mortgage said.

"I fear Your Grace has taken too much of the sharp air," Band said.

"Oh, no!" Lady Pecunia said. "With my constitution I could endure to take a great deal more, if it were left up to me.

"What do you think about it, Statute?"

Statute, another of Lady Pecunia's serving-women, replied, "A little air now and then does you well, and keeps Your Grace in your good health."

Band added, "And true temper."

Mortgage objected, "But too much, madam, may increase cold rheums, nourish catarrhs, green-sicknesses, and agues, and put you in consumption."

"Cold rheums" are runny noses. "Rheums" are discharges, and catarrhs are buildups of mucus. Green-sickness is anemia, and agues are fevers. "Consumption" is wasting away.

Mortgage was saying that Lady Pecunia might catch a cold.

Pennyboy Senior advised, "It's best to take the advice of your honorable women, noble madam. They know the state of your body, and have studied Your Grace's health —"

Band interrupted, "— and honor. Here will be visitants or suitors by and by; and it is not fitting that they find you here."

"It will make Your Grace too cheap to give them audience immediately," Statute said.

News is a commodity that can make a profit, and Lady Pecunia was being treated by the people around her as a commodity that could make a profit.

“Leave your secretary here to answer them,” Mortgage the nurse said.

“Wait here, Broker,” Lady Pecunia said to Broker, her secretary.

“I shall stay here, madam, and do Your Grace’s trusts with diligence,” Broker said.

Everyone except Broker exited.

— 2.2 —

Piedmantle the herald, who wanted to be a suitor to Lady Pecunia, entered the scene.

“What luck’s this?” he said. “I have come an inch too late.”

He had caught a glimpse of Lady Pecunia exiting.

Piedmantle then asked Broker, “Do you hear me, sir? Is Your Worship of the family unto the Lady Pecunia?”

Her “family” consisted of her household servants.

“Sir, I serve Her Grace, Aurelia Clara Pecunia, the Infanta,” Broker said.

An Infanta is a daughter of the King of Spain or Portugal, although the term came to be used to mean “great lady.”

“Has she all those titles, and ‘Her Grace’ besides?” Piedmantle the herald said. “I must correct that ignorance and oversight before I present myself and my research.”

As a herald, he did genealogical research, and he had researched Pecunia’s ancestry.

He continued, “Sir, I have drawn a pedigree for Her Grace, although I am yet a novice in that so noble study.”

“Are you a herald at arms?” Broker asked.

“No, sir, I am a pursuivant. My name is Piedmantle.”

“Good Master Piedmantle!” Broker said, perhaps pretending to recognize the name.

Piedmantle said, “I have traced her lineage —”

Broker interrupted, “— from all the Spanish mines in the West Indies, I hope, for she comes that way by her mother, but by her grandmother she’s Duchess of Mines.”

“From man’s creation I have brought her,” Piedmantle said.

He had traced Lady Pecunia’s ancestry back to Adam and Eve, he claimed.

“No further?” Broker said. “You must trace her heritage before, sir, long before Adam and Eve; otherwise, you have done nothing. Your Mines were before Adam.”

Pecunia is money, and money comes from mines (in the sense of underground deposits of gold and silver), and mines existed before the creation of Adam, the first man.

Broker was mocking Piedmantle by pretending that Mines was a family name.

Broker continued, “Search your office. Search roll five-and-twenty, and you will find it so.”

This kind of roll — roll number 25 — was a document at the College of Arms.

Broker continued, “I would have seen you are only a novice, Master Piedmantle, even if you had not told me so.”

Pennyboy Senior entered the scene from behind the two men and concealed himself so that he could eavesdrop.

Piedmantle said, “Sir, I am an apprentice in armory — in the story of coats of arms.”

Armory deals with blazoning — describing, depicting, painting — coats of arms. It is the science of heraldry.

Piedmantle continued, “I have read the Elements and Accidence, and all the leading books.”

The books Piedmantle referred to were The Elements of Armories and The Accidence of Armory.

“Accidence” means fundamentals or first principles.

He continued, “And I have now upon me a great ambition to be brought to Her Grace to kiss her hands.”

Piedmantle gave Broker a gold coin as a bribe, and Broker now began to give Piedmantle helpful information. Bribes to servants are useful in gaining access to a great lady.

Broker said, “Why, if you have acquaintance with Mistress Statute, or Mistress Band, my lady’s gentlewomen, they can introduce you to Lady Pecunia.

“One, Mistress Statute, is a judge’s daughter, but somewhat stately and haughty; the other, Mistress Band — her father’s only a scrivener, a professional scribe — but she can exert influence almost as much with my lady as the other, especially if Rose Wax, the chambermaid, is willing.

“Do you not know her, sir, neither?”

He was referring to Rose Wax, the chambermaid.

“No, truly, sir,” Piedmantle said.

Broker said, “She’s a good pliant wench and easy to be manipulated, sir.”

Softened wax could be easily manipulated. One way to soften a person is with a bribe.

He continued, “But the nurse, Old Mother Mortgage — if you have a tenement” — an apartment or a land holding — “or such a morsel? Although she has no teeth, she loves a sweetmeat, anything that melts in her warm gums. She could command it — access to Lady Pecunia — for you on such a trifle, a toy.”

According to Broker, the entire group of household servants could be bribed, just like Broker had been.

Bribery had worked on him. Why shouldn’t it work on the other servants of Lady Pecunia?

He continued, “Sir, you may see how for your love and this so pure complexion, a perfect sanguine, I have ventured thus the straining of a ward, opening a door into the secrets of our family.”

“Complexion” meant tinge, and “sanguine” meant red. In this society, gold was said to be colored red. Broker was referring to the gold coin that Piedmantle had used to bribe him.

“The straining of a ward” meant especially “the stretching of a boundary.” Broker should have been protecting Lady Pecunia.

A “ward” can be 1) a wardship, 2) a protectorate, 3) a fortification, or 4) a part of a lock.

Piedmantle said, “I ask you to let me know, sir — you to whom I am so much beholden — do but tell me your name.”

“My name is Broker. I am secretary and usher to Her Grace.”

“Good Master Broker!” Piedmantle said.

“Good Master Piedmantle,” Broker said.

Piedmantle said, “Why, you could do me, if you would, now, this favor on your own initiative.”

He had already bribed Broker. Why was it necessary to bribe anyone else? Why couldn’t Broker introduce him to Lady Pecunia?

“Truly, I think I could,” Broker said, “but if I would, I hardly should, unless either Mistress Band or Mistress Statute would lease to endorse it, or the good nurse I told you about, Mistress Mortgage.

“We know our places here. We don’t mingle in another’s sphere, but all of us move orderly in our own orbs; yet we are all concentrics.”

They all had their own duties, and they all revolved around Lady Pecunia.

In order for Piedmantle to be introduced to Lady Pecunia, he would have to get by the servants who were supposed to protect her.

“Well, sir, I’ll wait for a better season,” Piedmantle said.

“Do, and study the right means — the right way to be introduced to her,” Broker said. “Get Mistress Band to urge on your behalf, or little Wax.”

Piedmantle turned to go, and Broker made a mocking face at him, but Piedmantle did not see it. Although Piedmantle had bribed him, Broker did not respect Piedmantle.

“I have a hope, sir, that I may, by chance, alight on Her Grace as she’s taking the air,” Piedmantle said.

As Piedmantle exited, Broker made another mocking face at him.

Broker said, “That air of hope has blighted many an eyrie of kestrels like yourself, good Master Piedmantle.”

Broker was comparing Piedmantle’s alighting on Pecunia as she took the air to a hawk alighting on its prey in the air. An eyrie, aka aerie, is the nest of a bird of prey. A kestrel literally is a small hawk, and figuratively it is a human fool.

Pennyboy Senior came out of his hiding place and said, “Well said, Master Secretary; I stood behind you two and heard everything you said. I honor your dispatches — I like the way you got rid of him.

“If they are rude, untrained in our method, and have not studied the rule, dismiss them quickly.”

Piedmantle did not fit in with Broker and Pennyboy Senior. He gave money; he did not take it.

Pennyboy Senior did not mention the bribe Piedmantle had given to Broker; if he had noticed it, chances are he would have approved of Broker’s taking the bribe and still getting rid of Piedmantle.

Pennyboy Senior then said, “Where’s Lickfinger, my cook? That unctuous, greasy rascal — he never keeps his appointments in a timely manner, that vessel of kitchen stuff!”

The kitchen stuff was Lickfinger’s big belly, which was stuffed with food from the kitchen.

— 2.3 —

Lickfinger the cook entered the room.

“Here he has come, sir,” Broker said.

“Pox upon him and his kidney — he is always too late!” Pennyboy Senior said.

The word “kidney” meant character and temperament. Lickfinger’s character was to be always late.

“Too late to wish that you had them, I confess, who have them already,” Lickfinger said.

The pox was smallpox, which left pocks on the victims’ faces.

“What?” Pennyboy Senior asked.

“The pox!” Lickfinger answered.

“May the piles, the plague, and all diseases light on him who doesn’t know to keep his word,” Pennyboy Senior said.

The piles are hemorrhoids.

He continued, “I’d keep my word for sure! I hate that man who will not keep his word. When did I break my word?”

“Or I, until now?” Lickfinger said. “And I am late only half an hour —”

“Half a year,” Pennyboy Senior said, “to me who values a minute of time. I am a just man; I love always to be just.”

A just man is an exact man; Pennyboy Senior loved always to be on time.

Lickfinger responded, “Why, do you think that I can run like light-foot Ralph, or keep a wheelbarrow with a sail in town here to whirl me to you? I have lost two stone of suet in the service hastening hither.”

Light-foot Ralph was a fast runner.

A stone of weight is 14 pounds.

Suet was the greasy sweat dripping from Lickfinger's body as he "hurried" to see Pennyboy Senior.

Lickfinger continued, "You might have followed me like a watering pot and seen the knots I made along the street."

He sweat so much that he was like the spout of a watering pot, and as he "hurried," his dripping sweat made knots — intricate designs — in the dirt he walked on.

Lickfinger continued, "My face dropped grease like the skimmer in a fritter pan."

A skimmer is a slotted utensil used to raise fritters from a frying pan; grease drips from the skimmer.

As he wiped his face, Lickfinger continued, "And my whole body is yet, to say the truth, a roasted pound of butter with grated bread in it!"

He was referring to a kind of rich pastry.

Pennyboy Senior said, "Believe you, he who chooses."

This meant: I don't believe you.

He continued, "You delayed in order to have my venison stink and my fowl mortified, so that you might have them —"

A mortified fowl is one whose carcass is hung until it is tender. Hang it too long and it decays and is worth less money if it is sold, just as stinking venison brings in less money.

Mortified fowl, however, acquired a taste that some people prized and paid more for. It may be the case that Pennyboy Senior, who was not a glutton, cared nothing about taste and simply thought that Lickfinger was costing him money.

Lickfinger interrupted, “— a shilling or two cheaper. That’s your suspicion.”

Pennyboy Senior sold off gifts of food, and he wanted to receive a good price for them.

“Perhaps it is,” Pennyboy Senior said.

He added, “Will you go in and view and value all? Yonder is venison sent to me, and fowl and fish, in such abundance I am sick to see it!

“I wonder what they mean — I have told them about it — to burden a weak stomach and provoke a dying appetite! To thrust a sin upon me I never was guilty of — nothing but gluttony, gross gluttony, that will ruin this land!”

Possibly, some of the people who owed him money were paying their debts with food. Or they were using food to pay for an extension of their loan.

Gluttony is one of the Seven Deadly Sins; it is a sin that Pennyboy Senior was not guilty of.

“And abating two in the hundred,” Lickfinger said.

He was referring to the reduction in interest legally allowed to be charged. He knew that Pennyboy Senior believed that the reduction in legally allowed interest would ruin the land.

As a usurer, Pennyboy Senior was against reducing the interest rate. He believed or pretended to believe that lessening the profit of the usurer would make it harder for people — including poor people — to borrow money. Perhaps that is true. Lending to the poor can be risky. Moneylenders take risks to make more money, and they may be willing to risk money at ten percent interest that they would not be willing to risk at eight percent interest.

Pennyboy Senior sounded like a populist, but others could argue that usurious interest rates eat up the poor. Think of Payday Loans in the USA.

Pennyboy Senior said, “Aye, that same — abating two in the hundred — is a crying sin, a fearful damned device. It eats up the poor, devours them —”

Lickfinger said, “Sir, take heed what you give out.”

Pennyboy Senior did take care what he lent out; he wanted to get his money back and his interest, too.

Lickfinger’s words also meant, Don’t be a hypocrite. You care more about money than you do about the poor.”

Lickfinger’s words also meant for Pennyboy Senior to be careful what he said out loud. The politicians who backed the reduction in interest rates would not like his words.

Pennyboy Senior said, “What words I give out against your grave, great Solons? Numae Pompilii, they who made that law to take away the poor’s inheritance?”

Solon was an Athenian lawmaker. His name became a word meaning a wise ruler. Numa Pompilius succeeded Romulus as ruler of Rome. His name also became associated with wise rule. Numae Pompilii is the plural of Numa Pompilius. Of course, Pennyboy Senior’s use of these names for the lawmakers who had reduced the legal interest rate of loans was sarcastic; he did not think that these lawmakers were wise.

Pennyboy Senior continued, “It was the poor’s due, I will guarantee it, and the lawmakers have robbed them of it, plainly robbed them. I still am a just man; I tell the truth. When moneys went at ten in the hundred, I, and such as I, the servants of Pecunia, could spare the poor two out of ten, and did it.”

This sounds as if he had been charging the poor eight percent interest all along.

If that were true, why is he complaining? Lessening the interest rate two percent from ten percent would have the same effect as charging what the lawmakers allowed — actually, it would be the same thing, at least as far as the poor were concerned.

Pennyboy Senior disliked the fact that charging eight percent interest was now compulsory; now he could get no credit for being charitable.

But also perhaps the ten-percent interest he charged non-poor people allowed him to charge the poor only eight-percent interest.

Pennyboy Senior then asked, “What do you say, Broker?”

Lickfinger said to himself, “Ask your echo.”

He thought that Broker was a yes-man to Pennyboy Senior.

“You did it,” Broker said.

“I am for justice,” Pennyboy Senior said. “When did I leave justice? We knew it was theirs. The poor had right and title to it. Now —”

Lickfinger interrupted, “You can spare them nothing —”

Pennyboy Senior interrupted, “Very little —”

Lickfinger interrupted, “— as good as nothing.”

“The legislators have bound our hands with their wise, solemn act,” Pennyboy Senior said. “They have shortened our arms.”

Short arms are unable to reach deep into pockets to take out money to give to the poor.

Lickfinger said, “Beware lest those worshipful ears, sir, be shortened, and you play Crop in the Fleet, if you use this license.”

One punishment of the time was to crop — cut off part of — an offender’s ears. Such a punishment could be carried out in Fleet Prison.

“What license have you, knave?” Pennyboy Senior asked. “Are you an informer?”

Some people, such as Fools, have license to mock other people. An informer could have such license: Either let me mock you, or I shall inform the authorities about what you said.

“I am Lickfinger, your cook.”

“A saucy jack you are, that’s for sure.” Pennyboy Senior said.

The word “jack” means “knave.” A Jack Sauce is a saucy knave. As a cook, Lickfinger dealt with sauces.

Pennyboy Senior asked, “What did I say wrong, Broker?”

“Nothing that I heard, sir,” Broker said.

“I know his gift,” Lickfinger said to himself. “He can be deaf when he wishes.”

Pennyboy Senior asked Lickfinger, “Have you provided for me my bushel of eggs that I asked you for? I do not care how stale or stinking they are; let them be rotten because they are ammunition here to pelt the boys who break my windows.”

Lickfinger said, “Yes, sir, I have spared them for you and not used them for the mayor’s custard politic.”

At the annual Lord Mayor’s Feast in London, a jester would leap into a giant bowl of custard.

“It is well,” Pennyboy Senior said. “Go in, take hence all that excess food. Make what you can of it, your best. And when I have friends whom I invite at home, provide me such, such, and such a dish as I ask for, one at a time, no superfluity. Or if you don’t have it, return to me the money. You know my ways.”

“They are a little crooked,” Littlefinger said.

“What, knave?” Pennyboy Senior asked.

Lickfinger explained, “Because you do indent.”

Some legal documents were cut into two parts with a crooked line. The two parts could be shown to be a genuine document because the jagged lines of the two parts would fit together. Lickfinger was saying that Pennyboy Senior’s ways were crooked.

“It is true, sir,” Pennyboy Senior said. “I do indent that you shall return me money —”

One meaning of “indent” is “specify by contract.” People gave gifts of food to Pennyboy Senior, and Lickfinger sold them and gave the money to Pennyboy Senior.

Lickfinger interrupted, “— rather than food, I know it. You are just still.”

Pennyboy Senior preferred money to the gifts of food.

“I love it — money — still,” Pennyboy Senior said. “And therefore if you spend — serve and/or consume — the red-deer pies in your house, or sell them forth, sir, arrange it so that I may have their coffins — the crusts of the pies — all returned here and piled up. I would be thought to keep some kind of house.”

He wanted to keep track of household expenses.

“By the moldy signs?” Lickfinger asked.

“Mold” can be 1) a pie-crust, or 2) the earth of a grave.

“Moldy” can mean rotten.

Pennyboy Senior said, “And then remember, meat for my two dogs: fat flaps of mutton, kidneys, rumps of veal, good plenteous scraps. My maid shall eat the leftovers —”

“When you and your dogs have dined!” Lickfinger said. “A sweet remnant.”

Pennyboy Senior’s dogs ate well — better than the maid, and possibly better than Pennyboy Senior.

Seeing some people coming, Pennyboy Senior said, “Who’s here? My courtier and my little doctor, my muster-master — and what plover’s that whom they have brought to pluck and cheat?”

The courtier was Fitton. The little doctor was Almanac. The muster-master was Shunfield, who was a sea captain and as such kept a muster-list of sailors. The unknown person — the plover, or dupe — would turn out to be Madrigal, a poetaster, an inferior poet.

“I don’t know,” Broker said. “Some green plover. I’ll find out who he is.”

The jeerers wanted Madrigal to borrow money from Pennyboy Senior; if Madrigal got the loan, they would help Madrigal spend the money.

“Do, for I know the rest,” Pennyboy Senior said. “They are the jeerers — they are mocking, flouting jacks.”

— 2.4 —

Fitton, Almanac, Shunfield, and Madrigal entered the room. All four of them were jeerers, but Madrigal was the newest jeerer. They enjoyed mocking other people.

“How are you now, old money-bawd?” Fitton said. “We’re come —”

A money-bawd is a usurer.

Pennyboy Senior interrupted, “— to jeer me, as you are accustomed to do. I know you.”

He knew that they were also visiting him to borrow money.

“No, to give you some good security,” Almanac said, “and see Pecunia.”

“What is the security?” Pennyboy Senior asked.

“Ourselves,” Fitton said.

“We’ll be one bound for another,” Almanac said.

They would guarantee the repayment of each other’s loans.

Fitton pointed to Almanac and said, “I will be bound for this noble doctor here.”

Almanac pointed to Fitton and said, “I will be bound for this worthy courtier here.”

Fitton pointed to Shunfield and said, “This man of war, he was our muster-master.”

A muster-master keeps the muster-list of soldiers or sailors.

Almanac said, “But a sea-captain now, brave Captain Shunfield.”

Pennyboy Senior held up his nose and sniffed.

“You sniff the air now, as if the scent displeased you?” Shunfield said.

Some sea-goers smell strongly of fish and brine.

Fitton said to Pennyboy Senior, “You need not fear him, man. His credit is sound.”

Almanac added, “And seasoned, too, since he took salt at sea — that is, since he took to being a sailor.”

“I do not love pickled — brined — security,” Pennyboy Senior said. “I wish I had one good fresh-man in for all of you because the truth is that you three stink.”

A fresh-man is a novice, someone who can be taken advantage of. Also, a fresh-man is someone who bathes in fresh water.

The three who stank, stank because of bad character in addition to whatever odors they had.

“You are a rogue,” Shunfield said.

“I think I am, but I will lend no money on that security, Captain,” Pennyboy Senior replied.

Fitton, Almanac, and Shunfield were not good security: They were not people Pennyboy Senior wished to lend money to.

Almanac said, “Here’s a gentleman, a fresh-man in the world, one Master Madrigal.”

Madrigal was their plover; he was their dupe.

“Of an untainted credit,” Fitton said. “What do you say to him?”

According to Fitton, Madrigal would be good security to repay the loan.

Madrigal had stepped aside with Broker.

“He’s gone, I think,” Shunfield said. “Where is he?”

He called, “Madrigal?”

Pennyboy Senior said, “He has an odd singing — resounding — name. Is he an heir?”

He was punning on “heir” and “air” — a song. A madrigal is a song with parts for many voices.

Fitton said, “An heir to a fair fortune —”

Almanac interrupted, “— and full hopes. He is a dainty scholar and a pretty poet!”

Unfortunately, many poets don’t make much money, so their “full hopes” are quite modest, financially. They may have cultural capital without having financial capital. They may be heir to an air: a song.

“You’ve said enough,” Pennyboy Senior said. “I have no money, gentlemen. If he goes to it in rhyme even once, not a penny.”

Pennyboy Senior had money, but he had no money to lend to a poet.

He sniffed again.

“Why, he’s of years, although he has little beard,” Shunfield said. “He is an adult.”

“His beard has time to grow,” Pennyboy Senior said. “I have no money. Let him still dabble in poetry. No Pecunia is to be seen.”

Almanac said, “Come, you love to be costive always in your courtesy, but I have a pill, a golden pill, to purge away this melancholy.”

The word “costive” can mean 1) stingy, and 2) constipated. “Courtesy” here means generosity. “Costive generosity” is a contradiction in terms.

The jeerers wanted golden pills — coins, golden coins — to drive away their melancholy — melancholy that was caused by a lack of money.

A golden pill of this kind would drive away Pennyboy Senior's melancholy because he was a miser.

Disappointed at not being able to borrow money, the jeerers began to jeer at Pennyboy Senior.

Shunfield said, "His melancholy is caused by nothing but his keeping of the house here, with his two drowsy dogs."

Fitton said, "A drench — drink — of sack at a good tavern, and a fine fresh pullet, would cure him."

A pullet can be 1) a chicken, or 2) a woman, or 3) a prostitute.

"Nothing but a young hare in white broth," Lickfinger said. "I know his diet better than the doctor."

He may have meant "heir" in addition to "hare." Usurers can devour people they lend money to, including heirs.

Shunfield recognized him: "What, Lickfinger, my old host of the Ram Alley? You have some market here."

Ram Alley was a place with a bad reputation. Cookshops and taverns could be found there.

"Some dosser — pannier, aka basket — of fish or fowl to fetch off," Almanac said.

"An odd bargain of venison to drive," Fitton said.

Lickfinger did sell Pennyboy Senior's food.

Pennyboy Senior said to Lickfinger, "Will you go inside, knave?"

"I must necessarily go," Lickfinger replied.

He then said, “You see who drives me, gentlemen.”

Pennyboy Senior shoved him inside the house.

“Not the devil,” Almanac said.

A proverb states, “He must needs [necessarily] go whom the devil drives.”

“Pennyboy Senior may be, in time,” Fitton said. “He is the devil’s agent, now.”

“You are all cogging jacks — cheating knaves,” Pennyboy Senior said. “You are a covey — a set — of wits. You are the jeerers, who always assemble at meals.”

Having no money, the jeerers sought free meals where they could find them.

Pennyboy Senior added, “Or rather you assemble at an eyrie, for you are birds of prey and fly at and jeer all — nothing’s too big or high for you — and you are so truly feared, but not beloved, one of another as no one dares break company from the rest, lest they should fall upon and insult the man who is absent.”

They continued to jeer at Pennyboy Senior.

“Oh, the only oracle that ever squeaked or spoke out of a jacket!” Almanac said.

“How the rogue stinks, worse than a fishmonger’s sleeves!” Shunfield said.

“Or currier’s hands!” Fitton said.

Horace was once jeered by a man who said that he had often seen Horace’s father wipe his nose on his fist.

A currier 1) grooms horses, or 2) dresses leather. Either kind of currier can stink.

“And such a parboiled visage!” Shunfield said.

Fitton added, “His face looks like a dyer’s apron, exactly!”

Pennyboy Senior’s face was botched red and white.

“A sodden — stewed — head, and his whole brain a posset curd!” Almanac said.

A posset curd is hot milk curdled in hot spiced ale or sack.

“Aye, now you jeer,” Pennyboy Senior said. “Jeer on; I have no money.”

“I wonder what religion he’s of?” Almanac asked.

“No certain species surely,” Fitton said. “He’s a kind of mule that’s half an ethnic Heathen, half a Christian!”

A mule is the impotent offspring of a horse and a donkey.

“I have no money, gentlemen,” Pennyboy Senior said.

Shunfield said, “This blockhead — he has no sense of any virtue, honor, gentry, or merit.”

Pennyboy Senior replied, “You say very rightly, my meritorious captain — as I take it you are.”

Meretrix is Latin for “prostitute.” A meretrix can make money to pay the bills. One now-obsolete meaning of “meritorious” is “earning money through prostitution.”

Another meaning of “meritorious” is “having merit.”

A person with the “merit” of a Shunfield cannot make money to pay the bills.

Pennyboy Senior continued, “Merit will keep no house, nor pay no house-rent. Will Mistress Merit go to market, do you think? Set the pot on the stove, or feed the family? Will gentry settle up with the butcher or the baker, fetch in a pheasant or a brace — a pair — of partridges from goodwife Poulterer for my lady's supper?"

A poulterer sells poultry.

"See this pure and utter rogue!" Fitton said.

"This rogue has money, though," Pennyboy Senior said. "My worshipful brave courtier has no money — no, nor does my valiant Captain Shunfield."

"Hang you, rascal!" Shunfield said.

Pennyboy Senior said to Almanac, "Nor do you, my learned doctor. I loved you while you did hold your practice and killed tripe-wives, and kept yourself to your urinal."

He liked Almanac when Almanac actually worked as a doctor, killing women who dressed and sold tripe and inspecting the urine collected in urinals.

Medical practices of the time, such as bleeding, often killed patients.

Inspection of urine can show the state of the patient's health; urine is supposed to be clear, and cloudy or bloody urine can indicate bad health.

But now Almanac compiled and consulted almanacs and ephemerides and indulged in astrology. Ephemerides were tables of astronomical data that gave the predicted position of celestial objects such as the planets.

Pennyboy Senior continued, "But since your thumbs have greased the ephemerides, casting horoscopes, and turned over the pages of almanacs for your candle-rents, and your twelve houses in the Zodiac, with your almutens, almacantaros, you truly shall cant — speak — in vain as far as Pennyboy Senior is concerned."

“Candle-rents” are revenue gained from residential properties. Unless a residence is continually well maintained, such property depreciates just like a candle that continually melts away.

People would use the astrological almanacs to help them predict their revenue from rental properties. Imagine a farmer using weather predictions in The Farmer’s Almanac to predict crop yields.

“Almutens” are the astrological ruling planets.

According to the Oxford English Dictionary, an “almucantara” is “A circle on the celestial sphere parallel to the horizon, typically one of a series that cut the meridian at equal angular separations; a parallel of altitude.”

Almucantarans are used in astrological almanacs.

Almanac spent his time consulting almanacs and indulging in astrology instead of doctoring.

Shunfield said to the other jeerers, “I told you what we should find him to be: an absolute bawd.”

“A rogue, a cheater,” Fitton said.

Pennyboy Senior said, “Say what you please, gentlemen. I am of that humble nature and condition never to mind Your Worships, or take notice of what words you throw away like this. I keep house here like a lame cobbler who is never out of doors, with my two dogs, my friends, and as you say, I drive a quick, pretty trade always.”

A proverb states, “A cobbler is a king at home.”

He continued, “I get money, and as for titles, be they ‘rogue’ or ‘rascal,’ or whatever Your Worships fancy, let them pass as transitory things. These titles are mine today and yours tomorrow.”

“Hang you, dog!” Almanac said.

“You cur!” Shunfield said.

“You see how I blush and am ashamed of these grossly insulting attributes?” Pennyboy Senior said sarcastically. “Yet you have no money.”

Almanac said, “Well, wolf, hyena, you old pock-marked rascal, you will have the hernia fall down again into your scrotum, and I shall be sent for. I will remember then, that; and I will remember your fistula in ano I cured you of.”

“Fistula in ano” means fistula in the anus. An anal fistula is a passage from the inside of the anus to the skin around it.

If Almanac really could cure such hurts, he ought to keep his practice as a doctor of medicine.

“Thank your dog-leechcraft,” Pennyboy Senior said.

The word “dog” was used as an insult. “Dog-leechcraft” is quackery. Or perhaps Pennyboy Senior was calling Almanac a dog-doctor.

Perhaps Almanac really did cure Pennyboy Senior’s ailments. If he had continued his practice and not become a jeerer, most likely his credit would be good with Pennyboy Senior.

Doctors can do people good, and they can get good money for doing so.

Some people may see astrology as a help in getting rich quick; if it ever works, it works for very few. Famous astrologers, maybe?

“They were ’olesome piles, before you meddled with them,” Pennyboy Senior said.

They were wholesome hemorrhoids, and they were hemorrhoids in a hole.

Perhaps Almanac had not cured Pennyboy Senior's ailments.

They continued to jeer at Pennyboy Senior.

"What an ungrateful wretch is this!" Almanac said.

Shunfield said, "He remembers a courtesy no more than London Bridge remembers what arch was mended last."

London Bridge was in a state of disrepair, hence the children's song "London Bridge is Falling Down."

"He never thinks, more than a log, of any grace at court a man may do him, or that such a lord reached him his hand," Fitton said.

A proverb stated, "A friend in court is worth a penny in purse."

Fitton was a courtier, and he was saying that he could do Pennyboy Senior favors at court — if Pennyboy Senior lent him money.

"Oh, yes!" Pennyboy Senior said. "If grace would cancel the brewer's tally, or my good lord's hand would settle the bill; but, sir, they will not do it."

Fitton's good will would not pay Pennyboy Senior's bills.

Pennyboy Senior showed the jeerers a gold coin and said, "Here's a piece — it is my good Lord Piece, and it does everything. It goes to the butcher's and fetches in a mutton, and then it goes to the baker's and brings in bread. It makes fires, gets wine, and does more real courtesies than all the milords I know.

“My sweet Lord Piece! You are my lord; the rest are cogging jacks, under the rose.”

“Under the rose,” aka sub rosa, is an idiom meaning “between you and me” or “confidentially.”

“Rogue!” Shunfield said. “I am tempted to beat you now.”

“Truly, captain, if you dared to beat any other person, I would believe you,” Pennyboy Senior said.

Shunfield was good at threatening, but he was not good at actually fighting.

Pennyboy Senior continued, “But indeed you are hungry. You are not angry, captain, if I know your character rightly, good captain. No Pecunia is to be seen, even if Mistress Band would speak, or little Blushet — Blushing, aka Rose — Wax be never so easy.

“I’ll stop my ears with her against the sirens Court and Philosophy.”

In Homer’s Odyssey, Odysseus wanted to hear the song of the Sirens, who used their beautiful voices to lure sailors to their death. He ordered his men to stop their ears with wax so they wouldn’t hear the song of the Sirens, and he ordered his men to tie him to the mast so that when he heard the song, he wouldn’t jump overboard to go to the Sirens, which would result in his death.

The Sirens whom Pennyboy Senior and Pecunia were stopping their ears against and rejecting were Court and Philosophy: the courier Fitton and the natural philosopher Almanac, who was a doctor and so studied or was supposed to study the effects of natural medicines. Pennyboy Senior had no interest in hearing whatever these jeerers — or any jeerers — said.

“God be with you, gentlemen,” Pennyboy Senior said. “If you provide better names, Pecunia is for you.”

“God be with you” means “Goodbye.”

The jeerers need better names than they have (that is, they need to be different people with better characters than they have) if they want to borrow money from him. They also need to provide better names than they had been using to refer to him — “wolf, hyena, you old pocky rascal” — if they want to borrow money from him.

Fitton said, “What a damned Harpy he is!”

Harpies are mythological creatures that are half-bird and half woman. They are usually nuisances, but sometimes they are oracles.

Fitton then asked, “Where’s Madrigal? Has he sneaked away from here?”

Madrigal returned with Broker.

Shunfield said, “Here he comes with Broker, Lady Pecunia’s secretary.”

Almanac said, “He may do some good with him, perhaps.”

Who is he, and who is him?

He may be Broker, who may get bribe money from Madrigal. Or he is Madrigal, who may get access to Lady Pecunia and her women from Broker. But possibly, Madrigal may be able to borrow money from Pennyboy Senior.

Almanac asked, “Where have you been, Madrigal?”

“Above with My Lady’s women, reading verses,” Madrigal replied.

Apparently, Lady Pecunia was not present.

Fitton said, "That was a favor."

It was a favor for Madrigal to have been admitted into the ladies' presence. Whether hearing Madrigal's verses was a favor to the ladies is open to interpretation.

Fitton then said to Broker, "Good morning, Master Secretary."

"Good morning, Master Usher," Shunfield said to Broker.

Almanac said, "Sir, by both your worshipful titles and your name, Mas' Broker, good morning."

Mas' is short for Master.

Madrigal said, "I did ask him if he were Amphibian Broker."

An amphibious animal such as otters can live both on land and water: river otters and sea otters.

"Why?" Shunfield said.

Almanac said, "Because he has two offices, he is a creature of two natures."

Broker was Lady Pecunia's secretary and her gentleman-usher. These were his offices: his jobs.

"You may jeer," Broker said. "You have the wits, young gentlemen, but your hope of Helicon will never carry it here with our fat — dull and complacent — family."

The Muses resided on Mount Helicon. Poets have long attempted to climb that mountain.

Broker continued, "We have the dullest, most unbored — unpenetrated and unenlightened — ears for verse among our females."

He said to Madrigal, "I grieved that you read so long, sir. Old nurse Mortgage snored in the chair, and Statute, if you noticed her, fell fast asleep, and Mistress Band nodded, but not with any consent to what you read.

“They must have somewhat else to chink — clink — than rhymes; if you could make an epitaph on your land — imagine it on the point of departing from you — such a poem would wake them and bring Wax to her true temper.”

If Madrigal would sell his land, then he could bribe Lady Pecunia’s women servants with gold coins they could clink. That would keep them awake.

“To temper wax” is “to make wax malleable by kneading it.” Rose Wax would become pliant through the application of money to her hand.

Madrigal was supposed to be inheriting land — that is why the jeerers were attempting to take advantage of him. If they succeeded, Madrigal could well make an epitaph on the departure of his land.

“Truly, sir, and I will try,” Madrigal said.

“It is only earth, fit to make bricks and tiles of,” Broker said.

Broker wanted Madrigal to sell his land so that he — Broker — could get bribes.

Madrigal could also get money by mortgaging his land to Pennyboy Senior — and lose his land through non-payment of his debt.

Shunfield said, “A pox upon land. It is only for pots or pipkins — small earthen pots — at the best. If it would keep us in good tobacco pipes —”

Broker interrupted, “— it would be worth keeping.”

Fitton added, “Or in porcelain dishes, there would be some hope.”

“But this is a poor, hungry soil,” Almanac said. “And must be helped.”

Fitton said, “Who would hold any land to have the trouble to marl it?”

To marl land meant to improve it with marl, a kind of clayey soil used to improve sandy land.

“Not a gentleman,” Shunfield said.

Broker said, “Let rustics and laborers who love plows, carts, and harrows pursue such work; they always are busy in vexing the dull element.”

The dull element is earth.

They were working hard to persuade Madrigal that land was not worth having.

Many gentlemen at the time, of course, got their income from land.

“Our sweet songster shall rarify it into air,” Almanac said.

They wanted Madrigal to mortgage his land so they could burn through his money, which would go up in smoke and dissipate into the air.

Fitton whispered to Broker, “And you, Mas’ Broker, shall have a feeling.”

The jeerers would be happy to “borrow” money from Madrigal once he had mortgaged or sold his land, and Broker would have a share for helping to persuade Madrigal to mortgage or sell his land.

A “feeling” is a tip — or a bribe.

Broker said, “So it will gratify or soften, sir, the nerves.”

Tips gratify; bribes soften.

“Oh, it shall be palpable,” Madrigal said. “It shall make you run through a finger-ring, or a thumb-ring, run through the nose — hole — of a tobacco pipe, and draw your ductile — flexible — bones out like a knitting needle, to serve my subtle turns.”

Attendant spirits — familiars — were thought to be kept in a ring.

Madrigal was aware that money had power to turn greedy people into servants.

“I shall obey, sir,” Broker said “And run a thread, like an hourglass.”

Broker was a greedy person.

He would run continually like a trickle of sand in an hourglass to serve Madrigal and get bribes. Once Madrigal was out of money, the sand in the hourglass would cease to run. No bribes, no service.

Pennyboy Senior entered the room and asked, “Where is Broker?”

Seeing that the jeerers were still present, he asked, “Aren’t these flies — these parasites — gone yet?”

He said to the jeerers, of whom Madrigal was now one, “Please, leave my house. I’ll smoke you out else.”

Smoke is a way to keep unwelcome visitors such as mosquitoes away.

“Oh, the prodigal!” Fitton said. “Will you be at so much charge — expense — with us, and loss?”

The expense would be the cost of the wood — probably juniper wood to cleanse the house.

Madrigal pretended that Pennyboy Senior would be upset at the loss of fragrant smoke escaping from his house.

Madrigal said to Pennyboy Senior, “I have heard you have offered, sir, to lock up smoke, and caulk your windows, spar up — bolt — all your doors, thinking to keep it a close prisoner with you, and wept when it went out, sir, at your chimney.”

According to the jeerers, misers don’t wish to let go of any possession, even smoke, except in return for money.

“And yet his eyes were drier than a pumice because of the smoke,” Fitton said.

Shunfield said, “He is a wretched rascal, who will bind the nose of his bellows lest the wind get out when he’s abroad!”

Almanac said, “He sweeps down no cobwebs here, but instead he sells them for cut fingers.”

Cobwebs were used to stop cuts from bleeding.

Almanac continued, “And he sells the spiders, which are creatures reared of dust and cost him nothing, to fat old ladies to feed to their pet monkeys.”

Fitton said, “He has offered to gather up spilt water and to preserve each hair that falls from him to stuff balls with.”

Hair was used to stuff tennis balls.

Shunfield said, “He is a slave, and an idolater to Pecunia!”

Pennyboy Senior replied to the jeerers, “You all have happy memories, gentlemen, in rocking my poor cradle.”

Possibly, at one time, the jeerers had money, which they had borrowed from Pennyboy Senior, using their land as security. Pennyboy Senior had slept soundly with such security. Now, possibly, Pennyboy Senior had money and the jeerers' lands.

Pennyboy Senior continued, "I remember, too, when you had lands, and credit, worship and honor, friends, yes, and could give security in the form of land.

"Now you have none, or will have none very shortly."

He was thinking of Madrigal, whose new friends would most likely convince him to sell or mortgage his land.

Pennyboy Senior continued, "Time and the vicissitude of things can bring these things about."

He could also have mentioned that having the wrong kind of "friends" can bring these things about.

He continued, "I have all these, and money, too, and do possess them, and I am right heartily glad of all our memories, and both the changes: the change for the better in my case, and the change for the worse in your cases."

Fitton said to the other jeerers, "Let us leave the viper."

Pennyboy Senior had struck a nerve.

Everyone exited except Pennyboy Senior and Broker.

Pennyboy Senior said to himself about Fitton, "He's glad he is rid of his torture, and so soon."

He then said, "Broker, come here. Go up and tell your lady that she must be ready immediately, as well as Statute, Band, Mortgage, and Wax.

"My prodigal young kinsman will straightaway be here to see her. He is the top of our house, the flourishing and flaunting Pennyboy Junior."

The top of the house is the best of the house: the heir who will marry and produce descendants to carry on the family name. The other Pennyboys were unable to have children. Pennyboy Junior's father was dead, and Pennyboy Senior was old.

He continued, "We were but three of us in all the world. My brother Francis, whom they called Frank Pennyboy, was the father to this Pennyboy Junior — Frank Pennyboy is dead.

"This Pennyboy Junior is now the heir.

"I, Richer Pennyboy, not 'Richard,' but old Harry Pennyboy, and (to make a rhyme) close, wary Pennyboy, I shall have all at last, my hopes do tell me."

"Old Harry" was one of the devil's nicknames.

For some reason, Pennyboy Senior thought he would have all the family wealth. Possibly he thought this because Lady Pecunia resided with him.

Pennyboy Senior said to Broker, "Go, see that all is ready, and where my dogs have faulted on the floor, remove it with a broom, and sweeten all with a sprig of juniper — not too much, but sparing. We may be faulty ourselves otherwise, and turn prodigal in the entertaining of the Prodigal."

Fragrant juniper wood was burned to sweeten the air.

Broker exited.

Seeing his nephew approaching, Pennyboy Senior said, "Here he is! And with him — who? A clapper dudgeon!"

A clapper dudgeon is a beggar. "Dudgeon" is a wood used to make bowls and knife handles. A clapper is a lid to a clapper-dish or begging-bowl. Beggars could make noise by hitting their wooden begging bowl with a lid or a knife handle.

Clappers are also tongues: Beggars ask for alms while holding their begging bowl.

Pennyboy Senior said, “That’s a good sign, to have the beggar follow him so near at his first entry into fortune.”

Why would that be a good sign?

Pennyboy Senior had just had the jeerers trying to borrow money from him without good security. They were unlikely to ever be able to pay the money back.

By contrast, a real beggar was an improvement. A beggar would ask for alms and not make false promises to pay the money back.

A real beggar would also be a reminder to Pennyboy Junior not to waste his wealth.

— 2.5 —

Pennyboy Junior, Picklock, and the Canter entered the scene. The Canter was the clapper dudgeon whom Pennyboy Senior had seen.

Broker, Pecunia, Statute, Band, Wax, and Mortgage were in a neighboring study, where they could not be seen.

“How now, old uncle?” Pennyboy Junior said. “I have come to see you and the splendid lady here, the daughter of Ophir, they say you keep.”

Lady Pecunia was Pennyboy Senior’s guest.

Pennyboy Senior said, “Sweet nephew, even if she were the daughter of the sun, she’s at your service, and so am I, and the whole family, worshipful nephew.”

The family was the household servants.

“Do you say so, dear uncle?” Pennyboy Junior said.
“Welcome my friends, then. Here is Domine Picklock, my man of law.”

Learned professionals were called by the title “Domine,” aka “Master.”

Pennyboy Junior continued, “He solicits all my causes, follows my business, makes and settles my quarrels between my tenants and me, sows all my strifes and reaps them, too, troubles the country for me, and vexes any neighbor whom I please.”

“But with commission?” Pennyboy Senior asked.

A lawyer who worked under commission could cause problems and then receive payment for correcting them.

“Under my hand and seal,” Pennyboy Junior replied.

The lawyer definitely got paid.

“A worshipful — honorable — place!” Pennyboy Senior said.

Definitely a profitable job.

“I thank His Worship for it,” Picklock said.

Pennyboy Senior pointed to the Canter and said, “But who is this old gentleman?”

The Canter said, “A rogue, a vagrant, a very canter; aye, sir, one who maunds upon the pad — that is, I am one who begs upon the highway.”

In using words such as “maunds” and “pad,” the Canter was using cant: the specialized jargon used by beggars.

The Canter continued, “We should be brothers, though, for you are nearly as wretched as myself. You dare not use your money, and I have none.”

A person who will not use money when it ought to be used is like a person who owns books but does not read them.

Money should be used to make oneself comfortable, and good books ought to be read.

“Not use my money, you cogging jack — you cheating knave?” Pennyboy Senior said, angrily. “Who uses it at better rates? Who lends it for a greater percentage in the hundred than I do, sirrah?”

He used his money in usury.

Pennyboy Junior said, “Don’t be angry, uncle.”

“What?” Pennyboy Senior said. “To disgrace me with my queen? As if I did not know her value.”

His queen was Queen Pecunia and Queen Pecunia.

Pecunia is Latin for “money.”

He worshiped money, and money can be a quean — a whore.

The Canter said, “Sir, I meant that you dare not to enjoy it.”

For example, he could burn more juniper wood than he did to perfume the air in his house.

“Hold your peace,” Pennyboy Senior said. “You are a jack.”

A jack is a knave.

Now Pennyboy Junior was angry.

He said, “Uncle, he shall be a John — he shall be my servant, And, what’s more, for all that, he’s as good a man as you are.

If I can make him so, he will be a better man. Perhaps I will, too.”

He then said to the Canter and Picklock, “Come, let us go.”

Pennyboy Senior said, “Nay, kinsman, my worshipful kinsman, and the top of our house, don’t do your penitent uncle that affront, because of a rash word to leave his joyful threshold before you see the lady whom you long for, the Venus of the time and state, Pecunia!

“I perceive your bounty loves the man — the Canter — for some concealed virtue that he hides under those rags.”

The Canter said, “I owe my happiness to him, the waiting on His Worship, since I brought him the happy news, welcome to all young heirs.”

The “happy news” was that Pennyboy Junior’s father had died and left him all the father’s wealth.

Pennyboy Junior said, “You did it, indeed, for which I thank you yet.”

He then said to his uncle, “Your fortunate princess, uncle, is long in coming.”

Pecunia was fortunate in that it was a fortune.

Pennyboy Senior replied, “She is not rigged, sir. Setting forth some lady will cost as much as furnishing a fleet.”

An expensive fleet sailed against Spain in the Cádiz expedition of 1625. Women’s clothing and accessories can be expensive.

“Not rigged” meant that she had not completed getting ready for Pennyboy Junior’s visit.

The door to the study opened. Lady Pecunia sat in state, attended by Statute, Band, Wax, Mortgage, and Broker.

Pennyboy Senior said, "Here she's come at last, and like a galley gilt in the prow."

"Is this Pecunia?" Pennyboy Junior asked.

Pennyboy Senior said to Lady Pecunia, "Please give my promising kinsman, gracious madam, the favor of your hand."

"Nay, of my lips, sir, to him," Pecunia replied.

She kissed him.

Pennyboy Junior said to himself, "She kisses like a mortal creature."

He then said out loud to Pecunia, "Almighty madam, I have longed to see you."

Pecunia replied, "And I have my desire, sir, to behold that youth and shape which in my dreams and waking hours I have so often contemplated, and felt warm in my veins and native as my blood."

"When I was told of your arrival here, I felt my heart beat as if it would leap out in speech, and all my face was on fire. But how it came to pass I do not know."

Pennyboy Junior said, "Oh, beauty loves to be prouder than nature, and nature made you blush! I cannot satisfy my curious eyes, by which alone I'm happy in my beholding you."

He kissed her.

The Canter said to the others, "They pass the compliment prettily well."

The compliment was kissing. They were passing kisses back and forth.

“Aye, he does kiss her,” Picklock said. “I like him.”

Pennyboy Junior said, “My passion was clear contrary — internally vexed — and doubtful. I shook for fear, and yet I danced for joy. I had such motions as the sunbeams make against a wall or playing on water, or trembling vapor of a boiling pot —”

Pennyboy Senior said to the others, “That’s not so good. It should have been a crucible with molten metal; she would have understood it.”

In alchemy, the final step of producing a philosopher’s stone is Projection: the testing of the power of the philosopher’s stone. A base metal is melted, some of the powder of the philosopher’s stone is cast into the melted metal, and the base metal is turned into gold or silver.

Pennyboy Junior said to Pecunia, “I cannot talk, but I can love you, madam. Are these your gentlewomen? I love them, too.”

Her gentlewomen were her serving-women.

He began to name and kiss them.

“And which is Mistress Statute? Mistress Band? They all kiss intimately; the last stuck to my lips.”

Broker identified the last serving-woman whom Pennyboy Junior had kissed: “It was my lady’s chambermaid, soft Wax.”

No wonder their lips had stuck together: Wax was used as a sealant.

“Soft lips she has, I am sure of it,” Pennyboy Junior said.

He had not yet kissed Lady Pecunia’s aged nurse.

He said, “Mother Mortgage.”

He hesitated and then said, "I'll owe her a kiss, until she is younger."

He then kissed the three younger serving-women again, saying, "Statute, sweet Mistress Band, and honey, little Wax, we must be better acquainted."

Statute said, "We are only servants, sir."

Band said, "But he whom Her Grace is so content to grace we shall obey —"

Wax interrupted, "— and with all fit respect —"

Mortgage interrupted, "— in our poor places —"

Wax interrupted, "— being Her Grace's shadows."

Pennyboy Junior said, "A fine, well-spoken family."

He then asked Broker, "What's your name?"

"Broker."

Pennyboy Junior whispered to him, "I think my uncle should not need you: He is a crafty knave enough, believe it."

A proverb stated, "A crafty knave needs no broker."

He then asked, "Are you Her Grace's steward?"

"No, I am her gentleman-usher, sir," Broker replied.

Pennyboy Junior pretended that he had said he was a gentleman-'usher — gentleman-brusher — someone who brushed or swept the floors.

"What, of the hall?" Pennyboy Junior asked. "You have a sweeping face; your beard is like a broom."

"Sweeping face" can mean "majestic face."

“I have no barren chin, sir,” Broker said. “I am no eunuch, although I am a gentleman-usher.”

Gentleman-ushers were sometimes thought to be effeminate.

“You shall go with us,” Pennyboy Junior said.

He then said to Pennyboy Senior, “Uncle, I must have my princess forth today.”

“Whither you please, sir, you shall command her,” Pennyboy Senior said.

“I will do all grace to my new servant,” Lady Pecunia said.

This kind of servant was a man who was devoted to a woman.

Pennyboy Senior said to her, “Thanks to your generosity in treating him so well. He is my nephew and my chief, the point, tip, top, and tuft — chief — of all our family!”

He then said to Pennyboy Junior, “But, sir, on the condition always that you shall return Statute and Band home, with my sweet, soft Wax, and my good nurse here, Mortgage.”

“Oh! Who else?” Pennyboy Junior said.

Pennyboy Senior answered, “Ushered by Broker.”

“Do not fear,” Pennyboy Junior said.

Lady Pecunia would be well chaperoned.

Pennyboy Senior said, “She shall go with you, whither you please, sir, anywhere.”

The Canter said quietly to Picklock, “I see a money-bawd is commonly a flesh-bawd, too.”

Picklock quietly answered, “Do you think so?”

Wealthy people do engage in match-making, often in an attempt to gain more wealth.

Picklock said to himself, “Now, I swear on my faith, this canter would make a good grave burgess — magistrate — in some barn.”

Beggars gathered in barns like drinkers gather in taverns. The burgess of the barn would be the king of the beggars.

The Canter had shown some good sense in his speech.

Pennyboy Junior said to Pennyboy Senior, “Come, you shall go with us, uncle.”

“By no means, sir,” Pennyboy Senior said.

“We’ll have both sack and fiddlers,” Pennyboy Junior said.

Sack is a fortified white wine.

“I’ll not draw that charge upon Your Worship,” Pennyboy Senior said.

The Canter said quietly to Picklock, “He speaks modestly, and like an uncle.”

Pennyboy Senior said, “But Mas’ Broker here, he shall attend you, nephew, Her Grace’s usher, and what you fancy to bestow on him — be not too lavish, use a temperate bounty — I’ll take it as being done to myself.”

“I will be princely while I possess my princess, my Pecunia,” Pennyboy Junior said.

“Where is it you will eat?” Pennyboy Senior asked.

“Nearby, at Picklock’s lodging,” Pennyboy Junior said. “Old Lickfinger’s the cook, here in Ram Alley.”

Many lawyers had offices near Ram Alley.

“Lickfinger has good fare,” Pennyboy Senior said. “Perhaps I’ll come and see you.”

The Canter took Pennyboy Junior to the side, and, along with Picklock, began to persuade him to move the feast.

“Oh, bah!” the Canter said. “An alley, and a cook’s shop, gross! It will savor, sir, most rankly of them both. Let your food rather follow you to a tavern.”

Lickfinger could deliver the food from the cook-shop to the tavern where Pennyboy Junior would dine.

“A tavern’s as unfit, too, for a princess,” Picklock said.

“No, I have known a princess, and a great one, to come forth of a tavern,” the Canter said.

“Not go in, sir, though,” Picklock said.

Picklock was interpreting “come forth” as meaning “born in.”

“She must go in, if she came forth,” the Canter said. “The blessed Pocahontas, as the historian Captain John Smith calls her because she often saved his life, and great king’s daughter of Virginia, has been in the womb of a tavern.”

“Been in the womb of a tavern” meant that she had resided in a tavern.

Captain John Smith wrote The Generall Historie of Virginia (1624). Pocahontas visited England in 1616 and stayed at two inns: The Bell Savage Inn and an inn across the Thames at Brentford. She attended one of Ben Jonson’s masques, and he met her.

The Canter continued, “And, besides, your nasty uncle will spoil all your mirth, and be as disagreeable as the alley and the cook’s shop.”

“That’s true,” Picklock said.

“No, truly,” the Canter said, “dine in the Apollo Room in the Devil Tavern at Bell Temple, Fleet Street with Pecunia. That’s brave Duke Wadloe’s place. Have your friends around you and make a day of it.”

Simon Wadloe was the innkeeper at the Devil’s Inn.

“I am content, truly, to do that,” Pennyboy Junior said. “Our food shall be brought thither. Simon the king will bid us welcome.”

A song of the time was “Old Simon the King.” King Simon was a tippler. The present Simon the King was Simon Wadloe.

“Patron, I have a suit,” Picklock said. “I have a favor to ask of you.”

“What’s that?” Pennyboy Junior asked.

“That you will carry the Infanta — Pecunia — to see the Office of the Staple of News. Her Grace will be a grace to all the members of it.”

“I will do it,” Pennyboy Junior said, “and I will have her arms set up there with her titles — Aurelia Clara Pecunia, the Infanta — and in the Apollo Room.”

Great people often displayed their arms and titles at places they visited.

“Come, sweet princess, let us go,” Pennyboy Junior said to Lady Pecunia.

“Broker, be careful of your charge,” Pennyboy Senior said.

Broker was the main chaperone.

“I promise you that I will be careful,” Broker replied.

They exited.

THE SECOND INTERMEAN: AFTER THE SECOND ACT (The Staple of News)

“Why, this is duller and duller!” Gossip Censure complained. “Intolerable! Scurvy! There is neither a devil nor a fool in this play! I pray to God that some of us are not a witch, Gossip Mirth, to foretell the matter thus.”

The gossips had accurately predicted that no fool or devil would be in the play, and Gossip Censure was saying that she hoped that none of the gossips were witches.

Gossip Mirth replied, “I fear that we are all such, if we were old enough; but we are not all old enough to make one witch.”

A stereotype of witches is that they are old and withered. In Ben Jonson’s day, boys played all female roles on stage. The combined ages of the four boys playing the gossips would not be enough to make up the age of one witch.

Gossip Mirth then asked, “How do you like the Vice in the play?”

“Which character is the Vice?” Gossip Expectation asked.

Gossip Mirth answered, “There are three or four: old Covetousness, the sordid Pennyboy Senior; he is the money-bawd who is a flesh-bawd, too, they say.”

“But here is never a fiend to carry him away,” Gossip Tattle said. “Besides, he hasn’t a wooden dagger! I’d not give a rush for a Vice that has not a wooden dagger to snap at everybody he meets.”

In old medieval morality plays, the Vice character carried a wooden dagger, which he brandished. The Vice character represented evil. Sometimes, the Vice character had a name such as Inequity, which is unfairness, aka lack of justice.

A rush is a plant of little worth. A common cliché of the time stated, “Not worth a rush.”

Gossip Mirth said, “That was the old way, Gossip Tattle, when Iniquity came in like Hocus-Pocus the conjuror, wearing a juggler’s jerkin, with false skirts like the Knave of Clubs.”

The Knave of Clubs is the Jack of Clubs. One meaning of “knave” is “a knight’s personal attendant.” On playing cards, Jacks wear aristocratic clothing. Apparently, such clothing included long coats with slits on the sides.

Gossip Mirth continued, “But now they are attired like men and women of our own time, the Vices, male and female!”

That was certainly true of Ben Jonson’s earlier play The Devil Is an Ass.

Gossip Mirth continued, “Prodigality is like a young heir, and his mistress Money (whose favors he scatters like counters) is pranked up like a prime lady, the Infanta of the Mines.”

Prodigality, of course, is Pennyboy Junior, and Money, of course, is Lady Pecunia.

Counters are fake coins; think of chips in a casino. “Aye,” Gossip Censure said, “therein they abuse an honorable princess, it is thought.”

“By whom is it so thought?” Gossip Mirth said. “Or where lies the abuse?”

Gossip Censure said, “It is plain in the giving her the title ‘Infanta’ and giving her three names. “

The Infanta Isabella Clara Eugenia was the daughter of King Phillip II of Spain. Some people who saw or read the play could think that the Infanta of the Mines, Lady Pecunia, represented her.

People often thought that Ben Jonson's satire was directed against specific people. If that were true, Jonson could get into serious trouble, and so he objected or pretended to object to such interpretations.

"Take heed it lies not in the vice of your interpretation," Gossip Mirth said. "What have Aurelia, Clara, Pecunia to do with any person? Do they any more but express the property of money, which is the daughter of earth and drawn out of the mines? Is there nothing to be called 'Infanta' but what is open to criticism?"

"Why not have the 'Infanta of the Beggars,' or 'Infanta of the Gypsies,' as well as the 'King of Beggars' and the 'King of Gypsies'?"

Gossip Censure said, "Well, if there were no wiser people than I, I would sew him in a sack and send him by sea to his princess."

The wiser people would stop her from doing that. If not for the wiser people, she would do that.

Gossip Mirth said, "Indeed, if he — Ben Jonson — heard you, Censure, he would go near to stick the ass' ears to your high dressing, and perhaps to all our high dressings for hearkening — listening — to you."

A high dressing is an elaborate hairstyle in which the hair is combed very high.

Fools were given ass' ears in plays; think of Bottom in Shakespeare's A Midsummer Night's Dream.

Never insult a satirist. If you do, people may read insulting things about you hundreds of years later.

Gossip Tattle said, “By our Lady, the Virgin Mary, but he would not do that to mine. I would hearken and hearken and censure, if I saw cause, for the other princess’ sake, Pocahontas, surnamed the Blessed, whom he has abused indeed (and I do censure him, and will censure him) by saying she came forth of a tavern — that was said like a paltry poet.”

“That’s only one gossip’s opinion, and my Gossip Tattle’s, too!” Gossip Mirth said. “But what says Gossip Expectation here? She sits sullen and silent.”

“Truly, I await the sight of their office, their great office, the Staple of News Office, to see what it will be! They have talked about it, but we haven’t seen it open yet. I wish Butter the newsman would come in and spread — reveal — itself a little to us!”

“Or the butter-box, Buzz, the emissary,” Gossip Mirth said.

Hans Buzz, a Dutchman, was Emissary at the Exchange.

The Dutch had a reputation for loving butter and were called butter-boxes. Dutch people would carry boxes of butter when traveling so that they could add butter to the meals they purchased.

“When it is churned and dished up, we shall hear of it,” Gossip Tattle said.

Gossip Expectation said, “If it is fresh and sweet butter; but what if it is sour and wheyish?”

Gossip Mirth said, “Then it is worth nothing, mere pot-butter, fit to be spent in suppositories or greasing coach wheels, stale stinking butter, and such I fear it is, by its being barreled up so long.”

Pot-butter is salted butter stored in pots.

Because it was taking so long to see the Staple of News Office, Gossip Mirth expected that there would not be much to see.

“Or rank Irish butter,” Gossip Expectation said.

“Have patience, gossips,” Gossip Censure said. “Say that contrary to our expectations it proves to be right well-seasoned and -preserved salt butter?”

Gossip Mirth said, “Or to the time of year, in Lent, delicate almond butter!”

During Lent, people ate almond butter instead of dairy butter. Almond butter was sweetened with sugar.

Gossip Mirth continued, “I have a sweet tooth yet, and I will hope for the best, and sit down as quiet and calm as butter, look as smooth and soft as butter, be merry and melt like butter, laugh and be fat like butter — so long as Butter answer my expectation and be not mad butter.”

A proverb stated, “Butter is mad twice a year.” It is too soft in summer and too hard in winter.

Gossip Mirth finished, “If it is mad butter, it shall both July and December see. I say no more — except Dixi.”

Dixi means literally “I have spoken” and figuratively “I rest my case.”

TO THE READERS

In this following act, the Office of the Staple of News is opened and shown to the Prodigal and his princess, Pecunia, wherein the allegory and purpose of the author has hitherto been wholly mistaken, and so sinister an interpretation been made as if the souls of most of the spectators had lived in the eyes and ears of these ridiculous gossips who tattle between the acts.

But the author — Ben Jonson — asks you thus to mend it: to consider the news here vented to be none of his news or any reasonable man's, but news made like the time's news — a weekly cheat to draw money — and could not be fitter reprehended than in raising this ridiculous Staple of News Office, wherein the age may see her own folly or hunger and thirst after published pamphlets of news, set out every Saturday, but made all at home, and no syllable of truth in them, than which there cannot be a greater disease in nature or a fouler scorn put upon the times.

“And so apprehending it, you shall do the author and your own judgment a courtesy, and perceive the trick of alluring money to the Staple of News Office and there cheating the people. If you have the truth, rest quiet, and consider that

“Ficta, voluptatis causa, sint proxima veris.”

***

Ben Jonson translated this Latin passage from Horace's Art of Poetry (338) in this way:

“Poet never credit gained

“By writing truths, but things (like truths) well fained [feigned, faked].”

Please note:

The news-books of the time were generally published on Saturday, and they went from new news to old news in six days.

Attempting to verify news can be difficult, and news writers and publishers must decide to which degree the news they write and publish must be verified. A bad news writer and a bad publisher will write and publish unverified “news.”

The “news” recounted in the Staple of News Office in Jonson’s play is a parody of news.

— 3.1 —

Fitton and Cymbal talked together in the Staple of News Office. Lady Pecunia was a rich woman, and Cymbal wanted her for her money. His rival for Pecunia was Pennyboy Junior.

Fitton said to Cymbal, “You hunt upon a wrong scent still, and think the air of things will carry them, but it must be reason and proportion, not fine sounds, that must get you this lady, I say to you, my cousin — my partner — Cymbal.

“You have here entertained a pettifogger, name of Picklock, with the trust of an emissary’s place, and he is all for the young prodigal, Pennyboy Junior. You see that he has left us and gone over to the young prodigal’s side.”

A pettifogger conducts petty cases and shady business.

Fitton did not trust Picklock.

“Come, you do not know him, you who speak like this about him,” Cymbal said. “He will have a trick to open us a gap by a trap-door — a sneaky trick — when they least dream of it.”

Seeing Picklock coming, Cymbal said, “Here he comes.”

Picklock walked over to them.

Cymbal asked him, “What news do you bring?”

Picklock said loudly, “Where is my brother Buzz? My brother Ambler? Where are the register, examiner, and the clerks? Appear and let us muster all in pomp.

The register, Nathaniel the clerk, and the new clerk, Thomas Barber, entered the room.

Picklock said, "Let us be in pomp to put on a show for the rich Infanta, who is coming here straightaway, to make her visit. Pennyboy Junior the heir, my patron, has gotten permission for her to play and amuse herself, with all her train of servants, from the old churl her guardian: Pennyboy Senior.

"Now is your time to make all court to her, so that she may first just know, and then love, the place, and show it by her frequent visits here, and afterwards you must get her to sojourn with you. She will be weary of the prodigal quickly."

"Excellent news!" Cymbal said.

"And the counsel of an oracle!" Fitton said.

"What do you say, cousin Fitton?" Cymbal asked.

Fitton said, "Brother Picklock, I shall adore you for this parcel of tidings. It will cry up and proclaim the credit of our Staple of News Office eternally, and make it immortal!"

Picklock said, "See that your words to her, then, are fair and fit, and entertain her and her entourage, too, with all the migniardise — daintiness — and quaint caresses you can put on them."

"You seem by your language no less a courtier than a man of law," Fitton said. "I must embrace you."

Fitton had been suspicious of Picklock, but now he was impressed by the man.

Picklock replied, "Tut, I am Vertumnus on every change or chance; upon occasion, I am a true chameleon; I can change color for it."

He could change his appearance and manner of speaking and acting as needed for whatever goal he wished to achieve.

Picklock continued, “I move upon my axle like a turnstile, fit my face to the parties, and become, straightaway, one of them.”

Vertumnus was the Roman god of change; he could change himself to woo the goddess Pomona. The guises he used to court her included fisherman, gardener, reaper, soldier, and old woman.

The two men embraced.

Cymbal said to the register, Nathaniel the clerk, and Tom Barber, “Sirs, up, go to your desks, and spread the rolls upon the table, so.”

The register, Nathaniel the clerk, and Tom Barber took their places.

“Is the examiner set?” Cymbal asked.

The register answered, “Yes, sir.”

“The Emissaries Ambler and Buzz are both out of the office now,” Cymbal said.

“We’ll sustain their parts,” Picklock said.

They would make the Staple of News Office appear to be a thriving business by seeming to have lots of people busy at work, either inside or outside the Staple of News Office.

Picklock continued, “It does not matter; let them ply the affairs outside. Leave it to us within; I like that well.

“On with the cloak, and you with the Staple of News Office gown.”

Fitton put on the Staple of News Office cloak, and Cymbal put on the gown.

Picklock continued, “Preserve your dignity; stoop only to the Infanta. We’ll have a flight at Mortgage, Statute, and Band, and it shall be difficult but with some luck, we’ll bring Wax to the retrieve.”

Trained hawks would fly at their prey, kill it, and then retrieve it — bring it to their masters.

Cymbal, Fitton, and Picklock wanted to get Lady Pecunia’s servants on their side.

Picklock continued, “Each man must know his individual province, and discharge it.”

Fitton now completely supported Picklock.

“I do admire this nimble stratagem, Picklock,” Fitton said.

Cymbal whispered to Fitton, “Cuz — partner. What did I say?”

Fitton whispered back, “You have rectified my error!”

Fitton now trusted Picklock to do his part in their plot.

They were all going to play roles in the Staple of News Office and make it look like a high-status and very successful place of business. By doing so, they hoped to help Cymbal win Lady Pecunia.

— 3.2 —

Some new visitors entered the Staple of News Office: Pennyboy Junior, the Canter, Pecunia, Statute, Band, Mortgage, Wax, and Broker.

“By your leave, gentlemen, what is the news?” Pennyboy Junior said. “Good, good still, in your new Staple of News Office?”

He then said to Lady Pecunia, “Princess, here’s the Staple of News Office. This is the Governor; kiss him, noble princess, for my sake.”

Lady Pecunia kissed Cymbal.

Pennyboy Junior then asked Thomas Barber, the new clerk of the Staple of News Office, “Tom, how is it, honest Tom? How does your place, and you?”

He said to Lady Pecunia, “He is my creature, princess; this is my creature. I am his patron. I purchased his job for him. Give him your hand to kiss.”

Thomas Barber kissed Lady Pecunia’s hand.

Pennyboy Junior said, “He was my barber, but now he signs himself Clericus — Clerk! I bought this place — this job — for him and gave it to him.”

The Canter said, “He should have spoken of that, sir, and not you. Two do not do one office well.”

Thomas Barber should have acknowledged Pennyboy Junior’s patronage. Pennyboy Junior should not have mentioned it.

“It is true, but I am loath to lose my courtesies,” Pennyboy Junior said.

He did not want to miss out on the credit for doing a good deed.

The Canter said, “So are all they who do them to vain ends, and yet you do lose when you pay yourselves.”

Proverbs 27:2 states, “Let another man praise thee, and not thine own mouth; a stranger, and not thine own lips” (King James Version).

“No more of your moral maxims, Canter; they are stale,” Pennyboy Junior said. “We come for news; remember where you are.”

He then said, “I ask you to let my princess hear some news, good Master Cymbal.”

“What news would she like to hear, or of what kind, sir?” Cymbal asked.

“Any, any kind, so long as it is news, the newest that you have,” Pennyboy Junior said. “Some news of state, for a princess.”

Cymbal said to Thomas Barber, “Read the news from Rome, there.”

Thomas Barber read out loud:

“They write that the King of Spain has been chosen Pope.”

Actually, Philip IV (Spanish: Felipe IV) King of Spain (1621–1665), never became Pope. Pope Urban VIII was Pope from 1623-1644.

“What!” Pennyboy Junior said.

Thomas the Barber continued, “And Holy Roman Emperor, too, the thirtieth of February.”

“Is the previous Holy Roman Emperor dead?” Pennyboy Junior asked.

“No,” Cymbal said, “but he has resigned, and trails a pike now under Tilly —”

Actually, Holy Roman Emperor Ferdinand II served 1619-1637. He never resigned and never served as a common soldier under Johann Tzerclaes, Count of Tilly, who was the general of the army of the Catholic League.

Soldiers held a pike — a pole weapon for thrusting — in their hands at the sides, and the end of the pike trailed behind them.

Fitton interrupted, “— for penance.”

“These will beget strange turns in Christendom!” Pennyboy Junior said.

If the Holy Roman Emperor and the Pope were the same person, that person would have both ecclesiastical and secular authority and power.

Thomas Barber read out loud:

“And Spinola has been made general of the Jesuits.”

“Stranger news!” Pennyboy Junior said.

“Sir, all these news are alike true and certain,” Fitton said.

There were two famous Spinolas. One was Charles Spinola the Jesuit (1564-1622), who was martyred in Japan. The other was Ambrogio di Spinola (1569-1630), a Spanish general. The two were sometimes confused.

They began to talk about the Fifth Monarchy.

Cymbal said, “All the prospects of establishing the Fifth Monarchy were held to be but vain until the ecclesiastic and secular powers were united like this, both in one person who is both the Holy Roman Emperor and the Pope.”

The Fifth Monarchy is Christ’s Kingdom on Earth. An extreme Puritan sect believed that the year 1666 would be the year human beings would cease to rule the earth and Christ would begin to rule for 1,000 years. The Fifth Monarchy has yet to come about.

In history, the Pope and the Holy Roman Emperor were frequently rivals for power. In his Divine Comedy, Dante criticized such power struggles. He believed that the Pope should be the spiritual leader and the Holy Roman Emperor should be the political leader. Each leader should be happy with his own sphere of power.

“It has been long the aim of the house of Austria,” Fitton said.

“Just see Maximilian’s letters to the Baron of Bouttersheim, or Scheiterhuysen,” Cymbal said.

Maximilian I was Elector of Bavaria, and he was the founder of the Catholic League of Imperial Princes.

“Bouttersheim” means, roughly, “Butters-home.”

“Scheiterhuysen” means, roughly, “Shit-house.”

Fitton objected, “No, of Liechtenstein — Lord Paul, I think.”

Karl von Liechtenstein was a governor of Bohemia, and he presided over the country’s conversion to Catholicism.

“Lord Paul” is an inaccuracy made by Fitton.

“I have heard of some such thing,” Pennyboy Junior said.

“Don Spinola made general of the Jesuits!”

Pennyboy Junior said, “And he is a priest!”

Priest and general seem to be incompatible occupations.

Cymbal said, “Oh, no, he is dispensed — released from his religious vows — now, and so are the whole Society of Jesuits, who do now appear to be the only engineers of Christendom —”

Engineers are 1) schemers, or 2) inventors.

Pennyboy Junior said, “They have been thought so for a long time, and rightly, too —”

Fitton said, “Witness the engine that they have presented to Spinola to travel to the moon and thence make all his discoveries!”

According to this news, Jesuit engineers had invented a rocket for Spinola to travel to the Moon.

Cymbal said to Thomas Barber, “Read on.”

Thomas Barber read out loud:

“And Vitellesco, he who was last general, being now turned cook to the Society, has dressed His Excellence — Spinola — such a dish of eggs —”

Mutio (aka Muzio and Mutius) Vitellesco was Superior General of the Society of Jesuits from 1615 to 1645. Spinola had not been made general of the Jesuits. And Vitellesco had not been made a cook.

“Eggs? What, poached?” Pennyboy Junior asked.

“No, powdered,” Thomas Barber answered.

“Powdered” means 1) seasoned, or 2) filled with gunpower.

Cymbal said, “All the yolk is wildfire, as he shall need beleaguer and besiege no more towns. Now he can just throw his egg in.”

Spinola had undertaken a siege of Breda in the Netherlands in 1624-25. Time wore on, and Spinola grew tired of waiting for Breda to capitulate and so he used incendiary devices — the “eggs” — to set fire to Breda. On 2 June 1625, Breda capitulated.

Wildfire is a chemical mixture that, once ignited, is hard to extinguish.

“It shall clear and clearly consume palace and place, demolish and bear down all strengths before it!” Fitton said.

“It will never be extinguished until all becomes one ruin!”
Cymbal said.

Fitton began, “And from Florence —”

Thomas Barber interrupted:

“— they write that there was found in Galileo’s study a burning glass, which they have sent to Spinola, too, to set on fire any fleet that’s out at sea —”

They began to talk about a burning glass by moonshine in the water that could be used as a weapon against enemy ships.

Cymbal interrupted, “By moonshine, isn’t that right?”

“Yes, sir, in the water,” Thomas Barber said.

“Moonshine in the water” was an idiom for saying that something was unreal nonsense.

“His strengths will be irresistible, if this hold!” Pennyboy Junior said. “Have you no news against him on the contrary?”

Nathaniel the Clerk said, “Yes, sir.”

He read out loud:

“They write here that one Corneliuson has made for the Hollanders an invisible eel to swim the haven at Dunkirk and sink all the shipping there.”

A man named Cornelius Drebbel was an inventor of weaponry. He had invented a boat that was mostly underwater but allowed the occupant’s head to be above the water. The eel sounds much like a torpedo, but invisible.

Dunkirk was a haven for pirates.

Pennyboy Junior asked Thomas Barber, “Why haven’t you got this news, Tom?”

Cymbal said, “Because he keeps the pontifical side.”

Thomas Barber covered the news about the Catholics.

Pennyboy Junior wanted Thomas Barber to change sides — let someone else cover the news about the Catholics. Pennyboy Junior did not support the Pope, and he felt that the Catholics were against British interests.

“What!” Pennyboy Junior said, “Change sides, Tom. It was never in my thought to put you up against ourselves. Come down from your seat, quickly.”

“Why, sir?” Cymbal asked.

“I did not venture my money upon those terms,” Pennyboy Junior said. “If he may change, why so. I’ll have him keep his own side, sure.”

“Why, let him,” Fitton said. “It is just writing so much over again.”

“For that I’ll bear the charge,” Pennyboy Junior said. “There’s two pieces.”

He offered two gold coins to Cymbal.

Fitton said to Cymbal, “Come, do not saddle the gentleman with a position he dislikes.”

“I’ll take no money, sir,” Cymbal said, “And yet he shall have the place.”

He was permitting the change of place. And he was saying that he would not take the money. Why? So that he could impress Lady Pecunia with the success of the Staple of News Office.

Unnecessarily, Pennyboy Junior offered more money: “The number of coins shall be ten, then.”

Pennyboy Junior said to Thomas Barber, “Up, Tom; and the News Office shall take the money. Keep your side, Tom. Know your own side; do not forsake your side, Tom.”

Tom Barber and Nathaniel the clerk changed desks.

Cymbal said to Thomas Barber, “Read.”

Thomas Barber read out loud:

“They write here that one Corneliuson has made the Hollanders an invisible eel to swim the haven at Dunkirk and sink all the shipping there.”

“But how is it done?” Pennyboy Junior asked.

“I’ll tell you, sir,” Cymbal said. “It is an automa, runs underwater, with a snug, trim nose, and has a nimble tail — a nimble stern or propeller — that is made like an auger, with which tail she wriggles between the ribs of a ship and sinks it straightaway.”

Actually, “automaton” is the singular of “automata.”

“Whence have you this news?” Pennyboy Junior asked.

“From a right hand, I assure you,” Fitton answered. “The eel boats here that lie before Queenhithe came out of Holland.”

Queenhithe Dock was near the Southwark Bridge in London.

“A most splendid device to murder their flat bottoms — their boats!” Pennyboy Junior said.

“I grant you that,” Fitton said. “But what if Spinola should have a new project to bring an army over in cork shoes, and land them, here, at Harwich? All his horses are shod with cork, and fourscore pieces of ordnance, mounted upon cork-carriages, with inflatable bladders instead of wheels to run the passage over at a spring tide.”

“Is it true?” Pennyboy Junior asked.

“As true as the rest of the news,” Fitton replied.

“He’ll never leave his ingenious plots,” Pennyboy Junior said.

He then said, “I would like to hear now some curious — occult — news.”

“As what?” Cymbal asked.

“Magic, or alchemy, or flying in the air, I don’t care what,” Pennyboy Junior said.

Nathaniel the clerk read out loud:

“They write from Leipzig — pardon the use of coarse language — that the art of drawing farts out of dead bodies is by the Brotherhood of the Rosy Cross produced to perfection, in so sweet and rich a tincture —”

The Brotherhood of the Rosy Cross refers to the German followers of Christian Rosencreutz: the Rosicrucians.

Fitton interrupted, “— as there is no princess but may perfume her chamber with the extraction.”

Even princesses fart, but Fitton meant that princesses could use the farts from corpses to perfume their bedchambers.

Pennyboy Junior said to Lady Pecunia, “There’s something for you, princess.”

“What, a fart for her?” the Canter asked.

“I mean the spirit,” Pennyboy Junior said.

Aristotle divided the soul (or spirit) into three parts: Nutritive, Sensitive, and Rational. The nutritive soul is responsible for nourishment and digestion and excretion.

The Canter said, “Beware how she resents it.”

If Lady Pecunia actually used the extracted farts, she would re-scent them.

Pennyboy Junior then asked, “And what news do you have, Tom?”

They began to talk about the perpetual motion.

Thomas Barber read out loud:

“The perpetual motion is here found out by an alewife in Saint Katherine’s at the sign of the Dancing Bears —”

“What, from her tap?” Pennyboy Junior said. “I’ll go see that, or else I’ll send old Canter. He can make that investigation.”

The perpetual motion was ale flowing from the alewife’s taps and down her customers’ throats. This alewife kept bears that she brought out to dance for her customers.

The Canter said, “Yes, in ale.”

Cornelius (Cornelis) Drebbel presented King James I with what was supposed to be a perpetual clockwork machine.

Noise came from outside. People were coming into the Staple of News Office to buy news.

“Let me have all this news prepared and sealed,” Pennyboy Junior said.

The register said, “The people press upon us; if it pleases you, sir, withdraw with your fair princess. There’s a room within, sir, to retire to.”

The Staple of News Office included some rooms to serve as residences.

“No, good register,” Pennyboy Junior said. “We’ll remain out here and observe your office and what news it issues.”

The register’s office or position was called the House of Fame.

Fama is Rumor. Virgil wrote about Fama in his Aeneid (Book 4, lines 181ff): “Evil moves quickly, and of all evils, rumor moves the quickest. Rumor is the daughter of Mother Earth, who bore her after Jupiter had killed two of her sons: the Titan Coeus and the Giant Enceladus. Mother Earth gave birth to Rumor as a way to get revenge for the death of these sons. Rumor has wings and many feathers. Her many eyes never sleep, and she has many tongues and many ears. By night she flies, and by day she watches and listens. She values lies as much as she values truths.”

“My office is the House of Fame, sir,” the register said, “where both the curious and the negligent, the scrupulous and careless, the wild and grave, the idle and laborious, all meet to taste the cornucopiae — cornucopias — of her rumors, which Lady Fame, the mother of sport and play, pleases to scatter among the vulgar. Baits, sir, for the people! And they will bite like fishes.”

“Let’s see your office in action,” Pennyboy Junior said.

Some news customers entered the room. The first news customer was Dopper, a woman Anabaptist.

A dipper is a believer in immersion in water during baptism, rather than being sprinkled. The Dutch word dooper means “dipper.”

Dopper asked, “Have you, in your profane shop, any news about the saints at Amsterdam?”

Many Anabaptists were in Amsterdam, a city of religious toleration.

“Yes,” the register said. “How much would you like?”

“Six pennyworth,” Dopper answered.

“Lay your money down,” the register said.

Dopper paid the money.

The register then said, “Read, Thomas.”

Thomas Barber read out loud:

“The saints do write, they expect a prophet shortly, the Prophet Baal, to be sent over to them to calculate a time, and half a time, and the whole time, according to Naometry.”

Over and over, people throughout history have used numerology to determine the dates of events predicted in the Bible, including the return of Christ. So far, Christ has not returned and all predicted dates of His return have been wrong.

Revelation 12:14 states, “And to the woman were given two wings of a great eagle, that she might fly into the wilderness, into her place, where she is nourished for a time, and times, and half a time, from the face of the serpent” (King James Version).

Naometry attempted to predict future events by using the measurements of Solomon’s temple at Jerusalem.

“What’s that?” Pennyboy Junior said.

Thomas Barber answered, “The measuring of the Temple. A cabal — body of esoteric lore — found out but lately, and set out by Archy, or some such head, of whose long coat they have heard, and, because the coat is black, they desire it.”

Archibald Armstrong was court jester to King James I and King Charles I. He mourned, wearing a black coat, when King James I died.

Actually, a German scholar named Simon Studion invented Naometry.

Anabaptists wore black coats.

Dopper said, "Peace be with them!"

"So there had need, for they are still by the ears — at odds — one with another," the register said.

There was need for peace between the secular rulers and the religious people. King James I was Protestant, but in his reign, an Anabaptist named Edward Wightman became the last person to be burned at the stake for heresy in England.

"It is their zeal," Dopper said.

Anabaptists strongly believed in religious zeal. The virtue of Zeal is opposed to the sin of Sloth.

"Most likely," the register replied.

"Have you any other news of that species?" Dopper asked.

"Yes, but it is more expensive," the register said. "It will cost you a shilling."

Dopper offered some money, but she said, "Verily, there is a ninepence; I will spend no more."

The price the register had asked for this news was twelvecence: a twelve-penny shilling.

"Not to hear about the good of the saints?" the register asked.

"I am not sure that man is good," Dopper said.

She may have been referring to the prophet Baal.

The register said to Thomas Barber, “Read, from Constantinople, nine pennyworth of news.”

Thomas Barber read out loud:

“They give out here the grand Signor — the Sultan of Turkey — has certainly turned Christian, and to clear up the controversy between the Pope and him, who is the Antichrist, he means to visit the church at Amsterdam this very summer, and quit all marks of the Beast.”

Chances, the writer wanted “the Antichrist” to mean the Pope, but as written, “the Antichrist” means the grand Signor.

In Revelation, the damned wore the marks of the Beast. Protestants associated the marks of the Beast with Catholics; Catholics did not.

Revelation 16:2 states, “And the first went, and poured out his vial upon the earth; and there fell a noisome and grievous sore upon the men which had the mark of the beast, and upon them which worshipped his image” (King James Version).

Dopper said, “Now, these are joyful tidings! Who brought in this? Which emissary?”

“Buzz, your countryman,” the register said.

Hans Buzz, a Dutchman, was Emissary at the Exchange.

“Now, blessed be the man, and his whole family, with the nation!” Dopper said.

“Yes, for Amboyna, and the justice there!” the register said.

On 9 March 1623, the Dutch executed ten Englishmen who were at a trading post in Amboyna. They had confessed — after torture — that they had intended to capture the Dutch castle of Amboyna. A kind of justice was achieved: A plague was said to have killed 1,000 people there shortly after the execution.

The register whispered to Tom Barber, “This is a Dopper, a she-Anabaptist! Seal and deliver her news to her. Dispatch!”

A second customer spoke up as Dopper stepped aside to receive her parcel of news.

“Have you any news from the Indies?” the second customer asked. “Any miracles done in Japan by the Jesuits, or in China?”

In 1624, John Gee’s book The Foot out of the Snare: with a Detection of Sundry Late Practices and Impostures of the Priests and Jesuits in England. Whereunto is Added a Catalogue of Such Bookes as in this Authors Knowledge have been Vented Within Two Yeeres Last Past in London, by the Priests and their Agents appeared in print. John Gee called the stories of miracles done by priests and Jesuits “old wonder-working tales.” Stories about Jesuits in Japan and China tended to be stories of martyrdom rather than of miracles.

Nathaniel the clerk answered, “No, but we hear of a colony of cooks who will be set ashore on the coast of America for the conversion of the cannibals, and making them good-eating Christians. Here comes the colonel who undertakes it.”

“Good-eating Christians” could be 1) Christians who eat well, 2) Christians who taste good when eaten, or 3) both.

The third customer, accompanied by Lickfinger, approached them.

“Who?” the second customer asked. “Captain Lickfinger?”

We can assume that “Colonel” and “Captain” were honorary titles. As will become apparent later, Lickfinger thought of cooked food as resembling military fortifications.

Lickfinger said, “News, news, my boys! I am to furnish a great feast today, and I would have what news the Staple of News Office affords.”

He considered this feast, prepared for the Golden Heir, to be news.

Nathaniel the clerk said, “We were venting some news about you, about your new project —”

“Venting” means expressing. It can also mean selling, but Nathaniel the clerk had forgotten to collect the money before expressing the news.

The register interrupted, “— before it was paid for. You, Nathaniel, were somewhat too hasty.”

Pennyboy Junior asked, “What, Lickfinger, will you convert the cannibals with spit-and-pan divinity?”

Meat was roasted on a spit.

Lickfinger replied, “Sir, for that I will not urge, but for the fire and zeal to the true cause, I have undertaken this:

“With two lay-brethren to myself, no more — one of the broach, aka spit, the other of the boiler — in one six-month period, and by plain cookery, no magic to it except old Japhet’s physic (fire is the father of the European arts) to make such sauces for the savages and cook their meats with those enticing steams as it would make our cannibal-Christians forbear the mutual eating one another, which they do, and which they do more cunningly than the wild Anthropophagi who snatch only strangers, like my old patron’s dogs there.”

Japhet's physic is fire, which was given to human beings by Prometheus, son of Japhet.

The Anthropophagi were a legendary race of man-eaters.

Lickfinger was comparing the Anthropophagi's literal cannibalism to the Christians' figurative cannibalism.

The Anthropophagi ate only strangers, but the Christians — Catholics and Protestants — figuratively ate one another.

Lickfinger's old patron was Pennyboy Senior.

"Oh, my uncle's!" Pennyboy Junior said. "Is dinner ready, Lickfinger?"

"When you please, sir," Littlefinger said. "I was asking for just a parcel of news to supplement the long meal with, but it seems that you are furnished with news here already."

The news could be read out loud in between courses, or it could be posted so that people could read it before or after eating.

"Oh, not half!" Pennyboy Junior said.

He wanted more news.

"What court news is there?" Lickfinger asked. "Any proclamations or edicts to come forth?"

Thomas Barber said, "Yes, there is one that the King's barber has got for aid of our mystery — that is, trade — of barbering, whereof there is a manifest decay."

Trades are mysteries to those who do not know how to do them.

Thomas Barber continued, "There is a precept — an edict — for the wearing of long hair, to run to seed, to sow bald pates with, and the preserving of fruitful heads and chins, to help a craft, almost antiquated.”

Men with fruitful heads would allow their hair to grow long and produce seeds, which would be used to sow bald heads and make them fruitful. This would help increase barbers’ business.

Some men, however, had heads that would not be fertile fields for the hair seeds.

Thomas Barber continued, “Men who are bald and barren beyond hope are to be separated and set by to be gentlemen-ushers to old countesses —”

Gentleman-ushers had access to high-ranking women. To avoid scandal, those gentleman-ushers could be effeminate, or old.

Lickfinger said, “And coachmen to mount their boxes, reverently, and drive like lapwings with a shell upon their heads through the streets.”

Countesses of the time engaged in the affectation of making their coachmen ride bare-headed. The bald coachmen’s heads were as smooth as the shells of lapwings. Lapwing chicks were thought to be precocious and to start leaving the nest even while they had part of the shell they had hatched from on their heads.

Lickfinger asked, “Have you no news of the stage? They’ll ask me about new plays at dinnertime, and I should be as dumb — silent — as a fish.”

“Oh, yes!” Thomas Barber said. “There is a legacy left to the King’s Players, both for their various shifting of their scenes and the dexterous change of their persons to all shapes and all disguises, by the right reverend Archbishop of Spalato.”

The Archbishop of Spalato had a disagreement with the Pope. He visited King James I to spread his idea of a Universal Church, but the idea never bore fruit. Eventually, he returned to Rome. After the death of Pope Gregory XV, the Inquisition declared Spalato a relapsed heretic, and he was confined to the Castel Sant'Angelo and in September 1624 he died there of natural causes.

Actors are changeable; they play many roles.

The Archbishop of Spalato was also changeable. He disagreed with the Pope, but he later reconciled with him.

Lickfinger said, "He is dead who played him!"

The actor William Rowley, who played the Fat Bishop in Thomas Middleton's play A Game at Chess, died in February 1626. The character of the Fat Bishop was based on the Archbishop of Spalato.

"Then he's lost his share of the legacy," Thomas Barber said.

Lickfinger said, "What news is there about Gondomar?"

Thomas Barber answered, "He has a second fistula, or an excoriation at the least, for putting the poor English play that was written about him to such a sordid use, as is said he did, of cleansing his posteriors."

An excoriation is 1) a sore, or 2) a severe criticism.

The Count of Gondomar (1567-1626) did have an anal fistula. Gondomar was satirized in Thomas Middleton's play A Game at Chess, which was first staged in August 1624, in the character of the Black Knight. Gondomar had a special chair made so he could sit without discomfort. The chair was mentioned in the play, and Gondomar forced the play to close.

Gondomar is neither the first nor the last person to wipe his butt with the pages of a play.

Gondomar was a Spanish ambassador to England, and he became a friend to King James I. He promoted friendly relations between Catholic Spain and Protestant England. He also favored the beheading of Sir Walter Raleigh on 29 October 1618. Gondomar stayed in London from 1613 to 1618 and from 1619 to 1622. Many English hated him because of his effective promotion of Spanish interests.

Referring to Gondomar's second fistula, Lickfinger said, "That's justice! Justice!"

Thomas Barber said, "Since when he lives condemned to his chair at Brussels, and there he sits filing certain politic — crafty — hinges to hang the states on he's heaved off the hooks."

From 1625-1626, Gondomar was in Brussels on a diplomatic mission to the Infanta Isabella Clara Eugenia, sovereign of the Spanish Netherlands.

In the late 1500s, several Dutch provinces revolted against Spanish rule and declared their independence.

According to Thomas Barber, Gondomar sat on his special chair in Brussels and devised political schemes against the States General of the United Provinces, aka the Protestant Netherlands.

The southern Netherlands, including Belgium, were under southern control, and many Protestants therefore fled to the north.

Hinges are movable joints. Apparently, Gondomar was plotting politic — crafty — hinges that would move the Protestant Netherlands into becoming part of the Spanish Netherlands, with the result that the Protestant Netherlands would be hung out to dry. In addition, he traveled with his special chair. To make it portable, it may have had hinges and hooks.

“What must you have for these news?” Lickfinger asked. “What is the price?”

“You shall pay nothing,” Pennyboy Junior, a generous heir, said, “but include their price in with the other items in the bill for the feast.”

He then said to Thomas Barber, “There’s twenty pieces — twenty coins — that her Grace bestows upon the Staple of News Office, Tom. Write that down for news.”

Her Grace was Lady Pecunia, but Pennyboy Junior was paying the money. He wanted her to get the credit and to be mentioned in the news the Staple of News Office published.

“We may well do it,” the Register said. “We have not many such news.”

Pennyboy Junior wanted it definitely in the news published by the Staple of News Office, so he now made the news more newsworthy by doubling the amount of money.

He put down twenty more coins and said, “There’s twenty more pieces, if you say so. My princess is a princess! And put that, too, under the Staple of News Office seal.”

Cymbal took Pecunia aside, and he courted and wooed her to the Staple of News Office. He wanted her to take his roof for “covert,” a word that means 1) haven, 2) shelter, 3) protection, 4) control, and 5) jurisdiction.

As you would expect, Cymbal wanted Lady Pecunia to make a large investment in the Staple of News Office.

Cymbal said to her, “If it will please Your Grace to sojourn here and take my roof for covert, you shall know the rites belonging to your blood and birth, which few can apprehend. These sordid servants, who are your keepers rather than your attendants, should not come near your presence.”

The word “keepers” means guards. Guards can keep someone in custody, or they can protect someone. They are either jail-keepers, or guardians in the sense of guardian-angels.

Cymbal continued, “I would have you waited on by ladies, and your train borne up by persons of quality and honor.”

They would lift up the train of her dress so it didn’t trail on the floor, and they would make up her train of attendants.

He continued, “Your food should be served in with curious dances, and set upon the board with virgin hands tuned to their voices; not a dish removed but to the music, nor a drop of wine mixed with its water without harmony.”

Pennyboy Senior was a miser who accumulated money. Cymbal was a would-be spendthrift who, if he had access to someone else’s money, would spend it on luxuriousness. Pennyboy Junior was a prodigal who spent too freely, but who did good deeds with his money, including paying tradesmen well and buying Thomas Barber an office, aka job position.

Lady Pecunia said to Cymbal, ‘You are a courtier, sir, or somewhat more, who have this tempting language.’

Not all courtiers are good people. The bad ones can persuade other people to do evil.

“I’m your servant, excellent princess,” Cymbal said, “and I would have you appear as that which you are. Come forth, state and wonder of these our times.”

A person of state is a person of social standing. The word “state” also means splendor.

He continued, “Dazzle the vulgar eyes and strike the people blind with admiration!”

The word “vulgar” means 1) common, or 2) tasteless.

The Canter, who had been listening, said, “Why, that’s the end of wealth!”

He was punning. Certainly Cymbal believed that the end — the purpose — of wealth was ostentatious display. The Canter, however, was aware that such ostentatious spending was a way to end — get rid of — all of one’s wealth.

The Canter continued, “Thrust riches outward, and remain beggars within; contemplate nothing but the vile sordid things of time, place, money, and let the noble and the precious go. Virtue and honesty — hang them, poor thin membranes of honor, who respects them? Oh, the Fates!”

He was criticizing a life in which riches were thrust outside — money was used for conspicuous spending — and in which other riches — such as virtue and honesty — were ignored.

The Canter continued, “How has all just, true reputation fallen since money, this base money, began to have any reputation!”

While Cymbal was working on Lady Pecunia to persuade her to stay at the Staple of News Office, Fitton was working on Lady Pecunia’s waiting-women to convince them to persuade her to stay at the News Office, which he described as a paradise. They were having none of it, and they were jeering him.

“It’s a pity the gentleman is not immortal!” Band said

Band was unpersuaded by Fitton’s arguments and so she said that it was a pity that Fitton was not immortal because if he were an immortal god he would have the power to make the Staple of News Office as good as he said it was.

Wax said, “As he gives out, the place is, by description — ”

Fitton interrupted, “— a veritable paradise, as you would know if you could see it all, lady.”

“I am the chambermaid, sir,” Wax said. “You mistake. My lady may see all.”

Fitton should be showing all of the Staple of News Office to Lady Pecunia, not Wax the chambermaid.

Fitton said, “Sweet Mistress Statute, gentle Mistress Band, and Mother Mortgage, do but get Her Grace to sojourn here.”

Picklock said, “I thank you, gentle Wax.”

He was referring to her comment that Lady Pecunia may see all of the Staple of News Office.

Mortgage said, “If it were a chattel — a movable possession — I would try my credit.”

She would try her credit with her mistress: Lady Pecunia. That is, she would recommend that Lady Pecunia invest in the Staple of News Office.

“So it is, for term of life,” Picklock said. “We account it so.”

Statute said, “Mortgage means inheritance to Fitton and his heirs, or that he could assure a state of years. If that were to happen, I’ll be his Statute-Staple, Statute-Merchant, or whatever he pleases me to be.”

“Statute-Staple” and “Statute-Merchant” referred to a contract in which “Statute-Staple” was the mayor of a staple market and “Statute-Merchant” was a merchant of that staple. In the presence of the mayor, the debtor would swear that a debt would be repaid by a certain time. In this contract, if the debtor failed to repay a debt by the appointed time, then the creditor could seize the debtor's land.

A title to a property could be granted for a term of life — until the person dies. Or it could be granted for a term of years — for a certain number of years.

Cymbal and Fitton wanted Lady Pecunia to invest in the property: the Staple of News Office. The investment included the real estate of the Staple of News Office, and Statute knew that Lady Pecunia would like a good investment if she in fact invested in the Staple of News Office.

Cymbal had a term of life contract in the Staple of News Office.

A term of life investment could turn out to be a bad investment if the person with a term of life contract died quickly.

But if Cymbal were to die and the Staple of News Office passed on to Fitton, the contract could stipulate that Lady Pecunia's contract with Cymbal would still apply to Fitton.

“He — Fitton — can expect no more,” Picklock said.

Band said, “Fitton's cousin, Alderman Security, whom he did talk of so, just now —”

Statute interrupted, “— who is the very brooch of the bench, gem of the city —”

Band interrupted, “— let he — Alderman Security — and his deputy just assure his life for one period of seven years.”

If Alderman Security and his deputy were to insure Cymbal's life for seven years, then the serving-gentlewomen would see about interesting Lady Pecunia in the investment.

Of course, the contract would have to be legal, as attested by Alderman Security and his deputy: old Chain.

Statute said, “And see what we’ll do for him, upon his scarlet motion —”

Aldermen wore a scarlet gown.

Band said, “And old Chain, who draws — attracts — the City ears —”

Aldermen sometimes wore a ceremonial chain.

Wax interrupted, “— when he says nothing, but twirls his chain like this.”

She demonstrated him twirling his chain.

Statute said, “A moving oratory!”

The oratory was both persuasive and in the demonstration of the twirling of the chain, moving.

Band said, “Dumb rhetoric and silent eloquence, as the fine poet Samuel Daniel says.”

Fitton said to Picklock, “Come, they all scorn us. Don’t you see it? The family of scorn!”

Broker said to the serving-women, “Do not believe him!”

Broker was on the side of Fitton and Picklock. He was willing to make their case to the serving-women and even lie.

He then said, “Gentle Master Picklock, they did not understand. The gentlewomen, they thought you would have my lady sojourn with you at the Staple of News Office, whereas you desire only now and then a visit.”

Cymbal and Fitton definitely wanted Lady Pecunia to sojourn at the Staple of News Office.

Picklock replied, “Yes, if she pleased, sir. But her continual residence would much advance the Staple of News Office! I speak but as a member.”

As a lady of high social standing, Lady Pecunia’s staying at the Staple of News Office would greatly enhance its reputation. Also, of course, Lady Pecunia’s wealth would follow her.

Broker said, “It is enough.”

He whispered to Picklock, “I apprehend you. And it shall go hard, but I’ll so work as somebody shall work her.”

Broker was in league with Picklock to persuade Lady Pecunia to invest in — and stay at — the Staple of News Office. He understood that Picklock wanted her to stay at the News Office and he — Broker — would work hard to persuade at least one of the serving-women to help persuade Lady Pecunia to do that.

Picklock said to Broker, “Please, exchange with our master just a word about it.”

They stepped aside to talk privately.

Pennyboy Junior said, “Well, Lickfinger, see that our food is ready. You have enough news.”

Lickfinger replied, “I need some news about Bethlem Gabor, and then I’m gone.”

Gabriel Bathlen was a Prince of Transylvania who first wanted to marry the Emperor Frederick’s daughter and when he was rebuffed, he wanted to marry the sister of the Elector of Brandenburg. Bathlen wanted land, and he wanted to marry a woman who would bring him land; in return for marrying such a woman, he would fight on her father’s side, whether Protestant or Catholic. The Elector of Brandenburg was Protestant; Emperor Frederick was Catholic. During the Thirty Years War (1618-1648), Bathlen was changeable in his religious and political alliances.

Thomas Barber read out loud about Gabriel Bathlen:

“We hear he has devised a drum to fill all Christendom with the sound, but that he cannot draw his forces near it to march yet because of the violence of the noise. And therefore he is obliged by a design to carry them in the air and at some distance until he is married; then they shall appear.”

“Or never,” Lickfinger said.

Omens were popularly believed in, including such omens as the appearance of armies in the air.

Lickfinger then said, “Well, may God be with you.”

He started to leave, but seeing some people entering the Staple of News Office, he said, “Wait, who’s here?”

Two more customers of news entered the room.

Lickfinger said to Nathaniel the Clerk, “A little of the Duke of Bavier, and then —”

Bavier is Bavaria.

Nathaniel said, “He’s taken the grey habit of the Franciscans, and he has become the church’s miller. He grinds the Catholic grist with every wind; and Tilly takes the toll.”

Maximilian I was Elector of Bavaria, and he was the founder of the Catholic League of Imperial Princes.

Johann Tzerclaes, Count of Tilly, was the general of the army of the Catholic League.

The fourth customer asked, “Have you any news of the pageants to send down into the several counties? All the country expected from the city very splendid speeches now at the coronation.”

King Charles I was crowned on 2 February 1626, but his reign began on 27 March 1625. London was recovering from the effects of the plague, and the celebrations of the crowning were muted.

Lickfinger said, “It — all the country — expected more than it understood, for they — the pageants — stand mute, poor, innocent, dumb things. They are but wood, as is the bench and blocks they were wrought on, yet when May Day comes, and the sun shines, perhaps they’ll sing like Memnon’s statue and be vocal.”

The pageants were wood, figuratively and literally. They were figuratively wood because they were silent and did nothing. The speakers, because they were silent, were like blockheads — blocks of wood for displaying hats or wigs. They were literally wood because the structures (such as platforms) and furniture (such as benches) were made of wood.

At Karnack in Egypt was a statue of Amenhotep III. When the sun shone on the statue after it was damaged in an earthquake, the statue made a twanging sound like a plucked harp string. Apparently the sun warmed one side, expanding it, and causing friction as it moved against the unwarmed side.

The fifth customer asked, “Have you any forest news?”

Thomas Barber said, “None very wild, sir. Some rumor there is out of the Forest of Fools: A new park is being made there, to separate cuckolds of antler from the rascals. Such men as those whose wives are dead and have since cast their heads — shed their antlers — shall remain cuckolds-pollard.”

Parks are enclosed areas.

Rascals are 1) inferior male deer, or 2) inferior male humans.

Cuckolds are men with unfaithful wives; they are said to have invisible horns growing on their heads.

The word “pollard” means “without horns.”

The purpose of the park was to separate horned cuckolds from unhorned cuckolds.

“I’ll have that news,” Lickfinger said.

“And I,” Dopper said.

“And I,” the second customer said.

“And I,” the third customer said.

“And I,” the fourth customer said.

“And I,” the fifth customer said.

Sex news is always popular.

Pennyboy Junior invited the Master of the Staple of News Office — Cymbal — to dine.

Cymbal replied, “Sir, I desire to be excused; and, madam, I cannot leave my Staple of News Office the first day. But my cousin Fitton here shall wait upon you, and my emissary Picklock.”

“And Tom Clericus?” Pennyboy Junior asked, referring to Thomas Barber.

“I cannot spare him yet,” Cymbal said, “but he shall follow you when they have ordered the rolls.”

The news was written on rolls of paper.

Cymbal ordered the clerks, “When you have finished, shut up the Staple of News Office until two o’clock.”

Everyone except the clerks exited.

— 3.3 —

Three jeerers entered the Staple of News Office: Shunfield, Almanac, and Madrigal. They were looking for a free meal somewhere.

Shunfield said, “If you don’t mind, clerks, let us ask where shall we dine today? Do you know?”

“Where’s my friend Fitton?” Almanac asked.

“He’s just now gone out,” Thomas Barber said.

“Can’t your Staple of News Office tell us what splendid fellows eat together today in town, and where?” Shunfield asked.

Splendid fellows are likely to have money enough to be able to treat others to a meal.

“Yes, there’s a gentleman, the brave heir, young Pennyboy Junior, who dines in the Apollo Room in the Devil Tavern,” Thomas Barber answered.

“Come, let’s go thither, then,” Madrigal said. “I have supped in the Apollo Room.”

“With the Muses?” Almanac asked.

“No, not them, but with two gentlewomen called the Graces,” Madrigal said.

“They were always three in poetry,” Almanac said.

“That was the truth, sir,” Madrigal said.

The Muses were muses of the arts, including lyric poetry and epic poetry.

The Three Graces were goddesses of beauty, charm, and creativity.

Madrigal's two Graces were possibly prostitutes.

"Sir, Master Fitton's there, too," Thomas Barber said.

"All the better," Shunfield said.

"We may have a jeer, perhaps," Almanac said.

"Yes, you'll drink, Doctor Almanac, if there is any good food, as much good wine now as would lay up a Dutch ambassador," Shunfield said.

They would possibly have a jeer and good cheer — good food and drink.

The Dutch loved butter — and wine.

Thomas Barber said, "If he dines there, he's sure to have good food, for Lickfinger the cook provides the dinner."

"Who?" Almanac said. "The glory of the kitchen, who believes that cookery is a trade that goes all the way to Adam, who quotes Adam's broths and salads, and swears that Adam is not dead yet, but translated — conveyed — in some immortal crust, the paste of almonds?"

Lickfinger believed that Adam, the first man, lived on in the art of cookery.

"The same," Madrigal said. "He believes that no man can be a poet who is not a good cook — only good cooks know the palates and several tastes of the time. He derives all arts out of the kitchen but especially the art of poetry, which he concludes the same with cookery."

Lickfinger valued the art of cookery as highly as he did the art of poetry. Both cookery, as in the case of Adam, and poetry, as in the case of Ben Jonson, could make men immortal.

Shunfield said, “Tut, he maintains more heresies than that. He’ll draw the magisterium — the philosopher’s stone — from a minced-meat pie, and he’ll prefer jellies to your juleps, doctor.”

Powdered philosopher’s stone was supposed to turn base metals into silver and gold.

Some cooks are so good that they can make metaphorical gold out of an assortment of common ingredients. When Lickfinger created a minced-meat pie, it was if he had created the philosopher’s stone.

Juleps are sweetened medicinal drinks.

Almanac said, “I was at an olla podrida of his making.”

Olla podrida is a Portuguese dish that consists of a jumble or stew of spiced meats and vegetables.

Almanac continued, “The olla podrida was a brave piece of cookery at a funeral. Although it was a funeral, by opening the pot-lid, he made us laugh who’d wept all day, and sent us such a tickling into our nostrils as if the funeral feast had been a wedding dinner.”

Shunfield said, “Give him allowance, and that but moderate, he will make a Siren sing in the kettle. He will also send in an Arion in a splendid broth of a watery green color, just like the sea color — Arion will be mounted on the back of a grown conger, aka eel, but in such a posture as all the world would take him for a dolphin.”

Sirens were mythological monsters, but they sang beautifully.

A dolphin listened to Arion's music and then saved him when he was in danger of drowning in the sea. The dolphin carried Arion on its back to land.

Lickfinger's Arion was possibly an onion.

"He's an excellent fellow, without question," Madrigal said. "But he holds some paradoxes — unorthodox views."

"Aye, and pseudodoxes — false opinions," Almanac said. "But by the Virgin Mary, to be sure, for mostly he's orthodox in the kitchen."

"And he knows the clergy's taste," Madrigal said.

"Aye, and the laity's," Almanac said.

"You're not thinking about the time," Shunfield said. "We'll arrive too late if we don't go immediately."

"Let's leave, then," Madrigal said.

Shunfield said to the clerks, "Sirs, you must get some of this news for your Staple of News Office — news about who dines and sups in the town, where, and with whom. It will be beneficial, when you have news; and as we like our fare, we shall reward you."

The jeerers would use the news to decide whom to sponge off of that day.

The three jeerers — Madrigal, Almanac, and Shunfield — exited.

"A hungry trade it will be," Nathaniel said.

The jeerers lacked money to give to the clerks.

"Much like Duke Humphrey's," Thomas Barber said. "But, now and then, as the wholesome proverb says, it will obsonare famem ambulando."

“To dine with Duke Humphrey” was an idiom for “to go hungry.” Some gallants would go hungry and spend the meal hour on Duke Humphrey’s Walk at St. Paul’s. If they were lucky, someone would see them and invite them to dine with him.

The Latin obsonare famem ambulando means to get an appetite through walking.

“Shut up the Staple of News Office, gentle brother Thomas,” Nathaniel the clerk said.

Thomas Barber replied, “Brother Nathaniel, I have the wine for you — let me buy you a drink. I hope to see us, one day, promoted to be emissaries.”

“Why not?” Nathaniel the Clerk said. “By God’s eyelid, I despair because I am not a Master!”

He wanted a much higher position than he had.

— 3.4 —

In Pennyboy Senior’s house, Broker walked into a room and met Pennyboy Senior, who was startled to see Broker, who was supposed to be with Lady Pecunia.

“What is this now?” Pennyboy Senior said. “I think I was born under Hercules’ star! Nothing but trouble and tumult to oppress me!”

Hercules’ star was under the influence of the planet Mars, which was named after the Roman god of war.

Pennyboy Senior asked, “Why have you come back? Where is your charge? Where is Lady Pecunia?”

“I have brought a gentleman to speak with you,” Broker said.

This can’t have made a good impression on Pennyboy Senior. Broker was ignoring his responsibilities to do a favor for someone else — someone who almost certainly was going to ask Pennyboy Senior for money.

“To speak with me?” Pennyboy Senior said. “You know it is death for me to speak with any man.”

He was pretending to be ill. If he were ill, he need not engage in social courtesies such as standing when his visitor arrived.

He continued, “Who is he? Set me a chair.”

Broker brought him a chair and said, “He’s the master of the great News Office.”

“What?” Pennyboy Senior asked.

“The Staple of News Office, which is a mighty thing,” Broker said. “They talk six thousand a year.”

They could talk about making six thousand pounds a year — or they could spread six thousand rumors a year.

“Well, bring your six in,” Pennyboy Senior said. “Where have you left Pecunia?”

“Sir, in the Apollo Room,” Broker said. “They have scarcely sat down.”

“Bring in the six,” Pennyboy Senior said.

Broker exited and returned with Cymbal.

“Here is the gentleman,” Broker said.

“He must pardon me,” Pennyboy Senior said. “I cannot rise because I am a diseased man.”

“Rise by no means, sir,” Cymbal said. “Respect your health and ease.”

“My not rising is not because of pride in me, but because of pain, pain!” Pennyboy Senior said. “What’s your errand, sir, to me?”

He then said, “Broker, return to your charge; be Argus-eyed.”

The mythological Argus had eyes all over his body.

Pennyboy Senior continued, “Be awake to the affair you have in hand; serve in Apollo, but take heed of Bacchus.”

In other words, listen to music, but don’t get drunk.

Apollo is the god of music, among other things, and Bacchus is the god of wine.

Broker exited.

Pennyboy Senior said to Cymbal, “Go on, sir.”

“I have come to speak with you,” Cymbal said.

“It is pain for me to speak, a very death,” Pennyboy Senior said, “but I will hear you.”

“Sir, you have a lady who sojourns with you,” Cymbal said.

Pennyboy Senior pretended to have an affliction in his ears: “Ha? I am somewhat short in my sense of hearing, too —”

Cymbal interrupted, “— Pecunia.”

Pennyboy Senior pointed to one ear and continued his sentence, “— on that side, very imperfect; on —”

Cymbal interrupted, “— whom I would draw oftener to a poor News Office I am master of —”

“My hearing is very dead,” Pennyboy Senior said. “You must speak quicker.”

“Quick” is “living.” It is opposed to Pennyboy Senior’s very dead hearing, and “quicker” means for Cymbal to speak louder — livelier.

Cymbal said, “Or, if it would please you, sir, to let her sojourn in part with me, I have a moiety we will divide: half of the profits.”

This was a bribe.

“Ha?” Pennyboy Senior said. “I hear you better now. How come the profits in? Is it a certain business, or a casual business?”

“For I am loath to seek out doubtful courses, or run any hazardous paths. I love straight ways. I am a just and upright man!”

“Now all trade totters. The trade of money has fallen two percent in the hundred, but it was a certain trade while the age was thrifty and men were good managers of their financial affairs, looked after their supplies of goods, and had their minds fixed where they ought to be fixed.

“Now all the public riots as if all of them were prostitutes. The public wastes resources by spending money on coaches and on footmen’s coats and waiting-women’s gowns.

“They must have velvet haunches — with a pox — now taken up, and yet they do not pay the use.”

Haunches are a woman’s tight-fitting undergarment.

“With a pox” can be emphatic, or it can refer to venereal disease.

“Taken up” means 1) borrowed, or 2) removed.

“Use” means “interest.” It can also refer to sex.

This was a topic that Pennyboy Senior felt strongly about. He talked vehemently and loudly.

“Reduce the interest rate?” he shouted. “I am mad — furious — with this time’s manners.”

“You said just now that it was death for you to speak,” Cymbal said.

“Aye,” Pennyboy Senior said, “but an anger, a just anger, such as this is, puts life in man.”

He regarded his anger as righteous wrath.

He continued, “Who can endure to see the fury of men’s gullets and their groins? What fires, what cooks, what kitchens might be spared?”

He became angrier and angrier.

He continued, “What stews, ponds, parks, coops, garners, storehouses? What velvets, tissues, scarves, embroideries, and laces they might lack?”

“Stews” were tanks in which fish were kept until they were cooked and eaten.

Garners are storehouses.

Tissues are fabrics that are made of silk and precious metals.

Pennyboy Senior continued, “They covet things superfluous always, when it would be much more honorable for them to want and buy necessary things! What need has Nature of silver dishes or gold chamber pots, of perfumed handkerchiefs, or a numerous family of household servants to watch her eat?”

“Poor and wise, Nature requires food only. Hunger is not ambitious.

“Say that you were the emperor of pleasures, the great dictator of fashions for all Europe, and you had the pomp of all the courts and kingdoms on display for you to make a selection to make yourself gazed at and admired?”

“The pomp of all the courts and kingdoms” was fashionable clothing for people of high social standing.

Pennyboy Senior continued, “You must go to bed and take your natural rest.

“And then, all this show vanishes. Your finery was only shown; it was not possessed. While it was boasting itself, it was then perishing.”

While we are asleep, we are not gazed at and admired — or at least we are not aware of it.

Usually, people regard dreams as illusions opposed to reality. To Pennyboy Senior, waking reality, when focused on the pomp of all the courts and kingdoms, was the illusion.

Was Pennyboy Senior really saying what he believed when he said, “Your finery was only shown; it was not possessed. While it was boasting itself, it was then perishing”? He certainly was not telling the truth when he said that talking would be the death of him.

Cymbal said to himself, “This man has healthy lungs.”

Pennyboy Senior said, “All that excess appeared as little yours as the spectators’. It scarcely fills up the expectation of a few hours that entertains men’s lives.”

Splendid clothing is hardly the best thing one can accomplish in life.

After all, shouldn’t we be better than our clothing? If people were to judge our clothing to be good and our selves to be bad, shouldn’t that make us concerned?

Cymbal said to himself, "He has the monopoly of sole-speaking."

Pennyboy Senior was doing all the talking and not giving Cymbal the opportunity to speak.

Angry, Cymbal said, "Why, good sir, you do all the talking!"

"Why shouldn't I?" Pennyboy Senior said. "Aren't I under my own roof, my ceiling?"

"But I came here to talk with you," Cymbal said.

"Why, if I will not talk with you, sir, you are answered," Pennyboy Senior said. "Who sent for you?"

Cymbal said, "Nobody sent for me —"

Pennyboy Senior interrupted, "— but you came."

He then said, "Why, then, go as you came; here's no man who keeps you here. There, there lies your way. You see the door."

"This is strange!" Cymbal said.

"It is my civility, my code of conduct, when I do not relish the party or his business," Pennyboy Senior said. "I say to you, be gone, sir. I'll have no venture in your ship, the office, your bark of six, even if it were sixteen, good sir."

Investors could invest in a bark: a ship that would travel overseas. To entice people to invest in the risky voyage, rich profits were promised. In this case, even if the venture promised a profit of 16,000 pounds rather than 6,000 pounds, Pennyboy Senior was not interested.

Angry, Cymbal said, "You are a rogue!"

"I think I am, sir, truly," Pennyboy Senior said.

"A rascal and a money-bawd!" Cymbal said.

“Those are my surnames,” Pennyboy Senior said.

“A wretched rascal!” Cymbal said.

“You will overflow and spill all,” Pennyboy Senior said.

Cymbal called him additional names: “Caterpillar, moth, horse-leech, and dung-worm —”

“— still you lose your labor,” Pennyboy Senior interrupted.

“I am a broken vessel, all runs out. I am a shrunken old dryfat — a broken barrel good only for dry goods.

“Fare you well, good six.”

Cymbal exited the house, and then Pennyboy exited the room.

THE THIRD INTERMEAN: AFTER THE THIRD
ACT (The Staple of News)

“This old Pennyboy is a notable tough rascal!” Gossip Censure said. “Right city-bred!”

Gossip Mirth said, “In Silver Street, the region of money, a good headquarters for a usurer.”

Many silversmiths resided on Silver Street.

Gossip Tattle said, “He has rich ingredients in him, I promise you, if they were extracted — a true recipe and formula to make an alderman, if he were well wrought upon according to art.”

“I would like to see an alderman in chimia!” Gossip Expectation said. “That is a treatise of aldermanity truly written.”

“In chimia” means to be subjected to alchemical analysis.

“To show how much it differs from urbanity,” Gossip Censure said.

“Aye, or humanity,” Gossip Mirth said. “Either would appear in this Pennyboy Senior, if he were rightly distilled. But how do you like the news? You haven’t mentioned that.”

“Oh, the news are monstrous, scurvy, and stale!” Gossip Censure said. “And too exotic and outlandish! Ill-cooked and ill-dished!”

“They were as good yet as butter could make them!” Gossip Expectation said.

Of course, Nathaniel Butter was a prominent newsman of Ben Jonson’s time.

“In a word, they were beastly buttered!” Gossip Tattle said. “He — butter — shall never come on my bread more, nor in my mouth, if I can help it.”

According to the Oxford English Dictionary, the verb “come” has meant “ejaculate” since at least 1604.

Gossip Tattle continued, “I have had better news from the bake-house by ten thousand parts in a morning, or the conduits in Westminster, all the news of Tuttle Street and both the Almonries, the two Sanctuaries, Long and Round Woolstaple — with King Street and Cannon Row to boot!”

Gossip — news — can be found in many places.

King Henry VII had built two almshouses for the poor to the west of Westminster Abbey: the Great and Little Almonries.

Gossip Mirth said, “Aye, my Gossip Tattle knew what fine slips grew in Gardiner’s Lane.”

The word “slip” can mean 1) twig, and 2) counterfeit. In this context, it means illegitimate children.

Gossip Mirth continued, “My Gossip Tattle also knew who kissed the butcher’s wife with the cow’s breath, what matches were made in the Bowling Alley and what bets won and lost, how much grist went to the mill and what besides, who conjured in Tuttle Fields and how many, when they never came there, and which boy rode upon the astrologer Doctor Lamb in the likeness of a roaring lion that run away with him in his teeth and has not devoured him yet.”

Gossip Mirth was confused, and it showed in her language:

1) Some conjurors conjured in Tuttle Fields and they — the conjurors? the spirits? — never came there.

2) A boy rode on Doctor Lamb when Doctor Lamb took the form of a roaring lion and yet the boy was in Doctor Lamb's teeth.

Gossip Tattle said, "Why, I heard about it from my serving-maid, Joan Hearsay, and she heard it from a limb of the school, she says."

"A limb of Satan" is a young rascal or a young imp.

Gossip Tattle continued, "This was a little limb of nine years old, who told her that the master left out his conjuring book one day, and he found it, and so the fable came about. But whether it were true or no, we gossips are bound to believe it, if it is once out and afoot. How should we pass the time else, or find ourselves in fashionable discourse for all companies, if we do not credit all and make more of it in the reporting?"

"For my part, I believe it," Gossip Censure said. "If there were no wiser than I am and it were up to me, I would never have a cunning schoolmaster in England — I mean a cunning man, a schoolmaster, who is a conjurer, or a poet, or who had any acquaintance with a poet."

A cunning man is a conjuror or a smart schoolmaster.

Gossip Censure said, "They make all their scholars play-boys!"

In this context, play-boys are boys who act in plays.

She continued, "Isn't it a fine sight to see all our children made interluders? Do we pay our money for this? We send them to learn their grammar and their Terence, and they learn their play-books!"

Interludes are pauses between play acts.

Terence was a Roman playwright.

Gossip Censure continued, “Well, they say that we shall have no more Parliaments, God bless us.”

In August 1625, King Charles I dissolved Parliament. In February 1626, Parliament was recalled, but in June 1626, King Charles I again dissolved it.

Gossip Censure continued, “But if we have, I hope Zeal-of-the-land Busy and my gossip — friend — Rabbi Troubletruth will start up and see that we shall have painstaking — and sometimes painful — good ministers to keep school and catechize our youth, and not teach them to speak plays and act fables of false news in this manner, to the super-vexation of town and country, with a wanion — with a vengeance.”

Zeal-of-the-land Busy, who is a character in Ben Jonson’s play Bartholomew Fair, and Rabbi Troubletruth were Puritans who disliked the theater.

ACT 4 (The Staple of News)

— 4.1 —

Pennyboy Junior, Fitton, Shunfield, Almanac, Madrigal, the Canter, and Picklock were in the Devil Tavern. They had finished eating the noon meal.

“Come, gentlemen, let’s take a break from drinking to each other’s healths for a while,” Pennyboy Junior said. “This Lickfinger has made us a good noon dinner for our Pecunia. What shall we do with ourselves while the women water and the fiddlers eat?”

“Women water” can mean 1) the women freshen themselves with sweet water, or 2) the women urinate.

“Let’s jeer a little,” Fitton said.

He was referring to the jeering game that he and his friends practiced. The game involved insulting other people — and each other. It was far removed from legitimate satire.

“Jeer?” Pennyboy Junior asked. “What’s that?”

“Wait and see, sir,” Shunfield said.

Almanac said, “We first begin by jeering at ourselves, and then at you.”

“It is a game we are accustomed to play,” Shunfield said.

Madrigal said, “We jeer all kind of persons we meet with, of any rank or quality, and if we cannot jeer them, we jeer ourselves.”

The Canter said, “It is a pretty sweet society — and a grateful one!”

This kind of “grateful” is “full of grating.”

“Please, let’s see some jeering,” Picklock said.

Shunfield said, "Have at you then, lawyer."

This meant: Prepare to be attacked.

Shunfield continued, "I am going to jeer you. ... They say there was one of your coat in Bedlam hospital for lunatics lately —"

Lawyers wore a distinctive coat that indicated their profession.

"I marvel that all his clients were not there," Almanac said.

"They were the madder sort," Madrigal said.

Picking up on mad and Madrigal, Picklock said, "They were all not there except, sir, one like you, and he made verses."

Fitton said, "Madrigal, you have been jeered."

"I know I have," Madrigal said.

Shunfield asked Picklock, "But what did you do, lawyer, when you made love to Mistress Band at dinner?"

"To make love" means "to woo."

Madrigal said, "Why, from being an advocate, he grew the client."

Mistress Band would grow if she were successfully wooed and became pregnant.

"Well played, my poet!" Pennyboy Junior said.

Madrigal continued, "And he showed that the law of nature was there above the common law."

The law of nature governs such things as reproduction. It existed long before Humankind created the common law.

Common law is “the general law of a community,” or “[t]he unwritten law of England,” according to the Oxford English Dictionary.

“Quit, quit!” Shunfield said. “Touché! Touché!”

“Call you this jeering?” Pennyboy Junior said. “I can play at this. It is like a ball at tennis.”

Fitton said, “It is very likely that you can play at this, but we were not well started in the game.”

Almanac agreed with Pennyboy Junior that the game of jeering was like the game of tennis, “It is indeed, sir, when we speak at volley — fire volleys back and forth — all the ill we can at one another —”

Shunfield interrupted, “— as we this morning — I wish that you had heard us — at the rogue your uncle —”

Almanac interrupted, “— that money-bawd —”

Madrigal interrupted, — we called him a coat-card of the lowest order.”

A coat-card is a court-card or face-card in which the figure wears fancy clothing — king, queen, jack (aka knave).

“What’s that?” Pennyboy Junior asked. “A knave?”

“Some readings have it so,” Madrigal said.

Some manuscripts could use the word “jack” rather than the word “knave.”

Different manuscripts could also use the word “knave” to mean different things.

A knave can be 1) the attendant of a knight, or 2) a low, dishonest rogue.

Madrigal continued, “My manuscript uses ‘knave’ to mean ‘varlet.’”

A varlet can be 1) an attendant or servant, or 2) a low, dishonest rogue.

The Canter said, “And your manuscript calls yourself a fool of the first rank, and one who shall have the leading — take the precedence — of the right-hand file under this brave commander.”

Madrigal’s manuscript was bad enough to identify himself as a fool. The brave commander was probably Pennyboy Junior, host of the feast the jeerers had been enjoying.

The Canter was saying that if Pennyboy Junior was a knave, then Madrigal was the head fool serving under him.

“What do you say, Canter?” Pennyboy Junior asked.

The Canter said sarcastically, “Sir, I say this is a very wholesome exercise, and comely — it is just like lepers showing one another their scabs, or flies feeding on ulcers.”

“What is the news, gentlemen?” Pennyboy Junior said. “Have you any news for after dinner? I think we should not spend our time unprofitably.”

“They never lie, sir, between meals,” the Canter said.

He was punning on the word “lie”: 1) They never tell news, aka lies, between meals, and 2) They never lie down between meals, which means that they can stay awake and gather more news, aka lies.

The Canter added, “In preparation for supper — the evening meal — you may have a bale or two of news brought in.”

The jeerers began to talk quietly together.

Fitton said to the other jeerers, "This Canter is an old envious knave!"

"A very rascal!" Almanac said.

"I have watched him all this meal," Fitton said. "He has done nothing but mock, with scurvy faces, all we said."

"A supercilious rogue!" Almanac said. "He looks as if he were the patrico —"

Madrigal interrupted, "— or archpriest of canters."

A patrico is a hedge-priest — the uneducated parson of the beggars.

The archpriest is the leading Catholic in England.

A patrico and the archpriest were leading figures of underground organizations.

"He's some primate metropolitan rascal," Shunfield said.

A metropolitan is the leader of an ecclesiastical province, and a primate is the leader of metropolitans. In other words, Shunfield is obliquely saying the Canter is like the Archbishop of Canterbury — but for beggars.

Shunfield said, "Our shot-clog makes so much of him."

A shot-clog is a person who is not liked, but who is tolerated because he pays the shot — the bill — for the others. The jeerers regarded Pennyboy Junior as a sucker and a shot-clog. The jeerers were repaying generous hospitality with insults.

Almanac said, "The law and he do govern him."

In other words, Picklock and the Canter govern Pennyboy Junior.

"What are you saying, gentlemen?" Pennyboy Junior asked.

Fitton said, “We were saying that we don’t wonder that your man of law — Picklock — should so enjoy your favor; but how does it happen that this rogue, this Canter, enjoys your favor?”

Other people may wonder how does it happen that the jeerers enjoy Pennyboy Junior’s favor.

“Oh, speak good words,” Pennyboy Junior said. “Speak gentle words.”

He did not want the Canter to be criticized.

Fitton said, “He is a fellow who speaks no language —”

Almanac interrupted, “— except what jingling gypsies and peddlers trade in —”

Gypsies jingle because many gypsies sew small bells in their clothing.

Jingling gypsies and peddlers speak cant — specialized language that they understand but most others cannot.

Fitton said, “And no honest Christian can understand it.”

The Canter said to all the jeerers, “— why, by that argument you all are canters.”

He pointed to the jeerers in turn and said, “You, and you, and you — all the whole world are canters. I will prove it in your professions.”

“I would like to hear this,” Pennyboy Junior said.

He saw Lady Pecunia coming and said, “But wait, my princess comes. Get ready, Canter, to prove that all the world are canters — I’ll call for the proof soon.”

He then said to Lady Pecunia, “How is Your Grace?”

Lickfinger, Lady Pecunia, Statute, Band, Wax, and Mortgage walked over to them. The ladies had finished freshening up and Lickfinger had finished cleaning up after the noon meal.

“I hope the fare was good,” Lickfinger said.

“Yes, Lickfinger, and we shall thank you for it and reward you,” Lady Pecunia said.

Lickfinger and Madrigal had earlier been arguing over the relative importance of cookery and poetry. Now they continued the argument.

“Nay, I’ll not lose my argument, Lickfinger,” Madrigal said. “Before these gentlewomen, I affirm that the perfect and true strain of poetry is rather to be given the quick — lively — cellar than the fat — greasy — kitchen.”

Madrigal was asking this: What is the most important part of a banquet? The food you eat that makes you sluggish, or the wine you drink that enlivens you while also encouraging you to engage in conversation that also enlivens you.

In ancient Athens, people would eat and then following the meal would be a time for drinking and conversing. For example, in Plato’s Symposium, people ate a meal and following the meal they drank and talked about love.

Intoxicating wine can cause inspiration; heavy food can cause a nap.

Lickfinger responded, “Heretic, I see that you are for the vain Oracle of the Bottle. The hogshead, Trismegistus, is your Pegasus.”

Hogsheads are barrels that can contain wine.

In Pantagruel V:5, the Oracle of the Bottle is “Trinc,” which means “Drink.” Panurge, a character in Pantagruel, calls the bottle “trismegistian Bottle,” which means “thrice-renowned bottle.” The priestess tells Panurge that “by wine we become divine.”

The winged horse Pegasus struck its hoof on Mount Helicon, home of the Muses, and a spring arose from where Pegasus struck its hoof. Whoever drinks from that spring is poetically inspired.

Lickfinger continued, “Seduced poet, I say to you that a boiler, range, and dresser — kitchen table — were the fountains of all the knowledge in the universe.

“And they’re the kitchens, where the master cook — you don’t know the man, nor can you know him, until you have served some years in that deep school that’s both the nurse and mother of the arts, and hear him read, interpret, and demonstrate!

“A master cook! Why, he’s the man of men for a professor! He designs, he draws, he paints, he carves, he builds, he fortifies, he makes citadels of exotic fowl and fish.

“Some he dry-ditches like a dry moat, some he moats round with broths, he mounts marrowbones as if they were cannon, he cuts fifty-angled custards, he rears bulwark pies, and for his outerworks he raises ramparts of immortal crust, and he teaches all the tactics at one dinner. What ranks, what files to put his dishes in — he teaches the whole military art.”

Lickfinger was comparing cooking to building a fortification. For example, many forts were built with angles.

Doing so meant that often cannonballs would hit the defensive walls at an angle and thus the damage to the wall would be minimized. In addition, angles made it easier for defenders on the walls of the fort to see and fight attackers.

Lickfinger continued, “Then, he knows the influence of the stars upon his meats, and all their seasons, tempers, qualities, and so to fit his relishes and sauces, he has Nature in a pot above all the alchemists or airy brethren of the Rosy Cross — the Rosicrucians.

“He is an architect, an engineer, a soldier, a physician, a philosopher, a general mathematician.”

“It is granted,” Madrigal said.

Lickfinger continued, “And that you may not doubt that he is a poet —”

Almanac interrupted, “— this fury shows that he is a poet, if there were nothing else, and it is divine! I shall forever hereafter admire the wisdom of a cook.”

Almanac, a jeerer, respected cooks.

“And we, sir!” Band said.

Pennyboy Junior, who had been courting Lady Pecunia all the while, said, “Oh, how my princess draws me with her looks and hales me in, as eddies draw in boats or strong Charybdis ships that sail too near the reefs of love!”

Charybdis was a whirlpool that sucked down ships that got too close to it. Jason and the Argonauts and Odysseus and his men had to pass between Scylla and Charybdis. Scylla was a monster whose six heads would each snatch a sailor from a ship and eat him.

Pennyboy Junior continued, “The tides of your two eyes, wind of your breath, are such as suck in all who approach you!”

“Who has changed my servant?” Lady Pecunia asked.

This kind of servant was a male admirer.

Pennyboy Junior answered, “Yourself, who drink my blood up with your beams as the sun drinks up the sea! Pecunia shines more in the world than the sun, and makes it spring wherever she favors! If it pleases her just to show her delicately molded wrists, or bare her ivory hands, she captivates always!

“Her smiles, they are Love’s fetters! Her breasts, his apples! Her nipples, strawberries, where Cupid, if he were present now, would cry, ‘Farewell, my mother’s milk; here’s sweeter nectar!’”

Cupid is Venus’ son; she breastfed him.

Pennyboy Junior said, “Help me to praise Pecunia, gentlemen. She’s your princess; lend your wits.”

Fitton said, “She is a lady whom the Graces taught to move!”

“Whom the Hours did nurse!” Almanac said.

The Horae or Hours — goddesses who preside over the seasons — were the first to attend the goddess Venus when she was born from sea-foam.

“Whose lips are the instructions of all lovers!” Fitton said.

“Her eyes are their lights, and her eyes are rivals to the stars!” Almanac said.

“A voice as if Harmony still spoke!” Fitton said.

Harmony is the Music of the Spheres. The ears of the fallen cannot hear it.

“And polished skin whiter than Venus’ foot!” Almanac said.

“Young Hebe’s neck or Juno’s arms!” Fitton said.

Hebe was the ancient Greek goddess of youth, and Juno is called “white-armed Hera” in Homer’s Iliad. Hera is the Greek name for Juno.

Almanac said, “A hairstyle as large as the Morning’s, and her breath as sweet as meadows after rain and just newly mown!”

In this society, the rays of the morning sun were sometimes compared to hair.

“Leda might yield to her, for a face!” Fitton said.

Jupiter, the king of the gods, took the form of a swan and impregnated Leda, who gave birth to Helen, who became Helen of Troy. In a beauty contest of faces, Leda might come in second to Lady Pecunia. Or, possibly, Leda might be seduced because of Lady Pecunia’s face.

“Hermione, for breasts!” Almanac said.

Hermione was the daughter of King Menelaus and Helen (of Troy). Hermione married Neoptolemus, the son of Achilles. Helen was the most beautiful woman in the world.

“Flora, for cheeks!” Fitton said.

Flora is the goddess of flowers.

“And Helen, for a mouth!” Almanac said.

“Kiss, kiss them, princess,” Pennyboy Junior said to Lady Pecunia.

Lady Pecunia kissed them.

“The pearl strives to compare in whiteness with her neck —”
Fitton said.

Almanac interrupted, “— but loses the contest. Here the snow thaws snow; one frost dissolves another!”

“Oh, she has a forehead too dangerous to be looked upon!”
Fitton said.

“And glances that beguile the seer’s eyes!” Almanac said.

“Kiss, kiss again,” Pennyboy Junior said to Lady Pecunia.

She kissed them again.

Pennyboy Junior then asked, “What says my man of war?”

Shunfield, who had been quiet up to now, said, “I say she’s more than Fame can promise of her. A theme that’s overcome with her own matter! Praise is struck blind and deaf and dumb with her! Lady Pecunia astonishes commendation!”

In other words, words cannot adequately express her beauty.

“Well pumped, indeed, old sailor,” Pennyboy Junior said.

“Well pumped” meant that Shunfield’s praise was well worked: He had thought up good words to say, although as he said, words could not adequately express Lady Pecunia’s beauty.

“Kiss him, too, although he’s a sluggard,” Pennyboy Junior said to Lady Pecunia.

Captain Shunfield was late in praising Lady Pecunia, who kissed him anyway.

Pennyboy Junior then asked Madrigal, “What says my poet-sucker?”

A poet-sucker is an unweaned poet — a poet who is still a beginner.

Pennyboy Junior added, “He’s chewing his muse’s cud. I can see that by looking at him.”

Madrigal was working on a poem of praise for Lady Pecunia.

“I have almost finished,” Madrigal said. “I just lack the conclusion.”

“That’s the ill luck of all his works always,” Fitton said.

“What?” Pennyboy Junior asked.

“To begin many works, but finish none,” Fitton said.

“How does he do his mistress’ work?” Pennyboy Junior asked.

Madrigal’s mistress was Erato, the Muse of love poetry and lyric poetry.

“Imperfectly,” Fitton said.

“I cannot think he will finish that,” Almanac said.

“That” was the poem Madrigal was now working on.

“Let’s hear it,” Pennyboy Junior said to Madrigal.

“It is a madrigal,” Madrigal said. “I much like that kind of poem.”

“And because of that, you have the name Madrigal,” Pennyboy Junior said.

“It is his rose,” Fitton said. “He can make nothing else.”

Ben Jonson knew of a painter who could paint nothing but a rose — a practice he defended by saying that a rose was higher than any other subject of painting.

Madrigal said, “I made it to the tune the fiddlers played that we all liked so well.”

Poems often were used as song lyrics.

“Good,” Pennyboy Junior said. “Read it, read it.”

Madrigal read, “The sun is father of all metals, you know, silver and gold —”

“Aye, leave unsaid your prologues,” Pennyboy Junior said. “Read your poem!”

Madrigal read his poem out loud:

“As bright as is the Sun, her sire,

“Or Earth, her mother, in her best attire,

“Or Mint, the midwife, with her fire,

“Comes forth Her Grace!”

Pennyboy Junior said, “That ‘Mint, the midwife’ does well.”

Madrigal continued reading his poem out loud:

“The splendor of the wealthiest mines!

“The stamp and strength of all imperial lines,

“Both majesty and beauty shines

“In her sweet face!”

“That’s fairly said of money,” Fitton said.

The faces of imperial lines — kings and queens — are stamped on coins.

Madrigal continued reading his poem out loud:

“Look how a torch of taper light [lit],

“Or of that torch’s flame, a beacon bright —”

“Good!” Pennyboy Junior said.

Madrigal said, “Now, there I lack a line to finish, sir.”

Pennyboy thought up a line and then said it out loud:

“Or of that beacon’s fire, moonlight —”

Madrigal thought up the concluding line and then said it out loud:

“So takes she [Pecunia] place [precedence]!”

“It is good,” Fitton said.

Madrigal then said, “And then I have a saraband.”

A saraband is a slow and stately Spanish dance in triple time — three beats to the bar. Madrigal’s saraband was composed to that rhythm.

Madrigal recited his saraband:

“She makes good cheer, she keeps full boards [provides abundant food],

“She holds a fair of knights and lords,

“A market of all offices,

“And shops of honor, more or less.

“According to Pecunia’s grace,

“The bride hath [has] beauty, blood, and place,

“The bridegroom virtue, valor, wit,

“And wisdom, as he stands for it.”

“Call in the fiddlers,” Pennyboy Junior said. “Nick, the boy, shall sing the saraband.”

Pennyboy Junior then said to Lady Pecunia, “Sweet princess, kiss him. Kiss them all, dear madam, and, at the close, deign to call them cousins.”

“Cousins” are kin — or friends.

As she kissed them in turn, Lady Pecunia said, “Sweet cousin Madrigal, and cousin Fitton, my cousin Shunfield, and my learned cousin —”

The Canter said to himself, “Al-manach, although they call him Almanac.”

“Al” is Arabic for “the.” Al-manach is “the man — ach.” “Ach” is an interjection that expresses disgust and dismay and irritation, among other negative reactions.

Picklock said to himself, “Why, here the prodigal is prostituting his mistress!”

Pennyboy Junior was urging Lady Pecunia to engage in much kissing.

Pennyboy Junior said, “And Picklock, he must be a kinsman, too. My man of law will teach us all to win and keep our own.”

He then said to the Canter, “Old founder —”

“Nothing, I, sir?” the Canter said.

The Canter was saying that he did not feel he was worthy to be kissed by Lady Pecunia.

He continued, “I am a wretch, a beggar. She, the fortunate, can lack no kindred; we, the poor, know none.”

“Nor shall you know any, as far as I’m concerned,” Fitton said.

“I agree with Fitton,” Almanac said.

The fiddlers and Nick, the boy singer, entered the room.

“Sing, boy,” Pennyboy Junior said. “Stand here.”

The boy sang Madrigal’s saraband, and the guests danced.

The Canter said to himself, “Look, look, how all their eyes dance in their heads — look at them! — crazed by lust at the sight of their brave idol! How they are tickled with a light air, the bawdy saraband! They are all a kind of dancing machines, and they are set by nature thus to run alone to every sound! All things within and outside them move except their brain, and that stands still!

“Mere monsters here, in a chamber, of most subtle feet! And they make their legs be in tune while walking in the streets!

“These are the gallant spirits of the age, the miracles of the time, who can praise and denigrate men’s wits and set whatever rate on things their half-brained fancies please.

“Now, a pox upon them!

“See how attentively he — Pennyboy Junior — learns the jig, as if it were a mystery — a holy rite — of his faith!”

The Canter was hard on the dancing because it was inspired by love of money, but poetry, music, and dance can spiritually uplift human beings. So can food — think of Babette’s Feast.

Some art is better than other art, but even art that is not the best — or close to it — can be appreciated by at least some people.

The dancers were all struck with admiration of Madrigal.

“A dainty ditty!” Shunfield said.

“Oh, he’s a fine, delicate poet when he sets his mind to it,” Fitton said.

“And a dainty scholar,” Pennyboy Junior said.

“No, no great scholar,” Almanac said. “He writes like a gentleman.”

Rich gentlemen need not write for money; in this society, some scholars who had graduated from Oxford or Cambridge often did. In Ben Jonson’s Epicene, Jack Daw — who is a fool — distinguished between poets and versifiers. To Jack Daw, a poet is someone who makes money from poetry. Jack Daw preferred mere versifiers, who did not write for money, to true poets.

This society valued money: It is better to have money and not have to write for money.

Ben Jonson, of course, was a scholar who made his living from his literary endeavors.

“A pox on your scholar!” Shunfield said.

The Canter said to himself, “A pox on your distinction between scholars and gentlemen! As if a scholar were no gentleman. With these, to write like a gentleman will in time become the same as to write like an ass.

“These gentlemen? These rascals! I am sick of indignation at them.”

“How do you like it, sir?” Pennyboy Junior asked Fitton.

“It is excellent!” Fitton said.

“It was excellently sung!” Almanac said.

“A dainty air!” Fitton said.

“What says my Lickfinger?” Pennyboy Junior asked.

Lickfinger answered, “I am telling Mistress Band and Mistress Statute what a brave gentleman you are, and Wax here, how much better it would be if My Lady's Grace would here take up residence, sir, and keep house with you."

"What do they say?" Pennyboy Junior asked.

"We could consent, sir, willingly," Statute said.

"Aye, if we knew Her Grace had the least liking," Band said.

"We must obey Her Grace's will and pleasure," Wax said.

"I thank you, gentlewomen," Pennyboy Junior said.

He then said, "Ply them, Lickfinger. Give Mother Mortgage, there —"

Lickfinger finished the sentence, "— her dose of sack. I have it for her, and her quantity of hum — strong ale."

Sack is wine.

Lickfinger served wine all around.

The gallants were all gathered around Lady Pecunia.

"Indeed, therein I must confess, dear cousin, that I am a most unfortunate princess," Lady Pecunia said.

"And you still will be so, when Your Grace may help it," Almanac said.

According to Almanac, Lady Pecunia would cease being unfortunate if she lodged with Pennyboy Junior rather than continuing to stay with Pennyboy Senior.

As a miser, Pennyboy Senior did not treat Lady Pecunia — money — the way she ought to be treated.

Madrigal said, "Who'd lie in a room, with a close-stool and garlic, and kennel with his dogs, who had a prince like this young Pennyboy to sojourn with?"

A close-stool is a chamber pot that is enclosed in a box or a stool.

Shunfield said, “He’ll let you have your liberty —”

Almanac said, “He’ll let you go forth to where you please, and to whatever company you please —”

Misers keep money shut away from society.

Pennyboy Junior was not a miser.

Madrigal said, “He’ll let you scatter yourself — circulate — among us —”

Pennyboy Junior said to Madrigal, “Hope of Parnassus! Your ivy shall not wither, nor will your bays.”

Mount Parnassus was regarded as the source of poetic inspiration.

Ivy was sacred to Bacchus, god of wine. The bay laurel was sacred to Apollo, god of music, and poets were crowned with laurel wreaths.

Pennyboy Junior had more respect for Madrigal than he had before Madrigal’s song was sung.

Pennyboy Junior added, “You shall be had into Her Grace’s cellar, and there know sack and claret all December. Your vein of poetry is rich, and we must cherish it. Poets and bees swarm nowadays, but yet there are not those good taverns for the one sort as there are flowery fields to feed the other.

“Although bees are pleased with dew — ask little Wax who brings the honey to her lady’s hive — the poet must have wine. And he shall have it.”

Honey is stored in beeswax.

Pennyboy Senior — the miser — entered the room.

“Broker!” Pennyboy Senior called. “What, Broker!”

“Who’s that?” Pennyboy Junior said. “My uncle!”

“I am abused,” Pennyboy Senior said. “Where is my knave, my Broker?”

Lickfinger pointed and said, “Your Broker is laid out upon a bench, yonder. Sack has seized on him, in the shape of sleep.”

Broker was drunk and asleep.

“He has been dead to us almost this entire hour,” Picklock said.

“This entire hour?” Pennyboy Senior said.

Broker was supposed to have been looking after Lady Pecunia. If he had done his job, perhaps she would not have kissed so many men.

The Canter asked Pennyboy Senior, “Why do you sigh, sir? Because he’s at rest?”

“It breeds my unrest,” Pennyboy Senior replied.

Lickfinger offered him a drink and asked, “Will you take a cup of sack and see if you can sleep?”

“No, cogging jack — cheating rascal,” Pennyboy Senior said. “You, and your cups, too, perish!”

He struck the sack out of Lickfinger’s hand.

“Oh, the sack!” Shunfield said.

“The sack! The sack!” Madrigal said.

“A madrigal on sack!” the Canter said.

“Or rather an elegy, for the sack is gone,” Picklock said.

“Why do you do this, sir — spill the wine, and rave?” Lady Pecunia asked. “Because of Broker’s sleeping?”

“What?” Pennyboy Senior said. “Through sleep and sack, my trust has been wronged.”

He had trusted Broker, but Broker had not acted as he should have acted.

“But I am still awake to wait upon Your Grace,” Pennyboy Senior said. “Does it please you to quit this strange, lewd, ill-mannered company? They are not for you.”

“No, guardian,” Lady Pecunia said. “I do like them very well.”

“Your Grace’s pleasure will be observed, but you, Statute, and Band, and Wax, will go with me,” Pennyboy Senior said.

Statutes, bands (bonds), and wax (for sealing documents) are all useful to misers.

“Truly, we will not,” Statute said.

Band said, “We will stay and wait here upon Her Grace, and this your noble kinsman — Pennyboy Junior.”

“Noble! How noble?” Pennyboy Senior asked. “Who has made him noble?”

Pennyboy Junior answered, “Why, my most noble money has, or shall — my princess, here. She who, had you but kept and treated her kindly, would have made you noble and wise, too; nay, perhaps she would have done for you that which an Act of Parliament could not do: made you honest.”

Money, properly used, can do great good. So can a wise, kind, and noble person.

Under King James I, however, money actually could buy a kind of nobility. He sold peerages for money.

Pennyboy Junior continued, “The truth is, uncle, that Her Grace dislikes her treatment and conditions of employment, and especially her lodging.”

“Nay, say her jail,” Lady Pecunia said. “Never was an unfortunate princess so badly treated by a jailer. Ask my women.”

She then said, “Band, you can tell, and Statute, too, how he has treated me, kept me close prisoner, under twenty bolts —”

Statute interrupted, “— and forty padlocks —”

Band interrupted, “— all the malicious engines a wicked smith could forge out of his iron, such as locks and keys, shackles and manacles, to torture a great lady.”

Misers keep gold and money locked away.

Statute said, “He’s abused your Grace’s body.”

“No,” Lady Pecunia said. “He would have done so, but that lay not in his power. He had the use of your bodies, Band, and Wax, and sometimes Statute’s.

“Once he would have smothered me in a chest and strangled me in leather, but you came to my rescue, then, and gave me air.”

Statute said, “For which rescue he crammed us up in a closed box, all three — Band, Wax, and me — together, where we saw no sun in one six-month period.”

“A cruel man he is!” Wax said.

Band said, “He’s left my fellow Wax out in the cold —”

Statute finished the sentence, “— until she was as stiff as any frost, and crumbled away to dust, and almost lost her form.”

“There was much trouble taken to recover me,” Wax said.

“Women jeerers!” Pennyboy Senior said. “Have you learned, too, the subtle faculty? Come, I’ll show you the way home, if drink or a too-full diet have disguised — intoxicated — you.”

Band said, “The truth is that we have no mind, sir, to return —”

Statute interrupted, “— to be bound back to back —”

Band interrupted, “— and have our legs turned in, or writhed about —”

Wax interrupted, “— or else displayed —”

“Displayed” meant 1) literally lying down with the legs spread open, or 2) figuratively displayed like the pages of a document.

Statute interrupted, “— and be lodged with dust and fleas, as we were accustomed to be —”

Band interrupted, “— and dieted with dogs’ dung.”

Dogs poop on papers. Since dogs know nothing about which papers are valuable, such papers as bands (legal bonds), if accidentally dropped on the floor, can be pooped on.

Pennyboy Senior said, “Why, you whores, my bawds, my instruments, what should I call you that Humankind may think base enough for you?”

An “instrument” can be a tool, a document, or a woman’s genitalia.

“Listen, uncle,” Pennyboy Junior said. “I must not hear this of my princess’ servants, and in Apollo, in Pecunia’s room.”

They were in the Apollo Room.

The sun — Apollo is the sun-god — is the alchemical symbol for gold.

Pennyboy Junior continued, “Go, get you down the stairs, home to your kennel as swiftly as you can. Consult your dogs, the lares of your family, or, believe it, the fury of a footman and a bartender hangs over you.”

The Roman lares praestites were guardians of the state, and the Roman lares familiaris were household gods. Dogs are loyal guardians and are devoted to the family.

The jeerers all threatened Pennyboy Senior.

“A cudgel and a pot threaten a kind of vengeance,” Shunfield said.

“Barbers are at hand,” Madrigal said.

“Washing and shaving will ensue,” Almanac said.

The jeerers were threatening to cut his hair and beard.

“The well pump is not far away,” Fitton said. “If it were far away, the sink — cesspool — is near, or a good jordan — chamber pot.”

If necessary, they would shave him using sewer water.

Madrigal said, “You have now no money —”

Shunfield finished the sentence, “— but you are a rascal.”

Pennyboy Senior said, “I am cheated, robbed, jeered by confederacy.”

The jeerers kicked him.

“No, you are kicked and treated as fittingly as you should be,” Fitton said.

“You are spurned from all commerce of men, you who are a cur,” Shunfield said.

They began to kick Pennyboy Senior out.

“You are a stinking dog in a doublet with foul linen,” Almanac said.

“You are a snarling rascal,” Madrigal said. “Get out.”

“Out!” Shunfield said.

Retreating, Pennyboy Senior said, “Well, remember, I am cheated by my kinsman and his whore. Bane of these meetings in Apollo!”

Trying to lead him away, Lickfinger said, “Go, sir. You will be tossed like Block in a blanket, if you don’t leave.”

Block was one of Pennyboy Senior’s dogs.

Men and dogs could be punished by being tossed in a blanket.

“Down with him, Lickfinger!” Pennyboy Junior said.

Shaking Lickfinger off, Pennyboy Senior said, “Saucy jack, away! Pecunia is a whore!”

Pennyboy Senior exited, followed by Lickfinger.

Pennyboy Junior said to the musicians, “Play him down, fiddlers, and drown his noise!”

Seeing someone approach, he asked, “Who’s this?”

Recognizing the newcomer, Fitton said, “Oh, Master Piedmantle!”

Piedmantle, who had brought the Lady Pecunia her pedigree, entered the room and walked over to them. A pedigree is a genealogical tree or table.

“With your permission, gentlemen,” Piedmantle said.

Fitton began, “Her Grace’s herald —”

Almanac interrupted, “— no herald yet. He’s a heraldet.”

A heraldet is a petty herald.

“What’s that?” Pennyboy Junior asked.

“A canter,” the Canter said.

“Oh, you said you would prove that all of us are canters,” Pennyboy Junior said.

Cant is specialized jargon. Beggars and thieves use cant, but many occupations have their own cant. The Canter was going to show that the people present had their own cant.

Piedmantle’s cant was in heraldry.

Almanac’s cant was in medicine and in astrology.

Shunfield’s cant was in military matters.

Madrigal’s cant was in poetry and song.

Fitton’s cant was the cant of courtiers at the court. Such cant involved business — often fraudulent business. He did favors or pretended to be able to do favors for business people at the court. Fitton was a courtier, but he was also a court gossip.

Referring to Piedmantle, the Canter said, “Sir, here is one who will prove himself to be a canter, immediately. So shall the rest, in time.”

Seeing the pedigree that Piedmantle was holding, Lady Pecunia said to him, “My pedigree? I tell you, friend, he must be a good scholar who can know my descent. I am of princely race, and as good blood as any is in the mines runs through my veins.

“I am every limb a princess! The Duchess of Mines was my great-grandmother, and by the father’s side I come from Sol. My grandfather was Duke of Or, and he matched — married — in the blood royal of Ophir.”

“Sol” and “or” both mean gold. “Sol” is the personified sun, and “or” is the heraldic term for gold.

Piedmantle pointed to the pedigree and said, “Here’s his coat of arms.”

Lady Pecunia said, “I know it if I hear the blazon.”

The blazon is the description of heraldic arms using heraldic terms.

The heraldic terms are, of course, cant.

Piedmantle began to describe the coat of arms in heraldic terms: “He bears, in a field azure, a sun proper, beamy, twelve of the second.”

A field azure is a blue background. A sun proper, beamy, is the sun represented by a human face surrounded by twelve sunny rays or beams, and of the second color that had been mentioned: the sun’s color — which is or, aka gold. The word “proper” meant having its natural color. In the case of the sun, that color is gold. The first color mentioned was azure.

The Canter whispered sarcastically to Pennyboy Junior, “How far is this from canting!”

Pennyboy Junior whispered to the Canter, “Her Grace understands it.”

Cant can communicate, but often a study of the specialized terms must first be made. Lady Pecunia had grown up using these terms and so she had learned them naturally. Piedmantle, however, had to study to become a heraldet, and he was not yet a full herald.

The Canter whispered back, “She can cant, sir.”

Pointing to the pedigree, Lady Pecunia asked, “What are these? Besants?”

Besants are small gold circles. Originally, the term referred to large gold coins.

“Yes, if it pleases Your Grace,” Piedmantle answered.

“That is our coat of arms, too, as we come from Or,” Lady Pecunia said. “What line’s this?”

Piedmantle answered, “The rich mines of Potosi, the Spanish mines in the West Indies.”

Mount Potosi, which is in Bolivia (not the West Indies), was a rich source of silver.

A good herald ought to have a good knowledge of geography.

Lady Pecunia asked, “And what’s this?”

“The mines of Hungary,” Piedmantle said. “And this is the mines of Barbary.”

“But this, this little branch?” Lady Pecunia asked.

Piedmantle answered, “That’s the Welsh mine, that.”

“I have Welsh blood in me, too,” Lady Pecunia said. “Blaze, sir, that coat.”

In other words, describe in heraldic terms the Welsh coat of arms.

Piedmantle said, "That coat of arms bears (if it pleases you) argent, three leeks vert in canton or, and tasseled of the first color: argent."

Leeks are related to onions. They are not normally found in heraldic devices. Vert is the color green. Argent is the color silver.

In non-heraldic terms, the coat of arms of the Welsh mines had a silver background. In a gold square (canton or) were three green leeks. The coat of arms was adorned with silver tassels.

The Canter whispered to Pennyboy Junior, "Isn't this canting? Do you understand him?"

Pennyboy Junior whispered back, "I can't understand him, but it sounds well, and the whole pedigree is splendidly painted. I will have such a scroll, whatever it costs me."

Lady Pecunia said to Piedmantle, "Well, at better leisure we'll take a view of it, and so reward you."

"Kiss him, sweet princess, and give him the title of cousin," Pennyboy Junior said.

"I will, if you will have it," Lady Pecunia said.

She kissed Piedmantle and said to him, "Cousin Piedmantle!"

"I love all men of virtue, from my princess to my beggar here, old Canter," Pennyboy Junior said. "On, on to your proof. Whom will you prove to be the next canter?"

"The doctor here," the Canter said. "I will proceed with the learned. When he discourses of dissection, or any point of anatomy, and he tells you of vena cava and of vena porta, the meseraics, and the mesenterium, what does he do but cant?”

Of course, the italicized terms were part of the specialized vocabulary of doctors. Often, specialized terms are necessary: Doctors can use them to communicate much information to other doctors and nurses quickly. Giving such information to a patient takes longer because simpler words must be used. More than once, the writer of this book has been spoken to by a doctor but has had to request, “Can you say that in English, please?”

Almanac was an astrologer as well as a doctor. Two kinds of astrology existed. Natural astrology was concerned with predicting tides, seasons, eclipses, etc. Judicial astrology was concerned with the supposed effect of the planets and the zodiac on human beings.

The Canter began to speak about the cant of astrology: “Or if he run to his judicial astrology, and troll — move his tongue nimbly as he speaks about — the trine, the quartile, and the sextile, platic aspect, and partile, with his hyleg or alchochoden, cusps, and horoscope, doesn’t he cant? Who here can understand him?”

Once again, the Canter mentioned many specialized terms, this time those of astrology. One of his points about cant was that specialized terms can be used to deliberately confuse the audience and make the audience think that something non-scientific is scientific.

“This is no canter, though,” Almanac said about the Canter.

The Canter was making too much sense and criticizing his “betters” too strongly to be a beggar.

Talking about Shunfield’s cant — military jargon — the Canter said, “Or when my muster-master talks about his tactics, and his ranks and files, his bringers-up, his leaders-on, and cries, ‘Faces about to the right hand!’ or ‘The left!’ or cries, ‘Now, as you were!’ and then tells you about redoubts, cats, and cortines, doesn’t he cant?”

“Yes, indeed,” Pennyboy Junior said.

The Canter then talked about Madrigal’s use of the cant of poetry and song, “My egg-chinned — smooth-chinned — laureate here, when he comes forth with dimeters and trimeters, tetrameters, pentameters, hexameters, catalectics, his hyper- and his brachy-catalectics, his Pyrrhics, epitrites, and choriambics, what is all this but canting?”

Madrigal said to the others, “The Canter is a rare fellow!”

Shunfield said, “He is some begging scholar.”

The Canter had a good knowledge of specialized vocabulary, and he did not have a job. Some scholars are like that.

Fitton said, “He is a decayed — down on his luck — doctor, at least!”

“Nay, I do cherish virtue, though in rags,” Pennyboy Junior said.

The Canter said, “And you, Mas’ Courtier —”

Interrupting, Pennyboy Junior said to Fitton, “— now he treats of you. Stand forth to him fair.”

The Canter said, “You use cant with all your fly-blown — corrupt — projects.”

The projects were financial schemes, many of them doomed to fail. Courtiers such as Fitton said that they were able to bring projects to the attention of people who could finance them.

The Canter continued, “You also use look-outs of the politics, and you use your shut faces.”

Courtiers such as Fitton learned court gossip from observers at the court, and when they thought it appropriate, they used shut rather than open faces — they used looks that hid their intentions.

The Canter continued:

“You also use reserved — tried and tested and set aside until you need to use them — questions and answers that you play the game with.

“Such as:

“Is it a clear business? Will it manage well? My name must not be used else. Here, it will dash.”

“Dash” means founder. When a bill was rejected in Parliament, it was said to be dashed. But “dash” can also mean run or rush.

“Or: ‘Your business has received a taint; leave off and give it up. I may not prostitute myself.’

“Or: ‘Tut, tut, that little dust I can blow off at pleasure. Here’s no such mountain, yet, in the whole work that a light purse cannot level — a little money can smooth things over.’

“Or: ‘I will carry through this affair for you — give it freight and passage.’

“Give it freight and passage” means “give me some money.” “Freight and passage” refers to money for passage. In other contexts, the word “freight” can mean “cargo.”

The Canter continued, “You use such mint-phrases — fancy new phrases. This use of language is the worst of canting because of how much it pretends to have the sense it doesn’t have.”

In other words, Fitton's cant pretended to have sense and meaning that it did not actually have. Fitton pretended to help people whom he did not really help.

In contrast, doctors' cant does have sense and meaning, and doctors really can help people.

Fitton said to the others about the Canter, "This is someone who is other than he seems!"

"How do you like him?" Pennyboy Junior asked him.

"This man cannot be a canter!" Fitton said.

"But he is, sir," Pennyboy Junior said, "And he shall be still, and so shall you be, too. We'll all be canters. Now I think about it, noble whimsy's come into my brain. I'll build a college, I and my Pecunia, and I'll call it Canters' College. Does this idea sound well?"

"Excellent!" Almanac said.

Pennyboy Junior said, "And here stands my father rector" — he pointed to the Canter and then to the canters — "and here stand you professors — you shall all profess something, and live there with Her Grace and me, your founders. I'll endow it with lands and means, and Lickfinger shall be my master cook."

He looked around for Lickfinger and said, "What! Has he gone?"

The Canter said, "And Lickfinger shall be a professor."

"Yes, he will," Pennyboy Junior said.

The Canter said, "And he will read and teach Apicius' De re culinaria to your brave doxy and you!"

Apicius was a Roman gourmand. Another Apicius was credited with writing a book about cooking titled De re culinaria.

A doxy is a beggar's mistress. The Canter was referring to Lady Pecunia. In that case, the beggar would be Pennyboy Junior.

Pennyboy Junior said, "You, cousin Fitton, shall, as a courtier, read Aristotle's Politics."

By "read," he meant that Fitton would teach that book at Canters' College.

"Doctor Almanac shall read astrology.

"Shunfield shall read the military arts —"

The Canter interrupted, "— such as carving and assaulting the cold custard."

Horace, the author of Arts Poetica, or the Art of Poetry, was a Roman poet much appreciated by Ben Jonson. Pennyboy Junior was using the name to compliment Madrigal.

Pennyboy Junior continued, "He shall read his lyrics and his madrigals, fine songs which we will have at dinner, steeped in claret, and, in preparation for supper, soused in sack."

Madrigal would teach his own work at Canters' College.

"Truly a divine whimsy!" Madrigal said.

"And a worthy work fit for a chronicle!" Shunfield said.

The Cantors' College would give them a source of income.

“Isn’t it?” Pennyboy Junior said.

“A chronicle to and for all ages,” Shunfield said.

“And Piedmantle shall give us all our coats of arms,” Pennyboy Junior said. “But Picklock, what would you be? You can cant, too.”

“In all the languages in Westminster Hall: Pleas, Bench, or Chancery,” Picklock the lawyer said.

The great hall of Westminster Palace housed the Courts of Common Law (Pleas and Bench) and the Court of Chancery.

Picklock continued with a list of cant terms, especially those relating to property, owners, and tenants, used in these courts:

“Fee-farm, fee-tail, tenant in dower, at will, for term of life, by copy of court roll, knight’s service, homage, fealty, escuage, soccage, or frank almoin, grand sergeanty, or burgage.”

If you, the reader, don’t understand these terms, don’t worry about it. Neither did most of Ben Jonson’s original audience. If the non-lawyers in the audience could understand all these terms, then these terms wouldn’t be cant.

“You appear, Κατ’ ἔξοχὴν — par excellence — a canter,” Pennyboy Junior said. “You shall read all Littleton’s Tenures to me, and indeed all my conveyances.”

Littleton’s Tenures was a treatise on land law.

Picklock asked, “And make all your conveyances, too, sir? Keep all your courts, be steward of your lands, let all your leases, keep your evidences?”

If Picklock were to have all this legal power, and if he were an unscrupulous man, he could arrange things to favor himself and not Pennyboy Junior.

Picklock continued, “But first, I must procure and pass your mortmain. You must have license from above, sir.”

Property held in mortmain could be conveyed only with royal license or permission; such property was controlled by a corporation.

The Canter, who was knowledgeable about legal cant, as he was knowledgeable about so much else, knew that if Picklock could procure and pass a mortmain for Pennyboy Junior, and if he could manipulate Pennyboy Junior into giving him — Picklock — control over Pennyboy Junior’s wealth, he could arrange things to favor himself and not Pennyboy Junior.

Of course, if Picklock were both honest and competent, he could be a good steward of Pennyboy Junior’s wealth.

“Fear not,” Pennyboy Junior said. “Pecunia’s friends shall do it.”

“But I shall stop it,” the Canter said.

The Canter then revealed his true identity. He was not a beggar; instead, he was Pennyboy Junior’s father. He had faked his own death in order to find out how Pennyboy Junior would treat his inherited wealth — and Lady Pecunia.

The Canter — hereafter called Pennyboy Canter — said, “I am Your Worship’s loving and obedient father, your painstaking steward and lost officer, and I have done this to test how you would use pecunia — wealth — and Lady Pecunia when you had her.

“Now that I have seen how you treat her, I will take home the lady to my charge, and these her servants, and leave you my ragged cloak to wear as you travel to Beggars’ Bush!”

Beggars' Bush was a tree that was a notable rendezvous for beggars. "To go to Beggars' Bush" was an idiom meaning "to fall into poverty."

Pennyboy Canter continued, "A seat has been built already, and furnished, too, worth twenty of your imagined structures, Canters' College."

The seat was a place by Beggars' Bush for Pennyboy Junior.

Fitton said to the others, "The Canter is Pennyboy Junior's father!"

"He's alive, I think," Madrigal said.

"I knew he was no rogue!" Almanac said.

Pennyboy Canter said to his son, "You, prodigal, was I so solicitous for you to procure and plot with my learned counsel, Master Picklock, this noble match for you, and do you prostitute her, scatter your mistress' favors, and throw away her bounties as if they were red-burning coals too hot for you to handle, on such rascals who are the scum and excrements of men?"

"If you had sought out good and virtuous persons of these professions, I would have loved you, and I would have loved them — for these shall never have that plea against me or have the opportunity of claiming that I hate their callings — but I do hate their manners and their vices."

Specialized jargon can be used to communicate, or it can be used to deceive. Similarly, people can be good courtiers, soldiers, heralds, almanac-makers (lists of such things as times of tides and seasons can be useful), doctors, and poets — all of these are respectable occupations — or people can be corrupt practitioners of these professions.

Pennyboy Canter continued, "A worthy courtier is the ornament of a king's palace, his great master's honor."

He pointed to Fitton and said, “This is a moth, a rascal, a court-rat that gnaws the commonwealth with broking — unscrupulous — suits and eating grievances!”

He then said, “A true soldier is his country’s strength, his sovereign’s safety, and, to secure his sovereign’s peace, he makes himself the heir of danger, nay, the subject of it, and runs those virtuous hazards and heroic risks that this scarecrow” — he pointed to Shunfield — “cannot endure to hear of.”

“You are pleasant, sir,” Shunfield said.

He meant: You are making jokes.

Pennyboy Canter, however, was deadly serious in his mocking of Shunfield.

Pennyboy Canter replied, “With you I dare to be pleasant!”

Shunfield would not fight him. Shunfield was the type of person who shuns a battlefield.

Pennyboy Canter then pointed to Piedmantle and said, “Here is Piedmantle. Because he’s an ass and I don’t love him, does that mean I don’t love a herald who is the pure preserver of descents, the fair keeper of all nobility, without which all would run into confusion?”

Seeing a bad herald — one who mistakes a coat of arms for true nobility (a virtuous character) and one who makes a pedigree simply in order to suck up to a wealthy person — made Pennyboy Cantor love good heralds all the more.

Despising a bad herald does not mean one despises heraldry and good heralds.

Pennyboy Canter continued, “If Piedmantle were a learned herald, I would tell him that he can give coats of arms and marks of distinction; however, he cannot give honor, no more than money can make one noble — it may give place and rank, but it can give no virtue — and he would thank me for this truth.”

Two kinds of nobility exist: one is based on titles, and the other is based on a virtuous character. Sometimes, the two kinds of nobility can be found in one person, but being given — or buying — a title does not make one noble in the virtuous sense.

A person can be given a medal without having earned it.

Pennyboy Canter pointed to Almanac and said, “This dog-leach, this dog-doctor, you title him ‘Doctor’ — which means ‘learnéd’ — because he can compile an almanac, perhaps erect a scheme — a horoscope — for my great madam’s monkey when it has taken an enema and befouled the ephemerides.”

Ephemerides are books of tables of the positions of celestial bodies at various times. The great madam’s monkey has excreted solid waste on the ephemerides.

Pennyboy Canter continued, “Do I despise a learned physician when I call Almanac a quack?”

If the physician is truly learned, Pennyboy Canter would not call him a quack. But Almanac is not truly learned and so Pennyboy Canter does call him a quack.

Pennyboy Canter then said, “Or do I wither the ever-living garland, always green, of a good poet when I say that the wreath of this man” — he pointed to Madrigal — “is pieced and patched together with dirty, withered flowers?”

“Away!

“I am out of patience with these ulcers — I call you ulcers so that I will not call you something worse. There is no sore or plague but you to infect the times. I abhor your very scent.”

He then said to Lady Pecunia, “Come, lady, since my Prodigal didn’t know how to entertain you according to your worth, I’ll see if I have learned how to receive you with more respect to you and your fair train of attendants here.”

He then said to his son, Pennyboy Junior, “Farewell, my beggar in velvet, for today.”

Normally, a beggar in velvet is a courtier who seeks favor from the king. In this case, Pennyboy Junior was wearing fancy clothing, but he had no money because he now had no inheritance due to his father still being alive.

Pennyboy Cantor was leaving, and he was taking Lady Pecunia with him.

Pennyboy Canter pointed at the patched cloak that he had thrown to the floor and said to his son, “Tomorrow you may put on that grave robe and enter your great work of Canters’ College, your work, and worthy of a chronicle.”

THE FOURTH INTERMEAN: AFTER THE FOURTH ACT (The Staple of News)

“Why, this was the worst of all!” Gossip Tattle said. “The catastrophe!”

The catastrophe is the resolution of the play. Gossip Tattle meant catastasis — an extra complication in the play.

Or perhaps she meant that the conclusion of the last scene was a disaster.

“The play’s content began to be good just now — and he has spoiled it all with his beggar there!” Gossip Censure said.

“He” means Ben Jonson, the playwright of The Staple of News.

“A beggarly jack it is, I warrant him, and akin to the poet,” Gossip Mirth said.

The beggarly jack is Pennyboy Canter, and the poet is Ben Jonson.

“Like enough, for he — the Canter — had the chiefest part in his play, if you pay attention to it,” Gossip Tattle said.

Gossip Expectation said, “Absurdity on him, for a huge overgrown play-maker!”

Ben Jonson was a heavy man.

She continued, “Why should he — the playwright — make him — Pennyboy Junior’s father — live again, when they and we all thought him dead? If he had left him to his rags, there had been an end of him.”

Gossip Tattle said, “Aye, but set a beggar on horseback, he’ll never lin — cease — until he is a-gallop.”

“The young heir grew a fine gentleman in this last act!”
Gossip Censure said.

“So he did, Gossip Censure, and kept the best company,”
Gossip Expectation said.

“And feasted them and his mistress!” Gossip Censure said.

“And showed her to them all! He was not jealous —” Gossip
Tattle said.

Gossip Mirth interrupted, “— but very communicative and liberal and generous, and began to be magnificent, if the churl his father would have let him alone.”

Certainly, Pennyboy Junior has been generous, but sometimes he has been generous to the wrong people — such as the jeerers, who were happy to eat his food but called him a shot-clog.

And certainly, he has not been jealous. He has allowed many people to kiss Lady Pecunia. Indeed, he has encouraged them to kiss Lady Pecunia.

Of course, other people may object that Pennyboy Junior had allowed unworthy people to kiss Lady Pecunia.

Money may at times be a whore, but we ought not to encourage such whoredom.

Gossip Censure said, “It was spitefully done of the poet to make the chuff — the churl — take him off in his height, when he was going to do all his brave deeds!”

The poet is Ben Jonson. The chuff — a mean-spirited person — is Pennyboy Canter, according to Gossip Censure. The man in his height, about to do all his brave deeds, is Pennyboy Junior.

“To found an academy!” Gossip Expectation said.

“Erect a college!” Gossip Tattle said.

“Plant his professors and water his lectures —” Gossip Expectation said.

“— with wine, gossips, as he meant to do; and then to defraud his purposes —” Gossip Mirth interrupted.

“— kill the hopes of so many towardly — promising — young spirits —” Gossip Expectation interrupted.

“As the doctor’s —” Madam Tattle interrupted.

Madam Censure interrupted, “— and the courtier’s! I say, I was in love with Master Fitton. He did wear all he had, from the hat-band to the shoe-tie, so fashionably, and would stoop and look invitingly —”

Both hat-bands and shoe-ties could be ostentatious in this society.

“— and lie so, in wait for a piece of wit, like a mousetrap!” Gossip Mirth said.

“Lie” can mean 1) lie in wait, or 2) lie in one’s throat.

“Indeed, Gossip Mirth, so would the little doctor. All his behavior was only glister!” Gossip Expectation said.

“Glister” can mean 1) luster, or 2) enema.

She continued, “On my conscience, he would make any party’s physic in the world work with his discourse.”

Con men, including quacks, are often good with language. It is true, however, that a good bedside manner is helpful to patients and it is true that good doctors cultivate a good bedside manner.

Gossip Mirth said, “I wonder they would suffer it, a foolish old fornicating father — Pennyboy Canter — to ravish away his son’s mistress —”

“— and all her serving-women at once, as he did!” Madam Censure said.

“I would have flown in his gypsy’s — rogue’s — face, in faith,” Gossip Tattle said.

“To fly at someone” means “to attack that person.”

“It was a plain piece of political incest, and worthy to be brought before the high commission of wit,” Gossip Mirth said.

The political incest was Pennyboy Canter’s taking Lady Pecunia away from his son: Pennyboy Junior.

“The high commission of wit” is the four gossips.

“The high commission of wit” is also you — the reader of this book. It’s a compliment — when it’s not sarcastic.

All of you will have to decide whether Pennyboy Canter is justified in taking Lady Pecunia away from Pennyboy Junior.

“Suppose we were to censure Pennyboy Canter,” Gossip Mirth said. “You are the youngest voice, Gossip Tattle, so you begin.”

“By the Virgin Mary, I would have the old cony-catcher — trickster — cheated of all he has, in the young heir’s defense, by his learned counsel, Master Picklock,” Gossip Tattle said.

“I would rather the courtier had found out some trick to beg him from his estate,” Gossip Censure said.

The courtier Fitton could falsely inform on Pennyboy Canter and beg the king for Pennyboy Canter’s lands and property.

For example, Fitton could lie and say that Pennyboy Canter had spoken treasonous words and then ask the king to give him Pennyboy Canter's lands and property as a reward.

"Or the captain had courage enough to beat him," Gossip Expectation said.

"Or the fine madrigal-man, in rhyme, to have run him out of the country like an Irish rat," Gossip Censure said.

Some Irish believed that bards could kill rats or drive them away with rhymed incantations.

Gossip Tattle said, "No, I would have Master Piedmantle, Her Grace's herald, pluck down Pennyboy Canter's hatchments, reverse — turn upside down — his coat-armor, and nullify him for no gentleman."

Gossip Tattle was describing the ceremony of degradation.

Hatchments are escutcheons or ensigns armorial. They often showed the coat of arms of a deceased person. Since Pennyboy Canter was not deceased, Piedmantle might take away his hatchments.

Coat-armor was a coat of arms depicted on an outer coat and worn over armor. Coat-armor could also be displayed on vests or shields.

Piedmantle would degrade Pennyboy Canter's social status and make him no longer a gentleman and no longer entitled to a coat of arms.

Gossip Expectation said, "Nay, then let Master Doctor dissect him, have him opened, and his tripes taken to Lickfinger, to make a probation dish — a test of cookery — of."

"Agreed!" Gossip Censure said.

"Agreed!" Gossip Tattle said.

Gossip Mirth said, “By my faith, I would have him flat — completely — disinherited by a decree of court, bound to make restitution of the Lady Pecunia, and the use of her body to his son.”

“And the use of the bodies of her train of attendants given to the gentlemen,” Gossip Expectation said.

“And both the poet and himself — Ben Jonson and Pennyboy Canter — to ask them all forgiveness —” Gossip Censure said.

“And us, too —” Gossip Tattle interrupted.

“— in two large sheets of paper —” Gossip Censure interrupted.

Ben Jonson and Pennyboy Canter would each write their apology on a separate sheet of paper.

“Or to stand in the pillory wearing a piece of parchment, which the court please —” Gossip Expectation interrupted.

The pillory was a form of punishment. An offender’s head and hands would be placed in holes in boards called stocks that would limit their movement. The stocks were placed on a pole so that the offender would be standing.

Gossip Censure interrupted, “And those filled with news —”

The parchment Ben Jonson and Pennyboy Canter would wear could list their crimes — that is the news Gossip Censure was referring to.

Gossip Mirth interrupted, “— and dedicated to the sustaining of the Staple —”

Gossip Expectation interrupted, “— which their poet has let fall, most abruptly.”

Ben Jonson hadn't written much about the Staple of News Office in the last few scenes.

"Bankruptly, indeed!" Gossip Mirth said.

"You say wittily, Gossip Mirth, and therefore let a protest go out against him —" Gossip Censure said.

"A mournival of protests, or a gleek at least —" Gossip Mirth interrupted.

A mournival is four aces, four kings, four queens, four jacks, or four of anything. A gleek is 1) three aces, three kings, three queens, three jacks, or three of anything, or 2) an insult.

Three of the gossips had been doing a lot of talking recently, but Gossip Tattle had been relatively quiet.

"In all our names —" Gossip Expectation said.

"As a decayed wit —" Gossip Censure interrupted.

"Broken —" Gossip Expectation interrupted.

"Non-solvent —" Gossip Tattle interrupted.

"And forever forfeit —" Gossip Censure interrupted.

Gossip Mirth interrupted, "— to scorn of Mirth!"

Gossip Censure said, "— to scorn of Censure!"

Gossip Expectation said, "— to scorn of Expectation!"

Gossip Tattle said, "Subsigned, Tattle."

All were agreed that they would condemn Ben Jonson. As a playwright, he should have provided a good play with The Staple of News. In the opinion of the four gossips, he had not done that, and so they would scorn him because he had forfeited the good name of poet.

Gossip Tattle said, "Wait, the actors are coming again."

ACT 5 (The Staple of News)

— 5.1 —

Alone, Pennyboy Junior was wearing the patched cloak that his father had left him.

Pointing to his clothing, he said to himself, “Nay, they fit as if they had been made for me, and I am now a thing worth looking at, just as I said I would be in the morning.

“No rogue at a comitia — assembly — of the canters did ever there become his parent’s robes better than I do these. I am a great fool and beggar!

“Why don’t all who are of those societies come forth and welcome me as one of theirs? I think I should be, on every side, saluted as the Dauphin — Prince — of Beggars! The Prince of Prodigals!

“I, who have so fallen under the ears and eyes and tongues of all, have become the cautionary fable of the time, the subject matter of scorn, and the object of reprehension!

“I now begin to see my vanity shine in this glass, reflected by the foil.”

The glass, aka mirror, was the ragged cloak he was wearing on his shoulders. The foil, or contrasting element, was the extravagant clothing he was still wearing under the ragged cloak.

Pennyboy Junior continued, “Where are my fashioner, my feather-man, my linener, perfumer, barber, all that tail of rioters who followed me this morning?

“Not one is here! But there is a dark solitude about me worthy my cloak and patches, as if I had the epidemical disease upon me, and I’ll sit down with it.”

The epidemical disease was the plague, which London was still recovering from.

He sat on the ground.

Thomas Barber entered the scene and said, “My master! My maker!”

Pennyboy Junior was Thomas Barber’s maker in that he had paid for his position as clerk at the Staple of News Office.

“How are you?” Thomas Barber asked. “Why do you sit thus on the ground, sir? Have you heard the news?”

“No, nor do I care to hear any,” Pennyboy Junior said. “I wish I could sit here always, and let slip away the next one-and-twenty years, if that would result in having this day forgotten, and the day razed — scraped — out and destroyed, expunged from every ephemerides or almanac!

“Or, if it must stay in existence because time and nature have decreed it, still, then let it be a day of tricking prodigals as if tickling fish about the gills to catch them.

“Let it be a day of deluding gaping — open-mouthed — heirs, setting loose their loves and their discretions.

“Let it be a day of falling from the favors of their best friends and parents, falling from their own hopes, and entering the society of canters!”

“A doleful day it is, and dismal times have come upon us,” Thomas Barber said. “I am completely undone and ruined.”

“How, Tom?” Pennyboy Junior asked.

“Why, broke! Broke! Wretchedly broke!” Thomas Barber answered.

“What?” Pennyboy Junior said, not understanding.

“Our Staple of News Office is all to pieces,” Thomas Barber said. “It is quite dissolved!”

“What?” Pennyboy Junior said, still not understanding.

“It is shivered as if it had been in an earthquake!” Thomas Barber said. “Haven’t you heard the crack and ruins? We are all blown up!”

“As soon as they heard that the Infanta was taken away from them, whom they had so devoured in their hopes for Lady Pecunia to be their patroness and sojourn with them, our emissaries, register, and examiner flew into vapor; our grave governor Cymbal flew into a subtler air, and he has returned, we hear, to again be the grand captain of the jeerers.”

Cymbal’s true nature had been revealed: He was the chief of the jeerers and he, along with the other jeerers, had hoped to gain wealth from Lady Pecunia.

Thomas Barber continued:

“I and my fellow melted into butter and spoiled our ink, and so the News Office vanished.

“The last hum — buzz of gossip and news — that it made was that your father and Picklock, the man of law, have quarreled.”

Pennyboy Junior said, “What!”

He stood up and said, “This awakens me from my lethargy.”

Thomas Barber said, “And a great lawsuit is likely to be made between them.

“Picklock denies that the feoffment, aka the endowment, that your father made of the whole estate to him is a trust.

“Your father says that he did this action as a trust in the event of his death when he first laid this recent device — plan and plot — to test you.”

As part of his test of his son, Pennyboy Canter had signed over his assets to Picklock. According to Pennyboy Canter, the document was a trust: Picklock would hold the estate in trust and would deliver it to Pennyboy Junior in the event of Pennyboy Canter’s death. Pennyboy Canter meant for the trust to be revocable — he wanted it to last only as long as he was testing his son.

Picklock, however, was saying that the document was an absolute deed — Pennyboy Canter had given his estate away to Picklock with no conditions. If it was in fact not a trust and was in fact an absolute deed, then Picklock has and had no responsibility to do anything whatsoever for Pennyboy Junior.

“Has Picklock then a trust?” Pennyboy Junior asked.

“I cannot tell what the truth is,” Thomas Barber said.

So far, it was one person’s word against the other person’s word: Pennyboy Canter says this, and Picklock says that.

A close examination of the document by a court of law might determine the truth.

Thomas Barber saw Picklock coming and said, “Here comes the worshipful —”

Pennyboy Junior motioned for Thomas Barber to hide himself behind an arras: a wall hanging in front of an alcove. Thomas Barber did so.

Picklock entered the room and said, “What? My velvet — foppish — heir, turned beggar in mind, as in robes?”

Some of Pennyboy Junior's fancy clothing was made of velvet.

"You see what case — condition and clothing — your and my father's plots have brought me to," Pennyboy Junior said.

"Your father's, you may say, indeed, but not mine," Picklock said. "He's a hard-hearted gentleman! I am sorry to see his rigid resolution.

"That any man should so put off affection and human nature, to destroy his own, and triumph in a victory so cruel!

"Your father has quarreled with me because I am your follower and serve you, and he calls me a knave and a traitor to his trust. He says that he will have me disbarred —"

Pennyboy Junior interrupted, "— have you deserved it?"

"Oh, good heaven knows my conscience and the silly — innocent — latitude of it!" Picklock said.

Good heaven does indeed know our conscience and whether it is good or bad.

He continued, "I am a narrow-minded man, and my thoughts dwell all in a lane or line indeed, with no turning or scarce obliquity in them. I still look right forward to the intent and scope of that which he would go from now."

As a narrow-minded man, Picklock's mind is narrowly focused on one thing. His mind makes the lane to that one thing straight as well as narrow. He will not take side trips that lead him away from that one thing. What that one thing is he does not say, and he does not say whether pursuing that one thing is ethical or unethical.

Picklock does say that there is no scarce obliquity in his thoughts. "Obliquity" means deviance from moral conduct.

If there is no scarce obliquity in his thoughts, there may be abundant obliquity in his thoughts.

“Had you a trust, then?” Pennyboy Junior said.

Picklock answered, “Sir, I had something that will keep you still lord of all the estate, if I am honest — as I hope I shall be.”

One kind of trust is a document giving someone assets to hold in trust for someone else. Another kind of trust is to trust someone.

If you trust someone, you believe that person to be trustworthy and responsible, including morally responsible.

If Picklock had a trust and if he were honest, that might keep Pennyboy Junior lord of the estate. (If nothing else, Pennyboy Junior would eventually inherit the estate.)

Pennyboy Canter, however, could argue that the trust was revocable and that he was revoking it. Picklock would presumably argue that the trust (if it were not an absolute deed giving all of Pennyboy Canter’s wealth to Picklock) was irrevocable.

But Picklock says that he hopes he shall be honest. Referring to appearance, being honest means looking respectable, decent, and presentable. If Picklock had a trust, that could keep Pennyboy Junior lord of the estate. But Picklock could then manipulate Pennyboy Junior into giving him control of the estate. (Or he could say that the document was an irrevocable trust in which he would have control of the wealth until Pennyboy Cantor’s death.) Picklock would then use the estate for his own benefit, including using it to buy fine clothing that would make him look respectable, decent, and presentable.

Picklock continued, “My tender scrupulous breast will not permit me to see the heir defrauded and, like an alien, thrust out of the blood. The laws forbid that I should give consent to such a civil — legal — slaughter of a son!”

“Where is the deed?” Pennyboy Junior asked. “Do you have it with you?”

“No,” Picklock said. “It is a thing of greater consequence than to be borne about in a black box like a Low-Country Verlof or Welsh legal brief.”

Verlof is a leave of absence or furlough. The Welsh had a reputation for being litigious.

Legal documents were sometimes carried in a black box. But this was a very important legal document.

Picklock continued, “It is at Lickfinger’s, under lock and key.”

“Oh, fetch it here,” Pennyboy Junior said.

“I have told him to bring it so that you might see it,” Picklock said.

Pennyboy Junior thought and then asked, “Does he know what he is bringing?”

“No more than a gardener’s ass knows what roots it carries,” Picklock answered.

Pennyboy Junior thought and then said, “I was going to send my father, like an ass, a penitent letter, but I am glad I did not, now.”

“Hang him!” Picklock said. “He is an austere and sour grape that has no juice but what is verjuice in him.”

Verjuice is the juice of unripe grapes. It is used in cooking.

Pennyboy Junior thought and then said, "I'll show you my letter."

He left the room.

Alone, Picklock said to himself, "Show me a defiance — a challenge! If I can now get father and son to legally fight each other, make my profits out of both, commence a lawsuit with the old man for his whole estate, and go to law with the son's credit, undo and ruin both (both with their own money), it would be a masterpiece of chicanery worthy my lawyer's nightcap — white skull-cap — and the lawyer's gown I wear. It would be Picklock's name in law — that is, worthy of the name of Picklock."

Picklock's true nature has been revealed: He is an unscrupulous lawyer who is willing and eager to seize the wealth of Pennyboy Canter and Pennyboy Junior.

He then called Pennyboy Junior, "Where are you, sir? What is taking you so long?"

Pennyboy Junior returned and said, "I cannot find where I have laid the penitent letter, but I have laid it somewhere safe."

"It doesn't matter, sir," Picklock said. "Trust yourself to my trust. It is that which shall secure you, an absolute deed!"

The absolute deed was the trust Picklock wanted Pennyboy Junior to have in him: Trust Picklock absolutely, and certainly you will have control of the estate.

Picklock continued, "And I confess, it was in trust for you lest anything mortal might have happened to him."

He was admitting that the document was a deed of trust, not an absolute deed.

Picklock continued:

“But there must be a gratuity — a fee — thought on, and aid, sir, for the expenses, which will be great, of the lawsuit against such a mighty man as is your father, and a man possessed of so much land, Lady Pecunia, and her friends.

“I am not able to wage law and go to law against him, yet I must maintain the thing as my own right, always for your good, and therefore must be bold to use your credit to raise money.”

Picklock would be using Pennyboy Junior’s money — borrowed with Pennyboy Junior’s credit — to pursue the lawsuit against Pennyboy Canter. It takes money to wage law.

Picklock claimed that the lawsuit would be for the benefit of Pennyboy Junior, but actually it would be for the benefit of Picklock, who would be serving his own ends, including trying to enrich himself.

The lawsuit might be Picklock versus Pennyboy Canter, in which case Picklock would be saying that the document was an absolute deed giving all of Pennyboy Canter’s wealth to Picklock. In that case, Picklock would be saying — actually, lying — that he would give the wealth to Pennyboy Junior.

Or the lawsuit might be Pennyboy Junior versus Pennyboy Canter, in which case Picklock would be saying that the document was an irrevocable trust in which he would have control of the wealth until Pennyboy Cantor’s death.

Of course, Picklock would prefer to have the document regarded as an absolute deed, but he would benefit if it were an irrevocable trust.

Since Picklock had said, “I must maintain the thing as my own right,” the lawsuit would be Picklock versus Pennyboy Canter. The other lawsuit could be used, if needed.

Pennyboy Junior said, “Do what you will, so long as we are safe, and the trust will bear it.”

“Fear not,” Picklock said. “It is he who must pay arrearages — the debts — in the end. We’ll milk him and Pecunia and draw their cream down before he gets the deed into his hands. My name is Picklock, but he’ll find me a padlock.”

Of course, if Pennyboy Canter were to get the legal document in his hands, it would be Game Over. No legal document, no lawsuit to argue over the document.

— 5.2 —

Pennyboy Canter entered the scene and said to his son, “What are you doing now? Conferring with your learned counsel about the cheat? Are you part of the plot to cheat me?”

“What plot?” Pennyboy Junior asked.

“Your counsel there, Master Picklock, knows,” Pennyboy Canter said.

He then asked Picklock, “Will you restore the trust yet?”

He wanted Picklock to give him the deed of trust, thereby revoking it.

Picklock replied:

“Sir, be patient and search your memory, and think to yourself: What trust? Where does it appear?”

“I have your deed. Does your deed specify any trust? Isn’t it a perfect and completed act, and absolute in law, sealed and delivered before witnesses, the day and date emergent?”

“Emergent” means “unspecified.” Picklock was denying that Pennyboy Canter had specified a day and date to deliver the estate to his son; however, that date was upon Pennyboy Canter's death. When Pennyboy Canter died, his entire estate was supposed to be given to his son: Pennyboy Junior.

Pennyboy Canter said, "But what about the conversation we had? What about the oaths and vows that preceded the deed?"

"I will tell you, sir, since I am urged to tell you," Picklock said. "As I remember, you told me you had got a grown — huge — estate by griping and grasping means, sinisterly and dishonestly —"

Shocked, Pennyboy Canter said, "What!"

Picklock continued, "— and you were quite weary of your estate. If the parties lived from whom you had wrested it —"

Shocked, Pennyboy Canter said again, "What!"

It sounded as if Picklock were saying that Pennyboy Canter had caused deaths in acquiring his estate.

Picklock continued, "— you could be glad to part with all and give it back to them, for the satisfaction of your conscience. But since they'd yielded to humanity and had died, and since just heaven had sent you, for a punishment — you did acknowledge it — this riotous heir who would bring all to beggary in the end, and daily sowed consumption wherever he went —"

"You'd cheat both of us, then?" Pennyboy Canter said. "You'd cheat your confederate, my son, too?"

Picklock continued, "After a long, mature deliberation, you could not think where better how to place it —"

Pennyboy Canter interrupted, "— than on you, rascal?"

Picklock replied, "Use whatever name you please in your passionate anger, but with the return of your reason, you will come around and think that I am a faithful and a frugal friend to be preferred.”

“Preferred before a son?” Pennyboy Canter said.

Normally, in this society fathers left their property to their sons.

“He is a prodigal, a tub without a bottom, as you termed him,” Picklock said.

A proverb stated, “Every tub must stand on its own bottom.”

He continued, “For which I might return you a vow or two and seal it with an oath of thankfulness. I do not repent it, neither have I cause, yet —”

He might give a vow to and thank Pennyboy Canter for the estate, but he did not repent Pennyboy Canter’s giving the estate to him. The vow could be to do something for Pennyboy Canter’s son.

Pennyboy Canter said, “Forehead of steel and mouth of brass!”

He was saying that Picklock had a forehead that was incapable of blushing for shame and a mouth that was capable of saying anything.

Pennyboy Canter continued, “Has impudence polished so gross a lie, and dare you vent it? You engine, composed of all mixed — impure — metals! Get away from here! I will not exchange one syllable more with you until I may meet you at a bar in court before your judges.”

Pennyboy Junior’s porter arrived. Pennyboy Junior talked to him quietly and received a document and some keys from him. Picklock, who was busy talking to Pennyboy Canter, did not see this.

Picklock said to Pennyboy Canter, “To a court of law it must come before I part with it — your wealth to you, or” — he looked at Pennyboy Junior — “you, sir.”

“I will not listen to you anymore,” Pennyboy Canter said.

His son said to him, “Sir, listen to me, though. Not simply because I see through his intricate and tangled plots and hidden ends, nor simply because my parts — my shares in the estate — depend upon the unwinding of this so knotted skein, do I ask for your patience. To me he has confessed the trust.”

Earlier, Picklock had said to Pennyboy Junior, “And I confess, it was in trust for you lest anything mortal might have happened to him.”

But now Picklock denied saying that: “What? I confess it?”

“Aye, you did, you false man,” Pennyboy Junior said.

“Stand up to him and confront him,” Pennyboy Canter said to his son.

Picklock asked, “Where? When? To whom?”

“To me, just now, and here,” Pennyboy Junior said. “Can you deny it?”

“Can I eat or drink, sleep, wake, or dream, arise, sit, walk, or stand, do anything that’s natural?” Picklock said.

Yes, he could deny it. To him, lying came naturally.

“Yes, you lie,” Pennyboy Junior said. “It seems you can lie and perjure yourself — that is natural!”

“Oh, me!” Picklock said. “What times are these, of frontless carriage — of shameless conduct! An egg of the same nest! The father’s bird! It runs in a blood — a family — I see.”

Cicero once said, “O, tempora! O, mores!” This means, “Oh, the times! Oh, the customs!” It is an expression of despair at how bad the times have become.

“I’ll shut your mouth,” Pennyboy Junior said.

“With what?” Picklock asked.

“With truth,” Pennyboy Junior answered.

“With noise,” Picklock said. “I must have testimony before I shut my mouth. Where is your witness? Can you produce a witness?”

“As if my testimony were not twenty witnesses, compared with your testimony,” Pennyboy Junior said.

“So say all prodigals, sick of self-love, but that’s not law, young Scattergood,” Picklock said. “I live by law.”

“Scattergood” is a name for prodigals.

“I live by law” can mean 1) I live in accordance with the law, or 2) I make my living through law.

Pennyboy Junior said, “Why, if you have a conscience, that is a thousand witnesses.”

A proverb stated, “Conscience is a thousand witnesses.”

Picklock said, “No court grants out a writ of summons for the conscience that I know, nor a subpoena, nor an arrest warrant. I must have witness testimony, and of your producing, before this can come to a hearing, and it must be heard on oath and witness.”

Pennyboy Junior said, “Come forth, Tom.”

Thomas Barber, a witness who had heard Picklock say to Pennyboy Junior, “And I confess, it was in trust for you lest anything mortal might have happened to him,” came from the alcove behind the arras.

Pennyboy Junior said to him, “Speak what you heard, the truth, and the whole truth, and nothing but the truth. What did this varlet say?”

“A rat behind the hangings!” Picklock said, seeing Thomas Barber.

Readers will remember the scene in William Shakespeare’s Hamlet (Act 3, Scene 4) in which Hamlet kills Polonius, who is behind an arras. Hamlet says, “How now, a rat!” and then stabs him.

Thomas Barber said, “Sir, he said it was a trust, an act the which your father had will to alter, but his tender breast would not permit him to see the heir defrauded and, like an alien, thrust out of the blood — the laws forbid that he should give consent to such a civil slaughter of a son!”

Pennyboy Junior said, “And he talked of a gratuity to be given, and aid to the charges of the lawsuit, which he was to maintain in his own name, but for my benefit, he said.”

The lawsuit would be Picklock versus Pennyboy Canter.

“It is enough,” Pennyboy Canter said.

Thomas Barber said, “And he said that he would milk Pecunia and draw down her cream before you got the trust again.”

Pennyboy Canter said to Picklock, “Your ears are in my pocket, knave; go shake them the little while longer you will have them.”

Cropping a person’s ears was sometimes a legal punishment. Pennyboy Canter was telling Picklock that he would put Picklock’s ears in his pocket after they were cut off.

“You do trust to your great purse,” Picklock said.

He was saying — that is, lying — that Pennyboy Canter had bribed Thomas Barber to be his witness.

Pennyboy Canter said, “I have you in a purse-net, good Master Picklock, with your worming brain and wriggling engine-head — snare — of maintenance, which I shall see you hole with very shortly — a fine round head, when those two lugs — ears — are off, to trundle — roll — through a pillory.”

Purse-nets were nets in the shape of a bag used to catch rabbits.

According to the Oxford English Dictionary, “maintenance” means “wrongfully aiding and abetting litigation.”

Picklock would end up in a pillory with his earless head trapped in the hole made by a pair of stocks.

Pennyboy Canter asked Thomas Barber, “You are sure that you heard him speak this?”

Pennyboy Junior answered for Thomas Barber, “Aye, and more.”

“Much more!” Thomas Barber said.

Picklock said, “I’ll prove that your lawsuit against me is maintenance and conspiracy, and sue you all.”

“Do, do, my gowned vulture,” Pennyboy Junior said. “Crop in reversion.”

A gowned vulture is one way to describe a lawyer.

By “crop in reversion,” Pennyboy Canter meant “crop my and my son’s ears,” with “if you can” implied.

Pennyboy Canter continued, “I shall see you quoited — thrown — over the bar, as bargemen do their billets.”

In a game of quoits, players threw rings of iron, rope, rubber, etc., at a target.

Bargemen threw their cargo — billets, aka wood cut for fuel — on the quay, aka dock.

Picklock said, “This it is when men repent of their good deeds and would have them in again.”

Picklock was saying that Pennyboy Canter’s good deed was giving his estate to Picklock — an estate that Picklock said that Pennyboy Canter had gotten immorally.

He continued, “They are almost mad, but I forgive their lucida intervalla.”

Picklock was planning a defense in which he claimed that Pennyboy Canter and Pennyboy Junior were mentally incompetent. Of course, he would claim that Pennyboy Canter was having a lucida intervalla — a period of mental competence — when he signed what Picklock claimed was an absolute deed giving his estate to Picklock.

Although Pennyboy Canter had a witness in Thomas Barber, Picklock believed that he had an ace up his sleeve — the document that Pennyboy Canter had signed.

Seeing Lickfinger enter the room, Picklock called to him, “Oh, Lickfinger! Come here.”

He then asked him quietly, “Where’s my writing?”

The writing was the document that Pennyboy Canter had signed.

Pennyboy Canter and Pennyboy Junior, who was holding a document and some keys that he had gotten from his porter earlier but had kept hidden, also talked together quietly at a distance from Picklock and Lickfinger.

— 5.3 —

Lickfinger replied, “I sent it to you, together with your keys.”

“What!” Picklock said.

Lickfinger said, “By the porter who came for it, from you —”

Seeing the worried expression on Picklock’s face — Picklock had not received the document — Lickfinger added, “— and by the warrant of the token you had given me, the keys —”

The keys were Picklock’s keys, which had been used to lock up the document. Picklock had sent a porter to tell Lickfinger to bring him the document, and he had sent his keys so that Lickfinger could open the container and get the document and bring it to him. The keys were a token showing that the request really came from Picklock.

Lickfinger then finished his original sentence, “— and the porter bade me bring it.”

“And why didn’t you?” Picklock asked.

He had not received the document.

Lickfinger asked, “Why did you send a countermand?”

The countermand was a command revoking a previous command. The first command was for Lickfinger himself to bring the document to Picklock.

“Who, I?” Picklock asked.

“You, or some other you whom you put in trust,” Lickfinger said.

“In trust?” Picklock said.

“Your trust’s another self, you know,” Lickfinger said. “And without trust, and your trust, how should he take notice of your keys or of my charge?”

Actually, Pennyboy Junior had sent his porter to Lickfinger to get the document. (This is a second porter, not the porter whom Picklock had sent.) When Pennyboy Junior had told Picklock that he was going to get the letter he had written asking his father for forgiveness, he had actually been sending the porter to Lickfinger to get the document, which Picklock had said had been locked up. Thus, Pennyboy Junior knew about Picklock’s keys, which Picklock must have given to Lickfinger so that he could get the document. Pennyboy Junior had told his porter about Picklock’s keys. The second porter’s knowledge of the keys and the document had convinced Lickfinger that the second porter had really come from Picklock.

As Picklock and Lickfinger had talked, Pennyboy Junior had revealed to his father his plot of sending for the document by the porter, and that he was in possession of the deed and Picklock’s keys. Now Pennyboy Junior and Pennyboy Canter listened to Picklock and Lickfinger talk.

Picklock asked, “Did you know the man?”

Lickfinger replied, “I know he was a porter — and a sealed porter, for he bore the badge on his breast, I am sure.”

A sealed porter is a member of the Company of Porters. Their members wore a distinctive badge.

“I am lost! A plot! I scent it!” Picklock said.

“Why, and I sent it by the man you sent, whom else I would not have trusted,” Lickfinger said.

“A plague on your trust!” Picklock said. “I am trussed up among you.”

“Trussed up” means “ensnared.”

Pennyboy Junior, “Or you may be.”

Pennyboy Junior meant that Picklock could be trussed up in a noose on a gallows.

“In my own halter,” Picklock said. “I have made the noose.”

A halter is a noose.

Picklock exited.

“What was it, Lickfinger?” Pennyboy Junior asked.

“A document, sir,” Lickfinger said. “He sent for it by a token. I was bringing it, but then he sent a porter, and the porter seemed to be a man of decent carriage.”

Porters tend to be men of good carriage; their job is to carry things such as luggage.

“It was good fortune!” Pennyboy Canter said. “To cheat the cheater was no cheat, but justice.”

He then said to his son, “Take off your rags and be yourself again. This act of piety and good affection has partly reconciled me to you.”

Pennyboy Junior, who wanted to be fully reconciled to his father, began, “Sir —”

His father interrupted, “No vows, no promises. Too much protestation often makes suspected that which we would use to persuade.”

In Shakespeare's Hamlet, Queen Gertrude said, "The lady doth protest too much, methinks" (Act 3, Scene 2). In other words, she thought that the lady was objecting so much that she was losing credibility.

A proverb stated, "Too much protesting makes the truth suspected."

"Have you heard the news?" Lickfinger asked.

"The Staple of News Office is down," Pennyboy Junior said. "How should we have heard it?"

"But the news about your uncle?" Lickfinger asked.

Because the news was about his uncle, someone could have brought Pennyboy Junior the news.

"No," Pennyboy Junior said.

"He's run mad, sir," Lickfinger said.

Startled, Pennyboy Canter asked, "What, Lickfinger!"

"Your brother is stark staring mad," Lickfinger said. "He has almost killed his serving-maid —"

"Now, heaven forbid!" Pennyboy Canter said.

Lickfinger said, "He would have succeeded except that she's cat-lived and squirrel-limbed. He threw bed-staves at her."

Cats are supposed to have nine lives.

Bed-staves are short wooden sticks; they were used to support a mattress.

Lickfinger continued, "He has set wide his outer doors, and now keeps open house for all the passersby to see his justice.

"First, he has arrested his two dogs because he suspects them of being participants in the plot to cheat him, and there he sits like an old worm of the peace, wrapped up in furs, at a square table, interrogating, examining, and committing the poor curs to two old cases of close-stools” — these are boxes that used to contain a chamber-pot — “as prisons, the one of which he calls his Lollard’s tower, and the other his Block-house, because his two dogs’ names are Block and Lollard.”

Lollard’s Tower was a prison for religious heretics; “block-house” was a slang term for a prison.

“This would be splendid content for the jeerers,” Pennyboy Junior said.

“Aye, if the subject were not so wretched,” Pennyboy Canter said.

“Sure, I met them all, I think, upon that quest,” Lickfinger said.

He had met the jeerers going to Pennyboy Senior’s house to jeer at him. The jeerers thought that wretchedness was funny.

“Indeed, likely enough,” Pennyboy Canter said. “The vicious always are swift to show their natures. I’ll go there, too, but with another aim, if all succeed well and my simples work.”

Simples are medicines that have a single ingredient.

Pennyboy Canter’s aim, aka goal, was to restore his brother to health.

They exited in order to go to Pennyboy Senior’s house.

— 5.4 —

In a room of his house, Pennyboy Senior sat at his table with papers before him.

A porter entered the room and Pennyboy Senior asked him, "Where are the prisoners?"

"They are forthcoming, sir," the porter answered, "or coming forth, at least."

Pennyboy Senior said to himself, "The rogue has gotten drunk since I committed the prisoners to his charge."

He then said out loud, "Come here — near me. Yet nearer; breathe upon me."

The porter came near him, and Pennyboy Senior sniffed and said, "I smell wine! Wine, on my honor! Sack, canary sack!"

Canary sack is a sweet wine from the Canary Islands.

He asked the porter, "Couldn't your badge have been drunk with fulsome ale or beer, the porter's element? But sack!"

Ale and beer were cheaper than wine.

"I am not drunk," the porter said. "We had, sir, just one pint, an honest carrier and myself."

"Who paid for it?" Pennyboy Senior asked.

"Sir, I gave it to him," the porter answered.

"What?" Pennyboy Senior said. "And spend sixpence? A frock spend sixpence! Sixpence!"

A frock is a loose garment worn by workmen; it is often called a frock-smock.

As a miser, Pennyboy Senior was outraged that a porter would spend sixpence.

"Once in a year, sir," the porter replied.

"In seven years, varlet!" Pennyboy Senior said.

In seven years at 10 percent interest per year, the interest would roughly equal the principal.

Pennyboy Senior continued, “Do you know what you have done? Do you know what a consumption you have made of an estate? It might please heaven to let you, a healthy and young knave, live some seventy years longer, until you are fourscore-and-ten, perhaps a hundred — say, seventy years. How many times seven in seventy? Why, seven times ten is ten times seven.

“Pay attention to me, I will demonstrate to you on my fingers.

“Sixpence in seven years (because of use upon use, aka compound interest) grows in that first seven-year period to be a twelpence.”

A shilling is twelpence. It is one-twentieth of a pound.

Pennyboy Senior continued, “That, in the next seven-year period, grows to two shillings.

“In the third seven-year period, it grows to four shillings.

“In the fourth seven-year period, it grows to eight shillings.

“In the fifth seven-year period, it grows to sixteen shillings.

“In the sixth seven-year period, it grows to thirty-two shillings, aka one pound and twelve shillings.

“In the seventh seven-year period, it grows to three pounds and four shillings.

“In the eighth seven-year period, it grows to six pounds and eight shillings.

“In the ninth seven-year period, it grows to twelve pounds and sixteen shillings.

“And in the tenth seven-year period, it grows to five-and-twenty pounds and twelve shillings.

“This money you have fallen from and have lost out on, because of your riotous living, should you live seventy years, by spending sixpence once at the beginning of the first seven-year period.

“But in a single day to waste it! There is a sum that number cannot reach!

“Get out of my house, you pest of prodigality! Seed of consumption, get away from here! A wicked jailor is often worse than the prisoners.”

He gave the porter some money and said, “There’s your penny: four tokens for you. Out, away!”

A token is a small coin worth a farthing, aka one-fourth of a penny.

The porter exited.

Pennyboy Senior said to himself, “My dogs may yet be innocent and honest. If not, I have an entrapping question or two more to put to them, a cross-examination, and I shall catch them.”

He called one of his dogs, “Lollard!”

He then released Lollard from the close-stool that was Lollard’s prison.

Pennyboy Senior believed that his dogs were part of the plot to get Lady Pecunia and her serving-women away from him. He believed that his dogs had known that the ladies would leave and not return and that his dogs had done nothing to stop them.

Pennyboy Senior said to Lollard, "Silence! What whispering was that you had with Mortgage when you last licked her feet? The truth, now. Ha? Did you smell she was going?"

He then said an imaginary recorder, "Put down that."

Recorders recorded words spoken during a trial.

He continued, "And not, not to return? You are silent. Good. And when you leaped on Statute? As she went forth? You say, 'Consent'! There was consent as she was going forth? It would have been fitter at her coming home, but you knew that she would not? To your Tower."

He put Lollard in one of the close-stools, saying, "You are cunning, are you? I will meet your craft."

He then called his other dog, Block, and released it from the close-stool that was Block's prison. The dog licked him, and he said, "Block, show your face; stop your caresses.

"Tell me, and tell me truly, what affronts do you know that were done to Lady Pecunia, with the result that she left my house?

"None, do you say? Not that you know, or will admit to knowing?

"I fear that I shall find you an obstinate cur.

"Why did your fellow, Lollard, cry this morning? Because Broker kicked him? Why did Broker kick him? Because he pissed against my lady's gown?"

According to Pennyboy Senior's reasoning, Lady Pecunia may have decided to leave Pennyboy Senior's house because Lollard peed on her dress.

Pennyboy Senior continued, "Why, that was no affront? No? No distaste? You knew of none? You're a dissembling cur."

He put Block in the other close-stool, saying, "To your hole, again, your Block-house."

Pennyboy Senior said, "Lollard, arise."

He released Lollard from the close-stool and said, "Where did you lift your leg up last? Against what? Are you struck dummerer now, and whine for mercy?"

A dummerer is a beggar who fakes muteness, pretending to be unable to speak to gain sympathy and alms.

Pennyboy Senior asked, "Whose kirtle — woman's gown, outer petticoat, or skirt — was it you gnawed, too? Mistress Band's? And Wax's stockings? Who? Did Block bescumber — befoul with feces — Statute's white suit with the parchment lace there, and Broker's satin jacket? All will out. They had offence, offence enough to quit me."

Parchment lace is a kind of decorative trim.

He then said, "Appear, Block! Bah, it — your guilt — is manifest. He shows his guilt. Should he forswear it, make all the affidavits against it that he could before the bench and twenty juries, he would be convicted. He bears an air about him that does confess it! To prison again, close prison!"

He put Block back in a close-stool.

He then said, "Not you, Lollard. You may enjoy the liberty of the house. And yet there is a notion come in my head for which I must commit you, too, and close. Do not repine; it will be better for you."

He put Lollard back in a close-stool.

— 5.5 —

"This is enough to make the dogs mad, too," Cymbal said, looking into the room. "Let's go in upon him."

He and the other jeerers had been watching Pennyboy Senior. His door was open.

The jeerers — Cymbal, Fitton, Shunfield, Almanac, and Madrigal — entered the room.

“What is it now?” Pennyboy Senior said to them. “What’s the matter? Have you come to seize the prisoners? Make a rescue?”

“We have come to bail out your dogs,” Fitton said.

“They are notailable,” Pennyboy Senior said. “They stand committed without bail or mainprise — without anyone allowed to go surety for their release. Your bail cannot be taken.”

“Then the truth is that we have come here to vex you,” Shunfield said.

“To jeer you,” Almanac said.

“To bait and torment you, rather,” Madrigal said.

“A baited usurer will be good flesh,” Cymbal said.

“Baited” means “tormented.” A cruel sport of the time was bear-baiting. A bear or bull was tied to a stake so it could not flee, and then dogs were set loose to torment it. Some people of the time thought that baited bull meat tasted better than the meat of a bull that had not been baited.

“A baited” is also a pun for “abated” — “lessened.” Pennyboy Senior was complaining about loss of wealth because he had lost Lady Pecunia.

People had given Pennyboy Senior gifts of food when Lady Pecunia was with him. Now that she had left him, those gifts of food may not be forthcoming, and so Pennyboy Senior’s weight could also soon be abated.

“And tender, we are told,” Fitton said.

“Who is the butcher among you who has come to cut my throat?” Pennyboy Senior asked.

“You would die a calf’s death gladly, but it is an ox’s death that is meant for you,” Shunfield said.

A “calf” is a fool.

Fitton began, “To be fairly knocked on the head —”

Shunfield finished the sentence, “— with a good jeer or two.”

Oxen could be killed with blows to the head.

“And from your jawbone, Don Assinigo?” Pennyboy Senior said to Shunfield.

According to the Old Testament book Judges, Samson used the jawbone of an ass to slay a thousand Philistines.

The Spanish word asnico means “little ass.” Pennyboy Senior was calling Shunfield a little fool.

“Shunfield, he gave you a jeer,” Cymbal said. “You have suffered it.”

“I do confess a swashing — fiercely slashing — blow,” Shunfield said.

He then replied to Pennyboy Senior, “But, Snarl — you who might play the third dog because of your teeth — you have no money now?”

The first two dogs were Pennyboy Senior’s pets.

“No, nor no Mortgage,” Fitton said.

“Nor Band,” Almanac said.

“Nor Statute,” Madrigal said.

“No, nor blushet” — rose, aka Rose — “Wax,” Cymbal said.

“Nor you no office, as I take it,” Pennyboy Senior said.

The Staple of News Office was out of business now.

“Cymbal, he gave you a mighty jeer,” Shunfield said.

“A pox on these true jests, I say,” Fitton said.

Two proverbs of the time were 1) True jests are the worst, and 2) The truest jests sound worst in guilty ears.

“He will turn out to be the better jeerer,” Madrigal said.

Almanac said, “Let’s set upon him, and if we cannot jeer him down in wit —”

Madrigal interrupted and finished the sentence: “— let’s do it in noise.”

The jeerers knew that they had limitations: Almanac and Madrigal acknowledged that their wit — intelligence — was limited. All acknowledged a lack of money.

“I am content to do that,” Shunfield said.

“Charge, man of war!” Madrigal said to Shunfield.

“Belay him! Aboard! Board him!” Almanac said to Shunfield.

“We’ll give him a broadside first,” Shunfield said.

“Where’s your venison now?” Fitton asked Pennyboy Senior.

“Where’s your red-deer pies?” Cymbal asked Pennyboy Senior.

“With your baked turkeys?” Shunfield asked Pennyboy Senior.

“And your partridges?” Almanac asked Pennyboy Senior.

“Your pheasants and fat swans?” Madrigal asked Pennyboy Senior.

Back when Lady Pecunia lodged with Pennyboy Senior, people often gave him gifts of food.

“Like you, they have turned geese,” Pennyboy Senior replied.

“Geese” can mean fools.

“But such as will not keep your capitol!” Madrigal said.

In ancient Roman times, enemy soldiers known as the Gauls were trying to sneak up the Capitoline Hill, but geese sacred to Juno cackled and alerted the Romans to the approach of the enemy soldiers.

Shunfield began, “You were accustomed to have your breams —”

A bream is a kind of fish.

Almanac interrupted, “— and trouts sent in —”

Cymbal interrupted, “— fat carps and salmons —”

Fitton interrupted, “— aye, and, now and then an emblem of yourself, an over-grown pike?”

Pikes were so voracious that they ate other pike.

“You are a jack, sir,” Pennyboy Senior said.

“You have made a shift to swallow twenty such poor jacks before now,” Fitton said.

Almanac began, “If he should come to feed upon poor john
—”

“Poor jack” and “poor john” were phrases that meant dried hake — a kind of fish.

Madrigal interrupted, “— or turn pure Jack-a-Lent after all this?”

A Jack-a-Lent was a stuffed puppet that served as a target for stone-throwing children during Lent and was then burned.

Fitton began, “Tut, he’ll live like a grasshopper —”

Madrigal interrupted, “— on dew.”

Shunfield added, “Or like a bear, with the licking of his own claws.”

Pliny the Elder, author of Naturalis Historia (Natural History), wrote that grasshoppers had no mouths and lived on dew, and he wrote that during hibernation bears lived by sucking on their own fore-paws.

Cymbal said, “Aye, if his dogs were away.”

“He’ll eat them, first, while they are fat,” Almanac said.

“Indeed, and when they are gone, here’s nothing left to be seen,” Fitton said.

“Except his kindred — spiders, natives of the soil,” Cymbal said.

Almanac said, “He will have enough dust here to breed fleas.”

Pliny the Elder wrote that fleas could be brought into being by the sun shining on dust.

“But by that time, he’ll have no blood to rear them,” Madrigal said.

Shunfield began, “He will be as thin as a lantern; we shall see through him —”

Almanac interrupted, “— and through his gut colon — his belly — and count his intestina —”

Intestina is Latin for intestines.

We can count the ribs of a thin person; to count someone’s intestines, they must be really emaciated.

Pennyboy Senior said, “Rogues! Rascals!”

His dogs began to bark.

“He calls his dogs to his aid,” Fitton said.

“Oh, they just rise at the mention of his tripes,” Almanac said.

“Let them alone,” Cymbal said. “They don’t bark for him.”

“They bark se defendendo — in self-defense,” Madrigal said.

According to Madrigal, the dogs are barking because they don’t want Pennyboy Senior to get so hungry that he eats them.

“Or for custom,” Shunfield said. “As commonly curs do, one for another.”

Lickfinger entered the room and said, “Arm, arm yourselves, you gentlemen jeerers! The old Pennyboy Canter is coming in upon you with his forces — the gentleman who was the Canter.”

“Let’s go hence!” Shunfield said.

“Let’s go away!” Fitton said.

“Who is he?” Cymbal asked.

He had not heard that the Canter was actually Pennyboy Junior's father, who had faked his own death.

"Stay not to ask questions," Almanac said.

"He's a flame," Fitton said.

"A furnace," Shunfield said.

"A consumption," Almanac said. "He kills wherever he goes."

The jeerers all ran away.

"See, the whole covey is scattered!" Lickfinger said. "'Ware, 'ware the hawk! I love to see him — Pennyboy Canter — fly."

"Beware the hawk!" meant "Look out! A dangerous figure is coming!"

Pennyboy Canter was coming to fly at and attack the jeerers, but they had escaped by running away.

— 5.6 —

Pennyboy Canter and Pennyboy Junior arrived, along with Lady Pecunia and her train of attendants: Mortgage, Statute, Band, and Wax.

Pennyboy Canter said to Pennyboy Junior, "You see by this amazement and distraction what your companions were: a poor, frightened, and guilty race of men, who dare to stand and face no breath of truth, but, conscious to themselves of their no-wit and no-honesty, ran routed at every panic — frenzied — terror they themselves bred.

"They did that in a place where, elsewhere, as confident as sounding brass, their tinkling captain, Cymbal, and the rest dare put on any visor — mask — to deride the wretched, or, with buffon license, jest at whatsoever is serious, if not sacred.”

“Buffon license” is licentious buffoonery.

The jeerers were happy to mock wretched people and serious and sacred things; they were afraid to face righteous fury.

“Who’s this?” Pennyboy Senior asked. “My brother, and restored to life!”

He had not heard that the Canter was actually his brother, who had faked his death.

“Yes, I am your brother, and restored to life,” Pennyboy Canter said, “and I have been sent here to restore your wits, if your short madness is not more than anger conceived for your loss —”

In his Epistles I.2.62, Horace wrote that anger is a short madness.

Pennyboy Canter continued, “— which I return to you. See here, your Mortgage, Statute, Band, and Wax, without your Broker, have come to abide with you and vindicate the prodigal from stealing away the lady.

“Nay, Pecunia herself has come to free him fairly, and discharge all ties, except those of love, to her person, to treat her like a friend, not like a slave or like an idol.”

The word “friend” can mean “lover.”

“Superstition violates the deity it worships no less than scorn does.

“And believe it, brother, the use of things is all, and not the store.

“Surfeit and fullness have killed more than famine.”

Pennyboy Canter meant that money must be used wisely and not just stored away — and he knew that that was the way his brother would interpret the two sentences — but the two sentences were ambiguous. The truth of the two sentences is also debatable because extremes are dangerous.

“The use of things is all, and not the store” is ambiguous.

“Use” can mean “interest,” as in lending money at interest, and “store” can mean “possessions.”

In that case, the sentence means, “Lending money at interest is all, and not having possessions.”

But “use” can mean “putting things to work, such as spending money to buy things that you can use,” and “store” can mean “savings.”

In that case, the sentence means, “Spending money to buy useful possessions is all, and not having savings.”

The above two interpretations of the sentence are contradictory. If you believe in Aristotle’s theory of the mean between extremes, both sentences are also false.

“Surfeit and fullness have killed more than famine” is also ambiguous.

“Surfeit and fullness” can refer to having 1) too much money, or 2) too many possessions.

“Famine” can refer to having 1) a lack of money, or 2) a lack of possessions.

The ambiguity of the second sentence results in contradictory meanings:

1) Having too much money has killed more than not having enough money.

2) Having too much money has killed more than not having enough possessions.

3) Having too many possessions has killed more than not having enough possessions.

4) Having too many possessions has killed more than not having enough money.

The extremes of both the ambiguous first sentence and the ambiguous second sentence in both pairs of sentences show that Aristotle's ethical theory of the Golden Mean is correct: Avoid excesses and search for the middle.

If you believe in Aristotle's theory of the mean between extremes, you want to avoid the extremes of having too much money or too little money, and having too many possessions or too few possessions.

Being a miser is bad, and being a prodigal is bad. The middle way is liberality: spending and giving what is yours freely but without going to the extreme of being a spendthrift. A person who seeks the Golden Mean will buy things he or she needs and will donate money to charity but will also have an emergency fund. That person will also have a few luxuries when they are affordable and desirable.

Pennyboy Canter said, "The sparrow, with his little plumage, flies, while the proud peacock, overcharged with plumes, is fain to sweep the ground with his grown train and load of feathers."

"Wise and honored brother!" Pennyboy Senior said. "None but a brother, and one sent from the dead, as you are to me, could have altered my character. I thank my destiny, which is so gracious.

“Are there no pains and punishments, no penalties decreed from where you have come to us that smother money in chests and strangle her in bags?”

If Pennyboy Canter had been sent to him from the dead, then he had been to the Land of the Dead, where he had seen usurers.

In Dante’s Inferno, the usurers are punished in Circle 7. In contrast to the Blasphemers, who take something that ought to be fertile and make it infertile, the Greedy Moneylenders (usurers) take something that ought to be infertile and make it fertile. The definition of usury has changed over time, but originally, as in the Bible, it meant lending money at interest. The Bible is against lending money at interest to relatives or to poor people, although Jews are allowed to lend money at interest to non-Jews; thus, Jews became moneylenders in the Middle Ages. In modern times, usury is charging an unethically high rate of interest.

Because the Greedy Moneylenders have been taking something that ought to be infertile and making it fertile, they are in a burning plain with fire raining down on them. Here they are bent over, just like the Greedy Moneylenders of Dante’s time who bent over their tables and counted their money. Hanging from their necks are moneybags. Dante cannot recognize any of the Greedy Moneylenders by looking at their faces; they were so preoccupied with making money that they have lost their individuality.

Pennyboy Canter answered, “Oh, on the usurers are imposed mighty, intolerable fines and penalties, of which I come to warn you, forfeitures of whole estates, if they are known to be immorally acquired!”

“I thank you, brother, for the light you have given me,” Pennyboy Senior said. “I will prevent them all by taking action to repent my sins now.

“First, free my dogs, lest what I have done to them and against law is a praemunire — a violation of legal process — for, by Magna Carta, they could not be committed as close prisoners, my learned counsel, my cook, tells me here — and yet he showed me the way, first.”

“Who did? I?” Lickfinger said. “I encroach upon the liberty of the subjects?”

Pennyboy Senior was blaming someone else — someone innocent — for his crime. This is not a good way to repent.

“Peace!” Pennyboy Canter said. “Quiet! Picklock, your lodger, that stentor — that loud-voiced lawyer — has infected you.”

True, bad people can infect other people. If you are going to blame someone else, make sure that that person is guilty — blame the right person. But also remember that you have free will, and you can use that free will to resist the influence of bad people. Pennyboy Canter was strong enough not to become a jeerer; Madrigal was not strong enough to resist the bad influence of the jeerers. Pennyboy Senior needs to be strong enough to resist the bad influence of Picklock.

Pennyboy Canter added, “But I have Picklock safe enough in a wooden collar.”

The wooden collar was the stocks of a pillory.

“Next, I restore these servants to their lady with freedom, heart of cheer, and countenance. It is their year and day of jubilee.”

In biblical times, Hebrew slaves were set free in the year of jubilee. In the year 1625, when The Staple of News was first performed, a jubilee was celebrated.

Pecunia's train of serving-women said, "We thank you, sir."

Pennyboy Senior then said, "And lastly, to my nephew I give my house, goods, lands, all but my vices, and those I go to cleanse — kissing this lady, whom I give to him, too, and join their hands."

He joined the hands of Pennyboy Junior and Lady Pecunia. The two would be married.

In giving away all his money, Pennyboy Senior was not choosing the Golden Mean, but if he were mentally ill — he believed that his brother was resurrected from the Land of the Dead — it's good that his money is in the hands of a guardian.

Still, by joining the hands of Pennyboy Junior and Lady Pecunia, Pennyboy Senior affirmed that Lady Pecunia — and money — should be properly loved and valued.

Pennyboy Canter said to you, the readers, "If the spectators will join their hands and applaud, we thank them."

Pennyboy Junior added, "And we wish they may, as I, enjoy Pecunia."

Lady Pecunia added:

"And so Pecunia herself wishes that she may always be an aid for their good uses.

"Pecunia does not wish to be a slave to their pleasures or a tyrant over their fair desires, but instead to teach them all the Golden Mean.

"She wishes to teach the prodigal how to live, and she wishes to teach the sordid and the covetous how to die.

"She wishes to teach the sordid and the covetous how to die with sound mind, and she wishes to teach the prodigal how to live with safe frugality."

If the loss of Lady Pecunia can drive Pennyboy Senior mad, then death must be terrifying to misers because the moment we die, our money abandons us. Value money correctly, and you can die with a sound mind.

The prodigal — including Pennyboy Junior — need to value money correctly, too, so that they can live with safe — secure — frugality. Get money, spend money for the things you need and some of the things you want (and donate some money to charity), don't waste money, and have an emergency fund. Safe frugality includes such things as having enough food, being warm enough in cold weather, not being homeless, and having money in the bank.

Art Linkletter once asked a young boy on one of his daytime television programs, "What is happiness?" The boy answered, "A steady paycheck."

Apparently, the boy had lived through times when his parents did not have a steady paycheck.

THE EPILOGUE (The Staple of News)

Thus have you seen the maker's [the playwright's] double scope [two aims or intentions],

To profit [instruct] and delight, wherein our hope

Is, though the clout we do not always hit,

It will not be imputed to his wit —

A tree [bow] so tried and bent as it will not start [let fly].

Nor doth [does] he often crack [break] a string of art,

Though there may other accidents as strange

Happen: the weather [disposition] of your looks may change,

Or some high wind of misconceit [misconception] arise

To cause an alteration in our skies.

If so, we're sorry that [we] have so misspent

Our time and tackle [equipment, arrows]; yet he's confident,

And vows the next fair day he'll have us shoot

The same match o'er [over] for him, if you'll come to it.

Notes:

The clout is the center of an archery target: It is the white pin that attaches the target to a structure that holds it up.

Ben Jonson says that his play may not hit the clout, but not through lack of wit (intelligence). An arrow may miss because the bow has lost its elasticity or because the weather or wind makes hitting the clout difficult. A playwright may do his best to write a good play, and yet the play, although the playwright thinks it is good, may fail.

This is speculation on my part, but I wonder if the Justice of the Peace mentioned here is a reference to the Lord Chief Justice of England who appears in The Famous Victories of Henry V. The Justice in The Staple of News is both a fool and a man whom “no man will say black is his eye,” which means “No man will impugn his character.” Prince Hal in The Famous Victories of Henry V regards the Chief Justice as not worthy of being shown respect, but as King Henry V he has much respect for him.

The below information comes from the Wikipedia article titled “British Anabaptism”:

Following the death of Elizabeth, James I became the new ruler of England. He continued the policies of his predecessor that valued conformity under the state.[14] As Holland and England continued to maintain trade relations, it was of no surprise that Anabaptist ideas still made their way into England. Under his rule, the last public burning of heretics took place. Edward Wightman was the last to be burned publicly for heresy in England, and he was an Anabaptist. Although James I valued conformity for political reasons, this still shows the value he placed on making a public statement about religious minorities as well.

[...] sometimes the offender was drawn to the pillory on a hurdle, accompanied by minstrels and a paper sign hung around his or her head displaying the offence committed.

At the Quarter Sessions of October 1626 in Marlborough, “Thomas Edmonds was indicted for making and publisheing Libell which he confessed to be true, and thereupon convicted to goale there to remaine until Saterdag next, and then to stand under the pillorie situate in Marlborough for the space of two howres together in the Markett tyme. And then alsoe to have a broad white pap [paper] upon his forehead subscribed with these words in great letters (vizt) for a libel and (then he is to return to prison until the next assizes &c).”

*In Devizes in 1615 Nicholas Powell was convicted for deceiving John Smithe of thirty shillings with false letters. The below is a brief description of Aristotle's Mean Between Extremes:

Moral Virtue, and the Mean Between Extremes

Aristotle thought that we can acquire two different kinds of virtue: moral and intellectual. The appetitive element (the desiring element) of the human soul can lead us to moral virtue, if we have desires toward worthy goals and these desires are subjected to the rational regulating principle known as the mean between extremes.

This theory of the mean between extremes is a famous part of Aristotle's thought. He believed in moderation — as most Greeks did. If you have too much or too little of something, you will suffer from an excess or a deficiency of that thing. What you need is exactly the right amount. Thus courage is the mean between the extremes of rashness (excess) and cowardice (deficiency). Applying Aristotle's ideas (but not always his names for the qualities listed), we can make a list illustrating some means between extremes:

1. Courage

Rashness (Excess); Courage (Mean/Virtue); Cowardice (Deficiency)

2. Liberality

Prodigality (Excess); Liberality (Mean/Virtue); Miserliness

(Deficiency)

3. Charitable

Overly Generous (Excess); Charitable (Mean/Virtue); Cheap (Deficiency)

4. Weight

Obese (Excess); Normal Weight (Mean/Virtue); Anorexic (Deficiency)

5. Nobility

Vanity (Excess); Nobility (Mean/Virtue); Ignobility (Deficiency)

6. Good Temper

Hot Temper (Excess); Good Temper (Mean/Virtue); Indifference (Deficiency)

7. Truthfulness

Boastfulness (Excess); Truthfulness (Mean/Virtue); False Modesty (Deficiency)

The first example shows that courage is the mean between the excess of rashness and the deficiency of cowardice. Let's say that a person is walking down the street and sees a house on fire. A rash person would shout, "Don't worry, I'll save you," and rush inside the burning building without even bothering to find out whether anyone is inside to be rescued! A coward would ignore the fire and not even call the fire department. However, a courageous person would call the fire department, find out whether anyone was trapped inside the burning building, and render whatever assistance he or she rationally can.

The second example shows that liberality is the mean between the excess of prodigality and the deficiency of miserliness. A prodigal person would leave a $100 tip after eating a $10 pizza (however, this can be a good deed when done by someone who can easily spare the money and wants to help the server. If I give a $100 tip for a $10 pizza, I am being prodigal. If Microsoft founder Bill Gates gives a $100 tip for a $10 pizza, he is doing a good deed / being charitable). A miser would not leave any tip at all. However, a person who is liberal with money would leave a 15 percent tip for good service. (This example refers to the USA; most other countries don't have tipping.)

The third example shows that being charitable is the mean between the excess of being overly generous and the deficiency of being cheap. An overly generous person will give away all of his or her money to charity, not saving enough to live on. A cheap person will never give money to charity. However, a charitable person will pay his or her bills, keep enough money to live on (and keep some to save), but also give a portion that he or she can afford to charity.

The fourth example shows that normal weight is the mean between the excess of obesity and the deficiency of anorexia. An obese person pigs out every night (and every morning, and every noon, and two or three other times a day). An anorexic person will do 100 sit-ups after chewing a stick of sugarless gum. However, a person who maintains his or her normal, healthy weight will eat three square meals a day, and is willing to eat cake and ice cream at birthday parties (and salad for lunch the next day).

One point to notice is that not all activities have a mean between extremes. Some activities are already excessive in themselves. Thus, adultery is always wrong. You will never be able to commit adultery with the right person at the right time and in the right manner. (You should never say, "I don't want to commit too little adultery or too much adultery; I want to commit exactly the right amount of adultery"!)

Also, the mean can vary among people (see liberality above). In determining how much food to eat, the mean for a 300-pound weightlifter will be much greater than the mean for a 100-pound secretary. Also, a wealthy person such as Microsoft founder Bill Gates can afford to give much more money to charity than a college student can.

The way we acquire moral virtue, according to Aristotle, is through imitation and acquiring good habits. If we act the way a brave person acts, we will become brave. If we act the way a truthful person acts, we will become truthful. If we act the way a noble person acts, we will become noble.

In Chapter 5, scene 6, I described what Dante writes in his Inferno about the punishment of the Greedy Moneylenders (Usurers). That description was taken from this book:

Source: David Bruce, Dante's Inferno: A Discussion Guide. Self-Published. 2009.

<https://www.smashwords.com/books/view/342391>

From the same book is a description of the punishment of the Hoarders and Wasters of Money in the Fourth Circle of the Inferno:

The Incontinent: The Wasters and the Hoarders

As the god of wealth, Plutus is an appropriate guard for the Wasters and the Hoarders, who were incontinent when it came to managing money. The Wasters are Spendthrifts, who spent every penny they could, saving nothing for emergencies. The Hoarders are Misers, who saved every penny they could, spending little even to make themselves comfortable. These two opposed groups are condemned to roll great weights at each other. Each group sets off in an opposing direction around the Circle, and then they meet and crash the weights together, one group crying “Why hoard?” (Inferno VII.30) and the other group crying “Why waste?” (Inferno VII.30). Then they roll the weights back and meet again on the other side of the Circle. These two groups were opposed to each other in life; now they are eternally opposed to each other in death. In addition, Dante does not recognize any of the souls here. These souls were undiscerning in life — they did not know what true wealth is. Now, in death the souls are unable to be discerned by the living Dante. (He does recognize that some of the souls were monks by their haircuts, but he does not know their names.)

Note: The brief quotations are from Mark Musa's translation of Dante's Inferno.

deadly zin = deadly sin

V is often used for F

vifty pound = fifty pounds

’un, ’hun, ’hum are the rustic dialect form for ’im, him, them

’cham means I am

’che and ’ch mean I — possibly, ’ch is related to ich (German for “I”)

Some R sounds are transposed.

preform = perform

perportions = proportions

NOTES:

In Ben Jonson's society, a tale of a tub meant the same thing as a cock-and-bull story.

A cock-and-bull story is a ridiculous story. The term may have come from two inns that coaches stopped at in Stony Stratford, England. One inn was called the Cock and the other was called the Bull. Travelers would tell outrageous, unbelievable stories to entertain themselves and others.

In Ben Jonson's society, a person of higher rank would use "thou," "thee," "thine," and "thy" when referring to a person of lower rank. (These terms were also used affectionately and between equals.) A person of lower rank would use "you" and "your" when referring to a person of higher rank.

"Sirrah" was a title used to address someone of a social rank inferior to the speaker. Friends, however, could use it to refer to each other.

The word "wench" in Ben Jonson's time was not necessarily negative. It was often used affectionately.

The word "clown" can mean "rustic fellow" as well as "comic fellow."

The phrase "go to" can be imprecatory. These days, it is used in "go to Hell!"

Proverbs are often words of wisdom, but they can also be short pithy sayings in general use. In this sense, they can be clichés.

A hundred is a subdivision of a county or a shire; it has its own court. The setting, of course, is Finsbury Hundred (an open area in Middlesex).

PROLOGUE

No state affairs, nor any politic club
Pretend [Claim] we in our tale, here, of a tub,
But acts of clowns [comic rustics] and constables today
Stuff out the scenes of our ridiculous [funny] play.
A cooper's wit, or some such busy spark,
Illumining the High Constable and his clerk
And all the neighborhood, from old records
Of antique [old; also possibly "antic," aka funny] proverbs, drawn from Whitsun-lords,
And their authorities at wakes and ales,
With country precedents and old wives' tales,
We bring you now, to show what different things
The cotes of clowns are from the courts of kings.

***

"Whitsun-lords" are mock-lords who rule at Whitsun, which is the Christian High Holy Day of Pentecost.

In this context, "wakes" are festivals.

"Ales" are "ale-drinkings."

"Cotes of clowns" are the cottages of rustics.

ACT 1 (A Tale of a Tub)

— 1.1 —

Alone, and standing outside Squire Tub's residence in Totten Court, Hugh Chanon, the vicar of Pancras, said to himself on February 14: Valentine's Day:

"Now, by my faith, old Bishop Valentine, you have brought us nipping weather. Just as the proverb states — 'Februere doth cut and shear' — your day and diocese are very cold.

"All of your parishioners, as well as your lay persons and your quiristers — your choristers — have need to keep to their warm feather-beds if they are provided with loves."

In other words, everyone who already has a husband or wife can stay in bed late and stay warm on Valentine's Day. Those who are without mates need to be stirring.

The choristers are songbirds, which according to folklore, chose their mates on Valentine's Day.

"This is no season to seek new makes in."

"Makes" meant "mates." The word especially applied to birds.

"However, Sir Hugh of Pancras has come hither to Totten Court with news for the young lord of the manor, Squire Tripoly, about his mistress."

Squire Tub was also known as Squire Tripoly. His first name was Tripoly.

In this context, the word “mistress” meant a woman to whom a man was devoted. The word did not necessarily mean a sexual relationship. The Squire wanted to marry this woman.

Vicars were given the honorary title “Sir.”

Chanon Hugh called, “What, Squire, I say!”

He continued speaking to himself:

“Tub, I should call him, too.

“Sir Peter Tub was his father, a saltpeter man, who left his mother, Lady Tub of Totten Court, here to revel, and keep open house in; with the young Squire her son, and his governor Basket Hilts, both by sword and dagger.”

Some swords and daggers had basket hilts that protected the hand.

Saltpeter is potassium nitrate, which is used in making gunpowder.

He called, “Domine Armiger Tub! Squire Tripoly! Expergiscere!”

This meant, “Lord Squire Tub! Squire Tripoly! Wake up!”

An armiger is a person who is entitled to heraldic arms; that is, the person is someone who is entitled to have a coat of arms.

“I dare not call aloud lest Lady Tub should hear me and think I conjured up the spirit, her son, in priest’s lack-Latin. Oh, she is jealous of all mankind for him.”

In this context, “jealous” meant “suspicious,” and so she was carefully guarding her son. Lady Tub was vigilant in looking out for the well-being of her son.

A “lack-Latin” is a person who doesn’t know Latin well. Some priests of the time were ill-educated.

Squire Tub appeared at a window and said, “Chanon, is it you?”

“Yes, it is the Vicar of Pancras, Squire Tub! Wa’hoh!”

“Wa’hoh” is a cry made by a falconer.

Squire Tub said, “I come, I stoop to the call, Sir Hugh! I come in answer to your falconer’s call.”

“Stoop” meant “swoop down.”

He disappeared from the window above and came down in his night clothes.

Chanon Hugh said, “He knows my lure is from his love, fair Audrey, the High Constable’s daughter of Kentish Town here. The High Constable is Master Tobias Turf.”

Audrey Turf was a maiden of an age to be married, and many men in the area were well aware of that, Squire Tub among them.

“What news comes from Tobias Turf?” Squire Tub asked.

Chanon Hugh answered:

“He has awakened me an hour before I would usually get up, sir. And my duty is to the young worship of Totten Court, Squire Tripoly, who has my heart, as I have his.

“Your mistress — Audrey Turf — is to be made away from you, this morning, St. Valentine’s Day.

“A knot of clowns, aka rustics, the Council of Finsbury, so they are y-styled — styled, aka titled — met at her father’s.

“All the wise of the hundred there met together: Old Rasi Clench of Hampstead, petty constable; In-and-In Medley, cooper and headborough of Islington; with loud To-Pan, the tinker, or metal-man of Belsize, and a thirdborough; and D'ogenes Scriben, the great writer of Chalcot."

A hundred is a division of a county. All the great men of the hundred had met together to make a decision about an important matter.

"And why did all these wise men meet?" Squire Tub asked.

Chanon Hugh answered, "Sir, to decide in council who shall be a husband or a make — a mate — for Mistress Audrey. That person they have named and chosen: He is John Clay of Kilburn, a tough young fellow, and a tile-maker."

"And what must he do?" Squire Tub asked.

Chanon Hugh answered:

"Cover her, they say, and keep her warm, sir."

One meaning of "cover" is "have sex with."

"Mistress Audrey Turf last night did draw John Clay's name to be her Valentine."

In this society, Valentines were traditionally awarded by chance: the picking of lots.

"This chance occurrence has so taken her father and mother — because they themselves drew lots that matched them so, on Valentine's Eve thirty years ago — that they will have her married today by any means.

"They have sent a messenger to Kilburn, post-haste, for John Clay; which when I knew, I came post-haste with the like message to worshipful Tripoly, the Squire of Totten Court: and my advice is to cross and counteract it.”

Chanon Hugh wanted Squire Tub, not John Clay, to be the man who married Audrey.

“What is it, Sir Hugh?” Squire Tub asked.

“Where is your governor Hilts?” Chanon Hugh asked.
“Basket must do it.”

Basket Hilts would help in the plot to get Squire Tub married to Audrey. Basket Hilts was Squire Tub’s governor: his tutor and protector.

“Basket shall be called,” Squire Tub said.

He called, “Hilts! Can you see to rise?”

Basket Hilts called from inside Squire Tub’s house, “Cham [I am] not blind, sir, with too much light.”

“Open your other eye, and see if it is day,” Squire Tub said.

Basket Hilts answered, “Che [I] can spy that at as little a hole as another, through a millstone.”

Two proverbs of the time were these: 1) “One may see daylight at a little hole,” and 2) “I can see as far into a millstone as another man.”

Squire Tub said to Hugh Chanon, “He will have the last word, even though he talk bilk for it.”

“Bilk?” Chanon Hugh said. “What’s that mean?”

“Why, nothing,” Squire Tub said. “It is a word signifying nothing, and it is borrowed here to express nothing.”

“A fine device!” Chanon Hugh said.

“Yes, until we hear a finer,” Squire Tub said. “What’s your device now, Chanon Hugh?”

A device can be a trick, a plan, and/or a plot. And a bilk can be a hoax or a person who is a cheat.

Chanon Hugh said, “I will tell you in private. Lend it your ear. I will not trust the air with it, or scarcely my shirt; my cassock shall not know it. If I thought it did, I’d strip it off and burn it.”

A cassock is a full-length clerical garment.

Squire Tub replied, “That’s the way. You have thought up a plan to get a new one, Hugh. Is it worth it? Let’s hear it first.”

“Then hearken and receive it,” Chanon Hugh said.

They whispered together as Chanon Hugh told Squire Tub his plan for getting Audrey and Squire Tub married to each other.

Chanon Hugh said, “That is the plan, sir. Do you relish it?”

Basket Hilts entered the scene, and walked nearby, making himself ready — he was finishing getting dressed — to be of service.

“If Hilts is secret enough to carry it, there’s all,” Squire Tub said.

Basket Hilts said:

“It is no sand, nor buttermilk?”

These items are difficult to carry without containers.

He continued:

“If’t be, Ich’am [I am] no zieve [sieve], or wat’ring-pot, to draw knots i’your ’casions. If you trust me, zo. If not, praform [perform] it your zelves. 'Cham no man's wife, but resolute Hilts. You'll vind me i'the butt'ry."

Knots are criss-crossing lines made by water pouring from watering pots.

"Draw knots in your occasions" means "make difficulties in your business."

"'Cham no man's wife" means "I am no man's wife," aka "I depend on no one." In this context, "wife" means "dependant."

A buttery is a place where alcoholic drinks such as ale are stored.

Basket Hilts exited.

Squire Tub said:

"He is a testy clown, but a clown as tender — soft — as wool, and as melting as the weather in a thaw!

"He'll weep like all April, but he'll roar and bluster at you like middle March before. He will be as mellow, and as tipsy, too, as October; and as grave and bound up like a frost, with the new year, in January.

"He is as rigid as he is rustic."

A proverb stated, "A windy March and a rainy April make a beautiful May."

October was the traditional month for brewing ale.

Chanon Hugh said, "You know his nature, and describe it well. I'll leave him to your managing."

Squire Tub said, "Wait, Sir Hugh; take a good angel with you for your guide, and let this guard you homeward, as the blessing to our plan."

Squire Tub, who was punning on “guardian angel,” gave Chanon Hugh a gold coin that was known as an angel. Such coins were stamped with the image of an angel.

Chanon Hugh said:

“I thank you, Squire’s worship, most humbly —”

Squire Tub exited.

“— for the next angel: for this angel I am sure of.

“Oh, for a choir of these voices now, to chime in a man’s pocket, and cry chink! One does not chirp: It makes no harmony.”

Chanon Hugh hoped for more angels to chink in his moneybag and make beautiful music.

He continued:

“Grave Justice Bramble next must contribute an angel. His charity must offer at this wedding.

“I’ll bid more to the basin and the bride-ale, although only one can bear away the bride.”

At the bride-ale — wedding-feast — gifts were cast into a basin or bowl.

He was offering to give a gift at a second wedding; if a second wedding should be proposed, he hoped to get money from a second suitor.

“I smile to think how like a lottery these weddings are.

“Clay has Audrey in his possession.

“Squire Tub hopes to circumvent the tile-maker John Clay and marry Audrey.

“And now, if Justice Bramble do come off — pay up — it is two to one but Tub may lose his bottom and not marry Audrey.”

Justice Preamble, whom many people called Justice Bramble, was a third man who hoped to marry Audrey.

A “bottom” is a “deep place.” Women have a deep place.

Chanon Hugh was not loyal to Squire Tub. If he could get money by serving Justice Bramble, he would.

Chanon Hugh exited.

— 1.2 —

Rasi Clench, In-and-In Medley, D’ogenes Scriben, To-Pan, and Ball Puppy were standing outside Tobias Turf’s house in Kentish Town.

Clench of Hampstead was a farrier and petty constable.

Medley was the cooper of Islington and a headborough.

To-Pan of Belsize was a tinker, aka metal-man.

Scriben of Chalcot was a writer.

The Council of Finsbury — the “wise” ones of Finsbury — consisted of In-and-In Medley, Rasi Clench, To-Pan, and D’ogenes Scriben.

Ball Puppy was the High Constable’s serving-man.

Remembering what day it was, and what happened thirty years ago on that day, Clench said, “Why, it is thirty years, even as this day now, Zin [Saint] Valentine’s Day, of all kursined [christened, aka Christian] days, see. And the zame day of the month, as this Zin Valentine, or I am vouldy deceived —”

Medley interrupted, “— that our High Constable, Master Tobias Turf, and his dame were married. I think you are right. But what was that Zin Valentine? Did you ever know ’un [him], goodman Clench?”

Clench answered, “Zin Valentine, he was a deadly Zin, and dwelt at Highgate, as I have heard, but it was avore [before] my time. He was a cooper, too, as you are, Medley, an In-an’-In: a woundy brag — an extremely spirited — young vellow, as the ’port [report] went o’hun [of him] then, and in those days.”

Scriben asked, “Didn’t he write his name as ‘Sim Valentine’? Vor I have met no ‘Sin’ in Finsbury books, and yet I have writ ’em six or seven times over.”

Scriben may be the clerk who keeps the Finsbury records. And/or he may have meant to say that he has read the records six or seven times.

To-Pan said, “Oh, you mun [must] look for the nine deadly Sims in the church books, D’oge: not the High Constable’s, nor in the county’s. Zure [To be sure], that same Zin Valentine, he was a stately and noble Zin, if he were a Zin, and kept brave house —”

“Kept brave house” means “provided splendid hospitality.”

The seven deadly sins are anger, envy, gluttony, greed, lust, pride, and sloth.

To-Pan was confusing church theological books with the church books that recorded such things as births, marriages, and deaths.

Clench interrupted:

“— at the Cock and Hen Inn in Highgate.

“You have ’freshed my rememory [refreshed my memory] well in it, neighbor Pan. He had a place in the last King Harry’s time, of sorting and matching all the young couples: joining them, and putting them together; which is yet praformed, as on his day — Zin Valentine, as being the Zin of the shire, or the whole county. I am old rivet still, and bear a brain, the clench, the varrier [farrier], and true leech [physician] of Hampstead.”

An old rivet is an old fastening — a kind of nail. Old nails are still usable, and Clench’s brain was still usable.

A clench is a part of a nail that is turned back when one wants to clench: to fasten more securely.

The last King Harry was King Henry VIII, but Saint Valentine lived long before Henry VIII’s time.

To-Pan said, “You are a shrewd and keen-witted antiquity [antiquary], neighbor Clench, and a great guide to all the parishes! The very bell-wether of the hundred, here, as I may zay.”

A bell-wether is a leading sheep; it wears a bell and makes noise.

To-Pan continued, “Master Tobias Turf, the High Constable, would not miss you, for a score on [of] us, when he do ’scourse [discourse] of the great Charty [Magna Carta] to us.”

This was a compliment: Tobias Turf would not take twenty fellows for one Clench.

In 1215, King John I of England agreed to the bill of rights in the Magna Carta. It recognized some rights for barons, some of whom were rebelling, and for the Church.

Puppy asked, “What’s that, a horse? Can ’scourse naught but a horse?”

“’scourse” can mean horse trading in addition to discourse.

Puppy continued, “I never read o’hun [about him], and that in Smithveld Horse Fair — Charty? —”

Puppy was interpreting “Charty” [Carta] as meaning “carthorse.”

Puppy continued, “— in the old Fabian’s Chronicles; nor I think in any more chronicles of more recent times. He may be a giant there, for aught [anything] I know.”

Robert Fabian wrote history books about the time up to Henry VII.

“You should do well to study records, fellow Ball, both law and poetry,” Scriben said.

Puppy replied, “Why, all’s but writing and reading, is it, Scriben? If it is any more, it’s mere cheating zure [to be sure], vlat [flat] cheating; all your law and poets, too.”

According to some philosophic critics such as Plato, poets and artists create works of art that are far removed from reality: They are mere imitations of reality.

“Master High Constable comes,” To-Pan said.

Puppy said, “I’ll zay’t avore ’hun. [I’ll say it before him.]”

— 1.3 —

Tobias Turf, the High Constable of Kentish Town and the father of Audrey, entered the scene and said, “What’s that which makes you all so merry and loud, sirs, huh? I could have heard you all the way to my privy walk [private garden].”

Clench said, “A contervarsy ’twixt [controversy between] your two learned men here: ’Annibal [Hannibal] Puppy says that law and poetry are both flat [completely] cheating. All’s but writing and reading, he says, be it verse or prose.”

Tobias Turf said, “I think in conziencie, he do’ zay true! Who is it do thwart’un [contradict him], huh?”

“Why, my friend Scriben, if it please Your Worship,” Medley said.

Tobias Turf said:

“Who, D’oge? My D’ogenes? A great writer, by the Virgin Mary! He’ll vace me down and put me down, me myself sometimes, and say that verse goes upon veet [feet], as you and I do.

“But I can gi’ ’un [give him] the hearing; zit me down and laugh at ’un; and to myself conclude that the greatest clerks [scholars] are not the wisest men ever.

“Here they are both! What, sirs, disputin’, and holdin’ arguments of [about] verse and prose?

“And no green thing afore [before] the door that shows or speaks [announces] a wedding?”

Greenery was used as decorations during times of celebration such as weddings.

Scriben said, “Those were verses now that your Worship spoke, and they run upon vive [five] feet.”

Indeed, some of Tobias Turf’s dialogue could be divided into lines that were pentameters and so had five metrical feet.

Tobias Turf said, “Feet, vrom [from] my mouth, D’oge? Leave your ’zurd upinions [absurd opinions] and get me in some boughs to serve as decorations.”

Scriben said, “Let ’em have leaves first. There’s nothing green but bays and rosemary.”

It was February, after all, and so boughs did not have green leaves. Bay leaves and rosemary do not grow on boughs.

“And they’re too good for strewings, your maids say,” Puppy said.

Tobias Turf said:

“You take up ’dority [authority] still to vouch [cite] against me. All the twelve smocks [women] in the house, to be zure, are your authors.

“Get some fresh hay then, to lay under foot. Get some holly and ivy to make vine [fine (and entwine)] the posts.

“Isn’t it Son Valentine’s day, and isn’t Mistress Audrey, your young dame, to be married?”

Puppy exited to get the required plants.

Tobias Turf then said:

“I marvel that Clay should be so tedious [late in coming]; he’s to play Son Valentine, and the clown [rustic] sluggard’s not come fro’ [from] Kilburn yet!”

Medley asked, “Do you call your son-i’-law a clown, if it please Your Worship?”

Tobias Turf answered:

“Yes, and vor [for] worship — out of respect — too, my neighbor Medley.

“He is a Middlesex clown, and one of Finsbury: They were the first colons of the kingdom here, the primitory [primary] colons, my D’ogenes says.

“Where’s D’ogenes, my writer, now? Who were those you told me, D’ogenes, who were the first colons [he meant ‘colonists’] of the country? The ones whom the Romans brought in here?”

Scriben said, “The English word ‘clown’ comes from the Latin word coloni. Sir, colonus is an inhabitant, a clown original: as you’d zay, a farmer, a tiller of the earth, e’er sin’ [ever since] the Romans planted their colony first, which was in Middlesex.”

Tobias Turf said:

“Why so!

“I thank you heartily, good D’ogenes, you have zertified me and confirmed what I said. I had rather be an ancient colon, as they zay, a clown of Middlesex, a good rich farmer, or High Constable.

“I’d play [wager] hun ’gain [him against] a knight, or a good squire, or gentleman of any other county in the kindom [kingdom (and population)].”

To-Pan said:

“Outcept [Except] Kent, for there they landed all gentlemen, and came in with the Conqueror, mad Julius Caesar, who built Dover castle.

“My ancestor To-Pan beat the first kettle-drum avore ’hun [him], here vrom Dover on the march.”

In this society some people incorrectly thought that Julius Caesar had built the Tower of London. It was actually founded as part of the 1066 Norman Conquest. After Caesar’s time, the Romans built a fort at Dover.

To-Pan was mixing up William the Conqueror and Julius Caesar, and he was mixing up the fort at Dover and the Tower of London.

To-Pan continued:

“Which piece of monumental copper [the kettle-drum] hangs up, scoured, at Hammersmith yet; for there they came over the Thames at a low-water mark, vore [before] either London, aye, or Kingston Bridge, I doubt, were kursined [blessed].”

Ball Puppy returned with John Clay, who was supposed to marry Audrey on this Valentine’s Day.

Tobias Turf said:

“Zee, who is here: John Clay! Zon Valentine, and bridegroom!

“Have you zeen your Valentine-bride yet, sin’ you came, John Clay?”

John Clay was from Kilburn; he was a tile-maker, and he had been appointed to be the bridegroom to Audrey Turf.

— 1.4 —

“No, wusse [certainly],” John Clay said. “Che [I] alighted, I, just now in the yard. Puppy has scarce unswaddled my legs yet.”

Tobias Turf said:

“What, wisps o’your wedding-day, zon?”

John Clay had twisted hay around his stockings to protect his inner legs from chaffing. He was wearing shoes instead of high riding boots that would have protected his legs.

Ball Puppy had helped him remove the hay.

“This is right originous [original and natural] Clay, and Clay of Kilburn, too! I would have had boots on this day, zure, zon John.”

John Clay explained, “I did it to save charges [costs]. We mun [must] dance, on this day, zure, and who can dance in boots? No, I got on my best straw-colored stockings, and swaddled them over to zave charges, I.”

Tobias Turf said:

“And his new chamois doublet, too, with points!”

Points are laces that connect stockings to a doublet (a jacket).

Sausage-hose, which will be mentioned next, are stuffed stockings that resemble sausages.

“I like that yet; and his long sausage-hose, like the commander of four smoking tile-kils [tile-kilns], which he is captain of, captain of Kilburn; Clay with his hat turned up, of the leer [larboard, aka port, aka left] side, too, as if he would leap [have sex with] my daughter yet before night, and spring a new Turf to the old house!”

The bridal maidens, carrying rosemary and bay, entered the scene.

Seeing them, Tobias Turf said, “Look, an [if] the wenches ha’ not vound ’un [found him] out and do parzent ’un [present him] with a van [fan] of rosemary and bays, to vill [fill] a bow-pot [bouquet], trim the head of my best vore-horse [fore- or front-horse that leads the team]! We shall all have bride-laces or points, I zee; my daughter will be valiant, and prove a very Mary Ambry in the business.”

Bride-laces are laces or ribbons that are used to tie some rosemary to be worn at a wedding. Points are laces. Both points and bride-laces were given to wedding guests.

Mary Ambry was a valiant woman who was celebrated in a ballad about the capture of Ghent.

Clench said, “They zaid Your Worship had ’sured her [had promised her] to Squire Tub of Totten Court here; all the hundred rings of it.”

According to gossip in Finsbury Hundred, Audrey Turf had been engaged to marry Squire Tub.

Tobias Turf said:

“That’s a tale of a tub, sir, a mere tale of a tub. Lend it no ear, I pray you [please]. The Squire Tub is a fine man, but he is too fine a man, and has a Lady Tub, too, to [for] his mother. I’ll deal with none of these vine [fine] silken Tubs.

“I prefer John Clay and cloth-breech [homespun clothing] for my money and daughter.”

Squire Tub was from a family of a higher social class than the Turf family, and so Tobias Turf did not want his daughter to marry him.

Father Rosin, a musician, and two boys entered the scene.

Seeing him, Tobias Turf said:

“Here comes another old boy, too, vor his colors, will stroke down my wive’s udder of purses empty of all her milk-money this winter quarter.”

Father Rosin will stroke musical instruments with a bow, and he will be paid for his music with the money Tobias Turf’s wife had gotten from selling milk. This will empty her purse of money.

Of course, there is a bawdy meaning in “stroke down my wive’s udder.”

“He is old Father Rosin, the chief minstrel here, chief minstrel, too, of Highgate. She has hired him and all his two boys for a day and a half, and now they come for ribanding and rosemary. Give them enough, girls, give them enough, and take it out in his tunes anon [quickly].”

The girls will give old Father Rosin and his two boys ribanding and rosemary, and old Father Rosin will repay them with music. A riband is a ribbon.

Clench said, “I’ll ha’ [have] the song ‘Tom Tiler,’ for our John Clay’s sake, and the tile-kils, zure.”

Medley the joiner said, “And I’ll ha’ the song ‘The Jolly Joiner,’ for my own sake.”

To-Pan the tinker said, “I’ll ha’ ‘The Jovial Tinker’ for To-Pan’s sake.”

“We’ll all be jovy [jovial] this day vor Son Valentine, my sweet son John’s sake,” Tobias Turf said.

“There’s another reading now,” Scriben said. “My master reads it Son and not Sin Valentine.”

John Clay is Audrey’s Valentine, Tobias Turf wants John Clay to be his son-in-law, and so John Clay is Son Valentine.

“Nor Zim,” Puppy said. “And he is in the right; he is High Constable. And who should read above ’un [’im], or avore ’hun [before him]?”

Tobias Turf said:

“Son John shall bid us all welcome on this day. We’ll zerve under his colors. Lead the troop, John.

“And Puppy, see the bells ring. Press [Impress, aka enlist] all noises [bands of musicians] of Finsbury, in our name.

“D’ogenes Scriben shall draw a score of warrants vor the business.

“Does any wight parzent [person represent] Her Majesty’s person this hundred, ’bove the High Constable?”

“No, no,” the others said.

“Use our authority then to the utmost on’t [in this business],” Tobias Turf said.

They exited.

— 1.5 —

Chanon Hugh (the vicar of Pancras) and Justice Preamble talked together.

“So you are sure, sir, to prevent [forestall] ’em all,” Chanon Hugh said, “and throw a block [an obstacle] in the bridegroom’s way, John Clay, that he will hardly leap over.”

Justice Preamble replied, “I conceive [understand] you, Sir Hugh; as if your rhetoric would say, whereas the father of her is a Turf, a very superficies [surface layer] of the earth, he aims no higher than to match in Clay and there has pitched his rest.”

“Has pitched his rest” means “has staked everything.”

“Right, Justice Bramble,” Chanon Hugh said. “You have the winding [devious] wit, encompassing all.”

Justice Preamble said:

“Subtle [Cunning] Sir Hugh, you now are in the wrong, and err with the whole neighborhood, I must tell you, for you mistake my name.

“‘Justice Preamble’ is how I write myself; which with the ignorant clowns here — because of my profession of the law, and place of the peace [my job as judge] — is taken to be Bramble.

“But all my warrants, sir, do run Preamble: Richard Preamble.”

“Sir, I thank you for it,” Chanon Hugh said. “I thank you that Your good Worship would not let me run longer in error but would take me up thus.”

Justice Preamble said, “You are my learned and canonic neighbor; I would not have you stray. But the incorrigible nott-headed beast, the clowns or constables, still let them graze, eat salads, chew the cud. All the town music will not move a log.”

“Nott-headed” means “with close-cropped hair,” but “nott-headed,” of course, sounds like “knot-headed.”

Logs have knots.

Amphion was able to build the walls of the ancient Greek city Thebes by playing his lyre. As a result of the music, huge stones moved themselves into the correct position.

Chanon Hugh said, “The beetle and wedges will, where you will have them.”

A proverb stated, “There goes the wedge where the beetle drives.”

A beetle is a kind of hammer that is used with a wedge to split wood.

“True, true, Sir Hugh,” Justice Preamble said.

Miles Metaphor entered the scene.

Seeing Metaphor, Justice Preamble said, “Here comes Miles Metaphor, my clerk. He is the man who shall carry it, Chanon, by my instructions.”

Metaphor would help them carry out a plan to get Justice Preamble married to Audrey Turf.

Chanon Hugh said, “He will do it ad unguem, Miles Metaphor! He is a pretty fellow.”

“Ad unguem” means “to perfection.” The Latin translation is “to the fingernail.” Sculptors would scrape a fingernail over stone to check for flaws.

Justice Preamble said:

“I don’t love to keep shadows, or halfwits, to foil [frustrate] a business.

“Metaphor, have you see a king ride forth in state?”

“Sir, that I have,” Metaphor said. “King Edward, our late liege and sovereign lord, and I have set down the pomp.”

King Edward VI died in 1553. Metaphor had taken notes on the pomp that was on display when King Edward VI had ridden forth in state.

Justice Preamble said:

“Therefore I asked you.

“Have you observed the Messengers of the Chamber, what habits — liveries — they were in?”

The Messengers of the Chamber carried messages, of course, but they also had the legal power to make arrests.

Metaphor answered, “Yes, minor surcoats emblazoned with coats of arms. To the guard, a dragon and a greyhound, for the supporters of the arms.”

In other words, the dragon and greyhound were on either side and holding up the shield bearing the coat of arms. “To the guard” means “full-face.”

“Well noticed!” Justice Preamble said. “Do you know any of the Messengers of the Chamber?”

Metaphor said, “I know one who dwells here in Maribone.”

Justice Preamble asked, “Have you enough acquaintance with him that you could borrow his coat for an hour?”

“Or just his badge,” Metaphor said. “It will serve; it’s a little thing he wears on his breast.”

Justice Preamble said to Metaphor, “His coat, I say, is of more authority. Borrow his coat for an hour.”

He said to Chanon Hugh, “I love to do all things completely and perfectly, Chanon Hugh.”

He said to Metaphor, “Borrow his coat, Miles Metaphor, or borrow nothing.”

Metaphor said, “The tabard — official coat — of his office I will call it, or the coat-armor of his place, and so insinuate with him by that trope.”

“Coat-armor” is a heraldic garment worn over armor.

“Insinuate” means “suggest indirectly.”

A “trope” is a figure of speech.

Metaphor was going to borrow the coat by using rhetorical flourishes.

This particular coat was worn by a person who had the power to make arrests: a pursuivant. Therefore, we can assume that Justice Preamble and Chanon Hugh’s plot involved making an arrest or threatening to make an arrest.

Justice Preamble said, "I know your powers of rhetoric, Metaphor. Fetch him off in a fine figure of speech for his coat, I say."

Metaphor exited to carry out his errand.

Chanon Hugh said, "I'll take my leave, sir, of Your Worship, too, because I may expect the issue of our plan soon."

Justice Preamble said, "Wait, my diviner counsel. Take your fee."

He gave Chanon Hugh some money and said:

"We who take fees allow them to our counsel, and to our prime learned counsel, we allow double fees.

"There are a brace of angels — a pair of gold coins — to support you in your foot-walk this frost, for fear of falling, or spraining of a point of matrimony, when you come at it."

The "spraining of a point of matrimony" means "misinterpreting the marriage laws."

The marriage laws would be misinterpreted (if needed) in such a way as to allow Chanon Hugh to marry Justice Preamble and Audrey Turf to each other.

No one had actually proposed to Audrey Turf. Her bridegroom, John Clay, had been chosen for her.

"I am in Your Worship's service," Chanon Hugh said. "That the exploit is done, and you possessed of Mistress Audrey Turf —"

Justice Preamble interrupted, "I like your plan."

He exited.

Alone, Chanon Hugh said:

"And I like this effect of two to one."

Squire Tub had tipped him only one angel, but Justice Preamble had tipped him two angels.

“It works in my pocket against the Squire, and his half bottom [half-assed undertaking] here, of half a piece [a piece was a coin worth either 20 or 22 shillings, depending on when it was minted], which was not worth the stepping over the stile for.”

Justice Preamble tipped better than Squire Tub, and so Chanon Hugh would serve Justice Preamble.

“Squire Tub’s mother has quite marred him. Lady Tub is such a vessel of faeces; she is all dried earth! Terra damnata! She has not a drop of salt or peter in her!”

Terra damnata is a name for the sediment that is left over after an alchemical process. Both faeces and terra damnata are sediment.

Lady Tub was over-protective of her son.

“All her niter is gone.”

“Niter” is “saltpeter.” It is also nitrate fertilizer.

Lady Tub had no drop of peter and no fertilizer in her.

A drop of peter (semen) can be fertile.

Her late husband’s name was Peter Tub.

Chanon Hugh exited.

Lady Tub of Totten Court (Squire Tub's mother), and Pol-Marten (her usher, aka male attendant) talked together.

Lady Tub said:

“Is the horse ready, Marten? Call my son the Squire.

“This frosty morning we will take the air about the fields; for I do mean to be somebody's Valentine, in my velvet gown, this morning, even though it should be but a beggar-man.

“Why do you stand still, and do not call my son?”

Pol-Marten answered:

“Madam, if he had lain down with the lamb, he would have no doubt been stirring with the lark. But he sat up at play and watched the cock until his first warning scolded him off to rest.

“Late watchers are no early wakers, madam.

“But if Your Ladyship will have him called —”

Lady Tub said:

“Will I have him called? Why did I, sir, order that he be called, you weasel, you vermin of an usher?

“You will return your wit to your first style — title — of Martin Polecat, as a result of these stinking tricks, if you do use them.”

Polecats were known for their offensive stink.

Lady Tub continued:

“I shall no more call you Pol-Marten, by the title of a gentleman, if you go on like this —”

“I am gone,” Pol-Marten said.

He exited.

Shouting after him, Lady Tub said:

“Be quick then, in your come off — your return — and make amends, you stoat!”

She then said to herself:

“Was there ever such a foumart as serve as an usher to a great worshipful lady, such as myself!”

A foumart is a foul marten. A marten is a weasel-like animal, as is a polecat.

She continued:

“Who, when I heard his name first, Martin Polecat — a stinking name, and not to be pronounced without an apologetic bow in any lady’s presence — my very heart even grieved, seeing the fellow young, pretty, and handsome, being then, I say, a basket-carrier, and a man condemned to the saltpeter works.

“I made it my suit to Master Peter Tub that I might change the man’s name and position, and call him as I do now, by Pol-Marten, to have it sound like a gentleman in an official position, and I made him my own foreman, my daily waiter.”

A “foreman” is a servant who walks ahead of his employer. Waiters are servants.

She continued:

“And he to serve me thus! Ingratitude beyond the coarseness yet of any clownage shown to a lady!”

Pol-Marten returned.

Lady Tub asked him, “What now, is he stirring?”

“He is stirring early out of his bed and ready,” Pol-Marten said.

“And so then he is coming?” Lady Tub asked.

“No, madam, he is gone,” Pol-Marten said.

“Gone!” Lady Tub said. “To where? Ask the porter where he has gone.”

“I met the porter and have asked him about him,” Pol-Marten said. “The porter says he let Squire Tub go forth an hour ago.”

“An hour ago!” Lady Tub said. “What business could he have so early? Where is his serving-man, grave Basket Hilts, his guide and governor?”

“Gone with his master,” Pol-Marten said.

Lady Tub said:

“Has he gone, too?”

“Oh, that same surly knave is his indispensable right-hand man, and he leads my son amiss. He has carried him to some drinking match or other.

“Pol-Marten — I will call you so again, I’m friends with you now — go, get your horse and ride to all the towns about here where his haunts are, and cross the fields to meet and bring me word of where he is. He cannot be gone far, being on foot.

“Be curious — careful and diligent — to inquire about him, and tell Wisp, my serving-woman, to come and wait on me.”

Pol-Marten exited to carry out his orders.

Lady Tub said to herself, “We mothers bear our sons we have bought with pain, and this makes us often view them with too worriful eyes, and look over them with a zealous fear, beyond what is fitting.”

She was aware of her shortcoming, but she was unable to resist it.

— 1.7 —

Dido Wisp, Lady Tub’s serving-woman, arrived on the scene.

“How are you now, Wisp!” Lady Tub said. “Have you a Valentine yet? I’m taking the air to choose one.”

“May Fate send Your Ladyship a fit one then,” Wisp replied.

“What kind of one is that?” Lady Tub said.

Wisp answered, “A proper — handsome — man to please Your Ladyship.”

Lady Tub said:

“Away with that vanity that takes the foolish eye!

“I rather wish for any poor creature whose want may need my alms or courtesy; so Bishop Valentine left us his example to do deeds of charity:

“To feed the hungry, clothe the naked, visit the weak and sick, entertain the poor, and give the dead a Christian funeral.

“These were the works of piety Bishop Valentine practiced, and bade us imitate them, and not look for lovers, or handsome images to please our senses.

“Please, Wisp, deal freely with me now. We are alone, and we may be merry a little.

“Thou are not one of the court glories, aka great women at court, nor are thou one of the wonders for wit and intelligence or for beauty in the city.

“Tell me, what man would satisfy thy present fancy, had thy ambition the ability to choose a Valentine within the queen’s dominion, with the provision that he be a subject of the queen’s?”

Wisp answered:

“You have given me a large scope, madam, I confess, and I will deal with Your Ladyship sincerely. I’ll utter my whole heart to you.

“I would have him be the bravest, the richest, and the properest — the most handsome — man a tailor could make up; or all the poets, along with the makers of perfumes.”

The bravest man could be the most splendidly dressed (as a tailor could make him) or the most courageous (as an epic poet or writer of romances could make him).

Wisp continued:

“I would have him be such as not another woman but should feel spite and anger toward me!

“Three city ladies should run mad for him, and an infinite number of country madams.”

Lady Tub said, “You’d spare me and let me hold my wits and not run after him?”

Wisp said:

“I should with you — for the young squire, my master’s sake — dispense and concede a little; but it should be very little.

“Then all the court-wives I’d have be jealous of me, and all their husbands I’d have be jealous of them. And every lawyer's puss — wench — of any quality would lick her lips for a snatch in the term-time when the law courts are busy.”

In this context, “snatch” means a quick treat of a sexual nature — in other words, a quickie.

Lady Tub said:

“Come, let's walk; we'll hear the rest as we go on.

“You are this morning in a good vein, Dido; I wish I could be as merry! My son's absence troubles me not a little, although I seek these ways to put it off, which will not help.

“Care [Worry] that is entered once into the breast

“Will have the whole possession, before it rest.”

They exited.

ACT 2 (A Tale of a Tub)

— 2.1 —

Tobias Turf, John Clay, In-and-In Medley, Rasi Clench, To-Pan, D’ogenes Scriben, and Ball Puppy talked together.

Tobias Turf said:

“Zon Clay, cheer up, the better leg avore.”

A proverb states, “Set the best foot forward.”

He continued:

“This is a veat that is once done, and no more.”

The feat was a wedding.

Clench said, “And then it is done vorever, as they say.”

A proverb states, “The thing done has an end.”

“Right!” Medley said. “Vor a man ha’ his hour, and a dog his day.”

Two proverbs state, “Every man has his hour,” and “Every dog has his day.”

Both proverbs mean: Every person will have a successful moment.

Tobias Turf replied, “True, neighbor Medley, you are still In-and-In.”

Medley said to himself, “I would be Master Constable, if ’ch [I] could win.”

Yes, he would like a promotion to Chief Constable and take the place of Tobias Turf.

To-Pan said:

“I zay, John Clay, keep still on his old gait [chosen path, chosen course].

“Wedding and hanging both go at a rate [the same pace].”

A proverb stated, “Wedding and hanging go by destiny.”

Tobias Turf said:

“Well said, To-Pan. You have still the hap — the good fortune — to hit the nail of the head at a close.”

A close is a conclusion or a termination.

A proverb states, “Hit the nail on the head.”

“I think there never was a marriage managed with a more advisement [deliberation] than was this marriage, although I say it who should not say it. Especially 'gain' [against] my own flesh and blood: my wedded wife.

“Indeed, my wife would have had all the young bachelors and maidens, indeed, of the zix parishes hereabout. But I cried, ‘None, sweet Sybil, none of that gear [business], I.’ It would lick zalt, I told her, by her leave.”

“Salt” can mean “lasciviousness.” All the young bachelors and maidens would be courting each other.

“No, three or vour [four] of our wise, choice, honest neighbors, upstantial [substantial] persons, men who have borne office, and my own family would be enough to eat our dinner.

“What! Dear meat’s a thief. I know it by the butchers and the market-volk.”

In other words, expensive food is a thief. He did not want to pay an excessive amount of money for food.

“Humdrum, I cry.”

He wanted a wedding feast that was humdrum and simple, not fancy.

“No half ox in a pie. A man that’s invited to a bride-ale, if he has cake and drink enough, he need not veer his stake.”

A man with enough cake and ale will get a good return on his investment of coming to the wedding and giving a wedding gift.

Clench said, “That is right; he has spoken as true as a gun, believe it.”

Dame Sybil Turf, Audrey Turf, and six maids entered the scene. The maids were extra wedding guests.

Tobias Turf said:

“Come, Sybil, come; didn’t I tell you about this? Didn’t I tell you that this pride and muster — vanity and gathering — of women would mar all? Six women to one daughter, and a mother!

“The Queen — God save her — has no more herself.”

Queen Elizabeth I, who never married, had no children. Neither did Queen Mary I, although she did marry. Both queens had more than six serving-women.

Dame Turf said, “Why, if you keep so many maidens as servants, Master Turf, why shouldn’t all present our service and show our respects to her?”

Tobias Turf said:

“Your service? Good! I think you’ll write ‘your very loving and obedient mother’ to her shortly.

“Come, send your maids off; I will have them sent home again, wife. I love no trains of Kent or Christendom, as they say.”

A train can be a tail. Thomas à Becket was said to have fixed tails to the breeches of men of Kent because one of them cut off Thomas’ horse’s tail.

A train can also be an entourage.

Joyce, one of the maids, said, “We will not go back and leave our dame.”

Madge, another of the maids, said, “Why should Her Worship lack her tail of maids more than you do of men?”

“What? Are you mutinying, Madge?” Tobias Turf asked.

Joan said, “Zend back your c’lons [colons, aka clowns] agen [again], and we will vollow.”

“Else we’ll guard our dame,” all the maids said.

“I ha’ zet the nest of wasps all on a flame,” Tobias Turf said.

The maids were buzzing angrily.

Dame Turf said:

“Come, you are such another, Master Turf.”

“You are such another” means “You are just as bad as they are.”

Dame Turf continued:

“A clod you should be called, of a High Constable, to let no music go before your child to church, to cheer her heart up this cold morning!”

Tobias Turf said:

“You are for Father Rosin and his consort [company] of fiddling boys, the great feats [skills] and the less, bycause [for the reason, because] you have entertained [hired] them all from Highgate.

“To show your pomp you’d have your daughter and maids dance over the fields like fays [fairies], to church [in] this frost?”

February is a frosty month.

Tobias Turf said:

“I’ll have no roundels [round dances], I, in the queen’s paths.

“Let ’un [them] scrape the gut at home, where they have filled it, at afternoon.”

The musicians could scrape their catgut — play their strings — in the afternoon, at the Turfs’ home.

“I’ll have them play at dinner,” Dame Turf said.

Clench said, “She is in the right, sir, vor your wedding-dinner is starved without the music.”

“If the pies do not come in piping hot, you have lost that proverb,” Medley said.

“Piping hot” means “very hot,” as in “so hot it makes a piping — hissing — sound.”

Some kinds of music-making involve pipes.

“I yield to truth,” Tobias Turf said. “Wife, are you sissified [satisfied]?”

“A right good man!” To-Pan said. “When he knows right, he loves it.”

Scriben said, “And he will know it and show it, too, by his place of being High Constable, if nowhere else.”

— 2.2 —

Basket Hilts, who was bearded, carried a sword and a dagger. Ball Puppy carried a walking-stick made out of ash-wood; it could be used as a weapon.

Basket Hilts, the serving-man of Squire Tub, was also carrying out part of a plot to get Audrey Turf to marry Squire Tub.

“Well overtaken, gentlemen!” Basket Hilts said. “Please, which man among you is the queen’s high constable?”

“The tallest man,” Ball Puppy said. “Who else should he be, do you think?”

The tallest man is 1) the greatest in height, and/or 2) the bravest.

“It is no matter what I think, young clown,” Basket Hilts said. “Your answer savors of the cart. It is worthy only of a yokel.”

Criminals were sometimes paraded in public on a cart.

“What! Cart? And clown?” Ball Puppy said. “Do you know whose team you are speaking to?”

“Team” is a word that applies to cart-horses as well as to people.

Ball Puppy worked for the High Constable.

“No, nor do I care,” Basket Hilts said. “Whose jade may you be?”

A jade is an inferior horse.

“Jade? Cart? And clown?” Ball Puppy said. “Oh, for a lash of whipcord! Three-knotted cord!”

Whipcord was used for whips; the knots in the cord would sharpen the pain dealt by the whip.

Basket Hilts said:

“Do you mutter? Sir, snarl this way so that I may hear you, and answer for what you say with my school dagger about your costard, sir.”

A costard is 1) literally, an apple, or 2) metaphorically, a head.

His dagger was a school dagger because he would use it to teach Ball Puppy some manners.

Basket Hilts continued:

“Look to it, young grouse. I’ll lay it on, and sure.

“Take it off who’s wull. [Let whoever is well and willing to try to stop me.]”

He was threatening to beat anyone who interfered with him.

Clench said, “Nay, please, gentleman —”

Basket Hilts interrupted, “Go to, I will not bate him an ace [small part] of it.”

The phrase “go to” is often used in “go to Hell.”

He began to draw his dagger and said, “What? Roly-poly [Rascal]? Maple [Mottled like maple wood] face? All fellows? [Are all of you cowards?]”

Ball Puppy said:

“Do you hear me, friend?”

“I’d wish for you, vor your own good, to tie up your brended [brindled, aka variegated] bitch [sword] there, your dun-colored, rusty, pannier-hilt poinard [basket-hilted dagger], and not vex the young people with showing the teeth of it.

“We now are going to church in way of matrimony, some of us. Th’a’ rung all in a’ready. [They have rung the bell that announces that all is ready.]

“If they had not already rung the bell, all the horn-beasts [cattle] that are grazing in this close [enclosed field] should not have pulled me away from here, until this ash-plant [walking-stick] had rung noon on your pate, Master Broom-beard.”

Ball Puppy was saying that he would hit Hilts on the head twelve times with his walking-stick if he [Ball Puppy] didn’t have a wedding to go to.

“Rung noon” also refers to a cook’s custom on knocking on something to announce that the noon meal was ready.

Basket Hilts replied, “That would I fain zee [like to see], quoth [said] the blind George of Holloway. Come, sir!”

He drew his sword and dagger.

“Oh, their naked weapons!” Audrey exclaimed.

The word “weapon” was sometimes used to mean “penis.”

“For the passion of man, stop, gentleman and Puppy!” To-Pan said.

“Murder! Oh, murder!” John Clay shouted.

“Oh, my father and mother!” Audrey shouted.

“Husband, what do you mean?” Dame Turf said. “Why aren’t you stopping this fight? Son Clay, for God’s sake —”

“I charge you in the queen’s name, keep the peace,” Tobias Turf, the High Constable, said.

“Tell me about no queen or kaiser,” Basket Hilts said. “I must have a leg or a haunch of him before I go.”

A proverb stated, “He fears nor [neither] king nor kaiser [emperor].”

Medley objected, “But, zir, you must obey the queen’s high officers.”

“Why must I, goodman Must?” Basket Hilts asked.

“You must, an’ you wull,” Medley said.

“An’” can mean “and” or “if.”

“Wull” can mean “will” or “would.”

Tobias Turf said, “Gentleman, I’m here for fault, High Constable. I am here for lack of better circumstances —”

Basket Hilts interrupted, “Are you zo! What then?”

Tobias Turf said, “Please, sir, put up your weapons; do, at my request. As for him — Puppy — on my authority, he shall lie by the heels with his feet in the stocks, verbatim continente, an’ [if] I live.”

He meant by the Latin word verbatim “by my words” or “I say.” The Latin word continente means “continent.” He probably meant to say continenter, which means “continuously.”

The stocks were pieces of wood with half-circles carved out of one edge; when two pieces of wood were put together, the half-circles would form circles. A person would be restrained by having his or her feet put in the circles. The stocks would restrain Ball Puppy’s freedom of movement.

Dame Turf said, “Out on him for a knave! What a dead fright he has put me into! Come, Audrey, do not shake.”

“But isn’t Puppy hurt?” Audrey asked. “Or is the other man hurt?”

“No, bun,” John Clay said, “but if I had not cried ‘murder,’ I wusse [I know] —”

“Bun” is a term of endearment, like “sweetheart.”

Ball Puppy interrupted:

“Sweet goodman Clench, I pray you revise [malapropism for ‘advise’] my master I may not zit in the stocks until the wedding is over.

“Otherwise, Dame Turf and Mistress Audrey, I shall break the bride-cake.”

Ball Puppy was supposed to carry the wedding-cake in the procession.

He was unlikely to drop the wedding-cake and break it on purpose, so he may have meant that he would take a piece of the cake with him so he could eat it while he was in the stocks.

Clench said, “Zomething must be to save authority, Puppy.”

Something had to be done to preserve the status of the High Constable: Tobias Turf.

That thing could be to put Ball Puppy in the stocks immediately.

Dame Turf began, “Husband —”

Clench began, “And gossip [friend] —”

Audrey began, “Father —”

Tobias Turf interrupted, “Treat [Entreat] me not. It is in vain. If he does not lie by the heels, I’ll lie there for ’hun [him]; I’ll teach the hine [hind = servant] to carry a tongue in his head to his superiors.”

A proverb stated, “Keep a civil tongue in one’s head.”

“Subsuperiors” are superiors (who in fact may not be superior).

“This is a wise constable!” Basket Hilts said. “Where does he keep school? Where does he live?”

“In Kentish Town,” Clench said. “He is a very survere [severe] man.”

Basket Hilts said:

“But, as survere as he is, let me, sir, tell him, he shall not lay his man by the heels [put his serving-man in the stocks] for this.

“This was my quarrel; and by his office leave, if it carry ’hun [him] for this, it shall carry double, vor he shall carry me, too.”

In other words, if Tobias Turf puts Puppy in the stocks, he will have to put him [Basket Hilts] in the stocks, too, for they are guilty of the same offense.

“By the breath of man!” Tobias Turf said. “He is my chattel [property], my own hired goods, and if you do abet ’un [aid and encourage him] in this matter, I’ll clap you both by the heels, ankle to ankle.”

Basket Hilts said:

“You’ll clap a dog of wax as soon, old Blurt!”

A “man of wax” may be a man who is having a fit of anger. According to the Oxford English Dictionary, one meaning of “wax” is “angry feeling; a fit of anger.” “Wax” mainly means this in the expression “to be in a wax.”

“Man of wax,” however, can be used to emphatically praise a man. It may mean that a man is as handsome as a statue or that a particular man is a man of growth. The man may have grown literally or metaphorically.

One meaning of “dog” is a metal rest placed on either side of a fireplace to support burning wood. A dog made of wax would be useless.

Being called “old Blurt” is an insult.

“Come, don’t spare me, sir; I am no man’s wife — treat me as a man!

“I don’t care, I, sir, three skips of a louse for you, and I would not if you were ten tall — brave — constables, not I.”

“Nay, please, sir, don’t be angry, but content,” Tobias Turf said. “My man [employee: Ball Puppy] shall make you what amends you’ll ask ’hun [him].”

Basket Hilts said, “Let ’hun mend his manners then, and know his betters. It’s all I ask ’hun [of him]; and it will be his own, and his master’s, too, another day. ’Che vore ’hun. [I assure him.]”

A proverb stated, “Let him mind his manners; it will be his own another day.” In other words: “Let him mind his manners; it will be to his advantage in the long run.”

Basket Hilts did not want Ball Puppy to be put in the stocks.

Medley said, “As right as a club, still! Zure [To be sure,] this angry man speaks very near the mark when he is pleased.”

“As right as a club” may mean “Might makes right.”

“I thank you, sir,” Ball Puppy said. “If I meet you at Kentish Town, I will have the courtesy of the hundred for you.”

In other words, Ball Puppy would buy Basket Hilts a drink should they meet in Kentish Town.

Basket Hilts said:

“Gramercy [Thank you], good High Constable’s hine [hind = servant]!

“But do you hear me?

“Mas’ [Master] Constable, I have other manner of matter to bring you about than this. And so it is: I do belong to [am a retainer of] one of the queen’s captains, a gentleman of the battlefield, one Captain Thumbs.

“I don’t know whether you know ’hun [him] or not. It may be you do, and it may be you do not again.”

“No,” Tobias Turf said. “I assure you on my constableness that I do not know ’hun [him].

Basket Hilts said to himself, “Nor do I know him, either, indeed.”

There was no Captain Thumbs to know. As would soon become apparent, Captain Thumbs would be Chanon Hugh in disguise.

Basket Hilts said out loud:

“It skills — matters — not much.

“My captain and myself, having occasion to come riding by here, this morning, at the corner of St. John’s Wood some miles west of this town, were set upon by a group of country fellows, who not only beat us but robbed us most sufficiently and efficiently, and bound us to restrain our behavior, hand and foot; and so they left us.

“Now, Don [a complimentary title] Constable, I am to charge you in Her Majesty’s name, as you will answer it at your apperil [peril], that forthwith you raise a hue and cry in the hundred, for all such persons as you can dispect [suspect], by the length and breadth of your office.

“Vor I tell you the loss is of some value; therefore, look to it.”

The words “hue” and “cry” both mean “outcry.” The law officers were obliged to raise a hue and cry of citizens pursuing criminals. If they did not, the borough would be obliged to compensate the victim. In Ben Jonson’s play, the High Constable is responsible for making the payment.

Tobias Turf said:

“As fortune mend me now, or any office of a thousand pounds, if I know what to zay.”

He didn’t know what to say, and he still wouldn’t know what to say even if he should have good fortune or an appointment worth a thousand pounds.

This emergency was coming at a bad time: This was the wedding day of his daughter.

“I wish that I were dead or vair hanged up at Tyburn, that place of capital punishment, if I do know what course to take, or how [which way] to turn myself.

“Just at this time, too, now, my daughter is to be married!

“I’ll just go to Pancridge church nearby, and return instantly, and all my neighborhood shall go about the hue and cry.”

He would see John Clay and Audrey married, and then he would return and lead the hue and cry.

Basket Hilts' goal was to have Audrey Turf marry someone else. Because he did not want the marriage to John Clay to happen, he said:

“Tut, Pancridge me no Pancridge! Don't try to get out of your duty! If you let it slip, you will answer for it, and your cap will be made out of wool.”

By law, lower-class men wore wool caps. If Tobias Turf did not do his duty, he could lose his job and status.

“Therefore take heed, you'll feel the smart else, Constable.”

Tobias Turf replied, “Nay, good sir, stay.”

He then asked, “Neighbors, what do you think about this?”

His wife, Dame Turf, began, “Indeed, man —”

Tobias Turf said:

“By God's precious blood, woman, hold your tongue, and mind your pigs on the spit at home; you must have your oar in everything.”

He then asked Basket Hilts, “Please, sir, what kind of fellows were they?”

Basket Hilts answered, “Thieves' kind, I have told you.”

“I mean, what kind of men?” Tobias Turf replied.

“Men of our make and kind,” Basket Hilts said.

Tobias Turf responded:

“Nay, but with patience, sir, we who are officers must inquire about the special marks, and all the tokens of the despected [suspected] parties, or perhaps, else, we will be never the near [nearer] of our purpose in apprehending them.

“Can you tell what apparel any of them wore?”

Basket Hilts said:

“In truth, no; there were so many o’hun [of them], all similar to each another.”

Basket Hilts then described the leader of the robbers as looking exactly like John Clay:

“Now I remember that there was one busy fellow who was their leader.

“He was a blunt, squat swad [stupid, thickset bumpkin], but lower [shorter] than yourself.

Dame Turf said, “Judging by these marks, the leader of the robbers should be John Clay, now bless the man!”

“Peace, and be naught [be quiet]!” Tobias Turf said. “I think the woman be in a frenzic [frenzy].”

“John Clay?” Basket Hilts said. “Who’s he, good mistress?”

Audrey said, “He is the man who shall be my husband ”

“What!” Basket Hilts said. “Your husband, pretty one?”

Audrey said, “Yes, I shall soon be married.”

She pointed to John Clay and said, “That’s he.”

Tobias Turf said, “Passion of me, I am undone! I am ruined!”

He thought that John Clay, his son-in-law-to-be, was a robber.

“Bless master’s son!” Ball Puppy said.

Basket Hilts said to John Clay, “Oh, you are well apprehended. Do you know — recognize — me, sir?”

“No’s my record [answer],” John Clay said. “I never zaw you avore [before].”

“You did not?” Basket Hilts said. “Where were your eyes then? Out at washing?”

If the eyes were too dirty to see with, they must have needed a wash.

Tobias Turf said:

“What should a man zay? Who should he trust in these days?”

“Listen, John Clay, if you have done any such thing, tell the truth and shame the devil.”

“In faith, do that,” Clench said. “My gossip [friend] Turf zays well to you, John.”

“Speak, man,” Medley said, “but do not convess, nor be avraid.”

Instead of “confess,” Medley may have meant to say, “hold back.”

To-Pan said, “A man is a man, and a beast’s a beast, look to it.”

In other words, act like a man, not like a beast.

Dame Turf said:

“In the name of men or beasts, what are you doing?”

“Hare [Harry] the poor fellow out of his five wits, and seven senses?”

In Shakespeare's time, people were believed to have five wits: memory, fantasy, judgment, imagination, and common sense.

The traditional five senses are hearing, sight, touch, taste, and smell.

The others all seemed to think that John Clay was guilty of robbery.

Dame Turf comforted him:

“Do not weep, John Clay.”

She then said to all the others:

“I swear the poor wretch is as guilty from [of] it as the child is who was born this very morning.”

She meant that he was as innocent of committing robbery as was a newly born child.

John Clay said:

“No, as I am a kyrstin [Christian] soul, I wish I were hanged if ever I —

“Alas! I wish I were out of my life so I wish I were, and in again —”

He was very upset, and he was wishing that he were dead if he had committed robbery.

Ball Puppy said:

“Nay, Mistress Audrey will say nay to that.

“No in-and-out? If you were out of your life, what should she do for a husband? Who should fall aboard of her then? [Who should mount her then?]”

If John Clay were dead, Audrey would not like it because she would have no in-and-out (sex) and she would have no husband.

Ball Puppy then said to himself:

“Ball? He’s a puppy!

“No, Hannibal has no breeding!”

Ball Puppy was of a low social class, and he had no wife with whom to have sex. And Audrey would be likely to reject him if he asked her to marry him.

He then said out loud:

“Well, I say little.”

A proverb stated, “Though he say little, he thinks much.”

He continued:

“But hitherto all goes well — pray it prove no better.”

He probably meant to say: But so far all goes well — let’s hope the future proves to be no worse.”

“Come, father; I wish we — John Clay and I — were married!” Audrey said. “I am a-cold.”

Valentine’s Day was cold, but a husband would warm her up.

Basket Hilts said:

“Well, Master Constable, this your fine groom [a groom can be a servant] here, bridegroom, or whatsoever groom else he is, I charge him with the felony, and I order you to carry him back forthwith to the village of Paddington to my captain, who awaits my return there.

“I am to go to the next justice of peace, to get a warrant to raise a hue and cry and bring him and his fellows all afore ’hun [before him].

“Fare you well, sir, and look to ’hun [him] and keep him secure, I charge you, as you’ll answer it.

“Take heed; the business, if you defer it, may prejudicial [injure] you more than you think for [more than you expect].

“Zay [Say] I told you so.”

Basket Hilts exited.

Tobias Turf said:

“Here’s a bride-ale indeed!

“Ah, zon John, zon Clay! I little thought you would have proved a piece — a coin — of such false metal.”

And false mettle.

John Clay replied to his prospective father-in-law:

“Father, will you believe me?

“I wish I might never stir in my new shoes if ever I would do so voul a fact [so foul an evil deed].”

Tobias Turf said:

“Well, neighbors, I do order you to assist me with taking ’hun [him] to Paddington.

“If he is a true man, good; all the better for ’hun [him].

“I will do my duty, even if he were my own begotten son a thousand times.”

Dame Turf said, “Why, do you hear me, man? Husband? Master Turf?”

He ignored her and exited with Clench, Medley, To-Pan, and Scriben, and with John Clay in his custody.

Dame Turf said:

“What shall my daughter do?”

“Puppy, stay here.”

In this society, young women such as Audrey were accompanied by male protectors or by chaperones.

Dame Turf followed her husband and neighbors. Her maids went with her, leaving Audrey Turf and Ball Puppy behind.

Audrey said, “Mother, I’ll go with you and with my father.”

— 2.3 —

Ball Puppy said, “Nay, stay, sweet Mistress Audrey. Here are none but one friend — as they zay — who desires to speak a word or two, cold, with you.”

A proverb stated, “Here are none but friends.”

The words were “cold” because they were unexpected by Audrey. They were also spoken in cold weather.

“How do you veel yourself this frosty morning?” Ball Puppy asked.

Audrey replied, “What have you to do to ask, I ask you? [Why do you ask?] I am a-cold.”

The word “cold” can mean “without passion.” Puppy wanted her to be passionate.

Ball Puppy touched her hand and said, “It seems you are hot, good Mistress Audrey.”

“You lie,” Audrey said, slapping his hand away. “I am as cold as ice is. Feel someone or something else.”

“Nay, you have cooled my courage,” Ball Puppy said. “I am past it. I have done feeling with you.”

“Courage” can mean 1) “valor,” or 2) “desire for sex.”

The word “do” can mean “have sex with.”

“Done with me! [Had sex with me!]” Audrey said. “I do defy you, so I do, to say you have done with me. You are a saucy Puppy.”

“Oh, you mistake my meaning!” Ball Puppy said. “I meant not as you think I meant.”

“Meant you not knavery, Puppy?” Audrey asked.

“No, not I,” Ball Puppy said. “Clay meant you all the knavery, it seems, who, rather than he would be married to you, chose to be wedded to the gallows first.”

Many criminals, including robbers, such as John Clay was accused of being, were hung.

“I thought he was a dissembler,” Audrey said. “I thought that he would prove to be a slippery merchant in the frost. He might have married one first, and have been hanged after, if he had had a mind to it. But you men — bah!”

Ball Puppy asked, “Mistress Audrey, can you vind [find] in your heart to fancy Puppy? Me, poor Ball?”

Audrey said, “You are disposed to jeer at and mock one, Master Hannibal.”

Basket Hilts entered the scene.

Seeing him, Audrey said, “Have pity on me — it’s the angry man with the beard!”

Ball Puppy took off his hat.

Basket Hilts said to Ball Puppy, “Put on thy hat, I look for no despect.”

“Despect” sounds like “des’spect,” aka “disrespect,” and it means “looking-down-on,” but Basket Hilts meant that he was looking for no marks of respect.

“Where’s thy master?” Basket Hilts asked Ball Puppy.

“By the Virgin Mary, he has gone with the picture of despair to Paddington,” Ball Puppy replied.

The picture of despair was John Clay.

Basket Hilts said:

“Please run after ’hun [him] and tell ’hun he shall find my captain lodged at the Red Lion in Paddington; that’s the inn.

“Let ’un [him] ask vor Captain Thumbs. And take that for thy pains.”

He gave Ball Puppy some money and said, “He may seek long enough else.”

In other words: Otherwise, he may look for him for a long time.

Basket Hilts said, “Hie thee again.”

In other words: Hurry back.

“Yes, sir,” Ball Puppy said. “You’ll look to [after] Mistress Bride the while?”

“That I will,” Basket Hilts said. “Please hurry.”

Ball Puppy exited.

“What, Puppy!” Audrey said. “Puppy!”

He was leaving her with the angry bearded man.

“Sweet Mistress Bride, he’ll come again very soon,” Basket Hilts said.

He said ironically to himself:

“Here was no subtle device to get a wench. This Chanon has a brave pate [head] of his own! A shaven pate, and a right monger, i’ vaith!”

Chanon Hugh was a priest, and he had a shaven tonsure; still, he was a right monger — a disreputable dealer or trader — and possibly a whoremonger.

Basket Hilts continued talking to himself:

“This was his plot!

“I follow Captain Thumbs? We robbed in St. John’s Wood? In my other hose! [Pull my other leg!] I laugh to think what a fine fool’s finger they have of this wise constable, in pricking — pointing — out this Captain Thumbs to his neighbors.”

The “fool’s finger” is the middle finger, which is pointed at fools.

Basket Hilts continued talking to himself:

“You shall see the tile-man, too, set fire on his own kiln, and leap into it to save himself from hanging.”

The tile-man is John Clay.

Basket Hilts continued talking to himself:

“You talk of a bride-ale? Here was a bride-ale broke in the nick!”

The words “pricking” and “nick” have bawdy meanings. A “nick” is a notch or indentation. Bawdily, a prick can fit in a nick. Of course, “nick” can also mean “nick of time.”

Basket Hilts continued talking to himself:

“Well, I must yet dispatch this bride to my own master, the young Squire, and then my task is done.”

He said out loud to Audrey:

“Gentlewoman, I have in some sort done you some wrong, but now I’ll do you what right I can.

“It’s true you are a proper woman, but to be cast away on such a clown-pipe as Clay!”

A pipe can be 1) a wind instrument, or 2) a container for holding liquids.

John Clay is a clown-pipe or rustic-pipe. He is a rural fellow and may be talkative and have a beer belly.

Basket Hilts continued talking to Audrey:

“I think that your friends are not as wise as nature might have made them.

“Well, go to; there’s better fortune coming toward you, if you do not deject and regret it. Take a vool’s counsel” — as many characters in this play do, Basket Hilts unintentionally said the opposite of what he meant; he was unlikely to consider himself a fool — “and do not stand in your own light and undersell yourself.

“It may prove to be better than you expect, you will see.”

Audrey asked, “Alas, sir, what is it you would have me do? I’d fain — eagerly — do all for the best, if I knew how.”

Basket Hilts replied, “Don’t forsake a good turn when it is offered to you, fair mistress Audrey — that’s your name, I take it?”

“I am no Mistress, sir. My name is Audrey.”

She was no Mistress — “Mistress” was a polite title for a female head of household, and Audrey was still not married. She, however, was a woman whom men loved and so she was a mistress in that (nonsexual) sense.

Basket Hilts said, “Well, it so happens that there is a bold young squire, the blood — lively aristocratic man — of Totten Court, Tub, and Tripoly —”

“Squire Tub, you mean,” Audrey said. “I know him; he knows me, too.”

“He is in love with you; and more, he’s mad for you,” Basket Hilts said.

“Aye, so he told me — he is in his wits, I think,” Audrey said. “But he’s too fine for me, and he has a Lady Tub as his mother.”

“Lady” was a higher title than “Squire.”

Squire Tub entered the scene.

Seeing him, Audrey said, “Here he comes himself!”

— 2.4 —

“Oh, you are a trusty governor!” Squire Tub said to Basket Hilts.

“What ails you?” Basket Hilts said. “You do not know when you’re well, I think. You’d have the calf with the white face, sir, would you? I have her for you here; what more do you want?”

A calf with a white face is a pretty calf or a pretty fool.

“Quietness, Hilts, and I would hear no more of it,” Squire Tub said.

“No more of it, do you say?” Basket Hilts said. “I do not care if some of us had not heard so much of it, I tell you truly. A man must carry and vetch like Bungy’s dog for you.”

Friar Bungay was a magician; the familiar spirits of magicians had the form of animals.

Squire Tub asked, “What’s he?”

Basket Hilts answered:

“A spaniel — and scarcely be spit in the mouth for it.”

In this society, people believed that dogs liked to be spit in the mouth and so it was a sign of approval.

“A good dog deserves, sir, a good bone, from a free — generous — master.

“But, if your turns are served and you have gotten what you needed, the devil a bit — not at all — you care for a man after, ever a lard — lord — of you.

“‘Like will to like, indeed,’ quoth the scabbed squire to the mangy knight, when both met in a dish of buttered vish.”

A proverb stated, “A scabbed horse is good enough for a scabbed squire.”

Normally, a squire and a knight might meet over a dish of buttered fish while sharing a meal.

Basket Hilts continued:

“One bad, there’s never a good —”

A proverb stated, “One bad, the other worse.”

Another proverb stated, “One bad apple spoils the barrel.”

Basket Hilts continued:

“— and not a barrel better herring among you.”

In other words: You lords and masters are all alike — bad.

Squire Tub said:

“Nay, Hilts, please, don’t grow frampold [peevish and disagreeable] now.

“Turn not the bad cow after thy good sope [draught].”

A proverb stated that “a curst cow gives a good pail of milk but throws it down with her heels.” That is, a cursed cow gives a good pail of milk but then kicks it over with her hoof.

In other words: You have done something good; don’t ruin it now by doing something bad.

Squire Tub continued:

“Our plot has hitherto taken good effect; and should it now be troubled or stopped up, it would prove to be the utter ruin of my hopes.

“I ask thee to hasten to Pancridge, to the Chanon [Chanon Hugh], and give him notice of our good success. Tell him to make all things in readiness.

“Pretty Audrey and myself will cross the fields, using the nearest path.

“Good Hilts, make thou some haste, and meet us on the way.”

He then said, “Come, gentle Audrey.”

Basket Hilts said:

“Vaith, I wish I had a few more geances for it!”

The word “geances” may mean 1) a rustic pronunciation of “chances,” 2) a rustic pronunciation of lira “genovese,” aka small Genovese coins, or 2) “’geances,” aka acts of vengeance.

The best answer is probably that he would like a reward for his work: some coins.

Basket Hilts continued:

“If you say the word, send me to Jericho.

“Outcept [Unless] a man were a post-horse, I have not known the like of it; yet if he had kind words, it would never irk ’hun [him].

“But a man may break his heart out in these days and get a flap with a foxtail when he has done.

“And there is all!”

The idiom “get a flap with a foxtail” means “be scorned for his efforts.”

Squire Tub said:

“No, don’t say that, Hilts.”

He gave him some money and said:

“Wait a moment, there are crowns [coins] — my love and respect for you bestows them on thee for thy reward.

“If gold will please thee, all my land shall drop in bounty thus, to recompense thy merit.”

Basket Hilts said:

“Tut, keep your land and your gold, too, sir. I seek neither-nother [neither] of ’hun [them]. Learn to get more: You will know to spend that zum you have early enough.

“You are assured of me. I love you too, too well to live on the spoil of you — money plundered from you.

“For your own sake, I wish that there were no worse than I!

“All is not gold that glisters [glistens].

“I’ll go to Pancridge.”

Filled with emotion, he exited, weeping.

Squire Tub said:

“See how his love does melt him into tears! An honest, faithful servant is a jewel.

“Now the adventurous Squire has time and leisure to ask his Audrey how she is doing, and to hear a grateful answer from her.”

He waited a moment, and then he said:

“She does not speak.

“Has the proud tyrant, frost, usurped the seat of former beauty in my love’s fair cheek, staining the roseate tincture of her blood with the dull dye of blue-congealing cold?

“No, surely the weather dares not so presume to hurt an object of her brightness.

“Yet the more I view her, she but looks so, so.

“Ha! Give me leave — permission — to search this mystery!

“Oh, now I have it.”

He said to Audrey, “Bride, I know your grief. The last night’s cold has bred in you such horror of the assigned bridegroom’s constitution, the Kilburn claypit — that frost-bitten marl [fertilizer], that lump in courage, melting cake of ice — that the conceit [understanding] thereof has almost killed thee.

“But I must do thee good, wench, and refresh thee.”

He was saying that she was upset because she had discovered that John Clay was a robber.

“You are a merry man, Squire Tub of Totten Court!” Audrey said. “I have heard much of your words, but not of your deeds.”

“Thou say the truth, sweet,” Squire Tub said. “I have been too slack in deeds.”

“Yet I was never so strait-laced — so grudging — to you, Squire,” Audrey said.

“Why, did you ever love me, gentle Audrey?” Squire Tub asked.

“Love you? I cannot tell,” Audrey said. “I must hate nobody, my father says.”

“Yes, Clay and Kilburn,” Squire Tub said. “Audrey, you must hate them.”

If she married him, she would have to hate John Clay and the village from which he came: Kilburn.

“It shall be for your sake then,” Audrey said.

To love a higher-class man such as Squire Tub, she believed that she would have to hate some lower-class people and places.

“And ‘for my sake’ shall yield you that gratuity,” Squire Tub said.

The “gratuity” was meant to be a kiss.

He attempted to kiss her, but she pushed him back.

“Soft and fair, Squire,” Audrey said. “There go two words to a bargain.”

In this context, “soft and fair” meant “not so fast.” She wanted to be treated soft and fair: gently and fairly and with respect.

“What are those two words, Audrey?” Squire Tub asked.

“Soft and fair” can mean “gentle and beautiful.”

Audrey could bring these qualities to a marriage to Squire Tub that would give her a rise in social status.

“Nay, I cannot tell,” Audrey said. “My mother said, zure [to be sure], if you married me, you’d make me a lady the first week, and put me in I know not what, the very day.”

He would make her a lady, and he would do a second thing.

“What was it?” Squire Tub asked about the second thing. “Speak, gentle Audrey, thou shall have it yet.”

Audrey answered:

“A velvet dressing for my head is, they say, something that will make one brave — splendid.

“I will not know Bess Moale nor Margery Turnup; I will look another way upon them, and I will be proud.”

“Moale” may mean “mo’ ale” or “more ale,” and “Turnup” is similar to “Turnip.” “Moale” can also mean “mole.” “Turnup” can also mean “turn up,” as in an upturned nose. Food that turns one’s stomach is food that the stomach rejects and revolts against.

She would no longer be friends with her friends because of her rise in society. She would look down on them.

Marriage to Squire Tub would put her in fine clothing and would put her in a position where, she thought, she would have to look down on her friends.

Squire Tub said to himself:

“Truly, I could wish my wench a better wit. I could wish that she were more intelligent.”

Possibly, they were not communicating. Possibly, Audrey believed that if she became Squire Tub’s wife, he would want her to become proud and look down on her friends. But possibly, Squire Tub wanted her to hate her former beau, John Clay, but not to look down on her friends, After all, he had shown sensitivity to Basket Hilts’ feelings.

But possibly, Audrey did not want to be proud. Possibly, she was resisting marriage with Squire Tub, whom she believed was too socially high-ranking for her.

Squire Tub continued speaking to himself:

“But what she lacks in intelligence, her face supplies — makes up for.

“There is a sharply pointed luster — beauty — in her eye that has shot quite through me and has hit my heart, and thence it is I first received the wound that rankles and festers now, which only she can cure.

“Eagerly would I escape from this state of mind, but, being flesh, I cannot. I must love her, the naked truth is; and I will go on, were it for nothing but to cross my rivals.”

He then said out loud:

“Come, Audrey, I am now resolved to have thee.”

He wanted her to be his wife.

— 2.5 —

Justice Preamble and Miles Metaphor entered the scene.

Miles Metaphor was dressed as a pursuivant, a royal messenger. A pursuivant-at-arms has the legal authority to make arrests.

“Do it quickly, Miles,” Justice Preamble said. “Why do thou shake, man? Just speak his name; I’ll second thee myself.”

Justice Preamble was saying that Miles Metaphor need only speak the name of the man he was “arresting.” Justice Preamble would do what else needed to be done.

“What is his name?” Miles Metaphor asked.

“Squire Tripoly, or Tub,” Justice Preamble said. “Anything ___”

They walked over to Squire Tub.

Miles Metaphor said, “Squire Tub, I arrest you in the queen’s majesty’s name, and the name of all the Privy Council’s.”

“Arrest me, varlet?” Squire Tub said.

“Keep the peace, I order you,” Justice Preamble said.

“Are you there, Justice Bramble?” Squire Tub asked. “Where’s your warrant?”

Justice Preamble answered, “The warrant is directed here to me, from the whole Privy Council table; wherefore I would ask you to be patient, Squire, and make good the peace.”

He had no warrant, so he lied and said that the Privy Council table was sending him one.

Squire Tub replied, “Well, at your pleasure, Justice. I am wronged.”

He then asked Miles Metaphor, “Sirrah, who are you who have arrested me?”

“He is a pursuivant-at-arms, Squire Tub,” Justice Preamble said.

“I am a pursuivant,” Miles Metaphor said. “You can see by my coat.”

Miles Metaphor was wearing a pursuivant’s distinctive coat.

“Well, pursuivant, go with me,” Squire Tub said. “I’ll give you bail.”

Justice Preamble said:

“Sir, he may take no bail. It is a warrant in special from the Council, and it commands your personal appearance.

“Sir, I must take your weapon and then deliver you as a prisoner to this officer.”

He took Squire Tub’s sword and said:

“Squire Tub, I ask you to conceive of me no other than as your friend and neighbor.

“Let my person be severed from my office in the deed I am performing here, and I am clear and beyond reproof.”

He then said to Miles Metaphor:

“Here, pursuivant, receive him into your hands, and treat him like a gentleman.”

“I thank you, sir,” Squire Tub said. “But where must I go now?”

Justice Preamble replied:

“Nay, that must not be told you until you come to the place assigned by his instructions.

“I’ll be the maiden’s convoy — her escort — to her father for this time, Squire.”

Squire Tub said:

“I thank you, Master Bramble. I doubt or fear you will make her the balance — the scales of justice — to weigh your justice in. Please, do me right and don’t lead her, at least, out of the way.

“Justice is blind, and having a blind guide,

“She may be apt to slip aside.”

Squire Tub realized that Justice Preamble wanted to marry Audrey.

“I’ll see to her,” Justice Preamble said.

“See” means “look after,” but in this context it means that Justice Preamble would not be blind justice.

Justice Preamble and Audrey exited.

Squire Tub said:

“I see my wooing will not thrive. Arrested just as I had set my rest up — made a firm decision — for a wife, and being so fair for it, as I was! Everything was working out well!

“Well, Lady Fortune, thou are a blind bawd and a beggar, too, to cross me thus, and let my only rival get her from me! That’s the spite of spites.”

Whom does Squire Tub regard as his only rival?

His only rival was Justice Preamble, who intended to marry Audrey at Pancridge church.

John Clay was out of the picture because he was suspected of being a robber.

Squire Tub continued:

“But what I most wonder at is that I, being none of the court, am sent for thither by the Council.

“My heart is not as light as it was in the morning.”

— 2.6 —

Basket Hilts entered the scene and said to Squire Tub:

“You mean to make a hoyden — a fool — or a hare of me, to hunt counter thus and to make these doubles.”

“Doubles” are sharp turns, sometimes moving back on the course, and “to hunt counter” means to follow the scent of the hunted prey in the wrong direction — away from, not toward, the prey.

He continued:

“And you mean no such thing as you send about — as you said you would do!

“Where’s your sweetheart now, I wonder?”

He was wondering why Audrey wasn’t present. Basket Hilts had gone to a lot of trouble to get her for his master: Squire Tub.

“Oh, Hilts!” Squire Tub said.

Basket Hilts said:

“I know you of old! Never halt — that is, limp — in front of a cripple. Don’t attempt to trick me.

“Will you have a caudle? Where’s your grief and pain, sir? Speak.”

A caudle is a medicinal drink.

“Do you hear me, friend?” Miles Metaphor said to Basket Hilts. “Do you serve this gentleman?”

“What then, sir? What if I do?” Basket Hilts said. “Peradventure yea, peradventure nay. Maybe I do, and maybe I don’t. What’s that to you, sir? Speak.”

“Nay, please, sir, I meant no harm, in truth,” Miles Metaphor said. “But this good gentleman has been arrested.”

Angry, Basket Hilts said, “What! Say that to me again.”

Squire Tub said, “Nay, Basket, never storm. I am arrested here, upon command from the Queen’s Council and I must obey.”

“You say, sir, very truly, that you must obey,” Miles Metaphor said. “You are an honest gentleman, indeed!”

“He must?” Basket Hilts said.

“But that which most torments me is this: Justice Bramble has taken away from here my Audrey,” Squire Tub said.

Basket Hilts said:

“What! What!

“Stand aside a little, sirrah, you with the badge on your breast. Let’s know, sir, who and what you are.”

Miles Metaphor said, “I am, sir — please, do not look so terribly angry — a pursuivant.”

“A pursuivant!” Basket Hilts said. “What is your name, sir?”

Miles Metaphor said, “My name, sir —”

“What is it?” Basket Hilts interrupted. “Speak!”

He answered, “Miles Metaphor, and Justice Preamble’s clerk.”

Squire Tub asked Basket Hilts, “What does he say?”

Basket Hilts said, “Please, let us alone.”

He then asked Miles Metaphor, “You are a pursuivant?”

Afraid, Miles Metaphor answered, “No, indeed, sir, I wish I might never stir from you. I was made a pursuivant against my will.”

“Ha!” Basket Hilts said, “And who made you one? Tell the truth, or my will shall make you nothing, instantly.”

He drew his sword, and Miles Metaphor fell to his knees.

Miles Metaphor said, “Put up your frightful blade, and your dead-doing — death-dealing — look, and I shall tell you everything.”

“Speak then the truth, and the whole truth, and nothing but the truth,” Basket Hilts ordered.

Miles Metaphor said:

“My master, Justice Bramble, hearing that your master, the Squire Tub, was coming on this way with Mistress Audrey, the High Constable’s daughter, made me a pursuivant and gave me warrant — the authority — to arrest him, so that he might get the lady, with whom he has gone to Pancridge, to the vicar, not to her father’s.

“This was the plot, which, I beseech [beseech] you, do not tell my master.”

Squire Tub said, “Oh, wonderful! Well, Basket, let him rise.”

Miles Metaphor rose.

Squire Tub said to him, “Forge some excuse for my free escape. I’ll post — quickly go — to Paddington to acquaint old Tobias Turf with the whole business, and so stop the marriage.”

Squire Tub exited.

Basket Hilts said, “Well, bless thee. I wish thee grace to keep thy master’s secrets better or be hanged.”

Miles Metaphor replied:

“I thank you for your gentle admonition and advice.

“Please, let me call you godfather hereafter.”

Godfathers provide spiritual guidance.

He continued:

“And, as your godson Metaphor, I promise to keep my master’s privities sealed up in the valise — traveling bag — of my trust, locked close and secret forever, or let me be trussed up at Tyburn shortly.”

“Privities” are 1) secrets, and 2) private parts, genitals.

Basket Hilts replied, “May thine own wish save or choke thee! Let’s go.”

They exited.

ACT 3 (A Tale of a Tub)

— 3.1 —

Tobias Turf, Clench, Medley, To-Pan, Scriben, and John Clay stood together outside Tobias Turf's house.

Tobias Turf said:

“By the passion of me, was any man ever thus crossed? All things run arsy-varsy [topsy-turvy], upside down.

“High Constable! Now by Our Lady of Walsingham, I had rather be marked out as a Tom Scavenger, and with a shovel make clean the highways, than have this office of a constable, and a High Constable!”

Walsingham was a place of pilgrimages.

A scavenger was a street-cleaner.

The job of High Constable was turning out to have a lot of responsibility. Tobias Turf had to make a hue and cry after non-existent robbers, although he did not know that they were non-existent. He also had to arrest John Clay, the man who had been about to marry Audrey, the High Constable's daughter.

“The higher the charge, it brings more trouble, more vexation with it.”

The greater the job and responsibility, the more the trouble and the vexation it brings with it.

“Neighbors, good neighbors, 'vize me [advise me] what to do.

“How shall we bear ourselves in this hue and cry?

“We cannot find the Captain; no such man lodged at the Lion or came thither hurt.

“The morning we have spent in privy search, and because of that the bride-ale is deferred. The bride, she’s left alone in Puppy’s charge. The bridegroom, John Clay, goes under a pair of sureties — that is, under two people who have stood bail for him — and he is considered by all as a respected person.”

John Clay was not locked up because he had been bailed out by two people — including Tobias Turf, as will soon become known — who had guaranteed his presence at the time of trial. Now he was assisting in the hue and cry — the search — for the so-called other robbers.

Earlier, everyone had suspected that John Clay was a robber, but now they were returning to their original opinion that he was worthy of respect. That is why two people had stood surety for him.

Tobias Turf concluded:

“How should we bustle forward? Give me some counsel how to bestir our stumps in these cross ways.”

“Stumps” are legs.

Clench said:

“Indeed, gossip Turf, you have, you say, remission [commission] to comprehend [apprehend] all such as are dispected [suspected].

“Now would I make another privy search through this town, and then you have zearched two towns.”

Medley said:

“Masters, take heed, let’s not vind too many. One’s enough to stay the hangman’s stomach.”

That is, one criminal is enough to satisfy the hangman's appetite for hanging.

Medley continued:

"There is John Clay, who is yvound [found] already. He is a proper [handsome] man, a tile-man by his trade. He is a man, as one would zay, molded in clay, as spruce and smart in appearance as any neighbor's child among you."

Saying that a man was molded in wax was a compliment. Such a man was a perfect man, one who resembled a statue.

Medley continued:

"And he — you zee — is taken on conspition [suspicion], and two or three — they zay — what call you 'em?"

"Zuch as the justices of coram nobis [the King's Bench] grant — I forget their names, you have many of them, Master High Constable, they come to you.

"I ha' it at my tongue's end — coney-burrows, to bring him straight avore the zessions house."

Medley was trying to think of the word "warrants"; the word "warrens," meaning a habitat for rabbits, is close to it.

Conies are rabbits, and most species of rabbits burrow into the earth to create homes. A group of coney-burrows is called a warren.

"Oh, you mean warrens [warrants], neighbor, don't you?" Tobias Turf asked.

"Aye, aye, thick same [the very same]! You know 'un [them] well enough," Medley said.

Tobias Turf said:

"Too well, too well; I wish I had never known them!"

“We good vreeholders [freeholders] cannot live in quiet, but every hour new purcepts [precepts, orders], hues and cries, put us to requisitions night and day.”

A freeholder is a person who owns land and is able to dispose of it at will.

“Requisitions” is possibly a portmanteau word combining “requirements” and “inquisitions.” Duties such as raising a hue and cry, however, do requisition and require the High Constable’s time.

“What should a man zay? Should we leave the zearch?

“If I do, I am in danger [liable] to reburse [reimburse] as much as he was robbed of; aye, and pay his hurts [pay for the damage done to him].

“If I should vollow it [continue the search], all the good cheer — food — that was provided for the wedding dinner will be spoiled and lost. Oh, there are two vat pigs a-zindging [being singed] by the vire [fire], now by Saint Tony, too good to eat except on a wedding-day.”

Saint Anthony the Abbot (not Saint Anthony of Padua), aka Saint Anthony of the Desert, is the patron saint of swineherds.

“And then there is also being cooked a goose that will bid you all, ‘Come cut me!’”

A proverb stated, “Here is a goose so finely roasted it cries, ‘Come eat me.’”

“Zun Clay, zun Clay — for I must call thee so — be of good comfort; take my muckinder [handkerchief] and dry thine eyes.”

John Clay, Tobias Turf’s still prospective son-in-law, had been crying.

A possible punishment for robbery was hanging.

“If thou are true and honest, and if thou find thy conscience clear vrom [from] it [the robbery you are suspected of committing], pluck up a good heart [cheer up]: We’ll do well enough.

“If not, confess, in truth’s name.

“But in faith, I dare to be sworn upon all holy books that John Clay would never commit a robbery on his own head.”

“On his own head” means 1) against himself (i.e., he would never rob himself), and/or 2) on his own responsibility.

John Clay said:

“No, truth is my rightful judge; I have kept my hands here hence [away] from evil speaking, lying, and slandering, and my tongue from stealing.

“The man does not live this day who can say ‘John Clay, I have zeen thee, except in the way of honesty.’”

This meant: All who have seen me, John Clay, have never seen me be dishonest.

To-Pan said, “Indeed, neighbor Medley, I dare to be his borrow [security] that he would not look a true man in the vace.”

Of course, if John Clay were honest, he would look a true man in the face.

John Clay said:

“I take the town to concord [agree], where I dwell, all Kilburn be my witness, if I were not begot in bashfulness, brought up in shamefacedness [modesty].

“Let ’un [them] bring a dog but to my vace, that can zay I ha’ beat ’hun [him], and without a vault [fault].”

In other words, when John Clay beats a dog, the dog deserves it.

John Clay continued:

“Or but a cat that will swear upon a book I have as much as zet avire [set on fire] her tail, and I’ll give him or her a crown for ’mends [amends].

“But to give out and zay I have robbed a captain!

“Receive me at the latter day, if I ever thought of any such matter, or could mind it —”

The latter day is the Day of Judgment. Instead of “Receive me,” he meant, “Refuse me,” aka “Reject and condemn me.”

In-and-In Medley said:

“No, John, you are come of too good personage [family].

“I think my gossip [friend] Clench and Master Turf both think you would attempt no such vould matter.”

Tobias Turf said:

“But how unhappily it comes to pass just on the wedding-day!

“I beg your mercy, I had almost forgotten the hue and cry.

“Good neighbor Pan, you are the thirdborough [petty constable], and D’ogenes Scriben, you are my learned writer, so make out a new purcept [precept].”

A precept is a writ or warrant. The warrant would be for the men they were pursuing in a hue and cry.

“Lord, for thy goodness, I had forgotten my daughter all this while!

“The idle knave has brought no news from her.”

Seeing Ball Puppy coming, he said:

“Here comes the sneaking Puppy.

“What’s the news? My heart! My heart! I fear all is not well. Something’s misshaped [mis-happed, gone wrong] since he has come without Audrey.”

— 3.2 —

Ball Puppy and Dame Turf entered the scene.

Ball Puppy said, “Oh, where’s my master? My master! My master!”

Dame Turf said, “Thy master! What would thou want with thy master, man?”

She pointed to her husband and said, “There’s thy master.”

“What’s the matter, Puppy?” Tobias Turf asked.

“Oh, master!” Ball Puppy said. “Oh, dame! Oh, dame! Oh, master!”

“What do thou want to say to thy master, or thy dame?” Dame Turf asked.

“Oh, John Clay! John Clay! John Clay!” Ball Puppy cried.

“What about John Clay?” Tobias Turf asked.

“May good fortune grant that he doesn’t bring us news that John Clay shall be hanged!” Medley said.

“The world forfend [forbid]!” Clench said. “I hope it is not so well [he meant ‘ill’].”

“Oh, Lord!” John Clay said. “Oh, me, what shall I do? Poor John!”

In this society, salted fish were called “poor john.”

“Oh, John Clay! John Clay! John Clay!” Ball Puppy cried.

John Clay said to himself, “Woe to me that I was ever born! I will not stay and endure it, for all the tiles in Kilburn.”

Unobserved, he fled.

“What about Clay?” Dame Turf asked. “Speak, Puppy. What about him?”

Ball Puppy began, “He has lost, he has lost —”

Tobias Turf said, “For luck’s sake speak, Puppy. What has he lost?”

“Oh, Audrey, Audrey, Audrey!” Ball Puppy said.

“What about my daughter, Audrey?” Dame Turf said.

Ball Puppy said, “I tell you, Audrey — do you understand me? Audrey, sweet master, Audrey, my dear dame —”

“Where is she?” Tobias Turf asked. “What’s become of her, I ask thee?”

Ball Puppy said, “Oh, the serving-man! The serving-man! The serving-man!”

He was talking about Basket Hilts.

Tobias Turf asked, “Why do thou talk about the serving-man? Where’s Audrey?”

“Gone with the serving-man! Gone with the serving-man!” Ball Puppy said.

“Good Puppy, where has she gone with him?” Dame Turf asked.

Ball Puppy said:

“I cannot tell.

“He bade me bring you word that the Captain was staying at the Lion, and before I came back, Audrey was gone with the serving-man.

“I tell you, Audrey’s run away with the serving-man.”

Tobias Turf said, “‘Od ’socks, my woman, what shall we do now?”

“‘Od ’socks” is a mild curse: “By God’s socks.”

According to the Oxford English Dictionary, the word “godsokers” is “Used as an exclamation or oath expressing surprise or affirmation.”

Dame Turf said, “Now, if you don’t help, man, I don’t know, I.”

Tobias Turf said, “This was your pomp — unnecessary train — of maids! I told you about it. Six maids to vollow you, and leave not one to wait upon your daughter! I zaid Pride would be paid her old vippence [fivepence] one day, wife.”

In other words, pride would get its deserts.

A proverb states, “Pride goes before a fall.”

A common expression of the time was “as fine as fivepence.”

Dame Turf should have allowed one of her maids to wait on Audrey and serve as a chaperone.

Medley asked Ball Puppy, “What about John Clay, Ball Puppy?”

Ball Puppy began, “He has lost —”

Medley interrupted, “His life for a felony [felony]?”

Ball Puppy said, “No, his wife by villainy.”

Tobias Turf said:

“Now villains both! Oh, that same hue and cry! Oh, neighbors! Oh, that cursèd serving-man! Oh, maids! Oh, wife!

“But John Clay, where is he?”

Everyone looked around for him, but he had fled.

“What! Fled for veer [fear], zay ye? Will he slip us now? [Will he give us the slip now?] We who are sureties must require [inquire about and seek] ’hun [him] out.

“What shall we do to find the serving-man?

“Cock’s bodikins [By God’s body], we must not lose John Clay!

“Audrey, my daughter Audrey, too! Let us zend to all the towns and zeek her; but alas, the hue and cry, that must be looked to!”

If he found the serving-man, Basket Hilts, he believed that he would find his daughter, Audrey.

Squire Tub entered the scene and asked, “What, in a passion, Turf?”

Tobias Turf replied, “Aye, good Squire Tub. Honest varmers [farmers] were never thus perplexed.”

Squire Tub replied:

“Turf, I am privy to — I know — thy deep unrest, the ground of which springs from an idle plot laid for a suitor to your daughter Audrey — and thus much, Turf, let me advertise [advise] you.

“I met your daughter Audrey on the way, with Justice Bramble in her company, who intends to marry her at Pancridge church. And Chanon Hugh is there ready to meet them.

“To prevent this marriage, you must not trust delay, but with wingèd speed you must cross and oppose their sly intent.”

A proverb stated, “Delay in love is dangerous.”

Squire Tub continued:

“So then hie — hurry — thee, Turf; hasten to forbid the bans.”

He wanted Tobias Turf to stop the marriage.

Tobias Turf replied:

“Has Justice Bramble got my daughter Audrey? A little while shall he enjoy her, zure.”

He meant that Justice Bramble would enjoy her for only a little while. A bawdy cynic might say that he would enjoy her for about fifteen minutes.

“But oh, the hue and cry! That hinders me; I must pursue that or neglect my journey.”

He could pursue the hue and cry in search of the “robbers” (and John Clay), or he would neglect his journey to take John Clay to Paddington.

Of course, if he pursued the hue and cry, he would not be able to stop the marriage of his daughter to Justice Preamble.

“I’ll even leave all, and with the patient ass, the over-laden ass, throw off my burden, and cast aside my office; pluck in my large ears betimes [while I have time], lest some disjudge ’em [misjudge them] to be horns.”

A proverb stated, “An ass endures his burden, but not more than his burden.”

In the fable “The Hare and Its Ears,” a lion was angry at all animals that have horns, and so a hare avoided the lion lest the hare’s long ears be mistaken for horns.

Thomas Dekker in his play Match Me in London, wrote, “If the lion say the ass’s ears are horns, the ass, if he be wise, will swear it.”

“I’ll leave [cease] to beat it on the broken hoof and ease my pasterns.”

Tobias Turf was going to quit before he suffered any more.

Pasterns are the horse’s ankles.

“I’ll no more High Constables.”

He would no longer carry out the responsibilities of a High Constable.

Squire Tub said:

“I cannot choose but smile to see thee troubled with such a bald, half-hatchèd [badly thought-out] circumstance!

“The Captain [Chanon Hugh in disguise] was not robbed, as is reported; that trick the Justice craftily devised to break the marriage with the tile-man Clay.

“The hue and cry was merely counterfeit.”

It was counterfeit because it was based on a lie.

How did Squire Tub learn this?

Earlier, Miles Metaphor had told Squire Tub that the warrant against him, supposedly from the Queen’s Council, was a fake. Miles Metaphor, however, had not stated that the hue and cry against John Clay was based on a lie. Squire Tub had then left to inform Tobias Turf that Tobias’ daughter was in danger of being married to Justice Preamble.

Squire Tub continued:

“The rather may you judge it to be such because the bridegroom was described to be one of the thieves, first in the velony.”

The phrase “first in the velony” meant that he was the leader of the criminals committing the felony.

Squire Tub continued:

“Which, how far it is from him, yourselves may guess.

“It was Justice Bramble’s vetch [fetch, aka trick], to get the wench.”

Squire Tub had used his power of reasoning to figure out that the hue and cry against John Clay was based on a lie.

“And is this true, Squire Tub?” Tobias Turf asked.

Squire Tub replied, “Believe me, Turf, as I am a squire; or less, a gentleman.”

A squire ranks below a knight and above a gentleman.

Some people may consider having the qualities (rather than the rank) of a gentleman to be more important than having a high social rank.

Tobias Turf said:

“I take my office back, and my authority, upon Your Worship’s words.”

He then said:

“Neighbors, I am High Constable again.

“Where’s my zon Clay? He shall be my zon [son-in-law] yet.

“Wife, your meat by leisure: Draw back the spits.”

The phrase “your meat by leisure” means “your food without haste.” Tobias Turf wanted his wife to strive to keep the meat warm so it could be eaten later without being overcooked. Drawing back the spits meant that the meat would not be directly over the fire.

“That’s done already, man,” Dame Turf said.

Tobias Turf said:

“I’ll break off this marriage between Justice Preamble and Audrey; and afterward, she shall be given to her first betrothed: John Clay.

“Look after the meat, wife, look well to the roast.”

He exited with Clench, Medley, To-Pan, and Scriben.

“I’ll follow him aloof — at a distance — to see the outcome,” Squire Tub said.

He exited.

Ball Puppy said, “Dame, mistress, although I do not turn the spit, I hope yet to have the pig’s head.”

He wanted to eat the head of one of the pigs roasting on a spit.

“Come up, Jack-sauce — you impudent fellow — it shall be served to you,” Dame Turf said.

“No, no service,” Ball Puppy said, “but a reward for service.”

“I always took you for an unmannerly Puppy,” Dame Turf said. “Will you come, and vetch more wood to the vire, Master Ball?”

Ball Puppy said:

“I, vetch wood to the vire? I shall piss the vire out first. You think to make me even your ox, or ass, or anything.

“Although I cannot right myself and get revenge for myself on you, I’ll sure revenge myself on your meat.”

They exited.

— 3.4 —

Lady Tub, Pol-Marten, and Wisp talked together.

Pol-Marten said:

“Madam, to Kentish Town we have arrived at length, but by the way we cannot meet the Squire, nor by inquiry can we hear of him.

“Here is the house of Turf, the father of the maiden.”

Lady Tub said:

“Pol-Marten, look, the streets are strewed with herbs, and here has been a wedding, Wisp, it seems! I pray to Heaven that this bridal — this wedding — is not for my son!

“Good Marten, knock; knock quickly; ask for Turf.

“My thoughts misgive me and make me apprehensive, I am in such a fear —”

Pol-Marten knocked and said loudly, “Who keeps the house here?”

From inside Tobias Turf’s house, Ball Puppy answered, “Why, the door and walls keep the house.”

“I ask then, who’s within?” Pol-Marten asked.

“Not you who are without — outside,” Ball Puppy replied.

“Look forth, and speak into the street, here,” Pol-Marten said. “Come before my lady.”

Ball Puppy replied:

“Before my lady! Lord have mercy upon me.

“If I come before her, she will see the handsomest man in all the town, pardee!”

“Pardee!” means “By God!”

Ball Puppy opened the door, came outside, and said, “Now stand I vore [before] her, what zaith velvet she?”

“Velvet” was a luxurious cloth. Lady Tub was wearing a velvet gown.

“Sirrah, whose man are you?” Lady Tub asked.

“Madam, my master’s,” Ball Puppy answered.

“And who’s thy master?” Lady Tub asked.

“What you tread on, madam,” Ball Puppy answered.

“I tread on an old turf,” Lady Turf said.

“That Turf’s my master,” Ball Puppy said.

“A merry fellow!” Lady Tub said. “What’s thy name?”

“They call me Ball Puppy at home; away from my home, they call me Hannibal Puppy.”

Lady Tub said, “Come hither, I must kiss thee, Valentine Puppy.”

She then asked, “Wisp, have you got yourself a Valentine?”

“None, madam,” Wisp said. “He’s the first stranger whom I saw.”

According to custom, Valentines could be made by chance meetings as well as by the casting of lots.

Lady Tub said, “To me he is so, and such. Let’s share him equally.”

Both Lady Tub and Wisp attempted to kiss Ball Puppy.

He shouted:

“Help, help, good dame! A rescue, and in time!

“Instead of bills, come with colstaves; instead of spears, come with spits. Your slices shall serve for slicing swords, to save me and my wits. A lady and her woman here, their usher also by their side — but he stands mute — have plotted how to divide your Puppy.”

Bills are weapons with long blades. Colstaves are sticks used to carry stuff; spits were used for spit-roasting. Slices are flat kitchen utensils.

Ball Puppy was calling for help from the kitchen staff, who could use common items found in kitchens as weapons.

— 3.5 —

Dame Turf and her maids came outside.

“What is this now? What noise is this with you, Ball Puppy?”
Dame Turf asked.

Ball Puppy said:

“Oh, dame! And fellows of the kitchen! Arm, arm, for my safety, if you love your Ball!

“Here is a strange thing called a Lady, a mad-dame and madam, and a device of hers, yclept [called] her woman [serving-woman].”

The Lady is Lady Tub, and the device (perhaps Ball Puppy meant by “device” a puppet) is Dido Wisp.

Ball Puppy continued:

“They have plotted against me in the king’s highway to steal me from myself, and cut me in halves, to make one Valentine to serve them both. This one for my right-side love, and that one for my left-hand love.”

“So saucy, Puppy?” Dame Turf said. “To show no more reverence than that to my lady and her velvet gown?”

High-ranking women wore velvet gowns.

Lady Tub said:

“Turf’s wife, don’t rebuke him; your serving-man pleases me with his conceit. “

The conceit was the imaginative idea of splitting himself into half-Valentines.

Lady Tub then said to Ball Puppy:

“Wait, there are ten old nobles” — she gave him money —
“to make thee merrier yet, half-Valentine.”

“I thank you, right-side,” Ball Puppy said. “If my left-side could give me as much money as you have, it would make me a man of mark: young Hannibal!”

Nobles and marks are kinds of money.

Lady Tub said:

“Dido shall make that good, or I will for her.

“Here, Dido Wisp, there’s something for your Hannibal.”

Lady Tub gave her money, and then she said:

“He is your countryman, as well as your Valentine.”

Dido was a famous Queen of Carthage, and Hannibal was a famous general of Carthage.

Dido Wasp handed Hannibal Puppy the money and said, “Here, Master Hannibal: This is my lady’s bounty for her poor woman, Wisp.”

Ball Puppy said, “Brave Carthage queen! And such was Dido: I will forever be champion to her, who Juno is to thee.”

The goddess Juno supported Carthage, not Rome. In an attempt to prevent the Trojan Prince Aeneas from going to Italy and becoming an important ancestor of the Romans, she made Dido fall in love with Aeneas, hoping that Aeneas would stay in Carthage.

In Ball Puppy’s comparison, Lady Tub was Juno, and Dido Wisp was the Queen of Carthage.

Dame Turf said, “Your Ladyship is very welcome here. May it please you, good madam, to go near the house.”

“Turf’s wife, I come thus far to seek thy husband, having some business to impart to him,” Ball Puppy said. “Is he at home?”

Dame Turf said:

“Oh, no, if it shall please you. He is posted hence to Pancridge, with a witness.”

“With a witness” is an idiom for “hastily.”

Dame Turf continued:

“Young Justice Bramble has kept level coil [made a disturbance] here in our quarters and stolen away our daughter, and Master Turf’s run after, as fast as he can, to stop the marriage, if it can be stopped.”

“Level coil” is the game lever le cul, aka changing chairs.

Pol-Marten said, “Madam, these tidings are not much amiss, for if the Justice should have the maiden in keep [under his control], you need not fear the marriage of your son to her.”

Lady Tub said, “That somewhat eases my suspicious breast.”

She then asked, “Tell me, Turf’s wife, when was my son with Audrey? How long has it been since you saw him at your house?”

Ball Puppy said to Dame Turf, “Dame, let me take this rump out of your mouth.”

Ball Puppy was pretending that he didn’t want to use the word “tale,” which when spelled “tail” can mean “butt,” but of course the use of “rump” in this sentence is indelicate.

“What mean you by that, sir?” Dame Turf asked.

Ball Puppy said, “Rump and tail’s all one. But I would use a reverence for my lady. I would not zay, sir-reverence, ‘Take the tale out of your mouth,’ but rather ‘Take the rump.’”

“Sir-reverence,” aka “save your reverence,” was used to mean “excrement.” It also was used to apologize for using an indelicate phrase.

“To take the tale out of someone’s mouth” meant “to tell the tale for someone.”

“A well-bred youth!” Dame Turf said. “And vull of favor — attractive features — you are.”

Ball Puppy said:

“What might they zay, when I were gone, if I did not weigh my wordz? ‘This Puppy is a vool; Great Hannibal’s an ass: He had no breeding.’”

“No, Lady gay [Lady Tub], you shall not zay that your Val [Valentine] Puppy was so unlucky in speech as to fail and name a tail, be as be may be, ’vore a fair lady.”

“Stop jesting,” Lady Tub said. “Tell us when you saw our son.”

Ball Puppy began to pun on sun/son.

“By the Virgin Mary, it is two hours ago,” he said.

“Since you saw him?” Lady Tub asked.

“You might have seen him too, if you had looked up,” Ball Puppy said. “For it shined as bright as day.”

“I mean my son,” Lady Tub said.

“Your sun and our sun, are they not all one?” Ball Puppy asked.

“Fool, thou mistake my word. I asked thee for my son!”
Lady Tub said.

“I had thought there had been no more sons than one,” Ball Puppy said. “I know not what you ladies have — or may have.”

Some ladies may have more sons than they acknowledge having.

Pol-Marten asked, “Didn’t thou ever hear my lady had a son?”

Ball Puppy replied:

“She may have twenty; but for a son, unless she mean precisely Squire Tub, her zon, he was here just now, and brought my master word that Justice Bramble had got Mistress Audrey.

“But to where he has gone, here’s none can tell.”

Lady Tub said to Pol-Marten:

“Marten, I wonder at this strange discourse.

“The fool, it seems, is telling the truth; my son the Squire was doubtless here this morning.

“As for the match, I’ll smother what I think, and staying here, I’ll attend the sequel of this strange beginning.”

She then said:

“Turfs’ wife, my people and I will trouble thee, until we hear some tidings of thy husband; the rather for my parti-Valentine.”

Lady Tub and Dido Wisp would stay here at the Turfs’ home partly so they could be close to their half-Valentine: Ball Puppy.

They went inside the house.

— 3.6 —

Tobias Turf, Audrey, Clench, Medley, To-Pan, and Scriben talked together.

Tobias Turf had done a heroic deed: He had rescued his daughter from a man who had attempted to carry her away and marry her. Now he was thinking about his place in future pageants celebrating heroes.

He said:

“Well, I have succeeded, and I will triumph over this justice as becomes a constable, and a High Constable.”

Roman generals who won notable victories over enemy armies were allowed to ride into Rome triumphal processions with their army, spoils, and prisoners. These were great honors.

He continued:

“Next to our Saint George, who rescued the king’s daughter, I will ride; I will ride ahead of Prince Arthur.”

Saint George is the patron saint of England. One of his exploits was killing a dragon.

Prince Arthur may be King Arthur or, possibly, King Henry VIII’s elder brother.

Tobias Turf and his friends began to discuss some other people who could appear in a pageant with the High Constable.

“Or ahead of our Shoreditch Duke,” Clench said.

“Or Pancridge Earl,” Medley said.

The Shoreditch Duke and the Pancridge Earl are mock-aristocratic titles given to champion archers of the Finsbury Archers.

“Or Bevis, or Sir Guy, who were both High Constables,” To-Pan said.

Sir Bevis of Hampton and Sir Guy, who married the heiress of Warwick, were heroes of medieval romances.

Clench said, “One of Southampton —”

Medley said, “— the other of Warwick Castle.”

Tobias Turf said, “You shall work my exploit into a story for me, neighbor Medley, over my chimney.”

The story would be a narrative in pictures. Medley was a carpenter, and so the story would perhaps be an inlaid panel.

Scriben said, “I can give you, sir, a Roman story of a petty constable, who had a daughter who was called Virginia, similar to Mistress Audrey, and as young as she, and I can tell how her father bare [bore] himself in the business against Justice Appius, a decemvir in Rome, and justice of assize.”

Virginia’s father killed her rather than give her to the evil Appius Claudius. Livy tells the story in his History of Rome, Book 3, Chapters 44-49.

A decemvir was a justice, one of a group of ten, in ancient Rome.

Tobias Turf said, “That, that, good D’ogenes! A learned man is a chronicle.”

“I can tell you a thousand stories about great Pompey, Caesar, Trajan, all the High Constables there,” Scriben said.

“That was their place!” Tobias Turf said. “They were no more.”

“Dictator and High Constable were both the same positions,” Scriben said.

“High Constable was a higher position, though!” Medley said. “He laid Dick Tator by the heels.”

“Dick Tator” is Medley’s interpretation of “dictator.”

“Dick Tooter!” To-Pan said.

“Dick Tooter” is To-Pan’s interpretation of “Dick Tator.”

To-Pan continued, “He was one of the waits — musicians — of the city, I have read about ’hun [him]. He was a fellow who would be drunk, debauched — and he did zet ’un [him] in the stocks indeed: His name was Vadian, and a cunning Tooter.”

A tooter likely plays a wind instrument.

In To-Pan’s dialect, V is often used for F.

A Fabian is a member of the Roman gens (family) Fabia. This was a patrician family name.

In 221 and 217 B.C.E., Quintus Fabius Maximus Verrucosis — known as Cunctator — was Roman Dictator. “Cunctator” means “Delayer,” and as dictator he harassed the Carthaginian general Hannibal’s army without ever fighting it in open battle. This is probably the “Vadian” To-Pan meant.

Audrey said:

“Was a silly maid ever thus posted — handed — off, who should have had three husbands in one day, yet, by bad fortune, am possessed of — the owner of, or possessed by — none?”

“I went to church and would have been wed to Clay.

“Then Squire Tub seized me on the way and thought to have had me, but he missed his aim.”

In bawdy terms, Squire Tub’s “arrow” did not hit its feminine target.

Audrey continued:

“And Justice Bramble, nearest of the three, was almost married to me, when by chance in rushed my father and broke off that dance.”

Sex can be likened to a kind of dance.

Tobias Turf said:

“Aye, girl, there’s never a justice among them all who shall teach the Constable how to guard his own.

“Let’s go back to Kentish Town, and there make merry. These news will be glad tidings to my wife.

“Thou shall have Clay, my wench; that word shall stand.”

In Elizabethan slang the word “stand” can meant “erection.”

“He’s found by this time, surely, or else he’s drowned.

“The wedding dinner will be spoiled; make haste.”

Audrey said, “Husbands, they say, grow thick but thin are sown. I don’t care who my husband shall be, as long as I have one.”

The word “thick” can mean “stupid.”

A part of a husband can grow thick during the wedding night but then become thin once the sowing is done.

A farmer’s proverb stated, “Thick sown but thin came up.”

Tobias Turf said, “Aye, zay you zo? Perhaps you shall have none for that. [Perhaps you don’t deserve one.]”

“Now out on me!” Audrey said. “What shall I do then?”

“Sleep, Mistress Audrey, dream about proper, handsome men,” Medley said.

They exited.

— 3.7 —

Chanon Hugh and Justice Preamble talked together in Justice Preamble’s house.

Chanon Hugh said:

“O bone Deus! [Oh, good God!] Have you seen the like?”

“Here was, ‘Hodge hold thine ear fair, while I strike.’”

This was an idiomatic expression for a brawl.

“By the body of me, how did this gear — this trouble — come about?”

Justice Preamble said:

“I don’t know, Chanon, but it falls out contrary to what we wanted. Nor can I make conjecture by the circumstance of these events; it was impossible, being so close and politicly — secretly and shrewdly — carried, to come so quickly to the ears of Turf.

“Oh, priest, had thy slow delivery just been nimble, and thy lazy Latin tongue you had just run the forms over with that swift dispatch — speed — as had been requisite and needed, all would have been well!”

Chanon Hugh said:

“What should have been, that never loved the friar.”

A proverb stated, “What was good, the friar never loved.”

In other words: It would have been good to be quick, but that’s not my — Chanon Hugh’s — way.

He continued:

“But thus you see the old adage verified, multa cadunt inter — you can guess the rest.”

He then translated the Latin proverb Multa cadunt inter calicem supremaque labra:

“Many things fall between the cup and lip.”

“And though they touch, you are not sure to drink.

“You lacked good fortune, we had done our parts.

“Give a man fortune, throw him in the sea.”

In other words: Good fortune is followed by bad fortune.

A play at this time was titled Give a Man Luck and Throw Him into the Sea.

He continued:

“The properer the man, the worse the luck. Stay a time.

“Tempus edax — in time the stately ox, etc.

“Good counsels usually never come too late.”

The Latin proverb Tempus edax rerum means “Time, consumer of things.”

The full English proverb is “In time the savage ox does bear the yoke.”

Justice Preamble said, “You, sir, will run your counsels out of breath.”

Chanon Hugh said, “Spur a free horse, he’ll run himself to death.”

A proverb stated, “Do not spur a willing horse.”

Miles Metaphor entered the scene.

Seeing him, Chanon Hugh said, “Sancti Evangelistae! [Oh, holy Evangelists!] Here comes Miles!”

“What is the news, man, with our new-made pursuivant?” Justice Preamble asked.

Miles Metaphor said:

“A pursuivant! I wish that I were either more pursy [like a moneybag] and had more store of money, or less pursy [fat] and had more store of breath.

“You call me pursuivant!

“But I could never vaunt of [boast about] any purse I had since you were my godfathers and godmothers and gave me that nickname.”

They had given him the name of “pursuivant” and so they were his godfathers and godmothers.

“What’s the matter now?” Justice Preamble asked.

“Nay, it’s no matter [it’s not important],” Miles Metaphor said. “I have been simply beaten.”

“What has become of the Squire Tub, who was thy prisoner?” Chanon Hugh asked.

Miles Metaphor replied, “The lines of blood, which ran streaming from my head, can speak what rule the Squire has kept with me.”

A ruler can be used to make lines; the Squire had used his ruling power to make lines of blood run down Metaphor's head.

"Please, Miles, relate the manner how that happened," Justice Preamble said.

Miles Metaphor replied:

"Be it known unto you by these presents then, that I, Miles Metaphor, Your Worship's clerk, have even been beaten to an allegory by a multitude of hands."

He had been beaten out of himself, aka he had been beaten so hard that he was no longer metaphor but was instead allegory — all gory.

Miles Metaphor continued:

"Had they been but some five or six, I'd whipped them all like tops in Lent, and hurled them into Hobbler's hole, or the next ditch."

Hobbler's hole is a children's game involving a top and a hole. Possibly, children would try to spin the top in such a way that it would travel to and fall in the hole.

Miles Metaphor continued:

"I would have cracked all their costards — heads — as nimbly as a squirrel will crack nuts, and flourished similar to Hercules, the porter, among the pages."

Hercules was a porter of large size who served Queen Elizabeth I.

Miles Metaphor continued:

"But when they came on like bees about a hive, crows about carrion, flies about sweetmeats, nay, like watermen [ferrymen] about a fare [a customer], then was poor Metaphor glad to give up the honor of the day and surrender, to quit his charge to them, and run away to save his life, only to tell this news.”

Chanon Hugh said:

“How indirectly — how contrary — all things have fallen out!

“I cannot choose but wonder who they were who rescued your rival from the keep of Miles Metaphor.

“But most of all, I cannot well digest in what way Tobias Turf came to learn our plot.”

Justice Preamble said:

“Miles, I will see that all thy wounds are medically dressed.

“As for the Squire Tub’s escape, it doesn’t matter. We have by this means disappointed him, and that was all the main thing I aimed at.

“But Chanon Hugh, now muster up thy wits, and call thy thoughts into the consistory — the ecclesiastical court. Search all the secret corners of thy priest’s four-cornered cap to find another ingenious scheme to disappoint and stop her marriage with this Clay.

“Do that, and I’ll reward thee jovially.”

“Jovially” means “in the manner of the god Jupiter” — that is, handsomely.

Chanon Hugh replied, “Well said, Magister [Scholar] Justice. If I don’t fit you with such a new and well-laid stratagem as never yet your ears did hear a finer, call me with Lily Bos, Fur, Sus, atque Sacerdos.”

The Latin words, which mean “bull/cow, thief, boar/sow, and priest/priestess,” come from W. Lily’s Brevissima institutio seu ratio grammatices (1567), a Latin grammar.

In other words: If I don’t come up with a new good plan, class me among the animals.

Justice Preamble said, “I hear there’s comfort in thy words yet, Chanon. I’ll trust thy regulars and say no more.”

The Latin word regula means “grammatical rule.”

Chanon Hugh was part of the regular clergy.

Justice Preamble and Chanon Hugh exited.

Miles Metaphor said to himself, “I’ll follow, too. And if the dapper priest be just as cunning, point in his device [skillful in his plot], as I was in my lie, my master Preamble will stalk as if led by the nose with these new promises and fattened with supposes — expectations — of fine hopes.”

Miles Metaphor’s lie was that Squire Tub had been freed by men who had fought Miles. Instead, Basket Hilts had intimidated him, and Miles Metaphor had quickly released Squire Tub and told him about the plot by Justice Preamble and Chanon Hugh. Squire Tub had then informed Tobias Turf.

— 3.8 —

Tobias Turf, Dame Turf, Lady Tub, Pol-Marten, Audrey, and Ball Puppy spoke together at the Turfs’ house.

“Well, madam, I may thank the Squire, your son,” Tobias Turf said to Lady Tub. “If not for him, I would have been outwitted.”

Squire Tub had let the High Constable know that Justice Preamble had Audrey.

“May Heaven’s blessing alight upon his heart now!” Dame Turf said. “We are beholden to him, indeed, madam.”

“But can you inform me where he is?” Lady Tub asked. “And can you inform me about what he intended?”

“Madam, whatever he intended was no whit concerning me, and therefore was I less inquisitive,” Tobias Turf said. “Whatever he intended had nothing to do with me.”

Of course, he was wrong. Squire Tub had intended to marry Audrey. This is something that Squire Tub did not tell Tobias Turf.

Lady Tub said to Audrey, “Fair maiden, in faith, speak truth and do not dissemble. Doesn’t he often come and visit you?”

Audrey answered, “His Worship now and then, if it please you, takes pains to see my father and mother; but as for me, I know that I am too mean — of too lowly birth — for his high thoughts to stoop at, more than asking a light question to make him merry, or to pass his time.”

Lady Tub said, “You are a sober and serious maiden.”

She then ordered, “Call for my serving-woman, Marten.”

Her serving-woman was Dido Wisp.

Pol-Marten said, “The maids and her half-Valentine have plied her with courtesy of the bride-cake and the bowl, and so she is tipsy and lying down for a while.”

Lady Tub said:

“Oh, let her rest! We will cross over to Canonbury in the interim, and so make for home.

“Farewell, good Turf, and thy wife. I wish your daughter joy.”

Tobias Turf said, “We give thanks to Your Ladyship.”

Lady Tub and Pol-Marten exited.

Tobias Turf asked his wife, “Where is John Clay now? Have you seen him yet?”

Dame Turf said, “No, he has hidden himself out of the way because of fear of the hue and cry.”

Tobias Turf said:

“What, does that shadow walk avore ’un [before him] still?”

In 3.3 Squire Tub had told him that the hue and cry in search of John Clay was a counterfeit: It was based on a lie.

“Puppy, go seek ’un [him] out. Search all the corners that he frequents, and call ’un [him] forth.

“We’ll go once more to the church and try our vortunes.

“Luck, son Valentine!

“Where are all the wise men of Finzbury?”

Ball Puppy replied:

“Where wise men should be: at the ale and bride-cake.

“I wish that this couple had their destiny — either to be hanged or to be married — out of the way. A man cannot get the mounenance [amount] of an eggshell to stay his stomach.”

Some neighbors arrived on the scene and walked over to Tobias Turf.

“Vaith, vor my own part, I have zupped up so much broth as would have covered a leg of beef over head and ears [that is, completely immersed it] in the porridge-pot, and yet I cannot sussify [satisfy] wild nature.

“I wish that they were at once dispatched [married] so that we might go to dinner.

“I am with child of a huge stomach, and long for food, until by some honest midwife-piece-of-beef I am delivered of it.”

He was hungry with urgings for food like a pregnant woman, but the marriage had not occurred and so he could not eat yet. A piece of beef would satisfy his huge appetite and stop his hunger pangs the way a midwife stops birth pains.

Ball Puppy concluded:

“I must go now and hunt out for this Kilburn calf, John Clay, whom I don’t know where to find, nor which way to go.”

A “calf” is a fool.

Ball Puppy exited.

— 3.9 —

Chanon Hugh, in the personage of Captain Thumbs, entered the scene.

He said to you, the readers:

“Thus as a beggar in a king’s disguise, or an old cross well sided with [standing beside] a maypole, comes Chanon Hugh, accoutered as you see, disguised soldado-like. Note his scheme.”

A soldado is a soldier.

He continued:

“The Chanon is that Captain Thumbs, who was robbed.

“These bloody scars created with makeup upon my face are wounds. This scarf upon my arm shows my recent wounds, And thus am I to gull — fool — the constable.

“Now you have a man at arms among you! Look out! I’m a soldier!”

He then asked out loud:

“Friends, by your leave, which of you is the man named Turf?”

Tobias Turf answered, “Sir, I am Turf, if you want to speak with me.”

“Yes, with thee, Turf, if thou are High Constable,” the disguised Chanon Hugh said.

“I am both Turf, sir, and High Constable,” Tobias Turf said.

The disguised Chanon Hugh said:

“Then, Turf or Scurf, high or low constable, know that I was once a captain at the Battle of Saint Quentins in northern France, and passing across the ways over the country this morning, between this place — Kentish Town — and Hampstead Heath, I was by a crew of clowns robbed, bobbed [buffeted], and hurt.”

“Scurf” is flakes of skin. An example: dandruff. The word can also mean a scab.

The disguised Chanon Hugh continued:

“No sooner had I got my wounds bound up, but with much pain I went to the next justice, one Master Bramble, here at Maribone, and here a warrant is, which he has directed for you, one Turf — if your name is Toby Turf — who have let fall and allowed to lapse, they say, the hue and cry.

“And you shall answer it before the Justice.”

He presented a warrant to Tobias Turf.

“Heaven and Hell, dogs, devils, what is this!” Tobias Turf said. “Neighbors, was ever any constable thus crossed? What shall we do?”

In 3.3 Squire Tub had told Tobias Turf that the hue and cry in search of John Clay was a counterfeit: It was based on a lie. Tobias Turf, however, still believed that a man named Captain Thumbs had been attacked, although not by John Clay.

“Truly, we all must go hang ourselves,” Medley said. “I know no other way to escape the law.”

Ball Puppy entered the scene and said, “News, news! Oh, news —”

“What, have thou found out where John Clay is?” Tobias Turf asked.

“No, sir, the news is that I cannot find him,” Ball Puppy said.

The disguised Chanon Hugh asked Tobias Turf:

“Why do you dally, you damned russet coat?”

Peasants wore russet coats.

He continued:

“You peasant, you clown, you constable!

“See that you bring forth the suspected party, or by my honor — which I won on the battlefield — I’ll make you pay for it before the Justice.”

Tobias Turf said:

“Darn! Darn!

“Oh, wife, I’m now in a fine pickle.

“He who was most suspected is not found, and what now makes me think that he did the deed is that he thus absents him and dares not be seen.”

Now Tobias Turf was again thinking that John Clay was guilty of robbery.

He continued:

“Captain, my innocence will plead for me.

“Wife, I must go, necessarily and reluctantly, for I am the one whom the devil drives. Pray for me, wife and daughter, pray for me.”

The disguised Chanon Hugh said, “I’ll lead the way.”

He then said to himself, “Thus is the wedding-match put off, and if my plot succeeds, as I have laid it, my captainship shall cost him in fines many a crown.”

The disguised Chanon Hugh, Tobias Turf, and the neighbors exited.

Dame Turf said sarcastically, “So, we have brought our eggs to a fair market.”

She then said, “Curse that villain Clay! Would he do a robbery? I’ll never trust any smooth-faced tile-man for his sake.”

Audrey said, “Mother, the still sow eats up all the draff [pig swill].”

In other words: The quiet ones get it all.

Audrey and Dame Turf exited.

Alone, Ball Puppy said:

“Thus is my master, Toby Turf, the pattern of all the painful adventures now in print!”

Lawrence Twine had written a prose romance titled The Pattern of Painful Adventures (1576).

“I never could hope better of this match, this bride-ale, because of what happened the night before today — which is within man’s memory, I take it —”

Ball Puppy now listed many bad omens — the wedding feast was ominous for all the farm animals that were slain to provide the food for the feast.

The first omen — the talking ox — has a precedent in literature. In Livy’s History of Rome, Book 35, Chapter 21, Line 4, he wrote about an ox speaking and advising the Romans to beware before the Roman war with Antiochus (192 B.C.E.).

“— at the first report of the wedding, an ox did speak, who died soon after; a cow lost her calf; the bell-wether sheep was flayed — skinned — for it; a fat hog was singed, and washed, and shaven all over, to remove its bristles so it would look ugly in preparation for this day; the ducks they quacked; the hens also cackled, at the noise whereof a drake was seen to dance a headless round; the goose was cut in the head to hear it, too.”

Fowl such as chickens will flap their wings soon after their heads are cut off with an axe.

Ball Puppy continued:

“Brave Chant-it-clear, his noble heart was done, his comb was cut, and two or three of his wives, or fairest concubines, had their necks broken before they would zee this day.”

Chanticleer is a traditional name for a cock.

“To mark the verven’ [fervent] heart of a beast, the very pig, the pig this very morning, as he was a-roasting, cried out his eyes, and made a show as if he would have bit in two the spit, as if he would say, ‘There shall no roast meat be this dismal day.’”

Grease dripping from the eyes is a sign that the pig is fully roasted or close to it.

“And zure [surely], I think, if I had not gotten his tongue between my teeth and eaten it, he would have spoken it.

“Well, I will go in and cry, too; I will never stop crying until our maids may drive a buck — soak the clothes — with my salt tears at the next washing day.”

According to the Oxford English Dictionary, the phrase “to drive the buck” means “to carry through the process of bucking.” “Buck-washing” is a form of bleaching in which clothing is soaked or boiled in alkaline lye as the first part of the process.

He exited.

ACT 4 (A Tale of a Tub)

— 4.1 —

Justice Preamble, Chanon Hugh (disguised as Captain Thumbs), Tobias Turf, and Miles Metaphor talked together in Justice Preamble's house in Maribone.

Justice Preamble said:

“Keep out those fellows; I'll have none come in but the High Constable, the man of peace, and the queen's Captain, the brave man of war.

“Now, neighbor Turf, the reason why you are called before me by my warrant, but unspecified and not yet made clear in the warrant, is this, and please note it thoroughly!

“Here is a gentleman, Captain Thumbs, and, as it seems, both of good birth, fair speech, and peaceable, who was this morning robbed here in the wood.

“You, for your part, a man of good report and reputation, of credit, landed [owner of land] and of fair demesnes [domains], and by authority High Constable, are notwithstanding touched in this complaint, of being careless and not acting diligently in the hue and cry.

“I cannot choose but grieve a soldier's loss, and I am sorry, too, for your neglect of your duty, since you are my neighbor. This is all I accuse you of.”

The disguised Chanon Hugh said:

“This is not all; I can allege far more, and almost argue that he is an accessory to the robbery.

“Good Master Justice, give me permission to speak, for I am the plaintiff. Don't let his living in the neighborhood make him secure, and don't let him stand on his privilege as High Constable.”

Justice Preamble said, “Sir, I dare use no partiality. Accuse him then of what you please, as long as it is the truth.”

This sentence is ambiguous: It can mean 1) Accuse him then of what you please, as long as you truthfully accuse him, or 2) Accuse him then of what you please, as long as what you accuse him of is him being truthful.

The disguised Chanon Hugh said, “This more — and which is more than he can answer — beside his letting fall the hue and cry, he protects the man charged with the felony, and keeps him hidden, I hear, within his house, because he is affianced and engaged to his daughter.”

Tobias Turf said:

“I do defy ’hun [repudiate him]; so shall she do, too.

“I ask Your Worship’s favor, let me have hearing.

“I do convess, I was told of such a velony, and it disgrieved me not a little, when it was told to me, vor I was going to church to give Audrey away in marriage; and who should marry her but this very Clay, who was charged to be the chief thief o’hun [of them] all.

“Now I — may the halter stick me [may I be hanged] if I tell your worships any leazins [lies] — did forethink ’un [previously think that he] was the truest man, until he waz run away.

“I thought I had had ’un [him] as zure as in a zawpit, or in my oven, or in the town pound [lock-up].”

A sawpit is a hole in the ground.

He continued:

“I was zo zure o’hun [of him], I’d have given my life for ’un [him], until he did escape and run away.

“But now I zee ’un guilty, az var as I can look at ’un [as far as I can see]. Would you have more?”

Tobias Turf was again thinking that John Clay was guilty of robbery.

The disguised Chanon Hugh said:

“Yes, I will have, sir, what the law will give me.

“You gave your word to see him safe forthcoming; I challenge that [I call on you to make it good], but that is forfeited.

“Besides, your carelessness in the pursuit is evidence of your slackness and neglect of duty, which ought to be punished with severity.”

Justice Preamble said:

“He speaks but reason, Turf. Bring forth the man, and you are quit; but otherwise, your word binds you to make amends for all his loss. And think yourself befriended and let off lightly, if he takes it without a farther suit or going to law.

“Come to an agreement with him, Turf. The law is costly, and it will draw on charge — it will be expensive.”

Tobias Turf said:

“Yes, I do know, I vurst mun vee a returney [I first must fee an attorney], and then make legs — bow down to and request — my great man of law to be of my counsel and take trouble-vees [trouble-fees = money from me], and yet zay nothing vor me, but devise all district [strict, harsh] means to ransackle [ransack] me of my money.”

Some lawyers take fees, but then they do nothing for the money.

“May a pestilence prick the throats of hun [him]! I do know hun [him], as well az if I waz in their bellies, and brought up there.

“What would you have me do? What would you ask of me?”

The disguised Chanon Hugh said:

“I ask the restitution of my money taken from me in the theft, and I will not abate one penny of the sum: fourscore and five pounds. I ask in addition for amendment for my hurts; my pain and suffering are loss enough for me, sir, to sit down with — that is, to put up with.

“I’ll put it to Your Worship; what you award me I’ll take, and I will give him a general release.”

Justice Preamble asked, “And what do you say now, neighbor Turf?”

Tobias Turf said:

“I put it rather to Your Worship’s bitterment [arbitrement, aka arbitration], hab, nab.”

“Hab, nab” means “however it may turn out, win or lose.”

“I shall have a chance of the dice for it, I hope, let them even run, and —”

He meant that he hoped that he would win. A win in this situation would be a small fine.

Justice Preamble said to the disguised Chanon Hugh, “Faith, then I’ll pray you, because he is my neighbor, to take a hundred pounds and to give him day — to let him off.”

The hundred pounds were for the fourscore and five pounds the disguised Chanon Hugh said that he — Captain Thumbs — had been robbed of, plus fifteen pounds for pain and suffering.

Of course, no robbery and no pain and suffering had occurred. Justice Preamble and Chanon Hugh were defrauding Tobias Turf. A judge and a clergyman were committing a crime against the High Constable.

“Saint Valentine’s Day, I will, this very day, before sunset,” the disguised Chanon Hugh said. “My bond is forfeit otherwise.”

The bond was the warrant to have Tobias Turf arrested.

“Where will you have it paid?” Tobias Turf asked.

The disguised Chanon Hugh said, “In faith, I am a stranger here in the country. Do you know Chanon Hugh, the vicar of Pancras?”

“Yes, who doesn’t know him?” Tobias Turf said.

“I’ll make him my attorney to receive it, and I’ll give you a discharge of the charges against you,” the disguised Chanon Hugh said.

“Whom shall I send for the money?” Tobias Turf asked.

“Why, if you please, send Metaphor, my clerk,” Justice Preamble said. “And, Turf, I much commend thy willingness. It’s evidence of thy integrity.”

Tobias Turf said:

“But my integrity shall be myzelf still.

“Good Master Metaphor, give my wife this key, and do but whisper it — give it secretly — into her hand. She knows it well enough.

“Bid her, by that, to deliver to you the two zealed bags of silver that lie in the corner of the cupboard that stands at my bedside — they’re vifty pounds apiece — and bring them to your master.”

Miles Metaphor said:

“If I don’t prove to be as good a carrier as my friend Tom Long was, then call me his curtal, and change my name of Miles to Guiles, Wiles, Piles, Biles, or the foulest name you can devise, to play the game of crambo with for ale.”

Tom Long was proverbially a dilatory carrier.

A curtal is a horse or a dog with a docked tail.

The word “guiles” means “deceit” and “insidious intelligence.” The word “wiles” means “deceitful tricks.” The word “piles” means “hemorrhoids.” Bile is a secretion of the liver, and it is anger. The foulest name may be the vilest name, and so Viles’.

Crambo is a game in which a word is given and players have to find a rhyme for it.

The disguised Chanon Hugh said quietly to Miles Metaphor:

“Come here, Miles.

“Bring by that token, too, fair Audrey. Say that her father has sent for her. Say that John Clay has been found and waits at Pancras church, where I am waiting to marry them in haste.

“For by this means, Miles, I may say it to thee, thy master must be married to Audrey.

“But say not a word but instead be mum! Go, get thee gone. Be wary of thy charge and keep it close and secret.”

Miles Metaphor said quietly, “O super-dainty Chanon! Vicar incony! [Fine vicar!] Make no delay, Miles, but go away, and bring the wench and money.”

He exited.

The disguised Chanon Hugh said to Tobias Turf:

“Now, sir, I see you meant but honestly and except that business calls me hence away, I would not leave you until the sun were lower —”

He whispered to Justice Preamble:

“But Master Justice, one word, sir, with you.

“By the same token is your mistress sent for by Metaphor, your clerk, as from her father, who, when she comes, I’ll marry her to you, unwitting [unknown] to this Tobias Turf, who shall wait for me at the parsonage.”

He said to himself:

“This was my plot, which I must now make good; I must turn back into Chanon Hugh again, in my square cap.”

The disguised Chanon Hugh then said out loud:

“I humbly take my leave.”

Justice Preamble said:

“Adieu, good Captain Thumbs.”

The disguised Chanon Hugh exited.

Justice Preamble then said:

“Trust me, neighbor Turf, he seems to be a sober gentleman, but this distress has somewhat stirred his patience, and men, you know, in such extremities don’t incline themselves to points of courtesy.

“I’m glad you have made this end.”

Tobias Turf said:

“You stood as my friend, and I thank Your Justice-Worship.

“I ask me to be prezent soon at the tendering of the money, and zee me have a discharge, vor I have no craft in your law quibblins.”

“Craft” is “trickery.”

“Quibblins” are quibbles and tricks.

Justice Preamble said, “I’ll secure you, neighbor.”

They exited.

— The Scene Interloping —

[An Unauthorized and Unlicensed Scene]

Medley, Clench, To-Pan, and Scriben talked together.

Medley said:

“Indeed there is a woundy [very great] luck in names, sirs, and a main mystery, if a man knew where to vind it.

“My godsire’s name, I’ll tell you, was In-and-In Shittle, and a weaver he was, and it did fit his craft, for so his shittle went in and in still, this way, and then that way.

“And he named me In-and-In Medley; this name serves a joiner’s craft, because we do lay things in and in, in our work. But I am truly architectonicus professor, rather, that is, as one would zay, an architect.”

“Shittle” is a mispronunciation of “shuttle.”

Joiners sometimes do inlay work.

An architectonicus professor is a professor of architecture.

Clench said, “As I am a varrier and a visicary [a farrier and a physician/apothecary], horse-smith of Hampstead, and the whole town leech [doctor] —”

Clench medically treats people as well as horses.

Medley interrupted, “Yes, you have done woundy [very great] cures, gossip [friend] Clench.”

Clench said:

“If I can zee the stale [urine] once through a urine-hole, I’ll give a shrewd guess, be it man or beast.”

One hopes that “urine-hole” is a mispronunciation of “urinal.”

The shrewd guess would be about the illness and its cure.

Clench continued:

“I cured an ale-wife once who had the staggers worse than five horses, without rowelling.”

An ale-wife with the staggers may be a drunk ale-wife.

“Staggers” is also a horse disease.

“Rowelling” was a medical treatment for horses. It involved placing a piece of leather with a hole in it between the skin and flesh.

Clench continued:

“My godphere [godfather] was a Rabian [an Arabian] or a Jew — you can tell, D’oge, about ’un [him] — they called ’un [him] Doctor Rasi.”

“One Rasis was a great Arabic doctor,” Scriben said.

“He was King Harry’s doctor, and my godphere [godfather],” Clench said.

Doctor Rasi was King Henry VIII's physician.

A famous Arabian physician was known as Rhazes (Mohammed-ben-Zakaria).

To-Pan said, "My godphere [godfather] was a merry-Greek [merry companion], To-Pan of Twyford, a jovial tinker, and a stopper of holes, who left me metal-man of Belsize, his heir."

"A stopper of holes" has a bawdy meaning.

"But who was godphere [godfather], D'ogee?" Medley asked.

D'ogenes Scriben said:

"Vaith, I cannot tell if mine were kursined [christened] or not, but I am zure he had a kursin [Christian] name that he left me, Diogenes.

"A mighty learned man, but pestilence-poor — that is, extremely, plaguy poor — vor he had no house, save an old tub, to dwell in — I vind that in records — and always he turned the tub in the wind's teeth, so it blew on his backside, and there they would lie routing — roaring — one at the other a week, sometimes."

Diogenes was an ancient Greek philosopher who rejected wealth and lived in a tub or barrel. According to D'ogenes Scriben, he farted into the wind.

That's not a good idea. Neither is spitting into the wind.

"Thence came a tale of a tub," Medley said, "and the virst tale of a tub, old D'ogenes' tub."

"That was avore [before] Sir Peter Tub or his lady," Scriben said.

"Aye, or the Squire their son, Tripoly Tub," To-Pan said.

“The Squire is a fine gentleman!” Clench said.

“He is more: a gentleman and a half, almost a knight — within zix inches. That’s his true measure,” Medley said.

“Zure, you can gauge — measure — ’hun [him],” Clench said.

Medley said:

“To a streak, aka mark, or less; I know his diameters and circumference.”

According to the Oxford English Dictionary, a circumference is “That which surrounds, environment.”

According to the Oxford English Dictionary, a diameter is “the diametrical or direct opposite; contrarity, contradiction.”

The direct opposite of “that which surrounds” is that which is surrounded: If it isn’t surrounding, it is surrounded. In this context, that would be an interior life: thoughts and emotions. The environment is part of the exterior life: the place where one lives and acts.

Medley is claiming to know the Squire inside and out.

Medley continued:

“A knight is six diameters, and a squire is vive [five] and zomewhat more; I know it by the compass and scale of man.”

According to the Oxford English Dictionary, “compass” means “Artifice, skilful or crafty device.”

People’s guilt or innocence can be weighed in the scales of justice.

Knights are supposed to be gentlemen, and any knight who uses immoral and crafty devices and plots will be found guilty when weighed in the scales of justice. This kind of character is diametrically opposite to the character a knight should have.

Knights are supposed to abide by a higher standard of chivalry than squires and so they have more dimensions, aka diameters. More is expected of knights than is expected of squires. Knights are supposed to encompass a greater portion and quality of nobility.

Medley continued: “I have upon my rule here the just perportions [proportions] of a knight, a squire; with a tame justice, or an officer rampant [upright] upon the bench, from the High Constable down to the headborough, or tithingman, or meanest — lowest in rank — minister of the peace, God save ’un [him].”

“Rampant” means “upright”; a lion rampant is a lion standing on its hind legs.

To-Pan said, “Why, you can tell us by the squire, neighbor, whence he is called a constable, and whaffore [wherefore].”

“Squire” can mean 1) esquire, and/or 2) a mason’s square.

“No, that’s a book-case,” Medley said. “Scriben can do that. That’s writing and reading, and records.”

“Book-case” means “something that needs to be explained in words, not with math.”

Scriben said, “Two words, cyning and staple, make a constable, or as we’d say, a hold or stay for the king.”

“Cyning” is an old spelling for “king.”

“Staple” means “supporting thing,” such as a column that supports a roof.

“All constables are truly Johns-for-the-king, whatever their names are, be they Tony or Roger,” Clench said.

“John” is a name associated with servants. A song of the time was titled “John for the King.”

“And all are sworn, as vingers [fingers] on one hand, to hold together against the breach of the peace,” Medley said. “The High Constable is the thumb, as one would zay, the holdfast of the rest.”

A “holdfast” is something that binds.

To-Pan said, “Let’s hope to luck that he speed well in the business between Captain Thumbs and him!”

Medley said:

“I’ll warrant ’un [him] for a groat — I’ll put my money on him.

“I have his measures here in arithmetic [written down in figures], how he should bear ’unself [himself] in all the lines of his place and office.

“Let’s zeek ’un [him] out.”

They exited.

— 4.2 —

Squire Tub and Basket Hilts talked together.

“Hilts, how do thou like this, our good day’s work?” Squire Tub asked.

“As good even never a whit, as never the better,” Basket Hilts replied.

In other words: A waste of time.

“Shall we go to Pancridge or shall we go to Kentish Town, Hilts?” Squire Tub asked.

“Let Kentish Town or Pancridge come to us, if either will,” Basket Hilts said. “I will go home again.”

Squire Tub said:

“Indeed, Basket, our success has been but bad, and nothing prospers that we undertake, for we can neither meet with John Clay, nor Audrey, nor the Chanon Hugh, nor Tobias Turf the constable.

“We are like men who wander in strange woods and lose ourselves in search of those whom we seek.”

Basket Hilts said:

“This was because we rose on the wrong side of the bed.

“But as I am now here, just in the midway, I’ll zet my sword on the pommel, and that line the point valls [falls] to we’ll take, whether it be to Kentish Town, the church, or home again.”

The pommel is the rounded knob at the end of a sword’s hilt. To make a decision about which way to go, a person would set a sword on its pommel and let it go. Whichever way the sword pointed when it fell, that way the person would go.

Miles Metaphor, who was still disguised as the pursuivant, entered the scene, but he did not see Squire Tub or Basket Hilts. Miles Metaphor was walking to the Turfs’ house at Kentish Town.

Seeing him, Squire Tub said, “Stop, stop thy hand. Here’s Justice Bramble’s clerk. The unlucky hare has crossed us all this day. I’ll stand aside while thou pump out of him his business, Hilts, and how he’s now employed.”

When an unlucky cat — a black cat — crosses the way ahead of one, it’s supposed to be bad luck in this culture. Miles Metaphor was an unlucky hare: Hares are thought to be timid; after all, they are prey, not predators. Miles Metaphor was timid.

“Leave it to me,” Basket Hilts said. “I’ll treat him as he deserves.”

Miles Metaphor said to himself:

“Oh, for a pad-horse [an easily padding — easy-paced — horse], pack-horse, or a post-horse, to bear me on his neck, his back, or his croup [hind quarters]!

“I am as weary with running as a mill-horse that has led the mill once, twice, thrice about, after the breath has been out of his body.

“I could get up upon a pannier, a panel, or, to say the truth, a very pack-saddle, until all my honey were turned into gall, and I could sit in the seat no longer.”

A pannier is a basket for carrying goods, and a panel is a saddle-cloth: a cloth placed under the saddle.

Miles Metaphor was tired of walking, and he would like to ride a horse until he became tired of riding.

He continued:

“Oh, for the legs of a lackey now, or a footman, who is the surbater of a clerk courant [running clerk], and the confounder of his trestles dormant [sleeping tables]!”

Lackeys are servants who do a lot of running around as they serve their master, and footmen run beside the coach of their master. Actually, lackeys are footmen, and they are especially running footmen.

A surbater is a person who makes another person footsore. Here it may mean “outrunner.” They outrun the clerk courant, whose feet become sore as he tries to catch up.

“To surbate” means “to make footsore.”

A trestle table is a table made of one or more boards laid on top of trestles; trestles are frameworks that have a beam that is supported by two pairs of sloping legs.

The trestles dormant [sleeping tables] are the tables the clerks rest their heads on and sleep instead of working.

Miles Metaphor wants to have the legs of a footman so his feet will be accustomed to all the walking he is doing and so won't be sore.

Basket Hilts came forward.

Seeing him, Miles Metaphor said, “But who have we here, just in the nick?”

“Nick” means 1) at the critical moment, 2) in a tight place, or 3) the devil.

“I am neither Nick, nor in the nick,” Basket Hilts said. “Therefore you lie, Sir Metaphor.”

These were fighting words: “You lie.”

“Lie!” Miles Metaphor said. “How?”

“Lie so, sir,” Basket Hilts said.

He knocked him down.

“I lie not yet in my throat,” Miles Metaphor said.

Being accused of lying in one's throat was the worst kind of accusation of lying.

“Thou lie on the ground,” Basket Hilts said. “Do thou know me?”

“Yes, I did know you too late,” Miles Metaphor said.

If he had seen him earlier, he could have avoided meeting him.

“What is my name, then?” Basket Hilts asked.

“Basket,” Miles Metaphor answered.

“Basket what?” Basket Hilts asked.

Miles Metaphor said, “Basket the great —”

“The great what?” Basket Hilts asked.

Miles Metaphor said, “Lubber — I should say, lover of the Squire, his master.”

A “lubber” is a lout.

Basket Hilts said:

“Great is my patience to forbear thee thus, thou scrapehill scoundrel, and thou scum of man! Uncivil, orange-tawny-coated clerk!”

A scrapehill is a person who rakes dunghills.

“Thou came but half a thing into the world, and were made up of patches, parings, shreds.

“Thou, who when last thou were put out of service, travelled to Hampstead Heath on an Ash Wednesday, where thou did stand six weeks the Jack of Lent for boys to hurl things, three throws a penny, at thee, to make thee some money to put in a purse.”

A Jack of Lent is a stuffed puppet that serves as a target for boys to throw things at.

A purse is a bag for money.

“Do thou see this bold, bright blade? This sword shall shred thee as small unto the grave as minced meat for a pie.

“I’ll set all of thee in earth, except thy head and thy right arm, which shall be at liberty to keep thy hat off to show respect to me, while I question thee what, why, and whither thou were going now, with a face ready to break out — erupt — with business.

“And tell me truly, lest I dash it in pieces.”

Miles Metaphor said, “Then, Basket, put thy smiter — thy sword — up and hear what I say. I don’t dare tell the truth to a drawn sword.”

Hilts sheathed his sword and said, “It is sheathed; stand up and speak without fear or wit [cunning].”

Miles Metaphor stood up and said:

“I don’t know what they mean; but Constable Turf sends here his key for monies in his cupboard, which he must pay the Captain who was robbed this morning.

“Do you smell anything?”

He meant: Do you smell a trick?

Basket Hilts said, “No, not I. Thy breeches yet are honest.”

He meant that they were not yet soiled.

Miles Metaphor said:

“As is my mouth.

“Don’t you smell a rat?

“I tell you the truth: I think all’s knavery. For the Chanon whispered to me in my ear, when Turf had given me his key, to by the same token bring Mistress Audrey as if her father has sent for her to come thither, and to say that John Clay has been found — which is indeed to get the wench forth for my master, who is to be married when she comes there. The Chanon has his rules — his prayer book — ready and all there to dispatch the matter.”

Squire Tub came forward and said:

“Now, on my life, this is the Chanon’s plot!

“Miles, I have heard all thy discourse to Basket. Will thou be true and loyal to me? I’ll reward thee well, if thou make me happy in my Mistress Audrey.”

Miles Metaphor said, “Your Worship shall dispose of Metaphor through all his parts, even from the sole of the head to the crown of the foot, to be fully in your service.”

Squire Tub said:

“Then give thy message to the Mistress Turf:

“Tell her thy token, bring the money here, and likewise take young Audrey into thy charge.

“That done, then here, Metaphor, we will wait, and intercept and meet thee. And for thy reward, you two — you and Basket Hilts — shall share the money, and I will have the maiden.

“If anyone should take offence, I’ll make all good.”

Miles Metaphor asked, “But shall I have half the money, sir, indeed?”

“Aye, on my squireship and my land, I swear thou shall,”
Squire Tub said.

Miles Metaphor said:

“Then if I don’t make, sir, the cleanliest excuse to get her hither, and be then as careful to keep her for you as if it were for myself, then get down on your knees, and pray that honest Miles may break his neck before he get over two stiles.”

— 4.3 —

Squire Tub replied, “Make haste, then; we will wait here for thy return.”

Miles Metaphor exited, and Squire Tub said:

“This unlooked-for luck has revived my hopes, which were oppressed with a dark melancholy.

“In happy time we lingered on the way to meet these summons of a better sound, which are the essence of my soul’s content.”

Basket Hilts said:

“This heartless — cowardly — fellow, shame to serving-men, stain of all liveries, disgrace to his uniform, what fear makes him do!

“What sordid, ignoble, wretched, and unworthy things he does!

“Betray his master’s secrets, open the closet of his master’s plots, force the foolish Justice to make way for your love, plotting of his own —

“He is like a man who digs a trap to catch another man but falls into it himself!”

Squire Tub said, “So would I have it, and I hope it will prove a jest to twit — mock — the Justice with.”

“But that this poor white-livered, cowardly rogue should do it!” Basket Hilts said. “And only out of fear!”

“And hope of money, Hilts,” Squire Tub said. “Even a valiant man will nibble at that bait.”

“Who but a fool will refuse money offered to him?” Basket Hilts, who was hoping to get fifty pounds soon, said.

“And sent by so good chance and fortune?” Squire Tub said. “Pray heaven he speed and succeed.”

Basket Hilts said, “If he comes back empty-handed, let him count on going back empty-headed; I’ll not leave him so much of brain in his pate, with pepper and vinegar, that could be served in for sauce to a calf’s head.”

In the slang of the time, a calf is a fool.

“Thou treat him rightly, Hilts,” Squire Tub said.

Basket Hilts said:

“I’ll seal az much with my hand as I dare say now with my tongue.”

He shook hands with Squire Tub and asked:

‘But if you get the lass [away?] from Dargison, what will you do with her?’

The lass is Audrey.

“Dargison” may mean “son of darg.” In Scottish dialect, “darg” is a day’s work. Squire Tub may be calling Justice Preamble a working man as an insult. Basket Hilts had just referred to “the foolish Justice” and Squire Tub was hoping to twit Justice Preamble. Certainly, many people were working hard on this day to marry Audrey or to get Audrey married.

But perhaps “Dargison” is Miles Metaphor, Justice Preamble’s clerk, who was getting Audrey and bringing her to Squire Tub. Now Miles was working for Squire Tub and so he was a working man.

“Dargasson” means “de lad” or “de boy.” The French le gamin means “the boy” or “the lad,” and the French gosse means “lad, kid, brat.” This could be Miles Metaphor.

Squire Tub said, “We’ll think of that when once we have her in possession, governor.”

— 4.4 —

Ball Puppy, Miles Metaphor, and Audrey talked together in the Turfs’ house.

Ball Puppy said:

“You see we trust you, Master Metaphor, with Mistress Audrey. Please, treat her well, as a gentlewoman should be treated.

“For my part, I do incline a little and am sympathetic to the serving-man. We have been of a coat — that is, we were in the same occupation. I had a coat like yours, until it did play me such a sleeveless — pointless — errand as I had nothing where [nowhere] to put my arms in, and then I threw it off.”

Sleeves have ends.

“Err ends” might be nonexistent sleeves.

And nonexistent ends might be “air ends.”

“Please, go before her and walk in front of her, like a serving-man, and see that your nose does not run and drop.

“For an example, you shall see me. See how I go before her! So you should do, sweet Miles.

“She, for her own part, is a woman who doesn’t care what man can do to her in the way of honesty and good manners.

“So farewell, fair Mistress Audrey; farewell, Master Miles. I have brought you thus far onward on your way. I must go back now to make clean the rooms where my good lady has been.

“Please commend me to bridegroom Clay and tell him to bear up stiff.”

“Stiff” has a bawdy meaning in addition to the meaning of “steadfast.”

“Thank you, good Hannibal Puppy,” Miles Metaphor said. “I shall fit the leg of your commands with the strait buskins of dispatch very quickly.”

“Strait buskins” are tightly fitting coverings for feet and legs.

“Farewell, fine Metaphor,” Ball Puppy said.

He exited.

Miles Metaphor said to Audrey, “Come, gentle mistress, will you please to walk?”

“I don’t love to be led,” Audrey said. “I’d go alone.”

Miles Metaphor said, “Let not the mouse of my good meaning, lady, be snapped up in the trap of your suspicion, to lose the tail (or tale) there, either of her truth, or swallowed by the cat of misconstruction.”

In this culture, people thought that mice could escape traps by leaving behind their tail.

“You are too finical — too affected — for me,” Audrey said. “Speak plainly, sir.”

Squire Tub and Basket Hilts entered the scene.

“Welcome again, my Audrey, welcome, love!” Squire Tub said. “You shall go with me; in faith, deny me not. I cannot brook and endure the second hazard, mistress.”

“Forbear, Squire Tub,” Audrey said. “Stop. As my own mother says, I am not for your mowing. You’ll be flown before I am fledged.”

One meaning of “mow” is “have sex with.”

Squire Tub was older than Audrey. Metaphorically, Audrey was saying that Squire Tub would have flown away from the nest before she had grown the feathers that would enable her to fly.

Since Squire Tub had a tutor and protector in Basket Hilts, and since his mother was so protective of him, however, he may not have been much older than Audrey. She may have been using age as an excuse for not being interested in him.

“Have thou the money, Miles?” Basket Hilts asked.

“Here are two bags,” Miles Metaphor said. “Here’s fifty pounds in each bag.”

Squire Tub said, “Nay, Audrey, I possess you for this time.”

He gave Miles Metaphor and Basket Hilts the money and said, “Sirs, take that coin between you and divide it.”

He then said to Audrey, “My pretty sweeting, give me now the leave to challenge — claim — love and marriage at your hands.”

Audrey said:

“Now out upon you. Aren’t you ashamed?”

“What will my lady say? Indeed, I think she was at our house, and I think she asked for you, and I think she hit me in the teeth with you — that is, she reproached me about you.

“I thank Her Ladyship, and I think she means not to go away from here until she has found you.”

Squire Tub asked, “What are you saying? Was then my lady mother at your house?”

He then said, “Let’s have a word with you aside, in private.”

“Yes, twenty words,” Audrey said.

Tub and Audrey talked together apart from the others.

Lady Tub and Pol-Marten arrived on the scene.

Lady Tub said:

“It is strange, a motion — an impulse — but I know not what, comes into my mind, to leave the way to Totten Court and turn my journey to Kentish Town again.

“And look! Pol-Marten, my son is with his Audrey!

“A while ago, we left her at her father’s house, and has he thence removed her in such haste!

“What shall I do? Shall I speak fair words to him, or chide him?”

Pol-Marten advised, “Madam, your worthy son with duteous care can govern his affections. So then, break off their conversation some other way, pretending ignorance of what you know.”

Kneeling before Audrey, Squire Tub said to her, “If this is all, fair Audrey, I am thine.”

He felt that he could overcome any objections she had to their marriage.

Lady Tub approached him and said, “Mine you were once, though scarcely now your own.”

“By God’s eyelid, my lady, my lady!” Basket Hilts said.

“Is this my lady bright?” Miles Metaphor asked.

“Madam, you took me now a little tardy — you surprised me,” Squire Tub said, rising from his knees.

Lady Tub said:

“At prayers I think you were. What, are you so devout lately that you will shrive you — confess your sins — to all confessors you meet by chance?”

“Come, go with me, good Squire, and leave your linen.”

Audrey was dressed in linen for her wedding, if it should occur.

Lady Tub was wearing velvet, and velvet is more expensive than linen.

Lady Tub continued:

“I have now some business, which is of some importance, to impart to you.”

“Madam, please, spare me just an hour,” Squire Tub said.

“May it please you to walk before me, and I will follow you.”

“It must be now,” Lady Tub said. “My business lies this way.”

Squire Tub said, “Won’t you excuse me until an hour from now, madam?”

Lady Tub said:

“Squire, these excuses argue more your guilt. You have some new plan now to project that the poor tileman — John Clay — scarcely will thank you for.

“What? Will you go?”

Squire Tub said, “I have taken a charge upon me to see this maiden conducted to her father, who with the Chanon Hugh waits for her at Pancras, to see her married to the same John Clay.”

Lady Tub said, “It is very well, but Squire, don’t you worry about that. I’ll send Pol-Marten with her for that office. You shall go along with me — it is decided.”

“I have a little business with a friend, madam,” Squire Tub said.

Lady Tub replied, “That friend shall wait for you, or you for him.”

She then said, “Pol-Marten, take the maiden into your care. Commend me to her father.”

“I will follow you,” Squire Tub said.

“Tut, don’t talk to me about following,” Lady Tub said.

“I’ll but speak a word,” Squire Tub said.

Lady Tub said:

“No whispering; you forget yourself, and you make your love too palpable and obvious.

“A squire, and think so meanly? Fall upon a cow-shard?”

A cow-shard is cow dung.

A proverb stated, “The beetle flies over many a sweet flower and lights on a cow-shard.”

Lady Tub continued:

“You know my mind. Come, I’ll go to Tobias Turf’s house and look for Dido and our Valentine.”

Their Valentine was Ball Puppy.

Then she ordered:

“Pol-Marten, look after your charge; I’ll look after mine.”

Everyone except Pol-Marten and Audrey exited.

Pol-Marten said to himself:

“I smile to think that after so many offers of marriage this maiden has had, she now should fall to me, so that I should have her in my custody!

“It would be but a mad trick to make the attempt, and jump — make — a match with her immediately.

“She’s fair and handsome, and she’s rich enough. Both time and place provide a fair opportunity to do so.

“Have at it then! I’ll do it!”

He asked Audrey, “Fair lady, can you love?”

“No, sir,” Audrey answered. “What’s that?”

“A toy that women use,” Pol-Marten said.

A proverb stated, “Love is a toy [trifle].”

“If it is a toy, it’s good to play with,” Audrey said.

The noun “toy” can mean amorous activity such as flirtation.

“We will not stand talking about the toy,” Pol-Marten said.

“The way is short. Does it please you to prove it — to try it — mistress?”

“If you do mean to stand so long upon it, I ask you to let me give it a short cut, sir,” Audrey said.

A shortcut is a short way.

A cut is a vulva. Because a vulva consists of the labia (the cut) and the mound of Venus (no cut), aka mons veneris, the cut is a short cut.

The verb “stand” can mean to have an erection, which can be another kind of toy.

“It’s thus, fair maid: Are you disposed to marry?” Pol-Marten asked.

“You are disposed to ask,” Audrey said.

“Are you disposed to grant?” Pol-Marten asked.

“Now I see you are disposed indeed,” Audrey said.

“Disposed” can mean “inclined to jest.”

Pol-Marten said to himself, “I see that the wench lacks just a little wit and intelligence, and that defect her wealth may well supply.”

Actually, Audrey had made a good pun. She understood him quite well.

He then asked out loud, “In plain terms, tell me, will you have me, Audrey?”

Audrey replied:

“In as plain terms, I tell you who would have me.

“John Clay would have me, but he has too-hard — and two hard — hands. I don’t like him; besides, he is a thief.

“And Justice Bramble, he would eagerly have caught me and made me his wife.

“But the young Squire, he, rather than his life, would have me yet and make me a lady, he says, and be my knight to do me true knight’s service, before his lady mother.

“Can you make me a lady, if I were to have and marry you?”

No, he could not give her the social status of being a lady.

What could he give her?

Pol-Marten said, “I can give you a silken gown and a rich petticoat, and a French hood.”

He then said to himself, “All fools love to be brave — splendid. I find her humor, and I will pursue it.”

Her humor — personal desire — was to be splendidly dressed. So Pol-Marten thought.

But Audrey did not want to be a lady, and so she was resistant to marrying Squire Tub.

They exited.

— 4.6 —

Lady Tub, Dame Turf, Squire Tub, and Basket Hilts talked together in the Turfs’ house.

Lady Tub said:

“And as I told thee, she was intercepted by the Squire here, my son, and this bold Ruffin, his serving-man, who safely would have carried her to her father and the Chanon Hugh.

“But for more care of the security, my usher has her now in his grave charge.”

“Ruffin” is a name for a devil; it also means “ruffian.”

Squire Tub’s serving-man was Basket Hilts.

Lady Tub’s usher was Pol-Marten.

Dame Turf said:

“Now on my faith and halidom, we are beholden to Your Worship.”

“Halidom” is something held to be sacred.

She continued:

“She’s a girl, a foolish girl, and soon may be tempted. But if this day should pass well once over her head, I’ll wish her trust to herself and be responsible for herself, for I have been a very — a true — mother to her, though I am the one who says it.”

Some things such as praise of oneself are better said by someone else.

Squire Tub said, “Madam, it is late, and Pancridge is in your way. I think Your Ladyship forgets yourself.”

Lady Tub said:

“Your mind runs much on Pancridge. You think a lot about it.

“Well, young Squire, the black ox never trod yet on your foot — adversity has not yet tested you. These idle fancies will forsake you one day.”

She then said:

“Come, Mistress Turf, will you go take a walk over the fields to Pancridge, to your husband?”

Dame Turf answered:

“Madam, I would have been there an hour ago, except that I waited on my serving-man, Ball Puppy.”

She called:

“What, Ball, I say!”

She then said:

“I think the idle slouch has fallen asleep in the barn, he stays away so long.”

Terrified, Ball Puppy entered the scene and said:

“Satin, in the name of velvet Satin, dame!”

By “Satin,” he meant, “Satan.”

“The devil! Oh, the devil is in the barn!

“Help, help! A legion — spirit Legion is in the barn! In every straw is a devil!”

“Legion” with a capital L is the name of a devil; “legion” with a small l is a large number.

“Why do thou bawl so, Puppy?” Dame Turf asked. “Speak, what ails thee?”

He replied, “My name’s Ball Puppy, and I bawl. I have seen the devil among the straw. Oh, for a cross, a collop of Friar Bacon, or a conjuring stick of Doctor Faustus! Spirits are in the barn.”

A “collop” is a slice of bacon.

Friar Bacon and Doctor Faustus were famous magicians.

“What!” Squire Tub said. “Spirits in the barn? Basket, go and see.”

Basket Hilts replied:

“Sir, if you were my master ten times over, and Squire as well, as I already know you are, then you shall pardon me.

“Send me among devils? I zee you love me not.

“Hell be at their game, I’ll not trouble them.”

“Go and see,” Squire Tub said. “I warrant thee there’s no such matter.”

“If they were giants, it would be another matter,” Basket Hilts said. “But devils! No, if I should be torn in pieces, what is your warrant worth? I’ll see the fiend set fire to the barn before I come there.”

“Now all zaints bless us, if he should be there!” Dame Turf said. “He is an ugly sprite, I warrant.”

Ball Puppy said:

“As ugly as any sprite that ever held flesh-hook, dame, or handled fire-fork, rather.”

Devils often carried long hooks or forks. Flesh-hooks could be used for hanging the flesh of sinners; fire-forks were used for stirring the fire.

Ball Puppy continued:

“They have put me in a sweet pickle, dame. Except that my lady Valentine smells of musk, I should be ashamed to press into this presence.”

In other words: Lady Tub’s perfume covers up the stink in his pants that has resulted from his great fear.

“Basket, please, see what is the miracle!” Lady Tub said.

Squire Tub said to Basket Hilts, “Come, go with me. I’ll lead. Why stand thou still, man?”

Basket Hilts replied, “Cock’s precious, master, you are not mad indeed? You will not go to Hell before your time?”

“Cock’s precious” is an oath that has been sanitized for ears that are accustomed to listening for blasphemy. The original oath is “By God’s precious blood.”

“Why are thou thus afraid?” Squire Tub asked.

“No, not afraid,” Basket Hilts said. “But by your leave, I’ll come no nearer to the barn.”

“Puppy, will thou go with me?” Squire Tub asked.

Ball Puppy said:

“What! Go with you? Whither? Into the barn? Go to whom? The devil? Or to do what there? To be torn among ’hum [them]?”

“Wait for my master, the High Constable, or In-and-In, the headborough; let them go into the barn with warrant, seize the fiend, and set him in the stocks for his ill rule.

“It is not for me who am but flesh and blood to meddle with ’un [him]. Vor I cannot, nor I wu’not [and I would not].”

“I pray thee, Tripoly, look and see what is the matter!” Lady Tub said.

Squire Tripoli Tub replied, “That shall I, madam.”

He exited.

“May Heaven protect my master!” Basket Hilts said. “I tremble in every joint until he comes back.”

Ball Puppy said:

“Now, now, even now the spirits are tearing him in pieces.

“Now are they tossing his legs and arms like they were tossing loggets at a pear-tree.”

In a game called loggets, small pieces of wood were thrown near a stake.

The word “pear” can be used to mean vulva, and you can guess what a logget would be. (Parolles uses “pear” to refer to Helena’s virgin vulva in Act 1, Scene 1 of William Shakespeare’s All’s Well That Ends Well.)

Ball Puppy continued:

“I’ll go to the hole, peep in, and see whether he lives or dies.”

“I would not be in my master’s coat for thousands of pounds,” Basket Hilts said.

In a way, Basket Hilts was wearing his master’s coat: He was wearing his master’s livery, clothing that identified him as being the servant to a particular master.

Ball Puppy said, “Then pluck it off and turn thyself away.”

By taking off his master’s livery, Basket Hilts would show that he was quitting his job.

Ball Puppy peeped through a hole and said, “Oh, the devil! The devil! The devil!”

“Where, man? Where?” Basket Hilts asked.

“Alas, that we were ever born!” Dame Turf said. “So near, too!”

They were near to the “devil.”

“The Squire has him in his hand, and leads him out by the collar,” Ball Puppy said.

Squire Tub led John Clay over to the others.

“Oh, this is John Clay,” Dame Turf said.

“John Clay is at Pancras,” Lady Tub said. “He is there to be married.”

“This was the spirit that reveled in the barn,” Squire Tub said.

Ball Puppy said:

“The devil he was! Was this the he [the man] who was crawling among the wheat-straw? Had it been the barley, I should have taken him for the devil in drink, the spirit of the bride-ale!”

Barley is used in making alcoholic beverages: ale and spirits such as brandy.

Ball Puppy continued:

“But poor John, tame John of Clay, that sticks about the bung-hole —”

A bung-hole is a hole in a cask; it is stopped with a bung.

Basket Hilts said:

“If this be all your devil, I would take it in hand to conjure him — I would drive him away.

“But may Hell take me if ever I come in a right — a real — devil’s way, if I can keep myself out of it.”

“Well meant, Hilts,” Squire Tub said.

He exited.

Lady Tub asked, “But how came John Clay thus hid here in the straw, when news was brought to you all that he was at Pancridge, and you believed it?”

Dame Turf answered, “Justice Bramble’s serving-man told me so, madam; and by that same token and other things such as a key, he took away my daughter and two sealed bags of money.”

“Where’s the Squire?” Lady Tub said, not seeing him. “Has he gone away from here?”

“He was here, madam, just now,” Dame Turf said.

“Has the hue and cry passed by?” John Clay asked.

“Aye, aye, John Clay,” Ball Puppy answered.

“And am I out of danger to be hanged?” John Clay asked.

Robbers could be hanged.

“Hanged, John?” Ball Puppy said. “Yes, to be sure; unless, as with the proverb, you mean to make the choice of your own gallows.”

A proverb stated, “If I be hanged, I’ll choose my gallows.”

“Nay, then all’s well,” John Clay said. “Hearing your news, Ball Puppy, that you brought from Paddington, I even stole home here, and I thought to hide myself in the barn ever since.”

“Oh, wonderful!” Ball Puppy said. “And news was brought us here that you were at Pancridge, ready to be married.”

“No, in faith,” John Clay said. “I ne’er was funder [further] than the barn.”

Dame Turf said:

“Make haste, Puppy! Call forth Mistress Dido Wisp, my lady’s gentlewoman, to her lady, and call yourself forth, and a couple of maids, to wait upon me. We are all undone and ruined! My lady is undone! Her fine young son, the Squire, has gotten away.”

Dame Turf was afraid that Squire Tub would marry Audrey.

So was Lady Tub, who said to Ball Puppy, “Make haste, haste, good Valentine.”

Dame Turf said, “And you, John Clay, you are undone, too! All! My husband is undone, by a true key but a false token; and I myself am undone by parting with my daughter, who’ll be married to somebody whom she should not, if we don’t make haste.”

ACT 5 (A Tale of a Tub)

— 5.1 —

Squire Tub, Pol-Marten, and Audrey talked together.

Squire Tub said, “Please, good Pol-Marten, show thy diligence and faith at the same time. Bring her, but so disguised that the Chanon may not know her and leave me to plot the rest. I will expect thee here.”

Pol-Marten replied, “You shall, Squire. I’ll perform it with all care, if all my lady’s wardrobe will disguise her.”

Squire Tub exited.

“Come, Mistress Audrey,” Pol-Marten said.

“Has the Squire gone?” Audrey asked.

“He’ll meet us by and by, where he appointed,” Pol-Marten said. “You shall be splendidly dressed at once so that no one shall know you.”

They exited.

— 5.2 —

Clench, Medley, To-Pan, and D’ogenes Scriben talked together. They were outside Chanon Hugh’s house in St. Pancras.

“I wonder where the queen’s High Constable is?” Clench said. “I veer they have made ’hun away [carried him away].”

Medley said, “No, zure [to be sure], the Justice dare not consent to that. He’ll zee ’un [him] forthcoming.”

In other words: Justice Preamble will make sure that the High Constable appears.

To-Pan said, "He must, vor we can all take corpulent oath that we zaw 'un [him] go in the house."

A corporal oath is ratified by swearing on a Bible or other sacred object.

Scriben said, "Aye, upon record the clock dropped [chimed] twelve at Maribone."

"You are right, D'oge!" Medley said to Scriben. "Zet down to a minute; now it is a'most your [almost four o'clock]."

Squire Tub and Basket Hilts entered the scene.

"Here comes Squire Tub," Clench said.

"And his governor, Master Basket Hilts," Scriben said. "Do you know 'hun [him]? A valiant wise vellow, az tall a man on his hands as goes on veet."

Scriben was combining two proverbs:

"He is a tall man with his hands." In other words: He is skillful.

"As good a man as ever went on his legs."

Scriben then said, "Bless you, Mas' [Master] Basket."

"Thank you, good D'oge," Basket Hilts said.

"Who's that?" Squire Tub asked.

"D'oge Scriben, the great writer, sir, of Chalcot," Basket Hilts replied.

"And who are the rest?" Squire Tub asked.

Basket Hilts replied, "The wisest heads of the hundred. Medley the joiner, headborough of Islington; Pan of Belsize, and Clench, the leech [physician] of Hampstead: the High Constable's Council, here, of Finsbury."

Squire Tub said, “Prezent me to them, Hilts: Squire Tub of Totten Court.”

Basket Hilts said, “Wise men of Finsbury, make place for a squire: I bring to your acquaintance, Tub of Totten Court. Squire Tub, my master, loves all men of virtue, and longs, az one would zay, until he is one of you.”

“His Worship’s welcun to our company,” Clench said. “I wish that our company were even wiser for ’hun [for his sake]!”

To-Pan said, “Here are some of us who are called the witty — that is, wise — men over a hundred —”

Scriben interrupted, “And zome a thousand, when the Muster Day comes.”

Muster Day was a day of military parades and inspecting the troops.

Squire Tub said:

“I long, as my man Hilts said, and my governor, to be adopted and accepted into your society.

“Can any man make a masque here in this company?”

“A masque!” To-Pan said. “What’s that?”

Scriben answered, “A mumming — a short show, with vizards and fine clothes.”

Vizards are masks. Mummings often had disguised characters.

Clench said:

“A disguise, neighbor, is the true word [the older word] for a masque.”

He then pointed to Medley and said, “There stands the man who can do it, sir: Medley the joiner, In-and-In of Islington, the only man at a disguise in Middlesex.”

In other words: Medley is the only — the best — man in Middlesex for making a masque.

“But who shall write it?” Squire Tub said.

“Scriben, the great writer,” Basket Hilts said.

Scriben said:

“In-and-In Medley will do it alone, sir; he will join with no man, although he is a joiner.”

In addition to being a carpenter, a joiner can be a collaborator.

Scriben continued:

“In design, as he calls it, he must be sole inventor. In-and-In draws with no other in planning his project, he’ll tell you.

“It cannot else be feazible or conduce: Those are his ruling words!

“Will it please you to hear ’hun [him]?”

The verb “conduce” means “bring about a particular result.”

Squire Tub said, “Yes. Master In-and-In, I have heard of you.”

“I can do nothing, I,” Medley said.

“He can do all, sir,” Clench said.

“They’ll tell you so,” Medley said.

Squire Tub said:

“I’d have a toy presented, A Tale of a Tub, a story of myself.

“You can express a Tub?”

A toy can be an entertainment, or a trifle.

Medley said, “If it conduce to the design, whatever is feazible. I can express a wash-house, if need be, with a whole pedigree of Tubs.”

Squire Tub said, “No, one will be enough to note and give an account of our name and family, Squire Tub of Totten Court, and to show my adventures this very day. I’d have it in Tub’s Hall, at Totten Court, my lady mother’s house, which is my house indeed, for I am heir to it.”

Medley said, “If I might see the place and had surveyed it, I could say more. For all artistic invention, sir, comes by degrees and on the view [consideration] of nature. A world of things concurs to the design, which makes it feazible, if art conduces.”

He wanted to see the location of the masque and sketch its layout; such a knowledge of the location could give him ideas on how to present the masque. Such presentations could include mechanical contrivances.

“You say well, witty Master In-and-In,” Squire Tub said. “How long have you studied engine?”

The noun “engine” means the making of contrivances; it involves mechanics.

Medley answered, “Since I first joined [first practiced carpentry] or did inlay in wit [using my intelligence], some vorty [forty] years.”

“A pretty time!” Squire Tub said.

He then said:

“Basket Hilts, you go and wait on Master In-and-In to Totten Court, and all the other wise masters. Show them the hall and taste the language of the buttry to them.”

In other words: Show them the hall and give them a drink.

Squire Tub continued:

“Let them see all the Tub family members about the house, who can talk to him about the matter, until I come — which shall be within an hour at least.”

Clench said, “It will be glorious if In-and-In will undertake it, sir. He has a monstrous medley wit of his own.”

Squire Tub said:

“Spare for no cost, either in boards or hoops, to architect — design — your tub.”

Apparently, a very large tub was planned for the masque.

He continued:

“Haven’t you a cooper at London called Vitruvius? Send for him, or old John Heywood, call him to you to help.”

Vitruvius was a first-century Roman architect, and John Heywood was an English playwright and musician who went into exile in 1564.

“He scorns the proposal,” Scriben said. “Trust to In-and-In Medley alone.”

— 5.3 —

Lady Tub, Dame Turf, John Clay, Ball Puppy, and Dido Wisp entered the scene.

Lady Tub said:

“Oh, here’s the Squire!

“You slipped away from us finely, son! These manners to your mother will commend you, but in another age, not this.

“Well, Tripoly, your father, good Sir Peter, rest his bones, would not have done this.

“Where’s my usher: Pol-Marten? And where is your fair Mistress Audrey?”

“I did not see them,” Squire Tub said. “I saw no creature but the four wise masters here of Finsbury Hundred, who came to cry and make public their concern about their constable, Tobias Turf, who they say is lost.”

Dame Turf said, “My husband lost! And my fond — foolish — daughter, I fear, is lost, too!

“Where is Pol-Marten, your gentleman, madam?”

“Poor John Clay, thou have lost thy Audrey.”

“I have lost my wits, my little wits, good mother,” John Clay said. “I am distracted and confused.”

Ball Puppy said:

“And I have lost my mistress, Dido Wisp, who frowns upon her Puppy, Hannibal.”

This kind of mistress is a woman to whom one is devoted; it does not necessarily imply a sexual relationship.

Ball Puppy continued:

“Loss! Loss on every side! A public loss! Loss of my master! Loss of his daughter! Loss of favor, friends, my mistress! Loss of all!”

Justice Preamble and Tobias Turf entered the scene.

“What cry is this?” Justice Preamble asked.

“My serving-man, Ball Puppy, speaks of some loss,” Tobias Turf said.

“My master has been found!” Ball Puppy said. “Good luck, if it be thy will, alight on us all!”

“Oh, husband, are you alive?” Dame Turf said. “They said you were lost.”

“Where’s Justice Bramble’s clerk?” Tobias Turf asked. “Did he get the money that I sent for?”

“Yes, two hours ago,” Dame Turf said. “He got two bags of fifty pounds each in silver, and Audrey, too.”

“Why Audrey?” Tobias Turf said. “Who sent for her?”

“You, Master Turf, the fellow said,” Dame Turf answered.

“He lied,” Tobias Turf said. “I am cozened and cheated, robbed, undone, ruined! Miles Metaphor, your serving-man, is a thief, and has run away with my daughter, Master Bramble, and with my money.”

“Neighbor Turf, have patience; I can assure you that your daughter is safe,” Lady Tub said. “But as for the money, I know nothing about that.”

“My money is my daughter, and my daughter, she is my money, madam,” Tobias Turf said.

“I do wonder how your Ladyship has come to know anything in these affairs,” Justice Preamble said.

Lady Tub said, “Yes, Justice Bramble, I met the maiden in the fields by chance in the company of the Squire, my son. How he alighted upon — found — her, he himself best can tell.”

Squire Tub said, “I intercepted her as she was coming hither to her father, who sent for her by Miles Metaphor, Justice

Preamble's clerk. And if Your Ladyship hadn't hindered it, I would have paid back fine Master Justice for his newly made warrant, and for the new pursuivant he served it by this morning."

"Do you know that, sir?" Justice Preamble asked.

Lady Tub said, "You told me, Squire, quite another tale, but I didn't believe you, which made me send Audrey another way by my Pol-Marten, and take my journey back to Kentish Town, where we found John Clay hidden in the barn in order to escape the hue and cry after him; and here he is."

Tobias Turf said:

"John Clay again! Then set cock-a-hoop!"

"Set cock-a-hoop!" means "Let's celebrate!" The cock (tap) of a beer or wine cask would be opened so the liquor would flow freely.

He continued:

"I have lost no daughter, nor no money, Justice.

"John Clay shall pay; I'll look to you now, John. Vaith, out it must, as good at night as morning."

John Clay had broken his bail by escaping, and now Tobias Turf would make him pay back the money that Tobias Turf had spent because John Clay had escaped: one hundred pounds.

"I am even as vull [full] as a piper's bag with joy, or a great gun upon carnation [malapropism for 'coronation'] day!

"I could weep lion's tears — huge tears — to see you, John.

“It is but two bags of vifty pounds each I have ventured for you, but now I have you, you shall pay the whole hundred.

“Run from your borrows, son!”

In other words: Tobias Turf was shocked that John Clay had run from the pledges he had made to get Tobias Turf to stand — guarantee — his bail. Those pledges included not running away.

“Faith, even be hanged, if you once earth yourself and hide in a hole, John, in the barn, then I have no daughter vor you.”

He then asked:

“Who did verret ’hun [ferret John Clay out]?”

Dame Turf answered, “My lady’s son, the Squire here, vetched ’hun [him] out. Puppy had put us all in such a vright [fright] that we thought the devil was in the barn, and nobody dared to venture against hun [him].”

“I have now resolved who shall have my daughter,” Tobias Turf said.

“Who?” Dame Turf asked.

“He who best deserves her,” Tobias Turf said.

That person could be Squire Tub, who had shown courage in going into the barn when others thought that at least one devil was inside.

Seeing Chanon Hugh coming, Tobias Turf said, “Here comes the vicar.”

He then said to him, “Chanon Hugh, we have vound John Clay again! The matter’s all come round.”

“Has Miles Metaphor returned yet?” Chanon Hugh asked.

“All is turned here to confusion, and we have lost our plot,” Justice Preamble said. “I fear my serving-man has run away with the money, and John Clay has been found, in whom old Tobias Turf is sure to save his stake.”

“What shall we do then, Justice?” Chanon Hugh asked.

“The bride was met in the young Squire’s hands,” Justice Preamble said.

“And what’s become of her?” Chanon Hugh asked.

“None here can tell,” Justice Preamble said.

“Wasn’t my mother’s serving-man, Pol-Marten, with you, and a strange gentlewoman in his company, recently here, Chanon?” Squire Tub asked.

“Yes, and I dispatched them,” Chanon Hugh said.

“Dispatched them!” Squire Tub said. “What do you mean?”

“Why, I married them, as they desired, just now,” Chanon Hugh said.

“And do you know what you have done, Sir Hugh?” Squire Tub asked.

“No harm, I hope,” Chanon Hugh said.

Squire Tub said, “You have ended all the quarrel: Audrey is married.”

He had guessed the truth: The strange gentlewoman who had gotten married to Pol-Marten was Audrey, dressed in fine clothing.

“Married! To whom?” Lady Tub asked.

“My daughter Audrey married, and she not know of it!” Tobias Turf said.

Certainly, no one had anticipated the marriage: Apparently, no one, including Audrey, had ever thought that Pol-Marten would be her groom.

“Nor her father or mother!” Dame Turf said.

“Whom has she married?” Lady Tub asked

“Your Pol-Marten, madam,” Squire Tub said. “A groom who was never dreamt of.”

“Is he a man?” Tobias Turf asked.

“That he is, Turf,” Lady Tub said, “and I have made him a gentleman.”

Pol-Marten was her gentleman-usher.

“If he is a gentleman, then let Audrey shift for herself,” Dame Turf said.

If Audrey had married a gentleman, she had married well, and yes, she could look after herself.

Chanon Hugh said:

“She was so bravely — splendidly — dressed, I didn’t know who she was, I swear. And yet as a vicar I officiated at the wedding and married her by her own name to him.

“But she was so disguised, so ladylike, I think she did not know herself the while!

“I married them to each other as if they were a complete pair of strangers to me, and they presented themselves to me as such.”

“I wish them much joy, as they have given me heart’s ease,” Lady Tub said.

She was relieved that her son had not married Audrey.

Squire Tub said, "Then, madam, I'll entreat you now to relinquish your anxiety about and mistrust of me, and please to take all this good company home with you to supper. We'll have a merry night of it and laugh."

Lady Tub said:

"That is a very good proposal, Squire, which I yield to and grant and thank them to accept my invitation.

"Neighbor Turf, I'll have you and your wife be merry, and you, Sir Hugh, shall be pardoned for this your happy error by Justice Preamble, your friend and patron."

"If the young Squire can pardon it, then so do I," Justice Preamble said.

Most of them exited.

— 5.5 —

Ball Puppy, Dido Wisp, and Chanon Hugh tarried behind.

Ball Puppy said:

"Stay, my dear Dido.

"Good Vicar Hugh, we have some business with you.

"In short, this: If you dare knit another pair of strangers, Dido of Carthage and her countryman, stout Hannibal, stand to it. I have asked consent to marry her, and she has granted me her consent."

"Stands to it" means that he is ready to be married; the phrase also has a bawdy meaning.

"But does Dido say so?" Chanon Hugh asked.

Dido Wisp replied, "I dare not demur from what Ball Hanny has said."

"Come in then," Chanon Hugh said. "I'll dispatch you and marry you to each other. A good supper, good company, good discourse would not be lost, and above all, a place and time where wit has any source."

They exited.

— 5.6 —

Pol-Marten, Audrey, Squire Tub, and Lady Tub talked together at Totten Court.

Pol-Marten said, "After the hoping of your pardon, madam, for many faults committed, here my wife and I do stand, awaiting your mild judgment and sentence on us."

"I wish thee joy, Pol-Marten, and thy wife as much, Mistress Pol-Marten," Lady Tub said. "Thou have tricked — dressed — her up in very fine clothing, I think."

"For that I made bold with Your Ladyship's wardrobe, but I have trespassed within the limits of your leave — I hope," Pol-Marten said.

Lady Tub said:

"I give her what she wears; I know that all women love to be finely dressed.

"Thou have deserved it of me: I am extremely pleased with thy good fortune."

Justice Preamble, Tobias Turf, Dame Turf, and John Clay entered the scene.

Lady Tub said:

"Welcome, good Justice Preamble.

“Tobias Turf, look merrily on your daughter: She has married a gentleman.”

“So I think,” Tobias Turf said. “I dare not touch her, she is so fine; yet I will say, God bless her!”

If she were not so very well dressed, he would give her a hug and kiss to celebrate her marriage.

“And I, too, my fine daughter!” Dame Turf said. “I could love her now twice as well as if John Clay had married her.”

Squire Tub said:

“Come, come, my mother is pleased. I pardon all.

“Pol-Marten, come in, and wait upon my lady.

“Welcome, good guests!

“See that supper is served in with all the plenty of the house and with all respect and ceremony.

“I must confer with Master In-and-In Medley about some alterations in my masque.

“Send Basket Hilts out to me; tell him to bring the Council of Finsbury hither.

“I’ll have such a night that shall make the name of Totten Court immortal and be recorded to posterity.”

Everyone except Squire Tub exited.

— 5.7 —

In-and-In Medley, Clench, To-Pan, and Scriben entered the scene.

“Oh, Master In-and-In, what have you done about the masque?” Squire Tub said.

In-and-In Medley said:

“Surveyed the place, sir, and designed the layout or starting point of the work; and this it is.

“First, I have fixèd in the earth a tub, and an old tub, like a saltpeter tub, preluding by [malapropism for ‘alluding to’] your father’s name, Sir Peter, and the antiquity of your house and family, originating from saltpeter.”

“Good, in faith,” Squire Tub said. “You have shown reading about and proper knowledge of our family history here, sir.”

“I have a little knowledge in design, which I can vary, sir, to infinito [to infinity, aka indefinitely],” Medley said.

“Ad infinitum, sir, you mean,” Squire Tub said.

Ad infinitum is Latin; infinito is Italian.

Medley said:

“I do. I stand not on my Latin; I don’t know Latin well.

“I’ll invent, but I must be alone then, joined with no man. This we call the stand-still — starting point and foundation — of our work.”

“Who are those ‘we’ you now joined to yourself?” Squire Tub asked.

“I mean myself still, in the plural number,” Medley said, “And out of this we raise our Tale of a Tub.”

Squire Tub said:

“No, Master In-and-In, my Tale of a Tub.

“By your leave, I am Tub: the tale is about me and my adventures! I am Squire Tub, subjectum fabulae — the subject of our story.”

“But I am the author,” Medley said.

Squire Tub said:

“The workman, sir! The artificer, I grant you.”

An artificer is 1) a skilled craftsman, and/or 2) a trickster.

He continued:

“So John Skelton the laureate was the artificer of Elinour Bumming, but she was the subject of the rout and tunning.”

A rout is a fuss, and tunning means pouring liquor into a large beer or wine cask.

Skelton’s poem was actually titled The Tunning of Elinor Rumming.

“He has put you to it, neighbor In-and-In,” Clench said. “He has caught you out.”

“Do not dispute with him,” To-Pan said. “He who pays for all will always win.”

Scriben asked, “Are you revised [malapropism for ‘advised’] of that? Are you sure of that? A man may have wit and intelligence, and yet take off his hat to show respect to someone else.”

Medley continued his description of what he had created for the masque:

“Now, sir, this tub I will have capped — topped — with paper, a fine oiled lantern paper that we use.”

“Yes, every barber, every cutler has it,” To-Pan said.

Medley said:

“Which in the tub does contain the light to the business and shall with the very vapor of the candle drive all the motions of our matter about, as we present them.”

The device was a large tub or barrel that lay on its side with a candle and puppets inside. The candlelight cast shadows of the puppets on the fine oiled lantern paper, which allowed the shadows to be seen. The candlelight also flickered, causing the puppets to seem to move.

“Motions” are puppets; the “matter” was the entertainment.

Medley continued:

“For example, first the Worshipful Lady Tub —”

Squire Tub interrupted: “Right Worshipful, please; I am Worshipful myself.”

Lady Tub had a title superior to his, and so she was entitled to be called “Right Worshipful.”

Medley said:

“Your Squireship’s mother passes by — her usher Master Pol-Marten, bare-headed before her — in her velvet gown.”

Squire Tub asked, “But how shall the spectators, as it might be I, or Hilts, know it is my mother? Or that it is Pol-Marten, there, who walks before her?”

“Oh, we do nothing if we do not make that clear,” Medley said.

He did not explain how that would be made clear.

“You have seen none of his works, sir,” Clench said to Squire Tub.

To-Pan mentioned one of Medley’s works: “All the postures — positions at drill — of the trained bands of citizen-soldiers of the country, aka county.”

“All their colors — their banners,” Scriben added.

“And all their captains,” To-Pan added.

“All the cries of the city, and all the trades in their liveries,” Clench added.

Scriben said:

“He has his whistle of command, seat of authority, and virge — rod of office — to interpret [explain his purpose], tipped with silver, sir!

“You don’t know him and how excellent he is.”

Medley would use a whistle to give commands concerning the masque.

“Well, I will leave it all to him,” Squire Tub said.

“Give me the brief — the abstract — of your subject. Leave the whole state of the thing to me,” Medley said.

Basket Hilts entered the scene and said, “Supper is ready, sir.
My Lady calls for you.”

“I’ll send the brief to you in writing,” Squire Tub said to Medley.

“Sir, I will render feazible and facile — practicable and easy to accomplish — what you expect,” Medley promised.

Squire Tub said:

“Hilts, let it be your responsibility to see the wise of Finsbury made welcome. Let them lack nothing.

“Has old Rosin been sent for?”

“He’s come and is inside,” Basket Hilts said.

Squire Tub went inside.

“Lord, what a world of business the Squire dispatches!”
Scriben said.

“He is a learned man,” Medley said. “I think there are only a vew [few] who are of the Inns of Court or the Inns of Chancery like him.”

The Inns of Court and the Inns of Chancery were legal associations and institutions.

“Let’s take care to do what he needs,” Clench said.

Everyone exited except Basket Hilts.

— 5.8 —

Black Jack, Lady Tub’s butler, walked over to Basket Hilts and said, “Yonder’s another wedding couple, Master Basket, brought in by Vicar Hugh.”

“Who are they, Jack?” Basket Hilts asked.

“The High Constable’s serving-man, Ball Hanny, and Mistress Wisp, our lady’s serving-woman,” Black Jack said.

“And are the table merry?” Basket Hilts asked.

“There’s a young tile-maker who makes all laugh,” Black Jack said. “He will not eat his food, but cries at the table that he shall be hanged.”

Of course, he was in no danger of being hanged. The robbery he had been accused of committing was a lie: It never happened.

“He has lost his wench already,” Basket Hilts said. “He might as well be hanged.”

“Was the mistress — loved one — of Pol-Marten, our fellow servant, the wench intended for that sneak-John?” Black Jack asked.

“Sneak-John” is John Clay, whom Black Jack regards as shifty.

Basket Hilts said:

“Indeed, Black Jack, he should have been her bridegroom.

“But I must go to wait on my wise masters.

“Jack, you shall wait on me, and see the masque soon; I am half Lord Chamberlain in my master’s absence.”

The Lord Chamberlain arranged entertainments such as masques for the royal court.

“Shall we have a masque?” Black Jack asked. “Who makes it?”

Basket Hilts replied:

“In-and-In Medley, the maker — craftsman — of Islington.

“Come, go with me to the sage sentences — the sages who provide wise judgment — of Finsbury.”

They exited.

— 5.9 —

Two servants prepared a room for the masque by setting out chairs for the audience.

“Come, bring in the great chair for my lady,” the first servant said, “and set it there, and set out this chair for Justice Bramble.”

“This chair is for the Squire, my master, on the right hand,” the second servant said.

“And this chair is for the High Constable,” the first servant said.

“This chair is for his wife,” the second servant said.

“Then here are chairs for the bride and bridegroom,” the first servant said. “Here is Pol-Marten’s chair.”

“And the chair for she Pol-Marten is at my lady’s feet,” the second servant said.

“Right,” the first servant said.

“And beside them is the chair for Master Hannibal Puppy,” the second servant said.

“And his she-Puppy, Mistress Wisp who was,” the first servant said. “Here’s all the chairs that are mentioned in the note.”

The second servant said, “No, a chair is also needed for Master Vicar, the petty Chanon Hugh.”

In Chanon Hugh’s case, “petty” means 1) a minor cleric, and 2) small-minded.

“And a chair is needed for cast-by — rejected — John Clay,” the first servant said.

They finished setting out the chairs, and the first servant said, “There are all the chairs that are needed.”

Squire Tub entered the room and said:

“Cry, ‘A hall! A hall!’

“It is merry in Tottenham Hall, when beards wag all.”

The cry “A hall! A hall!” meant “Clear space for an entertainment!”

Squire Tub then called, “Come, Father Rozin, with your fiddle now, and two tall — fine — tooters. Play a flourish to announce the masque!”

The musicians entered and played a flourish.

Justice Preamble entered the hall, followed by Lady Tub, Tobias Turf, Dame Turf, Pol-Marten, Audrey, Puppy, Wisp, Chanon Hugh, John Clay, and the Council of Finsbury: In-and-In Medley, Scriben, To-Pan, and Clench.

All took their seats. Basket Hilts stood off to the side. His job was to cry “Peace!” aka “Silence!” before each episode of the masque.

Lady Tub said:

“Neighbors, all are welcome! Now Totten Hall looks like a court, and hence shall first be called so.”

The name would be Totten Court, aka Tottenham Court.

Lady Tub continued:

“Your witty short confession, Master Vicar, which you gave in another room, has been the prologue, and has revealed much to my son’s device, his Tale of a Tub.”

“Let my masque show itself, and In-and-In, the architect, appear,” Squire Tub said. “I hear the whistle.”

In-and-In Medley was blowing the whistle to announce that the masque was ready to start.

Basket Hilts said loudly, “Peace! Let there be silence!”

In-and-In Medley appeared in front of the curtain that the stage had in front. He would give brief descriptions of each episode of the masque.

Medley read the introduction of the masque out loud:

“Thus rise I first, in my light linen breeches,

“To run the meaning over in short speeches.

“Here is a tub: a Tub of Totten Court,

“An ancient Tub, has called you to this sport [entertainment].

“His father was a knight, the rich Sir Peter,

“Who got his wealth by a tub and by saltpeter,

“And left all to his Lady Tub, the mother

“Of this bold Squire Tub, and to no other.

“Now of this Tub and’s [and his] deeds, not done in ale,

“Observe, and you shall see the very tale.”

In other words: Squire Tub was not drunk when he did these deeds; this Tub did not contain ale.

In-and-In Medley then drew the curtain and revealed the top of the tub.

Basket Hilts said loudly, “Peace! Let there be silence!”

Music played to announce the first episode of the masque.

For each motion, or episode, of the masque, candlelight cast the shadows of the puppets onto oiled lantern paper, and Medley read out loud a poem that interpreted what the audience was seeing.

Medley read the first episode of the masque out loud:

“Here Chanon Hugh first brings to Totten Hall

“The High Constable’s counsel, tells the Squire all;

“Which, though discovered [revealed] — give the devil his due —

“The wise [men] of Finsbury do still pursue.

“Then with the Justice doth [does] he [Chanon Hugh] counterplot,

“And his clerk, Metaphor, to cut that knot [prevent that marriage];

“Whilst Lady Tub, in her sad [dark-colored] velvet gown,

“Missing her son, doth [does] seek him up and down.”

“With her Pol-Marten bare-headed before her,” Squire Tub said.

Medley said, “Yes, I have expressed it here in the shadow-figure, and Mistress Wisp, her woman, holding up her train.”

“In the next page report your second strain — the second part of your poem,” Squire Tub said.

Basket Hilts said loudly, “Peace! Let there be silence!”

Music sounded.

Medley read the second episode of the masque out loud:

“Here the High Constable and sages walk

“To church. The dame, the daughter, bride-maids talk

“Of wedding-business, till a fellow in comes,

“Relates the robbery of one Captain Thumbs;

“Chargeth the bridegroom with it, troubles all,

“And gets the bride; who in the hands doth [does] fall

“Of the bold Squire, but thence soon is ta'en [taken]

“By the sly Justice and his clerk profane,

“In shape [disguise] of pursuivant; which he not long

“Holds, but betrays all with his trembling tongue;

“As truth will break out and show —”

The “clerk profane” is Miles Metaphor, who is a civil clerk and not a clerk in holy orders.

Squire Tub interrupted, looking at the shadow-figures, “Oh, thou have made him kneel there in a corner, I see now. There is simple — sterling — honor for you, Hilts!”

Basket Hilts had knocked Miles Metaphor down.

Miles Metaphor’s cowardice is also mentioned in episode four of the masque.

“Didn’t I make him confess all to you?” Basket Hilts asked.

Squire Tub replied, “True, In-and-In has done you right, you see.”

He then requested, “Thy third part of the poem, please, witty In-and-In.”

Clench said, “The Squire commends ’un [him: In-and-In Medley]; he likes all well.”

“He cannot choose not to,” To-Pan said. “This is gear made to sell — it is good.”

Basket Hilts said loudly, “Peace! Let there be silence!”

Music sounded.

Medley read the third episode of the masque out loud:

“The careful [troubled] Constable here drooping comes,

“In his deluded search [he has been fooled into making the search] of [that is, for] Captain Thumbs.

“Puppy brings word his daughter’s run away

“With the tall [valiant] serving-man [Basket Hilts]. He frights [frightens] groom Clay

“Out of his wits. Returneth then the Squire,

“Mocks all their pains, and gives fame out a liar [shows that the report is a lie]

“For falsely charging Clay, when ’twas [it was] the plot

“Of subtle Bramble, who had Audrey got

“Into his hand by this winding [devious] device.

“The father makes a rescue in a trice,

“And with his daughter, like Saint George on foot,

“Comes home triumphing to his dear heart root [to his beloved wife];

“And tells the Lady Tub, whom he meets there,

“Of her son’s courtesies [courting of Audrey], the bachelor,

“Whose words had made ’em fall [that is, made them give up] the hue and cry.

“When Captain Thumbs coming to ask him why

“He had so done, he cannot yield him cause,

“But so he runs his neck into the laws [he becomes caught up in legal trouble].”

Basket Hilts said loudly, “Peace! Let there be silence!”

Music sounded.

Medley read the fourth episode of the masque out loud:

“The laws, who have a noose to crack his neck,

“As Justice Bramble tells him, who doth [does] peck

“A hundred pounds out of his purse, that comes

“Like his teeth from him, unto Captain Thumbs.”

A proverb stated, “To get money from him is like pulling teeth.”

Medley continued reading the fourth episode of the masque out loud:

“Thumbs is the Vicar in a false disguise,

“And employs Metaphor to fetch this prize,

“Who tells the secret unto Basket Hilts,

“For fear of beating. This the Squire quilts [that is, stitches together]

“Within his cap, and bids him but purloin [steal]

“The wench for him; they two shall share the coin.

“Which the sage lady [Lady Tub] in her ’foresaid gown

“Breaks off, returning unto Kentish Town

“To seek her Wisp, taking the Squire along,

“Who finds Clay John, as hidden in straw throng [in tightly pressed, aka thick, straw].”

Basket Hilts said:

“Oh, how I am beholden to the inventor, who would not, on record against me, write about my slackness here to enter the barn!

“Well, In-and-In, I see thou can discern!”

Squire Tub said to Medley, “Go on with your last episode, and come to a conclusion.”

Basket Hilts said loudly, “Peace! Let there be silence!”

Music sounded.

Medley read the fifth and final episode of the masque out loud:

“The last is known, and needs but small infusion [pouring]

“Into your memories, by leaving in

“These figures as you sit [by letting the puppets remain still, just as the audience members whom the puppets represent are sitting still]. I, In-and-In,

“Present you with the show: first, of a Lady

“Tub and her son, of whom this masque here made I.

“Then bridegroom Pol and Mistress Pol the bride,

“With the sub-couple, who sit them beside [sit beside them].”

The sub-couple were Ball Puppy and Dido Wisp.

Squire Tub said, “That is the only verse I altered for the better, euphonia gratia.”

Euphonia gratia is supposed to mean “for the sake of euphony,” but the correct Latin phrase is euphoniae gratia.

Medley finished reading the fifth episode out loud:

“Then Justice Bramble, with Sir Hugh the Chanon,

“And the bride’s parents, which I will not stan’ on [stand on, insist upon],

“Or the lost Clay, with the recovered Miles;

“Who thus unto his master him ’conciles [reconciles],

“On the Squire’s word, to pay old Turf his club [pay his contribution — that is, pay the money stolen from him].

“And so doth [does] end our Tale, here, of a Tub.”

EPILOGUE (A Tale of a Tub)

Squire Tub said to you, the audience:

“This tale of me, the Tub of Totten Court,

“A poet [playwright] first invented for your sport
[entertainment],

“Wherein the fortune of most empty tubs,

“Rolling in love, are shown, and with what rubs [difficulties]

“We’re [We are] commonly encountered, when the wit
[intelligence]

“Of the whole Hundred so opposeth [opposed] it.

“Our petty Chanon’s forkèd [devilish] plot in chief,

“Sly Justice’s arts, with the High Constable’s brief

“And brag [spirited] commands; my lady mother’s care
[worry, suspicion],

“And her Pol-Marten’s fortune; with the rare

“Fate of poor John, thus tumbled in the cask;”

[“Poor john” is dried, salted fish that is preserved in a cask.]

[Being in a cask as others roll it would certainly shake up someone, as has metaphorically happened to poor John Clay in this play.]

Squire Tub concluded:

“Got In-and-In to gi’t [to present it to] you in a masque:

“That [So that] you be pleased, who came to see a play,

“With those that [who] hear and mark [notice] not what we say.

“Wherein the poet’s fortune is, I fear,

“Still [Always] to be early up, but ne’er the near.”

[Getting up early and making a good play will not solve the problem of audience members who don’t pay attention.]

D’OGENES SCRIBEN

Many Cynics were beggars and the Cynic Diogenes was sometimes called the Dog. The word “Cynic” means “Dog-like.”

The Cynics believed in rejecting wealth, fame, and power and instead living a simple life. They often publicly and caustically rejected wealth, fame, and power and the people who pursued them.

Diogenes once carried a lit lamp during the daytime and claimed to be looking for a man — any man — but all he could find were scoundrels. (Retellings of this story sometimes say that he was looking for an honest man.)

Alexander the Great heard about Diogenes, met him, and asked if he could do anything for him. In doing so, Alexander stood between the famous Cynic and the sun and cast a shadow on him. Diogenes replied, “Yes, you can stand out of my sunlight.”

Alexander told him, “If I were not Alexander, I would want to be Diogenes.” Diogenes replied, “If I were not Diogenes, I would want to be Diogenes.”

When Alexander wondered why Diogenes was looking at a pile of bones, Diogenes replied, “I am looking for the bones of your father, but I cannot distinguish them from the bones of his slaves.”

Kentish Longtails

BY IAN · PUBLISHED SEPTEMBER 6, 2012 ·
UPDATED DECEMBER 10, 2018

The inhabitants of Strood in Kent were once nicknamed Kentish Longtails. Though this could relate to the belief in medieval mainland Europe that the English had tails, there is a folk tale relating a curse placed on the people of Strood by Thomas Becket, Archbishop of Canterbury.

It is said that whilst Thomas Becket (Born 1118 – Died 29 December 1170) was riding through Strood, a town that supported King Henry II against the Archbishop, he was waylaid by the inhabitants and an argument ensued. Robert de Broc, or a nephew of his cut off the tail of Thomas Becket's horse. The story goes on to say that the result of this insult was a curse put on the people of Strood and de Broc, by Thomas Becket, that all their descendants would be born with tails.

There is an historical account which mentions Robert de Broc, the cutting off of a horses tail and subsequent excommunication by Becket. According to William Fitz Stephen (William Fitzstephen) (Died 1191) – Becket's household clerk. 'On Christmas eve he read the lesson from the gospel, "the book of the generation", and celebrated the midnight mass. Before high mass on Christmas day, which he also celebrated, he preached a splendid sermon to the people, taking for his subject a text on which he was wont to ponder, namely, "on earth peace to men of good will". When he made mention of the holy fathers of the church of Canterbury who were therein confessors, he said that they already had one archbishop who was a martyr, St Alphege, and it was possible that they would shortly have another. And because of the shameful injury inflicted on the horse of a certain poor peasant of his, a servant of the church of Canterbury, by cutting off its tail, he bound Robert de Broc with a sentence of excommunication. He had previously threatened him through messengers, while inviting him to make reparation. But Robert, being contumacious, had returned answer by a certain knight, David of Romney, that if the archbishop excommunicated him he would act like an excommunicate. Also, those who had violently taken possession of his two churches of Harrow and Throwley and had refused to admit his officers, he involved in the same sentence.'

Here is some information on the five wits:

Five Wits

In the time of William Shakespeare, there were commonly reckoned to be five wits and five senses. The five wits were sometimes taken to be synonymous with the five senses, but were otherwise also known and regarded as the five inward wits, distinguishing them from the five senses, which were the five outward wits.

Much of this conflation has resulted from changes in meaning. In Early Modern English, “wit” and “sense” overlapped in meaning. Both could mean a faculty of perception (although this sense dropped from the word “wit” during the 17th century). Thus “five wits” and “five senses” could describe both groups of wits/senses, the inward and the outward, although the common distinction, where it was made, was “five wits” for the inward and “five senses” for the outward.

The inward and outward wits are a product of many centuries of philosophical and psychological thought, over which the concepts gradually developed, that have their origins in the works of Aristotle. The concept of five outward wits came to medieval thinking from Classical philosophy, and found its most major expression in Christian devotional literature of the Middle Ages. The concept of five inward wits similarly came from Classical views on psychology.

Modern thinking is that there are more than five (outward) senses, and the idea that there are five (corresponding to the gross anatomical features — eyes, ears, nose, skin, and mouth — of many higher animals) does not stand up to scientific scrutiny. (For more on this, see Definition of sense.) But the idea of five senses/wits from Aristotelian, medieval, and 16th century thought still lingers so strongly in modern thinking that a sense beyond the natural ones is still called a “sixth sense”.

The “inward” wits

Stephen Hawes’ poem Graunde Amoure shows that the five (inward) wits were “common wit”, “imagination”, “fantasy”, “estimation”, and “memory”. “Common wit” corresponds to Aristotle’s concept of common sense (sensus communis), and “estimation” roughly corresponds to the modern notion of instinct.

Shakespeare himself refers to these wits several times, in Romeo and Juliet (Act I, scene 4, and Act II, scene iv), King Lear (Act III, scene iv), Much Ado About Nothing (Act I, scene i, 55), and Twelfth Night (Act IV, scene ii, 92). He distinguished between the five wits and the five senses, as can be seen from Sonnet 141.

The traditional five senses are hearing, sight, touch, taste, and smell, and no doubt the joke here is that Dame Turf has gotten the number wrong.

Two other senses, however, may be balance (vestibular sense) and movement (proprioception).

For Your Information:

Vestibular

The vestibular system explains the perception of our body in relation to gravity, movement and balance. The vestibular system measures acceleration, g-force, body movements and head position. Examples of the vestibular system in practice include knowing that you are moving when you are in an elevator, knowing whether you are lying down or sat up, and being able to walk along a balance beam.

Proprioception

Proprioception is the sense of the relative position of neighbouring parts of the body and strength of effort being employed in movement. This sense is very important as it lets us know exactly where our body parts are, how we are positioned in space and to plan our movements. Examples of our proprioception in practice include being able to clap our hands together with our eyes closed, write with a pencil and apply with correct pressure, and navigate through a narrow space.

Below is some information on “fool’s finger”:

The dully-named middle finger was, to our forbears the fool’s finger, but not, alas, because it was covered in ink. Instead we got the name from the Romans who called it the digitus infamis (infamous), obscenus (obscene), and impudicus (rude). Nobody is sure why the Romans bore such a grudge against the middle finger, but it seems that it was they who invented the habit of sticking it up at those they did not like.

As Martial so delicately put it:

*Rideto multum qui te, Sextille, cinaedum
dixerit et digitum porrigito medium*

Which translates extraordinarily loosely as:

*If you are called a poof don’t pause or linger
But laugh and show the chap your middle finger.*

Blog.inkyfool.com. 10 December 2010

<https://blog.inkyfool.com/2010/12/digital-information-and-flipping-finger.html>

Below is more information about the middle finger:

The middle finger is mostly known from Greek comedy, but it is also mentioned in some Latin sources.

Martial's Epigram 28, lines 1–2:

Rideto multum qui te, Sextille, cinaedum
Dixerit et digitum porrigito medium.

“Laugh at the man who calls you a faggot, Sextillus, and extend your middle finger.”

And:

Logeion, s.v. impudicus, gives Martial 6.70.5 which mind you isn't specified as being the middle finger. But there's an interesting and amusing commentary on that passage in an article (CJ 47:67) on Roman Elementary Mathematics by J. Hilton Turner, which makes it pretty clear that it was. Elsewhere in the same article, there's a translation of a chunk of Bede in which he talks of the middle finger (clear from the context, despite no Latin original in the article) as impudicus.

In Muratori (XI, part 3, p126), in the anonymous Liber de computo sive kalendario attributed to Cyril of Alexandria, §138 there's another digitus impudicus; here too in the context of representing numbers on one's fingers.

Roger Pack, “Catullus, Carmen V: Abacus or Finger-Counting?”, AJP 77:47-51 at JSTOR builds on another part of the Turner article, by suggesting that the Catullus poem maybe is best viewed not on an abacus with Turner, but in finger-counting, and there's a bit about the impudicus in his article as well.

This is some information about Saint Anthony’s association with pigs:

The Possible Connections with Pigs

*So what is the connection with St. Anthony and pigs?
Here are several various explanations.*

The first explanation is that the pig represents evil that St. Anthony had to overcome as he fought the temptations of the world, the flesh, and the devil. Pigs, for obvious reasons, are associated with the ground and the earth. Thus, the idea is that some artists wanted to depict how St. Anthony defeated the earthly temptations by including a pig to represent the worldly sins.

Another related explanation is that the pig represents the demonic. As St. Athanasius records in his biography, St. Anthony experienced many attacks from the devil which sometimes came in the form of wild animals perhaps even wild pigs. And the image of wild pigs brings to mind the story in the Gospels where Jesus permitted the demons to enter the pigs who then promptly drowned themselves. (Luke 8:32-33)

A third possible association with pigs is related to skin disease. St. Anthony was known to be an intercessor for people who were suffering from various skin diseases. The reason for that was probably because of the excellent health which he maintained throughout the course of his life in spite of his ascetic lifestyle.

Skin diseases were often treated using pork fat because it would reduce the inflammation and itching. In order to make the connection between St. Anthony and his patronage for sufferers of skin diseases, the artists might have included a pig with the saint.

A later explanation is related to an order of that was founded centuries after his death--the Hospitallers of St. Anthony--who took the saint for their patron. The order was founded around 1095 by Gaston of Dauphiné who started the ministry of giving aid to the poor in thanksgiving from his own miraculous cure of a disease known as St. Anthony's Fire. The disease which is now known as ergotism was of epidemic proportions and responsible for the deaths of many in Europe over the centuries.

The order was supported in part by pigs. First, the order was allowed to raise pigs. Second, people would donate a pig to the order, raise the pig themselves, and give it to the order on the feast of St. Anthony which is the 17th of January.

Finally, there is the most appealing explanation (at least for pigs) which is that the saint healed a wild pig and through that action befriended the animal who remained with him in the desert. Of course, St. Anthony was a vegetarian so the pig would not ever have to worry about becoming his dinner.

In celebration of this story, there is a tradition of bringing domestic animals, including pigs, to the parish on January 17th in order to have them blessed by the priest.

Whichever story made the first connection between the saint and pigs, eventually pig herders latched on to his association with pigs and he became their patron as well as the patron of pigs, of course, and domestic animals, in general.

The reference to “large ears” and “horns” comes from one of Aesop’s Fables that has more than one moral:

A hurt Lion banned all horned animals from his kingdom. A Hare saw his ears looked like horns in his shadow decided to leave, ending a long-term friendship.

Paranoia can change everything.

Aesop For Children (The Hare and His Ears)

The Lion had been badly hurt by the horns of a Goat, which he was eating. He was very angry to think that any animal that he chose for a meal, should be so brazen as to wear such dangerous things as horns to scratch him while he ate. So he commanded that all animals with horns should leave his domains within twenty-four hours.

The command struck terror among the beasts. All those who were so unfortunate as to have horns, began to pack up and move out. Even the Hare, who, as you know, has no horns and so had nothing to fear, passed a very restless night, dreaming awful dreams about the fearful Lion.

And when he came out of the warren in the early morning sunshine, and there saw the shadow cast by his long and pointed ears, a terrible fright seized him.

“Goodby, neighbor Cricket,” he called. “I’m off. He will certainly make out that my ears are horns, no matter what I say.”

Moral

Do not give your enemies the slightest reason to attack your reputation.

Your enemies will seize any excuse to attack you.

JBR Collection

The Lion being once badly hurt by the horns of a Goat, went into a great rage, and swore that every animal with horns should be banished from his kingdom. Goats, Bulls, Rams, Deer, and every living thing with horns had quickly to be off on pain of death. A Hare, seeing from his shadow how long his ears were, was in great fear lest they should be taken for horns. “Good-bye, my friend,” said he to a Cricket who, for many a long summer evening, had chirped to him where he lay dozing: “I must be off from here. My ears are too much like horns to allow me to be comfortable.” “Horns!” exclaimed the Cricket, “do you take me for a fool? You no more have horns than I have.” “Say what you please,” replied the Hare, “were my ears only half as long as they are, they would be quite long enough for any one to lay hold of who wished to make them out to be horns.”

A Fabian is a member of the Roman gens (family) Fabia. This was a patrician name.

In 321 B.C.E., Quintus Fabius Ambustus was nominated to be Dictator. A fault in the auspices forced him to resign.

In 315 B.C.E., Quintus Fabius Maximus Rullianus was Dictator.

In 216 B.C.E., Marcus Fabius Buteo was named Dictator after the Battle of Cannae in which the Carthaginian general Hannibal achieved a great victory against the Romans.

In 221 and 217 B.C.E., Quintus Fabius Maximus Verrucosis — known as Cunctator — was dictator. “Cunctator” means “Delayer,” and as dictator he harassed Hannibal’s army without ever fighting it in open battle. This is probably the “Vadian” To-Pan meant.

In other words:

Vadian = Fabian = Fabius

Of course, we remember:

Octavian = Octavius

According to the Oxford English Dictionary, this is the definition of “darg”:

A day's work, the task of a day

“Dargison” could mean “son of work,” and so it could mean a working man.

Here is a comment that may be relevant:

Dargasson. In Irish gasson (from the French) means de lad or boy. Though it's slightly derogatory it's far more preferable to the alternative manin that is on the point of insult.

“The [de] lad” is the meaning of the French le gamin and le garçon.

The French gosse means “kid, child, brat.”

Perhaps “Dargason” is “De Gascon.”

“De” can mean “from” or “the.”

Miles Metaphor may be a young man and so be referred to derogatorily as “the boy.”

Here are two definitions of “gascon” in the Oxford English Dictionary:

A native or inhabitant of Gascony, a region and former province in south-west France.

A person who resembles a Gascon in character; a braggart, a boaster.

The Oxford English Dictionary's first recorded instance of the second definition, however, is from 1757.

Miles Metaphor did some boasting when he said, “Had they been but some five or six, I'd whipped them all like tops in Lent, and hurled them into Hobbler's hole, or the next ditch.”

But he said that to Chanon Hugh and Justice Preamble.
Squire Tub would not be aware of that boasting.

CHAPTER 17: Ben Jonson's Volpone, or the Fox

CAST OF CHARACTERS (Volpone, or the Fox)

The Main Man and His Main Servant

VOLPONE, a Magnifico. Volpone is Italian for “fox.” Volpone is crafty, is sly, and lacks morals. A magnifico is a wealthy, distinguished gentleman. Magnifico is Italian for “magnificent.” In particular, a magnifico is a plutocrat — his power comes from his wealth.

MOSCA, Volpone's Parasite. Mosca is Italian for “fly.” Mosca is a human parasite: He lives on other people. Many parasites are flatterers and hangers-on, but Mosca works hard at making himself indispensable to Volpone.

The Legacy-Hunters

VOLTORE, an Advocate. Voltore is Italian for “vulture.” An advocate is a lawyer. Voltore is a legacy-hunter: He wants to inherit Volpone's wealth. Vultures feed on dead animals.

CORBACCIO, an Old Gentleman. Corbaccio is Italian for “raven.” Corbaccio is a legacy-hunter: He wants to inherit Volpone's wealth. Ravens feed on dead animals. Ravens were also believed to neglect their young.

CORVINO, a Merchant. Corvino is Italian for “crow.” Corvino is a legacy-hunter: He wants to inherit Volpone's wealth. Crows feed on dead animals. Merchants sell things, and Corvino is willing to sell his wife's honor.

Two People with Good Morality

BONARIO, Son to Corbaccio. Bonario is Italian for “good-tempered.”

CELIA, Corvino's Wife. The Latin word “caelia” means “the Heavenly, aka celestial, one.”

Volpone's Less Important Servants

NANO, a Dwarf. Nano is Italian for “dwarf.” Many dwarves made their living as entertainers.

CASTRONE, a Eunuch. He has been castrated; some boys were castrated to preserve their high singing voice.

ANDROGYNO, a Hermaphrodite. His name is based on “androgynous” — both male and female. Volpone calls Androgyno his Fool — his jester.

Travelers

SIR POLITIC WOULD-BE, an English Knight and wannabe VIP. He wants to be thought to be important in affairs of state. “Pol” is a name for a parrot. A poll parrot chatters. “Politic” refers to statesmanship and diplomacy.

LADY POLITIC WOULD-BE, Sir Politic Would-Be's Wife. Also known as FINE MADAME WOULD-BE. She is in Venice to learn the womanly arts by studying the well-regarded Viennese prostitutes.

PEREGRINE, an English Gentleman Traveler. A peregrine falcon is a kind of hawk. A peregrine falcon is a predatory bird.

Law Officials

COMMANDATORI: Police Officers, aka Officers of Justice.

ADVOCARI: Judges, four Magistrates.

NOTARY, the Registrar to the court, aka Clerk of Court.

Other Characters

THREE MERCHANTS. Three merchants help Peregrine fool Sir Politic Would-be.

CROWD. A crowd of people watch the mountebank's performance.

WOMEN: Lady Politic Would-be's female attendants.

SERVANTS.

SCENE

VENICE, ITALY. To the Elizabethans, Venice was wealthy, sophisticated, and immoral.

DATE

Probably February or March 1606.

THE ARGUMENT (Volpone, or the Fox)

Volpone, childless, rich, feigns sick, [feigns] despair,

Offers his estate to hopes of several heirs,

Lies languishing: his parasite receives

Presents from all, assures, deludes; then weaves

Other cross plots [counter-plots], which open themselves [unfold and reveal themselves and] are told [exposed].

New tricks for safety are sought; they thrive: when bold,

Each tempts the other again, and all are sold [betrayed, ruined].

The “argument” of the play is a brief summary of the plot. This argument is an acrostic; the first letter of each line spells out VOLPONE.

Volpone is a rich man who has no children. Other rich people would like to inherit his property, so Volpone pretends to be sick and near death. The other rich people give him many expensive presents, hoping to be named his heir in his will. Characters immorally compete with each other, and in the end, all guilty persons are punished.

A parasite is a person who lives off another person. Mosca is Volpone’s parasite, his main servant.

PROLOGUE (Volpone, or the Fox)

Now, if God will send us a little luck, a little wit will serve to make our book a hit, according to the tastes of the literary season and audiences. However, here in this book is rhyme, and the rhyme is not empty of reason.

This we were bid to believe from our author, Ben Jonson, whose true intention, if you would know it, in all his books always has been this measure: to mix profit with your pleasure.

His intention has not been that of some authors, whose throats fail because of their envy as they cry hoarsely, “All he writes is excessively critical.” And when his books come out, these overly prolific authors think that they can insult his books by saying that he took a year to write each of them.

To this Mr. Jonson need not say that it is a lie because all he needs to do is to point to this work of art, which did not exist two months before it was first seen — Mr. Jonson wrote it in less than two months.

And although Mr. Jonson dares to give them five lives to mend his book — depending on your opinion of his value as an author, that’s five lives to look for non-existent errors to correct, or five lives to correct all the numerous errors — let it be known that it took him only five weeks to fully write it. He did not use the services of a co-author, a journeyman author paid to write some of the scenes, a beginning author working under his direction, or a tutor to provide direction to him.

Yet thus much I can give you as a token of his play’s worth: No eggs are broken, nor are there quaking custards — quivering cowards — frightened by fierce teeth. This book contains no slapstick of the kind that delights the ordinary crowd of ordinary people.

Nor does the author drag in a fool who recites clichés and stale jokes to stop gaps in loose, badly constructed writing, and nor does the author drag in characters who engage in a great many monstrous and forced actions — such things might make the book a hit at Bedlam, the hospital for the insane. Nor has he made his book out of jests stolen from each table where joke-tellers eat, but instead he has written his own jokes as they appear naturally and fit the events that occur in this book.

The author presents quick, lively, refined comedy, in accordance with the best critics: Aristotle and Horace. He observes the laws of time, place, and persons. This book can be read in a day, and the events take place in a day. The events also take place in locations that can be reasonably reached in a day. Also, the characters remain consistent in character: Greedy characters stay greedy, and good characters stay good. Any changes that occur are those that can realistically occur.

From no needful rule does the author stray. An unnecessary rule — to be followed only sometimes — is the law of action: The book should have only one plot. This book has a main plot and a sub-plot related to the theme of the main plot, and so the law of action is obviously not a needful rule.

All gall and copperas, aka sulphuric acid — from his ink the author has drained, and only a little salt — sediment — remains, wherewith he'll rub your cheeks, so that red with laughter, they shall look fresh for the upcoming week.

Yes, bitter gall and acid shall be absent from this book, although a little salty wit shall be present so that you shall laugh and be cheerful for a week.

ACT 1 (Volpone, or the Fox)

— 1.1 —

Volpone and Mosca were talking one morning in a room in Volpone's house in Venice.

Volpone said, "Good morning to the day; and next, good morning to my gold. Open the shrine, so that I may see my saint."

Mosca opened a treasure chest, revealing gold and other precious metals, jewels, etc. Volpone was a very wealthy man.

Some religious people believe in beginning the day with a prayer to what the people most value. Many Christians begin the day with a prayer to God. Volpone valued seeing the Sun — that is, being alive — and he valued material wealth. He now parodied a Christian's morning prayer.

Looking at the treasure, Volpone said, "Hail the world's soul, and my soul!"

Some systems of thought regard the anima mundi — the world's soul — as the most vital force in the universe.

He continued, "The teeming — pregnant — earth is glad to see the longed-for Sun peep through the horns of the celestial Ram."

In astrology, the Sun enters the astrological sign Aries, the Ram, at the beginning of spring in the Northern hemisphere. With the arrival of more minutes of sunshine, the Northern hemisphere is able to give birth to the many potential plants in seeds in the earth.

Volpone continued, "But I am even gladder than the teeming earth seeing the Sun when I see my treasure's splendor darkening the splendor of the Sun by contrast. My treasure, lying here among my other hoards of treasure, appears as bright as a flame by night, or like the first day of creation, when God created the Sun and the Moon out of chaos, and all darkness fled to Earth's center, where Hell is located."

In Exodus 13, God had appeared as a pillar of fire in order to lead the Israelites to the Promised Land.

Volpone then referred to the son of Sol; Sol is the Sun, and alchemists referred to gold as the son of Sol.

"Oh, you son of Sol, but brighter than your father, let me kiss you with adoration, and let me kiss every relic of sacred treasure in this blessed room.

"Well did wise poets, by your glorious name, title that age which they would have the best."

He was referring to the Golden Age, the best age, an age in which men lived easy lives. Life in the classical Golden Age is comparable to life in the Garden of Eden. Greed for gold, however, was not known in the Golden Age. Love of gold often leads to sin.

1 Timothy 6:10 states, "For the love of money is the root of all evil: which while some coveted after, they have erred from the faith, and pierced themselves through with many sorrows" (King James Version).

Referring to gold, Volpone said, "You are the best of all things, and you far transcend all kinds of joy — joy in children, parents, friends, or any other waking dream on Earth. I would rather have gold than any of these other things.

"People talk about golden Venus, the most beautiful goddess. They should have given Venus twenty thousand Cupids — such are your beauties and our loves! Gold is so beautiful that if Venus is golden, she should have been made pregnant twenty thousand times and given birth to twenty thousand Cupids, the god of cupidity.

“Gold, you are my dear saint. Riches are the dumb God that gives all men tongues. Gold cannot speak, yet all men will speak volumes — including volumes of lies — to acquire gold.

“Gold, you can do nothing, and yet you make men do all things — including evil things — to acquire you. Gold, you are the Unmoved Mover.

“Think of the price of souls. The Son of God gave his life to redeem the souls of sinners. But if a sinful life contains gold, sinners will consider Hell to be worth as much as Heaven. Gold is as valuable as the blood of Christ because both gold and the blood of Christ buy souls.

“Gold, you are virtue, fame, honor, and all other things. Whoever can get you shall be regarded as noble, valiant, honest, wise —”

Mosca interrupted, “And whatever else he wishes to be regarded as, sir. Riches are in fortune a greater good than wisdom is in nature. It is better to be lucky enough to acquire riches than it is to be born with wisdom.”

Proverbs 16:16 states, “How much better is it to get wisdom than gold! and to get understanding rather to be chosen than silver!” (King James Version). Mosca — and Volpone — disagree.

“True, my beloved Mosca,” Volpone said. “Yet I glory more in the cunning acquisition of my wealth than in its glad possession, since I gain wealth in no ordinary, common way.

“I don’t engage in business. I don’t engage in risky speculations. I wound no earth with plows, I fatten no beasts to feed the slaughterhouses. I have no mills for iron, olive oil, corn, or men, to grind them into powder.”

Men can be ground down through excessively hard work.

Volpone continued, “I blow no subtly conceived glassware. I expose no ships to the threats of the furrow-faced — wave-wracked — sea. I make no monetary speculations in the public bank, nor am I a private moneylender —”

Mosca interrupted, “No sir, nor do you devour soft, easily manipulated prodigal sons who spend their money before they inherit it. Some people will swallow a melting heir — an heir whose wealth melts wastefully away — as glibly as your Dutch will swallow pills — mouthfuls — of butter, and never purge — take an emetic or a laxative — for it. They digest the heir so thoroughly that there is no need for such remedies, and they are able to do so without purging — being punished for — their actions.

“Such people tear forth the fathers of poor families out of their beds, and coffin them alive in some kind, clasping — fetters are clasping — prison, where their bones may be forthcoming, when the flesh is rotten. In other words, they won’t leave the debtors’ prison alive.

“But your sweet nature abhors these courses of action. You loathe the widow’s or the orphan’s tears that would then wash your pavements, and their piteous cries that would ring in your roofs, and beat the air for vengeance.”

“You are right, Mosca,” Volpone said. “I do loathe it.”

He had seen the tears and had heard the cries of distress.

Mosca continued, “And besides, sir, you are not like a thresher who stands with a huge flail, watching a heap of corn, and, although he is hungry, he dares not taste the smallest grain, but instead feeds on mallows — vegetation that is eaten during famines — and other such bitter herbs.

“Also, you are not like the merchant who has filled his vaults with fine wines from Greece and rich wines from Crete, yet drinks the dregs of bad, vinegary wine from Lombardy.

“You will not lie in straw while moths and worms feed on your sumptuous hangings and soft beds.”

In other words, Volpone knew how to spend money and enjoy himself. He was a bon vivant, not a miser.

Mosca continued, “You know the use of riches, and dare give now from that bright heap, to me, your poor servant, or to your dwarf, or your hermaphrodite, your eunuch, or what other household-trifle — menial servant — your pleasure permits to work for you.”

Volpone’s servants included a dwarf, a eunuch, and a hermaphrodite. He had hired these people to keep him entertained.

“Stop, Mosca,” Volpone said.

He took a coin from his treasure chest and held it out to Mosca, saying, “Take this from my hand.”

Mosca took the coin.

Volpone then said, “You strike on the truth in all things, and those people who call you a parasite are envious of you.

“Bring here my dwarf, my eunuch, and my Fool, and let them entertain me.”

Mosca exited to summon Nano the dwarf, Castrone the eunuch, and Androgyno the hermaphrodite, who was also Volpone’s Fool, aka professional jester.

Alone, Volpone said to himself, “What should I do, but cocker up my genius, and live free to all delights my fortune calls me to?”

By “cocker up my genius,” Volpone meant “indulge my appetites.” “Cocker up” was a fitting term because many of his appetites were sexual.

Volpone continued, “I have no wife, no parent, child, or relative to give my possessions to, so whomever I choose must be my heir, and this makes men flatter and pay attention to me. My lack of an heir draws new flatterers daily to my house, women and men of all ages, who bring me presents, send me gold and silver vessels and utensils, money, and jewels in the hope that when I die (which they expect each greedy minute) their gifts shall then return ten-fold to them.

“And some, greedier than the rest, seek to have a monopoly of me and inherit all I have, and they work to undermine their competitors who would also like to inherit all I have. They compete in giving gifts because the bigger the gift, the bigger appears to be their love for me.

“All of these things I allow to happen. I play with their hopes, and I am happy to turn their hopes into my profit. I am happy to look upon their kindness, and accept more of the gifts they bring, and look upon those gifts. All the time I take these flatterers in hand and manipulate them. I tie a cherry to a string and let the cherry knock against their lips, and I let it get close to their mouths, and then I draw the cherry back before they can bite it.”

Hearing a noise, he said, “What’s that?”

— 1.2 —

Mosca arrived with Nano the dwarf, Castrone the eunuch, and Androgyno the hermaphrodite. The three had been summoned to entertain Volpone. Nano was holding a paper.

Nano the dwarf said, reading from his notes, “Now, make room for fresh performers, who want you to know, they bring you neither play, nor university show.”

They were giving a performance, but it was not like a play in a theater, nor was it like a university show that would display vast learning. Actually, their show would display vast learning, but it would do so in a satiric manner. They would mock the belief in progress, using the Pythagorean idea of reincarnation, or the transmigration of souls.

Nano the dwarf held the notes as he recited, “Therefore we entreat you that whatsoever we performers rehearse, may it not fare a whit the worse, for the false pace of the verse.”

By “rehearse,” he meant “recite,” but sometimes performers regard each performance as the rehearsal for the next performance.

Nano the dwarf recited, “If you wonder at this, you will wonder more before we pass, for know, here in the body of Androgyno the hermaphrodite is enclosed the soul of Pythagoras, that divine trickster, as hereafter shall follow.”

Nano the dwarf now explained the origin of this particular soul and how through the process of reincarnation it came to be Pythagoras’ soul and eventually became Androgyno the hermaphrodite’s soul.

Nano the dwarf recited, “Pythagoras’ soul, fast and loose, sir, came first from the god Apollo.”

Apollo was the classical god of prophecy, music, archery, medicine, plague, and more.

The soul was fast and loose. In reincarnation, it was connected fast to a body and then became loose and so was able to travel to another body. “Fast and loose” was also a con game in which a chain or string was placed on a table with the chain or string making loops. The sucker was supposed to pick the loop that was fast, but the con man could arrange the chain or string in such a way that whichever loop the sucker picked, the loop would be loose. Similarly, since humans are mortal, the soul always eventually comes loose from the body.

Nano the dwarf recited, “And then the soul was breathed into Aethalides, Mercury’s son, where it had the gift to remember all that ever was done.”

Aethalides was the herald of Jason and the Argonauts, who are famous for traveling to acquire the Golden Fleece. Mercury was the herald of the gods, and he gave Aethalides perfect memory. Because of this, all who had the soul, including Pythagoras, were able to remember all his or her previous incarnations.

Nano the dwarf recited, “From Aethalides the soul fled forth, and made quick transmigration to goldy-locked Euphorbus, who was killed in good fashion, at the siege of old Troy, by the cuckold of Sparta.”

Euphorbus, who decorated his hair with gold clips, was the first warrior to wound Patroclus, the beloved friend of Achilles, the greatest warrior of the Trojan War. Euphorbus was killed by Menelaus, who was cuckolded by Paris, Prince of Troy, who ran away with Menelaus’ wife, Helen, the most beautiful woman in the world.

Nano the dwarf recited, “Hermotimus was next (I find it in my notes) to whom the soul did pass, where no sooner it was missing but with one Pyrrhus of Delos it learned to go a fishing, and from him did it enter the sophist of Greece.”

Hermotimus was a philosopher, and Pyrrhus was a fisherman. The sophist of Greece was Pythagoras himself, who is famous for the Pythagorean theorem, among other things.

Nano the dwarf recited, “From Pythagoras, the soul went into a beautiful piece of ass named Aspasia, who was a meretrix, which is Greek for ‘prostitute.’ She was a meretrix who performed merry tricks and who was the mistress of the Greek statesman Pericles. And the next toss of her — the soul — was from a whore to a philosopher again.”

The “next toss” meant both “next sexual bout” and “next reincarnation.”

Nano the dwarf recited, “As the soul itself does relate, the soul became Crates the Cynic, a disciple of the Cynic philosopher Diogenes. Since then the soul has resided in kings, knights, and beggars, knaves, lords and fools, and the soul has resided in ox and ass, camel, mule, goat, and badger, in all which it has spoken, as it has in the cobbler’s cock.”

Lucian of Samosata was a satirist who wrote in Greek. In his work “The Dream, or the Cock,” he wrote about a cock — a rooster — that claimed to be the reincarnation of the soul of Pythagoras. The cock also recounted many other reincarnations of the soul. The work is a Cynic sermon that praises poverty and argues that wealth does not necessarily lead to happiness. In this work, a cock awakens Micyllus the cobbler. He threatens to kill the cock, but the cock makes him invisible and shows him how the rich live in private, proving that he, a cobbler, is better off than the wealthy.

Nano the dwarf recited, “But I didn’t come here to discourse about that matter of reincarnation, or his one, two, or three, or his great oath, BY QUATER! Nor did I come here to discourse about his musics, his trigon, his golden thigh, or his telling how elements shift.”

Pythagoras believed in the importance of mathematics in understanding reality. The quaternion consisted of the first four whole numbers (1, 2, 3, 4). These numbers added up to ten, an important number. These numbers also could be used to construct a trigon, an equilateral triangle with four dots as the bottom level, three dots as the next level, two dots as the next level, and one dot as the top level. Each side would have four dots.

Pythagoras used numbers and ratios to investigate such things as the musical scale.

According to myth, Pythagoras had a golden thigh, and he believed that the four elements — air, fire, water, and earth — were constantly changing into each other.

Nano the dwarf recited to Androgyno the hermaphrodite, “But I would ask, how of late have you experienced transformation and how have you shifted your coat in these days of reformation.”

The days of reformation referred to the Protestant Reformation; the most radical of the Protestants were the Puritans. “Shifted your coat” meant “changing sides” — leaving Catholicism to become Protestant.

Androgyno the hermaphrodite recited, “Like one of the reformed, I am a fool, as you see, accounting all old doctrine as heresy.”

Androgyno the hermaphrodite was wearing the costume of a Fool, a professional jester. As a Fool, he regarded the old doctrines — such as those of Catholicism — as heretical.

Nano the dwarf recited, “But have you eaten food that is forbidden to you?”

Pythagoreans were forbidden to eat meat, fish, and beans.

Androgyno the hermaphrodite recited, “My soul dined on fish, when first my soul entered a Carthusian.”

Carthusians were members of a religious sect that allowed devotees to eat fish.

Nano the dwarf recited as he asked about the soul, “Has your dogmatical silence ever left you?”

Pythagoreans — and Carthusians — made a vow of silence for a number of years.

Androgyno the hermaphrodite recited, “Of that an obstreperous lawyer bereft me.”

The soul had once entered a loud lawyer.

Nano the dwarf recited, “Oh, what a wonderful change, when Sir Lawyer forsook the soul! For Pythagoras’ sake, what body then did the soul take?”

Androgyno the hermaphrodite recited, “A good dull mule.”

Lawyers rode mules.

Nano the dwarf recited, “What! And by that means you were brought to allow yourself to eat beans?”

Although Pythagoreans were forbidden to eat beans, mules were fed them.

Androgyno the hermaphrodite recited, “Yes.”

Nano the dwarf recited, “But from the mule into whom did the soul pass?”

Androgyno the hermaphrodite recited, “Into a very strange beast, by some writers called an ass. By other writers, the very strange beast is called a precise, pure, illuminate brother, one of those who devour flesh, and sometimes one another, and who will drop you forth a libel, or a sanctified lie, between every spoonful of a nativity pie.”

The very strange beast was a Puritan. Puritans are “precise” because they are strict, and they are “illuminate” because they have seen religious light. The name “Puritan” comes from their claim to be “pure.”

Puritans literally ate the flesh of animals, and they metaphorically ate the flesh of their fellow human beings through their sharp business dealings.

Puritans were fond of publishing libelous pamphlets denouncing their enemies.

Due to a hatred of Catholicism, including Catholic masses, Puritans avoided the use of the syllable “mas” and so they ate what they called nativity pie rather than Christmas pie, which was the same thing except for the name.

Nano the dwarf recited, “Now move on, out of respect for Heaven, from that profane sect of Puritanism, and gently report your next transmigration.”

Androgyno the hermaphrodite recited, “I, the soul, then entered the body you see before you. I am in the body of Androgyno the hermaphrodite.”

Nano the dwarf recited, “This body is a creature of delight, and, what is more than a Fool, it is a hermaphrodite! Now, please, sweet soul, in all your variation, which body would you choose to be in to keep up your station?”

Androgyno the hermaphrodite recited, “Truly, I prefer this body I am in. This is the body in which I would tarry.”

Nano the dwarf recited, “Because here the delight of each sex you can experience? As a hermaphrodite, you can experience sex as a man and as a woman.”

Androgyno the hermaphrodite recited, “Unfortunately, those pleasures are stale and forsaken. No, it is your Fool wherewith I am so taken. The Fool is the one and only creature that I can call blessed. For all other forms I have taken have proven to be most distressed.”

Nano the dwarf recited, “That is spoken truly, as if you were still in Pythagoras. This learned opinion we will celebrate, fellow eunuch, as behooves us, with all our wit and art, to dignify that whereof ourselves are so great and special a part.”

Nano the dwarf and Castrone the eunuch were part fool, as are we all.

Volpone said, “Now, that was very, very pretty! Mosca, was this your invention? Did you write this?”

Mosca said, “If it pleases you, my patron, I admit that I wrote it. But if you don’t like it, I did not write it.”

“It does please me, good Mosca,” Volpone said.

“Then I wrote it, sir,” Mosca said.

The skit was cynical. A god created the soul, but the bodies the soul inhabited varied greatly and did not progress, but if anything, regressed. Nothing was learned from ascetic and religious practices, as these varied from body to body with no consistency. The skit pointed out the soul’s lack of progress.

Readers could argue that although this is cynical, it is true. Despite millennia of religious education, many people of Ben Jonson’s day and our own seem determined to turn themselves into animals.

Nano the dwarf and Castrone the eunuch then sang this song about Fools:

“Worth men’s envy, or admiration,

“Free from care or sorrow-taking,

“Selves and others merry making,

“All that Fools speak or do is sterling.

“Your Fool is your great man’s darling,

“And your ladies’ sport [entertainment] and pleasure;

“Tongue and bauble are his treasure.”

A Fool’s bauble is the court jester’s baton, which has a face carved at the top. “Bauble” was also a slang word for “penis,” and a Fool could use his tongue and penis to entertain the ladies.

“Even his face begets laughter,

“And he speaks truth free from slaughter.”

Professional Fools were given free speech. They could almost always say insulting things without being punished as long as they were witty.

“He’s the grace of every feast,

“And sometimes the chiefest guest.”

Sometimes, the Fool sat in the seat of honor: at the top of the table, beside the host.

“He has his trencher [plate] and his stool,

“When Wit waits upon the Fool.”

The master of the house, who is presumably intelligent — “wit” means “intelligent person” — waits on the Fool. Also, the god of Wit serves the Fool by making the Fool witty.

“Oh, who would not be

“He, he, he?”

As Nano the dwarf and Castrone the eunuch laughed “he, he, he,” they pointed to Androgyno the hermaphrodite, who was wearing a Fool’s costume and who carried a Fool’s bauble.

Knocking sounded on the door.

Volpone asked, “Who’s that?”

He then ordered the entertainers to leave: “Away!”

Nano the dwarf and Castrone the eunuch exited.

Volpone said, “Look and see who it is, Mosca.”

Seeing Androgyno the hermaphrodite, Volpone ordered, “Fool, begone!”

Androgyno the hermaphrodite exited.

Mosca said, “It is Signior Voltore, the lawyer. I know him by his distinctive knock.”

Voltore is Italian for “vulture.”

Volpone needed to appear to be ill and bedridden when he saw Voltore, so he ordered, “Fetch me my gown, my furs, and my caps. Tell him that my bed is being changed, and let him entertain himself for a while outside in the gallery.”

The caps were worn for warmth. One cap buttoned under the chin and covered hair and ears. The other cap was a skullcap with ear flaps.

Mosca exited.

Volpone said to himself, “Now, now, my clients begin their visitation!”

Clients would visit their patron in the early morning as a form of respect.

Volpone continued, “Vulture, kite, raven, and carrion-crow, all my birds of prey who think that I am turning into a carcass, now they come.”

Voltore was the vulture, Corbaccio was the raven, and Corvino was the crow. These birds all ate carrion, but did not usually kill it — they waited for it to die. Voltore, Corbaccio, and Corvino were all waiting for Volpone to die. The kite really is a bird of prey, and if anyone is the kite, events would show that Mosca is.

Volpone said, “I am not for them yet.”

He was not yet ready to meet them, nor was he yet a corpse.

Mosca returned with the gown and other items.

Volpone asked, “What is the news?”

Mosca said, “Voltore has brought a piece of plate, sir.”

The plate was a gold utensil.

“How big?” Volpone asked.

“Huge, massy, and antique, with your name inscribed and your coat of arms engraved,” Mosca replied.

“Good!” Volpone said. “And doesn’t it show a fox stretched on the earth, with fine delusive sleights, mocking a gaping crow?”

He was imagining that a sly fox would be a suitable image to engrave on the plate. Foxes would sometimes pretend to be dead. When scavenging birds came near the fox, the fox would spring up and kill a bird and feed on it. Volpone pretended to be near death so that suckers would give him expensive gifts such as this huge plate.

Volpone was also referring to one of Aesop’s fables. A crow had a piece of cheese in its beak, and a fox wanted to eat the cheese. The fox began to praise the crow, and when the fox praised the crow's singing voice, the crow opened its beak to caw. The cheese fell out of the crow's mouth, and the fox gobbled it up.

Volpone laughed, "Ha, Mosca?"

He replied, "Your wit is sharp, sir."

Volpone said, "Give me my furs."

The furs were meant to keep an ill man warm.

Volpone, putting on his invalid's clothing, asked Mosca, "Why are you laughing so much, man?"

"I cannot refrain from laughing, sir," Mosca replied, "when I think about what thoughts Voltore has now, outside, as he walks. He thinks that this might be the last gift he will give to you. He thinks that this gift might be the one that will convince you to make him your heir. He is thinking that if you die today, and give him all you own, what a wealthy man he will be tomorrow. He thinks about what a large return he would get from all his gifts to you. He thinks about how he would be worshiped, and revered, by other people. He thinks about how he would ride with his furs on a horse wearing an ornamental cloth that reaches its hooves. He thinks about how he would be waited on by herds of fools and clients. He thinks about how he would have a way cleared for his mule that is as lettered — educated — as himself. He thinks about how he would be called the great and learned lawyer, and then he concludes that there's nothing impossible."

Volpone said, "Yes, one thing is impossible: to be learned, Mosca."

"Oh, no — you are wrong," Mosca said. "Being rich implies being learned. Hood an ass with reverend purple, so you can hide its two ambitious ears, and it shall pass for a cathedral doctor.”

Doctors wore purple hoods to show that they were learned. Hide an ass’ ears with such a hood, and people will think that the ass is learned.

An ambitious man aspires to a high position; an ass’ ears have a high position.

“My nightcaps, my nightcaps, good Mosca,” Volpone said.

He put on the two nightcaps and then said, “Bring Voltore in.”

“Wait, sir,” Mosca said. “You need your ointment for your eyes.”

The ointment made Volpone’s eyes appear to be those of a sick man. Volpone would act as if he were nearly blind, nearly deaf, and nearly dead.

“That’s true,” Volpone said. “I need to use that ointment. Hurry, hurry.”

Mosca helped him by applying the cosmetics and ointment that made him appear to be ill.

Volpone said, “I long to have possession of my new present.”

“That, and thousands more, I hope to see you lord of,” Mosca said.

“Thanks, kind Mosca,” Volpone said.

Mosca began, “And that, when I am dead and lost in blended dust, as are a hundred such servants as I am, in succession
—”

He was wishing Volpone an incredibly long life, one in which Volpone would outlive him and one hundred other servants who would, one at a time, take Mosca's place.

"No, that would be too much, Mosca," Volpone said.

"You shall live, continually, to delude these Harpies," Mosca said.

Harpies are half-women, half-birds who torment people by eating their food and fouling the food that they do not eat. Sometimes, they are sent to bedevil sinners. They are also a symbol of greed.

"Loving Mosca!" Volpone said. "My disguise is well done now. Give me my pillow, and let Voltore enter."

Mosca exited to bring in Voltore.

Poets such as Homer and Virgil began their epics with an invocation to a god or gods to help them with their epic poems. For example, Homer began his Iliad in this way:

Rage.

Goddess, use me to tell the story of the rage of Achilles, a Greek warrior who had the rage of a god. The rage of the son of Peleus made corpses of many men and sent their souls to the Land of the Dead. Dogs and birds feasted on warriors' flesh, all because of Achilles and the will of Zeus, king of gods and men.

Volpone now parodied these invocations by praying not to a god or goddess for help but by praying to a number of feigned illnesses for help.

He prayed, "Now, my feigned cough, my feigned tuberculosis, and my feigned gout, my feigned paralysis, feigned palsy, and feigned watery discharges from my nose and eyes, with your artificially induced functions help this my imposture, wherein, these past three years, I have milked their hopes.

“Voltore comes; I hear him.”

Volpone then faked some weak coughs and a groan.

— 1.3 —

Mosca returned, leading Voltore, who was holding a large piece of plate.

Mosca said to Voltore, “You still are what you were in Volpone’s affections, sir. Only you, of all the rest, are the man who commands his love, and you do wisely to preserve it thus, with visits early in the morning, and kind gifts that show your good intentions to him, which, I know, cannot but be accepted most gratefully.”

He then said loudly to Volpone, “Patron! Sir! Signior Voltore has come —”

Volpone interrupted with a weak voice, “What did you say?”

Mosca said, “Sir, Signior Voltore has come this morning to visit you.”

“I thank him,” Volpone said.

“And he has brought you the gift of a piece of antique plate, bought from a goldsmith’s shop in the Piazza di San Marco.”

“He is welcome,” Volpone said weakly. “Ask him to come more often.”

“Yes,” Mosca said.

Voltore asked, “What did he say?”

Mosca replied, “He thanks you, and he wants you to see him often.”

“Mosca,” Volpone said.

“My patron!” Mosca replied.

“Bring Voltore near to me,” Volpone said. “Where is he? I long to feel his hand.”

Knowing what Volpone was really interested in, Mosca said, “The plate is here, sir.”

Voltore asked, “How are you, sir? How is your health?”

“I thank you, Signior Voltore,” Volpone said. “Where is the plate? My eyes are bad.”

Voltore put the plate into Volpone’s hands and said, “I’m sorry to see you still this weak.”

Mosca thought, He’s sorry that Volpone is not weaker.

Volpone said, “You are too munificent — too generous.”

“No, sir,” Voltore said. “I wish to Heaven that I could give health to you as well as that plate!”

“You give, sir, what you can,” Volpone said. “I thank you. Your love shows judgment in this, and it shall not be unrewarded. I ask that you see me often.”

“Yes, I shall, sir,” Voltore said.

“Be not far from me,” Volpone said.

“Do you observe that, sir?” Mosca asked Voltore.

Volpone said, “Listen to me carefully; it will concern you.”

Mosca said to Voltore, “You are a happy man, sir; know your good. Know what good thing will happen to you.”

Volpone said, “I cannot now last long —”

Mosca said to Voltore, “You are his heir, sir.”

Voltore asked, “Am I?”

“I feel me going,” Volpone said.

He faked some coughs and groans.

He added, “I’m sailing to my port.”

He faked some more coughs and groans.

He added, “And I am glad I am so near my haven.”

The haven is Heaven, although Volpone may have been optimistic when he called it “my haven.”

“Alas, kind gentleman!” Mosca said, “Well, we must all go —”

Voltore interrupted, “But, Mosca —”

Mosca ignored him and continued, “Age will conquer.”

Voltore said, “Please listen to me. Am I officially made his heir for certain?”

“Are you?” Mosca said. “I beg you, sir, to be pleased to write my name in your list of servants and dependents. All my hopes depend upon your worship: I am lost once Volpone is dead, unless the rising Sun shines on me.”

Volpone’s wealth would make the Sun — Voltore — rise.

“It shall both shine on and warm you, Mosca,” Voltore said.

“Sir, I am a man who has not done your love all the worst services,” Mosca said. “Here I serve you. It is as if I am trusted with your keys so that I can see that all your coffers and all your caskets are locked, and so that I can keep the poor inventory of your jewels, your plate, and your monies. I am your steward, sir. I husband your goods here.”

Mosca claimed to have Volpone's keys and to take care of Volpone's wealth — wealth that according to Mosca would soon belong to Voltore.

"But am I the sole heir?" Voltore asked.

"You are the heir without a partner, sir," Mosca replied. "This was confirmed this morning. The wax of the seal is still warm, and the ink is scarcely dry upon the parchment."

"Happy, happy me!" Voltore said. "For what reason did he make me his sole heir, sweet Mosca?"

"Your merit, sir," Mosca said. "You deserved it. I know no second reason."

"Your modesty won't allow you to know it," Voltore said, "but I know the help that you have given to me. Well, I shall requite it."

He may have meant that Mosca will be well rewarded for his services, but given his greed, he may have simply meant that Mosca would receive a small reward.

Mosca said, "Volpone has always liked your manner of acting, sir. That was what first took his fancy and made you his favorite. I often have heard him say how he admired men of your large profession, who promise much and advocate for every side, right or wrong, and who advocate for things that are complete contradictions, until the lawyers are hoarse again, and yet all that they say is lawful to be said. They take any case and argue any position. Men of your large profession, with very quick agility, are men who turn and return, and who make knots and undo them. Men of your large profession give forkéd-tongued, ambiguous counsel. They take provoking gold [Mosca thought, Either they take a bribe, or they take money to petition a judge to take up a case] from either side of a dispute, and put it away in their pocket. These men, he knew, would thrive with their humility [Mosca thought sarcastically, They must be humble because, like beggars, they accept money from anyone], and for his part, he thought he would be blest to have his heir of such a suffering spirit, so wise, so grave, of so perplexed a tongue, and also so loud, which would not wag, nor scarcely lie still, without a fee, when every word your worship lets fall is a chequin!”

Mosca’s “praise” of the legal profession was hardly praise. A lawyer’s tongue would scarcely lie still — either not move at all or be constantly lying — without a fee. A chequin is a Venetian gold coin.

Loud knocking sounded at the door.

Mosca said, “Who’s that? Someone is knocking. I would not have you seen, sir. And yet — pretend you came and went in haste. I’ll make up an excuse.

“And, gentle sir, when you come to swim in golden lard, up to the arms in honey, so that your chin is held up stiff, with the fatness — richness — of the flood, think about me, your vassal. Just remember me. I have not been your worst of clients.”

Mosca was telling Voltore that soon Voltore would be up to his chin in riches and that he hoped that Voltore would remember him. Once Voltore inherited Volpone’s wealth, Mosca would be out of a job.

Voltore said, “Mosca!”

Mosca asked, “When will you have your inventory brought, sir? Or see a copy of the will?”

The inventory was of Volpone’s goods, goods that Voltore thought he would soon inherit.

The knocking continued, and Mosca shouted, “Coming!”

Mosca then said to Voltore, “I will bring them to you, sir. Leave, be gone, look serious as if you were doing business here.”

Voltore exited.

Volpone jumped out of bed and said, “Excellent Mosca! Come here, and let me kiss you.”

“Keep still, sir,” Mosca said, looking out of a window. “Corbaccio is here to see you.”

Volpone said, “Put the plate away. The vulture’s gone, and the old raven’s come!”

— 1.4 —

Mosca put the plate on the treasure chest, where it was visible, and said to the plate, “Betake you to your silence, and your sleep. Stand there and multiply.”

Mosca was parodying part of Genesis 1:28:

And God blessed them, and God said unto them, Be fruitful, and multiply, and replenish the earth, and subdue it: and have dominion over the fish of the sea, and over the fowl of the air, and over every living thing that moveth upon the earth. (King James Version)

One meaning of “stand” in Elizabethan and Jacobean English was “to have an erection.”

Mosca thought, Now, we shall see a wretch who is indeed more impotent than this wretch — Volpone — can feign to be, yet the first wretch hopes to hop over the second wretch’s grave.

Volpone was pretending to be so ill that he was impotent, but Corbaccio was an old man who really was impotent.

If Corbaccio were more intelligent, he would realize that he was much more likely than Volpone to die first.

Corbaccio entered the room. Corbaccio is Italian for “raven.”

Mosca greeted him: “Signior Corbaccio! You’re very welcome, sir.”

Corbaccio asked, “How is Volpone, your patron?”

“Indeed, just as he was before,” Mosca said. “He has not gotten better.”

Corbaccio, an old man who was hard of hearing, asked, “What! Is he getting better?”

“No, sir. He’s rather worse,” Mosca said.

Corbaccio, who hoped to inherit Volpone’s goods, said, “That’s good. Where is he?”

“Upon his couch, sir, newly fallen asleep,” Mosca said.

Volpone was using the couch as a daybed.

“Does he sleep well?” Corbaccio asked.

“Not a wink, sir, all this night,” Mosca said. “Nor did he sleep yesterday. He only dozes.”

“Good!” Corbaccio said. “He should take some advice from physicians. I have brought him an opiate here, from my own doctor.”

“He will not hear of drugs,” Mosca said. “He refuses to take them.”

“Why?” Corbaccio said. “I myself stood by while it was made, I saw all the ingredients, and I know that it cannot but most gently work. I would bet my life against his that the purpose of this potion is just to make him sleep.”

Lying on the couch, Volpone thought, Yes, to make him sleep his last sleep — the eternal sleep — if he would take it.

“Sir,” Mosca said, “he has no faith in medicine.”

“What did you say?” Corbaccio asked. “What did you say?”

“He has no faith in medicine,” Mosca repeated. “He thinks that doctors are the greater danger, and the worse disease, to escape. I often have heard him protest that a physician should never be his heir.”

A proverb stated that only a fool would make his physician his heir.

The hard-of-hearing Corbaccio asked, “I won’t be his heir?”

“No, a physician will not be his heir, sir,” Mosca said.

“Oh, no, no, no,” Corbaccio said. “I do not intend for a physician to be his heir.”

“No, sir,” Mosca said, “and he says that he cannot endure their fees. He says that they financially flay a man before they kill him.”

“Right,” Corbaccio said. “I understand you.”

“And then they do it by experimenting with ‘cures’ on the patient,” Mosca said, “for which the law not only absolves them, but gives them great reward, and he is loath to pay a doctor to kill him.”

“It is true,” Corbaccio said. “Doctors kill with as much license as a judge.”

“No, with even more license than a judge,” Mosca said. “A judge kills, sir, only when the law condemns a man to death, but a doctor can kill even a judge when the judge is the doctor’s patient.”

“Yes,” Corbaccio said, “or the doctor can kill me or any other man.”

He then asked about Volpone’s health, “How is his apoplexy? Is that strong on him still?”

Apoplexy is the condition of incapacity that follows having suffered a stroke. Strong apoplexy is deadly.

“Very violent,” Mosca said. “His speech is broken, and his eyes are set and staring. His face is drawn longer than it was accustomed to be.”

“What? What? He is stronger than he was accustomed to be?” Corbaccio asked, mishearing.

“No, sir,” Mosca said. “His face is drawn longer than it was accustomed to be.”

“Oh, good!” Corbaccio said. He wanted Volpone to die soon.

Mosca said, “His mouth is always open and gaping, and his eyelids hang.”

“Good,” Corbaccio said.

“A freezing numbness stiffens all his joints,” Mosca said, “and makes the color of his flesh like lead.”

“That is good,” Corbaccio said.

“His pulse beats slowly, and dully.”

“These are all good symptoms, still,” Corbaccio said.

Mosca said, “And from his brain —”

“I understand you,” Corbaccio interrupted. “Good.”

Mosca continued, “— flows a cold sweat, with a continual watery discharge from the sagging corners of his eyes.”

Discharge from the brain was a sign of imminent death.

“Is it possible?” Corbaccio said. “Despite my old age, I am in better shape than he is, ha!”

He then asked, “How fares Volpone with the swimming of his head?”

“Oh, sir, he has gone past the dizziness and dimness of vision,” Mosca said. “He has gotten worse. He now has lost his feeling, and he has stopped snoring. You can hardly perceive that he breathes.”

“Excellent, excellent!” Corbaccio said. “Surely I shall outlast him. This makes me young again by a score of years. I feel twenty years younger.”

“I was coming for you, sir,” Mosca said.

This could mean that he was coming to bring Corbaccio to Volpone’s deathbed, or that he was setting a trap for Corbaccio.

“Has Volpone made his will?” Corbaccio asked. “What has he given me?”

“No, sir,” Mosca said, answering the first question.

Thinking that Mosca was answering the second question, the hard-of-hearing Corbaccio said, “Nothing! What!”

Mosca clarified, “Volpone has not made his will, sir.”

“Oh! Oh! Oh!” Corbaccio said. “But why was Voltore, the lawyer, here?”

“He smelled a carcass, sir, when he heard that my master was thinking about his testament,” Mosca said. “I urged Volpone to make his last will and testament for your good.”

“Voltore came to Volpone, did he?” Corbaccio said. “I thought so.”

“Yes,” Mosca said, “and Voltore presented Volpone with this piece of plate.”

“In order to be his heir?” Corbaccio asked.

“I do not know, sir,” Mosca replied.

“True,” Corbaccio said, mishearing. “I know it, too.”

Mosca thought, Yes, you would think that Voltore gave the plate in order to become Volpone’s heir. You are judging Voltore by your own scale. You are thinking that Voltore is doing what you are doing. Of course, you are correct.

Corbaccio said, “Well, I shall yet prevent him from succeeding. See, Mosca, look. I have brought here a bag of bright chequins that will quite weigh down his plate.”

He meant that the bag of gold coins was more valuable than the plate that Voltore had given to Volpone.

Taking the bag of gold coins, Mosca said, “Yes, indeed, sir. This is truly health-giving; this is your sacred medicine. Opiates do not compare to this great elixir!”

An elixir was a health potion. Alchemists sought to create the Elixir of Life, which was thought to make humans live very long lives, and perhaps forever.

Corbaccio said, “It is aurum palpabile, if not potabile.”

These are Latin terms. Aurum palpabile is touchable gold; aurum potabile is drinkable gold. Aurum potabile was a drink containing gold; it was thought to promote health.

Mosca joked, “It shall be administered to him in his bowl.”

He was joking that he would pour the gold coins into Volpone’s bowl so that Volpone could eat them and restore his health.

“Yes, do, do, do,” Corbaccio said.

“This is a very blessed cordial!” Mosca said. “This will restore his health.”

“Yes, do, do, do,” Corbaccio said.

“I think it were not best, sir,” Mosca said.

“To do what?” Corbaccio asked.

“To restore Volpone’s health.”

“Oh, no, no, no,” Corbaccio said. “By no means.”

Mosca said, “Why, sir, this bag of gold coins will work some strange effect on Volpone, if he would feel it.”

“That is true,” Corbaccio said. “Therefore, let’s not let him feel it. I’ll take my bag of gold coins. Give it back to me.”

“By no means,” Mosca said, “pardon me.”

He meant for “By no means” to be an introductory element, but “By no means pardon me” was good advice.

He added, “You shall not do yourself that wrong, sir. I will so advise you that you shall inherit all of Volpone’s wealth.”

“What!” Corbaccio asked.

“All of it, sir,” Mosca said. “It is your right, your own. No man can claim a part of Volpone’s wealth. It is yours, without a rival, and decreed by destiny.”

“How, how, good Mosca?” Corbaccio asked.

“I’ll tell you, sir,” Mosca said. “He shall recover from this fit.”

“I understand,” Corbaccio said.

“And, at the first opportunity after he has regained his senses, I will importune him to make his last will and testament, and I will show him this bag of gold coins.”

“Good, good,” Corbaccio said.

“It will be better yet,” Mosca said, “if you will listen to me, sir.”

“Yes, with all my heart,” Corbaccio said.

“Now, I advise you to speedily go home. There, make a will in which you shall inscribe my master as your sole heir.”

“And disinherit my son!” Corbaccio said.

“Oh, sir, it is all for the better,” Mosca said. “This new will shall have an outward appearance that conceals the truth in order to make this trick much more plausible.”

“Oh, so the new will is only a trick?” Corbaccio said.

Mosca said, “This will, sir, you shall send to me. Now, when I come to emphasize, as I will, your cares, your watchings at Volpone’s sickbed, and your many prayers for him, your more than many gifts, and your this day’s present, and finally, I produce your will — where, without thought or the least regard for your legitimate son, a son so brave and highly meriting, the stream of your diverted love has thrown you upon my master and made him your heir, Volpone cannot be so stupid, or stone dead, but out of conscience, and complete gratitude —”

Corbaccio interrupted: “— he must pronounce me his heir.”

“That is true,” Mosca said.

Corbaccio said, “I have thought of this plot previously.”

“I believe it,” Mosca said, flattering Corbaccio.

The hard-of-hearing Corbaccio asked, “Don’t you believe it?”

“Yes, sir,” Mosca said. He really did not believe it.

“My own plot,” Corbaccio said.

Mosca said, “Which, when he has done, sir —”

Corbaccio interrupted, “Made me his heir?”

Mosca said, “And you so certain to survive him —”

“Yes,” Corbaccio said.

Mosca said, “Being so lusty a man —”

One meaning of “lusty” was healthy; the other meaning definitely did not apply to Corbaccio because he was impotent.

“That is true,” Corbaccio replied to Mosca.

“Yes, sir,” Mosca said.

Corbaccio said, “I thought of that, too. You, Mosca, are the exact instrument that expresses my thoughts!”

Mosca began, “You have not only done yourself a good —”

Corbaccio interrupted: “— but multiplied it on my son.”

Corbaccio thought that he would outlive Volpone, and so Corbaccio’s son would inherit Volpone’s wealth as well as Corbaccio’s wealth.

“That is right, sir,” Mosca said.

“This is still what I have plotted previously,” Corbaccio said.

Mosca said, “Alas, sir! Heaven knows that it has been all my concern, all my care — I even grow gray from it — how to work things —”

“I understand, sweet Mosca,” Corbaccio said.

“You are the man for whom I labor here,” Mosca said.

“Yes, do, do, do,” Corbaccio said. “I’ll see to the will immediately.”

He started for the door.

Mosca said quietly so that Volpone but not Corbaccio could hear him, “May a rook go with you, raven!”

This meant, May you — who are the raven — be rooked, aka cheated.

Corbaccio said to Mosca, “I know that you are honest.”

Mosca said quietly so that Volpone but not Corbaccio could hear him, “You lie, sir!”

Corbaccio said, “And —”

Mosca finished the sentence quietly so that Volpone but not Corbaccio could hear him, “— your knowledge is no better than your ears, sir.”

Corbaccio said, “I do not doubt that I will be a father to you.”

Corbaccio was a father who was going home to write a will that disinherited his son.

Mosca said quietly so that Volpone but not Corbaccio could hear him, “Nor do I doubt that I will cheat my brother out of his blessing.”

Mosca intended to cheat Corbaccio’s son out of his inheritance, and so if Corbaccio were Mosca’s father, then Mosca would be cheating his brother out of his inheritance.

In Genesis 27, Jacob cheats Esau, his brother, out of their father’s blessing.

Corbaccio said, “I may have my youth restored to me. Why not?”

Mosca said quietly so that Volpone but not Corbaccio could hear him, “Your worship is a precious ass!”

“What did you say?” Corbaccio asked.

Mosca replied, “I desire your worship to make haste, sir.”

“It is done,” Corbaccio said. “It is done. I am going.”

He exited.

Volpone leapt out of bed and said, “Oh, I shall burst with laughter! Loosen my clothing so I can laugh! Loosen my clothing!”

Mosca said, “Contain your flux of laughter, sir.”

“Flux” means both “flood” and “dysentery.” The illness dysentery results in a flood of bloody diarrhea.

Mosca added, “You know this hope of inheriting all your wealth is such a bait that it covers any hook.”

Volpone said, “Oh, but the way you work with the bait, and the way that you place it in front of them! I cannot hold back my good feelings. Good rascal, let me kiss you. I have never known you to be in so rare a humor. I have never seen you be so effective in trapping suckers — you are in excellent form!”

“I do not deserve such praise, sir,” Mosca said. “I am only doing as I have been taught. I follow your grave instructions: I trick them with words, I pour oily flattery into their ears, and I send them away.”

“It is true! It is true!” Volpone said. “What a rare punishment is avarice to itself! A greedy man punishes himself!”

“Yes, with our help, sir,” Mosca said.

Volpone said, “So many cares and worries, so many maladies, so many fears attend on old age, yes, that death is so often called on, as no wish other than for death can be more frequent with old men. Their limbs are weak, their senses are dull, and their seeing, hearing, and walking are all dead before them. Yes, even their teeth, their instruments of eating, fail them. Yet this is reckoned life!

“Just now, here was an old man, who has now gone home, who wishes to live longer! He does ‘not’ feel his gout or his palsy. He pretends to himself that he is younger by scores of years. He flatters his age by confidently lying about it. He hopes that he may, with the use of magic charms, like Aeson, have his youth restored.”

Aeson was the father of Jason, leader of the Argonauts. Medea, a young witch, helped Jason get the Golden Fleece. Medea and Jason then married, and Medea used magic to restore Aeson’s youth.

Volpone continued, “And with these thoughts he so fattens himself, as if fate would be as easily cheated as he himself, and all turns to air! He regards old age as a delusion!”

Knocking sounded at the door.

Volpone asked, “Who’s that there, now? A third visitor?”

Mosca said, “Quiet. Get into your bed again. I hear the visitor’s voice. He is Corvino, our spruce, dapper, well-dressed merchant.”

Volpone lay down on the bed and said, “I am ‘dead.’”

Mosca said, “Let’s have another bout, sir, with your eyes.”

He used the ointment again to make Volpone’s eyes look like those of a very ill man.

Mosca asked loudly, “Who’s there?”

— 1.5 —

Corvino entered the room. Corvino is Italian for “crow.”

Mosca said, “Signior Corvino! You have come when you were most wished for! Oh, how happy would you be, if you knew it, now!”

Corvino asked, “Why? What? Wherein?”

“The tardy hour has come, sir,” Mosca said.

“Volpone is not dead, is he?” Corvino asked.

“He is not dead, sir, but he is as good as dead,” Mosca replied. “He knows no man.”

Corvino asked, “What shall I do then?”

“What do you mean, sir?” Mosca asked.

“I have brought him here a pearl as a gift,” Corvino said.

If Volpone could not recognize Corvino, Corvino would get no credit for giving him a valuable gift.

Mosca said, “Perhaps he has enough remembrance left as to know you, sir. He continually calls for you. Nothing but your name is in his mouth.

“Is your pearl orient, sir?”

Pearls from the orient were the most valuable.

“Venice was never owner of the like,” Corvino said.

Volpone said faintly, “Signior Corvino.”

“Listen,” Mosca said.

Volpone again said faintly, “Signior Corvino.”

Mosca said, “He calls you; step over to him and give him the pearl.”

Mosca said to Volpone, “Signior Corvino is here, sir, and he has brought you a rich pearl.”

Corvino gave the pearl to Volpone, who grabbed it and held it tightly.

Corvino said to Volpone, “How are you, sir?”

He then said to Mosca, “Tell Volpone that the pearl doubles the twelfth carat.”

The pearl’s size was twenty-four carats; it was a very large and very valuable pearl.

“Sir, he cannot understand; his hearing’s gone, and yet it comforts him to see you.”

Corvino said, “Say that I have a diamond for him, too.”

Mosca said, “It’s best for you to show it, sir. Put it into his hand; it is only there he apprehends. He has his feeling, yet.”

Volpone grabbed the diamond.

Mosca said, “See how he grasps it!”

“Alas, good gentleman!” Corvino said. “How pitiful the sight is!”

“Tut!” Mosca said, “You forget, sir. The weeping of an heir should always be laughter under a mask.”

“Why, am I his heir?” Corvino asked.

Mosca replied, “Sir, I am sworn. I may not show you the will until Volpone is dead, but here has been Corbaccio, here has been Voltore, here have been others, too. I cannot number them because they were so many. All of them had their mouths open hoping for legacies: They all want to inherit Volpone's wealth. But I, taking the opportunity given by his calling for you — 'Signior Corvino, Signior Corvino' — took paper, and pen, and ink, and there I asked him whom he would have to be his heir? 'Corvino.' Who should be his executor? 'Corvino.' And, to any question he was silent to, I always interpreted the nods he made, through weakness and palsy, for consent, and I sent home the others, with nothing bequeathed to them, except a reason to cry and curse."

According to Mosca's story, Volpone's illness included palsy, which made him nod. Although the nods were involuntary movements caused by the palsy, Mosca had always interpreted them as being voluntary acknowledgments that Volpone wanted Corvino to be his heir and the executor of his will.

Corvino said, "Oh, my dear Mosca!"

He hugged him.

Corvino asked, "Doesn't he perceive us?"

"No more than a blind harper would," Mosca replied.

A blind harper such as the epic poet Homer, who strummed a lyre as he sang his poems, would perceive quite a lot.

Mosca continued, "He knows no man, no face of friend, nor name of any servant, nor who fed him last or gave him something to drink. Not even those he has begotten, or brought up, can he remember."

"Has he children?" Corvino asked.

"Bastards," Mosca said. "Some dozen, or more, whom he begot on beggars, gypsies, and Jews, and blacks, when he was drunk. Didn't you know that, sir? It is the common talk of the town. The dwarf, the Fool, and the eunuch in this house are all his. He's the true biological father of his family, in all, except me — but he has given them nothing."

“That’s good, that’s good,” Corvino said. “Are you sure he doesn’t hear us?”

“Am I sure, sir?” Mosca said. “Why, look and listen, then give credit to your own senses.”

Mosca shouted in Volpone’s ear, “May the pox — syphilis — approach, and add to your diseases, if it would send you into the hereafter sooner, sir, because your sexual incontinence has deserved syphilis through and through, and thoroughly, and it deserves the plague to boot!”

What Mosca said about Volpone’s sexual incontinence may be true, but Volpone was pretending to be so ill that he is incapable of sexual incontinence.

Mosca said to Corvino, “You may come close, sir.”

Mosca shouted in Volpone’s ear, “I wish that you would once and for all close those filthy eyes of yours that flow with slime like two frog-ponds, and I wish the termination of those same hanging cheeks that are covered with hide instead of skin —”

Mosca said to Corvino, “Help me, sir.”

Mosca continued, “— and that look like frozen dishrags set on end!”

Corvino said loudly, “Or that look like an old smoked wall, on which the rain ran down in streaks!”

“Excellent! Sir, speak out,” Mosca said. “You may be louder still. A firearm discharged in his ear would hardly penetrate it and make itself heard.”

Corvino shouted, “His nose is like a common sewer, always running.”

“That is good!” Mosca said. “And what about his mouth?”

“It is a complete cesspool,” Corvino said.

“Oh, stop his mouth,” Mosca said. “Suffocate him.”

“By no means,” Corvino said. “No way.”

“Please let me do it,” Mosca said. “Truly, I could stifle him excellently with a pillow — as well as any woman could who should look after him.”

“Do as you will,” Corvino said, “but I’ll be gone.”

Corvino did not want to witness the murder.

“Do as you wish,” Mosca said. “It is your presence that makes him last so long.”

“Please use no violence,” Corvino said.

“No?” Mosca said. “Sir, why not? Why should you have such scruples, sir?”

“Use your discretion,” Corvino said.

Mosca had called Corvino’s bluff. Corvino did not mind if Mosca were to murder Volpone, but Corvino did not want to witness it or get in legal trouble for it.

“Well, good sir, leave,” Mosca said.

Corvino said, “Shouldn’t I trouble Volpone now and take my pearl back?”

Mosca said, “Pooh! Nor your diamond.”

Mosca meant that Corvino should not trouble Volpone by taking his pearl and diamond back again.

Mosca said, “What a needless worry is this that afflicts you? Isn’t everything that is here yours?”

If Corvino were Volpone's heir, as Corvino supposed, Corvino would inherit all of Volpone's wealth, including the diamond and pearl that Volpone was holding.

Mosca said, "Am not I here, whom you have made your servant? Am I not here, who owe my being to you?"

Mosca had stated that he was willing to murder Volpone for Corvino. If this happened, Corvino would get back his two jewels quickly.

"Grateful Mosca!" Corvino said. "You are my friend, my fellow, my companion, and my partner, and you shall share in all my fortunes."

"Excepting one," Mosca said.

"What's that?" Corvino said.

"Your gorgeous wife, sir."

Corvino immediately exited. He was a jealous man, and he was leaving to check up on his wife. Soon, however, he would be willing to allow Volpone to sleep with his wife if it would get him Volpone's wealth. Because he was willing to allow Volpone to cuckold him, it is appropriate that he gave Volpone a diamond and a pearl — two precious stones. In this society, testicles were called stones. They are still known as the family jewels.

Mosca said, "Now he is gone. We had no other way to shoo him away from here, but this."

"My divine Mosca!" Volpone said. "You have outdone yourself today!"

Knocking sounded on the door.

Volpone said, "Who's there? I will be troubled with no more visitors. Prepare for me music, dances, banquets, and all delights. The Turk is not more sensual in his pleasures than Volpone will be.”

The Turk was Mahomet III, the Ottoman Sultan, who was also known as the Grand Turk. He was known for taking great delight in sensual, including sexual, pleasures.

Mosca exited.

Volpone looked over the morning’s profits, saying, “Let me see. A pearl! A diamond! Plate! Gold coins! A good morning’s haul! Why, this is better than robbing churches, even. Or getting fat, by eating, once a month, a man.”

The eating of a man was metaphorical. He was referring to devouring a man by collecting the interest each month on usurious loans, or by grinding down the man through excessive hard work. One man’s ruin can be another man’s source of wealth.

Mosca returned.

“Who is it?” Volpone asked.

“‘The beauteous Lady Politic Would-be, sir. Wife to the English knight, Sir Politic Would-be.’ These are the exact words I have been demanded to say to you. She has sent a squire to learn how you slept last night and to ask whether you would be willing to entertain visitors.”

“Not now,” Volpone said. “She can visit me some three hours from now.”

“I told the squire as much,” Mosca said.

Volpone said, “When I am high with mirth and wine, then, then.

“Before Heaven, I wonder at the desperate valor of the bold English, that they dare let loose their wives to all encounters!”

Venetian men such as Corvino kept a close eye on their wives; in contrast, Englishmen such as Sir Politic Would-be gave their wives free rein.

Mosca said, “Sir, this knight had his name not for nothing. He is politic and cunning, and knows, however his wife may affect strange airs, she hasn’t the face to be dishonest.”

In other words, the knight’s wife’s face was not pretty enough to have an affair.

He continued, “But if she had Signior Corvino’s wife’s face ...”

“Has she so excellent a face?” Volpone asked.

“Oh, sir, her face is the wonder, the blazing star of Italy!” Mosca said. “She is a wench of the first year! She is a beauty as ripe as harvest! Her skin is whiter than a swan all over; it is whiter than silver, snow, or lilies! She has a soft lip that would tempt you to an eternity of kissing! And she has flesh that melts in the touch to blood!”

Touching her skin would make her blush — or grow hot with sexual passion.

Mosca continued, likening her to what Volpone loved best: “She is as bright as your gold, and as lovely as your gold!”

“Why haven’t I known this before?” Volpone asked.

“Alas, sir,” Mosca said. “I myself discovered it only yesterday.”

“How might I see her?” Volpone asked.

“Oh, that is not possible,” Mosca said. “She’s guarded as warily as is your gold. She never goes out of doors and never gets fresh air except at a window. All her looks are sweet as the first grapes or cherries, and her looks are watched as closely as the first grapes or cherries are.”

The first grapes or cherries are watched very carefully to ensure that the crop is harvested at the best time.

“I must see her,” Volpone said.

“Sir, there is a guard of spies ten thick upon her,” Mosca said. “The spies are Corvino’s whole household. Each spy is set to spy upon his fellow, and all the spies have their orders to spy upon his wife. When Corvino leaves or enters his home, he has his spies report to him.”

“I will go see her, though but at her window,” Volpone said.

“If you do, wear some disguise, then,” Mosca said.

“That is true,” Volpone said. “I must maintain my pretense of being a seriously ill man. We’ll think about which disguise I can use.”

ACT 2 (Volpone, or the Fox)

— 2.1 —

At Saint Mark's Place, at a corner near Corvino's house, Sir Politic Would-be and Peregrine were talking. Both were travelers from England, and they had just met. In fact, Peregrine had just disembarked on this day.

Sir Politic Would-be said, "Sir, to a wise man, all the world's his soil, aka country."

A proverb states, "A wise man may live anywhere."

He continued, "It is not Italy, nor France, nor Europe, that must bound me, if my fates call me forth. Yet, I protest, it is no salty, wanton desire of seeing countries, changing my religious affiliation, or suffering any disaffection to the state of England, where I was bred and to which I owe my dearest projects, that has brought me out of England, much less Ulysses' idle, antique, stale, gray-headed project of knowing men's minds and manners!"

Ulysses was the Roman name of Odysseus, hero of Homer's Odyssey. In the beginning of the Odyssey, we learn that Odysseus has traveled to many lands and learned the minds of many men. Learning the minds of many men is a very good reason to travel.

Sir Politic Would-be continued, "Instead, a peculiar humor, aka inclination or whim, of my wife's laid for this height of Venice."

Venice is definitely at sea level; Sir Politic Would-be liked to use fancy language, and he was using "height" to mean "latitude."

He continued, "We came to observe, to make notes, to learn the language, and so forth."

He paused and then asked, "I hope you travel, sir, with license?"

English travelers were required to get a permit from the Privy Council to travel aboard. Some travelers did not do this.

"Yes," Peregrine replied.

"Since you have a permit, I dare the more safely to converse with you," Sir Politic Would-be said.

English travelers with licenses were not supposed to talk to English travelers without licenses.

He then asked, "How long, sir, has it been since you left England?"

"Seven weeks."

"You left so recently!" Sir Politic Would-be said. "You have not been with my lord ambassador?"

English travelers with permits were required to be presented to the English lord ambassador.

"Not yet, sir," Peregrine replied.

"Please," Sir Politic Would-be said, "tell me what news, sir, vents our climate?"

"Vents our climate" was a fancy way of saying "comes from England."

He continued, "I heard last night a very strange thing reported by some of my lord ambassador's followers, and I long to hear how it will be seconded."

By "seconded," he meant "confirmed."

"What was it, sir?" Peregrine asked.

Sir Politic Would-be whispered as if he were imparting a secret, “Indeed, sir, the news was of a raven that was said to have built a nest in a ship royal of the King’s.”

A raven was thought to be an omen of evil, and the building of a nest on a ship was also thought to be a bad omen. However, these were superstitions, and Peregrine marveled at how seriously Sir Politic Would-be was taking them.

Peregrine thought to himself, This fellow, is he trying to trick me and make me look like a fool, or has he himself been tricked and made to look like a fool, do you suppose? Sir Politic Would-be is either trying to make me a fool, or he is a fool himself.

He asked, “What is your name, sir?”

“My name is Politic Would-be.”

Peregrine thought, Oh, his name sums him up. He wants people to think that he is in the know about political matters, including political intrigues. But if he takes these superstitions seriously, he can’t be in the know. He is a fool, and that gives me license to make fun of him.

He asked, “Are you a knight, sir?”

Sir Politic Would-be wore spurs, although in Venice there was no use for spurs.

“I am a poor knight, sir,” Sir Politic Would-be replied.

Peregrine was likely to agree.

Peregrine said, “Is your lady lying — staying — here in Venice to acquire knowledge of fashions of clothing, including headdresses, and behavior, among the courtesans? Is she the fine Lady Would-be?”

Venetian courtesans were renowned for their fashionable clothing and courteous conversation.

Sir Politic Would-be said, “Yes, sir; the spider and the bee often suck from one and the same flower.”

He did not say which — his wife or the courtesan — was the spider and which was the bee, but apparently he meant that his wife could learn from the courtesans without having any of the reputation of the courtesans rub off on her. This may not be a good thing since in some circles the courtesans had an excellent reputation.

“Good Sir Politic Would-be,” Peregrine said, “I beg your pardon. I have heard much about you. What you said about the raven is true.”

“You know that for a fact?” Sir Politic asked.

“Yes,” Peregrine replied, “and I know about the lion’s whelping in the Tower of London.”

Lions were kept in the Tower of London, and a lioness named Elizabeth whelped on 5 August 1604 and on 26 February 1605. Such births to cubs in the Tower of London were unprecedented.

“Another whelp!” Sir Politic Would-be exclaimed.

“Yes, another, sir,” Peregrine said.

“Now, by Heaven, what prodigies are these? We have also had the fires at Berwick and the new star!”

On 19 July 1333, the Battle of Halidon Hill occurred, in which the army of King Edward III of England defeated the Scottish army of Sir Archibald Douglas. A letter written on 15 January 1605 described a recently witnessed spectral battle between two armies in the sky above Halidon Hill, which is near Berwick. Today, we think that superstitious people witnessed the aurora borealis.

On 30 September 1604, a supernova appeared in the sky and remained visible for seventeen months.

Superstitious people regarded such unusual things appearing in the sky as ominous.

Sir Politic Would-be continued, “All these things happened at the same time; this is strange and full of omen! Did you witness those atmospheric phenomena?”

“I did, sir,” Peregrine replied.

“They are fearsome signs!” Sir Politic Would-be said. “Please, sir, confirm this for me, if you can. Were three porpoises seen above the London Bridge, as has been reported?”

On 19 January 1606, a porpoise was captured in a small creek where no one would expect a porpoise to be, but it was captured below London Bridge. Peregrine knew that only one porpoise had been captured, but he was willing to have fun at Sir Politic Would-be’s expense.

Peregrine replied, “Six porpoises, and a sturgeon, sir.”

Actually, sturgeons were commonly found in the Thames River at the time.

“I am astonished,” Sir Politic Would-be said.

“Sir, don’t be astonished,” Peregrine said. “I’ll tell you a greater prodigy than these.”

“What should these things portend?” Sir Politic Would-be asked. “They must foretell important events.”

Peregrine said, “The very day — let me be sure — that I put forth from London, a whale was discovered in the river, as high as Woolwich, that had waited there, few know how many months, for the subversion of the Stode fleet.”

Ships belonging to the English Merchant Adventurer's fleet were at Stade (then known as Stode), located northwest of Hamburg, Germany. A few days after the porpoise mentioned previously was captured, a whale was sighted in the Thames River at Woolwich, eight miles from London. "To subvert" is "to destroy completely." What connection a whale in the Thames River could have with the complete destruction of a fleet of English ships at Stade, Germany, is something that needs explanation.

"Is it possible?" Sir Politic Would-be said. "Yes, believe that it is possible. The whale was either sent from Spain, or the archdukes. It is Spinola's whale, upon my life and my reputation! Won't the Spaniards cease these projects that attempt to destroy England?"

At this time, England and Spain were at peace, due to a peace treaty signed in 1604, but Sir Politic Would-be was still suspicious of Spaniards. He thought that the whale could have come directly from Spain or from the archdukes. The archdukes were Albert of Austria and his wife, the Infanta Isabella, who ruled the Spanish Netherlands. ("Infanta" means daughter of the King of Spain.) Ambrogio Spinola commanded the Spanish army that was located in the Netherlands. In reality he was a very successful commander, but some credulous people believed that he was a military mastermind who thought of having a whale swim up the Thames River to London, where it would take in water and then spout the water over London, drowning the city.

Sir Politic Would-be said, "Worthy sir, please give me some other news."

Peregrine said, "Indeed, Stone the Fool is dead, and the people he entertained lack a tavern fool extremely."

Stone the Fool, the court jester of King James I of England, had been whipped in the spring of 1605 for making jokes about the Lord Admiral, who had been part of the English delegation to end the Anglo-Spanish War, which had lasted for nineteen years. Professional Fools were supposed to have immunity to such punishment, but occasionally one went too far.

“Is Master Stone dead?” Sir Politic Would-be asked.

“He’s dead, sir,” Peregrine replied. “Why, I hope that you didn’t think him to be immortal?”

He thought, Oh, this knight, if he were well known, would be a precious thing to put on our English stage, but anyone who would write such a character would be thought to feign extremely, if not maliciously. Such a character as Sir Politic Would-be would not be believed.

“Stone dead!” Sir Politic Would-be said.

“Dead,” Peregrine said. “Lord, how deeply, sir, you apprehend it! You feel it deeply, sir. Was he a kinsman of yours?”

“Not that I know of,” Sir Politic Would-be said. “Well! That same fellow was an unknown Fool.”

He meant that people really did not know Stone the Fool; Stone the Fool kept his real character secret.

“And yet you knew him, it seems?” Peregrine asked.

“I did know him,” Sir Politic Would-be said. “Sir, I knew him to have one of the most dangerous heads living within the state, and so I held him.”

“Indeed, sir?”

“While he lived, he actively took action against the interests of England. He received weekly intelligence reports, upon my knowledge, out of the Low Countries, for all parts of the world, secreted in cabbages. And those intelligence reports he dispensed again to ambassadors, in oranges, melons, apricots, lemons, citrons, and such-like foods for the upper class. Sometimes he hid the intelligence reports in oysters from Colchester and cockles from Selsey.”

“You make me marvel,” Peregrine said.

“Sir, I say these things upon my knowledge,” Sir Politic Would-be said. “I’ve observed him, at your public tavern, take his instructions in a plate of food from a traveller who was a secret agent, and immediately, before the meal was done, convey an answer in a toothpick.”

“Strange!” Peregrine said. “How could this be done, sir?”

“Why, the meat was cut so like his code, and so laid, as he must easily read the cipher,” Sir Politic Would-be said.

A fashion of the time was to cut food into strange shapes, sometimes including the shapes of letters. Sir Politic Would-be was claiming that Stone the Fool’s food had been cut in such a way that it contained a secret message in the form of a cipher, aka secret code.

He didn’t explain how an answer could be conveyed in a toothpick.

“I have heard,” Peregrine said, “that Stone the Fool could not read, sir.”

“That misinformation was cunningly spread as part of a plan by those who employed him,” Sir Politic Would-be said, “but he could read, and he knew many languages, and to add to these things, he had as sound a noggin —”

Peregrine interrupted, “I have heard, sir, that baboons were spies, and that they were a kind of cunning nation near China.”

Sir Politic Would-be agreed: “Yes, yes. They are known as the Mamuluchi. Indeed, they had their hand in a French plot or two, but they were so extremely given to women that they revealed everything, yet I received intelligence and news here, on Wednesday last, from someone on their side, that they were returned, made their reports, as the fashion is, and now stand ready for fresh employment.”

Actually, the Mamuluchi had nothing to do with either baboons or China, but Sir Politic Would-be wanted to appear to be in the know. What he called the Mamuluchi were actually the Mamelukes; they were former slaves who in 1254 seized power in Egypt and who beginning in 1517 ruled Egypt under an Ottoman viceroy. Many powerful Mamelukes were eunuchs, not womanizers.

“By God’s heart!” Peregrine said.

He thought, This Sir Pol will admit to ignorance of nothing.

“Pol” is short for “politician” or “parrot.” A parrot speaks without understanding, as do many politicians.

Peregrine said, “It seems, sir, you know all.”

“Not all, sir, but I have some general notions,” Sir Politic Would-be said. “I love to note and to observe. Although I live outside of London, free from the active torrent, yet I wish to mark the currents and the passages of things for my own private use, and I want to know the ebbs and flows of state.”

“Believe, sir,” Peregrine said, flattering Sir Politic Would-be, “that I hold myself in no small obligation to my good fortune for casting me thus luckily upon you, whose knowledge, if your generosity in imparting it equal it, may do me great assistance in instruction for my behavior and my bearing, which are still so rude and raw.”

“Why, have you come forth out of England without knowledge of the rules for travel?” Sir Politic Would-be asked.

“Indeed, I had some common rules from out of that vulgar grammar that he who cried Italian to me, taught me,” Peregrine said.

The grammar was vulgar because it was written in the vulgar, aka common, language: Italian, not Latin. Peregrine said that the writer “cried” rather than “taught” Italian because Italian is an expressive language.

“Why, this is what spoils all our brave young bloods,” Sir Politic Would-be said. “We entrust our hopeful gentry — our splendid young gentlemen — to pedants, who are fellows of exterior surface, and mere bark, aka shell. They have nothing worthwhile inside. You seem to be a gentleman of noble race. I do not teach my knowledge professionally, but my fate has been to be where I have been consulted with in matters of this high kind, touching some great men’s sons, who are persons of good blood and honor.”

He was saying that he had imparted his important knowledge to other young gentlemen.

— 2.2 —

Mosca and Nano the dwarf, wearing disguises, arrived, carrying material for erecting a temporary stage. Their disguises were those of zanies — the mountebank’s assistants, who would also perform. Some curious people followed them.

Peregrine asked, “Who are these people, sir?”

He was either asking about the gentlemen to whom Sir Politic Would-be had claimed to impart his important knowledge, or he was asking about the newly arrived people.

Mosca said, “Under that window, there the stage must be.”

Nano the dwarf pointed to a window, and Mosca said, “The same.”

The window was part of Corvino’s residence.

Sir Politic Would-be said, “These are fellows who will mount a bank. Didn’t your instructor in the valuable languages ever discourse to you about the Italian mountebanks?”

A mountebank is someone like the proprietor of an American medicine show. The term “mountebank” originated in the late 16th century. It comes from the Italian montambanco, which in turn comes from monta in banco! This means, “Climb on the bench!” Often, the mountebank would stand on a bench or other raised platform while performing and while selling his medicine.

Mountebanks would mount a bank — climb upon a temporary stage, which was often made of a bench or benches — and entertain the crowd of people who would gather. The mountebanks would then sell the crowd of people quack medicines.

“Yes, sir,” Peregrine replied.

“Why, here you shall see one,” Sir Politic Would-be said.

“They are quacks,” Peregrine said. “They are fellows who live by venting — loudly advertising and selling — oils and drugs.”

“Was that the character he gave you of them?” Sir Politic Would-be asked. “Is that what sort of people he told you Italian mountebanks are?”

“That’s what I remember,” Peregrine said.

“Pity his ignorance,” Sir Politic Would-be said. “Italian mountebanks are the only knowing — knowledgeable — men of Europe! They are great general scholars, excellent physicians, very admired statesmen, and the professed favorites and private advisors to the greatest princes. They are the only languaged men of all the world! They know the most languages, and they speak the most skillfully!”

Sir Politic Would-be believed the lies that mountebanks said while speaking to the crowds.

Peregrine said, “And, I have heard, they are most ignorant impostors, whose language consists of fancy words and bits of knowledge to use to baffle their audience with bullshit. They lie about being the favorites of great men just as much as they lie about their own vile medicines; they tell these lies while also making monstrous oaths. They will sell a drug for two-pence, before they depart, that they have valued at twelve crowns previously.”

Sir Politic Would-be replied, “Sir, calumnies are answered best with silence. You yourself shall judge for yourself.”

He asked the disguised Mosca and Nano the dwarf, “Who is it mounts, my friends? Who is the mountebank?”

Mosca replied, “Scoto of Mantua, sir.”

Scoto of Mantua was a famous Italian mountebank who had performed juggling and sleight-of-hand tricks before Queen Elizabeth I in England around 1576.

“Is it he?” Sir Politic Would-be said.

He then said to Peregrine, “Now, then, I’ll proudly promise, sir, you shall behold a different man than the man who has been fantasied to you. I wonder, though, that he should mount his bank — his stage — here in this undistinguished nook. After all, he has been accustomed to appear in the main part of the Piazza!”

Of course, “Scoto of Mantua” — actually, Volpone — was performing here because he wanted to see Corvino’s wife at the window under which he would perform.

Sir Politic Would-be said, “Here he comes.”

Volpone, disguised as a mountebank doctor, arrived. A crowd of people followed him.

Volpone said to the disguised Nano the dwarf, “Mount, zany. Climb up to the temporary stage.”

Nano the dwarf climbed up on stage; he would perform.

The crowd made excited noises.

Sir Politic Would-be said, “See how the people follow him! He’s a man who may write a check for ten thousand crowns on a bank here. He’s wealthy.”

The disguised Volpone now climbed up on the temporary stage.

Sir Politic Would-be said, “Observe closely how he moves. I always observe closely his stateliness as he climbs on stage.”

“It is worth seeing, sir,” Peregrine said.

The disguised Volpone said to the crowd, “Most noble gentlemen, and my worthy patrons! It may seem strange that I, your Scoto Mantuano, who was always accustomed to fix my bank, aka stage, in the main part of the public Piazza, near the shelter of the Portico to the Procuratia, where VIPs are seen, should now, after eight months’ absence from this illustrious city of Venice, humbly retire myself and mount my stage in an obscure nook of the Piazza.”

Sir Politic Would-be said, “Didn’t I just now say the same thing?”

Peregrine shushed him, “Be quiet, sir.”

The disguised Volpone said, “Let me tell you that I am not, as your Lombard proverb saith, cold on my feet, or content to part with my commodities at a cheaper rate than I am accustomed to sell them for. Don’t look for bargain-basement prices.”

The Lombard proverb about cold on one’s feet meant that someone was so impoverished that he would sell things very cheaply out of a deep need to buy necessities.

The disguised Volpone continued, “Also, don’t believe that the calumnious reports of that impudent detractor, and shame to our profession — Alessandro Buttone, I mean — who stated in public that I had been condemned a sforzato, aka slave, to the galleys, for poisoning the Cardinal Pietro Bembo’s ... shall we say ‘cook’ ... have at all taken possession of me as would a serious illness or an officer of the law, much less merely dejected me.

“No, no, worthy gentlemen; to tell you the truth, I cannot endure to see the rabble of these ground ciarlitani, aka charlatans, who spread their cloaks on the pavement and stand on them rather than on a stage, as if they meant to do feats of acrobatics, and then come in lamely, with their moldy tales out of Giovanni Boccaccio’s Decameron, like the stale Tabarine the storyteller did. Some of these ground ciarlitani talk about their travels and about their tedious captivity in the Turks’ galleys, when, indeed, if the truth were known, they were the Christians’ galleys, where very temperately they ate bread and drank water, as a wholesome penance, prescribed them by their confessors, for base pilferies.”

According to the disguised Volpone, the ground ciarlitani were lucky to be the slaves of Christians, who helped them to be temperate — a virtue — by giving them only bread and water for nourishment.

Sir Politic Would-be said, “Observe closely the mountebank’s bearing and his contempt for his rivals.”

The disguised Volpone continued, “These turdy-facey-nasty-patey-lousy-fartical rogues, with one poor goat’s-worth of unprepared antimony, finely wrapped up in several individual scartoccios, are able, very well, to kill their twenty patients a week, and then these rogues play and have fun with the money they made.”

A goat was worth four-pence.

The disguised Volpone was using “antimony” to baffle his hearers with bullshit. Unprepared antimony is the silvery ore; antimony is a chemical element that is a grey metalloid. The antimony is poisonous and kills people. Volpone may have wanted his hearers to think of anti-mony as anti-monk or monks’ bane. Antimony was used effectively in chemical purification, but any monk foolish enough to swallow the poisonous antimony as a purgative would probably die.

A scartoccio was a piece of paper. A dose of medicine was placed in the piece of paper and sold.

The disguised Volpone was saying that his mountebank rivals took a little medicine — oops, I meant poison — divided it into a large number of individual doses, and then sold it to enough people that it would kill twenty people a week. This gave the rivals enough money to play for a week.

The disguised Volpone continued, “Yet, these meager, starved spirits, who have half stopped the organs of their minds with earthy oppilations that cause mental constipation, do not lack their favorers among your shriveled salad-eating artisans, who are overjoyed that they may have their half-pennyworth of medicine. Even though the medicine may purge them into another world, it doesn't matter."

The disguised Volpone was making fun of the salad-eating Italians. At least one of the English members of Volpone's audience — the English were meat eaters — approved.

"Excellent!" Sir Politic Would-be said to Peregrine. "Have you ever heard better language, sir?"

"Well, let them go," the disguised Volpone said. "And, gentlemen, honorable gentlemen, know that for this time our stage, being thus removed from the clamors of the canaglia — the riff-raff — shall be the scene of pleasure and delight, for I have nothing to sell, little or nothing to sell."

"I told you, sir, his purpose," Sir Politic Would-be said.

He believed that the mountebank's purpose was to serve and improve Humankind, not to make money.

"You did so, sir," Peregrine said.

The disguised Volpone continued, "I protest that I and my six servants are not able to make enough of this precious liquor" — he held up a glass vial of the "medicine" he was selling — "so fast is it fetched away from my lodging by gentlemen of your city, foreigners from Venice's mainland holdings, honorable merchants, and yes, senators, too. These people, ever since my arrival here in Venice, have detained me to serve them by giving me their splendid — most splendid — liberalities.

"And this has been to their great benefit, for what avails a rich man to have his storehouses stuffed with muscatel wine, or with wine of the purest grape, when his physicians prescribe him, on pain of death, to drink nothing but water boiled and flavored with aniseeds?

“Oh, health! Health! The blessing of the rich! The riches of the poor! Who can buy you at too dear a rate, since there is no enjoying this world without you?”

“Be not then so sparing of your purses, honorable gentlemen, as to abridge and shorten the natural course of life.”

Peregrine said, “You see his purpose in being here.”

He meant that the purpose was to make money.

Sir Politic Would-be replied, “Yes, isn’t it good?”

He meant that the purpose was to make people healthy.

The disguised Volpone continued, “For, when a humid discharge of catarrh, aka mucous, by the mutability of air, falls from your head into an arm or shoulder, or any other part, take a ducat, or a gold chequin, and apply it to the place affected, and see what good effect it can work.”

In other words, money and gold won’t cure a disease such as rheumatism, which people at this time thought was caused by a change in the weather making mucous descend from the head into another part of the body.

The disguised Volpone continued, “No, no, money and gold won’t cure the disguise. It is this blessed unguento, aka unguent, aka ointment, this rare extraction, that has the only power to disperse all malignant humors that proceed either of hot, cold, moist, or windy causes.”

Peregrine said, “I wish that he had mentioned dry, too.”

The disguised Volpone had mentioned “hot, cold, moist, or windy causes” of illnesses. According to the medical theory of humors, the causes of illnesses were hot, cold, moist, or dry.

Sir Politic Would-be said, "Please observe him closely."

The disguised Volpone said, "This blessed ointment has the power to fortify the sourest stomach suffering from indigestion, yes, even if it were one that, through extreme weakness, vomited blood, by applying only a warm napkin to the place, after the application of the ointment and massage.

"This blessed ointment has the power to cure dizziness in the head if you put only a drop in your nostrils and likewise behind your ears. It is a most sovereign and approved remedy.

"This blessed ointment can also cure these ailments:

"The mal caduco, aka the falling sickness, aka epilepsy.

"Cramps.

"Convulsions.

"Paralyses.

"Epilepsies.

"Tremor cordia, aka palpitations of the heart.

"Retired nerves, aka shrunken sinews.

"Ill vapors of the spleen, aka hysteria.

"Stoppings of the liver.

"The stone, aka kidney stones.

"The strangury, aka difficult urination.

"Hernia ventosa, aka a windy hernia.

"Iliaca passio, aka painful obstruction of the small intestine.

"It also immediately stops dysentery.

“It eases the torsion of the small guts, aka colic.

“It also cures melancholia hypocondriaca, aka depression.

“This medicine cures all of these diseases as long as it is taken and applied according to my printed instructions.”

The disguised Volpone held high first the instructions and then the vial of medicine as he said these things:

“For this is the physician, and this is the medicine.

“This counsels, and this cures.

“This gives the direction, and this works the effect.”

He then said, “And, in sum, both together may be termed an abstract of the theory and practice in the Aesculapian art.”

Aesculapius is the god of medicine.

The disguised Volpone continued, “It will cost you eight crowns. And —”

He pointed to Nano the dwarf and said, “Zan Fritada, please sing a verse extempore in honor of it.”

“Zan Fritada” means “Jack Pancake.” He was a zany who was famous for his skills in providing entertainments such as storytelling, singing, and ad-libbing.

Sir Politic Would-be asked, “How do you like him, sir?”

Peregrine replied, “Most strangely, I do!”

“Strangely” meant “unfavorably,” and it meant “exceptionally.” Peregrine meant “unfavorably,” but Sir Politic Would-be understood him to mean “exceptionally well.”

Sir Politic Would-be asked, “Is not his language rare?”

Peregrine replied, "I never heard the like except for alchemy or Broughton's books."

Alchemical texts were very difficult to understand, as were the theological texts of the Puritan Hugh Broughton.

The disguised Nano the dwarf and the disguised Mosca played musical instruments and sang this song:

"Had old Hippocrates, or Galen,

"That to their books put med'cines all in,

"But known this secret, they had never

"(Of which they will be guilty ever)

"Been murderers of so much paper,

"Or wasted many a hurtless [harmless] taper [candle];

"No Indian drug had e'er been famed,

"Tobacco, sassafras not named;

"Ne [Nor] yet, of guacum one small stick, sir,

"Nor Raymond Lully's great elixir.

"Ne [Nor] had been known the Danish Gonswart,

"Or Paracelsus, with his long sword."

Hippocrates and Galen were ancient physicians, each of whom had written many books, thereby murdering paper and candles.

Tobacco, sassafras, and guacum were used as medicines. Guacum came from the guacium tree.

Raymond Lully was thought to be an alchemist who had discovered the Elixir of Life, which would greatly lengthen one's life, possibly even making the person immortal.

The Danish Gonswart kept his secrets so closely hidden that no one today knows who he was. Or, possibly, “Danish Gonswart” is a portmanteau word combining “Danewort” (an herb also known as Dwarf Elder) and Goutwort (an herb used to cure gout). A “wort” is an herb used in medicine.

Paracelsus was an early Renaissance physician who combined medicine with magic. He was believed to keep his most important medicine and magics in the hollow pommel of his long sword. He was believed to have made the Philosopher’s Stone, which would turn base metals into gold and silver. Powdered Philosopher’s Stone was believed, if consumed, to cure all illnesses and greatly extend life.

Peregrine said, “All this, yet, will not do. Eight crowns is too high a price to pay.”

The disguised Volpone said to Nona the dwarf, “No more.”

He then said to his audience, “Gentlemen, I wish I had time to discourse to you the miraculous effects of this my oil, surnamed Oglio del Scoto, aka Scoto’s Oil, with the countless catalogue of those whom I have cured of the illnesses I have mentioned, and of many more diseases.

“Gentlemen, I wish I had time to discourse to you the patents and privileges of all the princes and commonwealths of Christendom.”

Patents are official certificates that confer certain rights, such as the right and the privilege to sell something. Of course, the disguised Volpone wanted his audience to think that all the princes and commonwealths of Christendom had given this right and privilege to him.

The disguised Volpone continued, “Gentlemen, I wish I had time to discourse to you just the depositions of those who appeared on my behalf before the Signiory of the Sanita, which licenses mountebanks, and the most learned College of Physicians, where I was authorized, after notice was taken of the admirable virtues of my medicaments, and my own excellency in the matter of rare and unknown secrets, not only to disperse them publicly in this famous city, but also in all the territories that happily experience joy under the government of the most pious and magnificent states of Italy.

“But some gallant fellow may say, ‘Oh, there are many people who claim to have as good, and as proven-by-experiments medicinal formulas as yours.’

“Indeed, very many people have attempted, like apes, in imitation of that which is really and essentially in me, to make this oil. They have bestowed great cost in such alchemical equipment as furnaces, stills, and alembicks, as well as continual fires and preparation of the ingredients (as indeed there goes into it six hundred different herbs, besides some quantity of human fat, for the conglutination, aka gluing together — we buy the human fat from the anatomists), but when these practitioners come to the last decoction, aka boiling down, they blow, blow, puff, puff to make the fire hotter, and all flies in fumo — everything goes up in smoke! Ha! Ha! Ha!”

Anybody who consumes the “medicine” is consuming human fat and so is a cannibal.

In fumo is Latin for “in smoke.”

“Poor wretches! I pity their folly and indiscretion rather than their loss of time and money because time and money may be recovered by industry, but to be born a fool is an incurable disease.

“As for myself, I always from my youth have endeavored to get the rarest secrets, and learn them, either in exchange for my own secret knowledge or for money. I have spared neither cost nor labor, where anything was worthy to be learned.

“And gentlemen, honorable gentlemen, I will undertake, by virtue of chemical art, out of the honorable hat that covers your head, to extract the four elements — that is to say, the fire, air, water, and earth — and return to you your felt hat without burn or stain.”

The secret knowledge that the disguised Volpone said he had labored so hard for so long and so expensively to acquire allows him to remove burn marks and stains from felt hats.

The disguised Volpone continued, “For, while others have been playing the ball game known as the Balloo, I have been at my books and I am now past the craggy paths of study and have come to the flowery plains of honor and reputation.”

Sir Politic Would-be said, “I do assure you, sir, that is his aim.”

According to Sir Politic Would-be, the mountebank’s aim was to acquire honor and reputation.

The disguised Volpone continued, “But, about our price —”

Peregrine said, “And that is another of his aims, Sir Pol.”

According to Peregrine, the mountebank’s aim was to acquire money.

The disguised Volpone continued, “You all know, honorable gentlemen, I have never valued this ampulla, or vial, at less than eight crowns, but for this time, I am content to be deprived of it for six. Six crowns is the price, and less, I know you cannot offer me out of courtesy.

“Take it, or leave it; in either case, both it is and I am at your service. I ask you not for the price that the value of the thing would demand, for then I should demand from you a thousand crowns.

“That is the price that the Cardinals Montalto and Fernese, the great Duke of Tuscany, the godfather of my child, and several other princes, have given me, but I despise money.

“Only to show my affection to you, honorable gentlemen, and your illustrious State here, I have neglected the messages of these princes, neglected my own duties, made my journey here, just to present you with the fruits of my travels.”

He then turned to the disguised Nano the dwarf and the disguised Mosca and said, “Tune your voices once more to the touch of your instruments, and give the honorable assembly some delightful recreation.”

Peregrine said, “What monstrous and most painful circumstance — unnecessary ado — is being made here just to get some three or four small coins, some three-pence in the whole! For that is what the profits will come to.”

The disguised Nano the dwarf and the disguised Mosca sang this song:

“You that [who] would last long, list [listen] to my song,

“Make no more coil [fuss], but buy of this oil.

“Would you be ever fair [always beautiful] and young?

“Stout of teeth, and strong of tongue?

“Tart [Keen] of palate? Quick of ear?

“Sharp of sight? Of nostril clear?

“Moist of hand? [Horny.] And light of foot?

“Or, I will come nearer to’t [state what I mean more clearly],

“Would you live free from all diseases?

“Do the act your mistress pleases;

“Yet fright [frighten] all aches from your bones?”

“Here’s a med’cine for the nones.”

The song stated that the medicine would do such things as give the taker a keen appetite and clear his or her sinuses. It was also very good at helping clear up sexual troubles. It would make the taker moist of hand — a sign of amorousness. You can guess the act that pleases your mistress. The medicine would also make the taker light of foot — promiscuous. It would also frighten the ache from the taker’s bones — it would cure the venereal disease that made the bones ache.

It is a medicine for the nones — it will cure none, aka no one person, and it will cure none, aka no one disease, and it will cure at none, aka no one time or occasion. That is the reason for the plural: nones. Volpone, however, wanted the audience to think that “nones” was “nonces.” “Nonce” means “particular purpose” and “particular occasion.” This medicine would cure no one particular purpose at no one particular occasion.

The disguised Volpone said, “Well, I am in a humor — the mood — at this time to make a present of the small quantity my coffer contains; to the rich, in courtesy, and to the poor for God’s sake.

“Therefore, now listen carefully: I asked you to pay six crowns, and six crowns, at other times, you have paid me, but you shall not now give me six crowns, nor five, nor four, nor three, nor two, nor one; nor half a ducat; no, nor a moccinigo. Six—”

Crowns, ducats, and moccinigos are all pieces of money.

The disguised Volpone paused to make the audience wait for the medicine’s true price, and then he continued, “— pence it will cost you, or else it will cost you six hundred pounds, for I won't go any lower — expect no lower price, for I swear by the banner displayed in front of my stage that I will not abate a bagatine, or knock off a farthing.”

He continued, “I will have only a small amount of money that is a pledge of your loves, so that I can carry something from among you away to show I am not despised by you.

“Therefore, now, toss your handkerchiefs, cheerfully, cheerfully, and be advised that the first heroic spirit who deigns to grace me with a handkerchief, I will give him or her a little remembrance of something, in addition to the medicine, that shall please that heroic spirit better than if I had presented it with a double pistolet.”

The disguised Volpone was promising to give the first buyer an extra gift that would be valued at more than a double pistolet, which is a valuable coin.

Buyers of the medicine would tie the money in a handkerchief and toss it to the mountebank, who would take the money, tie the medicine in the handkerchief, and toss it back to the buyer. The first buyer would receive an additional gift in the handkerchief. At this time, handkerchiefs were used for ornamental rather than hygienic purposes.

Peregrine asked, “Will you be that heroic spark, Sir Pol? Will you be the first buyer?”

Celia, Corvino's wife, had been watching from the window. She now threw down her handkerchief — in which was tied six pence — to the disguised Volpone.

Peregrine said, “Oh, look! The lady at the window has beaten you and got there first.”

The disguised Volpone said, “Lady, I kiss your bounty, and for this timely grace you have done your poor Scoto of Mantua, I will return you, over and above my oil, a secret of such high and inestimable nature that it shall make you forever enamored of that minute wherein your eye first descended on so mean, yet not altogether to be despised, an object.

“Here is a powder concealed in this paper, about which, if I would state its true worth, nine thousand volumes were but as one page, that page as a line, that line as a word — so short is this pilgrimage of man (which some call life) to the expressing of it.”

The disguised Volpone had been speaking volumes of words about Scotto’s oil — and now this powder — but if he were to state their true worth, he could do it in one word: crap.

He continued, “Would I reflect on the price? Why, the whole world is but as an empire, that empire as a province, that province as a bank, that bank as a private purse to the purchase of it.”

The price of his medicine had gone from eight crowns to six pence. At this time, one crown was worth five shillings. A shilling was worth twelve pence. Therefore, one crown was worth 60 pence. The original price was eight crowns, or 480 pence. The final price was six pence.

He continued, “I will only tell you; it is the powder that made Venus a goddess (Apollo gave the powder to her) and kept her perpetually young, cleared her wrinkles, firmed her gums, filled her skin and made it free of wrinkles, and colored her hair.

“From Venus the secret of the powder went to Helen of Troy, and at the sack of Troy it was unfortunately lost until now, in this our age, it was as happily recovered, by a studious antiquarian, out of some ruins of Asia, who sent a moiety of it (but much adulterated) to the court of France and the ladies there now color their hair with it.

“The rest, at this present time, remains with me; it has been refined to a quintessence, so that, wherever it simply touches, it perpetually preserves that part in youth, restores the complexion in age, and seats your teeth — even if they have danced like the strings of a piano — as firmly as a wall and makes your teeth as white as ivory, even if they were as black as —”

— 2.3 —

Corvino arrived. He saw and recognized Celia’s handkerchief, and he was instantly jealous, although she had given him no reason for being jealous.

Corvino finished the disguised Volpone’s sentence for him in his own way: “— blood of the devil, and black as my shame!”

He then ordered the disguised Volpone, “Come down here from the stage! Come down! Have you no house but mine to make your scene?”

Corvino recognized that what he was seeing was like a commedia dell’arte comedy skit that used stock characters. Flaminio was the name of the lover in many skits. Franciscina was the name of the saucy, sexually willing maidservant. Pantalone di Besogniosi (Pantaloon of the Paupers) was the name of the aging, miserly merchant who wore pantaloons (a kind of trouser) and whose young wife often cuckolded him.

Corvino said to the disguised Volpone, “Signior Flaminio, will you come down, sir? Down? What, is my wife your Franciscina, sir? Are there no windows on the whole Piazza here to make your theatrical properties, but mine? None but mine?”

He beat the disguised Volpone and drove him and the disguised Nano and Mosca away. They ran fast.

He then said, “By God’s heart, before tomorrow I shall be newly christened and called the Pantalone di Besogniosi by everyone in town.”

Peregrine asked, “What does this mean, Sir Pol?”

“It is some trick of state, believe it,” Sir Politic Would-be said. “I will go home.”

Peregrine said, “It may be some design on you. Someone may be wanting to trick you.”

The only person wanting to trick Sir Politic Would-be was Peregrine, who wanted to trick him into making more of a fool of himself.

“I don’t know,” Sir Politic Would-be said, “but I’ll be on my guard.”

“It is your best option, sir,” Peregrine said.

Sir Politic Would-be said, “For the past three weeks, all my pieces of intelligence and news — all my letters — have been intercepted.”

Actually, he had recently said that last Wednesday he had received intelligence and news about the Mamuluchi.

“Indeed, sir!” Peregrine said. “You had best be careful.”

“So I will,” Sir Politic Would-be said.

He exited.

Peregrine said to himself, “This knight, I must not lose him — because I want to laugh at him — until night.”

He followed Sir Politic Would-be.

Volpone and Mosca talked together in a room in Volpone's house.

“Oh, I am wounded!” Volpone said.

“Where, sir?” Mosca asked.

“Not on the outside,” Volpone said. “Corvino's blows were nothing. I could bear them forever. But angry Cupid, shooting arrows like thunderbolts from Corvino's wife's eyes, has shot himself into me like a flame. There, now, he flings about his burning heat, just like an ambitious — rising — fire, whose vent is stopped in a furnace. The fight is all within me.”

A closed vent would cause the fire to die down through lack of air, so Volpone was saying the opposite of what he meant.

“I cannot live, unless you help me, Mosca. My liver melts, and I, without the hope of some soft air from her refreshing breath am but a heap of cinders.”

Giving a fire more air would reduce the material being burned to a heap of cinders more quickly, so Volpone was saying the opposite of what he meant.

“Alas, good sir,” Mosca said. “I wish that you had never seen her!”

“I wish that you had never told me about her!” Volpone said.

“Sir, it is true,” Mosca said. “I confess I was made unfortunate and you were made unhappy by my telling you about her, but I'm bound in conscience no less than in duty to do my best to bring about the release of your torment, and I will, sir.”

One way to release Volpone's torment would be to find a way to have Corvino's wife sleep with him.

“Dear Mosca, shall I hope to have my torment relieved?” Volpone asked.

“Sir, you who are more than dear to me, I will not advise you to despair of being without anything that a human can bring about,” Mosca said. “And what you want is something that I can bring about.”

“Oh, there spoke my better angel,” Volpone said.

This is ironic. Volpone’s “better angel” is someone who is willing to help him commit adultery, a sin that is punished in the Inferno unless it is repented while the adulterer is still alive.

“Mosca” means “fly,” and Beelzebub is the Lord of the Flies. Beelzebub is a winged demon and a fallen angel.

Volpone handed Mosca his keys and said, “Mosca, take my keys. My gold, plate, and jewels, all’s at your devotion.”

He meant “at your disposal.” The word “devotion” has ironic religious overtones. “Devotion” is a word used to name how many people react to God. Of course, Volpone worshipped and was devoted to gold and other material possessions.

Volpone continued, “Employ them however you will; indeed, coin me and employ me, too, as long as you crown my longings and get them satisfied, Mosca. Use whatever you have to, to get Corvino’s wife to sleep with me.”

“Use your patience,” Mosca said.

He meant that it would take some time.

“So I have,” Volpone replied.

He had not.

“I have no doubt that I will bring success to your desires,” Mosca said. “I will get you what you want.”

“In that case, I don’t repent me being in my recent disguise as a mountebank,” Volpone said.

“If you can horn Corvino, sir, you need not repent being disguised as a mountebank,” Mosca said.

By “horn,” he meant make a cuckold out of Corvino by sleeping with his wife. This society joked that cuckolds had invisible horns growing on their foreheads.

“That is true,” Volpone said. “Besides, I have never meant Corvino to be my heir.”

He meant that since he had never meant Corvino to be his heir, it was OK to make Corvino a cuckold. Actually, if he had meant Corvino to be his heir, it would make some (but not moral) sense to sleep with Corvino’s wife. If she gave birth to a son for Volpone, eventually Volpone’s son would inherit Volpone’s wealth. The word “cuckold” comes from the cuckoo bird, which lays its eggs in other birds’ nests; the other birds raise the cuckoo’s nestlings.

Thinking about “heir” led Volpone to think about “hair,” and he asked, “Won’t the color of my beard and eyebrows make my identity known? Won’t Corvino recognize that the mountebank is me because of the color of our hair?”

Foxes are known for red fur, and Volpone’s hair and beard were red.

“Not a chance,” Mosca said.

“I did my performance as the mountebank well,” Volpone said.

Mosca replied, “So well that I wish I could follow you in my performance, with half the happiness and success!”

Mosca would put on a performance to manipulate Corvino to allow Volpone to sleep with his wife.

He thought, And yet I would escape your epilogue — the beating that Corvino gave you!

Volpone asked, “But were they gulled — fooled — with the belief that I was Scoto the mountebank?”

“Sir, Scoto himself could hardly have distinguished you from himself!” Mosca said. “But I don’t have the time to flatter you now. We’ll part, and as I prosper, so applaud my art. I will get you what you want.”

— 2.5 —

A very angry and jealous Corvino dragged his innocent wife, Celia, into a room of their house. He had a sword in his hand.

Corvino said, “Death of my honor, with the city’s fool! A juggling, tooth-pulling, prating mountebank!”

Mountebanks sometimes performed tooth extractions.

He continued, “And at a public window! Where, while he, with his strained overacting, and his mugging of faces, to his drug lecture draws your itching ears, a crew of old, unmarried, noted lechers stood leering up like satyrs, and you smiled most graciously and fanned your favors forth — that is, you flirted — to give your hot spectators satisfaction!

“Was your mountebank their call? Their whistle? Were the spectators using the mountebank to call and whistle to you like hunters calling and whistling to lure birds to be caught?

“Or were you enamored of his copper rings and his saffron jewelry with the toadstone in it?”

Copper rings were cheap rings that could fool fools into thinking they were made of gold. Saffron jewelry was jewelry that was stained to make it look like gold. Toads were thought to have a precious jewel with magical abilities located in their head.

He continued, “Or were you enamored of his embroidered suit with the cope-stitch, a suit that was made out of a hearse-cloth? Or were you enamored of his old tilt-feather? Or were you enamored of his starched beard?”

Hearse cloth was a drape for a coffin. According to Corvino, the mountebank had made a suit of the cloth and embroidered it to make it fancy, using a cope-stitch — a stitch used in making copes, aka ecclesiastical gowns. Some men at this time stiffened their beards with egg whites or gum so that they kept a fashionable shape.

Corvino continued, “Well, you shall have him, yes! He shall come home, and minister to you the fricace — massage — for the mother.”

To treat a woman for hysteria, aka the mother, doctors would massage the woman’s genitals until the woman had an orgasm. Actually, many doctors disliked doing this because it took so much time and so they trained midwives to do it.

Corvino continued, “Or, let me see, I think you’d rather mount; wouldn’t you mount?”

He meant that his wife would like to mount the platform on which the mountebank performed — and he meant that his wife would like to sexually mount the mountebank.

He continued, “Why, if you’ll mount, you may; yes, truly, you may. And so you may be seen, down to the foot.”

If his wife climbed on the platform, people would get a good view of her and perhaps see more of her than this society thought was proper to be seen.

He continued, “Get yourself a cittern, Lady Vanity, and be a dealer with the manly man. Make one.”

Prostitutes often played the musical instrument called a cittern. “To be a dealer” meant to be either a prostitute or a bawd. To “make one” meant to copulate and make one person out of two.

Corvino continued, “I’ll just protest that I am a cuckold and save your dowry.”

A wife who was convicted of committing adultery forfeited her dowry to her husband.

He continued, “I’m a Dutchman, I am! For, if you thought me to be an Italian, you would be damned before you did this, you whore!”

Dutchmen were thought to be calm, while Italians — such as Corvino — were thought to be hot-tempered and capable of great violence.

He continued, “You would tremble to imagine that the murder of your father, mother, brother, and the rest of your family would follow your adultery — that is the Italian way of justice.”

His wife, Celia, pleaded, “Good sir, have patience.”

Corvino replied, “What could you propose I do to yourself less than that in this heat of wrath and stung with my dishonor I should strike this steel sword into you with as many stabs as you were gazed on by goatish — lecherous — eyes? That is what you deserve!”

“Alas, sir, be at peace!” Celia said. “I could not think that my being at the window would move your impatience now more than at other times. I did no harm by being at the window.”

“No!” Corvino said. “You didn’t try to seek and entertain a parley — conversation — with a known knave, before a multitude of witnesses! You were an actor with your handkerchief, which he most sweetly kissed when he got it, and might, no doubt, return it with a letter, and appoint a place where you might meet — your sister’s, your mother’s, or your aunt’s might serve the turn.”

In this society, the word “aunt” sometimes meant “bawd.” “Serve the term” meant both “serve the purpose” and “provide the sexual service.”

Celia said, “Why, dear sir, when do I make these excuses, or ever stir out of doors, except to go to the church? And that I do so seldom —”

“Well, it shall be less in the future,” Corvino said. “And your restraint before was liberty compared to what I now decree, and therefore pay close attention to what I now say.

“First, I will have this bawdy light — this window — dammed up, aka boarded up. And until that is done, some two or three yards away from the window, I’ll chalk a line. If you happen to set your desperate, reckless, violent foot over that line, more Hell, more horror, and more wild remorseless rage shall seize on you than shall seize on a conjurer who has heedlessly left his circle’s safety before his devil was sent back to Hell.”

Conjurors were reputed to be able to call devils from out of Hell, but devils were dangerous, and so conjurors made a magic circle to keep themselves safe while the devil was present. If a conjuror stepped out of the magic circle, he was at the nonexistent mercy of the devil.

Corvino held up a chastity belt and said, “And then here’s a lock that I will hang upon you.”

The chastity belt prevented a woman from having sex.

He continued, “And, now I think about it, I will keep you backwards. Your lodging shall be backwards, at the back of the house. You will walk backwards. What you see — your prospect — all shall be backwards, and the only sexual pleasure that you shall know will be backwards — the back hole rather than the front hole.

“Indeed, since you force my honest nature, know that it is your own fault. Your being too open makes me treat you thus because you will not contain your subtle and cunning nostrils — used for smelling out lust — in a sweet room, but they must snuff the air of rank and sweaty passersby.”

Knocking sounded at the door.

Corvino said, “Someone is knocking.”

He said to his wife, “Leave, and don’t be seen, on pain of your life. Don’t look toward the window. If you do — wait and hear this — then let me not prosper, whore, unless I will make you an anatomy by dissecting you myself, and read a lecture about you to the city, and in public.”

To make her an anatomy meant to make her a skeleton through dissecting her. It also meant to dissect her moral character in a lecture. Of course, Corvino now thought because of his jealousy that her moral character is bad.

He said, “Go away! Leave!”

A servant entered the room.

Corvino asked, “Who’s there at the door?”

“It is Signior Mosca, sir.”

— 2.6 —

“Let him come in.”

The servant exited.

Corvino, assuming that Volpone had died and that Mosca had come to tell him that news, said to himself, “His master’s dead. There’s yet some good to counteract the bad.”

Mosca entered the room.

“My Mosca, welcome!” Corvino said. “I guess your news.”

“I fear you cannot, sir,” Mosca said.

“Isn’t your news that Volpone is dead?”

“Rather the contrary.”

“Not his recovery?”

“Yes, sir,” Mosca said.

“I am cursed, I am bewitched, my crosses meet to vex me,” Corvino said.

To Corvino, the cross that he bore in Volpone’s not dying was similar to the cross that Christ endured.

Corvino asked, “How? How? How? How?”

“Why, sir, with the mountebank Scotto’s oil,” Mosca replied. “Corbaccio and Voltore brought some of it to Volpone, while I was busy in an inner room.”

“God’s death!” Corvino said, “That damned mountebank! If not for the law, I could now kill the rascal! It cannot be that his oil should have the virtue of restoring Volpone’s health. Haven’t I known the mountebank Scotto to be a common rogue? He comes fiddling into the osteria, aka inn, with a tumbling whore, aka female acrobat or whore, whose work is tumbling in the hay, and when he has done all his forced tricks — tricks he is forced to perform to survive — hasn’t he been glad to get a poor spoonful of stale wine with flies in it?”

“It cannot be that his oil is effective. All his ingredients consist of a sheep’s gall, a roasted bitch’s marrow, some few boiled insects, pounded caterpillars, a little capon’s grease, and fasting spittle. I know his ingredients to the smallest portion.”

“Fasting spittle” is a starving man’s spit. No doubt Corvino thought that Scoto was often a starving man.

“I don’t know, sir,” Mosca said, “but some of it they there poured into his ears, and some in his nostrils, and the medicine made him recover. All they did in addition was to massage the oil into his skin.”

“A pox on that massage!” Corvino said.

“And since then, to seem the more zealous and flattering of — giving him high hopes concerning — his health, there, they have had, at extremely high fees, the college of physicians consulting about him and trying to determine how they might restore him to complete health.

“One doctor wants Volpone to have a poultice of spices. Another doctor wants a flayed ape clapped to Volpone’s breast. A third doctor would have it be a dog, and a fourth doctor would have it be an oil, with wild cats’ skins.

“At last, they all resolved that to preserve him there was no other means but that some young woman who is lusty and full of juice must be immediately sought out to sleep by him.”

“Lusty” means “healthy and energetic” and “horny.” “Full of juice” means “energetic” and “wet between the legs.”

In 1 Kings 1:1-4, a young woman is brought to sleep with the very old King David to keep him warm, but he does not have sex with her:

I Now king David was old and stricken in years; and they covered him with clothes, but he gat no heat.

2 Wherefore his servants said unto him, Let there be sought for my lord the king a young virgin: and let her stand before the king, and let her cherish him, and let her lie in thy bosom, that my lord the king may get heat.

3 So they sought for a fair damsel throughout all the coasts of Israel, and found Abishag a Shunammite, and brought her to the king.

4 And the damsel was very fair, and cherished the king, and ministered to him: but the king knew her not. (King James Version)

Mosca continued, “And in this service, most unhappily and most unwillingly I am now employed: I have been sent to find a young woman to sleep with Volpone. I thought to pre-acquaint you with that here, in order to get your advice, since it concerns you most and because I would not do anything that might cross your ends. I don’t want to do anything that might prevent you from inheriting Volpone’s wealth. On you I am wholly dependent, sir. After Volpone dies, I will need a new position.

“Yet, if I do not find a young woman to sleep with Volpone, Corbaccio and Voltore and the physicians may report my slackness to Volpone and work me out of his good opinion, and then all your hopes, ventures, or whatsoever will all be frustrated!

“I do but tell you, sir; I am simply reporting news you need to know. Besides, they are all now competing to determine who shall first present him with a young woman to sleep with. Therefore ... I entreat you to quickly decide what you will do, and I entreat you to act first and forestall them, if you can.”

“This is death to my hopes!” Corvino said. “This is my villainous fortune! It is best to hire some common courtesan — some common prostitute.”

“Yes, I thought about that, sir,” Mosca said. “But whores are all so cunning, so full of artifice, and men of old age on the other hand are doting and gullible, so that — I cannot tell for sure — but we may, perhaps, light on a whore who may cheat us all. She may inherit Volpone’s wealth!”

“That is true,” Corvino said.

“So no, no to using a prostitute,” Mosca said. “The young woman must be one who has no tricks, sir. Some simple thing, a creature who can be made to do it, some wench you may command. Have you no kinswoman you can order to do it? God’s so —”

This expletive meant “By God’s soul” and sounded like “cazzo,” which is Italian for “cock.”

Mosca continued, “Think, think, think, think, think, think, think, sir.”

He hesitated and then added, “One of the doctors there offered his daughter.”

“What!” Corvino said.

“Yes, Signior Lupo, the physician.”

Lupo is Italian for “Wolf.”

“His daughter!” Corvino said.

“And she is a virgin, sir,” Mosca said. “Why? Alas, the physician knows the state of Volpone’s body, what it is. The physician knows that nothing can warm Volpone’s blood, sir, but a fever. The physician knows that no incantation can raise Volpone’s spirit. A long forgetfulness has seized that part.”

In other words, Mosca is saying nothing can raise Volpone’s penis; he has been impotent for a long time.

Mosca added, “Besides, sir, who shall know it? Some one or two —”

Corvino interrupted, “Please let me think for a moment.”

He walked a short distance away to think.

He said to himself, “If any man but I had had this luck. . . . The thing in itself, I know, is nothing. . . . Why shouldn’t I command my blood and my affections just like this dull doctor does? In the point of honor, the cases are all one of wife and daughter.”

“Command my blood and my affections” meant both “control my passions and feelings” and “order my relative, who is one with me and who is the object of my affections” to do something. In Corvino’s case, the relative was his wife; in the doctor’s case, the relative was his daughter. (Of course, Mosca had simply made up the doctor and daughter.)

Mosca said to himself, “I hear him coming.”

The “coming” was “coming around to the way Mosca was persuading him” and “Corvino beginning to move toward Mosca.”

Corvino said to himself, “She is my wife — she shall do it. It is done: I have made my decision. By God’s light! If this doctor, who is not engaged, unless it be for his counsel, which is nothing, offers Volpone his daughter, what should I, who am so deeply in, do? The doctor stands to make a fee, but I stand to inherit all of Volpone’s wealth. I will forestall the doctor.

“Wretch! Covetous wretch!”

Was he thinking that perhaps the doctor was making an attempt at inheriting Volpone’s wealth and was therefore a covetous wretch? Or was Corvino referring to himself?

Corvino said out loud, "I have determined what I shall do."

"What is that, sir?" Mosca asked.

"We'll make all sure," Corvino said. "We'll make me sure of inheriting Volpone's wealth. Mosca, the party you know of shall be my own wife."

He used the euphemism "party you know of" because he was unwilling to say "young woman who shall sleep with Volpone."

Mosca said, "Sir, that is the thing — except that I would not seem to advise you — I would have proposed to you at the first. And now you make your count and inventory all of Volpone's possessions, which you are sure to inherit, because with this decision you have cut all your competitors' throats in this cutthroat competition.

"Why, this decision is directly taking a legal possession of Volpone's wealth!

"And when Volpone suffers his next fit, we may let him go and die. All we need to do is only to pull the pillow from under his head, and he is throttled to death. It would have been done previously, except for your moral scruples and doubts."

When people in this society were dying, their pillows were taken away from under their heads to make it easier to die. Mosca was making a joke: Removing Volpone's pillow would make it easier for Volpone to die because Mosca would use the pillow to smother Volpone to death.

"Yes, a plague on it," Corvino said. "My conscience fools my wit! My conscience won't allow me to do what my intelligence tells me I need to do to inherit Volpone's wealth.

"Well, I'll be quick, and so you should be, lest they should be before us and find a young woman to sleep with Volpone.

“Go home, prepare Volpone, tell him with what zeal and willingness I am doing it. Swear that it was on my first hearing about it (as you may do truly) that I made my own freely made proposal.”

“Sir, I promise you that I’ll so possess him with your generosity that the rest of his starved clients shall all be banished from his house and only you shall be allowed to visit him. But do not come, sir, until I send the OK to you because I have something else to ripen for your good — but you must not know what it is.”

Mosca did not want Corvino and Celia to arrive early.

Corvino said, “Be careful not to forget to send the OK to me.”

“You don’t need to worry about that,” Mosca said.

Mosca exited.

— 2.7 —

Corvino called, “Where are you, wife? My Celia? Wife?”

Corvino’s wife, Celia, entered the room. She was crying.

Corvino said to her, “What, blubbing? Come, dry those tears. I think you thought that I was in earnest when I pretended to be jealous. Ha! By this light I swear that I talked like that only in order to test you. I think that the lightness of the occasion — the lack of any real reason for me to be jealous — should have assured you that I was only pretending to be jealous. Come, I am not jealous.”

“No?” Celia asked.

“Indeed, I am not jealous, and I have never been jealous,” Corvino said. “Jealousy is a poor and unprofitable emotion.”

He was hoping to make considerable profit by not being jealous and by prostituting his wife to Volpone.

He continued, "Don't I know that if women have a will and the desire to engage in adulterous sex, they'll do it despite all the watchmen in the world, and don't I know that the fiercest spies are tamed with gold? Guards can be bribed.

"Tut, I am confident in you. You shall see it, and you'll see that I'll give you reason, too, to believe that I am confident in you."

Celia thought that he meant that he was confident that she was honest and chaste, but he meant that he was confident that she would do what he ordered her to do.

Corvino said, "Come kiss me. Go and make yourself ready, immediately. Wear all your best attire and your choicest jewelry. Put them all on, and with them, put on your best looks. We are invited to a formal banquet, at old Volpone's, where it shall appear how far I am free from jealousy or fear."

Corvino was lying to Celia about the formal banquet. He simply wanted her to dress extremely nicely as if she were going to a formal banquet.

Corvino also had no intention of waiting for Mosca's OK. He wanted to do this immediately.

CHAPTER 3 (Volpone, or the Fox)

— 3.1 —

Mosca stood alone in the Piazza, aka public square.

He said to himself, “I fear that I shall begin to grow in love with my dear self, and my most prosperous parts, aka flourishing talents, because they so spring and burgeon and grow big that I can feel a whimsy in my blood. I don’t know how, but success has made me wanton. I could skip out of my skin, now, like a cunning snake, I am so limber.”

Mosca was in a good mood because his manipulation of Corvino had gone so well, and his good mood was such that it was like a sexual excitement. It was like the excitement that made a penis grow and come out from under its foreskin.

Now he began to reflect on parasites, people who live by flattering and serving other people. Some parasites are more capable than other parasites.

He said to himself, “Oh, your parasite is a very precious thing, dropped from above and God-given. Parasitism is not bred among clods and blockheads here on earth.

“I wonder why the mystery of parasitism has not been made a science because it is so liberally professed!”

In this society, a “mystery” is a craft such as being a carpenter or a blacksmith; it is skilled labor. In contrast is “science,” aka liberal arts, which is what gentlemen study in higher education. The liberal arts consist of knowledge that is worthy for a free man. Liber is Latin for “free” and for “book.”

“Liberally professed” meant both that parasitism is widely practiced and that even gentlemen practice it.

Mosca continued, “Almost all the wise world is little else, in nature, but parasites, or sub-parasites.

“And yet, by a true parasite, I don’t mean parasites who have only a bare town-art, which is enough to know who’s able to feed them. They have no house, no family, and no care, and therefore they mold tales — devise scandals — for men’s ears, to tempt their hearing.

“Or they get kitchen-invention, and some stale receipts to please the belly and the groin.”

Kitchen-invention is both gossip and food — both are cooked up in the kitchen. The stale receipts are stale recipes — uninteresting food. But the word “stale” also means “prostitute,” and so stale receipts are the tricks of whores. Food that pleases the groin is aphrodisiacal.

To Mosca, a true parasite does more than simply serve his master by telling the master gossip and providing the master with whores.

Mosca continued, “Nor by ‘parasite’ do I mean those with their court dog-tricks, who can fawn and flear, and make their revenue out of legs and faces, echo my lord, and lick away a mote.”

To Mosca, a true parasite does more than simply serve his master by fawning like a dog. To “flear” is to “smile obsequiously.” Such poor parasites make legs, aka bows, and faces, aka smirks. They echo their master’s opinions back to him, and they are sycophants who will remove lint from their master’s coat or shirt. Mosca emphasized these parasites’ servility by saying that they would lick away such items.

Mosca now described what he considered a true parasite:

“But a true parasite is your fine elegant rascal, who can rise and stoop, almost at the same time, and like an arrow shoot through the air as nimbly as a falling star, aka meteor, and who can turn as quickly as a swallow does, and be here, and there, and here, and yonder, all at once, and who can be present to any humor and all occasions, and change a visor, aka mask, aka his personality, swifter than a thought!”

According to Mosca, a true parasite is very changeable. He will change to fit his master’s every mood, and he will change to fit any occasion. A true parasite can adapt.

Mosca himself was a master of adapting. He was able to think of ways to manipulate other people to serve his master, Volpone. He had certainly shown that in his dealings with Voltore, Corbaccio, and Corvino.

Mosca continued, “This is the creature who has had the art of parasitism born with him. He doesn’t toil to learn it, but he practices it out of most excellent nature, and such sparks are the true parasites. Other parasites are only their zanis — their comic servants.”

And yet Mosca was doing the same things that he criticized lesser parasites of doing. He had certainly flattered Volpone for his performance as a mountebank, and he was acting as a pander when he was manipulating Corvino into allowing Volpone to sleep with Celia. He also had invented gossip and scandal: Signior Lupus is offering his virgin daughter to Volpone to sleep with! A parasite is a flatterer; Mosca had flattered Volpone and his victims, and in this conversation with himself, Mosca was flattering himself.

The difference between a true parasite and other parasites may be enjoyment and competence. A true parasite enjoys being a parasite. A true parasite is at ease when adapting to every mood and every occasion, and a true parasite is at ease while manipulating other people. A true parasite enjoys using his wits and is competent at manipulating other people.

— 3.2 —

Bonario walked onto the scene.

Mosca said, “Who’s this? Bonario, old Corbaccio’s son? The exact person I was going to seek!”

He said to Bonario, “Fair sir, you are happily met.”

“I cannot be happily met by you,” Bonario replied.

“Why not, sir?” Mosca asked.

“Please know your path and go on your way and leave me,” Bonario said. “I would be loath to engage in conversation with such a contemptible fellow as you are.”

“Courteous sir, don’t scorn me because of my poverty,” Mosca said.

“I don’t, by Heaven,” Bonario said, “but you shall give me leave to hate you because of your baseness.”

“My baseness!” Mosca said.

“Yes,” Bonario said. “Answer me this: Isn’t your sloth sufficient reason for me to hate you? And your flattery? And your means of getting food to eat?”

The charge of sloth may seem unfair. Mosca certainly acted quickly to serve his master. But one meaning of sloth — found in Dante’s Divine Comedy — is slackness in pursuing the things that ought to be pursued. Mosca worked hard to serve Volpone, but he did not work hard to save his own soul.

“May Heaven be good to me!” Mosca said. “Sir, these imputations are too commonly made and easily stuck on virtue when she's poor. Poor people are often undeservedly called base.

“You are unequal — unjust to, and of higher social standing than — me, and even if what you say about me were righteous, yet you are not righteous when you — before you know me — proceed to censure me. May St. Mark, patron saint of Venice, bear witness against you because what you are doing is inhuman.”

Mosca pretended to cry.

Bonario said to himself, “What! Is he crying? The crying is a soft and good sign; it indicates a gentle nature. I am sorry that I was so harsh to him.”

Mosca said, “It is true that because I am swayed by strong necessity, I am forced to eat my gotten-with-much-trouble bread with too much obsequiousness. It is true, besides, that I am fain to spin my own poor raiment — obtain my own clothing — out of my service as a servant alone, being not born to a free fortune ...”

The word “fain” means both “obliged” and “eager.” Mosca wanted Bonario to think that he (Mosca) was forced to be a parasite in order to get clothing, but actually Mosca enjoyed being a parasite — it gave him an opportunity to use his wits to manipulate other people and attempt to improve his situation in life.

Matthew 6:28 asks, “And why take ye thought for raiment? Consider the lilies of the field, how they grow; they toil not, neither do they spin” (King James Version).

Mosca continued, “... but that I have done base offices, in rending friends asunder, dividing families, betraying counsels, whispering false lies, or undermining men with praises, enticed their credulity with perjuries, corrupted chastity, or that I am in love with my own tender ease, but would not rather undergo as a test the most rugged and laborious course that might redeem my present estimation and lift my reputation from bad to good, let me here perish in all hope of goodness.”

This is ambiguous. Does “It is true” apply to these words?

If “It is true” applies to these words, then Mosca was saying the truth: It is true that he has done these evil deeds and it is true that he would rather not do the rugged and laborious deeds that would give him a good reputation, and it is true that Bonario ought to allow him to die here and now so that Mosca would not be able to do these evil deeds and so that goodness would exist.

If “It is true” does not apply to these words, then Mosca was lying to Bonario: He (Mosca) has not done these evil things, and he would prefer to do the rugged and laborious deeds that would give him a good reputation, and if what he just claimed is not true, then let him (Mosca) perish in all hope of goodness — let him give up all hope of eternal life in Heaven.

By being ambiguous, Mosca was able to lie to Bonario yet tell the truth to himself.

Bonario was convinced by Mosca’s crying and by his words. He thought, This cannot be an impersonated passion. This cannot be false emotion.

He said to Mosca, “I am to blame. I was mistaken about your nature and character. Please forgive me and tell me your business.”

“Sir, it concerns you,” Mosca said, “and although I may seem at first to make a grievous offence in my manners, and in my gratitude to my master, yet out of the pure love that I bear all right, and out of my hatred of the wrong, I must reveal it.

“At this very hour, your father is carrying out his intention to disinherit you —”

“What!” Bonario said.

Mosca continued, “— and thrust you forth into the world, as a complete stranger to his blood. It is true, sir. The work in no way concerns me personally, except as I claim an interest in the general state of goodness and true virtue, which I hear abounds in you, and only for that reason and without a second, ulterior motive, sir, I have done it.”

“This tale has lost you much of the recent trust I had in you,” Bonario said. “What you say is impossible. I don’t know how to believe that my father should be so unnatural as to disinherit me, his flesh and blood.”

“You have a confidence in your father that well becomes your filial piety,” Mosca said, “and it is formed, no doubt, from your own simple innocence, which makes the wrong done to you all the more monstrous and abhorred.”

“Simple” can mean “straightforward,” but Mosca was thinking of “simple-minded.”

Mosca continued, “But, sir, I now will tell you more. This very minute, the act of disinheriting you is now or soon will be happening, and if you shall only be pleased to go with me, I’ll bring you, I dare not say where you shall see, but where your ear shall be a witness of the deed. You will hear yourself written off as a bastard, and you will hear yourself proclaimed to be the common issue of the earth.”

“The common issue of the earth” means “of unknown parentage.”

“I am amazed!” Bonario said. “I am bewildered!”

“Sir, if I don’t do what I said I would do, draw your just sword, and mark your vengeance on my forehead and face

— mark me up as your villain. You are having too much wrong done to you, and I suffer for you, sir. My heart weeps blood in anguish —”

Bonario interrupted, “Lead. I will follow you.”

— 3.3 —

In a room in Volpone’s house stood Volpone, Nano the dwarf, Androgyno the hermaphrodite, and Castrone the eunuch.

Volpone said, “Mosca has stayed away for a long time, I think. Bring forth your skills in entertainment, and help to make the wretched time sweet. I am bored; entertain me.”

Volpone had sent Mosca to persuade Corvino to allow his wife to sleep with him. Volpone did not know about Mosca’s conversation with Bonario.

Nano the dwarf, Androgyno the hermaphrodite, and Castrone the eunuch performed a skit in which they competed to be Volpone’s favorite. In doing so, they were mocking the greedy legacy-hunters: Voltore, Corbaccio, and Corvino.

Nano the dwarf recited:

“Dwarf, fool, and eunuch, well met here we be.

“A question it were now, whether [which] of us three,

“Being all the known delicates [acknowledged darlings/favorites] of a rich man,

“In pleasing him, claim the precedency can?”

Castrone the eunuch recited:

“I claim for myself.”

Androgyno the hermaphrodite, who was the professional Fool of the group, recited:

“And so does the Fool.”

Nano the dwarf recited:

“It is foolish indeed. Let me set you both to school [instruct you both].

“First for your dwarf, he’s little and witty,

“And everything, as it is little, is pretty [the littler it is, the prettier it is];

“Else why do men say to a creature of my shape,

“So [As] soon as they see him, ‘It’s a pretty little ape’?

“And why a pretty ‘ape,’ but for pleasing imitation

“Of greater men’s actions, in a ridiculous fashion?”

Some dwarves made a living by imitating and mocking VIPs.

Nano the dwarf continued:

“Besides, this feat [dainty] body of mine does not crave

“Half the meat, drink, and cloth, one of your bulks [large bodies] will have.”

Nano the dwarf now began to talk about Androgyno the hermaphrodite, who was the professional Fool of the group:

“Admit [that] your Fool’s face be [is] the mother of laughter,

“Yet, [as] for his brain, it must always come after [be less important]:

“And though that [a funny face that causes laughter] do feed him, it is a pitiful case,

“His body is beholding [beholden] to such a bad face.”

Knocking sounded at the door.

“Who’s there?” Volpone said.

He then said, “I must go to my couch and appear to be ill.”

He then said to Androgyno the hermaphrodite and Castrone the eunuch, “Leave!”

Androgyno the hermaphrodite and Castrone the eunuch exited.

Volpone then said, “Go and look, Nano. See who it is. But give me my caps, first.”

Nano the dwarf handed him his two caps.

Volpone then said to him, “Go and enquire who it is.”

Nano the dwarf exited.

Volpone prayed to the god of love, “Now, may Cupid let the knocker be Mosca, and may Cupid let Mosca come with good news!”

The good news would be that Volpone could sleep with Corvino’s wife.

Nano the dwarf returned and said, “It is the beauteous madam —”

“Lady Would-be? Is it she?” Volpone asked.

Lady Would-be was not beauteous, but that was how she required people to announce her presence.

“The same,” Nano the dwarf replied.

“Now torment has come to me!” Volpone said.

He did not want to talk to her, but he had earlier told Mosca to tell her squire to tell her to come back later and visit him.

He said, “Escort her in because she will enter my room or dwell forever in the outer room. Bring her in quickly. The quicker she is here, the quicker she will leave.”

Nano the dwarf exited.

Volpone lay on the sleeping couch and said, “I wish that this hardship — her visit — were over. This is one Hell, and I fear a second Hell, too — I fear that my loathing this woman, Lady Would-be, will quite expel my appetite for the other woman, Celia. I wish that the tedious Lady Would-be were now taking her leave. Lord, what I am about to suffer threatens me!”

— 3.4 —

Nano the dwarf escorted Lady Would-be into the room. She resembled a parrot. Her dress was green with a red collar, and her nose was red from makeup.

“I thank you, good sir,” Lady Would-be said to Nano the dwarf. “Please signify to your patron that I am here.”

She looked at herself in a mirror and said, “The top of my dress does not show enough of my neck.”

The current Italian fashion was to wear a low-cut dress that displayed the breasts more than the English considered proper.

She said to Nano the dwarf, “I need to trouble you, sir. Let me request that you tell one of my women to come here to me.”

Nano the dwarf exited to carry out the request.

Looking at herself in the mirror again, Lady Would-be said sarcastically, “Truly, I am dressed most favorably, today! It doesn’t matter; it is good enough.”

In part, she meant that her waiting-women had not dressed her well, including dressing her hair.

The first waiting-woman and Nano the dwarf entered the room.

Looking in the mirror, Lady Would-be had noticed that the curls on the top of her head were uneven. One curl on the side of her head was higher than all the others.

She said to her waiting-woman about the uneven curls, “Look, and see these insolent, petulant things.”

She then said, “How could they have done this?”

“They” referred to both the waiting-women and the curls.

Volpone, unnoticed by Lady Would-be, said to himself, “I feel the fever entering my body at my ears.”

Unfortunately for him, it was not a sexual fever.

He added quietly, “Oh, for a charm to frighten it away.”

Lady Would-be said to the waiting-woman, “Come nearer. Is this curl in its right place, or is it in this place that you see? Why is this curl higher than all the rest? You have not yet washed your eyes! You can’t see because you still have sleep-gum in your eyes! Or are your eyes uneven in your head? Where is your fellow waiting-woman? Bring her to me.”

The first waiting-woman exited.

Nano the dwarf said to himself, “May St. Mark deliver us now! Soon, she will beat her serving-women because her nose is red.”

The first serving-woman returned with the second serving-woman.

Lady Would-be said, "Please look at my headdress and my hair, forsooth. Are all things apt, or no? Is everything in its right place?"

Pointing, the first serving-woman said, "One hair a little, here, sticks out, forsooth."

Lady Would-be said, "Does it, forsooth? And where was your dear sight, when it did so, forsooth! What! Are you bird-eyed?"

She said to the second serving-woman, "And are you bird-eyed, too?"

"Bird-eyed" meant "round-eyed." The serving-women were surprised and frightened at how seriously Lady Would-be was treating such a small thing.

Lady Would-be said to the two serving-women, "Please, both of you come to me and fix my hair."

They did.

Lady Would-be scolded them as if she were a professor and they were her pupils: "Now, by that light, I muse that you are not ashamed! I, who have preached these things so often to you, read you the principles, argued all the grounds and fundamentals, disputed the pros and cons of every fitness and every grace, called you to meetings to discuss my frequent hairdressing sessions —"

Nano the dwarf thought, She protects her hair more carefully than she does her reputation or honor.

Lady Would-be continued, "I have made you acquainted with what an ample dowry the knowledge of these things would be to you. With this knowledge of hairdressing, you would be able, alone, to get yourselves noble husbands at your return to England, and still you neglect to acquire that knowledge like this!

“Besides, you know what a curious and particular nation of people the Italians are. What will they say about me? They will say, ‘The English lady cannot dress herself.’ Here’s a fine imputation for our country of England to be charged with.

“Well, go your ways, and stay in the next room.

“This fucus — skin makeup — I am wearing is too coarse, too, but it doesn’t matter.”

She asked Nano the dwarf, “Good sir, will you entertain them?”

Nano the dwarf and the two waiting-women exited.

Lady Would-be had been so busy looking in the mirror and complaining to her serving-women that she had not noticed Volpone, who now said to himself, “The storm comes toward me.”

Seeing Volpone, Lady Would-be went over to him and asked, “How is my Volpone doing?”

“Troubled with noise, I cannot sleep,” Volpone replied. “I dreamt that a strange Fury entered, just now, my house, and with the dreadful tempest of her voice, she split my roof in two.”

A Fury is an avenging goddess. They especially take vengeance on people who tear families apart. When Orestes murdered his mother, the Furies pursued and tormented him. Volpone was very willing to tear Corvino’s marriage apart by sleeping with his wife, Celia.

Volpone was comparing Lady Would-be in part to the Fury. Furies keep their victims from finding any rest, and Lady Would-be was doing that to him.

Lady Would-be was oblivious to the hint that she was disturbing Volpone. Rather than listen to him, she immediately came up with something to say.

Believing that the topic of conversation was dreams, she said, “Believe me, I had the most fearful dream, if I could remember it.”

Volpone thought, Damn my fate! I have given her the opportunity to torment me. Now she will tell me her dream.

Lady Would-be said, “I thought that the golden mediocrity is polite and delicate —”

The “golden mediocrity” is the golden mean. Horace used the phrase “aurea mediocritas” in his Odes Book 2, Poem 10, line 5. The golden mean is the ideal moderate position that lies between two immoderate extremes. For example: Too little courage is cowardice. Too much courage is foolhardiness and rashness. The golden mean is true courage.

In this case, the “golden mediocrity” is a telling phrase. Most of the characters in Volpone are immoderately pursuing gold, and that leads to them being golden mediocrities. For example, rather than doing anything important with his life, Volpone spends much of his time pretending to be a very ill man even though this leads to a lack of freedom for him. Because he is supposed to be close to dying, he cannot leave his home unless he is in disguise.

Volpone said to Lady Would-be, “Oh, if you respect and love me, say no more. I sweat and I suffer at the mention of any dream. You can feel me to see how I am still trembling.”

Unfortunately, Volpone's mention of his trembling gave Lady Would-be the opportunity to diagnose the "illness" and to prescribe "cures."

"Alas, good soul!" she said. "You suffer from the passion — the suffering — of the heart."

This referred to heartburn and illnesses other than lovesickness affecting the heart.

She instantly began making recommendations of what she considered to be cures: "Seed-pearl would be good now, boiled with syrup of apples, tincture of gold, and coral, citron-pills, elicampane root, myrobalanes —"

Volpone thought, "Damn, I have taken a grasshopper by the wings!"

Grasshoppers make noise with their legs. Holding a grasshopper by the wings does not prevent it from making noise.

Although Volpone wanted Lady Would-be to leave, it seemed as if every word he said was making her stay.

Lady Would-be continued, "— burnt silk, and ambergris. You have good muscatel in the house —"

Ingredients for a cure were often crushed and mixed with muscatel wine for the ill person to drink.

Volpone asked, "Won't you have a drink, and then depart?"

It was customary for visitors ending their visit to be offered a drink before they left.

Lady Would-be said, "No, don't worry that I will do that."

She continued her list of cures: "I'm afraid that we won't be able to get some English saffron — half a dram would be enough. We also need sixteen cloves, a little musk, dried mints, bugloss, and barley-meal —”

Her “cures” were indiscriminate; they were used for a wide range of illnesses, including smallpox and depression, not just for heartburn and other heart ailments.

Volpone thought, She’s set off again! Before, I faked illnesses. Now, I feel as if I really have one!

Lady Would-be said, “And these ingredients need to be made into a poultice and applied with a true-scarlet cloth.”

Volpone thought, Another flood of words! A complete torrent!

Lady Would-be asked, “Shall I, sir, make you a poultice?”

“No, no, no,” Volpone said. “I am very well. You need prescribe no more medicines.”

“I have studied medicine a little,” Lady Politic said, “but now, I’m all for music, except I have an hour or two for painting in the mornings.

“I want ladies, indeed, to know all arts and letters, aka fine arts and the literary arts. She should be able to discourse, to write, and to paint, but principal in importance, as Plato holds, is music — and wise Pythagoras, I take it, believes the same thing. Music is the true rapture and harmony.

“When there is harmony in face, in voice, and clothes, that is, indeed, the female sex’s chiefest ornament.”

Harmony in face apparently includes even — not lopsided — curls, harmony in voice apparently includes talk, talk, talk, and harmony in clothes apparently includes low-cut dresses.

Volpone said, “The poet as old in time as Plato, and as knowing, says that the highest female grace is silence.”

In Sophocles' Ajax, as translated by R. C. Trevelyan, Tecmessa, Ajax' spear-bride, states that Ajax once told her, "Woman, silence is the grace of woman."

Lady Would-be asked, "Which of your poets? Petrarch, or Tasso, or Dante? Guarini? Ariosto? Aretine? Cieco d'Adria? I have read them all."

She was ignorant of exactly when Plato and these Italian writers lived. None of the writers she mentioned is "as old in time as Plato."

Plato (died 348-347 BCE) is famous for his Dialogues, many of which have Socrates as a main speaker. "Plato" means "broad." If you are not cynical, you can think of "broad-shouldered." If you are cynical, you can think of "fatso."

Francesco Petrarch (1304-1374) is a great Italian writer of love poetry.

Torquato Tasso (1544-1595) wrote the epic poem Gerusalemme Liberata about the First Crusade. In English, the title is Jerusalem Delivered.

Dante Alighieri (1265-1321), one of the greatest poets who ever lived, wrote The Divine Comedy, which consists of the Inferno, Purgatory, and Paradise. It describes his imaginative trip to the three destinations of the afterlife.

Battista Guarini (1537-1612) wrote the pastoral tragicomedy Il Pastor Fido. In 1602, it was translated into English as The Faithful Shepherd. Although Lady Would-be thought Guarini to be a contemporary of Plato, he was still alive at the time she was speaking.

Ludovico Ariosto (1474-1533) wrote Orlando Furioso about Charlemagne, Orlando (aka Roland), and the Franks, a collection of Germanic peoples.

Pietro Aretine (1492-1556), a satirist, wrote his “Sonnets of Lust” to accompany sixteen pornographic images by the artist Giulio Romano. The Italian title is Sonetti Lussuriosi.

Cieco d’Adria (1541-1585) was a playwright who also translated the first book of Homer’s Iliad. He is much less well known as an author than the other literary figures mentioned. Cieco d’Adria means “the blind man of Adria.” His real name is Luigi Groto. Adria is a town in the Veneto region of Northern Italy.

Volpone said to himself, “Is everything a cause to my destruction? Does everything I say cause her to talk and talk and talk?”

Lady Would-be said, “I think I have two or three of their books with me.”

Volpone said to himself, “The Sun and the sea will both stand still sooner than her eternal tongue; nothing can escape it.”

Lady Would-be found a book and said, “Here’s Battista Guarini’s Pastor Fido —”

Volpone said to himself, “Maintain an obstinate silence. That’s now my safest course of action.”

Lady Would-be said, “All our English writers, I mean such as are happy enough to be proficient in the Italian language, will deign to steal out of this author, Battista Guarini, mainly. They will steal from him almost as much as from Montagnié’s Essays.”

She pronounced the name Montaigne with too many syllables.

She continued, “Battista Guarini has so modern and facile a vein, befitting the time, and catching the court-ear!

“Petrarch is more passionate, yet he, in the days when writing sonnets was popular, entrusted English writers with much for them to imitate.

“Dante is hard, and few can understand him.

“For an outrageous wit, there’s Aretine, but his pictures are a little obscene.”

The pictures were actually by the artist Giulio Romano, and they were definitely pornographic.

Lady Would-be said to Volpone, who was maintaining an obstinate silence, “You aren’t listening to me.”

Volpone replied, “Alas, my mind is perturbed.”

Lady Would-be said, “Why, in such cases, we must cure ourselves. We must make use of our philosophy —”

“Oh, me!” Volpone groaned.

Lady Would-be continued, “— and as we find that our emotions strongly rebel, we must encounter them with reason, or divert them, by giving scope to some other emotion of lesser danger.”

If we are overcome by one emotion, we may be able to overcome it by reason, or by making an effort to feel another emotion. A person who feels too much melancholy may be able to realize rationally that things are better than they seem or to realize rationally that a certain plan of action will improve things, or may be able to perform some action — listen to music or take a walk, perhaps — that will relieve the melancholy.

Lady Would-be continued, “Just as, in political bodies, there’s nothing more that overwhelms the judgment, and clouds the understanding, than too much settling and fixing, and, as it were, subsiding upon one object.”

She was using alchemical terms. “Settling” refers to dregs settling in a liquid. “Fixing” refers to making a volatile substance not volatile. “Subsiding” refers to the precipitation of sediment. A political body can spend too much time on one issue. It can expend all its effort on the one issue and then subside into inaction. A more effective political body may work on more than one issue at a time and make incremental improvements on each issue.

Lady Would-be continued, “For the incorporating of these same outward things — these things that compete for our attention — into that part, which we call mental, leaves some certain dregs that stop the organs, and as Plato says, assassinate our knowledge.”

Plato wrote about the Theory of the Forms in his books, including The Republic. True reality is found in the Forms, such as the Form of Justice. What most people call reality, according to Plato, is only a reflection of true reality. Lady Would-be’s meaning is unclear. Perhaps she meant that people need to take time on think about more important matters. Concentrating on trivial things can be intellectually debilitating, and concentrating on the doing of immoral actions can be very spiritually debilitating. If so, she has made an important point. Concentrating on amassing wealth through immoral means is very debilitating; less debilitating is concentrating on whether one’s hairstyle has exactly even curls. Concentrating on achieving something of lasting positive importance can be intellectually and spiritually uplifting.

Volpone said to himself, “May the spirit of patience help me now!”

Lady Would-be said, “Come, truly I must visit you on more days and make you well. I need to make you laugh and be lusty.”

One meaning of “lusty” is “to be in vigorous good health.”

Volpone said to himself, “May my good angel save me!”

Lady Would-be said, “There was but one sole man in all the world with whom I ever could sympathize, and he would lie, often, three, four hours together to hear me speak, and he would be sometimes so rapt, that he would answer me quite from the purpose, with a non sequitur, like you, and you are like him, exactly.”

Apparently, the man either wasn’t paying attention to her conversation or wanted to get rid of her.

She continued, “I’ll tell you, if only for the purpose, sir, to make you fall asleep, how that man and I spent our time and loves together, for some six years.”

Volpone moaned one time for each of the six years: “Oh! Oh! Oh! Oh! Oh! Oh!”

Lady Would-be said, “For we were coetanei — the same age — and brought up —”

Volpone said to himself, “May some power, some fate, some fortune rescue me!”

— 3.5 —

Mosca entered the room and said, “May God save you, madam!”

“Good sir,” Lady Would-be said.

“Mosca?” Volpone said. “Welcome. Welcome to my redemption.”

Mosca went over to Volpone and asked, “What do you mean, sir?”

Volpone said quietly so that Lady Would-be would not hear, "Oh, rid me of this my torture, quickly. There she is: my madam, with the everlasting voice. The church bells, in times of pestilence, when they ring constantly to announce each new death from the plague, never made a noise like hers or were in perpetual motion like her tongue! The noise made in cockpits when cocks fight and men gamble is not close to the noise she makes. My entire house, just now, steamed like a bath because of her thick breath. A lawyer could not have been heard, nor scarcely another woman, such a hail of words she has let fall. For Hell's sake, make her leave my home."

Mosca asked, "Has she given you a present?"

Visitors, and especially visiting legacy-hunters, often gave Volpone presents.

"Oh, I do not care about a present from her," Volpone said. "I'll pay any price and suffer any loss for her absence."

Mosca said, "Madam —"

Lady Would-be now gave her present: "I have brought your patron a trifle, a cap here, with my own embroidery."

"That is good," Mosca said.

He added, "I forgot to tell you that I saw your husband the knight at a place where you would little think he would be."

"Where?" Lady Would-be asked.

"Indeed, where yet, if you make haste, you may find him," Mosca said. "He is rowing on the water in a gondola with the most skillful courtesan of Venice."

"Is that true?" Lady Would-be asked.

"Pursue them, and believe your own eyes," Mosca said. "Leave, and I will give your gift to my patron."

Lady Would-be exited hastily.

Mosca said to Volpone, "I knew that trick would work because it is common knowledge that those who give themselves the greatest freedom to flirt are always the most jealous."

Many Italian men were surprised at how much freedom Englishwomen had.

Volpone said, "Mosca, I give you hearty thanks for your quick lie to Lady Would-be and for your delivery of me.

"Now, about my hope to sleep with Celia, Corvino's wife, what news do you have?"

Lady Would-be reentered the room and said, "Listen to me, sir."

Volpone said to himself, "Again! I fear a paroxysm. Any more of this, and I will have a stroke."

Lady Would-be asked Mosca, "Which way did they row together? In which direction were they headed?"

"Toward the Rialto Bridge," Mosca replied.

"Please lend me your dwarf," Lady Would-be requested.

"Please take him," Mosca replied.

Lady Would-be exited.

Mosca said to Volpone, "Your hopes, sir, are like happy blossoms. They are fair, and they promise timely fruit, if you will wait for the ripening. Keep lying on your couch. Corbaccio will arrive quickly with the will. When he has gone, I'll tell you more."

Mosca exited.

Volpone said to himself, “My blood and my spirits are returned. I am alive, and like your reckless gamester, at the game of primero, whose thought had whispered to him, do not go less, I think that I lie, and draw, for an encounter.”

The terms he used were from the game of primero. “Not go less” meant either “not make a smaller bet” or “make the highest bet.” “Lie” meant “place the bet.” “Draw” meant “draw a card.” “Encounter” meant “have the cards for a winning hand.”

Volpone intended to go through with the seduction. He would lie on the couch and draw Celia toward him for a sexual encounter. He would not go for less than that.

— 3.6 —

Mosca and Bonario talked; they were within hearing distance of Volpone’s room.

Mosca showed Bonario a closet and said, “Sir, here you may be entirely concealed, but please have some patience, sir.”

Knocking sounded at the door.

Mosca said, “That is the way that your father knocks. I have to leave you.”

“Do so,” Bonario said.

Mosca exited.

Bonario said to himself, “Yet, I cannot imagine that this is true. I can’t believe that I am doing this, and I can’t believe that my father would disinherit me.”

He went into the closet.

Mosca answered the door and discovered that he had been mistaken. He had expected Bonario's father, Corbaccio, to come, and so he had thought that Corbaccio had knocked. Instead, Corvino and his wife, Celia, were at the door. This was contrary to Mosca's plan. He wanted Bonario to witness his father disinheriting him; he did not want Bonario to witness Volpone sleeping with Celia.

"Death on me!" Mosca said. "You have come too soon. Why did you? Didn't I say that I would send word to you about when to come?"

"Yes, but I feared that you might forget," Corvino said, "and then my rivals might strike first."

Mosca thought, They might strike first! Has a man ever been so eager to be given the horns of a cuckold! A courtier would not work this eagerly even for a sinecure — a position with much money but little work — at court!

He said, "Well, now there's no helping it. Stay here. I'll be right back."

He exited.

Corvino looked behind him and said, "Where are you, Celia? Do you know why I have brought you here?"

Celia replied, "Not well, except what you have told me."

Corvino said, "Now I will tell you in more detail. Come here and listen."

They talked together.

Mosca went to the closet in which Bonario was concealed and knocked.

Bonario opened the closet door, and Mosca said to him, “Sir, your father has sent word that it will be half an hour before he comes, and therefore, if you please to walk to that gallery at the upper end, there are some books to entertain you and pass the time, and I’ll take care that no man shall come and see you, sir.”

Bonario replied, “Yes, I will stay there.”

He thought, I don’t trust this fellow.

He exited.

Mosca watched him go and said to himself, “He is far enough away there that he can hear nothing. And, as for his father, I can keep him away until the right time.”

Mosca then went to Volpone’s room, where Volpone was lying on a couch, pretending to be ill. Mosca entered the room and went to him.

Meanwhile, Bonario returned and reentered the closet because he did not trust Mosca. Bonario could hear whatever happened in Volpone’s room.

Corvino and Celia argued as he forced her into Volpone’s room. Volpone and Mosca were able to overhear them.

Corvino said, “Now, there is no going back, and therefore, resolve upon doing what I tell you to do. I have so decreed: It must be done. Nor would I tell you before this because I wanted to avoid all shifts and tricks that might deny me what I want.”

Celia said, “Sir, let me beg you not to continue to make these strange trials of my chastity.”

Earlier, Corvino had said that he was testing her when he “pretended” to be jealous of her and the mountebank. Celia was hoping that this was another test.

She continued, "If you doubt my chastity, why, lock me up forever: Make me the heir of darkness. Let me live where I may set your jealous fears to rest, even if I don't have your trust."

"Believe it, I have no such jealousy," her husband said. "All that I speak I mean, yet I'm not mad. Nor am I horn-mad, do you see?"

A horn-mad man was afraid of being cuckolded, or he was angry at being cuckolded. Corvino was acting in such a way that it seemed he wanted his wife to cuckold him, and so he was not horn-mad.

He said, "Show me that you are an obedient wife."

"Oh, Heaven!" Celia said.

"I say to you that I want you to do this," Corvino said.

"Is this a trap you have set for me?" Celia asked.

"I've told you the reasons for doing this," her husband said. "The physicians have determined that Volpone is impotent and is dying."

So Corvino had been led to believe.

He continued, "Volpone's death and his will concern me very much. I have made commitments in this business venture: I have given many expensive gifts to Volpone, and it is a necessity for me to regain those gifts and a profit in the form of a legacy. Therefore, if you are my loyal wife, be won over to my side and respect my venture by doing what I tell you to do."

"Should I respect your venture more than I respect your honor?" Celia asked. "Is your financial venture more important than your honor?"

“What is ‘honor’?” Corvino asked. “Tut, it is only a breath. There’s no such thing in nature. ‘Honor’ is a mere term invented to awe fools. What! Is my gold the worse because other people have touched it? Are my clothes the worse because other people have looked at them? Why, this is no more.”

No more? He meant that his wife would be no worse should Volpone touch her and see her in bed. She would also be no worse if she slept with Volpone.

Corvino continued, “Volpone is an old decrepit wretch, and he has lost the use of his senses. He has no strength. He has to be fed his food with other people’s fingers. All he knows is to open his mouth when his gums are scalded with hot food. Volpone is only a voice, a shadow. How can this man hurt you?”

Celia prayed, “Lord, what evil spirit has entered my husband?”

Corvino said, “And as for being worried about your reputation, that’s such a laughable excuse. As if I would go and tell what you will have done, and shout it out loud on the Piazza! Who shall know what you will have done, except Volpone, who cannot speak and tell anyone about it, and this fellow Mosca, whose lips are in my pocket? He serves me, and so he will be quiet about this. Unless you yourself proclaim what you will have done, I know no other way that others shall come to know about it.”

Celia asked, “Are Heaven and saints then nothing? Will they be too blind to see this, or too stupid to understand what they see?”

“What!” Corvino said.

“Good sir,” Celia said, “continue to be jealous about me. Emulate Heaven and the saints. Think about what hate they burn with toward every sin.”

“I grant that if I thought this were a sin, I would not urge you to commit it,” Corvino said. “If I would offer this to some young Frenchman, or some hot Tuscan blood who had read Aretine, conned all his pornographic prints, knew every twist and turn within lust’s labyrinth, and were a professed expert in lechery, and if I would look upon him and applaud him, then this would be a sin.

“But this here is the contrary of a sin. It is a pious work, a good deed, and complete charity that will help an ill man, and it is an honorable course of action to assure that I will get my own.”

What he considered “his own” were the gifts he had given to Volpone and the legacy he expected to receive when Volpone died.

“Oh, Heaven!” Celia said. “Can you, Heaven, endure such a change as this that has occurred in my husband?”

Corvino had gone from being overly jealous of his wife to being overly eager to place her in a position in which she could willingly commit adultery — or be raped.

Volpone said quietly, “You are my honor, Mosca, and my pride, my joy, my tickling, my delight! Go and bring them near.”

Mosca went to Corvino and said, “Please come near, sir.”

Corvino said to Celia, “Come on.”

She stood still, and he said, “What! I won’t allow you to be rebellious! By that light —”

Mosca said to Volpone, “Sir, Signior Corvino has come here to see you.”

“Oh!” Volpone said weakly.

Mosca said, “And hearing about the medical consultation held so recently about your health, he has come to offer, or rather, sir, to prostitute —”

One meaning, now obsolete, of “to prostitute” was “to offer selflessly with complete devotion.”

“Thanks, sweet Mosca,” Corvino said.

Mosca continued, “— freely, unasked, and untreated —”

“That is well said,” Corvino said.

Mosca continued, “— as the true fervent instance of his love for you, his own most fair and proper wife, the beauty only of price in Venice —”

Celia was Corvino’s fair and proper wife. She was beautiful, she was his legally married wife, and she was proper in her behavior. She was seemly, decorous, and respectable. To Corvino, however, she was “only of price.” What he valued was only the wealth she could bring him by sleeping with Volpone.

“Only of price” also means “unique in value.”

Corvino said to Mosca, “You have stated that well.”

Mosca continued, “— to be your female comforter, and to preserve and save you.”

Volpone said weakly, “Alas, I am already past being saved!”

Some readers may agree.

He continued, “Please thank him for his good care and promptness, but despite his good care and promptness, it is a vain labor even to fight against Heaven, and to apply fire to stone —”

He broke out in a fit of coughing: “Uh! Uh! Uh! Uh!”

“To apply fire to stone” was an expression denoting uselessness. It is useless to apply fire to stone in an attempt to make the stone catch on fire.

However, “stone” was also a slang word meaning “testicle,” and bringing Celia to Volpone was applying sexual fire to Volpone’s testicles.

Volpone had started coughing in order to keep himself from laughing at his own pun.

Volpone continued, “— or to make a dead leaf grow again.”

A part of Volpone’s body that was supposed to be dead would start to grow again if Volpone were left alone with Celia, if Volpone had his way, and his way with her.

Volpone continued, “I take his wishes kindly, though, and you may tell him what I have done for him.”

Corvino listened closely, thinking that Volpone had definitely made him his heir.

Volpone continued, “Indeed, my state is hopeless. I wish for him to pray for me, and to use his fortune with reverence, when he comes to have it.”

“Reverence” means “deep respect.” Corvino’s actions showed that he had no reverence for Volpone, Celia, or God.

Mosca said to Corvino, “Did you hear that, sir? Go to him with your wife.”

Corvino tried to make Celia go over to Volpone’s bed, but she resisted.

He swore, "Heart of my father! Will you persist in being thus obstinate? Come, please, come. You can see that it is nothing, Celia."

He meant that she could see that Volpone was too ill to be able to engage in sex.

Corvino continued, "By this hand—"

He raised his hand in the air and threatened her with it.

He continued, "— I swear that I shall grow violent. Come, do it, I say."

"Sir, kill me, instead," Celia said. "I will swallow poison, eat burning coals, do anything —"

Corvino interrupted, "Be damned! Sweetheart, I'll drag you away from here to home, by the hair. I will cry out in the streets that you are a strumpet. I will rip your face from your mouth to your ears, and I will slit your nose like I would slit the nose of a raw rotchet!"

A rotchet is a fish that is now called the red gurnard. Its head is bony, and to cut it requires much force.

He continued, "Do not provoke me. Come, yield to me, I am loath —"

He was loathsome.

Corvino continued, "By God's death I swear I will buy some slave whom I will kill, and I will bind you — alive — to him, and I will hang you outside my window. I will imagine some monstrous crime that I, in capital letters, will use acid and burning corrosives to eat into the flesh of your stubborn breast. Now, by the blood you have incensed in me, I'll do it!"

"Sir, what you please, you may do," Celia replied. "I am your martyr."

“Don’t be obstinate like this,” her husband said. “I have not deserved it. Think who it is who is entreating you to do this. Please, sweetheart, you shall indeed have jewels, gowns, clothing and headdresses. Think of what you want, and ask for it. Only go and kiss him, or just touch him ... for my sake ... at my request ... just this once. You won’t! No! You will not! I shall remember this. Will you disgrace me thus? Do you crave — thirst for — my undoing, my ruination?”

Mosca said to Celia, “Gentle lady, be persuaded.”

“No, no,” Corvino said. “She has watched for the right time she can strike and ruin me. By God’s precious blood, this action of hers is scurvy, it is very scurvy, and you, Celia, are —”

“Be calm, good sir,” Mosca said.

Corvino continued, “—an arrant locust, by Heaven, a locust! A plague of locusts! Whore, crocodile, you who have prepared your tears in advance, anticipating the best time that you can let them flow —”

Crocodiles were thought to cry tears in order to draw their prey toward them. Earlier, Mosca had shed tears in order to manipulate Bonario.

“Please, sir,” Mosca said. “She will consider your request.”

Celia said, “I wish that the loss of my life would serve to satisfy —”

“By God’s death!” Corvino swore. “If she would just speak to him, and save my reputation, it would be something, but she spitefully desires my utter ruination!”

Mosca said, “It is true that you have now put your fortune in her hands.”

In other words, Celia must sleep with Volpone, or Corvino will be ruined.

Mosca continued, “Why, truly she is holding back because of her modesty. I must acquit her of having any other motivation. If you were absent, she would be more forthcoming.”

He thought, And she would be more cumming.

He continued, “I know it, and I dare undertake to say that for her. What woman can before her husband?”

Can what? Commit adultery.

Mosca continued, “Please, let us depart, and leave her here.”

Corvino said, “Sweet Celia, you may still redeem everything. I’ll say no more. If you don’t, consider yourself as lost.”

Corvino and Mosca began to leave.

Celia tried to follow them, but her husband ordered her, “No, stay there.”

Corvino and Mosca exited.

Celia said to herself, “Oh, God, and His good angels! To where, where, has shame fled from human breasts? How is it possible that with such ease men dare put off your — God’s and the good angels’ — honors, and their own? Is honorable marriage, which always was a cause of life — a reason to live, and an honorable way to bring children into the world — now placed beneath the basest circumstance? Is honorable marriage now valued less than the worst situation? And has modesty been made an exile because of money?”

Volpone said with vigorous good health, “Yes, in the case of Corvino, and other such earth-fed minds —”

He jumped off the couch and continued “— who have never tasted the true Heaven of love. Assure yourself, Celia, that he who would sell you only for the hope of gain — and that hope uncertain — would have sold his portion of Paradise for ready money, if he had met a merchant who would buy it.”

Celia, of course, was amazed to see Volpone’s vigorous good health.

Volpone asked, “Why are you amazed to see me thus revived? You should rather applaud the miracle that your beauty has made; my revival is your great work. Your beauty has, not just now, but many times raised me, in several shapes.”

One shape was the form of an erect penis; the other shape was the disguise of a mountebank. He was lying that he had assumed additional shapes, aka figures, aka disguises, to see her.

He continued, “Just this morning, I assumed the disguise of a mountebank in order to see you at your window. Yes, before I would have stopped my scheming for your love, in varying figures, I would have contended with the blue Proteus, or the horned flood.”

Proteus was a sea-god who was a shape-shifter. In Homer’s Odyssey, Menelaus tells a story of sneaking up on Proteus and holding on to him as he changed shapes and tried to escape. After Proteus gave up trying to escape, he answered Menelaus’ questions. As a sea-god, Proteus was sea-colored, aka blue.

In this culture, rivers were often called floods. The horned flood referred to was the shape-shifting river-god Achelous. Hercules and Achelous fought over the mortal woman Deianira. Achelous assumed three shapes — a bull, a snake, and a man with an ox-like face — but Hercules defeated each shape.

Volpone said, “Now you are welcome.”

“Sir!” Celia said, backing away from him as he advanced toward her.

“No, don’t flee from me,” Volpone said. “And don’t let your false imagination that I was bedridden make you think I am so. You shall not find that to be true. I am now as fresh, as hot, as high, and in as Jovian a situation as when, in that so celebrated scene, at the recitation of our comedy, for the entertainment of the great Valois, I acted the part of young Antinous and attracted the eyes and ears of all the ladies present — they admired each of my graceful gestures, notes, and movements.”

A typical Jovian situation is one in which Jove, King of the gods, transforms himself into another shape in order to commit adultery — often consisting of rape — with a mortal woman. For example, he transformed into a swan in order to have sex with Leda, who gave birth to Castor and Pollux, and he transformed into a shower of gold in order to have sex with Semele, who became the mother of Bacchus.

The “great Valois” is Henry of Valois, who became King Henry III of France. When his brother King Charles IX of France died without leaving children in 1574, Henry returned to France. He traveled through Venice, where he was royally entertained, including with theatrical entertainments.

Antinous was a beautiful young man who was a favorite of the Roman Emperor Hadrian. Henry of Valois was thought to be a transvestite who would have enjoyed looking at — and perhaps more — the beautiful young man.

Volpone thought of Jove — and himself — as so good-looking that women found themselves attracted to them. But Jove often committed rape.

Volpone now sang this song:

“Come, my Celia, let us prove [try],

“While we can, the sports of love,

“Time will not be ours forever,

“He [Time], at length, our good [well-being] will sever;

“Spend not then his gifts in vain;

“Suns, that set, may rise again:

“But if once we lose this light,

“It is with us perpetual night [death].

“Why should we defer our joys?

“Fame [Reputation] and rumor [gossip] are but toys [trifles].

“Cannot we delude the eyes

“Of a few poor household spies?

“Or his [Corvino’s] easier ears beguile,

“Thus removed [not present] by our wile [trick]? —

“It is no sin love’s fruits to steal:

“But the sweet thefts to reveal;

“To be taken [caught in the act], to be seen,

“These have crimes accounted been.”

This was a carpe diem — seize the day — song. Soon we will die, and therefore we ought to enjoy what pleasure we can. It was also a seduction song arguing that it is not the committing of adultery that is wrong — instead, getting caught committing adultery is wrong.

Celia prayed, “May some malignant mist blast me or some dire lightning strike this my offending face!”

Her face offended her because its beauty was causing Volpone to act like a beast.

“Why droops my Celia?” Volpone said. “You have, in place of a base husband, found a worthy lover. Use your fortune well, with secrecy and pleasure.”

He opened his treasure chest and said, “Look and behold what you are Queen of, not merely in expectation, as I feed the hope of expectation to others; instead, you are definitely possessed of this treasure, and you are crowned as its Queen.”

Volpone held a necklace and said, “Look! Here is a pearl necklace. Each pearl is more valuable than that pearl the brave Egyptian queen caroused with. Dissolve these pearls and drink them.”

Cleopatra, Queen of Egypt, once dissolved a very valuable pearl in vinegar and drank it in order to impress Mark Antony. Things ended badly for them; both of them committed suicide.

Volpone held some jewels and said, “Look! Here is a ruby that may put out both the eyes of our St. Mark of Venice.”

The ruby was so valuable that, according to Volpone, it could bribe even a saint to close his eyes and not see adultery being committed under his nose.

Volpone continued, “Here is a diamond that would have bought Lollia Paulina, when she came in like starlight, hidden under jewels that were the spoils of provinces.”

Lollia Paulina, wife of the Roman Emperor Caligula, wore alternate layers of emeralds and pearls “upon her head, in her hair, in her wreaths, in her ears, upon her neck, in her bracelets, and on her fingers,” according to the Roman historian Pliny. Her grandfather had taken the jewels from the provinces he ruled. Things ended badly for all of these people. Caligula was assassinated, and both Lollia and her grandfather committed suicide.

Volpone continued, “Take these jewels and wear and lose them. There still remains an earring valuable enough to purchase them again, and this whole state of Venice.”

His words were ambiguous. They could have meant that there still remained an earring that was valuable enough to purchase again the lost jewels as well as the whole state of Venice (in which case, he was lying), or his words could have meant there still remains a valuable earring and there still remains the whole state of Venice.

He continued, “A gem that is worth only an individual person’s entire estate is nothing: We will eat the value of such a gem at a single meal. The heads of parrots, the tongues of nightingales, and the brains of peacocks and ostriches shall be our food, and if we could get the phoenix, although the bird would become extinct, it would be our dish.”

The phoenix is a mythical bird of Arabia. Only one exists at a time, and every five hundred years it sets itself on fire and is reborn from the ashes. Since only one phoenix exists, if Volpone and Celia were to eat it, it would become extinct.

Celia said, “Good sir, these things might move a mind affected by such delights, but I, whose innocence is all I can think is valuable, or worth the enjoying, and which, once lost, I have nothing to lose beyond it, cannot be captured with these sensual baits. If you have a conscience —”

Volpone interrupted, “A conscience is the beggar’s virtue. If you have wisdom, listen to me, Celia. Your baths shall be the juice of July-flowers and of the spirit of roses and of violets, the milk of unicorns, and panthers’ breath gathered in bags, and mixed with Cretan wines.”

July-flowers are clove-scented pinks, unicorns are mythological beings associated with virgins, panthers were believed to have sweet breath that attracted prey, and wine from Crete was expensive.

He continued, “Our drink shall be prepared with gold and ambergris, which we will drink until my roof whirls round with the vertigo. And my dwarf shall dance, my eunuch shall sing, and my Fool shall make up the antic, aka grotesque dance, while we, in changed shapes, will enact Ovid’s tales of changes and metamorphoses. Now you shall be like Europa, and I will be like Jove.”

Europa was a Phoenician woman whom Jove, King of the gods, lusted after. He transformed himself into a white bull, Europa climbed onto his back, and he kidnapped her by running into the ocean and swimming to Crete, where he either seduced or raped her. She became the first Queen of Crete and the mother of Minos. Europe is named after her.

Volpone continued, “Then I will be like Mars, and you will be like Erycine.”

Erycine is a name for Venus, goddess of sexual passion. A temple on Mount Eryx in Sicily was dedicated to her. In Homer’s Odyssey, a blind bard sings a story of how the two immortals had an affair, which ended badly for them. Being immortal, Mars and Venus cannot die, but Venus’ husband, Vulcan, discovered the affair and set a trap for them. While they were having sex, he threw fine chains over them, netting and trapping them. Then he called over the gods and goddesses to look at and laugh at the unhappy adulterers. The goddesses were embarrassed and stayed home, but the gods came to jeer and mock and laugh. By the way, the immortals' Greek names are Ares (Mars), Aphrodite (Venus), and Hephaestus (Vulcan).

Volpone continued, "We will change into the shapes of all the rest of the lovers in Ovid's Metamorphoses until we have quite run through them and wearied all the fables of the gods.

"Then I will have you sexually in more modern forms. You will be attired like some sprightly dame of France, a splendid Tuscan lady, or a proud Spanish beauty. Sometimes, you will seem to be the Persian Shah's wife, or the Grand Signior of Turkey's mistress, and for a change you will appear to be one of Venice's most skillful courtesans, or some sexually quick and lively Negro, or a cold Russian, and I will meet you sexually in as many shapes where we may so transfuse our wandering souls" — he kissed her, an act that in the case of spiritual love involved an interchange of souls — "out at our lips, and score up such sums of pleasures —"

He sang these lines:

"That the curious shall not know

"How to tell [count] them as they flow;

"And the envious, when they find

"What their number is, will be pined [pained]."

They would kiss so many times that curious onlookers would not be able to count them and envious people, once they found out the number of kisses, would feel pain.

As she tried to escape from Volpone's advances, Celia pleaded, "If you have ears that will be pierced — or eyes that can be opened — or a heart that may be touched — or any part that yet proclaims manhood about you —”

Volpone would think that his penis proclaims his manhood, but for Celia true manhood lay in spiritual strength.

She continued, “— if you have the slightest trace of the purity of the holy saints — or of Heaven — give me mercy and let me escape — if not, be bountiful and kill me. You know that I am a creature, here ill betrayed by one — my husband — whose shame I would like to forget it is.

“If you will deign to give me neither of these graces, yet feed your wrath, sir, rather than your lust — wrath is a vice that comes closer to manliness — and punish that unhappy crime of nature, that crime which you miscall my beauty. Skin my face, or poison it with ointments, as a punishment for its seducing your blood and passion to this rebellion against ethical conduct. Rub these hands of mine with something that may cause an eating leprosy all the way down to my bones and marrow. Do anything that will disfigure me, except when it comes to my honor — and I will kneel to you, I will pray for you, I will make a thousand hourly vows, sir, for your health, and I will report to everyone — and believe it, too — that you are virtuous —”

The thought of his being virtuous enraged Volpone, who considered it a charge of impotence.

He said, “Do you think that I am cold, frozen, and impotent, and so you will report that to everyone? You seem to think that I have Nestor’s hernia.”

Nestor was an old Greek advisor to Agamemnon, leader of the Greek troops during the Trojan War. The Roman satirist Juvenal wrote much later that Nestor had a hernia. Some hernias occur in the groin.

Volpone said, “I degenerate and abuse my nation by playing with opportunity thus long.”

By “degenerate and abuse my nation,” he meant that he had not been acting as macho as he felt Italian men should act.

He continued, “I should have done the act of sex with you, and then have conversed with you. Yield to me, or I’ll force you — I’ll rape you!”

He grabbed her.

Celia prayed, “Oh, just God!”

Volpone said, “You pray in vain.”

Bonario had been listening. Now he rushed in and separated Volpone and Celia, saying, “Forbear, foul ravisher, libidinous swine! Free the forced lady, or you die, impostor. Except that I’m loath to snatch your punishment out of the hand of justice, you would yet be made the timely sacrifice of vengeance before this altar and this dross, your idol.”

The altar was Volpone’s treasure chest, and the dross was his gold.

Bonario said to Celia, “Lady, let’s leave this place; it is the den of villainy. Fear nothing, you have a guard: me. And he, Volpone, before long, shall meet his just reward.”

Bonario wanted a law court to justly punish Volpone.

Bonario and Celia exited.

Volpone cried, “Fall on me, roof, and bury me in ruin. Become my grave, you that were my shelter! Oh, I am unmasked, dispirited and flaccid, undone and ruined, betrayed to beggary, betrayed to infamy —”

Mosca entered the room. His face was bleeding where Bonario had wounded him.

He said, “Where shall I, the most wretched shame of men, run so I can beat out my unlucky brains?”

“Here, here,” Volpone said, intending to comfort Mosca, but unintentionally answering his question. “What! Are you bleeding?”

“Oh, I wish that Bonario’s well-driven sword had been so good as to have cleft me down to the navel before I lived to see my life, my hopes, my spirits, my patron, all thus desperately entangled as a result of my error!”

“Woe on your fortune!” Volpone said.

“And on my follies, sir,” Mosca said.

“You have made me miserable,” Volpone said.

Mosca had arranged for Celia to come to Volpone. Mosca would also claim to not know that Bonario had hidden himself and eavesdropped on Volpone and Celia.

“And I have made myself miserable, sir,” Mosca said. “Who would have thought that Bonario would have eavesdropped, so?”

“What shall we do?” Volpone asked.

“I don’t know,” Mosca said. “If my heart could expiate — do penance for — this mischance, I’d pluck it out. Will you please hang me? Or cut my throat? And I’ll requite you, sir; I’ll do the same for you. Let us die like Romans, since we have lived like Grecians.”

The Greeks had a reputation for extravagant and reckless living. The Romans had a reputation for dying with honor; some famous Romans had preferred to commit suicide rather than surrender. For example, Cato the Younger had committed suicide rather than surrender to Julius Caesar. Also, Brutus and Cassius committed suicide rather than surrender to Octavian Caesar.

Knocking sounded on the door.

“Listen,” Volpone said to Mosca. “Who’s there? I hear some footsteps. Venetian police officers have come to apprehend us! I feel the brand hissing already at my forehead; now, my ears are boring.”

A Venetian punishment was to brand offenders, often on the forehead. A short while ago, Celia had asked Volpone if he had ears that could be pierced — by her words. Now, his ears were boring — making a hole in themselves. Now, he was wishing that he had listened to her.

Mosca said, “Go to your couch, sir. You must make that place good, whatever it takes. You must keep up the pretense of being an invalid.”

Volpone lay down on the couch.

Mosca said, “Guilty men always dread and anticipate what they deserve.”

— 3.9 —

Mosca opened the door and said, “Signior Corbaccio!”

Corbaccio, Bonario’s elderly father, walked into the room.

Seeing Mosca’s bloody face, Corbaccio said, “Why, what has happened, Mosca?”

The legacy-hunter Voltore arrived and stood in the doorway, unnoticed.

“Oh, I am ruined, amazed, and confused, sir,” Mosca said. “Your son, I don’t know how, became aware of your changing your will and changing it to make my patron and not him your heir. Bonario violently entered our house, and with his sword drawn he sought you, called you an unnatural wretch, and vowed that he would kill you.”

In Mosca’s story, Bonario regarded his father as unnatural because his father was disinheriting him. It’s natural for parents to take care of their children and make them their heirs.

“Kill me!” Corbaccio said.

“Yes, and he said that he would kill my patron,” Mosca said.

“This act shall disinherit him indeed,” Corbaccio said.

He gave Mosca a paper and said, “Here is my will naming Volpone as my heir.”

Originally, the will was supposed to be a ruse to get Volpone to reciprocate by naming Corbaccio as his heir, but now Corbaccio really intended to disinherit his own son.

“This is good, sir,” Mosca said. “It is in the proper legal form.”

“It is right and well,” Corbaccio said. “Be you as careful now for me. Look after my interests.”

“My life, sir, will not be treated with more tender concern than I will have for your interests,” Mosca said. “I am only yours.”

“How is Volpone?” Corbaccio asked. “Will he die shortly, do you think?”

“I fear that he’ll outlast May,” Mosca said.

The hard-of-hearing Corbaccio asked, “Today?”

“No, I fear that he will live through May, sir.”

“Can’t you give him a dram?” Corbaccio asked.

A dram is a measure of liquid medicine, but Mosca understood that Corbaccio meant liquid poison.

Mosca replied, “Oh, by no means, sir.”

“I’ll not beg you to,” Corbaccio said.

Voltore stepped into the room and said, referring to Mosca, “This is a knave, I see.”

Seeing Voltore for the first time, Mosca thought, What! Signior Voltore! Did he overhear me?

Voltore hissed, “Parasite!”

Mosca said, “Who’s that? Oh, sir, you have come at a very good time.”

He walked over to Voltore so that Corbaccio could see but not hear them.

“I am scarcely in time to discover your tricks, I fear,” Voltore said. “You are only his? And you are only mine, also? Isn’t that right?”

“Who?” Mosca said. “I, sir?”

“You, sir,” Voltore said. “What plot is this about a will?”

“It is a plot to benefit you, sir,” Mosca said.

“Come on,” Voltore said. “Don’t put your foists upon me; I shall scent them.”

The word “foist” means both “trick” and “silent fart.” The name “Voltore” means “vulture,” and vultures have a keen sense of smell.

“Didn’t you hear the plot?” Mosca asked.

“Yes, I heard that Corbaccio has made your patron there” — he pointed to Volpone — “his heir.”

“That is true,” Mosca said. “This happened as a result of my action. He was persuaded to make the will by my plot, with the hope —”

Voltore interrupted, “— that your patron should reciprocate and make Corbaccio his heir? And you have promised Corbaccio that that will happen?”

“Yes, I did that for your benefit, I did, sir,” Mosca said. “Even more, I told his son and brought and hid him here, where he might hear his father give the deed to me. I was determined to do this course of action by the thought, sir, that the unnaturalness (it is unnatural for a father to disinherit a son), first, of the act, and then his father’s often disclaiming Bonario as his biological son would surely enrage Bonario (a rage that I intended to inflame) and make him do some violence upon his parent. Because of that violence, the law would take sufficient hold on Bonario to deny him the inheritance, and you would be instated in a double hope.”

Mosca was saying that Bonario would kill Corbaccio, his father. Volpone would then inherit Corbaccio’s wealth, and after Volpone died, Voltore would inherit the wealth of both Corbaccio and Volpone.

Apparently, Mosca really did want Bonario to kill Corbaccio; this would allow Volpone to immediately inherit Corbaccio’s wealth. Mosca was willing to be not only a pimp for Volpone but also an accessory to murder.

Mosca said, “With truth as my comfort and my conscience, I swear that my only aim was to dig you a fortune out of these two old rotten sepulchers —”

Mosca was comparing Corbaccio and Volpone to old rotten sepulchers that contained wealth — wealth that would be robbed from the sepulchers.

Voltore said, “I beg your pardon, Mosca.”

Mosca continued, “— a fortune worth your patience, and your great merit, sir. But see the change that Bonario has created in my plan!”

“Why, what happened?” Voltore asked.

“Misfortune,” Mosca said. “You must help, sir. While we were awaiting the old raven, Corbaccio, in comes Corvino’s wife, sent here by her husband —”

“What, with a present?” Voltore asked.

“No, sir, she was visiting,” Mosca said. “I’ll tell you why, soon. Because she stayed a long time, the young Bonario grew impatient, rushed forth, seized the lady, wounded me, and made her swear — or he would murder her, that was his vow — to charge that my patron, Volpone, tried to rape her.”

Mosca pointed to Volpone, who was lying on the couch, pretending to be a very ill old man, and said, “You can see how unlikely it is that he would attempt to rape her!”

He then continued, “And now with that pretext he’s gone away from here to accuse his father, defame my patron, and defeat you in the matter of a legacy from Volpone.”

“Where is her husband?” Voltore said. “Let him be sent for immediately.”

“Sir, I’ll go and fetch him,” Mosca said.

“Bring him to the Scrutineo.”

Voltore, a lawyer, was very familiar with the Scrutineo, the law court in the Senate House.

“Sir, I will,” Mosca said.

“This must be stopped,” Voltore said.

“Oh, you do nobly, sir,” Mosca said. “Alas, all this was labored, sir, for your good, nor was there any lack of sagacity and planning in the plot. But fortune can, at any time, overthrow the projects of a hundred learned scholars, sir.”

The hard-of-hearing Corbaccio asked, “What’s that?”

Voltore asked him, “Will it please you, sir, to go along with me?”

Voltore and Corbaccio exited.

Mosca said to Volpone, “Patron, go in and pray for our success.”

Volpone rose from the couch and said, “Need makes devotion: People pray most when they most need help. May Heaven bless your labor!”

ACT 4 (Volpone, or the Fox)

— 4.1. —

Sir Politic Would-be and Peregrine talked while standing on a street.

Sir Politic Would-be said, referring to the episode with the mountebank (but his words were appropriate to the just-finished episode of Volpone and Celia), “I told you, sir, it was a plot! You see what observation is! You see what keeping your eyes open can do for you!”

He added, “You mentioned to me that you had the need for some instructions about traveling. Since we have met here in this height, aka latitude, of Venice, I will tell you, sir, a few particulars I have set down that are relevant only for this meridian of Venice and are fit to be known by your inexperienced traveller, and they are these that I will tell you. I will not touch, sir, on your language or your clothes, for they are old.”

Sir Politic Would-be was using the word “your” indefinitely — “your clothes” meant the clothing of travelers in general. This use of “your” was an affectation that then-travelers to Venice picked up, but in order to make a joke, Peregrine pretended that Sir Politic Would-be was criticizing his clothes.

“Sir, I have better clothes,” Peregrine said.

Sir Politic Would-be said, “I meant, as they are themes, aka topics. Language and clothes are old themes that have been much talked about, and so travelers tend to know much about them.

“Oh, sir, proceed,” Peregrine said. “I’ll slander you no more of wit, good sir.”

His last sentence was ambiguous. Sir Politic Would-be understood it to mean this: I won't misrepresent what you say in order to make a joke. Peregrine meant this: I won't slander you by saying that you have wit.

Sir Politic Would-be said, "First, as for your demeanor, you must be grave and serious, very reserved, and closed-mouthed. Do not tell a secret on any terms, not even to your father. You can just barely tell a fable, aka fictitious story, but use caution: Make sure choice both of your company and of your discourse. Be careful that you never speak a truth —"

"What!" Peregrine said.

Sir Politic Would-be continued, "Don't tell the truth to foreigners, for those are the people you must most converse with. Others — travelers from Britain — I would not know, sir, except at a distance, so that I still might be a saver in them. Otherwise, you shall have tricks passed upon you hourly."

A saver is a gambler who neither wins nor loses, but comes out even. By avoiding travelers from his own country — Sir Politic Would-be ignored his own advice when it came to Peregrine — he lost what could have been new friends, but he saved money that he could have lost if he had given them loans. (Sir Politic Would-be spent much time thinking about money; he had taken out loans from the Jewish moneylenders of Venice.)

He added, "And then, as for your religion, profess none, but wonder at the diversity of all religions, and, for your part state that if there were no other than simply the laws of the land, you could be happy. Nick Machiavelli and Monsieur Bodin were both of this mind."

Sir Politic Would-be advised professing to be an atheist as a way of keeping out of trouble while traveling in Venice. At the time, much anti-Catholic feeling was current in England, and Protestant English rulers worried that English travelers might acquire what the rulers considered to be bad religious thought in Catholic countries such as Italy.

Niccolo Machiavelli wrote in The Prince that political goals came before religious goals. Jean Bodin argued in La Republique that to avoid civic unrest political rulers ought to be religiously tolerant. It is wrong to say that these authors advocated atheism.

Of course, believers consider it a virtue not to hide their religion.

Sir Politic Would-be continued, “Then you must learn the use and handling of your silver fork at meals and the metal of your glass (these are important matters to your Italian) and to know the hour when you must eat your melons and your figs.”

Forks were still not widely used in England at the time, but they would be in a few years. Venice was famous for its glassware, and the “metal” of the glass referred to the quality of the molten glass used to make the glassware.

“Is that a point of state, aka a point of diplomacy, too?” Peregrine asked.

“Here in Venice it is,” Sir Politic Would-be said. “As for your Venetian, if he sees a man who is even a little bit preposterous and not behaving in the conventionally correct manner, he immediately makes a judgment about his character, and he strips him of his dignity by taunting him.”

Actually, that is true of many people other than Venetians. It was true of Peregrine, for example, as events have already and would soon show.

Sir Politic Would-be continued, “I’ll acquaint you, sir, with the knowledge that I now have lived here some fourteen months since the first week of my landing here. Everyone took me for a citizen of Venice because I knew the forms so well —”

Peregrine thought, — the forms and nothing else.

He meant that Sir Politic Would-be knew the outward appearance but nothing of any real substance.

Sir Politic Would-be said, “I had read Contarini.”

Cardinal Gasparo Contarini’s De Magistratibus et Republica Venetorum, was published in 1589. Sir Lewis Lewkenor’s English translation The Commonwealth and Government of Venice was published in 1599.

He continued, “I leased a house, dealt with my Jewish moneylenders to furnish it with moveable property — well, if I could but find one man, one man after my own heart, whom I dared to trust, I would —”

“Would what, sir?” Peregrine asked.

“— make him rich,” Sir Politic Would-be said. “Make him a fortune. He should not think again. I would command it.”

The other man would not have to think; Sir Politic would do the thinking for both of them.

“How?” Peregrine asked.

“With certain projects that I have,” Sir Politic Would-be said, “which I may not reveal.”

Sir Politic Would-be seems to have been leery of lending money to other travelers. That is good advice for Peregrine. Many people have hare-minded projects that are certain or almost certain to lose money. That was true then, and it is true now.

Peregrine thought, If I had even one person to wager with, I would lay odds now that Sir Politic will reveal his projects to me immediately.

“One of my projects,” Sir Politic Would-be said, “and it is one that I don’t care greatly who knows about it, is to serve the state of Venice with smoked herrings for three years, and at a certain rate, from Rotterdam in the Netherlands, where I have correspondence.”

Given that Venice is located on the Adriatic Sea, one wonders about the intelligence of importing fish all the way from the Netherlands.

Holding a paper, Sir Politic Would-be continued, “There’s a letter, sent me from one of the States, and to that purpose.”

The word “States” was deliberately ambiguous. By “one of the States,” Sir Politic Would-be meant “one of the provinces”; Rotterdam is located in the province of South Holland. However, he was hoping that Peregrine would understand “one of the States” to mean “one of the members of the Dutch States-General,” the bicameral legislature of the Netherlands.

Sir Politic Would-be continued, “He cannot write his name, but that’s his mark.”

He wanted Peregrine to think the correspondent could not write his name on the letter because of the confidential content of the letter, but Peregrine was likely to think, Yes, Sir Politic Would-be is exactly the kind of man who would receive a letter from a man who is unable to write anything, including his own name.

Peregrine called the bluff: “Is the writer of the letter a Chandler?”

A Chandler is either a retail grocer or a ship’s provisioner.

Sir Politic Would-be replied, “No, a cheesemonger — a seller of cheeses and other dairy products. There are some others, too, with whom I treat about the same negotiation, and I will undertake it. For this is how it will work: I’ll do it with ease because I have planned it all. Your hoy carries only three men in her, and a boy.”

A hoy is a small Dutch sloop used for short hauls along the coast; it is too small for a voyage from the Netherlands to Venice, Italy.

He continued, “And she shall make me three round trips a year.”

That means three cargoes of smoked herring.

He continued, “So, if there comes to fruition only one of three, I save.”

He would break even if the hoy successfully made one voyage. However, this is true only if the first voyage is successful. If the hoy sinks on the first voyage, there will not be a second or a third voyage.

He continued, “If two voyages are successful, I can defalk.”

The word “defalcation” means “diminution” or “reduction.” Presumably, Sir Politic Would-be meant that if two voyages were successful, he would make a profit on the business venture and could pay back some of the money he owed to Jewish moneylenders. We should note that word “defalk” is very close to the spelling of the word “default,” which is likely what Sir Politic Would-be would do with any loan gotten to finance the business venture.

Sir Politic Would-be continued, “But this is only if my main project fails.”

“Then you have others?” Peregrine asked.

“I would be loath to draw the subtle and cunning air of such a place as Venice without coming up with a thousand schemes of my own,” Sir Politic Would-be said. “I’ll not lie, sir. Wherever I come to live, I love to be considerative: I love to analyze what is around me.

“And it is true that I have during my free hours thought upon some certain benefits for the state of Venice, which I call ‘my Precautions,’ and, sir, which I mean, in hopes of being granted a pension, to propound to the Great Council, then to the Forty, and so on up to the Ten.”

The Great Council, the Forty, and the Ten were the most important governing bodies of Venice.

He continued, “My means are made already —”

The “means” were his means of access. He had to get access to the Great Council, the Forty, and the Ten in order to make his proposals to them. Normally, to do that you had to know someone important.

“By whom are they made?” Peregrine asked.

“Sir, by one whom, although his position is obscure and low, yet he can sway, and they will hear him. He’s a police officer.”

This is a minor court official who is in charge of arresting and summoning offenders.

“What!” Peregrine said. “A common sergeant?”

He was incredulous that such a minor court official could get Sir Politic Would-be access to the Great Council, the Forty, and the Ten.

“Sir, even minor court officials such as the police officer put into the mouths of the Great Council, the Forty, and the Ten what they should say, sometimes, just like greater men do. I think I have my notes to show you —”

He began to look through his pockets.

Peregrine began, “Good sir —”

Sir Politic Would-be interrupted, “But you shall swear to me, as you are a gentleman, not to steal my ideas —”

“I, sir!” Peregrine said.

“— nor to reveal any of the details of my plans.”

He stopped searching his pockets and said, “My notes are not on me.”

“Oh, but you can remember your ideas, sir,” Peregrine said.

“My first idea concerns tinderboxes,” Sir Politic Would-be said. “You must know that no family is here without its tinderbox. Now, sir, let’s say that you or I were ill disposed toward the Venetian government. Tinderboxes are very portable, and with one in our pockets, might not you or I go into the Arsenal and come out again?”

The implication was that they could easily set fire to the Arsenal, which was the shipyard where ships and ordnance were located. In fact, in the 1560s, the Arsenal had exploded and burned.

Sir Politic Would-be continued, “And no one would be the wiser.”

“Except yourself, sir,” Peregrine said. Peregrine would definitely not set fire to the Arsenal, and he did not think the people of Venice would do so. Since the Arsenal was heavily guarded, it also seemed unlikely that the enemies of Venice would be able to use tinderboxes to set fire to the Arsenal.

“Very well, then,” Sir Politic Would-be said. “I therefore would warn and advise the Venetian government how fitting it would be that none but such people as are known patriots, sound lovers of their country, should be allowed to enjoy tinderboxes in their houses. Also, those tinderboxes would be licensed at some government office, and they would be so big that they could not be hidden in pockets.”

“Admirable!” Peregrine said.

Sir Politic Would-be said, “My next idea concerns how to find out by an immediate demonstration whether a ship, newly arrived from Syria or from any suspected part of all the Levant, aka the Eastern Mediterranean, is guilty of carrying the plague.”

This would be useful, indeed, if it could be done accurately.

He continued, “Right now ships are quarantined for forty, fifty days, sometimes, around the two islands with a lazaretto, aka quarantine house, for their trial period. If no signs of plague show up after forty or fifty days, then the ships can come to Venice. I’ll save that expense and loss for the merchant, and in an hour show whether or not the ship carries the plague —”

“Indeed, sir!” Peregrine said.

Sir Politic Would-be continued, “— or I will lose my labor.”

If his test for determining whether a ship was or was not carrying the plague were implemented and failed, he could lose his life — and thousands of other people could lose their lives.

Peregrine said, “By my faith, that’s much.”

“Sir, understand me,” Sir Politic Would-be said. “It will cost me in onions, some thirty livres —”

Livres are French pounds.

“Which is one pound sterling,” Peregrine said.

“Beside my waterworks,” Peregrine said, “for this is what I will do, sir. First, I will bring in your ship between two brick walls, but those the state shall invest in. On the one wall I will stretch a fair tarpaulin, and in that I will stick my onions, cut in halves. The other wall will be full of loop-holes, out at which I will thrust the noses of my bellows; and those bellows I will keep, using the waterworks, in perpetual motion, which is the easiest matter of a hundred. Now, sir, your onion, which does naturally attract the infection of plague, and your bellows blowing the air upon the onion, will show, instantly, by its changed color, that there is contagion, or if there is no contagion of the plague the onion will remain as fair as it was at the first.”

His plan had a few faults:

1) The waterworks are powered by moving water, but Venice is unlikely to have a suitable source of moving water. Sir Politic Would-be seems to have gotten this part of his idea from a water-driven mill on a river.

2) People of the time believed that a cut onion would absorb plague particles from the air. This is wrong, but Sir Politic Would-be would look at the cut onion and see if its color had changed. In a short time, a cut onion will turn brown through exposure to even pure air. If Sir Peregrine were to look instantly at the onion, as he had said, the onion would not have changed color and so his test would conclude that every ship was free of the plague. If Sir Peregrine waited a short time to look at the onion, since it would take time for the test to be done, the onion would have changed color and so his test would conclude that every ship was infected with the plague.

Sir Politic Would-be said, “Now my idea is known, it is nothing.”

He meant that once his idea was known, it seemed obvious.

“You are right, sir,” Peregrine said.

He meant that the idea was worth nothing.

“I wish I had my notes,” Sir Politic Would-be said as he looked through his pockets.

“Indeed, I wish the same thing,” Peregrine said. “But you have done well for once, sir.”

He had done well at amusing Peregrine.

“If I were traitorous, or would be made so,” Sir Politic Would-be said, “I could show you ways that I could sell this state of Venice now, to the Turks, in spite of the Venetian galleys, or their —”

He was verging on getting himself — and Peregrine — in real trouble with the Venetian government, whose enemies were the Turks.

Peregrine began to caution him, “Please, Sir Pol —”

Sir Politic Would-be took the hint and said, “I don’t have my notes on me.”

“I feared that,” Peregrine said, meaning both Sir Politic Would-be’s treasonous ideas and his not having his notes on him.

Sir Politic Would-be found a notebook, and Peregrine said, “There are your notes, sir.”

“No,” Sir Politic Would-be said. “This is my diary, in which I note my actions of the day.”

“Please let me see it, sir,” Peregrine said.

Sir Politic Would-be handed him his diary, and Peregrine asked, “What is here?”

He read a part of Sir Politic Would-be’s diary out loud:

“Notandum, a rat had gnawn my spur-leathers; notwithstanding, I put on new spur-leathers, and did go forth, but first I threw three beans over the threshold.”

Notandum is Latin for “It should be noted.”

Sir Politic Would-be wore spurs to indicate his status as a knight, despite there being no practical reason for wearing spurs in Venice, a city without horses. Spur-leathers are laces that are used to tie spurs to boots.

His diary entry showed that he was superstitious. Throwing three beans over the threshold was supposed to ward off the evil foretold by the rat’s gnawing the spur-leather.

Peregrine continued reading out loud:

“I went and bought two toothpicks, of which I broke one immediately, in a discourse with a Dutch merchant about ragion’ del stato.”

Ragion’ del stato are “reasons of state,” aka “political matters.”

Peregrine continued to read Sir Politic Would-be’s diary out loud:

“From him I went and paid a moccinigo, aka small coin, for mending my silk stockings. Along my way, I bargained for herring, and at St. Mark’s I peed.”

Peregrine said, “Indeed, these are politic notes!”

Meanings of “politic” include “political, shrewd, cunning, and scheming.” A better word to describe the contents of Sir Politic Would-be’s diary is “trivial.”

Sir Politic Would-be said, “Sir, I let pass no action of my life without making a note of it.”

“Believe me, that is wise!” Peregrine said.

Sir Politic Would-be said, “Sir, continue to read.”

— 4.2 —

Lady Would-be now arrived. With her were Nano the dwarf and her two waiting-women.

Lady Would-be said, “Where would this loose knight be, I wonder? I’m sure he’s in a whorehouse and part of his body is housed in a whore’s body.”

“Why, then he’s fast,” Nano the dwarf said, punning on the con game known as fast and loose.

By “fast,” he meant “fast-moving.”

She replied, “Yes, he plays both — fast and loose — with me. By “loose,” she meant that he was wanton and that he was now with a “loose” woman.

“Please stay here and rest for a moment. This heat will do more harm to my makeup than his heart is worth. I do not care to hinder and stop him, but instead to take him in the act.”

She rubbed the side of her nose and said, “How my makeup is coming off!”

The first woman-servant saw Sir Politic Would-be and said, “My master’s yonder.”

“Where?” Lady Would-be asked.

The first woman-servant pointed and added, “He’s with a young gentleman.”

Lady Would-be said, “That person is the party we’re after. She’s dressed in male apparel!”

Venice was known for both its female courtesans and for its many homosexual transvestite prostitutes. Resenting the competition, some female courtesans began to wear men’s clothing, apparently hoping to get business in sodomy. Lady Would-be thought that Peregrine, a young man, was a female courtesan who was wearing men’s clothing.

Lady Would-be said to Nano the dwarf, “Please, sir, jostle my knight to get his attention. I’ll be gentle out of concern for his reputation, however much he deserves blame.”

Seeing her, Sir Politic Would-be said, “My lady!”

“Where?” Peregrine asked.

“It is she indeed, sir,” he replied. “You shall know her. She is, I would say even if she were not mine, a lady of much merit as concerns fashion and behavior, and as for beauty I dare compare —”

“It seems you are not jealous,” Peregrine said, “since you dare to praise her to another man.”

“As for discourse and conversation —”

“Being your wife, she cannot miss that.”

Peregrine meant that if she were Sir Politic Would-be’s wife, she must be talkative.

Sir Politic Would-be tried to introduce Peregrine and his wife, “Madam, here is a gentleman. Please treat him well. He seems to be a youth, but he is —”

Lady Would-be finished the sentence: “— none.”

She meant that Peregrine was a female prostitute dressed in men’s clothing.

Sir Politic Would-be said, “Yes, he is a gentleman who has put his face so soon into the world —”

By “so soon,” he meant “at so early an age.”

Lady Would-be misunderstood him: “You mean, ‘as early’? As early as today?”

She meant that Peregrine had begun to dress as a man only this day.

Sir Politic Would-be asked, “What do you mean?”

His wife replied, “Why, I mean in this suit of clothing, sir; you understand me, I am sure.”

She believed that her husband definitely knew that Peregrine was a female courtesan dressed in men’s clothing.

She continued, “Well, Master Would-be, this does not become you. I had thought the odor, sir, of your good name would have been more precious to you. I had thought that you would not have done this dire massacre on your honor, especially considering your gravity and rank! But knights, I see, care little for the oaths they make to ladies — chiefly, their own ladies.”

One such oath is the oath they make in the marriage ceremony.

“Now by my spurs, the symbol of my knighthood —” Sir Politic Would-be began.

Peregrine thought, Lord, how his brain is humbled for an oath!

In thinking of an oath to make to his wife, Sir Politic Would-be’s brain, aka thought, went down to his heels where his knight’s spurs were. Also, Peregrine believed that Sir Politic Would-be had bought his knighthood rather than earned it.

King James I of England made people knights in return for money.

Sir Politic Would-be finished his oath, “— I don’t understand you.”

His wife said, “Right, sir, your cunning may carry it off, thus. Go ahead. Pretend that you don’t understand me.”

She then said to Peregrine, “Sir, I want to have a word with you. I would be loath to argue publicly with any gentlewoman, or to seem perverse, or violent. I want to act as The Courtier advises.”

The Courtier was a famous book of etiquette.

She continued, “Doing that comes too near rusticity, aka country vulgarity, in a lady, which I would shun by all means, and whatever I may deserve from Master Would-be, yet to have one fair gentlewoman thus be made the unnatural instrument to wrong another, and one she does not know, and to persevere in doing so ... well, in my poor judgment, that is not warranted because it is a solecism in our sex, if not in manners.”

A “solecism” is an impropriety in grammar or in behavior.

In addressing Peregrine, she sometimes referred to him as male and sometimes as female. She believed him to be biologically female but dressed as male.

“What is this!” Peregrine said.

Sir Politic Would-be said to his wife, “Sweet madam, come nearer to your aim. Speak more plainly.”

“Indeed, and I will, sir,” Lady Would-be said, “since you provoke me with your impudence and laughter about your light, aka licentious, land-Siren here, your Sporus, your hermaphrodite —”

In Homer's epic poem The Odyssey, Sirens are dangerous creatures with beautiful voices that they use to lure sailors to sail their ships close to shore and wreck them on the rocks. Since her husband was on dry land, Lady Would-be called Peregrine a land-Siren.

Sporus was a young boy who was a favorite of the dissolute Roman Emperor Nero, who had him castrated and dressed in female clothing. Nero then "married" him.

"What do we have here?" Peregrine said. "Poetic fury, and historic storms?"

The Sirens came from poetry, and Sporus came from history.

Sir Politic Would-be said about Peregrine, "The gentleman, believe it, is a worthy man, and he is from our nation."

He meant that Peregrine was from England.

His wife said, "Yes, he is from your Whitefriars nation."

Whitefriars was a place in London where prostitutes flocked because it was a "liberty," a place where sanctuary was given.

Lady Would-be said, "Come, I blush for you, Master Would-be, and I am ashamed you should have no more forehead, aka sense of shame, than thus to play the patron, or St. George, to a lewd harlot, a base fricatrice, a female devil, wearing a male's appearance."

A "fricatrice" is a masseuse, or in this case, a prostitute.

Sir Politic Would-be now understood what his wife thought Peregrine was, and he thought that she might be right!

He said to Peregrine, "If you are such a person as my wife thinks you are, I must bid adieu to your delights. The case appears too liquid."

The word “liquid” meant “clear and transparent.”

His wife said to him as he exited, “Yes, you may carry it clear and pretend not to know that this ‘man’ is a woman, with your state-face — your hypocritical demeanor!

“But as for this, your carnival concupiscence, who has fled here to Venice for liberty of conscience, from the furious persecution of the Marshal, I will discipline her.”

The “carnival concupiscence” was Peregrine, whom she thought to have the lechery that was displayed by many people during carnivals.

Lady Would-be thought that Peregrine had fled to Venice for liberty of conscience. Puritans and Catholics and other people whose religion was persecuted used “liberty of conscience” to mean religious freedom, but she used it to mean “freedom from conscience” — the freedom to do whatever evil action one wishes to do without having to worry about being punished — often with a whipping — by the Marshal.

“This is fine, indeed!” Peregrine said. “And do you often act like this? Is this the way you exercise your wits in preparation for when you have the opportunity to use them? Madam —”

“Come off it, sir,” Lady Would-be said sarcastically.

She grabbed his shirt and tried to pull it off in an attempt to show that Peregrine was in fact a woman.

“Do you hear me, lady?” Peregrine said. “Why, if your knight has made you beg for shirts, or to invite me home, you might have done it a nearer way, by far.”

Peregrine was now thinking that Sir Politic Would-be had set a trap for him, a trap that perhaps included pimping his wife to Peregrine.

Lady Would-be said, “Your words won’t get you out of my snare.”

She held on tightly to his shirt.

“Why am I in your snare?” Peregrine said. “Tell me that. Indeed, your husband told me you were fair, and so you are, only your nose inclines, that side that’s facing the Sun, to the queen-apple.”

The queen-apple is red. Peregrine was saying that one side of her nose was red. The other side had lost its makeup when Lady Would-be had rubbed her nose.

“This cannot be endured by any patience,” Lady Would-be said.

— 4.3 —

Mosca entered the scene.

Seeing Lady Would-be, he asked, “What is the matter, madam?”

She replied, “If the Venetian Senate doesn’t do me justice in the suit I will make to them about this, I’ll protest to all the world that they are no aristocracy.”

Niccolo Machiavelli had stated in The Prince that Venetian aristocrats could not be real aristocrats because they were merchants.

“What is the injury he has done to you, lady?” Mosca asked.

“Why, the callet — the whore — you told me about, I have here taken disguised.”

“Who?” Mosca said. “This person! What does your ladyship mean? The creature — the callet — I mentioned to you is apprehended now, and she is appearing before the Senate; you shall see her —”

“Where?” Lady Would-be asked.

“I’ll take you to her,” Mosca said. “As for this young gentleman, I saw him land this morning at the port.”

“Is it possible!” Lady Would-be said. “How my judgment has wandered astray!”

She said to Peregrine, “Sir, I must, blushing, say to you that I have erred, and I beg your pardon.”

A wary Peregrine said, “What, still more changes!”

Lady Would-be said, “I hope that you lack the malice to remember a gentlewoman’s passion. If you stay in Venice here, please use me, sir —”

By “passion,” she meant “anger,” but the word is also used in the phrase “sexual passion.”

By “use,” she meant “allow me to help you” — she could help him socially. But the word is also used to mean “use sexually.”

“Will you go now, madam?” Mosca asked.

Lady Would-be continued to speak to Peregrine, “Please, sir, use me. Indeed, the more you use me, the more I shall conceive ... that you have forgot our quarrel.”

One meaning of the word “conceive” is “get pregnant.”

Lady Would-be, Mosca, Nano the dwarf, and the two serving-women exited.

Peregrine was certain that Sir Politic Would-be was prostituting his wife to him.

Alone, Peregrine said to himself, “This is strange! Sir Politic Would-be? No, his name ought to be Sir Politic Bawd. To make me thus acquainted with his wife!

“Well, wise Sir Pol, since you have played this trick upon my innocent freshmanship, I’ll test your salt-head to see how invulnerable it is against a counter-plot.”

A salt-head is an experienced head. The word “salt” also means “wanton.”

— 4.4 —

Voltore, Corbaccio, Corvino, and Mosca arrived at the Scrutineo.

Voltore, who was a lawyer and would be speaking for them in the court of law, said, “Well, now you know the management and conduct of the business. Your constancy is all that is required to the safety of it.”

They had met and determined on the lying story they would tell the four Advocari, aka Judges. To get away with their lie, they had to stick to their story.

Mosca asked, “Is the lie safely and surely communicated among us? Is that definitely the case? Does every man know his burden?”

The “burden” is the refrain to a song. Mosca was asking whether each man knew his part of the lying story they would tell the Judges.

“Yes,” Corvino said.

“Then shrink not,” Mosca said, going over to Corvino.

“But does Voltore the advocate know the truth?” Corvino quietly asked Mosca.

The truth was that Corvino had tried to prostitute his wife, Celia, to Volpone.

“Oh, sir, by no means,” Mosca quietly said. “I devised a tale that has completely saved your reputation. But be valiant, sir.”

Corvino said quietly, “I fear no one but Voltore the lawyer. I fear that his pleading on our behalves could make him stand for a co-heir —”

“Co-halter!” Mosca quietly said. “Hang him.”

A “halter” is a hangman’s noose. Mosca wanted to put to rest Corvino’s fear that anyone but him would be Volpone’s heir.

Mosca quietly continued, “We will only use his tongue, his noise, as we do Croaker’s here.”

“Croaker” was a way of referring to Corbaccio, who as an old man spoke in a croaking voice.

“What shall he — Corbaccio — do?” Corvino said.

“When we have done, you mean?” Mosca asked.

“Yes.”

“Why, we’ll think about that,” Mosca said. “We’ll sell him for mummia; he’s half dust already.”

Mummia was a medicine that was made from mummies, or from dried corpses. As an old man, Corbaccio was already half-dried out.

Mosca went over to Voltore and said quietly, referring to Corvino, “Doesn’t it make you smile to see this buffalo and how he playfully tosses his head?”

Buffalo and cuckold have horns. Celia had not cuckolded Corvino, but that was not what these four men would testify in court.

Mosca thought, I also will toss my head playfully if everything turns out well.

Mosca said loudly to the hear-of-hearing Corbaccio, “Sir, only you are that man who shall enjoy the crop of all Volpone’s wealth, and these other two men — Corvino and Voltore — don’t know for whom they are toiling.”

“True,” Corbaccio said. “Peace. Be quiet.”

He was worried that Corvino and Voltore would hear.

Mosca said to Corvino loudly enough for Voltore to hear, “But you shall eat the crop — you shall enjoy Volpone’s wealth.”

He then went to Voltore and quietly said, “Fat chance!”

He then said to Voltore loudly enough for all to hear, “Worshipful sir, may Mercury sit upon your thundering tongue, or the French Hercules.”

Mercury is the god of eloquence, as well as the god of thieves and liars. The gods are much stronger than mortals.

After Hercules completed his Tenth Labor, stealing the cattle of Geryon, he passed through France and became the ancestor of the French people. According to the satirist Lucian, Hercules became a master of eloquence in his old age.

If Mercury were to sit upon Voltore’s thundering tongue, he quite possibly could get it dirty or he could make it capable of telling eloquent lies.

If Mercury were to sit upon the French Hercules, it would be a case of might makes right. Hercules is strong, and the truth is strong, but both can be overcome by a greater strength and by guile.

Hercules killed the Centaur Nessus when Nessus tried to rape Hercules' wife, Deianira. As Nessus was dying, he told Deianira that his blood was charmed. She should soak one of Hercules' shirts with the blood and then give him the shirt if Hercules were ever attracted to another woman. Much later, Hercules was attracted to another woman, and Deianira gave him the shirt, but Nessus' blood was like acid, and Hercules killed himself to escape the torment.

Mosca loudly continued, "And may Hercules make your language as conquering as his club, to beat at full length flat, as with a tempest, our adversaries."

He then said quietly to Voltore, "But they are much more your adversaries, sir."

Voltore was going to argue to defeat his two adversaries in court: Celia and Bonario. In addition to defeating them, he was hoping to defeat his other two adversaries — Corvino and Corbaccio — and inherit all of Volpone's wealth.

"Here they come," Voltore said. "Be quiet now."

The four Judges and Celia, Bonario, the Notary, and the police officers were coming.

"I have another witness, if you need one, sir, whom I can produce," Mosca said.

"Who is it?" Voltore asked.

"Sir, I have her," Mosca said.

Events would reveal the other witness: Lady Would-be.

— 4.5 —

The four Judges, Celia, Bonario, the Notary, the police officers, and others arrived. The four Judges had already listened to the testimony of Bonario and Celia.

The four Judges sat and talked.

The First Judge said, “The like of this case the Venetian Senate has never heard of.”

The Second Judge said, “It will sound most strange to them when we report it.”

The Judges reviewed cases and could recommend them to go before the Venetian Senate. In this case, however, the Judges would decide to make the judgment themselves.

The Fourth Judge said, “Celia, the gentlewoman, has always been held to have an unreproved reputation. She has always been thought to be of good character.”

The Third Judge said, “So has the youth Bonario.”

The Fourth Judge said, “The more unnatural part is that of his father, Corbaccio.”

Corbaccio had disinherited his son; this was unnatural — it was not something a biological father would do.

The Second Judge said, “Even more unnatural is the act of Celia’s husband, Corvino.”

Corvino had attempted to prostitute his wife, Celia, to Volpone.

The First Judge said, “I don’t know what name to give his act because it is so monstrous!”

The Fourth Judge said, “But the impostor, Volpone, is a thing created to exceed precedent!”

Volpone was an impostor because he was pretending to be a seriously ill man although he was well enough to attempt to rape Celia.

The First Judge said, “And he was created to exceed all future possibilities!”

The Second Judge said, “I never heard a true voluptuary described, except for him.”

A voluptuary is a sybarite, a person who is self-indulgent in the pursuit of luxury or gratification of the senses.

The Third Judge asked, “Has everyone who was subpoenaed arrived?”

The Notary replied, “All, except for the old magnifico, Volpone.”

A magnifico is a great person in Venice.

The First Judge asked, “Why isn’t he here?”

“If it please your Fatherhoods, here is Volpone’s advocate,” Mosca said. “Volpone himself is so weak, so feeble —”

“Fatherhoods” is in fact the correct way to address the Judges.

The Fourth Judge asked Mosca, “Who are you?”

“Volpone’s parasite, his knave, his pandar,” Bonario said. “I beseech the court to force Volpone to come to the court so that your grave eyes may bear strong witness of his strange impostures.”

Voltore the lawyer said to the Judges, “Upon my faith and my credit with your virtues, I swear that Volpone is so ill that he is not able to endure the air.”

The Second Judge said, “Bring him here, nevertheless.”

The Third Judge said, “We will see him.”

The Fourth Judge said, “Fetch him.”

Voltore said, “May your Fatherhoods’ fitting pleasures be obeyed.”

Some officers of the law exited to get Volpone.

Voltore then said, “But surely, the sight of Volpone will rather move your pities than your indignation.

“May it please the court that in the meantime, he may be heard in me — I am his representative and can speak for him. I know that this place is most void of prejudice, and therefore I crave to be heard, since we have no reason to fear that our truth would hurt our case.”

The Third Judge said, “Speak freely.”

Voltore said, “Then know, most honored fathers, I must now reveal to your strangely imposed-upon ears the most prodigious and most shameless piece of downright impudence and treachery that vicious nature ever yet brought forth to shame the state of Venice.”

He pointed to Celia and said, “This lewd woman, who lacks no artificial looks or tears to help the vizard — the mask — she has now put on, has long been known to be a secret adulteress with that lascivious youth there.”

Celia was crying at being called “lewd.” She was wearing the half-mask that many Venetian women wore while in public, but Voltore was saying that she wore a mask of innocence to hide her guilt.

He pointed to Bonario and then continued, “She has not just been suspected, I say, but definitely known, to be an adulteress, and she has been taken in the act with him.”

He pointed to Corvino, her husband, and said, “She has been pardoned by this man, the too-easy, too-credulous husband, whose everlasting generosity makes him now stand here as the most unhappy, innocent person that man's own goodness ever made accused."

He then said, "Celia and Bonario received a gift of forgiveness of such very dear grace and mercy that they didn't know how to respond to it except with shame because it was such a very dear gift that they could never repay it. They began to hate the gift, and rather than to accept the gift with thanks, they tried to find a way to root out and eradicate the memory of the gift.

"I pray to your Fatherhoods to observe the malice of their reaction to the gift, yes, the rage of creatures discovered in their evils, and I pray to your Fatherhoods to observe the brazen insolence such people exhibit, even in their crimes — but that will become more apparent soon."

He pointed to Corbaccio and said, "This gentleman, the father, hearing of this foul crime, with many others, which daily struck at his too-tender ears, and grieved in nothing more than that he could not preserve himself as a parent — his son's ills growing to that strange flood and unnatural profusion of evil — at last decided to disinherit him."

The First Judge said, "These are strange turns of event!"

The First Judge said, "Bonario's reputation was always fair and honest."

Voltore said, "So much more full of danger is his vice, which can beguile so under the shade of virtue.

"But, as I said, my honored sires, his father had this settled purpose of disinheriting Bonario. We don't know by what means Bonario learned about this settled purpose, but after he learned that this day was appointed for the deed of disinheritance, that parricide — I cannot give Bonario a better title — he and Celia, his paramour, made a secret arrangement. She would be there when he entered Volpone's house. Volpone was the man, your Fatherhoods must understand, designated by Corbaccio to inherit his wealth.

“In Volpone’s house, Bonario sought his father, Corbaccio. But for what purpose did Bonario seek his father, my lords? I tremble to pronounce it. I tremble to say that a son toward a father, and toward such a father, should have so foul, felonious intent! Bonario’s intention was to murder him.

“Fortunately, he was unable to do that because of his father’s lucky absence. But what did Bonario do then? He did not check his wicked thoughts; no, now he thought up new evil deeds.

“Evil always ends where it begins.”

In other words, once evil is thought up, it will find an outlet. Evil thoughts always lead to evil deeds. Bonario had thought of committing an act of horror, and now he would commit an act of horror. The verb “ends” means “concludes” or “finishes.”

Voltore continued, “Bonario committed an act of horror, Fathers! He dragged forth the aged gentleman Volpone — who had there lain bedridden three years and more — out of and off his innocent couch, naked in invalid’s clothes upon the floor, and left him there.

“He also wounded Volpone’s servant Mosca in the face.

“He also, along with this strumpet — Celia — who was the prostitute decoy to his invented, fraudulent plot and who was glad to be so sexually active — I shall here desire your Fatherhoods to note my conclusions as being most remarkable — thought at once to stop his father’s intention to disinherit him.

“They attempted to discredit his father’s free choice of the old gentleman, Volpone, as his heir. They also attempted to redeem themselves by laying infamy upon this man, Celia's husband, Corvino, to whom, with blushing, they should acknowledge as due their lives."

The First Judge asked, "What evidence do you have of this?"

Bonario interrupted, "Most honored fathers, I humbly beg that you give no credit to this man's mercenary tongue."

The First Judge said, "Stop interrupting. Be quiet."

Bonario said, "His soul lives in his fee. He cares more for money than he does for his soul."

Shocked, the Third Judge said, "Oh, sir!"

Bonario said, "This fellow, for six more small coins, would plead against his Maker."

The First Judge said, "You forget yourself. Remember where you are."

Voltore said, "Grave Fathers, let him have permission to speak. Can any man imagine that he will spare his accuser, me, when he would not have spared his parent? He was willing to murder his father, so he is certainly willing to insult and slander me."

The First Judge said to Voltore, "Well, produce your proofs. Show us your evidence."

Celia said, "I wish I could forget I were a creature."

One meaning of "creature" is "despicable person," but she meant a creature of God, Who created all human beings.

Voltone called a witness: "Signior Corbaccio."

Corbaccio came forward to testify.

The First Judge asked, "Who is he?"

Voltore replied, "He is Bonario's father."

The Second Judge asked, "Has he sworn under oath to tell the truth?"

The Notary answered, "Yes."

"What must I do now?" Corbaccio asked.

The Notary answered, "Your testimony's required. It is craved."

The hard-of-hearing Corbaccio asked, "Speak to the knave?"

By "knave," he meant his son, Bonario.

Corbaccio continued, "I'll have my mouth first stopped with earth — I'll die first. My heart hates knowing him. I disclaim any part of him. I am no kin of his."

The First Judge asked, "Why do you say that?"

Corbaccio said, "He is the mere portent of nature! He is a freak of nature! He is an utter stranger to my loins. I am not his biological father."

Bonario interrupted, "Have they forced you to say this?"

Corbaccio said, "I will not hear you — you monster of men, you swine, you goat, you wolf, you parricide! Speak not, you viper."

Because of Mosca's lies, he was convinced that Bonario had intended to murder him.

Bonario, an obedient son, said, "Sir, I will sit down, and rather wish my innocence should suffer than I resist the authority of a father."

Voltore called the next witness: "Signior Corvino!"

Corvino came forward to testify.

The Second Judge said, “This is strange.”

The First Judge asked, “Who’s this?”

The Notary replied, “Celia’s husband.”

The Fourth Judge asked, “Has he sworn under oath to tell the truth?”

The Notary answered, “Yes.”

The Third Judge said to Corvino, “Speak, then.”

Corvino said, “This woman, Celia, if it please your Fatherhoods, is a whore, of very hot sexual exercise, even more lecherous than a partridge, which is the most lecherous of creatures, according to Pliny’s Natural History and Aelian’s On the Characteristics of Animals. This is well known.”

Shocked by Corvino’s language and its content, the First Judge said, “No more.”

Corvino said, “She neighs like a jennet — a horse — when it’s in heat.”

Shocked by Corvino’s language and its content, the Notary ordered, “Preserve the honor of the court.”

“I shall,” Corvino said, “and I shall preserve the modesty of your most reverend ears. And yet I hope that I may say that these eyes of mine have seen her glued to that piece of cedar, that fine well-timbered gallant named Bonario.”

“Well-timbered” meant “well-built” and hinted at “well-hung.”

Corvino pointed to his forehead, where a cuckold’s horns were said to grow, and said, “Here the letters may be read, through the horn, that make the story complete.”

The cuckold's letter is V, and it is created by the cuckold's horns. Corvino used the plural "letters" because he was testifying that he had been cuckolded more than once.

He was also referring to a student's hornbook. Students would study a page that had the letters of the alphabet on it; a thin layer of horn protected the page. When it is very thin, horn is transparent, and when heated, horn is malleable.

Mosca said to Corvino, "Excellent testimony, sir!"

Corvino whispered to Mosca, "There's no shame in this now, is there?"

Corvino was worried that his testimony might not preserve the honor and the modesty of the court.

"None at all," Mosca replied.

Mosca meant that Corvino's testimony was shameless.

Corvino continued his testimony: "And I hope that I may say that I hope that Celia is well on her way to her damnation, if there is in fact a Hell that is greater than whore and woman — a good Catholic Christian may doubt that there is."

Corvino was not a good Catholic Christian.

The Third Judge said, "Corvino's grief has made him frantic."

The First Judge said, "Remove him from here."

Hearing that her husband hoped that she was well on her way to Hell, Celia fainted.

The Second Judge said, "Look after the woman."

"Splendid!" Corvino said. "Prettily feigned and acted, again!"

The Fourth Judge said, "Stand back from her."

The First Judge said, "Give her some air."

The Third Judge asked Mosca, "What can you say? What is your testimony?"

Mosca said, "My wound, may it please your wisdoms, speaks for me. I received it as I went to aid my good patron, Volpone, when Bonario missed his sought-for father and when that well-taught dame, Celia, had her cue given to her to cry out, "Rape!"

Bonario interrupted, "Oh, this is very carefully planned impudence! Fathers —"

The Third Judge interrupted, "Sir, be silent. You had your hearing free from interruption, and so must they."

The Second Judge said, "I begin to fear that there is some willful and fraudulent deception here."

He was beginning to believe that Bonario was at fault.

The Fourth Judge said, "This woman, Celia, has too many moods."

Voltore said, "Grave fathers, Celia is a creature of a most professed and prostituted lewdness."

By "creature," he meant "despicable person."

Corvino said, "Grave fathers, she is very impetuous and she is insatiable."

Voltore said, "I hope that her feignings will not deceive your wisdoms. Just this day she tempted a stranger, a grave knight, with her loose eyes, and more with her lascivious kisses."

He pointed to Mosca and said, "This man saw them together on the water in a gondola."

Mosca said, “Present is the lady herself who saw them, too. She is outside. When she saw them, she pursued them in the open streets in hopes of saving her knight’s honor.”

The First Judge said, “Produce that lady.”

The Second Judge said, “Let her come.”

Mosca exited to get Lady Would-be.

The Fourth Judge said, “These things strike me with wonder!”

The Fourth Judge said, “I am astonished. I have been turned into a stone.”

— 4.6 —

Mosca returned with Lady Would-be.

He said to her, “Be resolute, madam.”

He had coached her on what to say in the courtroom. Mosca had already told her that Peregrine was not a prostitute dressed as a woman. He, however, may have convinced her that Celia was a prostitute who had been with her husband on a gondola. Or he may have convinced her to deliberately commit perjury.

Lady Would-be pointed to Celia and said, “Yes, this same woman is she.”

She was falsely testifying that her husband and Celia had been together on a gondola.

She said to Celia, “Get out, you chameleon harlot! Now your eyes vie with the tears of the hyena. Do you dare to look upon my wronged face?”

She called Celia a chameleon because she believed that although Celia was a prostitute, she could put on an innocent appearance.

Lady Would-be was mixing up the tears a crocodile sheds and the sound a hyena makes. A crocodile was believed to shed tears to lure its victims, while a hyena was believed to mimic a human voice to lure its victims.

Lady Would-be said to the Judges, “I beg your pardons, I fear I have forgettingly transgressed against the dignity of the court —”

The Second Judge said, “No, you haven’t, madam.”

Lady Would-be continued, “— and been exorbitant and immoderate in my speech.”

The Second Judge said, “You haven’t, lady.”

The Fourth Judge said, “This evidence is strong.”

Lady Would-be said, “Surely, I had no intention of scandalizing your honors, or my sex.”

The Second Judge said, “We believe you.”

Lady Would-be said, “Surely, you may believe it.”

The Second Judge said, “Madam, we do.”

Lady Would-be said, “Indeed, you may; my breeding is not so coarse —”

The First Judge said, “We know it.”

Lady Would-be continued, “— as to offend with pertinacy —”

She was correct: She was not currently bringing up anything in court that was pertinent to the case.

The Third Judge said, “Lady —”

Lady Would-be continued, “— such a court! No, surely.”

The First Judge said, “We well think it.”

Lady Would-be continued, “You may think it.”

The First Judge said, “Let her conquer us and have the last word.”

He then asked Bonario, “What witnesses have you to make good your report?”

Bonario replied, “Our consciences.”

Celia added, “And Heaven, which never fails the innocent.”

The Fourth Judge said, “These are no testimonies.”

Bonario said, “Not in your courts, where a greater number of, and louder, witnesses overcome.”

The Fourth Judge said, “Now you grow insolent.”

The officers who had gone after Volpone now returned, carrying Volpone on a couch. Volpone was acting as if he were very ill and utterly without the strength needed to engage in sex.

Voltore said, “Here comes the testimony that will convict and put to utter dumbness the bold tongues of Bonario and Celia.”

He pointed to Volpone and said sarcastically, “See here, grave fathers, here’s the ravisher, the rapist, the rider on other men’s wives, the great impostor, the grand and horny voluptuary!

“Don’t you think these limbs engage in sex? Don’t you think these eyes covet a concubine? Please look at these hands — aren’t they fit to stroke a lady’s breasts?”

“Or perhaps he is faking his illness!”

“So he is,” Bonario said.

“Would you have him tortured?” Voltore asked.

“I would have him tested,” Bonario said.

Voltore said, “Best test him then with spikes, or burning irons. Put him to the strappado.”

The strappado is a form of torture in which the victim’s hands are tied behind his or her back with a rope and then the victim is lifted high in the air. To increase the pain, weights can be tied to the victim’s feet, or the victim can be raised and dropped partway, coming to a sudden stop. In this torture, the victim suffers dislocated shoulders.

Voltore sarcastically continued, “I have heard that the rack has cured the gout.”

The rack is a form of torture in which ropes are tied to the victim’s hands and other ropes are tied to the victim’s feet, and the ropes are used to stretch the victim until their limbs are dislocated.

Being threatened with the rack is enough to make even a person suffering from gout try to run away.

Voltore sarcastically continued, “Indeed, put Volpone on the rack, and help rid him of a malady; be courteous.

“I say, before these honored Fathers, that Volpone is so ill that he shall still have as many diseases left as Celia has Biblically known adulterers, or as you, Bonario, have Biblically known strumpets.”

He paused and then said to the Judges, “Oh, my just hearers, if these deeds, acts of this bold and most outrageous kind, may be done with impunity, can even one citizen escape losing his or her life and reputation to anyone who dares to slander him or her? Which of you are safe, my honored Fathers?

“I would ask, with the permission of your grave Fatherhoods, if their plot has any appearance of or resemblance to truth? With your permission, let me ask if, to the dullest nostril here, their plot does not smell like rank and most abhorred slander?”

“I beg your care of this good gentleman, Volpone, whose life is much endangered by their lies, and as for them, I will conclude with this: Vicious persons, when they’re hot and fleshed in — initiated in and eager for more — impious acts, their constancy abounds.

“Damned deeds are done with greatest confidence and boldness.”

The First Judge said, “Take Bonario and Celia into custody, and separate them.”

The Second Judge said, “It is a pity that two such monsters should live.”

The First Judge said, “Let the old gentleman, Volpone, be returned to his home with care.”

Some officers of the law carried Volpone away on his couch.

The First Judge added, “I’m sorry our credulity — our believing Bonario and Celia at first — has wronged him.”

The Fourth Judge added, “Bonario and Celia are two creatures! They are thoroughly evil!”

The Third Judge said, “I feel as though I have an earthquake inside me.”

The Second Judge added, “Their shame, even in their cradles, fled their faces. Even from infancy, Bonario and Celia have been shameless.”

The Fourth Judge said to Voltore, “You have done a worthy service to the state, sir, by revealing their crimes.”

The First Judge said, “You shall hear, before night, what punishment the court decrees upon them.”

Voltore replied, “We thank your Fatherhoods.”

The Judges, Notary, and officers of the law exited with Bonario and Celia.

Voltore asked Mosca, “How do you like the result of the trial?”

“It is splendid,” Mosca replied. “I’d have your tongue, sir, tipped with gold for this. I’d have you be the heir to the whole city. I’d have the earth lack men before you lack a living: They’re bound to erect your statue in St. Mark’s.”

He then said, “Signior Corvino, I want you to go and show yourself in public, so people know that you have conquered in this trial.”

“Yes,” Corvino replied.

Mosca and Corvino began to talk quietly together.

Mosca said, “It was much better that you should profess yourself a cuckold in public like this than that the other thing should have been proved.”

The other thing was Corvino’s attempt to prostitute his wife, Celia.

Corvino replied, “I considered that. Now it is her fault.”

“It could have been yours,” Mosca said.

“True,” Corvino said, “but I still fear this lawyer: Voltore.”

He still regarded Voltore as a rival who could inherit Volpone’s wealth.

“Indeed, you need not fear him,” Mosca said. “I dare to ease you of that fear.”

“I trust you, Mosca,” Corvino said.

Mosca replied, “You can trust me as you trust your own soul, sir.”

Corvino’s soul was rotten.

Corvino exited.

Corbaccio said, “Mosca!”

Mosca replied, “Now for your business, sir.”

“What?” the hard-of-hearing Corbaccio asked. “Do you have business?”

“Yes, yours, sir,” Mosca replied.

“Oh, none else?”

“None else, not I,” Mosca said. “I have only your business.”

“Be careful, then,” Corbaccio said.

Voltore and Lady Would-be were listening. Because Corbaccio was hard of hearing, Mosca was speaking loudly.

“You can sleep with both your eyes shut,” Mosca said.

“Don’t worry about anything.”

“Dispatch my business,” Corbaccio said.

He meant this: Get Volpone to make me his heir.

“Instantly,” Mosca said. “Right away.”

Corbaccio said, “And look that everything, whatever it is, is put in the inventory of his goods: jewels, plate, moneys, household stuff, bedding, curtains.”

Mosca said, “Curtain-rings, sir.”

The sarcasm went over Corbaccio's head.

Mosca added, "The advocate's fee must be deducted from the wealth you will gain."

"I'll pay him now," Corbaccio said. "You'll be too prodigal and generous."

Mosca said. "Sir, I must give Voltore his fee as advocate."

Corbaccio asked, "Two chequins is enough?"

"No, give him six chequins, sir," Mosca said.

"It is too much."

"He talked a long time. You must consider that, sir."

Corbaccio said, "Well, there's three," handing it over.

"I'll give it to him," Mosca said.

"Do so, and here's something for you."

Corbaccio handed Mosca a small coin.

Corbaccio exited.

Mosca said sarcastically, "Bountiful bones! What horrid and strange offence did he commit against nature in his youth to give him this old age?"

People who commit some horribly evil deed during their youth may be punished with suffering in their old age.

Mosca said to Voltore, who had heard everything, "You see, sir, how I work to help you accomplish your goals."

He gave Voltore the three chequins and added, "Take no notice of the smallness of this fee. It's not worth worrying about."

Voltore, whose eyes were on Volpone's wealth and whose mind was on making all of that wealth his, said, "I won't. I'll leave you now."

Mosca replied, "Good advocate!"

Voltore exited.

Mosca thought, All is yours, the devil and all.

This meant, You think that everything is yours, including the devil and everything else.

Mosca then said to Lady Would-be, "Madam, I'll escort you to your home."

"No, I'll go see your patron, Volpone," she replied.

"That you shall not," Mosca said, "and I'll tell you why. My intention is to urge my patron to rewrite his will and make you his heir because of the zeal you showed as you helped him with your testimony today. Before your testimony, you were only third or fourth in line to inherit his wealth, but you shall now be the first in line. But if you were present as I tried to persuade Volpone to rewrite his will, it would appear as if you were begging for his money. Therefore —"

Lady Would-be interrupted, "You shall sway me. I will go home."

Possibly, this is the exact time Lady Would-be became a legacy-hunter.

ACT 5 (Volpone, or the Fox)

— 5.1 —

Volpone was alone in his room.

He said to himself, “Well, I am here, and all this turmoil is in the past. I never disliked my disguise as a seriously ill person until this moment that just ended. Here in private my disguise is good, but out in public ...

“Let me cave — take care — as I catch my breath.”

Cave is Latin for “be wary” and “be on guard.”

Volpone needed to be on his guard in case anyone — such as Lady Would-be — visited and caught him out of bed.

He continued, “By God, my left leg began to have the cramp, and I feared immediately that some power had struck me with a dead palsy.”

A “dead palsy” is serious paralysis such as a stroke can cause.

He continued, “Well! I must be merry and shake it off. Too many of these fears would give me some villainous disease if they would come fast and thick upon me. I’ll stop them. Give me a bowl of lusty wine to frighten away this sense of dread from my heart.”

He poured himself some wine and drank deeply.

“Ah! The sense of dread is almost gone already; I shall conquer it completely. Any trick, now, of rare ingenious knavery that would possess me with a violent laughter, would make me a man again.”

He drank deeply again.

“Ah! This heat is life; it is blood by this time.”

This society believed that wine turned to blood after it was consumed. As blood, it conveyed heat and courage to the person who had consumed the wine.

— 5.2 —

Mosca entered the room.

“Mosca!” Volpone greeted him.

“How are you, sir?” Mosca asked.

He then asked rhetorically, “Does the day look clear again? Have we recovered from what could have been a disaster, and have we gotten off the path of error and gotten back to our correct path so that we can see our path before us? Is our path free from obstruction once more?”

He was mocking religious language about leaving the path of moral error and getting back on the path of moral behavior. Volpone and he were now free to continue their con games.

Volpone said, “Exquisite Mosca!”

Mosca was an exquisitely ingenious scoundrel.

“Was it not carried off learnedly?” Mosca asked.

“Yes, and stoutly and bravely,” Volpone said. “Good wits are greatest in extreme crises.”

“It would be a folly beyond thought to trust any grand act to a cowardly spirit,” Mosca said. “You are not delighted with it enough, I think?”

Mosca knew Volpone well. Volpone was one to up the ante, to push things to an extreme that could break them. Mosca was usually satisfied with enough.

Volpone replied, "Oh, I was delighted more than if I had enjoyed the wench: Celia. The pleasure of sexually enjoying all womankind is not like the greater pleasure I got from deceiving the court."

"Why, now you're talking, sir," Mosca said. "That's exactly right."

He hesitated and then said, "We must here be fixed and stop while we're ahead. Here we must rest. This is our masterpiece: We cannot think to go beyond this."

"True," Volpone said, but soon he would seek to go beyond this. "You have played your prize part, my precious Mosca."

"Yes, sir," Mosca said, "To fool the court —"

Volpone interrupted, "And quite divert the torrent of the law upon the innocent."

"Yes," Mosca said, "and to make so splendid a music out of discords." The discords were the rival legacy-hunters who had come together and made splendid music to fool the court into finding innocent people guilty.

"Right," Volpone said. "That still to me is the strangest wonder: how you managed to do it! That these people, being so divided among themselves and not trusting each other, should not smell a rat either in me or in you, or doubt and fear the other members of their own side."

"True, they will not see it," Mosca said. "Too much light blinds them, I think. They ignore what should be obvious. Each of them is so possessed and stuffed with his own hopes of inheriting your money that anything to the contrary, no matter how true or apparent or palpable, they will resist it —"

Volpone sarcastically said, "— like a temptation of the devil."

Many people will strenuously resist a temptation of the devil, but the legacy-hunters were not such people. One temptation of the devil was the hope of inheriting Volpone's wealth.

"Right, sir," Mosca said. "Merchants may talk of trade, and your great signiors may talk of land that yields well, but if Italy has any glebe — plot of land — more fruitful than these fellows, I am deceived."

Volpone had gotten much wealth from the legacy-hunters.

Mosca asked, "Didn't your advocate, Voltore, perform splendidly?"

"Oh, he did," Volpone said.

He parodied Voltore's performance in the courtroom: "My most honored Fathers, my grave Fathers, under correction of your Fatherhoods, what face of truth is here? If these strange deeds may pass, most honored Fathers."

He added, "It took a lot of effort to keep from laughing."

Mosca said, "It seemed to me that you sweat, sir."

Volpone said, "True, I did a little."

Volpone had been afraid.

"Confess, sir," Mosca said. "Weren't you daunted?"

"Truly, I was a little in a mist — a little dazed — but I was not dejected and downcast. I was always my own self."

"I believe it, sir," Mosca said. "Now, so truth help me, I must necessarily say this, sir, and out of conscience for your advocate, Voltore. He has taken pains, truly, sir, and has very richly deserved, in my poor judgment — I speak it with goodwill and not to contradict you, sir — to be well cheated."

Mosca believed that Voltore deserved to be well cheated because he had lied in the courtroom. Applying the same logic to others, we have to conclude that Corbaccio, Corvino, Lady Would-be, Volpone, and Mosca also deserved to be well cheated.

“True,” Volpone said, “I think so, too, judging by what I heard him say in the latter end of the trial.”

Volpone had not been present for the first part of the trial.

“Oh, but what he said before you arrived, sir,” Mosca said, “had you heard him first make the chief points of his argument and then aggravate and exaggerate the injuries he claimed Bonario and Celia had done, and then make his vehement figures — gestures and lawyerly figures of speech — I kept expecting him to change his shirt because of his sweating.”

He added sarcastically, “And to think that he did this out of pure love, with no hope of gain.”

“You are right,” Volpone said. “He deserves to be cheated. I cannot repay him, Mosca, as I would like to, not yet; but for your sake, at your entreaty, I will begin, even now — to vex them all, this very instant.”

Mosca had entreated him to cheat Voltore, and now Volpone was intending to vex all the legacy-hunters.

“Good sir —” Mosca said, wondering what Volpone was planning.

Volpone interrupted, “Call Nano the Dwarf and Castrone the Eunuch to come here.”

Mosca called, “Castrone! Nano!”

Nano the dwarf and Castrone the eunuch entered the room.

“Here we are,” Nano the dwarf said.

Volpone asked, "Shall we have a jig now?"

A jig or dance was often performed after a play was finished. Volpone and Mosca had just finished performing their parts in the trial. However, Volpone had in mind a con rather than a dance.

"Whatever you please, sir," Mosca said, wondering what Volpone was up to.

Volpone said to Nano the dwarf and Castrone the eunuch, "Go immediately into the streets, you two, and say that I am dead. Do it in character — do it seriously, do you hear? Say that I have died because of the grief caused me by being recently slandered as a would-be rapist."

Nano the dwarf and Castrone the eunuch exited.

"What do you have in mind, sir?" Mosca asked.

Volpone said, "My vulture, crow, and raven shall immediately come flying hither, on hearing the news, to peck for carrion. So will my she-wolf, and all will be greedy and full of expectation of inheriting my wealth."

The she-wolf was Lady Would-be, who usually was parrot-like.

"And then to have it ravished from their mouths!" Mosca said.

"That is true," Volpone said.

He elaborated on his plan: "I will have you put on more-respectable clothing, and you shall act as if you were my heir. You shall show them a will. Open that chest, and take out one of those wills that have the name of my beneficiary blank. I'll immediately write in your name."

Mosca gave him the will and said, "This is a splendid plot, sir."

“Yes,” Volpone said. “When they just stand, open-mouthed, and find themselves deluded —”

“Yes,” Mosca said.

“And you will treat them scurvily!” Volpone said. “Hurry. Put on better clothing, the clothing of an upper-class man!”

Mosca put on a fine shirt and asked, “But what about, sir, if they ask after the body?”

“Say that it was beginning to rot.”

“I’ll say it stank, sir,” Mosca said, “and I was obliged to have it coffined up immediately, and sent away.”

“Say anything that you want,” Volpone said. “Wait, here’s my will. Get yourself a cap, and have an account book, pen and ink, and papers in front of you. Sit as if you were taking an inventory of my property. I’ll get up behind the curtain, on a stool, and listen. Occasionally, I’ll peep over the curtain to see how they look, and with what degrees their blood leaves their faces. Oh, it will give me a rare meal of laughter!”

Mosca put on a cap, and put the required items on a table in front of him.

He said, “Your advocate, Voltore, will turn stark dull — completely insensible — upon hearing that I am your heir.”

“It will take off his oratory’s sharpness,” Volpone said.

Mosca added, “But your clarissimo, Corbaccio, old round-back, he will crump — curl up — like a wood louse when it is touched.”

A clarissimo is a grandee of Venice.

Corbaccio, an old man, was stooped-over.

“And what about Corvino?” Volpone asked.

“Oh, sir, look for him tomorrow morning to run around in the streets with a rope and dagger, thinking about committing suicide or violence,” Mosca said. “When he learns that I am your heir, he must run mad. Lady Would-be, too, who came into the court to bear false witness for your worship —”

“Yes, and kissed me in front of the Fathers, although all my face flowed with oils,” Volpone said.

“And with sweat, sir,” Mosca said, saying the same thing that Volpone had said but using the less genteel term.

Mosca added, “Why, your gold is such medicine that it dries up all those offensive smells. It transforms people who are the most deformed, and it restores them and makes them lovely, as if it were the strange poetical girdle of Venus that makes anyone who wears it irresistible. Jove himself — the King of the gods — could not invent for himself clothing more cunning to pass by the guards of Acrisius.”

Jove, aka Jupiter, had in fact worn gold when he visited Danaë, the daughter of Acrisius. He had appeared to her in a shower of gold after Acrisius had locked her in a tower after hearing a prophecy that she would give birth to a son who would kill him. Jove slept with Danaë, who gave birth to Perseus, who grew up and killed Acrisius.

Mosca continued, “Gold is the thing that gives all the world her grace, her youth, her beauty.”

“I think she loves me,” Volpone said, referring to gold.

“Who? The Lady Would-be, sir?” Mosca asked.

Realizing that Volpone was referring to gold, and knowing that Volpone would think he was referring to Lady Would-be, Mosca said, “She’s jealous of you.”

In addition to the meaning we know best, the word “jealous” had two meanings that are now obsolete: 1) devoted, and 2) doubtful and mistrustful.

Mosca meant that gold, like Lady Fortune, was a fickle mistress. Already Mosca was planning to make use of the will that Voltore had given to him.

“Do you think so?” Volpone said. “Do you think Lady Would-be is jealous of me?”

Knocking sounded at the door.

“Listen,” Mosca said. “Someone is here already.”

“Look and see who it is,” Volpone ordered.

Mosca looked out a window and said, “It is the vulture: Voltore. He has the quickest scent.”

Vultures are known for their ability to quickly sniff out dead bodies.

“I’ll go to my place behind the curtain,” Volpone said. “You be ready to act as though I am dead and you are my heir.”

Volpone went behind the curtain.

Mosca said, “I am ready.”

Volpone said, “Mosca, play the skilled torturer now. Torture them splendidly.”

— 5.3 —

Voltore entered the room and asked, “How are you now, my Mosca?”

Mosca sat at the desk, writing as he inventoried Volpone’s wealth. He said, “Turkish carpets, nine —”

Voltore said with approval, “Taking an inventory! That is good.”

Mosca said, “Two suits of bedding, tissue —”

Voltore interrupted, “Where’s the will? Let me read that while you take inventory.”

Some servants entered, carrying Corbaccio in a chair.

Corbaccio said, “Set me down, and all of you go home.”

The servants exited.

Voltore said, “Has he, Corbaccio, come now to trouble us!”

Mosca said, “— of cloth of gold, two more —”

Tissue of cloth of gold is high-quality cloth that has strands of gold and silver woven into it.

Corbaccio asked, “Is it done, Mosca?”

He was asking if Volpone’s will had been changed to name him as heir.

Mosca said, “Of separate velvet hangings, eight —”

Voltore said, “I like the care Mosca is taking as he makes the inventory.”

Corbaccio asked, “Didn’t you hear me?”

Corvino entered the room and said, “Ha! Has the hour of Volpone’s death come, Mosca?”

Volpone looked over the curtain and said, “Yes, now they muster.”

Corvino asked, “What are the advocate Voltore and old Corbaccio doing here?”

Corbaccio asked, “What are Voltore and Corvino doing here?”

Lady Would-be entered the room and said, “Mosca! Is Volpone’s thread spun?”

She was referring to the Three Fates. Clotho spun the thread of a human’s life, Lachesis measured it, and Atropos cut the thread at the time of the human’s death.

Mosca said, “Eight chests of linen —”

Volpone looked over the curtain and said, “Oh, my fine Dame Would-be, too!”

Corvino said, “Mosca, give me the will so that I may show it to these people and get rid of them.”

Mosca said, “Six chests of linen with a diamond-shaped pattern, four of damask.”

He then picked up the will that named him as heir, and gave it to Corvino carelessly over his shoulder, saying, “There.”

Corbaccio asked, “Is that the will?”

Mosca said, “Down-beds, and bolsters —”

A bolster is a long pillow placed under other pillows as support.

Volpone looked over the curtain and said, “Splendid! Continue to be busy. Now the legacy-hunters begin to flutter! They never think of me. Look! See! See! See! How their swift eyes run over the long deed, to the name, and to the legacies, seeking what is bequeathed to them there —”

Mosca said, “Ten sets of wall hangings —”

Volpone looked over the curtain and said, “Hangings, yes, in their garters, Mosca. Now their hopes are at the last gasp.”

An insult of the time was, “Go hang yourself in your own garters!”

Voltore said, “Mosca is the heir?”

The hard-of-hearing Corbaccio asked, “What’s that?”

Volpone looked over the curtain and said, “My advocate, Voltore, is struck dumb. Look at my merchant, Corvino; he has heard of some strange storm, a ship of his has been lost, and he faints. My lady will swoon. Old glass-eyes, aka Corbaccio with his eyeglasses, has not reached his despair yet.”

Corbaccio took the will, saying, “All these others are out of hope. I am surely the man who has been named Volpone’s heir.”

Corvino asked, “But, Mosca —”

Still writing the inventory, Mosca said, “Two cabinets.”

Corvino asked, “Is this in earnest? Is this for real?”

Mosca said, “One made of ebony —”

Corvino asked, “Or are you only deluding me?”

Mosca said, “The other, made of mother of pearl.”

He looked at Corvino and said, “I am very busy. Indeed, this is a fortune that has been thrown upon me —”

He wrote as he said, “Item, one salt cellar made out of agate —”

He looked at Corvino and said, “— a fortune that has been thrown upon me without my seeking it.”

This is something that would especially hurt the legacy-hunters. They had sought the legacy and not gotten it; Mosca had not sought the legacy and had gotten it.

Lady Would-be asked, “Do you hear me, sir?”

Mosca said, “A perfumed box —”

He said to Lady Would-be, “Please stop bothering me. You see I’m busy —”

He continued, “— made of an onyx —”

Lady Would-be said, “What!”

Mosca said to all the legacy-hunters, “Tomorrow or the next day, I shall be at leisure to talk with you all.”

Corvino asked, “Is this the end result of my great expectations?”

Lady Would-be said to Mosca, “Sir, I must have a fairer answer.”

“Madam!” Mosca said. “Indeed, and you shall. Please fairly leave my house.”

She looked angry.

He added, “No, raise no tempest with your looks, but listen to me. Remember what your ladyship offered me to put you in Volpone’s will as an heir.”

Mosca was saying obliquely that she had offered him sex. Apparently, this had happened after the trial.

He added, “Go ahead, think on it. And think on what you said even the best madams did to provide for themselves, and why shouldn’t you? Enough. Go home, and treat the poor Sir Pol, your knight, well, out of fear I tell some riddles — some secrets. Go and be melancholy.”

Lady Would-be exited.

Volpone looked over the curtain and said, “Oh, my fine devil!”

Corvino said, “Mosca, I would like a word with you.”

“Lord!” Mosca said. “Won’t you take your leave from here yet? I think, of all the legacy-hunters here, you should have been the example for the others and left first. Why should you stay here? What are you thinking? What do you think you will get? Listen to me. Don’t you know that I know you are an ass, and that you would most eagerly have been a willing cuckold, if fortune would have allowed you to be? Don’t you know that I know you are declared to be a cuckold, and you are OK with it?”

He picked up various jewels as he said, “This pearl, you’ll say, was yours? That is correct. This diamond, you’ll say, was yours? I’ll not deny it, but I will say ‘Thank you.’ Much here else, you’ll say, was yours? It may be so. Why, think that these good deeds — your gifts — may help to hide your bad deeds.”

He added, “I’ll not betray you. Although you are extraordinary, and you are a cuckold only in title but not in deed, since Celia never committed adultery, it is enough. Go home. Be melancholy, too, or be insane.”

Corvino exited.

Volpone looked over the curtain and said, “Splendid Mosca! How his villainy becomes him!”

Voltore said to himself, “Certainly Mosca is deluding all these other legacy-hunters for me.”

Looking at the will, the eyeglasses-wearing Corbaccio said, “Mosca is the heir!”

Volpone looked over the curtain and said, “Oh, his four eyes have found it.”

Corbaccio said, “I am tricked, cheated, by a parasite slave.”

He said to Mosca, "Harlot, you have gulled me."

At this time, the word "harlot" meant "rascal" when applied to a man.

"Yes, sir," Mosca said. "I have cheated you. Stop your mouth, or I shall pull out the only tooth that is left.

"Aren't you he, that filthy covetous wretch, with the three legs — one of them a cane — who here, in hope of prey, have, any time these past three years, snuffed about, with your most groveling nose, and would have hired me to poison my patron, sir?"

"Aren't you the man who has today in court professed the disinheriting of your son?"

"Aren't you the man who has today in court perjured yourself?"

"Go home, and die, and stink. If you but croak a syllable, all comes out. Go away, and call your porters to carry you home!"

Corbaccio exited.

Mosca said, "Go. Go and stink."

Volpone looked over the curtain and said, "Excellent varlet!"

Voltore said, "Now, my faithful Mosca, I find your loyalty ___"

"Sir!" Mosca said.

"— to be sincere," Voltore finished.

Mosca wrote on the inventory and said, "A table made of porphyry."

He then said to Voltore, “I marvel that you’ll be thus troublesome to me.”

Volpone said, “Stop your act now. The others are gone. We are alone.”

“Why? Who are you?” Mosca said. “What! Who sent for you?”

He began to imitate Voltore: “Oh, I beg your mercy, reverend sir! In good faith, I am grieved for you that any good luck of mine should thus defeat your — I must necessarily say — most deserving travails.”

Voltore had worked very hard and suffered travails in his attempts to inherit Volpone’s wealth.

Mosca continued, “But I protest, sir, Volpone’s fortune was cast upon me, and I could almost wish to be without it except that the will of the dead must be observed.

“Indeed, my joy is that you don’t need it. You have a gift, sir — thank your education — that will never let you go without while there are men and malice to breed lawsuits. I wish I had only half the means of making a living like yours. For that, I would give all my fortune, sir!

“If I should have any lawsuits — but I hope, since things are so easy and direct and the will is so clear, I shall not — I will make bold with your obstreperous, aka noisy, aid. Please understand, sir, that I will pay your usual fee, sir.

“In the meantime, I know that you who know so much law will also have the conscience not to be covetous of what is mine.

“Good sir, I thank you for my plate — the gold plate you gave to Volpone that is now mine. It will help to set up in life a young man — me.

“Indeed, you look as if you were constipated. You had best go home and take a laxative, sir.”

Voltore exited.

Volpone came out from behind the curtain and said, “Tell him to eat a lot of lettuce; I hear it acts as a laxative.

“My witty mischief, let me embrace you. Oh, I wish that I could now transform you to a Venus!”

To Volpone, cheating people was an aphrodisiac; it made him horny.

He added, “Mosca, go, immediately get my outdoors clothing of a clarissimo — a Venetian gentleman. Now that everyone thinks that you are rich, you can wear it. Put it on, and walk on the public streets. Be seen by the legacy-hunters, and torment them some more. We must pursue, as well as plot. Who would have lost this feast? Who would have missed out on all this fun?”

“I fear doing that will lose them,” Mosca said.

He feared that any more mockery would kill the geese that had been laying golden eggs — the legacy-hunters would never again give gifts.

“Oh, my recovery shall recover all,” Volpone said optimistically. “They will find that I am still alive, and they will be as greedy as ever for my wealth.

“I wish that I could now think of some disguise that I could wear and meet them and ask them questions. How I would vex them always at every turn!”

“Sir, I can fit you,” Mosca said. “I can give you what you need.”

He was ambiguous when he said “what you need.” Volpone needed a disguise — and a comeuppance.

“Can you?” Volpone asked.

“Yes,” Mosca said. “I know one of the Commandatori, one of the police officers, sir, a man who greatly resembles you. I will immediately make him drunk and bring you his uniform.”

Volpone, who had been drinking, said, “This will be a splendid disguise, and one that is worthy of your brain! Oh, I will be a sharp pain to the legacy-hunters.”

“Sir, while in disguise, you must look for curses — the legacy-hunters will definitely curse you.”

Volpone said, “They will curse me until they burst. The fox always fares best when he is cursed.”

That is true. When the fox escapes the hunters, they curse it.

— 5.4 —

Outside Sir Politic Would-be’s house, Peregrine, who was in disguise, and three merchants talked.

Peregrine asked, “Am I well enough disguised?”

The First Merchant said, “I promise that you are.”

“All my ambition is only to frighten him,” Peregrine said. “That is the extent of my goal.”

The Second Merchant said, “If you could ship him away, it would be excellent.”

The Third Merchant said, “To Zant, or to Aleppo?”

Zant was a Greek island under the control of Venice, and Aleppo was a Syrian city. The merchants were talking about kidnapping Sir Politic Would-be and sending him far, far away.

“Yes, we could do that,” Peregrine said, “and then he would have his adventures put in the Book of Voyages and his gulled story registered for the truth.”

He was against kidnapping Sir Politic Would-be, although they could if they wanted. If they were to kidnap Sir Politic Would-be and ship him away, he would make up a fantastic tale — a tale to fool other people by making his part in it much more heroic than the reality — and it would appear in popular travel books of extraordinary tales. One such travel book was Richard Hakluyt’s three-volume The Principal Navigations, Voiages, Traffiques and Discoveries of the English Nation.

Peregrine said, “Well, gentlemen, when I have been inside for a while, and you think that Sir Politic Would-be and I are warm in our conversation, know your war-like approaches. Show up at the right time.”

The First Merchant said, “Trust it to our care. We will do it right.”

The merchants hid themselves.

Peregrine knocked, and a waiting-woman arrived.

He said, “May God save you, fair lady! Is Sir Pol inside?”

“I do not know, sir,” the waiting-woman replied.

“Please say to him that I am a merchant, on serious business, and I want to speak with him.”

“I will see, sir.”

She allowed him to go inside into a waiting room.

“Thank you.”

The waiting-woman exited.

Peregrine said to himself, "I see the servants of the household are all female here."

He had recently referred to Sir Pol as "Sir Bawd." He thought that Sir Pol's house was a brothel.

The waiting-woman returned and said, "He says, sir, that he has weighty affairs of state that now require his whole attention. At some other time you may possess his time."

Peregrine said, "Please go to him again and say that if those weighty affairs of state require his whole attention, these weighty affairs of state that I will talk to him about will forcibly compel him to pay attention. Those are the kinds of weighty affairs of state that I am bringing him tidings of."

The waiting-woman exited.

Peregrine said to himself, "What might be his grave affair of state now! How to make Bolognian sausages here in Venice, leaving out one of the ingredients in order to reduce the cost of making them?"

The waiting-woman returned and said, "Sir, he says that he knows by your word 'tidings' that you are no statesman, and therefore he wills you to wait."

Sir Politic Would-be believed that a statesman would use the word "intelligence" instead of "tidings."

The waiting-woman's words about willing Peregrine to wait were not clear. Peregrine thought that Sir Pol regarded him as being no statesman and therefore of no importance, and so Sir Pol was telling him to wait until Sir Pol deigned to meet him.

An angry Peregrine said, "Sweetheart, please return to him. I have not read as many proclamations and studied them for words to use, as he has done, but —"

He saw Sir Politic Would-be coming and said, “But — here he deigns to come.”

The waiting-woman’s words about willing Peregrine to wait really meant that since Peregrine was no statesman he was not dangerous to Sir Politic Would-be and so Sir Politic Would-be in fact would be out quickly to meet him. Sir Politic believed, or pretended to believe, that spies were watching him.

The waiting-woman exited.

Sir Politic Would-be said to the disguised Peregrine, “Sir, I must crave your courteous pardon. There has chanced today an unkind disaster between my lady and me, and I was penning my apology, to give her satisfaction, just as you came now.”

Sir Politic Would-be’s “weighty affairs of state” had been writing a letter of apology to his wife.

The disguised Peregrine said, “Sir, I am grieved that I bring you a worse disaster. The gentleman you met at the port today who told you that he was newly arrived —”

He was referring to himself.

Sir Politic Would-be asked, “Yes, was he a fugitive prostitute?”

He still believed that Peregrine had been a female prostitute dressed in men’s clothing.

“No, sir,” Peregrine said. “He was a spy set on you, and he related to the Venetian Senate that you professed to him to have a plot to sell the State of Venice to the Turks.”

“Oh!” Sir Politic Would-be said.

That crime was punishable by torture and death.

The disguised Peregrine said, “For which crime, warrants have been signed by this time to arrest you, and to search your study for papers —”

Sir Politic Would-be said, “Alas, sir, I have none, except notes drawn out of play-books —”

Many of his political ideas came out of books of plays.

“All the better to convict you, sir,” the disguised Peregrine said.

In fact, political authorities read and watched plays to ascertain if they were guilty of sedition. Political authorities sometimes arrested and tortured or threatened to torture playwrights.

Sir Politic Would-be continued, “— and some essays.”

Ben Jonson disliked many essays because he believed that the authors made too great use of quotations, thus making the essay’s information second-hand. Since Sir Politic Would-be got some of his political ideas from essays, any of that information he would impart would be third-hand.

Sir Politic Would-be asked, “What shall I do?”

The disguised Peregrine said, “Sir, it would be best to hide yourself in a chest for holding sugar. Or, if you could lie curled up, a frail would be splendid. In either case, I could send you onboard a ship.”

A frail is a rush basket used to ship figs and raisins.

Sir Politic Would-be said, “Sir, I just talked about the plot merely for the sake of conversation.”

Knocking sounded at the door.

The disguised Peregrine said, “Listen! They are here!”

“I am a wretch! A wretch!” Sir Politic Would-be said.

“What will you do, sir?” the disguised Peregrine said. “Haven’t you a cask or barrel to leap into? They’ll torture you on the rack; you must be quick to avoid being arrested.”

Sir Politic Would-be said, “Sir, I have a stratagem —”

The Third Merchant yelled from outside, “Sir Politic Would-be!”

The Second Merchant yelled from outside, “Where is he?”

Sir Politic Would-be continued, “— that I have thought up before this time in case it was needed.”

“What is it?” the disguised Peregrine asked.

“I shall never endure the torture,” Sir Politic Would-be said to himself.

He then said to the disguised Peregrine, “Indeed, it is, sir, a tortoise shell that is fit for this emergency. Please, sir, help me.”

He lifted a cover to reveal the shell of a large sea turtle and said, “Here I’ve got a place, sir, to put my legs. Please lay the shell on me, sir.”

He lay down while the disguised Peregrine placed the shell on top of him.

Sir Politic Would-be said, “With this cap, and my black gloves, I’ll lie, sir, like a tortoise, until they are gone.”

The disguised Peregrine thought, And you call this a stratagem?

“It’s my own idea,” Sir Politic Would-be said. “Good sir, tell my wife’s waiting-women to burn my papers.”

The disguised Peregrine exited.

The three merchants now rushed into the room.

The First Merchant asked, "Where has he hidden?"

The Third Merchant said, "We must and surely will find him."

The Second Merchant asked, "Which is his study?"

The disguised Peregrine returned.

The First Merchant asked, "Who are you, sir?"

The disguised Peregrine said, "I am a merchant who came here to look at this tortoise."

The Third Merchant said, "What!"

The First Merchant said, "By St. Mark, what beast is this!"

The disguised Peregrine said, "It is a fish."

The Second Merchant said to the "tortoise," "Come out here!"

The disguised Peregrine said, "You may strike the tortoise, sir, and walk on him. He's strong enough to bear a cart."

The First Merchant said, "What? Strong enough to bear a cart running over him?"

The disguised Peregrine said, "Yes, sir."

The Third Merchant said, "Let's jump on him."

The Second Merchant said, "Can't he move?"

"He creeps, sir," the disguised Peregrine said.

The First Merchant said, "Let's see him creep."

"No, good sir," the disguised Peregrine said. "You will hurt him."

The Second Merchant said, “By God’s heart, I will see him creep, or I will prick his guts.”

The Third Merchant said to the “tortoise,” “Come out here!”

“Please, sir!” the disguised Peregrine said.

He whispered to Sir Politic Would-be, “Creep a little.”

The First Merchant said, “Come forth.”

The “tortoise” moved a little.

The Second Merchant said, “Come farther still.”

“Good sir!” the disguised Peregrine said.

He whispered to Sir Politic Would-be, “Creep.”

The Second Merchant said, “We’ll see his legs.”

The three merchants pulled the shell off Sir Politic Would-be.

The Third Merchant said, “By God’s soul, the tortoise is wearing garters!”

The First Merchant said, “Yes, and gloves!”

The Second Merchant said, “Is this your fearful tortoise!”

The tortoise at one time had made its prey fearful, but now the “tortoise” was full of fear.

Peregrine removed his disguise and said, “Now, Sir Pol, we are even. I shall be prepared for your next project. I am sorry for the funeral — on a burning pier — of your notes, sir.”

Peregrine thought that Sir Politic Would-be had tried to set a trap for him with the help of Lady Would-be. Peregrine was wrong.

The First Merchant said, “This would make a splendid puppet show to be seen in Fleet Street.”

The Second Merchant said, “Yes, in the Term, when the law courts are in session and lots of people are in town.”

The First Merchant said, “Or at Smithfield, when Bartholomew Fair is being held.”

Because the three merchants had a good knowledge of England and were apparently good friends with Peregrine, they may have sailed together on the same ship to Venice and disembarked earlier this day.

The Third Merchant said, “I think this is just a melancholy sight.”

Peregrine said, “Farewell, most politic tortoise!”

Peregrine and the three merchants exited.

Sir Politic Would-be said to the waiting-woman, “Where’s my lady? Does she know about this?”

He thought that she might have known about the trick.

The waiting-woman replied, “I don’t know, sir.”

Sir Politic Would-be said, “Find out.”

The waiting-woman exited.

He lamented, “Oh, I shall be the fable told at all feasts, the freight of the newspapers, the tale of the ship-boys, and which is worst, even the main topic of gossip at the taverns.”

The waiting-woman returned and said, “My lady’s come home. She is very melancholy and says, sir, she will immediately go to sea for her health.”

Sir Politic Would-be said, “And I will go to sea in order to shun this place and climate forever. I will creep with my house on my back and think it well to shrink my poor head in my politic shell.”

Sir Politic Would-be and his wife would most likely return home to England. Apparently, he had learned something: not to pretend to be a statesman or a spy. A tortoise is a symbol of positive qualities: It does not pretend to be what it is not. Its house, which it carries on its back, is exactly what it needs. No tortoise has a grander or a lesser house than it needs. The tortoise is known for its slow but steady movement, and its ability to steadily move toward a goal often allows it to achieve the goal when faster, flashier, overconfident animals cannot; this is the moral of the Aesop fable “The Tortoise and the Hare.” Whether or not Sir Politic Would-be had come to Venice to gain knowledge, he had gained knowledge.

Erasmus wrote that “the mind fortified with virtue and philosophy fears the assaults of Fortune no more than a tortoise fears flies.” Many characters in this book need to learn this.

— 5.5 —

Just outside Volpone’s house, Volpone and Mosca were talking. Mosca was wearing the clothing of a clarrissimo, aka Venetian gentleman. Volpone was wearing the uniform of a police officer.

Volpone asked, “Do I look like the police officer?”

“Oh, sir, you are he,” Mosca said. “No man can tell the difference between you.”

“Good,” Volpone said.

“But what do I look like?” Mosca asked.

“Before Heaven, I say that you look like a brave clarissimo. You finely suit that suit of fine clothing! It’s a pity that you weren’t born a clarissimo.”

Mosca thought, If I can hold on to my artificial position of clarissimo, it will go well for me.

Volpone said, “I’ll go and see first what the news is at the court.”

Mosca said, “Do so.”

Volpone exited.

Alone, Mosca said, “My fox is out of his hole, and before he shall re-enter it, I’ll make him languish in his borrowed disguise until he comes to terms with me.”

He called, “Androgyno, Castrone, Nano!”

The three servants entered and said, “Here!”

Mosca said, “Go and entertain yourselves outside; go and have fun.”

They exited.

Alone, Mosca said, “So, now I have the keys, and I am possessed.”

He meant that he was in possession of the house. Readers may be forgiven if they thought he was possessed by a demon of Hell.

He continued, “Since Volpone wants to be dead before his time, I’ll bury him or gain by him. I am his heir, and so I will continue to be, until he at least shares his wealth with me. To cheat him out of everything he has would be only a well-deserved con: No man would call it a sin. Let the entertainment he gets out of conning others pay for his being conned; this is called the Fox-trap.”

Let's think about this.

According to Mosca, to cheat Corbaccio and Corvino out of everything they have would be only a well-deserved con: No man would call it a sin.

It's not true. By cheating Corbaccio, Volpone is also cheating Bonario, Corbaccio's innocent son. By cheating Corvino, Volpone is also cheating Celia, Corvino's innocent wife.

Even in the case of Mosca's cheating Voltore, cheating him is still a sin and a crime.

— 5.6 —

Corbaccio and Corvino talked on a Venetian street.

Corbaccio said, "They say that the court is set. It is ready to begin."

Corvino said, "We must continue to maintain the tale we told at the first court session, for both our reputations."

He meant that they needed to continue to tell the falsehoods they had earlier told. In Corvino's case, he needed to continue to lie that his wife had cuckolded him.

Corbaccio said, "Why, mine's no tale: My son would there have killed me."

He was telling only part of the truth — or at least part of what he believed to be the truth. When he had made Volpone his heir, his son had not even been suspected of anything evil. Of course, his son had had no intention of murdering him.

"That's true, I had forgotten —" Corvino said.

He thought, My testimony is a tale — a lie — I am sure.

He continued, "But as for your will, sir."

"Yes, I'll make a demand upon Mosca for that hereafter, now that his patron, Volpone, is dead."

Mosca still had the will that Corbaccio had made that listed Volpone as his heir.

Volpone, disguised as a police officer, entered the scene. His purpose was to torment the two legacy-hunters with their failure to inherit his wealth.

"Signior Corvino! And Corbaccio!" he called.

He said to Corbaccio, "Sir, much joy to you."

Corvino asked, "Much joy from what?"

"The sudden good that has dropped down upon you," the disguised Volpone answered.

"Where?" Corbaccio asked.

"None knows how, but it came from old Volpone, sir," the disguised Volpone said.

"Go away, arrant knave!" Corbaccio said.

"Don't allow your too much wealth, sir, to make you furious," the disguised Volpone said.

"Go away, you varlet!" Corbaccio said.

"Why, sir?" the disguised Volpone asked.

"Do you mock me?" Corbaccio asked.

"You mock everyone in the entire world, sir," the disguised Volpone said. "Didn't you and Volpone make each other your heir?"

Corbaccio said, "Out, harlot!"

The disguised Volpone said, “Oh, if Corbaccio didn’t inherit Volpone’s wealth, then probably you are the man, Signior Corvino. Indeed, you carry your new wealth well; you haven’t grown insane because of your new riches. I love your spirit: You haven’t swollen up like bread with too much yeast because of your fortune. Some people would swell now like a wine-vat with such an autumn harvest of grapes, which is a metaphor for your new riches. Did he give you everything, sir?”

“Get lost, you rascal!” Corvino said.

“Truly, your wife has shown that she is every inch a woman by committing adultery, but you are well and you need not care because you have a good estate to bear the burden of being a cuckold, sir, and your estate is made much, much better by Volpone’s death — unless Corbaccio has a share.”

“Go away, varlet,” Corbaccio said.

“You will not acknowledge that you are the heir, sir,” the disguised Volpone said. “Why, that is wise. Thus do all gamblers, at all games, mislead other people. No man wants to appear as if he has won.”

Corvino and Corbaccio exited.

Seeing Voltore coming toward him, the disguised Volpone said, “Here comes my vulture, heaving his beak up in the air, and snuffing.”

— 5.7 —

Voltore complained to himself, “Outstripped thus, by a parasite — a man dependent upon another for the necessities of life! A slave who used to run errands, and make bows for crumbs! Well, what I’ll do —”

The disguised Volpone said, “The court waits for your worship. I even rejoice, sir, at your worship’s happiness, and

I rejoice that it fell into so learned hands, which understand the fingering —”

Clever cheaters make clever use of their fingers.

“What do you mean?” Voltore interrupted.

“I mean to be a suitor to your worship, for the small tenement, which needs repairs and is at the end of your long row of houses by the Piscaria, aka the fish market. It was, in the time of Volpone, your predecessor, before he grew diseased, as handsome, pretty, and well patronized a bawdy-house as any was in Venice, with no dispraise intended toward any of them. But it fell into disrepair along with him; his body and that house decayed, together.”

The disguised Volpone was pretending that Voltore had inherited the tenement from Volpone, who may have received income from the bawdy-house before making money from legacy-hunters.

“Come sir, stop your prating,” Voltore said.

“Why, if your worship will just give me your hand in a handshake to acknowledge that I may have the first refusal, I will have finished. That house is a mere toy, aka trifle, to you, sir; it is candle-rents.”

“Candle-rents” are the rents that come from a house that is dilapidated and growing worse. The house is wearing out and soon will bring in no more rent. Similarly, candles give off light, but they consume themselves in the process.

The disguised Volpone continued, “As your learned worship knows —”

Voltore interrupted, “What do I know?”

“Indeed, you know no end of your wealth, sir,” the disguised Volpone said. “May God decrease it!”

He deliberately said “decrease” rather than “increase.” A stereotype of police officers was they made many malapropisms — they misused words.

“Mistaking knave!” Voltore said. “Are you mocking my misfortune?”

“God’s blessing on your heart, sir,” the disguised Volpone said. “I wish it were more!”

The “more” could be God’s blessing on Voltore’s heart or God’s decreasing Voltore’s wealth.

Voltore exited.

The disguised Volpone said, “Now I will go to and mock my first victims — Corbaccio and Corvino — again, at the next corner.”

— 5.8 —

Corbaccio and Corvino stood on another part of the street as Mosca appeared and walked by them.

“Look at him,” Corbaccio said. “He is wearing our clothing — the clothing of a Venetian gentleman! Look at the impudent varlet!”

“I wish that I could shoot my eyes at him like stone cannonballs,” Corvino said.

The disguised Volpone walked over to them and asked, “But is this true, sir, about Mosca the parasite?”

Corbaccio said, “You again! Here to afflict us! Monster!”

“In good faith, sir,” the disguised Volpone said, “I’m heartily grieved that a man with a beard of your grave length should be so overreached. I never could endure that parasite’s hair; I thought that even his nose looked like that of a con man.

There always was something in his look that promised the bane of a clarissimo.”

Corbaccio, Corvino, Voltore, and Volpone himself all had the title of clarissimo.

Corbaccio began, “Knave —”

The disguised Volpone interrupted, “I still think that you, who are so experienced in the world, a witty merchant, the fine bird, Corvino, who have such moral emblems on your name, should not have sung your shame, and dropped your cheese, to let the fox laugh at your emptiness.”

A moral emblem is an illustration with a printed explanation that points out the moral. Many moral emblems come from animal fables.

Volpone was referring to Aesop’s fable about the Fox, the Cheese, and the Crow. Corvino, whose name means “crow,” had sung about his shame — the shame of being cuckolded — in open court. Now the fox — Volpone — was laughing at Corvino’s emptiness. The crow’s belly was empty in the fable, but Corvino’s head was empty. He lacked intelligence and moral insight.

Corvino said, “Sirrah, you think the privilege of the place, and your red saucy cap, that seems to me nailed to your blockhead with those two chequins, can warrant and officially sanction your abuses.”

They stood on a public street, and in particular a public street just outside the courtroom. No violence would be tolerated there. In addition, Volpone was wearing the uniform of a police officer, which included a cap with two medallions of St. Mark — the medallions resembled the gold coins known as chequins.

He continued, “If you come hither, you shall perceive, sir, that I dare to beat you; approach.”

“There is no haste, sir,” the disguised Volpone said. “I know your valor well, since you dare to publish what you are, sir.”

Volpone did know Corvino’s valor well; Corvino had beaten Volpone when he was disguised as a mountebank; however, Volpone’s “compliment” was actually an insult: Corvino must be a brave man in order to announce publicly in court that he is a cuckold.

Corvino said, “Wait, I want to speak with you.”

“Sir, sir, another time,” the disguised Volpone said.

“No, now,” Corvino insisted.

“Oh lord, sir!” the disguised Volpone said, adding sarcastically, “I would be a wise man if I would stand and face the fury of a distracted cuckold.”

He began to run away just as Mosca returned.

Corbaccio said, “What! Mosca has come again!”

Volpone said as he neared Mosca, “Face them, Mosca! Save me!”

Corbaccio said, “The air’s infected where Mosca breathes.”

Corvino said, “Let’s flee from him.”

Corbaccio and Corvino exited.

Volpone said to Mosca, “Excellent basilisk! Voltore is coming. Turn upon the vulture.”

A basilisk is a mythical serpent that can kill anyone with its look.

Voltore walked over to Mosca and said, “Well, flesh-fly, it is summer with you now.”

A flesh-fly is a fly that lays its eggs in dead bodies. The Italian word mosca means “flesh-fly.”

Voltore continued, “Your winter will come on.”

Flies die in the winter in the Northern Hemisphere.

Mosca replied, “Good advocate, please don’t rail, nor threaten out of place like this. You will make a solecism, as madam — Lady Would-be — says.”

A solecism is a breach of propriety.

Mosca continued, “Get yourself another lawyer’s cap; your brain is breaking loose and falling out of the one you are now wearing.”

Voltore said, “Well, sir.”

Mosca exited.

The disguised Volpone asked Voltore, “Do you want me to beat the insolent slave and throw dirt upon his first good clothes?”

Voltore, who knew he was being mocked, looked at the disguised Volpone and said to himself, “This man is doubtless some familiar.”

He meant that the disguised Volpone was a familiar friend of Mosca, or a member of Mosca’s household, or a familiar spirit of a witch.

The disguised Volpone said, “Sir, the court truly is waiting for you. I am mad that a mule that never read Justinian should get up and ride an advocate.”

Lawyers often rode mules to the court. Volpone meant that Mosca, who never had read the codified law that the Roman Emperor Justinian had ordered to be made, had gotten the better of Voltore. It was as if a mule were riding the lawyer, rather than the lawyer riding the mule.

The disguised Volpone continued, “Had you no lawyerly trick to avoid being made a fool, sir, by such a creature? I hope that you are only jesting; he has not done it. It is just a confederacy between you and Mosca so that you can blind the rest to the true fact that you are the heir.”

Voltore said, “You are a strange, officious, troublesome knave! You torment me.”

The disguised Volpone said, “I know ... that it cannot be, sir, that you should be cheated. It is not within the wit of man to do it. You are so wise and so prudent, and it is fit that wealth and wisdom should always go together.”

Voltore exited with the disguised Volpone following and tormenting him.

— 5.10 —

The Judges, the Notary, Bonario, Celia, Corbaccio, Corvino, police officers, etc. were in the Scrutineo.

The First Judge asked, “Are all the parties here?”

The Notary answered, “All except the advocate Voltore.”

The Second Judge said, “And here he comes.”

Voltore and the disguised Volpone arrived.

The First Judge ordered, “Now bring Bonario and Celia forth to be sentenced.”

Putting on an act of suffering great emotional turmoil, Voltore said, “Oh, my most honored fathers, let your mercy for once win out over your justice, to forgive — I am distracted, greatly troubled, divided —”

The disguised Volpone thought, What is he doing?

What Voltore was doing was trying to get revenge on Mosca, who had been tormenting him.

Voltore said, “Oh, I don’t know who to address myself to first — whether your Fatherhoods, or these innocents, Bonario and Celia —”

Will he betray himself? Corvino thought.

Voltore continued, “— whom equally I have abused, out of most covetous motivations —”

Corvino said out loud, “The man is insane!”

Corbaccio asked, “What’s that? What did you say?”

“Voltore is possessed by the devil,” Corvino said.

Voltore continued, “— for which, now struck in conscience, here I prostrate myself at your offended feet, and I ask for pardon.”

He knelt.

The First and Second Judges said, “Arise.”

Voltore stood up.

Celia said, “Oh, Heaven, how just you are!”

Volpone thought, I am caught in my own noose.

By pretending to be dead and to have made Mosca his heir, and by having Mosca torment Voltore, he had given Voltore a reason to speak up in court.

Corvino said to Corbaccio, “Be constant, sir. Don’t change the story you told in court earlier. Nothing now can help, except for impudence.”

He wanted Corbaccio and himself to continue to maintain as true the lies they had testified to in court earlier that day.

The First Judge said, “Continue speaking.”

A police officer ordered the people in the courtroom, “Silence!”

Voltore said, “It is not madness in me, reverend fathers, but only conscience, conscience, my good sires, that makes me now tell the truth. That parasite, that knave, has been the instrument of all. He is the party responsible for what is wrong.”

The First Judge said, “Where is that knave? Fetch him.”

Volpone, still disguised as a police officer, said, “I will go and fetch him.”

He exited.

Worried about being found guilty of committing perjury in the earlier trial, Corvino said, “Grave fathers, this man — Voltore — is distracted and out of his wits. He confessed it just now. For, hoping to be the heir of old Volpone, who now is dead —”

“What!” the Third Judge said.

“Is Volpone dead?” the Second Judge asked.

Corvino answered, “He has died since you last saw him, grave Fathers —”

Bonario said, “Oh, this is surely vengeance!”

He believed that God had punished Volpone because Volpone had tried to rape Celia.

The First Judge said, “Wait, then Volpone was no deceiver?”

If Volpone had been a deceiver, he would have been in good health and only pretending to be sick. His death showed that he was no deceiver.

Voltore replied, “Oh, no, he was not a deceiver.”

As far as Voltore knew, Volpone was not a deceiver. Volpone believed that Volpone had really been ill for three years and had really just died, and therefore he must have been too ill to attempt to rape Celia.

Voltore continued, “But as for the parasite, grave Fathers —”

Corvino said, “Voltore is speaking only out of complete envy because Volpone’s servant has gotten the thing Voltore hoped to swallow. If it please your Fatherhoods, this is the truth, though I’ll not exonerate the parasite, for he may be somewhat at fault.”

Corvino would be happy to get Mosca in trouble.

Voltore said, “Yes, the parasite is responsible for dashing your hopes, as well as mine, Corvino, but I’ll use modesty, moderation, and restraint as I talk.”

Voltore was trying to tell Corvino that Corvino’s perjury need not come out. Voltore wanted to get Mosca in trouble, and if he could do that without getting Corvino in trouble, that would be OK. But that was a deliberate deception. His papers would inform the Judges that Celia had been forcibly brought to Volpone’s house by Corvino, her husband, and left there. Voltore’s papers would also say that Mosca had lied about Bonario and about Celia. Mosca had said that Bonario had wanted to kill Corbaccio, his own father. He had also testified that Celia had come to Volpone's house of her own free will.

Voltore gave the Judges some papers and said, "If it pleases your wisdoms to view these certain, reliable notes, and simply confer about them, as I hope you will favor me, they shall speak the clear truth."

Still worried, Corvino said, "The devil has entered him!"

Bonario said, "Or bides in you."

The Fourth Judge said, "We have done ill by sending a public police officer for him, if he really is the heir."

The Second Judge asked, "For whom?"

The Fourth Judge said, "The man whom they call the parasite; he is apparently Volpone's heir and a rich man now."

So far, Mosca's name had not been mentioned during the trials; he had always been referred to as a parasite and a knave.

The Third Judge said, "That is true. He is a man of great estate now that he is Volpone's heir and Volpone has died."

The Fourth Judge said to the Notary, "Go and learn his name, and say to him that the court requests his presence here only for the clearing up of a few questions."

Because Mosca was thought to be a rich man now, the Judges wanted to treat him with respect and definitely not call him a parasite.

The Notary exited.

The Second Judge, who had been reading Volpone's notes, said, "This is a labyrinth!"

Volpone's notes contradicted some of what had been said at the previous trial.

The First Judge asked Corvino, "Do you stand by your testimony in the first trial? Is that testimony true?"

Corvino said, "My estate, my life, my reputation —"

Bonario said sarcastically, "What reputation!"

Corvino continued, "— are at the stake."

His words were ambiguous. One meaning was that he was staking his estate, life, and reputation on the truth of his earlier testimony. Another meaning was that his estate, life, and reputation were tied to a stake like a bear at a bear-baiting. In the "sport" of bear-baiting, a bear would be tied to a stake and then dogs would be set to torment it.

The First Judge asked Corbaccio, "Do you also stand by your testimony in the first trial? Is that testimony true?"

Corbaccio answered, "The advocate — Voltore — is a knave, and he has a forked tongue —"

The Second Judge said, "Speak to the point. Answer the question."

Corbaccio saying that Voltore is a knave is not the same thing as Corbaccio saying that his earlier testimony had been true.

Corbaccio added, "So is the parasite. He is a knave, too."

The First Judge said, "This is all confusion."

Voltore said, "I beseech your Fatherhoods just to read those papers I gave you."

Corvino said to the Judges, "Give no credit to anything that the false spirit has written. Nothing else is possible except that Voltore is possessed by a devil, grave fathers."

— 5.11 —

Volpone walked on a street, alone.

He said to himself, "I have made a snare — a noose — for my own neck by pretending to have died! I have run my head into the snare and noose of my own free will! And I did it while I was laughing at and tormenting the legacy-hunters! Plus, I did it when I had just escaped from the first trial and was free and clear. I did it — got myself into new trouble — out of mere wantonness! Oh, the dull devil of stupidity and alcohol was in this brain of mine when I devised my plan, and Mosca seconded it. He must now help me to sear up — cauterize — this vein, or we will bleed out and die."

Nano the dwarf, Androgyno the hermaphrodite, and Castrone the eunuch came walking down the street and met Volpone.

Volpone asked, "What is going on? Who let you loose out of the house? Where are you going now? To buy gingerbread? Or to drown kittens?"

Nano the dwarf said, "Sir, master Mosca called us out of doors and told us all to go and have a day off, and he took the keys."

Androgyno the hermaphrodite said, "Yes, what Nano said is the truth."

Volpone said, "Did master Mosca take the keys? Well! I'm in deeper trouble than I thought."

He was immediately suspicious of Mosca. If Mosca had the keys, he could prevent Volpone from entering his own house.

He continued, “These are my fine schemes! I must be merry, and the result is evil to me! What a vile wretch was I, who could not bear my fortune soberly! I had to have my fancies and my whims!

“Well, all of you go and seek Mosca. His reason for taking my keys may be more loyal to me than I fear it is. Tell him that he must immediately come to me in the court. Thither I will go, and if it is possible, I will unscrew my advocate, Voltore, who is wound tight, by giving him new hopes of inheriting my property. When I provoked him, then I lost myself.”

— 5.12 —

In the Scrutineo, the Judges had been examining Voltore’s papers.

The First Judge said, “Voltore here in these papers states that the gentleman Bonario was wronged and that the gentlewoman Celia was forcibly brought to Volpone’s house by her husband, and left there.”

Voltore said, “That is very true.”

Celia said, “How ready is Heaven to help those who pray!”

The First Judge said, “But that Volpone attempted to rape her, he holds to be utterly false. He says that he knows that Volpone was impotent.”

Voltore certainly believed that to have been the truth.

Corvino, desperate to stay out of trouble, said, “Grave Fathers, Voltore is possessed. Again, I say that a devil has possessed his body. Indeed, if it is possible for possession and obsession to exist together, he has both.”

In possession, a devil enters the person’s body and controls it. If lust for gold is a demon, Voltore was possessed. In obsession, a devil controls the person from outside the body. The disguised Volpone would show up almost immediately and would control Voltore.

The Third Judge said, “Here comes our police officer.”

Volpone, still disguised as a police officer, entered the courtroom.

He said, “The parasite will immediately be here, grave Fathers.”

The Fourth Judge said severely, “You might invent some name other than ‘parasite’ for him, Sir Varlet.”

The use of “Sir” was sarcastic.

The Third Judge asked, “Didn’t the Notary meet him?”

“Him” referred to Mosca.

“Not that I know,” the disguised Volpone said.

The Fourth Judge said, “His [Mosca’s] testimony will clear up everything.”

“So far,” the Second Judge said, “everything is misty.”

Voltore said, “May it please your Fatherhoods —”

The disguised Volpone whispered to him, “Sir, the parasite wanted me to tell you that his master is still alive, you are still the heir, your hopes are the same as they were before his supposed death, and this was only a jest —”

“How is this possible?” Voltore asked.

The disguised Volpone said, “Sir, he wanted to test if you were loyal to him, and how you were disposed toward him.”

“Are you sure he is alive?” Voltore asked.

“Do I live, sir?” the disguised Volpone asked. “I am as sure he is alive as I am sure I am alive.”

“Oh, me!” Voltore said. “I have been too violent, aggressive, and bold.”

“Sir, you may redeem it,” the disguised Volpone said. “They said you were possessed by a devil. Fall down, and seem to be possessed. I’ll help you to pull this trick off.”

Voltore fell to the floor as if he were having a fit.

The disguised Volpone said loudly, “God bless the man!”

He whispered to Voltore, “Breathe deeply, hold your breath, and swell your cheeks.”

He said loudly, “Look! Look! Look! Look! He vomits crooked pins! His eyes are staring like a dead hare’s hung in a poulterer’s shop! His mouth’s awry!”

He said to Corvino, “Do you see, signior?”

Voltore pretended that a devil was moving around in his body. He moved different muscles to simulate the devil’s movements.

The disguised Volpone said, “Now it is in his belly!”

Corvino, recognizing an opportunity to discount Voltore’s previous testimony, said, “Yes, it’s the devil!”

Voltore made swallowing movements.

The disguised Volpone said, “Now it’s in his throat!”

Corvino said, “Yes, I perceive it plainly.”

The disguised Volpone said, “The devil is coming out! It’s leaving the body! Stand clear. See, where it flies, in the shape of a blue toad, with a bat’s wings!”

This society believed in demonic possessions and in exorcisms. Demonic possessions and exorcisms were sometimes faked.

Sulphur, which is associated with devils, burns with a blue color. In this society, toads and bats were also associated with devils.

The disguised Volpone asked, “Corbaccio, don’t you also see it, sir?”

“What?” Corbaccio said. “I think I do.”

Corvino said, “It is very evident. I definitely saw it.”

The disguised Volpone said, “Look! Voltore is coming to himself! He is regaining consciousness!”

“Where am I?” Voltore asked.

“Take good heart, the worst is past, sir,” the disguised Volpone said. “You are dispossessed.”

“What a strange turn of events this is!” the First Judge said.

“It is sudden, and full of wonder!” the Second Judge said.

“If Voltore were possessed, as it appears he was, all this he has said is nothing,” the Third Judge said. “We can’t believe his papers or his testimony.”

“He has been often subject to these fits,” Corvino said.

The First Judge said, “Show him that writing.”

Voltore’s papers were handed to him.

The First Judge asked, “Do you know these papers, sir?”

Volpone whispered to Voltore, “Deny them, sir. Forswear them. Don’t admit you know them.”

“Yes, I know them well,” Voltore said to the Judges. “This is my handwriting, but everything written in these papers is false.”

“Oh, this is deceit!” Bonario said.

“What a maze this is!” the Second Judge said.

“Is he not guilty then?” the First Judge said. “I mean the man you call the parasite in your papers.”

“Grave fathers,” Voltore said, “He is no more guilty than his good patron, old Volpone.”

“Why, he is dead,” the Fourth Judge said.

“Oh no, my honored fathers,” Voltore said. “Volpone still lives.”

“What!” the First Judge said. “Is he still alive?”

“Yes,” Voltore said. “He is still alive.”

“This is getting even more complicated!” the Second Judge said.

“You said he was dead,” the Third Judge said.

“Never,” Voltore said.

“You said so,” the Third Judge said.

“I heard you say it,” Corvino said.

Mosca, dressed like a gentleman, walked into the courtroom.

The Fourth Judge said, “Here comes the gentleman; make way for him.”

The Third Judge said, “Get him a stool to sit on.”

The Fourth Judge thought about Mosca, He is a handsome man, and if Volpone were dead, he would be a fit husband for my daughter.

“Give him room,” the Third Judge said.

The disguised Volpone whispered, “Mosca, I was almost lost. Voltore the advocate had revealed everything, but now it is all recovered. All’s on the hinge and moving smoothly again. Tell the Judges that I am living.”

Mosca said loudly about the disguised Volpone, “What interfering, meddling knave is this man?”

He then said to the Judges, “Most reverend Fathers, I would have arrived sooner to wait on your grave pleasures except that my order for the funeral of my dear patron required me —”

The disguised Volpone whispered, “Mosca!”

Mosca said, “— whom I intend to bury like a gentleman.”

The words “like a gentleman” were ambiguous. They could refer to Volpone or to Mosca, or both. Like a gentleman, Mosca could bury Volpone like a gentleman.

Also, the words “bury like a gentleman” were ambiguous. Did he mean to bury Volpone like a gentleman, or at some later date have a gentleman’s burial for himself?

Volpone thought, Yes, you would like to bury me like a gentleman — so quickly that I am still alive — and cheat me out of everything.

“This is even stranger!” the Second Judge said. “It is very intricate!”

“And come about again!” the First Judge said.

Volpone had been declared dead by Corvino and then alive by Voltore and now was declared dead again by Mosca.

The Fourth Judge thought, Volpone is dead. I have a husband for my daughter. She shall marry this man who has been called a parasite but who is now a gentleman.

Mosca whispered to the disguised Volpone, “Will you give me half of all your wealth?”

“First, I’ll be hanged,” the disguised Volpone said.

“I know,” Mosca whispered. “I heard you, your voice is good, cry out not so loudly.”

“Let us question the advocate,” the First Judge said.

He then asked Voltore, “Sir, didn’t you affirm that Volpone was alive?”

Instead of Voltore, the disguised Volpone answered the question, “Yes, and he is.”

He pointed to Mosca and said, “This gentleman told me so.”

He whispered to Mosca, “You shall have half of my wealth.”

Mosca said loudly about Volpone, “Whose drunkard is this man? Speak, someone who knows him. I have never seen his face before now.”

He whispered to Volpone, “I cannot now afford to help you so cheaply.”

Even if Mosca were to get Volpone’s promise to give Mosca half his wealth, what would prevent Volpone from renegeing on his promise later?

“No!” the disguised Volpone said.

The First Judge said to Voltore, “Answer the question. What do you say in answer to it?”

Voltore pointed to Volpone, who was still disguised as a police officer, and said, "This officer told me that Volpone is still alive."

"I did, grave Fathers," the disguised Volpone said, "and I will maintain he lives with my own life."

He pointed to Mosca and said, "And I maintain that this creature told me that Volpone is still alive."

He thought, I was born with all good stars as my enemies.

"Most grave Fathers," Mosca said, "if such insolence as this is allowed to be inflicted upon me, I am silent. I hope that this is not the reason for which you sent for me."

Referring to the disguised Volpone, the Second Judge said, "Take him away."

The disguised Volpone shouted, "Mosca!"

Referring to the disguised Volpone, the Second Judge said, "Let him be whipped."

The disguised Volpone said to Mosca, "Will you betray me? Cheat me?"

The Third Judge said, "And let him learn how to bear himself toward a person of a gentleman's rank."

"Take him away," the Fourth Judge ordered.

Some police officers seized the disguised Volpone.

Mosca said, "I humbly thank your Fatherhoods."

The disguised Volpone thought, Hold on! Wait! Whipped! And lose all that I have! If I confess, I cannot be punished much more harshly.

In hopes of getting his daughter wed to a wealthy man, the Fourth Judge asked Mosca, "Sir, are you married?"

The disguised Volpone thought, Mosca and the Fourth Judge's family will be allied soon through Mosca's engagement to the Fourth Judge's daughter. I must be resolute. The Fox shall here and now remove his disguise.

He took off his disguise and revealed himself to all present.

“Patron!” Mosca said.

Volpone said to him, “Now my ruin shall not come alone. Your wedding match I’ll certainly hinder. My wealth shall not allow you to attach yourself to a family or worm yourself into one.”

“Why, patron!” Mosca said.

“I am Volpone, and this is my knave,” Volpone said, pointing to Mosca.

He pointed to Voltore and said, “This man is his own knave.”

He pointed to Corbaccio and said, “This man is avarice’s fool.”

He pointed to Corvino and said, “This man is a chimera of wittol, fool, and knave.”

A wittol is a contented cuckold.

A chimera is a mythological monster that has the head of a lion, the body of a goat, and the tail of a snake.

Volpone continued, “And, reverend Fathers, since all we can hope for is nothing but a sentence, let’s not now despair of receiving it. You hear me ... brief.”

A brief is a begging petition. Volpone was not begging; this was as close to a begging petition as the Judges would get from him. He was also speaking only briefly so the Judges could get on with their sentencing.

Corvino, who was willing to beg, began, “May it please your Fatherhoods —”

A police officer ordered, “Silence!”

The First Judge said, “The knot is now undone by a miracle. All is clear.”

“Nothing can be more clear,” the Second Judge said.

The Judges could see that Volpone, who had been reputed to be dying for the last three years, was a vigorous, healthy man. The Judges were also aware of the many gifts that Volpone had received from the legacy-hunters. Intelligent people, the Judges could figure out what had happened.

“Nothing can more prove these two — Bonario and Celia — innocent,” the Third Judge said.

Volpone was certainly healthy enough to attempt to rape Celia.

“Give them their liberty,” the First Judge ordered.

“Heaven could not long let such gross crimes be hidden,” Bonario said.

The Second Judge said, “If this is held to be the highway to riches, I hope I may be poor!”

“This is not gain, but torment,” the Third Judge said.

“These possess wealth, as sick men possess fevers, which more truly may be said to possess them,” the First Judge said.

The Second Judge said, “That parasite is dressed like a gentleman. Take that clothing off him.”

Police officers stripped Mosca of his gentleman’s robe.

Corvino and Mosca said together, “Most honored Fathers!”

The First Judge asked, “Can you plead anything to stop or pause the course of justice? If you can, speak.”

Corvino and Voltore said, “We beg favor.”

Celia, who was very forgiving, added, “And mercy.”

The Judges were not forgiving.

The First Judge said to Celia, “You hurt your innocence by begging for the guilty. Stand back.”

He then said, “First we will judge the parasite.”

He said to Mosca, “You appear to have been the chief agent, if not plotter, in all these wicked impostures, and now, finally, you have with your impudence abused the court and worn the clothing of a gentleman of Venice, although you are a fellow of no noble birth and no noble blood.”

For a non-gentleman to wear the clothing of a gentleman was a serious crime in Venice.

The First Judge continued talking to Mosca, “For which our sentence is that first you will be whipped and then you will live as a perpetual prisoner in our galleys — our Venetian ships.”

“I thank you for him,” Voltore said.

Just minutes previously, Mosca had seemed to be a very wealthy gentleman.

Mosca snarled at Volpone, “Bane to your wolvish nature!”

Wolfbane is a poison.

The First Judge ordered, “Deliver him to the police officers.”

A bailiff took Mosca over to some police officers who escorted him out of the courtroom.

The First Judge said, “Thou, Volpone, who are by blood and rank a gentleman, cannot fall under a similar censure.”

The First Judge’s use of the word “thou” — and his use soon of the word “thee” — was that of a superior talking to someone much lower on the social scale. It was an insult.

He continued, “But our judgment on thee is that all your wealth be immediately confiscated and forfeited to the Hospital of the Incurabili — the Hospital of the Incurables.

“And since the most of your wealth was gotten by imposture, by feigning lame, gout, palsy, and such diseases, you are to lie in prison, cramped with irons, until you are sick and lame for real.”

He ordered, “Remove him.”

Volpone said, “This is called mortifying a Fox.”

Even in these circumstances, he was capable of wit. “Mortifying” was a multiple pun that meant these things:

- Humiliating. Volpone was publicly humiliated.
- Subjecting the body to discipline intended to subjugate bodily desires so that spiritual desires would be dominate.
- Giving wealth to charitable causes, aka disposing of wealth by mortification. Volpone’s wealth would go to the Hospital of the Incurables.
- Hanging up a dead game animal to let it become tender. Volpone would at least metaphorically be hung up in chains.
- Wasting away. Volpone would waste away in prison.
- Becoming gangrenous. Volpone’s chains in prison could very well cause gangrene.
- Causing death. Volpone would die in prison.

Volpone was taken over to some police officers, who escorted him out of the courtroom.

The First Judge said to the advocate, “Thou, Voltore, to take away the scandal thou has given all worthy men of your profession, are banished from their fellowship and from our state.”

He then said, “Corbaccio!”

He ordered the bailiff, “Bring him near to me so he can hear me!”

He then said to Corbaccio, “We here give thy son possession of all your estate, and we confine thee to the monastery of San Spirito, where, since you didn’t know how to live well here, thou shall be taught how to die well there.”

Corbaccio said, “Ah! What did he say?”

A police officer said, “You shall know soon, sir.”

The First Judge said, “Thou, Corvino, shall be immediately embarked from your own house, and rowed round about Venice, through the miles-long Canal Grande, wearing a cap with very long asses’ ears instead of horns.”

The asses’ ears would show that he is a fool. The cap had no horns because the court had determined that Celia was innocent of committing adultery.

The First Judge continued, “And then you will climb, with a paper describing your crimes pinned on your breast, to the pillory —”

The pillory was a wooden device that restrained a criminal’s hands and head. Often, people would torment the criminal while he was in the pillory.

“Yes,” Corvino said, “and I will have my eyes beaten out by all the things people will throw at me — stinking fish, bruised fruit, and rotten eggs. This punishment is good. I am glad that I shall be blind and shall not see my shame.”

The First Judge said, “And to expiate thy wrongs done to your wife, you are to send her home to her father, with her dowry trebled.”

He said to Voltore, Corbaccio, and Corvino, “And for your crimes, these are all your sentences —”

Voltore, Corbaccio, and Corvino pleaded, “Honored Fathers —”

The First Judge continued, “— which may not be revoked.

“Now you begin, when your crimes are done and past, and when you are to be punished, to think what your crimes are.”

He said to the police officers, “Take them away! Let all who see these vices thus rewarded, take them to heart and love to study them! Evil deeds feed like beasts, until they are fat, and then they bleed.”

EPILOGUE (Volpone, or the Fox)

Volpone says this to you the readers:

The seasoning of a play — and a book — is the applause.

Now, although the Fox is punished by the laws,

He yet does hope, there is no suffering due,

For any crime that he has done against you.

If there is, censure him; here he full of fears stands.

If not, fare jovially, and Jovially, and clap your hands.

***

In astrology, the planet Jupiter is associated with mirth and humor.

Cast: ANDROGYNO, a Hermaphrodite

True hermaphrodites exist.

Here is the beginning of the Wikipedia article on “True Hermaphroditism”:

True hermaphroditism, now clinically known as ovotesticular disorder of sex development, is a medical term for an intersex condition in which an individual is born with ovarian and testicular tissue. More commonly one or both gonads is an ovotestis containing both types of tissue.

https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/True\_hermaphroditism

Here is the beginning of a first-person account of a true hermaphrodite:

I Am a True Hermaphrodite

We Do Exist

People say that true hermaphroditism does not exist in humans; I can tell you for definite that it does. It's true that you cannot have a fully functional and complete set of both genitals together, but I was born with one ovary and one testicle, and that makes me a hermaphrodite.

“unprepared antimony” (2.2)

This is a quotation from John Man’s The Gutenberg Revolution: How Printing Changed the Course of History (2010), p. 130:

Antimony deserves respect. The silvery ore was much used in antiquity for make-up and as a means of chemical purification. It was said that monks, impressed by its chemical effects, swallowed it to purify their bodies. Unfortunately, antimony is deadly poisonous, so the only things they purified, if anything, were their souls. Almost certainly this is a piece of nonsense based on a false etymology that derives the metal’s name from anti/monos — ‘anti-monk’. In popular parlance it was ‘monks bane’.

Four Humors and Four Elements (2.2)

The society of Volpone believed in the theory of elements, which are earth, air, water, and fire, and the theory of humors, which are blood, phlegm, choler, and black choler.

Every physical thing, including the bodies of human beings, is made up of the four elements, each of which has associated qualities.

Earth is cold, heavy, and dry.

Air is hot, light, and wet.

Water is cold, heavy, and wet.

Fire is hot, light, and dry.

Doctors in this society believed that each of the human body's four humors, or vital fluids, made a contribution to the personality, and for a human being to be sane and healthy, the four humors had to be present in the right amounts. If a man had too much of a certain humor, it would harm his personality and health.

Blood was the sanguine humor. A sanguine man was optimistic.

Phlegm was the phlegmatic humor. A phlegmatic man was calm.

Yellow bile was the choleric humor. A choleric man was angry.

Black bile was the melancholic humor. A melancholic man was gloomy.

When a man was ill, doctors would try to get the four humors back into balance by purging him, often through bloodletting or through the use of laxatives. Mountebanks sold "medicines" that were supposed to bring the four humors into the correct balance.

"He shall come home, and minister unto you / The fricace for the mother" (2.5)

The "mother" is "hysteria." Doctors (mountebanks were quack doctors) would give women genital massages to make them orgasm as a treatment for hysteria.

The below is an excerpt from a New York Times review of this book: Rachel P. Mains, The Technology of Orgasm: "Hysteria," the Vibrator, and Women's Sexual Satisfaction. The Johns Hopkins University Press. 1999. Revised Ed. 2001.

In 1653 Pieter van Foreest, called Alemarianus Petrus Forestus, published a medical compendium titled Observationem et Curationem Medicinalium ac Chirurgicarum Opera Omnia, with a chapter on the diseases of women. For the affliction commonly called hysteria (literally, “womb disease”) and known in his volume as praefocatio matricis or “suffocation of the mother,” the physician advised as follows:

“When these symptoms indicate, we think it necessary to ask a midwife to assist, so that she can massage the genitalia with one finger inside, using oil of lilies, musk root, crocus, or [something] similar. And in this way the afflicted woman can be aroused to the paroxysm. This kind of stimulation with the finger is recommended by Galen and Avicenna, among others, most especially for widows, those who live chaste lives, and female religious, as Gradus [Ferrari da Gradi] proposes; it is less often recommended for very young women, public women, or married women, for whom it is a better remedy to engage in intercourse with their spouses.”

As Forestus suggests here, in the Western medical tradition genital massage to orgasm by a physician or midwife was a standard treatment for hysteria, an ailment considered common and chronic in women.

This is the review:

Sarah Boxer, “Batteries Not Included: A social history of the vibrator.” New York Times. 21 March 1999

<http://www.nytimes.com/books/99/03/21/reviews/990321.21boxert.html>

Note: Doctors hated doing this, largely because of the time it took, and so they often had midwives do this. In the 1880s, the vibrator was invented so that doctors wouldn’t have to perform genital massages on females.

“pull the pillow from his head” (2.6)

When people were dying, their pillows were taken away from under their heads to make it easier to die. The sixteenth-century Shiltei Hagiborim by R. Joshua Boaz argued against what he regarded as a form of what we would probably call euthanasia:

“There would appear to be grounds for forbidding the custom, practiced by some, in the case of someone who is dying and his soul cannot depart, of removing the pillow from underneath the gose [someone who is expected to die within 72 hours] so that he will die quickly. For they say that the bird feathers in the bedding prevent the soul from leaving the body.”

Horned Flood (3.7)

The below is from Sophocles’ Trachiniae (Women of Trachis):

My suitor was the river Achelóüs, who took three forms to ask me of my father: a rambling bull once — then a writhing snake of gleaming colors — then again a man with ox-like face: and from his beard’s dark shadows stream upon stream of water tumbled down. Such was my suitor.

Pearls — Lollia Paulini and Cleopatra (3.7)

The below is from Pliny’s Natural History:

Pliny the Elder, The Natural History. John Bostock, M.D., F.R.S., H.T. Riley, Esq., B.A., Ed.

I once saw Lollia Paulina, the wife of the Emperor Caius — it was not at any public festival, or any solemn ceremonial, but only at an ordinary wedding entertainment — covered with emeralds and pearls, which shone in alternate layers upon her head, in her hair, in her wreaths, in her ears, upon her neck, in her bracelets, and on her fingers, and the value of which amounted in all to forty millions of sesterces; indeed she was prepared at once to prove the fact, by showing the receipts and acquittances. Nor were these any presents made by a prodigal potentate, but treasures which had descended to her from her grandfather, and obtained by the spoliation of the provinces. Such are the fruits of plunder and extortion! It was for this reason that M. Lollius was held so infamous all over the East for the presents which he extorted from the kings; the result of which was, that he was denied the friendship of Caius Cæsar, and took poison; and all this was done, I say, that his grand-daughter might be seen, by the glare of lamps, covered all over with jewels to the amount of forty millions of sesterces! Now let a person only picture to himself, on the one hand, what was the value of the habits worn by Curius or Fabricius in their triumphs, let him picture to himself the objects displayed to the public on their triumphal litters, and then, on the other hand, let him think upon this Lollia, this one bit of a woman, the head of an empire, taking her place at table, thus attired; would he not much rather that the conquerors had been torn from their very chariots, than that they had conquered for such a result as this?

Nor, indeed, are these the most supreme evidences of luxury. There were formerly two pearls, the largest that had been ever seen in the whole world: Cleopatra, the last of the queens of Egypt, was in possession of them both, they having come to her by descent from the kings of the East. When Antony had been sated by her, day after day, with the most exquisite banquets, this queenly courtesan, inflated with vanity and disdainful arrogance, affected to treat all this sumptuousness and all these vast preparations with the greatest contempt; upon which Antony enquired what there was that could possibly be added to such extraordinary magnificence. To this she made answer, that on a single entertainment she would expend ten millions of sesterces. Antony was extremely desirous to learn how that could be done, but looked upon it as a thing quite impossible; and a wager was the result. On the following day, upon which the matter was to be decided, in order that she might not lose the wager, she had an entertainment set before Antony, magnificent in every respect, though no better than his usual repast. Upon this, Antony joked her, and enquired what was the amount expended upon it; to which she made answer that the banquet which he then beheld was only a trifling appendage to the real banquet, and that she alone would consume at the meal to the ascertained value of that amount, she herself would swallow the ten millions of sesterces; and so ordered the second course to be served. In obedience to her instructions, the servants placed before her a single vessel, which was filled with vinegar, a liquid, the sharpness and strength of which is able to dissolve pearls. At this moment she was wearing in her ears those choicest and most rare and unique productions of Nature; and while Antony was waiting to see what she was going to do, taking one of them from out of her ear, she threw it into the vinegar, and directly it was melted, swallowed it. Lucius Plancus, who had been named umpire in the wager, placed his hand upon the other at the very instant that she was making preparations to dissolve it in a similar manner, and declared that Antony had lost — an omen which, in the result, was fully confirmed. The fame of the second pearl is equal to that which attends its fellow. After the queen, who had thus come off victorious on so important a question, had been seized, it was cut asunder, in order that this, the other half of the entertainment, might serve as pendants for the ears of Venus, in the Pantheon at Rome.

Panthers' Breath (3.7)

The below is from Pliny's Natural History:

CHAP. 23.—PANTHERS.

The panther and the tiger are nearly the only animals that are remarkable for a skin distinguished by the variety of its spots;<sup>1</sup> whereas others have them of a single colour, appropriate to each species. The lions of Syria alone are black. The spots of the panther are like small eyes, upon a white ground. It is said that all quadrupeds are attracted in a most wonderful manner by their odour,<sup>2</sup> while they are terrified by the fierceness of their aspect; for which reason the creature conceals its head, and then seizes upon the animals that are attracted to it by the sweetness of the odour. It is said by some, that the panther has, on the shoulder, a spot which bears the form of the moon; and that, like it, it regularly increases to full, and then diminishes to a crescent. At present, we apply the general names of varia<sup>3</sup> and pard, (which last belongs to the males), to all the numerous species of this animal, which is very common in Africa and Syria.<sup>4</sup> Some writers distinguish the panther, as being remarkable for its whiteness: but as yet I have not observed any other difference between them.

1 Pliny, in B. xiii. c. 15, speaks of “tables of tiger and panther pattern,” as articles of ornamental furniture among the Romans, named from the peculiar patterns of the veins in the citrus wood, of which they were formed. — B.

2 This, though mentioned by Aristotle, Hist. Anim. B. ix. c. 8, is probably incorrect; and still more the addition made by Ælian, Anim. Nat. B. v. c. 40, that this odour is grateful to man. It has, however, induced some to conjecture, that the animal here described might be the civet but the description given is inapplicable to that animal; nor, indeed, does the civet appear to have been known to the ancients. For further information, see the remarks of Cuvier, Ajasson, vol. vi. p. 420, and Lemaire, vol. iii. p. 386. Pliny, in B. xxi. c. 18, says that no animal, except the panther, has any odour.—B.

3 Meaning the “spotted” or “parti-coloured” female.

4 Xenophon, in his Cynegeticon, says, that the pard is found on Mount Pangæus, in Macedonia; the truth of which is denied by Aristotle, who says that it is not to be found in Europe.

Mummmia (4.4)

This is an excerpt from the Wikipedia article on MUMMMIA:

*Mummmia, mumia, or originally mummy referred to several different preparations in the history of medicine, from “mineral pitch” to “powdered human mummies”. It originated from Arabic mūmiyā “a type of resinous bitumen found in Western Asia and used curatively” in traditional Islamic medicine, which was translated as pissasphaltus (from “pitch” and “asphalt”) in ancient Greek medicine. In medieval European medicine, mūmiyā “bitumen” was transliterated into Latin as mumia meaning both “a bituminous medicine from Persia” and “mummy”. Merchants in apothecaries dispensed expensive mummmia bitumen, which was thought to be an effective cure-all for many ailments. Beginning around the 12th century when supplies of imported natural bitumen ran short, mummmia was misinterpreted as “mummy”, and the word’s meaning expanded to “a black resinous exudate scraped out from embalmed Egyptian mummies”. This began a period of lucrative trade between Egypt and Europe, and suppliers substituted rare mummmia exudate with entire mummies, either embalmed or desiccated. After Egypt banned the shipment of mummmia in the 16th century, unscrupulous European apothecaries began to sell fraudulent mummmia prepared by embalming and desiccating fresh corpses. During the Renaissance, scholars proved that translating bituminous *mummmia as mummy was a mistake, and physicians stopped prescribing the ineffective drug. Lastly, artists in the 17th and 18th centuries used ground up mummies to tint a popular oil-paint called mummy brown.

Tortoise (5.4)

John S. Weld wrote this about the tortoise scene:

*The meaning of this scene is emphasized and perhaps Jonson's choice of symbol is explained by Erasmus's interpretation of the proverbial quam curat testudino muscas: "the mind fortified with virtue and philosophy fears the assaults of Fortune no more than a tortoise fears flies." — Opera, II. 662.*

"vomits crooked pins" (5.12)

Witches were said to make people do this.

The below is an excerpt from a late seventeenth century account of witchcraft:

In the Town of Beckenton, in Somersetshire, liveth one William Spicer, a young Man about eighteen Years of Age. As he was wont to pass by the Alms-house (where lived an Old Woman, about Four score) he would call her Witch, and tell her of her Buns; which did so enrage the Old Woman, that she threatened him with a Warrant; and accordingly did fetch one from a Neighbouring Justice of the Peace. At which he was so frightened, that he humbled himself to her, and promised never to call her so again. Within a few days after, this Young Man fell into the strangest Fits that held him about a Fortnight. When the Fits were upon him, he would often say that he did see this Old Woman against the Wall in the same Room of the House where he was, and that sometimes she did knock her Fist at him; sometimes grin her Teeth, and sometimes laugh at him in his Fits. He was so strong, that three or four Men could scarce hold him; and when he did call for Small Beer to drink, he would be sure to bring up some Crooked Pins to the Number of Thirty, and upwards.

In the same Town liveth one Mary Hill, about the same Age of this Young Man; who meeting with this Old Woman, demanded the Ring she borrowed of her, with a threatening from the Old Woman that she had been better to have let her kept it longer. About a Week before the said Mary was taken with Fits, she met this Old Woman in the Street; who taking her by the hand, desired her to go with her to Froom, to look after some Spinning Work. The said Mary being afraid, refused to go with her. About four days after she met the Old Woman again, who begged an Apple of her, which she refused to give her.

The Sunday following, she complained of a pricking in her Stomack; but on Monday, as she was Eating her Dinner, something arose in her Throat, which was like to have Choaked her; and at the same time she fell into Violent Fits, which held her till Nine or Ten a Clock at Night. The Fits were so strong and violent, that Four or Five Persons were scarce able to hold her, and in the midst of them, she would tell how she saw this old Woman against the Wall, grinning at her, and that she was the Person that had bewitcht her.

The Wednesday following, she began to throw up Crooked Pins, and so continued for the space of a Fortnight. After this, she began to throw up Nails and Pins. And then she began to throw up Nails again, and Handles of Spoons, several pieces of Iron, Lead, and Tin, with several clusters of Crooked Pins; some tied with Yarn, and some with Thread, with abundance of Blood. She threw up in all, above Two Hundred Crooked Pins.

The People of the Town seeing the sad and deplorable Condition of the said Mary, did cause this old Woman to be brought near the House where the Mary Lived, and being gathered together above an Hundred People, the said Mary was brought forth into the open Air, who immediately fell into such strong Fits, that two or three men were scarce able to hold her, and being brought upon the Hill by the Church, and the old Woman brought near her (notwithstanding there were four men to hold the said Mary in a Chair) she mounted up over their Heads into the Air; but the men, and others standing by, caught hold of her Legs, and pulled her down again.

This old Woman was ordered to be searched by a Jury of Women, who found about her several purple Spots, which they prickt with a sharp Needle, but she felt no pain. She had about her other Marks and Tokens of a Witch, and she was sent to the County Jayle.

This old Woman was had to a great River near the Town, to see whether she could sink under Water. Her Legs being tied, she was put in, and though she did endeavour to the uttermost by her Hands, yet she could not, but would lie upon her Back, and did Swim like a piece of Cork. There were present above Twenty Persons to Attest the Truth of this. She was had to the Water a second time, and being put in, she swam as at first; and though there were present above Two Hundred People to see this Sight, yet it could not be believed by many. At the same time, also, there was put into the Water, a Lusty young Woman, who sunk immediately, and had been drowned, had it not been for the help that was at hand. To satisfy the World, and to leave no Room for doubting, the old Woman was had down to the Water the third time, and being put in as before, she did still Swim. At this Swimming of her, were present, such a Company of People of the Town and Country, and many of them, Persons of Quality, as could not well be Numbered; so that now, there is scarce one Person that doubts of the Truth of this thing.

It is full Ten Weeks ago that this young Woman was first seized with these Terrible Fits, yet she continues to be often seized with terrible Fits, and to bring up both Nails and Handles of Spoons, and is still remaining an Object of great Pity.

APPENDIX B: ABOUT THE AUTHOR

It was a dark and stormy night. Suddenly a cry rang out, and on a hot summer night in 1954, Josephine, wife of Carl Bruce, gave birth to a boy — me. Unfortunately, this young married couple allowed Reuben Saturday, Josephine's brother, to name their first-born. Reuben, aka "The Joker," decided that Bruce was a nice name, so he decided to name me Bruce Bruce. I have gone by my middle name — David — ever since.

Being named Bruce David Bruce hasn't been all bad. Bank tellers remember me very quickly, so I don't often have to show an ID. It can be fun in charades, also. When I was a counselor as a teenager at Camp Echoing Hills in Warsaw, Ohio, a fellow counselor gave the signs for "sounds like" and "two words," then she pointed to a bruise on her leg twice. Bruise Bruise? Oh yeah, Bruce Bruce is the answer!

Uncle Reuben, by the way, gave me a haircut when I was in kindergarten. He cut my hair short and shaved a small bald spot on the back of my head. My mother wouldn't let me go to school until the bald spot grew out again.

Of all my brothers and sisters (six in all), I am the only transplant to Athens, Ohio. I was born in Newark, Ohio, and have lived all around Southeastern Ohio. However, I moved to Athens to go to Ohio University and have never left.

At Ohio U, I never could make up my mind whether to major in English or Philosophy, so I got a bachelor's degree with a double major in both areas, then I added a Master of Arts degree in English and a Master of Arts degree in Philosophy. Yes, I have my MAMA degree.

Currently, and for a long time to come (I eat fruits and veggies), I am spending my retirement writing books such as Nadia Comaneci: Perfect 10, The Funniest People in Dance, Homer's Iliad: A Retelling in Prose, and William Shakespeare's Othello: A Retelling in Prose.

By the way, my sister Brenda Kennedy writes romances such as A New Beginning and Shattered Dreams.
